Much of the time of a savage is taken up in providing for his safety. He tries to defend himself against those he is able to fight, he seeks hiding places from those who are too strong for him. The remedy for this miserable state of things is to be found in a settled government. To guard against foreign enemies and bands of robbers, government provides soldiers. There are police to apprehend criminals, judges to try them and prisons for their confinement. Were there no governments, man would try to carry arms for his defence or to pay other other men to defend him. If injured, there would be no judge to decide the case. Neither would there be any roads or post – offices or any other public services.

To pay for soldiers, police, judges and other officers, there must be taxes. If a person tried to defend himself, it would cost him far more, and after all, the protection would be very insufficient.

Questions:

- What is the problem faced by a savage?
- Why is a settled government necessary?
- What would happen if there were no government?
- What is the purpose of taxes?
