O P MALHOTRA'S

THE LAW OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

7TH EDITION

DR E. V. RAO

VOLUME 1

Sections 1 to 11

LexisNexis

Table of Contents

(IN) O P Malhotra: The Law of Industrial Disputes, 7e 2015

O P Malhotra: The Law of Industrial Disputes, 7e 2015

O P Malhotra

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 1. Short title, extent and commencement.—

(1) This Act may be called the Industrial Disputes Act 1947.

1[(2)It extends to the whole of India:

2[* * *]]

(3) It shall come into force on the first day of April, 1947.

---

1 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 2, for the former sub-section (wef 29-8-1956).

2 Proviso omitted by Act 51 of 1970, s 2 and Sch (wef 1-9-1971).

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context-

(a) 'appropriate government' means-

(i) in relation to any industrial dispute concerning [3][* * ] any industry carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government [4][ * ] or by a railway company [5][or concerning any such controlled industry as may be specified in this behalf by the Central Government] [6][ * ] or in relation to an industrial dispute concerning [7][a Dock Labour Board established under section 5A of the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act, 1948 (9 of 1948), or [8][the Industrial Finance Corporation of India Limited formed and registered under the Companies Act, 1956 (1 of 1956)], or the Employees' State Insurance Corporation established under section 3 of the Employees' State Insurance Act, 1948 (34 of 1948), or the Board of Trustees constituted under section 3A of the Coal Mines Provident Fund and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1948 (46 of 1948), or the Central Board of Trustees and the State Boards of Trustees constituted under section 5A and section 5B, respectively, of the Employees' Provident Fund and Miscellaneous Provisions Act, 1952 (19 of 1952), [9][ * *] or the Life Insurance Corporation of India established under section 3 of the Life Insurance Corporation Act, 1956 (31 of 1956), or [10][the Oil and Natural Gas Corporation Limited registered under the Companies Act, 1956 (1 of 1956)], or the Deposit Insurance and Credit Guarantee Corporation established under section 3 of the Deposit Insurance and Credit Guarantee Corporation Act, 1961 (47 of 1961), or the Central Warehousing Corporation established under section 3 of the Warehousing Corporations Act, 1962 (58 of 1962), or the Unit Trust of India established under section 3 of the Unit Trust of India Act, 1963 (52 of 1963), or the Food Corporation of India established under section 3, or a Board of Management established for two or more contiguous States under section 16, of the Food Corporations Act, 1964 (37 of 1964), or [11][the Airports Authority of India constituted under section 3 of the Airports Authority of India Act, 1994 (55 of 1994)], or a Regional Rural Bank established under section 3 of the Regional Rural Banks Act, 1976 (21 of 1976), or the Export Credit and Guarantee Corporation Limited or the Industrial Reconstruction Bank of India Limited], [12][the National Housing Bank established under section 3 of the National Housing Bank Act, 1987 (53 of 1987) or] [13][[14][an air transport service, or a banking or an insurance company,] a mine, an oil-field,] [15][a Cantonment Board,] or a [16][major port, any company in which not less than fifty-one per cent. of the paid-up share capital is held by the Central Government, or any corporation, not being a corporation referred to in this clause, established by or under any law made by Parliament, or the Central public sector undertaking, subsidiary companies set up by the principal undertaking and autonomous bodies owned or controlled by the Central Government, the Central Government and]

17[(ii) in relation to any other industrial dispute, including the State public sector undertaking, subsidiary companies set up by the principal undertaking and autonomous bodies owned or controlled by the State Government, the State Government:

Provided that in case of a dispute between a contractor and the contract labour employed through the contractor in any industrial establishment where such dispute first arose, the appropriate Government shall be the Central Government or the State Government, as the case may be, which has control over such industrial establishment.]

18 [(aa) "arbitrator" includes an umpire;]

19[20[(aaa) "average pay" means the average of the wages payable to a workman—

(i) in the case of monthly paid workman, in the three complete calendar months,

(ii) in the case of weekly paid workman, in the four complete weeks,

(iii) in the case of daily-paid workman, in the twelve full working days, preceding the date on which the average pay becomes payable if the workman had worked for three complete calendar months or four complete weeks or twelve full working days, as the case may be, and where such calculation cannot be made, the average pay shall be calculated as the average of the wages payable to a workman during the period he actually worked;]

21[(b) "award" means an interim or a final determination of any industrial dispute or of any question relating thereto by any Labour Court, Industrial Tribunal or National Industrial Tribunal and includes an arbitration award made under Section 10-A;]

22[(bb) "Banking Company" means a banking company as defined in Section 5 of the Banking Companies Act, 1949 (10 of 1949)[23], having branches or other establishments in more than one State, and includes [24][the Export-Import Bank of India] [25][the Industrial Reconstruction Bank of India,] [26][* * *] [27][the Small Industries Development Bank of India established under section 3 of the Small Industries Development Bank of India Act, 1989 (39 of 1989),] the Reserve Bank of India, the State Bank of India, [28][a corresponding new bank constituted under section 3 of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act, 1970 (5 of 1970), [29][a corresponding new bank constituted under section 3 of the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act, 1980 (40 of 1980), and any subsidiary bank]], as defined in the State Bank of India (Subsidiary Banks) Act, 1959 (38 of 1959);]

(c) "Board" means a Board of Conciliation constituted under this Act;

30[(cc) "closure" means the permanent closing down of a place of employment or part thereof;]

(d) "conciliation officer" means a conciliation officer appointed under this Act;

(e) "conciliation proceeding" means any proceeding held by a conciliation officer or Board under this Act;

31[(ee) "controlled industry" means any industry the control of which by the Union has been declared by any Central Act to be expedient in the public interest;]

[32][]

(f) "Court" means a Court of Inquiry constituted under this Act;

(g) "employer" means—

(i) in relation to an industry carried on by or under the authority of any department of [33][the Central Government or a State Government,] the authority prescribed in this behalf, or where no authority is prescribed, the head of the department;

(ii) in relation to an industry carried on by or on behalf of a local authority, the chief executive officer of that authority;

34[(gg) "executive" in relation to a trade union, means the body, by whatever name called, to which the management of the affairs of the trade union is entrusted].

35[(h) "Federal Railway" * * *]

(i) a person shall be deemed to be "independent" for the purpose of his appointment as the Chairman or other member of a Board, Court or Tribunal, if he is unconnected with the industrial dispute referred to such Board, Court or Tribunal or with any industry directly affected by such dispute:

[36][Provided that no person shall cease to be independent by reason only of the fact that he is a shareholder of an incorporated company which is connected with, or likely to be affected by, such industrial dispute; but in such a case, he shall disclose to the appropriate Government the nature and extent of the shares held by him in such company;]

37[(j) "industry" means any business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employers and includes any calling, service, employment, handicraft, or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen;]

(k) "industrial dispute" means any dispute or difference between employers and employers, or between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour, of any person;

38[(ka) "Industrial establishment or undertaking" means an establishment or undertaking in which any industry is carried on:

Provided that where several activities are carried on in an establishment or undertaking and only one or some of such activities is or are an industry or industries, then,—

(a) if any unit of such establishment of undertaking carrying on any activity, being an industry, is severable from the other unit or units of such establishment or undertaking, such unit shall be deemed to be a separate industrial establishment or undertaking;

(b) if the predominant activity or each of the predominant activities carried on in such establishment or undertaking or any unit thereof is an industry and the other activity or each of the other activities carried on in such establishment or undertaking or unit thereof is not severable from and is, for the purpose of carrying on, or aiding the carrying on of, such predominant activity or activities, the entire establishment or undertaking or, as the case may be, unit thereof shall be deemed to be an industrial establishment or undertaking;]

39[(kk) "insurance company" means an insurance company as defined in section 2 of the Insurance Act, 1938 (4 of 1938), having branches or other establishments in more than one State;]

40[(kka) "khadi" has the meaning assigned to it in clause (d) of section 2 of the Khadi and Village Industries Commission Act, 1956 (61 of 1956);]

41[[(kkb)] "Labour Court" means a Labour Court constituted under section 7 ;]

42[(kkk) "lay-off" (with its grammatical variations and cognate expressions) means the failure, refusal or inability of an employer on account of shortage of coal, power or raw materials or the accumulation of stocks or the breakdown of machinery [43][or natural calamity or for any other connected reason] to give employment to a workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of his industrial establishment and who has not been retrenched.

Explanation.—Every workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of the industrial establishment and who presents himself for work at the establishment at the time appointed for the purpose during normal working hours on any day and is not given employment by the employer within two hours of his so presenting himself shall be deemed to have been laid-off for that day within the meaning of this clause:

Provided that if the workman, instead of being given employment at the commencement of any shift for any day is asked to present himself for the purpose during the second half of the shift for the day and is given employment then, he shall be deemed to have been laid-off only for one-half of that day:

Provided further that if he is not given any such employment even after so presenting himself, he shall not be deemed to have been laid-off for the second half of the shift for the day and shall be entitled to full basic wages and dearness allowance for that part of the day];

(l) "lock-out" means the [44][temporary closing of a place of employment], or the suspension of work, or the refusal by an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him;

45[(la) "major port" means a major port as defined in clause (8) of section 3 of the Indian Ports Act, 1908 (15 of 1908);

(lb) "mine" means a mine as defined in clause (j) of sub-section (1) of section 2 of the Mines Act, 1952 (35 of 1952);]

46[(ll) "National Tribunal" means a National Industrial Tribunal constituted under section 7B ;]

47[(lll) "office bearer", in relation to a trade union, includes any member of the executive thereof, but does not include an auditor;]

(m) "prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under this Act;

(n) "public utility service" means—

(i) any railway service [48][or any transport service for the carriage of passenger or goods by air;]

49[(ia) any service in, or in connection with the working of, any major port or dock;]

(ii) any section of an industrial establishment, on the working of which the safety of the establishment or the workmen employed therein depends;

(iii) any postal, telegraph or telephone service;

(iv) any industry which supplies power, light or water to the public;

(v) any system of public conservancy or sanitation;

(vi) any industry specified in the [50][First Schedule] which the appropriate Government may, if satisfied that public emergency or public interest so requires, by notification in the Official Gazette, declared to be a public utility service for the purposes of this Act, for such period as may be specified in the notification:

Provided that the period so specified shall not, in the first instance, exceed six months but may, by a like notification, be extended from time to time, by any period not exceeding six months, at anyone time if in the opinion of the appropriate Government public emergency or public interest requires such extension;

(o) "railway company" means a railway company as defined in section 3 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890 (9 of 1890);[51]

52[(oo)] "retrenchment" means the termination by the employer of the service of a workman for any reason whatsoever, otherwise than as a punishment inflicted by way of disciplinary action, but does not include—

(a) voluntary retirement of the workman; or

(b) retirement of the workman on reaching the age of superannuating if the contract of employment between the employer and the workman concerned contains a stipulation in that behalf; or

53[(bb) termination of the service of the workman as a result of the non-removal of the contract of employment between the employer and the workman concerned on its expiry or of such contract being terminated under a stipulation in that behalf contained therein; or]

(c) termination of the service of a workman on the ground of continued ill-health;

54[(p) "settlement" means a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceeding and includes a written agreement between the employer and workmen arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding where such agreement has been signed by the parties thereto in such manner as may be prescribed and a copy thereof has been sent to [55][an officer authorised in this behalf by] the appropriate Government and the conciliation officer;]

(q) "strike" means a cessation of work by a body of persons employed in any industry acting in combination, or a concerted refusal, or a refusal under a common understanding, of any number of persons who are or have been so employed to continue to work or to accept employment;

56[(qq) "trade union" means a trade union registered under the Trade Unions Act, 1926 (16 of 1926);]

57[(r) "Tribunal" means an Industrial Tribunal constituted under section 7A and includes an industrial Tribunal constituted before the 10th day of March, 1957, under this Act;]

58[(ra) "unfair labour practice" means any of the practices specified in the Fifth Schedule;]

59[(rb) "village industries" has the meaning assigned to it in clause (h) of section 2 of the Khadi and Village Industries Commission Act, 1956 (61 of 1956);]

60[(rr) "wages" means all remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of employment, express or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a workman in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment, and includes—

(i) such allowance (including dearness allowance) as the workman is for the time being entitled to;

(ii) the value of any house accommodation, or of supply of light, water, medical attendance or other amenity or of any service or of any concessional supply of foodgrains or other articles;

(iii) any travelling concession;

61[(iv) any commission payable on the promotion of sales or business or both;]

but does not include—

(a) any bonus;

(b) any contribution paid or payable by the employer to any pension fund or provident fund or for the benefit of the workman under any law for the time being in force;

(c) any gratuity payable on the termination of his service;]

62[(s) "workman" means any person (including an apprentice) employed in any industry to do any manual, unskilled, skilled, technical, operational, clerical or supervisory work for hire or reward, whether the terms of employment be express or implied, and for the purposes of any proceeding under this Act in relation to an industrial dispute, includes any such person who has been dismissed, discharged or retrenched in connection with, or as a consequence of, that dispute, or whose dismissal, discharge or retrenchment has led to that dispute, but does not include any such person—

(i) who is subject to the Air Force Act, 1950 (45 of 1950), or the Army Act, 1950 (46 of 1950), or the Navy Act, 1957 (62 of 1957); or

(ii) who is employed in the police service or as an officer or other employee of a prison; or

(iii) who is employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity; or

(iv) who, being employed in a supervisory capacity, draws wages exceeding [63][ten thousand rupees] per mensem or exercises, either by the nature of the duties attached to the office or by reason of the powers vested in him, functions mainly of a managerial nature].

CONSTRUCTION

Unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context

The definition of a word or phrase in the definition section of a statute does not necessarily apply to every context in which the word or the phrase may appear. If the word or phrase is used in a context in which the definition will not fit in, then the word or phrase has to be interpreted according to its ordinary meaning. When a statute does not contain the qualifying words 'unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context', those qualifying words are always understood. Words must take their colour from the context and need not have the same meaning in every section.[64]The definition section is a dictionary for the purpose of the Act but the expressions which are defined may be used in different senses and with a meaning of a limited character.[65]Where an Act, like the General Clauses Act, is enacted in order to shorten the language used in parliamentary legislations and to avoid a repetition of the same words in the course of the same piece of legislation, it is not meant to give a hide-bound meaning to terms and phrases generally occurring in the legislation. This is the reason why the definition sections contain words like 'unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context'. Words and phrases have either a very narrow or a very wide significance, according to the requirements of the context and subject of the legislation, which would decide whether the one or the other meaning is to be attached to such words or phrases. The statute book contains many illustrations showing that the same words have been used in different senses in different contexts.[66] In Bennett Coleman, in view of the words 'unless the context otherwise requires', preambling the definition section of the Working Journalists and other Newspaper Employees' (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act 1955, construing the words 'who is employed' in the definition of the 'Working Journalist', the Supreme Court held that even an ex-employee could resort to the protection of the Act with respect to the claims which accrued to him while he was in employment, even after ceasing to be in employment.[67]

Means

When a statute says that a word or phrase shall 'mean' not merely 'include'—certain things or acts, the definition is a hard and fast definition, and no other meaning can be assigned to the expression than, that which is put down in the definition.[68] In other words, the legislature intends to exhaust the significance of the term defined.[69]

Includes

'Shall include' is a phrase of extension and does not restrict the definition; it is not equivalent to 'shall mean'.[70] 'Include' is generally used in interpretation clauses, in order to enlarge the meaning of words or phrases occurring in the body of the statute; and when it is so used, these words or phrases must be construed as comprehending, not only such things as they signify according to their natural import, but also those things which the interpretation clause declares that they shall include. When the word 'includes' is used in a definition, the legislature intends the definition to be enumerative, but not exhaustive. That is to say, the term defined will retain its ordinary meaning, but its scope would be extended to bring within it matters, which its ordinary meaning mayor may not comprise.[71]But 'include' is susceptible of another construction, which may become imperative if the context of the Act is sufficient to show that it was not merely employed for the purpose of adding to the natural significance of the words or expressions defined. It may be equivalent to 'mean and include', and in that case, it may afford an exhaustive explanation of the meaning, which, for the purposes of the Act, must invariably be attached to those words.

Need for Common Definitions

Stressing the need for simplicity and uniformity in the definitions of terms constantly used in the labour laws, the NCL-II observed:

> One of the most important steps that one needs to take in rationalising and simplifying the existing labour laws is in the area of simple common definitions of terms that are in constant use; such terms include 'worker', 'wages' and 'establishment'. By making the law applicable to establishments employing 20 or more Workers, irrespective of the nature of the activity in which the establishment is engaged, we have avoided the need to define 'industry'. After examining all aspects of the question, we have come to the conclusion that the persons engaged in domestic service are better covered under the proposed type of umbrella legislation, particularly in regard to wages, hours of work, working conditions, safety and social security.[72]

Clause (a): APPROPRIATE GOVERNMENT

Evolution

The term 'appropriate government' was not defined in the Trade Disputes Act 1929 (7 of 1929). The term was defined by s 2(a) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947. Before it reached its present form, the definition had undergone a number of amendments, which have been indicated in the footnotes to the text of the section. The definition is exhaustive. It is not discriminatory or unconstitutional and does not contravene the principle of equality under Art. 14 of the Constitution.[73]

Sub-Clause (i): Central Government

In relation to any industrial dispute concerning an industrial undertaking or establishment enumerated in this clause, the Central Government is the appropriate government. In a union territory like Delhi, the central and the state governments merge and it is immaterial whether an order of reference is made by the one or the other.[74] The word 'concerning', according to Webster's Third New International Dictionary, means 'relating to, regarding, respecting, about-an affair that concerns one:..'. The word 'concerning' must be construed in a reasonable manner, and as referring to such 'industrial disputes' as have got a proximate, intimate and real connection with the establishments or authority mentioned in the definition, and it must not be taken to refer to a connection which is farfetched, remote and hypothetical. It would, therefore, be a question of fact, in each case, to be decided with reference to the facts of that case, as to whether an 'industrial dispute' concerns any of the corporations or authorities mentioned in the definition or not.[75]

Any industry carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government

Before discussing the judicial gloss on this highly controversial definition with special reference to the phrase "by or under the authority of the Central Government", it is pertinent to bring to the notice of the readers that s 2(a) has been amended by the Parliament by ID Amendment Act 2010, whereby the following phrases were inserted in sub-cl (i) and sub-cl (ii) of cl (a) of s 2, ie, 'appropriate Government' after the words 'major port':

[76][any company in which not less than fifty-one percent of the paid-up share capital is held by the Central Government, or any corporation, not being a corporation referred to in this clause, established by or under any law made by the Parliament, or the Central public sector undertaking, subsidiary companies set up by the principal undertaking and autonomous bodies owned or controlled by the Central Government,] the Central Government, and

(ii) [77][in relation to any other industrial dispute, including the State public sector undertaking, subsidiary companies set up by the principal undertaking and autonomous bodies owned or controlled by the State Government, the State Government;

Provided that in case of a dispute between a contractor and the contract labour employed through the contractor in any industrial establishment where such dispute first arose, the appropriate Government shall be the Central Government or the State Government, as the case may be, which has control over such industrial establishment.]

In view of the said amendment of major significance, most of the law laid down by High Courts and the Supreme Court in the pre-amendment phase will have no application to cases arising in the post-amendment phase, in so far as the Central Public Sector undertakings and Statutory Corporations falling within the above parameters are concerned. Viewed thus, a large majority of the decisions discussed below, which were rendered in the pre-amendment phase - on the question which is the appropriate government in respect of a central public sector undertaking: is it the central government or the state government in whose territorial jurisdiction the unit is located? - stand reduced to mere academic discussion and research work, with no practical application to disputes arising after 2010. With these introductory remarks, let us take a look at the welter of confusing judicial trends that ruled the industrial relations firmament for over six decades.

In construing the phrase 'carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government,' in the definition of 'appropriate government' in s 2(a) of the Act, there being nothing to the contrary in that provision, the word 'authority' must be construed according to its ordinary meaning and, therefore, must mean a legal power given by one person to another to do an Act. In other words, a person is said to be authorised or to have authority when he is in such a position that he can Act in a certain manner without incurring liability, to which he would be exposed but for the authority, or, so as to produce the same effect as if the person granting the authority had for himself, done the Act. The words 'under the authority of, mean pursuant to the authority, such as where an agent or servant acts under such authority of his principal.[78] These words mean much the same as 'on behalf of'.[79] This phrase must, therefore, mean and is intended to apply to industries carried on directly under the authority of the Central Government.[80] For an industry to be carried on under the authority of the Central Government, it must be an industry belonging to the Central Government, that is to say, its undertaking.[81] The expression 'carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government' involves a direct nexus with the industry, through servants or agents of the Central Government.[82] In order to come within the purview of this expression, an industry must be acting pursuant to the authority of the Central Government, as if it were an agent or servant of the Central Government with the latter as its principal.[83] Thus, an industry carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government is a Central Government industry, which may be carried on directly by the Central Government or by some body or person nominated by the government for that purpose. The definition of the employer in s 2(g) of the Act, which also uses the same words, viz, 'carried on by or under the authority of the government, means either an industry carried on directly by a department of the government, such as posts and telegraphs or the railways, or one carried on by such department, through the instrumentality of an agent.[84]

Under s 80 of the Punjab Reorganisation Act 1966, from the appointed date, ie, 1 November 1966, the Beas Dam Project was to be 'carried on' by the Central Government, although the Central Government was to Act on behalf of the successor states and the State of Rajasthan. It was held that in relation to an industrial dispute between the project and its workmen, subsequent to the appointed day, the appropriate government to make a reference was the Central Government, and not the State of Punjab.[85]Likewise, Central Electro Chemical Research Institute, which is one of the national laboratories established by the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research, has been held to be controlled by and 'carried on or under the authority of the Central Government, for the purpose of the Act.' Accordingly, the appropriate government is the Central Government, and not the state government.[86] No business owned or carried on by a private person or a limited company can be a business carried on by or under the authority of the government.[87] Likewise, industries which are carried on by incorporated commercial corporations, which are governed by their own constitutions, for their own purposes, cannot be described as carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government as these corporations are independent legal entities and run the industries for their own purposes. Even if the Central Government owns the entire share capital and controls such corporations, the industries carried on by them are still worked under the authority of their own constitutions or charters. [88]

In Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union, the State of Bihar referred an industrial dispute between the heavy engineering corporation, a company incorporated under the Companies Act 1956, and its workmen, for adjudication, to the industrial tribunal. The reference was challenged in a writ petition by the mazdoor union before the High Court of Patna, contending that the 'appropriate government' to refer the dispute was the Central Government and not the state government. The High Court rejected the contention and upheld the validity of the order of reference.[89] In appeal, by special leave against the holding of the High Court, a two judge Bench of the Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the High Court as it held that the words 'under authority of' mean 'pursuant to the authority', like an agent or servant acting under or pursuant to the authority of its principal or master. Since the corporation could not be said to be carrying on its business pursuant to the authority of the Central Government, it was not acting under the authority of the Central Government.

Relying on common law interpretation, the Bench took the view that the company derives its powers and functions from its memorandum and articles of association. The fact that the entire share capital was contributed by the Central Government and all the shares were held by the President and officers of the Central Government, who were incharge of the management of the corporation, was not relevant, as the shareholders and the corporation were distinct entities. And the fact that the President of India and certain officers of the Central Government held all its shares did not make the company an agent either of the President or of the Central Government. The power to decide as to how the company should function, how the directors should be appointed and how the wages and salaries payable by the company to its employees should be determined, were all derived from the memorandum and articles of association of the corporation and not by reason of the company being an agent of the Central Government. Therefore, on the basis of the incorporation of the company and in view of the law of principal and agent as regards a company registered under the Companies Act, the court came to the conclusion that the State of Bihar was the appropriate government, and not the Central Government. This holding was followed by a three judge Bench of the court in Hindustan Aeronautics, in which the dispute related to the workmen employed in the Barrackpore branch of Hindustan Aeronautics, whose Head Office is located in Bangalore. The Supreme Court rejected the contention that the appropriate government was the Central Government or, in the alternative, Karnataka Government, and held that West Bengal was the appropriate government.[90]

In Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh, another three judge Bench considered the purport of the expression 'under the authority of any department of the Central Government' for the purpose of payment of bonus, while interpreting s 32(4) of the Payment of Bonus Act. The court held that the industrial undertaking had its own personality and status despite the power exercised by the Central Government, which directed the management and subjected it to regulatory control.[91] These two decisions were followed by a two judge Bench decision of the court in Food Corporation.[92] In Air India Statutory Corpn, K Ramaswamy J held that the corporations and companies held and controlled by the central and state governments will be the instruments of centre and states respectively within the meaning of Art. 12 of the Constitution.[93] Therefore, after this decision, the law laid down by the court in the earlier dicta,[94] stands overturned. So also do the holdings of the Karnataka,[1] Delhi,[2] Kerala,[3] Bombay,[4] Patna,[5] Madras[6] and Bombay,[7] High Courts.

In Bharat Glass Works, the question, before Calcutta High Court was whether an undertaking, the management and control of which was taken over by the Central Government, could be said to be an industry 'carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government.' Subsequent to the said takeover, the State of West Bengal referred an industrial dispute between the company and its workmen, to an industrial tribunal, for adjudication. The order of reference was challenged before the Calcutta High Court on the ground that an industry which is 'controlled' in the manner laid down under that Act, must be held to be 'carried on under the authority of the Central Government'. A single judge of the High Court negatived the contention, holding that a business which is carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government must be a Central Government business. In other words, an industry, to be 'carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government', must be an industry 'belonging to the Central Government, that is to say, its own undertaking'.[8]

In DP Kelkar, the Bombay High Court held that under the provisions of Ch IIIA, the management and control of the establishment is completely taken away from the directors and substantially from the shareholders, and the effective management and control of the Central Government, through the authorized controller, is substituted. In the circumstances, it is impossible not to hold that the industrial undertaking is being 'carried on under the authority of the Central Government'.[9]

In National Textile Corpn, dissenting from DP Kelkar, the Allahabad High Court declined to accept the temporary external control of the management of the mills as tantamounting to an abrogation of the proprietary rights and ownership of the mills, which continued with the company only, and held that the industry in respect of the mills, on account of their management being taken over in accordance with the provisions of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act 1951, could not be said to be carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government.[10] This point may not be covered by the ratio of the holding of the Supreme Court in Air India Statutory Corporation (supra), because such a company cannot be said to be an instrument of the state. But as long as its control and management vests with the Central Government, under the Industries (Development & Regulation) Act, it cannot be gainsaid that factually, it is 'carried on under the authority of the Central Government', by virtue of the provisions of that Act. Hence, the 'appropriate government' to refer a dispute to, between such company and its workmen, would be the Central Government. The view expressed by Ramaswamy J in Air India Statutory Corporation, does not seem to have found favour with several High Courts.

In Cotton Corporation, the Karnataka High Court held that merely because the government of India was holding a majority of the shares in the Cotton Corporation of India, and was exercising control over corporation, it could not be said that the Central Government was the appropriate government within the meaning of s 2(a)(i). On this view of the matter, the court held that the state government, within whose territorial jurisdiction the dispute arose, would be the appropriate government.[11] In respect of Castrol (India) Ltd, which deals in lubricants, the Central Government is the appropriate government, as it falls within the category of industries engaged in the manufacture or production of mineral oil, motor and aviation spirit, diesel oil, kerosene oil, etc, which have been declared as controlled industries within the meaning of s 2(a)(i), by a notification issued on 6 May 1994.[12] Where a reference was made by the state government regarding a dispute relating to Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd, it was challenged on the basis of the ratio of Air India Statutory Corpn. A single judge of the Bombay High Court repelled the contention and held that the said decision in Air India Statutory Corpn was rendered in connection with the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970, and hence, it had no application to a case falling under the Industrial Disputes Act and that, being a decision by a Bench of three-judges, it could not be said to overrule the earlier decision given by a co-ordinate Bench in Hindustan Aeronautics,[13]to the effect that the state government was the appropriate government for the purpose of Industrial Disputes Act.[14]

In Saudi Arabian Airlines, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that where a reference for adjudication was made by the state government, being the appropriate government under s 2(a) as on the date of reference, a subsequent amendment to s 2(a), by which Central Government was made the appropriate government in respect of the said industry, can have only a prospective operation and it would not put an end to the adjudication proceedings already commenced on the reference made by the state government in the pre-amended period. The proceedings commenced upon the said reference must be carried to their logical conclusion, even after the amendment comes into force. The award passed by the labour court and published by the state government in that case was, therefore, held perfectly valid and justified.[15] In Meenakshi Patel v EEPC , a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the Engineering Export Promotion Council, though not a 'controlled industry', was certainly an industry carried on 'under the authority of the Central Government' and, therefore, the Central Government would be the appropriate government.[16] In respect of Indian Council of Agricultural Research (ICAR), the Central Government is the appropriate government as it exercises sufficient authority and control in the actual functioning of ICAR.[17]

Any Industry Carried on by a Railway Company

With respect to a railway company, the 'appropriate government' is the Central Government. But a business carried on by a private limited company, though under the licence and control of the East India Railway Administration, is not an industry carried on by a railway company.[18] However, the Central Government and not the state government, will be the appropriate government for making the reference of a dispute, for adjudication, on the matter of a termination of the service of a coolie working under a railway contractor.[19]

Any controlled industry as may be specified in this behalf by the Central Government

In order that the Central Government may be the 'appropriate government' in relation to a controlled industry, two requirements must be satisfied, viz,

(a) the industry should be a 'controlled industry'; and

(b) it should have been 'specified in this behalf ie, it should have been specified as such for the purpose of this provision.[20]

These two requirements are to be satisfied cumulatively.[21] As pointed out by the Supreme Court in Bijay Cotton Mills, that in order to attract the provisions of this clause, it is not enough that the industry in question is a 'controlled industry', but it should also have been specified by the Central Government as a 'controlled industry' for the purposes of s 2(a)(i).[22] In relation to the employees employed in a canteen, run by a contractor in the premises of the Hindustan Petroleum Corporation, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the Central Government would be the appropriate government, in view of the fact that the Central Government had notified that the appropriate government with respect to the corporation will be the Central Government.[23]

Specified Corporations

With respect to disputes relating to the following corporations and bodies, the Central Government has specifically been made the 'appropriate government':

(a) A Dock Labour Board;

(b) The Industrial Corporation of India Limited, formed and registered under the Companies Act 1956;

(c) The Employees State Insurance Corporation;

(d) A Board of Trustees;

(e) The Central Board of Trustees and the State Board of Trustees;

(f) The Indian Airlines Corporation and the Air India Corporation;

(g) The Life Insurance Corporation of India;

(h) The Oil and Natural Gas Commission;

(i) The Deposit Insurance and Credit Guarantee Corporation;

(j) The Central Warehousing Corporation;

(k) The Unit Trust of India;

(l) The Food Corporation of India;

(m) The International Air Port Authority of India;

(n) A Regional Rural Bank;

(o) The Export Credit and Guarantee Corporation Ltd;

(p) The Industrial Reconstruction Corporation of India Ltd; and;

(q) The Banking Services Commission.

A Banking Company

A banking company has been defined in cl (bb) of s 2. It is only with respect to the banking companies falling within the definition of a banking company in the Act, that the Central Government is the appropriate government. With respect to the other banking companies, only the State Government in which the bank is situated, would be the appropriate government, [See, notes under cl (bb)].

An Insurance Company

An insurance company has been defined in cl (kk) of s 2. It is only in relation to the insurance companies falling within the definition, that the Central Government is the appropriate government; with respect to the other companies, it is the state government. [See, notes under cl (kk)].

A Mine

The words, 'in relation to an industrial dispute concerning ... a mine,' in this clause, have to be construed without reference to the broad definition of an industry in s 2(j) of the Act.[24] It is quite clear that the employees who are employed in any mining operation, for the purpose of searching and obtaining minerals by extraction, including all borings, bore-holes and oil-wells and other modes of working, as enumerated in the definition of a 'mine', can be stated to be employed in a mine. Likewise, employees engaged in loading ore in a mine, are employed in a mine.[25] But, unless a person is so employed, he cannot be said to be engaged in any kind of work incidental to or connected with mining operations.[26] An illustration of this point is Serajuddin & Co,[27] where the Supreme Court held that an 'industrial dispute' between the workmen employed in the head office of a company at Calcutta, engaged in a mining business, having its mines in the State of Orissa, was not an industrial dispute concerning a 'mine', as the head office was not connected with the mining operations. The Patna High Court, in Khas Jeenagora Coal Co, took the view that the Central Government was not the 'appropriate government' in connection with a dispute connected with the non-employment of a person working as a watchman or as a peon, in the bungalow of a director of the company, situated at the mine site.[28] Likewise, regarding a dispute about the clerks working in the accounts section of certain collieries, who were not doing any job directly connected with the mining operations, the appropriate government was the state government and not the Central Government.[29] The Gauhati High Court held that an oil refinery cannot be treated as a mine within the meaning of s 2(j)(viii) of the Mines Act.[30]

The expression 'concerning a mine' in s 2(a)(i) of the Act—a welfare statute—has to be liberally construed. There is no indication in the Act that the word 'mine' should be given a narrow meaning such as to exclude stone-quarries.[31] It is a well-settled position of law that a quarry is included in 'mine'.[32] Loading and unloading of ore is an activity connected with mining.[33] But a cement factory using lime stone from mines miles away from the factory and working independently of such mines, cannot be called a workshop of the mines, even if the mine and the factory are owned by the same management.[34] An industrial dispute between the Neyveli Lignite Corporation Ltd and the employees engaged in its security force was not an industrial dispute concerning a 'mine', because the category of Watch and Ward-the security force-was not included in the definition of 'a person employed in the mine' in s 2(1)(h) of the Mines Act, prior to its amendment by Act 42 of 1983.[35]

An Oil-field

The appropriate government in relation to an industrial dispute concerning an oil-field is the Central Government.

A Cantonment Board

The Punjab High Court held that the 'appropriate government', with respect to a cantonment board created and regulated by the provisions of the Cantonment Act 1924 while managing the affairs of the cantonment board under the provisions of Ch III of the Act and acting under the supervision and control of the Central Government, was the Central Government.[36] However, the legislature specifically included 'Cantonment Board' in s 2(a)(i) by the Amending Act No 36 of 1964, thereby putting an end to any confusion in this regard.

A Major Port

The expression 'in relation to any industrial dispute concerning a major port' was considered by the judicial commissioner, Kutch, with respect to a dispute in PK Pillai.[37] The company had an office in the Kandla Port, which was carrying on its business in the port. It was observed that these words would have applied if there were a dispute 'between the port authorities and their workmen or between people doing the port work and their workmen'. But the company was neither a port authority, nor doing port work; hence the 'appropriate government' was the state government, and not the Central Government. But in the under-noted case,[38] the Bombay High Court held that the activities of a firm, carrying on its business of clearing, shipping and managing a godown department in a port, were concerning a 'major port', hence the Central Government was the appropriate government. In connection with a dispute relating to the Port of Mormugoa, a major port by virtue of r 2(f) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, the reference of such dispute by the administrator appointed by the President, was held to be a reference by the Central Government, which was the 'appropriate government'.[39] The Central Government is the 'appropriate government' in respect of a dispute arising in the Union Territory of Goa, Daman and Diu.[40] In Hindustan Aeronautics, a reference made by the Government of UP under s 4K of the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947 was challenged by the petitioner company. Quashing the reference, Shishir Kumar J, of the Allahabad High Court held that a reference by the state government under the said section of the State Act was itself not maintainable in view of the fact that the Central Government, which exercises control and authority over Hindustan Aeronautics, is the appropriate government; and, by the same token, any subsequent application made by the state government under s 6(6) of the said Act for correcting any clerical or arithmetical error in the relevant award was also not maintainable.[41]

Sub-clause (ii): State Government

In relation to any industrial dispute other than those specified in sub-cl (i), the appropriate government would be the State Government. In other words, all industrial disputes which are outside the purview of sub-cl (i) are the concerns of the state government, under sub-cl (ii). Thus, the general rule is that an industrial dispute arising between an employer and his employee would be referred for adjudication by the state government, except in the cases falling under s 2(a)(i) of the Act.[42]The Act has not defined the meaning to be assigned to the word 'state government'. But for the purposes of this clause, the 'Union Territory of Delhi', administered by the lieutenant governor, has been held to be a 'state government' by a Full Bench of the Delhi High Court.[43]Consequently, where a function is to be discharged in relation to 'industrial disputes' or the exercise of any other power under the Act and the 'appropriate government' is the 'State Government', it can be validly discharged by the lieutenant governor of Delhi. This is the plain reading of the provisions of s 2(a)(ii) of the Act, read with s 3(8)(b)(iii) and s 3(60) of the General Clauses Act 1897.[44]

Concerns having establishments in more than one State

It has been seen that in relation to 'industrial disputes' concerning the bodies envisaged in sub-cl (i) of cl (a) of s 2, the Central Government, and in relation to other industrial disputes, the state government is the 'appropriate government'. In cases where the entire business of an establishment is confined to the territories of a state, obviously, the government of that state is the 'appropriate government'. But difficulties arise in cases where an employer has establishments in more than one state. The Act does not contain any provisions in this connection. Nor does it contemplate a joint reference by more than one state.[45] In certain cases, the courts have relied upon the principles governing the jurisdiction of civil courts to entertain actions or proceedings. The principle of 'cause of action' has been pressed into service, though this test is neither comprehensive, nor satisfactory. The Act does not deal with 'the cause of action', nor does it indicate as to what factors will confer jurisdiction on the 'appropriate government' for making a reference in the case of an employer having establishments in more than one state. No exhaustive definition of a 'cause of action' is possible. A Full Bench of the Patna High Court, in Paritosh Kumar Pal, observed that, generally, a cause of action 'constitutes all that bundle of facts which, entitles the plaintiff to claim the legal reliefs sought for, and broadly speaking, those very considerations would be attracted in the case of an 'industrial dispute' also, which would encompass all that bundle of facts on the basis of which a workman would invoke the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act.[46]

The decision of the Bombay High Court, in Lalbhai Tricumlal, has erroneously been taken to be the foundation up on which the edifice of the subsequent case law has been built. In this case, the head office of the employer company was in Ahmedabad and it had a branch office in Bombay. The services of a workman, who was employed in the Bombay branch, were terminated. The workman filed an application before the labour court at Bombay under the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946, for reinstatement. The employer raised the objection that the labour court at Bombay had no jurisdiction to deal with the application, as the only court that was competent to deal with the matter was the labour court at Ahmedabad. The Bombay labour court, therefore, made a reference to the industrial court, under s 81 of that Act, and the industrial court held that the Bombay labour court had jurisdiction. In a writ petition against the said order, Chagla CJ observed that, applying the well-known tests of jurisdiction, a court or tribunal would have jurisdiction if the parties reside within its jurisdiction or if the subject-matter of the dispute substantially arises within jurisdiction. And, therefore, the correct approach to this question is to ask ourselves - where did this dispute substantially arise? Since the workman had been dismissed from service in Bombay, it was held that the dispute had substantially arisen in Bombay and the labour court at Bombay had jurisdiction.[47]However, the court refrained from expressing an opinion on the question of whether the Ahmedabad Court would have jurisdiction as well or not. It is obvious that this case was neither under the Industrial Disputes Act nor was it concerned with the question as to which government was the 'appropriate government' in relation to the dispute. It is also significant to note that the High Court was only dealing with the question as to whether the Bombay labour court, under the BIRA, had jurisdiction to deal with the application. The said observations of Chagla CJ were blindly followed by various courts in subsequent decisions, and no court appears to have paused to look into the anatomy of this case.

In Lipton, the facts were: the Delhi office of the employer company exercised control over the salesmen and other employees of the company posted in Punjab, Rajasthan and Utter Pradesh states, apart from those working in Delhi territory. An industrial dispute relating to fixation of grades and scales and the bonus was referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication by the Delhi Administration, which, apart from the workmen employed in the Delhi office, also included the employees working in the other states, under the control of the Delhi office. The employer company raised a preliminary objection before the tribunal that it had no jurisdiction to make an award in respect of the employees who were employed outside the State of Delhi. The industrial tribunal as well as the labour appellate tribunal, rejected this objection as all the workmen working under the control of the Delhi office, whether they worked in Delhi or not, received their salaries from the Delhi office and they were controlled from the Delhi office in matters of leave, transfer, supervision etc. In these circumstances, it was held that the Delhi state was the 'appropriate government', not only with respect to the workmen employed in the Delhi office, but in respect of those working in other offices as well which were controlled by the Delhi office. Though in appeal against the award, this point was raised before the Supreme Court, it was not seriously pressed at the time of hearing. The Supreme Court, therefore, did not discuss this question and contented itself with a perfunctory observation, viz, 'we are of the view that the industrial tribunal, Delhi had jurisdiction to adjudicate on the dispute between Lipton Ltd and its workmen of the Delhi office'.[48]

In Indian Cable Co, the company had closed its branch in Ambala in the State of Punjab and had, consequently, terminated the services of all its employees working in that branch. After the closure, the State of Punjab referred the dispute relating to the justifiability of the retrenchment of the workmen, for adjudication. The employer company, inter alia, raised a preliminary objection before the tribunal, that the Punjab government was not the 'appropriate government' to make the reference, because at the relevant time, the company had no office in that state. In appeal against the order of the tribunal, upholding the validity of the reference, in view of its decision on another point, the Supreme Court did not consider it necessary to express any opinion on this question.[49] But echoing the voice of Chagla CJ, in Lalbhai Tricumlal Mills, the court made an obiter observation that: 'the Act contains no provisions bearing on this question, which must consequently be decided on the principles governing the jurisdiction of courts to entertain actions or proceedings,' though it did not spell out the principles governing the jurisdiction of the courts, to entertain actions or proceedings in the context of the Industrial Disputes Act and again contented itself by extracting a passage from Lalbhai Tricumlal Mills and saying that 'these principles are applicable for deciding which of the states has jurisdiction to make a reference under s 10 of the Act'.

Lalbhai Tricumlal Mills and Indian Cable Co were mechanically followed by the court in Sri Ranga Vilas Motors, in which the head office of the company was situated in Krishnagiri, in the State of Madras, and it had a branch at Bangalore, in the State of Mysore, where the concerned workman was employed. The service of the workman was terminated at Bangalore, but the dispute was sponsored by the workmen at Krishnagiri, which gave it the character of an 'industrial dispute'. The court observed that since there was a separate establishment at Bangalore, where the concerned workman was working and the impugned order had to operate on the workman at Bangalore, the Mysore government was the 'appropriate government'. The court adumbrated the test:

> Where did the dispute arise? Ordinarily, if there is a separate establishment and the workman is working in that establishment, the dispute would arise at that place... there would clearly be some nexus between the dispute and the territory of the state and not necessarily between the territory of the state and the industry concerning which the dispute arose.[50]

The ratio of this case is that the place where the impugned order operates on the service of a workman, is the place where/the 'cause of action' arises and the state in which that place is situated, will be the appropriate government for making the reference of an industrial dispute arising out of the impugned order. The implication of this decision and the relevant observations clearly indicate that since the government of Mysore was the appropriate government, by necessary implication the State of Madras could not be the appropriate government. In Paritosh Kumar Pal, the facts briefly were: the employer company had its registered office as well as its head office, at Calcutta, while it had no establishment in Bihar. The business in the State of Bihar was controlled from Calcutta. A workman working as a medical-cum-sales representative at Patna was dismissed by an order issued from Calcutta. A Full Bench of Patna High Court held that the situs of the employment of workman would determine the territorial jurisdiction of the tribunal in a dispute arising from the termination of such employment.[51] This holding of the High Court is not correct law, even if we apply the test of Sri Rangavilas Motors, where the company had establishments at two places, namely, in Karnataka as well as in Madras. Admittedly, in Paritosh Kumar (supra), there was no establishment in the State of Bihar, which could have been the appropriate government with respect to the dispute.

In Spencer & Co, a single judge of the Delhi High Court made an unreasoned obiter that 'there may be more than one appropriate government.[52] Likewise, a single judge of the Kerala High Court, in Emerald Valley Estates, in his obiter, observed: 'There may be cases where part of the cause of action arose in two or more states. In such cases, two or more states may have a concurrent jurisdiction.[53] So also, the Gujarat High Court, in Vinod Rao, made obiter observations that two governments may have simultaneous jurisdictions to refer a dispute for adjudication to the tribunals appointed by them.[54]

In Gestetner Duplicator, another single judge of the Delhi High Court, specifically took this view. In this case, the concerned workman was employed by the administrative office of the company at Delhi. But at the relevant time, when his service was terminated, he was working at Hubli, in the State of Karnataka. The reference with respect to the termination of the service of the workman was made by the Delhi administration. Faced with the question of whether Karnataka was the appropriate government to make the order of reference, as the order of termination had operated on the service of the workman at Hubli, the court relied upon the obiter observations of the single judge in Spencer (supra) in holding that there can be more than one appropriate government to refer the same dispute for adjudication to the tribunals appointed by it.[55] In support of this view, the court also relied upon the provisions of s 10(1)(a) and s 33B of the Act, but without working out their scope and implications. These provisions do not apply to such situation at all.

A single judge of the Karnataka High Court, has taken the view that if a cause of action could arise where the contract was concluded, the dispute could arise where the contract of employment was terminated.[56] In other words, there can be two 'appropriate governments' to deal with the same industrial dispute. On the other hand, in J&J Dechane, the Kerala High Court quashed the order of reference made by the State of Kerala, relating to the termination of the service of a medical representative employed for canvassing orders for the sale of its products, in the States of Kerala and Mysore, by a company having its registered office at Hyderabad, in the State of Andhra Pradesh. The court took the view that the employer company was not carrying on any business in the State of Kerala, as it had no establishment in that state, and the workman was only a roving representative of the company, for promoting the sales of its products. Therefore, the State of Andhra Pradesh, and not the State of Kerala, was the 'appropriate government'. Gopalan Nambiyar J, observed that:

> It seems reasonable, and fairly clear, that there can be only one government which can be regarded as the 'appropriate government' for the purpose of making a reference under s 10(1)(c). The consequences of holding that more than one government can refer the same industrial dispute for adjudication, appear to us to be startling.[57]

Similarly, the Madhya Pradesh High Court, in Medical Representatives, quashed, the order of reference made by the State of Madhya Pradesh, with respect to the termination of the service of an employee employed by a company, which had its head office at Bombay, to canvass for the sales of its products in the State of Madhya Pradesh. In this case, the fact that the State of Maharashtra was the appropriate government was not disputed, but it was contended that the State of Madhya Pradesh was also concurrently the appropriate government to make the reference, since, inasmuch as the service of the workman was terminated in the State of Madhya Pradesh, the cause of action arose there. In view of the fact that the company was not carrying on its business anywhere in the State of Madhya Pradesh as on the date of the reference, the State of Madhya Pradesh could not be the appropriate government. Furthermore, since the dispute between the company and the workman arose at Bombay, where the order of the dismissal was passed, only the State of Maharashtra could be the appropriate government. The court observed that keeping in view the very significance and meaning of the adjective 'appropriate', qualifying the word 'government', only one government can be called as the appropriate government for making the reference.[58]

Another Division Bench of Bombay High Court, in General Superintendence Co, took the view that two governments cannot be the 'appropriate governments', operating in the same field, in respect of the same subject-matter. If two governments are to operate, 'there will be t wo authorities operating in the same field, at the same level, which is not envisaged under the Industrial Disputes Act'. The court then noticed indications available under the Act, to show that if one government is acting, another government cannot Act in the same field, in respect of the same subject-matter.[59] The law as stated in J&J Dechane (Kerala), Medical Representatives (MP), and General Superintendence Co (Bombay), is correct, whereas the decisions rendered in Gestetner and Spencer (Delhi), Emerald Valley (Kerala) and Vinod Rao (Gujarat) are wrong. The wording of the provision so conspicuous in so far as the word 'appropriate' qualifies the singular expression 'government' that there cannot be more than one appropriate government exercising the power of reference in respect of the same dispute involving the same parties at the same time. The consequences of the holding that there can be more than one appropriate governments to refer the same dispute for adjudication to the tribunals appointed by them, will be startling and result in an unending and tangled multiplicity of industrial litigation, which would be devastating for industrial peace. Some of the latter class of cases have been analysed in the following paragraphs.

In Godrej Soaps, it was held that, in respect of a workman appointed as a sales supervisor for a part of the territory of Karnataka but at all times stationed at Bombay, and whose termination order was served in Bombay coupled with the further fact being that the employer had no branch or administrative office in Karnataka, the appropriate government was the State of Maharashtra, and not Karnataka.[60] It is submitted that this case was rightly decided consistent with the spirit of the letter of the definition and the spirit of the Act. In BG Sampat, the facts disclosed that the appointment letter was issued from the head office of the company, located in Bombay, but the workman was employed in Calcutta. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the government of West Bengal was the appropriate government to refer a dispute relating to the termination of the said workman.[61]

In New Delhi GM Union, the Delhi High Court upheld the refusal by the government of Delhi to refer a dispute relating to the Management Development Institute, on the ground that the said institute was situated in the State of Haryana, and therefore, the matter could not be referred for adjudication for want of jurisdiction.[62] Where the situs of the employment of a workman was found to be Gurgaon, and the termination letter was also issued at Gurgaon, the appropriate government could not be held to be the Government of the NCT of Delhi just because the head office of the company was located in Delhi. It is axiomatic that the territory within which the services of an employee are wrongfully terminated, would be the territory where the cause of action substantially arises partly, if not wholly. The reference made by the government of the NCT of Delhi was quashed as not being competent. The jurisdiction would be with the competent courts of Gurgaon and it would be for the concerned government to consider whether a reference is to be made.[63] In a case where a workman, who was initially appointed at the head office of the company at Madras, but was later transferred to Kanpur, was dismissed while he was working at Kanpur, it was held that the conciliation officer of Madras, had the territorial jurisdiction to admit the dispute for conciliation.[64]

What is relevant while sustaining a dispute under s 2A, before a labour court, is the place where the cause of action arose substantially, namely, the place where the employee was working at the time when the order of termination was issued, and not the place of the initial appointment, even if he was transferred to other places. In view of the categorical finding that the workman was last employed, at the time of his termination, at Jamshedpur, he could not maintain the claim before the labour court at Madras.[65] In Udaipur Distillery, the petitioner-workman filed a complaint before the industrial court, Mumbai against his transfer from Mumbai to Delhi. Rejecting the contention that Mumbai industrial court had jurisdiction to try the case, Khandeparkar J, held that ID Act does not deal with jurisdictional issues and that s 20 of CPC applied to the case. In view of the fact that the decision of transfer was taken at Udaipur by the respondent-company, the said dispute substantially arose at Udaipur.[66]

In Mining & Allied Machinery Corpn, the facts disclosed that the Central Government, being the appropriate government, had delegated the powers to the West Bengal Government under s 39 of the Act. The State Government referred the dispute relating to closure, to the Industrial Tribunal. While the reference was pending adjudication, the Central Government issued a notice convening a meeting for hearing on the application, but closed the factory down. Rejecting the contention of the employees' union, Seth J, of the Calcutta High Court held that by delegating the power to make reference to the State Government, the Central Government merely created a parallel authority and hence the order of the State Government was not liable to be quashed. Similarly, such delegation could not be said to have taken away the jurisdiction of the Central Government to issue a notice convening a meeting.[67]In respect of the closure of undertakings engaging less than 300 workmen and located in Lucknow and Kanpur, which are governed by the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947, the Deputy Commissioner of Labour, Government of UP, has no jurisdiction to issue a prosecution notice under s 25R of the Central Act, as it has no application to the undertakings located in the State of UP.[68] In respect of a dispute relating to a workman engaged in the office of the Kerala State EDC, which is located in Mumbai, the appropriate government is the State Government in terms of s 2(a)(i) of the ID Act.[69]

The decisions rendered, and the observations made, in Vinod Rao, Gestetner, Spencer, as also the latest decision of Seth J., in Mining and Allied Machinery Corporation call for some analysis. In the face of clear and unambiguous language used in s 2(a) as to which one - the Central or the State Government - is the appropriate government in respect of such and such establishments/undertakings, to hold that "there could be more than one appropriate government" is a judicial perversion of grave dimensions. The learned judges of Gujarat, Delhi, Kerala and Calcutta have grossly misdirected themselves and handed down irresponsible and reckless decisions with no application of judicial mind. Let us imagine the consequences of a situation in which two governments make a reference of an identical dispute relating to the same undertaking/establishment to two different tribunals, which pass divergent and/or diametrically opposite awards involving workmen of the same employer working in different states! Even from a common sense point of view - not to speak of a legal or judicial sense - is it possible to envisage multiple authorities exercising power in respect of the same subject-matter involving the same parties at the same time?

Reverting to Mining and Allied Machinery Corporation, what is meant by the observation that "in delegating the power to the State Government, the Central Government had merely created a parallel authority"? The facts of the case disclose that it was a case covered by s 25-O of IDA, which requires prior permission before closing down the undertaking, and the State Government referred the application made by the employer for adjudication. Is it possible to visualise an odious situation in which the State Government refers the dispute relating to closure for adjudication, and, while the said reference is pending before the tribunal, the Central Government issues a notice convening a meeting for hearing the self-same application and, still worse, at the same time, closes down the factory even before the reference is disposed of by the adjudicator, thus reducing the entire law relating to the closure of undertakings to a mockery? The views expressed by the learned judges in the above cases - result not in industrial peace and harmony - but plunge the industrial community in chaos and anarchy, thereby setting the scheme and objects of Industrial Relations Law at naught! This kind of judicial callousness and indifference, which has become more rampant in the recent past deserves to be denounced in the strongest language and terms. The decisions rendered in J&J Dechane, Medical Representatives, and General Superintendence, are consistent with the spirit of s 2(a) and are right, whereas the above four decisions rendered, and the observations made, in Vinod Rao, Gestetner, Spencer and Mining and Allied Machinery Corpn are absolutely misconceived, wholly perverse and completely wrong.

In Tata Memorial Hospital, the facts briefly were: there were two unions operating in the Tata Memorial Centre, Mumbai - The Tata Memorial Hospital Workers Union, which was the recognised union, and The Tata Memorial Hospital Kamgar Sanghatana. The second mentioned union filed two applications before the industrial court under ss 15 & 16 respectively seeking cancellation of the recognition of Workers Union and granting recognition to itself. Before the industrial court, the management raised objection as to the maintainability of the said applications on the ground that in respect of the undertaking, the Central Government was the appropriate government. The industrial court held that the state government was the appropriate government, which was upheld by a single judge, but reversed by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court, which held that the Central Government was the appropriate government in view of the fact that that the Governing Council of the Centre was managing the institution as a delegate of the Central Government; that on this view of matter and also on the basis of the Supreme Court decision rendered in Steel Authority of India, the Division Bench held that the Central Government was the appropriate government. The issue before the Supreme Court was which of the two - the State or the Centre - was the 'appropriate government'. Setting aside the order of the Division Bench, Gokhale J (for self, Kabir and Joseph JJ), held that mere allocation of business under any department would not in any manner decide the issue as raised in the present case as to whether a particular industry is under the control of the Central Government. The business rules cannot be conclusive to show that any institution or organization listed under the allocation of business, would be part of any department of the Government of India,[70] but in so far as Tata Memorial Centre was concerned, the State Government was the appropriate government.[71] It is submitted that this case was rightly decided. The NCL-II observed:

> There is no need for different definitions of the term 'appropriate government'. There must be a single definition of the term, applicable to all labour laws. The Central Government should be the 'appropriate government' in respect of Central Government establishments, railways, posts, telecommunications, major ports, lighthouses, Food corporation of India, Central Warehousing Corporation, banks (other than cooperative banks), insurance, financial institutions, mines, stock exchanges, shipping, mints, security printing presses, air transport industry, petroleum industry, atomic energy, space, broadcasting and television, defence establishments, cantonment boards, central social security institutions and institutions such as those belonging to the CSIR, ICAR, ICMR, NCERT and in respect of industrial disputes between the contractor and the contract labour engaged in these enterprises or establishments. In respect of all others, the concerned state government or union territory administrations should be the appropriate governments. In case of a dispute, the matter will be determined by the National Labour Relations Commission, that we want to be set up.[72]

Clause (aa): ARBITRATOR

Arbitrator

Clause(aa) has been inserted by s 2 of the Act 36 of 1964 and it has to be read with s 10(A)(1A). In the case of a reference which is being made to an even number of arbitrators, it becomes necessary to bring in an umpire so as to have a majority award. A provision, therefore, has been made to include an 'umpire' in the definition of an 'arbitrator'.

Clause (aaa): AVERAGE PAY

Average pay

This clause lays down the manner of calculating the 'average pay' of monthly, weekly or daily-rated workmen, for certain purposes of this Act.[73] There are three categories set forth, and then, there is a residual category. The first is the case of a 'monthly paid' workman; the second, of a 'weekly paid' workman and the third, of a 'daily paid workman'. The residual category is that of those persons, whose 'average pay' cannot be calculated upon any of these three bases. In such cases, the pay is to be calculated as the average of the wages payable to the workman during the period that he had actually worked. The period of three months, four weeks or 12 days, as specified for the first three categories of workmen, must precede the day on which the pay becomes payable. In case a workman has not worked for the period specified, the average pay shall be calculated as the average wages payable to him for the period he had actually worked. In Indian Hume Pipe, the Madras High Court held that where a workman was being paid fixed wages for every working day, but such wages were paid to him fortnightly, he was to be treated as a daily-rated workman and not one falling under the residual part of the clause, for computing his 'average pay'. It was observed that the residual part of this clause is applicable to piece-rated Workers and the like, whose wages depend upon the quantum of work turned out and which are liable to vary from day to day, and it might also apply to cases where the workman has not worked during the entire period of three calendar months, four weeks or twelve days, as the case might be, preceding the relevant date.[74]

Clause (b): AWARD

Award

An 'award' must be:[75]

(i) an interim or final determination, (ii) of an industrial dispute or any question relating thereto, and (iii) by any:

- (a) labour court;
- (b) industrial tribunal;
- (c) national tribunal; or
- (d) an arbitrator, under s 10A.

Interim or Final Determination

The definition of an award is analogous to that of a 'decree' as defined in s 2(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure.[76] It plainly requires an 'industrial dispute' or 'any question relating thereto', to be determined by the adjudicator. The object of the decision in the 'award' is to resolve the differences between the disputants. The expression 'determination of any dispute' means an adjudication of the dispute between the parties.[77] The definition of an 'award' has two parts. The first part covers an interim or final determination of any industrial dispute. The second part takes in an interim or final determination of any question relating to that dispute but the basic postulate common to both the parts of the definition is the existence of an industrial dispute, actual or apprehended. The 'determination' contemplated by the definition is not a termination of the proceedings before the tribunal, by one method or the other. There is a 'determination' only when there is an adjudication of the industrial dispute or of a question relating thereto, on merits.[78] The word 'determination' implies an adjudication upon the relevant materials, by the tribunal.[79] It is implicit in the word 'determination' that it should be judicial, implying that the tribunal should exercise its own judgment.[80] The words' interim' or 'final determination' of any industrial dispute or of any question, necessarily involve an application of the mind of the tribunal, to the problem before it. The determination may be final or interim, because there is scope for such determination even in the interim stage, whilst the inquiry into the dispute is in progress. In any case, there should be a determination of the dispute in the sense that it should not be left incomplete and unresolved, because the expression 'determination' implies that the adjudicator has to adjudicate upon the whole dispute, as referred to him. Hence, he cannot leave a part of the dispute to be resolved by the parties.

In Birla Cotton, the court remanded the award to the tribunal, who had left a part of the dispute relating to the standardization in the wage-structure unresolved, to be resolved by the parties, with the direction that a joint committee should be formed to go into and investigate the anomalies in the categories to be found in the company. The Supreme Court directed the tribunal to itself decide the question, and if necessary, with the help of assessors. Thus a partial adjudication of a dispute is not a determination as contemplated by the definition of an 'award'.[81] If, however, a number of demands are referred to the tribunal for adjudication and the tribunal decides only one or some of such issues, and gives its 'award' with respect to those issues, which is published under s 17, it will be the final adjudication in so far as those demands are concerned, because each of the demands is an industrial dispute by itself.[82] Orders of the authorities under s 33(1) or s 33(2) are not awards as contemplated by this clause, because there is no final or interim determination of an 'industrial dispute' in such cases.[83] The definition contemplates that it should be a 'determination' of an 'industrial dispute', by a labour court, an industrial tribunal, a national tribunal or an arbitrator under s 10A. Hence, a determination of the dispute by any other authority, such as one by a High Court, in its writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution, will not be an award.[84] An order passed under s 33C(2) is not an 'award' within the meaning of s 2(b) of the IDA. Proceedings under s 33C are in the nature of execution proceedings. When the quantum of amount due to a workman is determined by a labour court, it is a 'decision' and not an 'award', and hence, need not be published under s 17.[85]

Interim Award and Interim Relief

An 'interim award' is like a 'preliminary decree' within the meaning of s 2(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure.[86] The word 'interim', inter alia, has been defined in the Oxford Dictionary as 'a temporary or provisional arrangement, adopted in the meanwhile'. In the context of the definition of the term 'award', the word 'interim' qualifies the 'determination of any industrial dispute' as well as 'any question relating thereto'. Hence, any interim determination of an 'industrial dispute' itself or of 'any question relating thereto', will fall within the definition of an 'award'. An interim award in this context means only a provisional arrangement, made in a matter of urgency and subject to a final adjustment or complete determination of the dispute; for example, a payment on an account, pending the final settlement of the amount.[87]

In Hotel Imperial, the Supreme Court held that the adjudicator may give an award about the entire dispute at the end of the proceedings, which will be the final determination of the industrial dispute referred to it. It is also open to the adjudicator to make an award in respect of some of the matters referred to it, whilst some others remain to be decided. This would be the determination of the matters decided and would be an interim award. Whether the award is interim or final, it will have to be published as required by s 17 of the Act. An interim relief, on the other hand, is granted by an order, given under the power conferred on the adjudicator under s 10(4), with respect to matters incidental to the points of dispute referred for adjudication. During the pendency of the adjudication of an industrial dispute, the adjudicator can give an interim relief where it is admissible as being incidental to the main question referred to it. The tribunal has the power to make an interim award on a point of dispute referred to it for adjudication, or on a matter incidental to the main question.[88] The Patna,[89] Punjab,[90] Delhi[91] and Calcutta[92] High Courts have taken the view that an order granting an interim relief must take the form of an interim award, and therefore, must be published under s 17, so as to be enforceable under s 17 A. On the other hand, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court has expressly dissented from the view of the Patna High Court and held that:

> Interim relief, eg, a direction to pay a subsistence allowance to a dismissed workman during the pendency of a dispute concerning the validity of his dismissal, or any other interim relief which the tribunal has the power to grant, need not and should not be made in the form of an award. Such an order should only be in the nature of an interim order ... [93]

The holding of the Karnataka High Court is the correct law, while the view of the other High Courts is clearly wrong. Once it is conceded that there is no interim or final determination of a dispute or difference, it follows that there is no award within the meaning of s 2(b) and, by the same token, s 17, which mandates the publication of 'Awards', is not attracted. An order granting an interim relief is not the determination of the dispute, inasmuch as it does not decide any question or dispute between the parties, even as an interim measure. It is like any other order made in the course of adjudication, before making the award by determining the dispute. An order of an interim relief, not being an interim award, will not require publication. Nor will its disobedience be punishable under s 29 of the Act. But the relief granted by such an order can be realised through the machinery of s 33C of the Act. Under s 10(4), an adjudicator has the power to adjudicate on matters 'incidental' to the points of dispute referred for adjudication. A priori, while adjudicating on the points referred for adjudication, the tribunal can grant interim relief. In the case of a dismissal, the tribunal can grant an interim relief after finding that the inquiry on the basis of which the Workers were dismissed, was not fair and proper. But the interim relief can be granted only from the date of application for such relief, and not from the date of the dismissal of the workman.[1]

Though an industrial tribunal can give an interim relief, 'ordinarily, interim relief should not be the whole relief that the workmen would get, if they succeeded finally'.[2] In a case of discharge or dismissal, it is not open to the tribunal to order a reinstatement as an interim relief, for that would be giving the workman the very relief that he could get on a trial of the complaint, if the employer fails to justify the order of dismissal.[3] Interim relief granted by the industrial tribunal, directing the employer not to transfer the workmen to another station, pending the adjudication of the dispute under reference, is the whole relief that the workmen would get in case they succeed in the adjudication. In Darshak Limited, the Karnataka High Court has upheld the validity of such relief.[4] It is submitted that this decision is misconceived and is repugnant to the very concept of interim relief. As a matter of principle and law, no interim relief of whatsoever nature could be granted to a workman whose service has been terminated or who has been dismissed, until the dispute is finally adjudicated, for the simple reason that the moment the termination or dismissal order is served on the employee, it starts producing its legal consequences in so far as that very moment, he ceases to be the employee of the organisation. Until the action of employer is overturned in a proper proceeding directed to that end, such an ex-employee cannot claim any compensation from the employer in the form of 'interim relief'. The learned judge of Karnataka High Court had clearly transgressed his legitimate confines in upholding the misplaced award passed by the labour court.

Where, in an industrial dispute relating to the date of birth of a workman, the tribunal directed the employer not to retire the workman till the final decision of the reference was made, the High Court quashed the interim award of the tribunal and held that it was not open to the tribunal to give such interim relief which was the whole relief the workman could get finally, that if ultimately the workman loses in the reference, even then he would get the service benefits, whereas the employer could not be compensated for the consequential loss and that, in such cases, the balance of convenience would always lie in favour of the employer.[5] In granting interim relief, the tribunal must determine that there is a good prima facie case in favour of the workmen in the final adjudication and that on the facts of the particular case, an interim relief by way of the interim award is necessary.[6] In other words, while exercising the discretion to grant interim relief in an appropriate case, the tribunal has to consider prima facie, the balance of convenience and the necessity of its interference for protecting the parties from irreparable injury.[7]The insertion of s 10-B in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, by the Tamil Nadu Amendment Act 1982, (Act 36 of 1982), has not taken away the right of the tribunal to award interim relief because the power of the government under s 10B is to be exercised immediately after the reference has been made under s 10(1). Furthermore, a quasi-judicial power vested in the tribunal, under s 10(4) of the Act, cannot be taken away by conferring an administrative power on the government.[8]

Howsoever wide the powers of the tribunal may be, it cannot award its own brand of interim reliefs, pending the adjudication. An interim relief must be a relief carved out of the main relief claimed by the workmen. In Radio Foundation, the High Court of Patna quashed a direction given by the industrial tribunal, to the employer, to deposit two months' wages, to be paid to the workmen if they succeeded in the case, which was in the nature of asking the management to give a security in cash in order to enable the workmen to get the money if they ultimately succeeded on their demand for a bonus. The High Court held that the tribunal had no power to give an interim relief of this kind.[9] Likewise, an order of the labour court, directing an employer to deposit a certain amount in the court, with the stipulation that if the amount was not deposited, steps would be taken to recover the same as arrears of land revenue, was quashed by the Allahabad High Court, which held that it was beyond the jurisdiction of a labour court to direct a party to deposit any amount in the court or recover the same as arrears of land revenue.[10] In awarding an 'interim relief', it is not sufficient to say that the workman concerned was undergoing great hardship, as merely that fact cannot be a ground for the grant of an interim relief. It is incumbent upon the tribunal to discuss the relevant facts of the case and find out in what way the stand of the employer is unjustified, if at all so, and whether the demand for the relief is justified. It is only after such findings are recorded that the interim relief can be granted, and not otherwise.[11] An interim order for an interim relief is not an award and is not enforceable under s 17 and the violation of such order is not punishable under s 29. However, the tribunal has inherent power to enforce its interim order by making compliance with such order a condition precedent for employer to participate in the adjudication proceedings.[12]

The Decision on Preliminary Issues

The labour appellate tribunal took the view that the findings of a tribunal on preliminary issues are in no sense 'interim award' because such findings order no relief in favour of any party and the position in respect to the findings on preliminary issues is similar to that of the interlocutory orders passed by a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure, as regards jurisdiction or limitation, for the suit to proceed on merits. An 'award' to be 'interim' or 'final', must grant or refuse to grant all or any of the reliefs which have been asked for in the inquiry and this cannot include orders which are interlocutory.[13] A similar view has been taken by a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in holding that an interim order deciding a preliminary objection whether the tribunal has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute referred to it or not, cannot be said to be an 'award' because it does not 'determine' any part of the dispute or any of other question relating thereto.[14] The Calcutta High Court held that a 'no-dispute award' made by the tribunal, where none of the parties appeared before it, would not be an 'award' and its publication would not convert it into an award. On the construction of the expression 'or of any question relating thereto', the court observed that it means any matter incidental to the dispute and 'to constitute an award, the main dispute might be decided first and thereafter any such matter or question relating to the main dispute might be decided or adjudicated upon'.[15] On the other hand, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that the decision of the labour court that the matter referred to it for adjudication was not an 'industrial dispute' is itself a determination of a 'question relating thereto' and would fall within the definition of 'award'.[16]

In Cox & Kings, the Supreme Court has disagreed with the view of the Allahabad High Court. In this case, an order of reference relating to the termination of services of certain workmen had been held to be invalid by the labour court for the reason that no demand of the workmen in this connection had been made on the employer, as such no 'industrial dispute' had come into existence. This order of the labour court was published in the gazette of the government as an 'award' under s 17(1) of the Act. Subsequently, upon a demand notice having been served by the workman on the management bringing into existence the 'industrial dispute', the dispute again had been referred to the labour court for adjudication. The question for consideration before the court, therefore, was whether the previous order of the labour court holding that the dispute under reference was not an 'industrial dispute', was an 'award' within the meaning of s 2(b) which required termination under s 19(6) of the Act, before the second reference could be made. The court laid down a two-fold test for a decision of a tribunal to fall within the definition of an 'award', viz:

(i) it must be an adjudication of a question or point relating to the industrial dispute which has been specified in the order of reference, or is incidental thereto, and

(ii) such an adjudication must be one on merits. The decision of the labour court did not satisfy either of these criteria. Therefore, the court held that it did not possess the essential attributes of an 'award'. The determination of the question that the dispute under reference was not an 'industrial dispute' would not make such determination an 'award'. Nor the publication of such a decision under s 17(1) would confer the status of an award on it. In support of this conclusion, the court further observed that since the order 'by its very nature did not impose any continuing obligation on the parties bound by it', it was an additional reason for holding that the second reference was not barred. [17]

The effect of the aforesaid decision is that the decision of a tribunal on a preliminary issue will not be an 'award' and, therefore, it need not be published under s 17(1). If it is not published, it will not become enforceable under s 17A or binding under s 18, nor will it be operative under s 19, so as to require termination thereunder. The attention of the court does not appear to have been drawn to the provisions of s 20(3), which fixes the points of time on which the proceedings before the adjudicatory authorities are deemed to have commenced and concluded. The adjudicatory proceedings on a reference are deemed to have commenced on the date of the reference of the dispute for adjudication and are deemed to have concluded on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s 17A. Therefore, in a case where the tribunal decides that the dispute under reference is not an 'industrial dispute', it will not be able to proceed any further with the adjudication, such that decision puts an end to its jurisdiction. If such a decision is not an 'award', it will not become enforceable under s 17A, and the proceedings before the tribunal shall, therefore, never be deemed to have concluded. Thus, in such cases, there will be a perpetual 'pendency' before the tribunal for the purposes of ss 10, 23, 33 & 33A. This will lead to a manifest absurdity and repugnancy. In such cases, in order to avoid uncertainty, inconvenience and confusion, a liberal construction of the statute is permissible.[18]

The words 'any question relating thereto', in the definition of an 'award' in s 2(b), and the words 'matters incidental thereto' in s 10(4), are wide enough to take in their fold preliminary questions such as whether the dispute under reference is an 'industrial dispute' or not. This construction would avoid repugnancy, confusion and absurdity. This was the rationale of the decision of the Allahabad High Court in the Swadesi Cotton Mills case. But, instead of reverting to this rationale, the Supreme Court disposed it off with a perfunctory statement that, 'in our opinion, this is not a correct statement of law on the point'. It appears that the court thought that only a decision on merits would satisfy the requirements of the definition of an 'award', without spelling out the implications of the expression 'any question relating thereto' appearing in the definition of 'award' in s 2(b), or of the words 'matters incidental thereto' occurring in s 10(4). The decision on this point, therefore, requires a reconsideration. In Hindustan Motors, it was held that the construction placed on the expression 'or any question relating thereto' by the Calcutta High Court in BR Herrman (supra) could lead to absurdity and inconvenience. In the case of a 'no-dispute' award, the dispute still subsists and awaits adjudication, as there has been no award. Therefore, a second reference of the same dispute cannot be held to be bad.[19] In Gurbhej Singh, the facts were: the labour court dismissed the reference for non-prosecution, whereupon the government made a second reference of the same dispute. The issue was whether such a reference is barred by res judicata. Negating the contention, it was held that such dismissal of first reference could not bar a second reference as there was no adjudication on merits.[20]

Compromise Award

The Act does not contain any provision specifically authorising an industrial adjudicator to record a compromise and pass an award in its terms corresponding to the provisions of O 23, r 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But this does not mean that the tribunal is precluded from taking note of a compromise entered into between the Workers and management. In DN Ganguli, the Supreme Court made an obiter observation to the effect:

> it would be very unreasonable to assume that the industrial tribunal would insist upon dealing with the dispute on merits even after it is informed that the dispute has been amicably settled between the parties... There can, therefore, be no doubt that if an industrial dispute before the tribunal is amicably settled, the tribunal would immediately agree to make an award in terms of the settlement between the parties. [21]

The Bombay High Court in Maharana Mill, while dealing with a case of withdrawal of a dispute by the parties from adjudication also made an obiter observation that the position might have been different, if the dispute had been settled on merits by private agreement and the tribunal had been asked to make an award in terms of the agreement.[22] The Madras,[23] Madhya Pradesh,[24] Andhra,[25] and Patna,[26] High Courts have taken the view that even if the parties to a dispute come to a settlement by mutual discussion outside the field of industrial adjudication, still the tribunal cannot abdicate its duties to find out the process by which the settlement has been arrived at and weigh the pros and cons of the same, apply independently its mind to it and thereafter determine the dispute or question in the light of such settlement. The tribunal can adopt the compromise entered into by the parties as the foundation of its award after satisfying itself that the settlement is fair and just. In Hindustan HFE Union, the Delhi High Court observed that it would be difficult to subscribe to the proposition that the consent award cannot be regarded as an award unless it bears on its face an expression of the tribunal's opinion that it is fair, just and equitable. The court emphatically held that a consent award is as good as an award made by the tribunal after contest and is to be treated as an award so long as the compromise embodied in the award resolves the disputes between the parties which had been referred to the tribunal for adjudication and is not tainted with fraud, collusion, coercion or undue influence. Such consent award is binding on the parties unless it is terminated in the manner provided by sub-s (6) of s 19 of the Act.[27] This view does not appear to be the correct view of Law as it seems to suggest that it is not necessary for the tribunal to bring its own judicial mind to bear upon the compromise to give it the character of 'determination'. In Government Silk Weaving Factory, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of a settlement which was adopted by the tribunal after applying its mind judicially to it.[28]

The Gujarat High Court in Gandhidham Nagarpalika, observed that if the parties do not adduce evidence on the issue whether or not settlement was just and fair, they impliedly meant that they accept the averments made in their respective pleadings and they do away with the requirement of any proof thereof. Subsequently, neither party can make the grievance that the other party did not lead any evidence before the tribunal.[29]

Where, during the pendency of an industrial dispute before the tribunal, the management and the workman arrived at a compromise settlement and filed the same before the tribunal, the rejection of the said settlement by the tribunal on the ground that the workman was not present was perverse. In such a case, the tribunal was bound to accept the compromise.[30] In Indian Bank, the facts disclosed that the Bank, having entered into an agreement with the canteen staff, challenged the consent award passed by the tribunal. Seth J, of Calcutta High Court rejected the contention of the Bank that it was not an award within the meaning of s 2(b).[31] But, where the workman, after accepting the offer made by the management for a compromise on certain terms, withdrew the said acceptance at the next hearing before the labour court, the passing of an award by the labour court on the alleged compromise was erroneous and hence not sustainable.[32]

Withdrawal of the Dispute

There has been some conflict of judicial opinion on the question whether the order of a tribunal permitting withdrawal of an 'industrial dispute' from adjudication for private settlement by subsequent negotiation or by arbitration by private arbitrators, even if published under s 17 of the Act, would be an 'award' under s 2(b). A single judge of the Kerala High Court,[33] observed that the expression 'determination' in the definition of award in the Act indicates only a coming to an end, may be in any way whatever, though it may require examination and choice. But another single judge of the same High Court dissented from these observations and said that, to satisfy the definition of an award there should be an interim or final determination of the dispute and there is none where the tribunal merely dismissed the reference for non-prosecution, and held that an order of the tribunal permitting withdrawal of the dispute for subsequent settlement or arbitration cannot amount to an award.[34] Likewise, the Bombay High Court, held that there must be 'determination' of an industrial dispute or a question relating thereto and if the dispute remains unresolved as before and is to be determined in future either by private arbitration or negotiation, there is no determination of the dispute by the Tribunal. It was, therefore, held that even though the order made by the Tribunal was described as 'award', and also published as such in the official gazette, it would not be an 'award' within the meaning of the definition.[35] This view of the Bombay High Court was followed by the Madhya Pradesh High Court.[36] The Mysore High Court has also held that there was determination only when there was an adjudication on the merits.[37] This is the correct view of the law. Occasionally, in the course of adjudication proceedings, the workmen give up or do not press some of the demands before the tribunal. Consequently, no evidence is led on such demands. It is impossible for any tribunal to adjudicate upon any demand without evidence on record. In the absence of any allegation that such demands were unfairly given up, the tribunal is to content itself by recording that the demands were given up or were not pressed. Such holding will constitute an award.[38]

Ex parte Award

Section 15 of the Act makes it the duty of the tribunal to make an award and submit it to the 'appropriate Government'. Rule 10B of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribed the procedure to be adopted by the tribunal when a reference is made to it and the scheme of the rules makes it clear that the tribunal must make a pronouncement on the validity of the claim made by one party and repudiated by the other. Although r 22 empowers the tribunal to proceed ex parte, when one of the parties to the proceedings before it fails to appear, the adjudicator is not absolved of his duty to make the determination of the dispute which he is called upon to decide. The scheme of the Act and the rules make it obvious that even though a party is placed ex parte, the tribunal must pronounce on the dispute and record its findings with respect to that matter. In other words, the tribunal has no power to reject the reference.[39] The Andhra, Allahabad, Kerala, Madhya Pradesh and Mysore High Courts have held that a reference dismissed by the tribunal for default of appearance of workmen, even though published in the official gazette, does not attain the sanctity to get itself exalted into an 'award' as defined in s 2(b) of the Act, because such an order does not involve any adjudication whatsoever of the dispute referred to it and in no manner sets at rest the differences between the opposing parties.[40] To satisfy the definition of 'award', there should be an interim or a final determination of the dispute and there is none where the tribunal merely dismissed the reference for non-prosecution.[41]

Section 17(2) gives finality to the 'award' published under s 17(1). But if there is no 'determination' of the industrial dispute or any question relating thereto as contemplated by s 2(b), the order of the tribunal dismissing the reference merely on the ground of non-prosecution would not be an 'award' in the eye of law. Hence, the publication of such an order purporting to be an 'award' would not make it final under s 17(2). In view of the provisions of r 22 of the Central Rules, the adjudicator may proceed ex parte where any party fails to attend or be represented or after having attended or being represented fails to file the pleadings or participate in the proceedings, as if that party 'had duly attended or had been represented'. In such situations, if after applying its mind fully to the statements and documents placed before it by the party appearing before it, the tribunal makes the award, such an award is not assailable.[42] Furthermore, after an ex parte award becomes enforceable on the expiry of 30 days as contemplated by s 17 A, an application to assail such an award will not be maintainable.[43] But if an aggrieved party can successfully show to the reviewing court that its absence from taking part in the adjudication proceedings was unavoidable and was not due to any lack of bona fides, it may be a case for quashing an ex parte order.[44]

In RB Girap,[45] the labour court dismissed the reference because on the date for filing the claim statement of the workman, neither the workman nor his advocate were present. But when the workman became aware of the order of the labour court, his advocate advised him that the application for setting aside the order need not be filed till the award is published in the government gazette. After publication of the award, the workman filed the application for restoration, which was rejected by the labour court as time-barred. The award was quashed by Bombay High Court, restoring the matter to the labour court. The delay in making the application for restoration was condoned for the reason that the poor employee drawing negligible wages should not be denied the opportunity of being heard on merits by the labour court, and he should not be punished for the erroneous advice given to him by his lawyer. If the tribunal is clothed with the authority to pass an ex parte award, then necessarily by implication it follows that it can set aside the same. If the tribunal in seisin of the controversy is not relegated to the position of functus officio, then, there is no question and/or doubt about the tribunal's competence to entertain the application for setting it aside.[46] Till the award is published under s 17A and thirty days expire from the publication thereof, the tribunal has all control. It may become functus officio only thereafter, and not at any interim stage or prior to the said stage. The tribunal can reopen its order till the award becomes final.[47] The labour court cannot set aside an ex parte award after the expiry of 30 days from the date of publication of award, as it becomes functus officio after the said period.[48] However, in Anil Sood, the Supreme Court held that the labour court/industrial tribunal would not become functus officio and has jurisdiction to deal with the application for setting aside the ex parte award. The court observed:

> The aspect that the party against whom award is to be made due opportunity to defend has to be given is a matter of procedure and not that of power in the sense in which the language is adopted in s 11. When matters are referred to the tribunal or court, they have to be decided objectively and the tribunals/courts have to exercise their discretion in a judicial manner without arbitrariness by following the general principles of law and rules of natural justice. The power to proceed ex parte is available under rule 22 of the Central Rules which also includes the power to inquire whether or not there was sufficient cause for the absence of a party at the hearing, and if there is sufficient cause shown which prevented a party from appearing, when if the party is visited with an award without a notice which is a nullity and therefore, the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to proceed and consequently, it must necessarily have power to set aside the ex parte award.[49]

The above decision deserves to be assailed in so far as it propounds that the tribunal has the power to set aside an award even after the expiry of 30 days after its publication by the Government. It is one thing to say that the tribunal does not become functus officio on the submission of the award to the government and hence it can set aside an ex parte award if it could be shown that a party had sufficient cause in not appearing before the tribunal or that he was prevented from so appearing before the tribunal, and quite another to suggest that the tribunal continues to enjoy the power to set aside an ex parte order even after the award had come into operation. Such an interpretation of law is positively disastrous to the very concept of 'dispute settlement' and is unwarranted. Once the award came into force on the expiry of thirty days after its publication, the decision of the tribunal is made public. Further, it implies that the dispute has been conclusively adjudicated by a competent authority after adhering to the procedure prescribed thereof. What remains thereafter is nothing more than implementation of the terms of the award, even if it were found that the award was, or had to be, passed ex parte. Thereafter, it cannot be permitted to be set aside by the same tribunal on the ground that there was justification for setting it aside because a party to the dispute had shown sufficient cause for not showing up at the appropriate time. If, it was found the labour court or tribunal had not served the notice to one of the parties, and proceeded to adjudicate the dispute arbitrarily, then the right course for the aggrieved party is to approach the High Court and get it quashed, instead of permitting the trial court to meddle with the award, even after it came into force, and set it aside. If, on the other hand, it was found that the party did not choose to appear even after putting it on notice and even after granting sufficient number of adjournments, then the defaulting party should not be permitted to gain an undue advantage out of his own wrong. At any rate, it doesn't appeal to common sense to invest the same tribunal/labour court with the power to set aside its own award, that too, after it takes effect under s 17A. It is submitted that Anil Sood was wrongly decided and requires review by a larger Bench.

In LML, the facts were that the labour court had not served notice on the management which was a party to the dispute raised by the workman, and the submitted the ex parte award to the government. The application filed before the labour court for setting aside the said ex parte award having been rejected on the ground that thirty days had expired and hence the labour court became functus officio, the employer moved the High Court. Following the decision of Supreme Court in Anil Sood, the Delhi High Court directed the labour court to dispose of the application of the defaulting party in terms of the said ratio.[50] In Surajgarh KVS Samiti, the High Court of Rajasthan dismissed the writ petition filed by the management against the rejection of its application for setting aside the ex parte award, as it was found that the tribunal rejected the said application on the ground that the management did not appear in the adjudication proceedings despite service of notice and that the application was without merit.[51] In Ajit Singh, a single Judge of Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the labour court would become functus officio after the expiry of 30 days of the publication of the award, and hence the order passed by it setting aside the ex parte award after that period would be invalid.[52] It is submitted that the decision of Punjab High Court in Ajit Singh lays down the correct law as compared to that of Supreme Court in Anil Sood (supra).

Relief

After determination of the issues referred to it, the tribunal has to award relief. If the claim is not sustainable, the tribunal may not award any relief. But if the claim is made out, it may award in full or part, the relief claimed by the aggrieved party, depending upon the circumstances of each case.[53]

1. Form of the Award

For detailed discussion of the form of the award, see notes and comments under s 16.

2. Publication of Award

See notes and comments under s 17.

3. Commencement of Award

See notes and comments under s 17A.

4. Period of Operation of the Award

See notes and comments under s 19.

5. Retrospective Effect of Award
6. Binding Effect of Award

See notes and comments under s 18(3).

7. Enforcement of Award

A party in whose favour an award is made may enforce it in any of the following manners:

(i) By moving the 'appropriate Government' to prosecute the defaulting party under s 29.

(ii) Where any money or benefit which is capable of being computed in terms of money under an 'award' to a workman from his employer, such workman may make an application under s 33C to the appropriate government or the layout court, for the recovery of the money or computation of such benefit in terms of money due to him under the award.

(iii) The breach of an award may itself be raised as an 'industrial dispute' to lead to another reference to an industrial tribunal.[54]

(iv) Institute a civil suit for obtaining a decree in satisfaction of the dues under the award, and such a decree will be enforceable by execution proceedings under O 21 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[55]

The point No (i) is only a criminal provision for breach of an award, the point No (iii) will lead to absurdity and point No (iv) will lead to protracted and prolix litigation. The only proper mode of recovery of money or benefit under an award is the point No (ii). But an award of Industrial Tribunal is the decision of an industrial dispute by a statutory Tribunal and can have no more statutory force than the decree of the civil court. Either it may be executed or otherwise implemented in the manner laid down in the relevant law, but cannot be enforced by a prerogative writ of mandamus as an instrument having the force of Law itself.[56]

Clause (bb): BANKING COMPANY

Banking Company

The term 'Banking Company' was inserted in the Act by the Industrial Disputes (Banking and Insurance Companies) Ordinance 1949, which was promulgated on 30 April 1949 and then enacted into law by s 3 of the Industrial Disputes (Banking and Insurance Companies) Act 1949 (54 of 1949). This definition was amended by s 3 of the Act 36 of 1956 which again was substituted by the present definition by the State Bank of India (Subsidiary Banks) Act 1959 (38 of 1959), s 64 and Sch 3, Pt 2. The definition was again amended by s 38 and Sch 2, Pt 2 of Act 18 of 1964, where 'the Industrial Development Bank of India' was also included in the definition. Now, by the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act 1970 (Act 5 of 1970) 'a corresponding new Bank constituted under s 3 ' of that Act has been further included in the definition. The definition is not violative of Art. 14 of the Constitution as discriminatory.[57] To fall within the meaning of this definition, a Banking Company has to satisfy two requirements, viz:

(i) It should be a 'Banking Company' as defined in s 5 of the Banking Companies Act 1949 (10 of 1949).

(ii) It should have branches or other establishment in more than one State. The following Banks have specifically been included in the definition:

(a) The Industrial Development Bank of India;

(b) The Reserve Bank of India;

(c) The State Bank of India; and

(d) Any subsidiary Bank as defined in the State Bank of India (Subsidiary Banks) Act 1959.

A 'Banking Company' does not cease to be a 'Banking Company' by merely changing its name and transferring some of its assets and liabilities to some other company. For a Banking Company to cease to be Banking Company within the meaning of s 2(bb) of the Industrial Disputes Act, it is necessary that the licence granted to it by the Reserve Bank of India under s 22 of the Banking Companies Act must be cancelled.[58] It is necessary that the Banking Company must, at the time in question be able to accept deposits of money from the public repayable on demand or on such terms on which the money might have been deposited. It is sufficient that Banking is the primary business of the company even if by reason of certain supervening cause, it is not able for the time-being to carry on the work of receiving deposits and of making payment.[59]

Clause (c): BOARD

Board

This clause is the reproduction of s 2(a) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. It has not since been amended. A 'board' is constituted under s 5 of the Act, by a notification in the official gazette. It is constituted for the purpose of promoting settlements of industrial disputes. Its powers are wider than those of a conciliation officer. Under s 10(1)(a), existing or apprehended disputes are referable to a board for promoting their settlement. Section 11 deals with the powers of boards, while s 13 deals with their duties. Section 20 specifies the points of time when the proceedings before a board are deemed to have commenced and concluded.

Clause (cc): CLOSURE

Closure

The expression 'closure' had not been defined in the Act hitherto. But, in view of a lot of litigation being centered around the closure of industrial undertakings, subsequent legislation has accentuated the need for defining a 'closure'. Section 25(FFA) and s 25(O) impose certain conditions on indiscreet closures. Therefore, with a view to effectively deal with the subject, this definition has been inserted. Certain judicial dicta have held that even a temporary closure in certain circumstances, could be deemed to be a closure. But, under the present definition, it is only 'the permanent closing down' of a place of employment that can be taken to be a closure. However, a closure may be partial. In other words, it is not necessary that the whole establishment is closed, for the purposes of the definition. In Glass Workers, a dispute raised by the union that the closure of the industrial establishment effected in 1982 was not bona fide closure, but was in fact a lock-out, was referred for adjudication to the industrial tribunal. The tribunal passed an award holding that the closure was real and bona fide. Justice Tiwari of Allahabad High Court upheld the order of the tribunal to the effect that no relief could be granted to the workmen in a dead industry.[60] For a detailed discussion, see the notes and comments under s 25FFF.

Clause (d): CONCILIATION OFFICER

Conciliation Officer

A conciliation officer is appointed under s 4 of the Act. His appointment may be for a limited period or it may be permanent. Conciliation officers are charged with the duty of mediating in and promoting the settlement of industrial disputes. Section 11 deals with the procedure and powers of conciliation officers, while s 12 deals with their duties. Section 20 specifies the points of time at which the conciliation proceedings shall be deemed to have commenced and concluded.

Clause (e): CONCILIATION PROCEEDING

Conciliation Proceeding

The term 'conciliation proceeding', means any proceeding before a conciliation officer or a board. Where a dispute relates to a 'public utility service' and a notice under s 22 has been given, the conciliation officer is bound to initiate the conciliation proceedings. But regarding other establishments, discretion is given to the conciliation officer to initiate or not to initiate the conciliation proceedings. However, a board can initiate the proceedings only after a reference has been made to it under s 10 of the Act and the scope of the 'conciliation proceedings' before the board is limited by the terms of the reference made to it. Before the amendment of the definition of 'settlement' in s 2(p), by the Amending Act of 1956, any settlement arrived at in the absence of the conciliation officer, was held not to be binding under the Act.[61] But after the amendment, a written agreement between the parties, arrived at otherwise than in the course of 'conciliation proceedings', has been included in the definition and would be a binding 'settlement', provided that the requirements of that provision are complied with.

Clause (ee): CONTROLLED INDUSTRY

Controlled Industry

The industries, the control of which the Union Government, by a Central Act, may declare to be expedient in the public interest, will fall within the purview of this definition. Schedule 1 to the Industrial (Development & Regulation) Act 1951 gives the list of such controlled industries. [See also Notes and Comments under s 2(a) —'appropriate government', under the caption 'any controlled industry as may be specified in this behalf by the Central Government'.]

Clause (f): COURT

Court

Section 2(b) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929 (Act 7 of 1929) was identical to this clause, which was originally enacted in the IDA 1947. There has been no amendment of this clause so far. The appropriate government may appoint a court of inquiry under s 6, for inquiring into any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute. The procedure to be followed by the court and its powers have been laid down in s 11. Section 14 prescribes the duties of the court of inquiring into the matters referred to it and reporting thereon to the appropriate government, ordinarily, within a period of six months from the commencement of its inquiry. The reference to a court of inquiry is to be made under s 10(1)(b).

Clause (g): EMPLOYER

Employer

The repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, contained a somewhat similar, though not identical, provision in s 2(c). The present clause was originally enacted in the IDA. The definition is neither exhaustive nor inclusive.[62] The word 'employer' is not specifically defined, but the clause merely indicates who is to be considered an employer for the purposes of an industry, carried on by or under the authority of a department of government and by or on behalf of a local authority.

The definition of an 'employer' has been made exclusive and it is probably for the benefit of the employees. For example, if a departmental head has taken an action, a complaint can be taken against such action as being the action of the employer. To that extent, the agent or the person for the time being in authority, is clothed with the personality of the employer, so that he may be answerable.[63] An employer under s 2(g) means, in relation to an industry carried on by or under the authority of any department of the Central Government or a state government, the authority prescribed in that behalf, or where no such authority is prescribed, the head of the department.[64]On a combined reading of s 2(g), 2(j) and 2(s), it is apparent that if the state carries on any undertaking or business, it is an employer within the meaning of the Act and persons working in such undertakings, are its workmen.[65] The definition of the term 'employer' is, therefore, intended to operate only in relation to an activity properly describable as an industry.[66]

Rule 2(g) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, prescribes that, with reference to cl (g) of s 2, in relation to an industry carried on by or under the authority of a department of the Central Government or state government, the officer-in-charge of the industrial establishment shall be the 'employer' in respect of that establishment, and in relation to an industry concerning the railways, carried on by or under the authority of a department of the Central Government, anyone of the officers mentioned in sub-cll (a), (b) and (c) of r 2(g)(ii), shall be the 'employers'. The definition of the term 'employer' in this clause, is neither exhaustive nor inclusive. The meaning given to the term 'employer' by this definition is only illustrative. The term 'employer', therefore, must be given its ordinary grammatical meaning.[67]

Central Government

The expression 'Central Government' has been defined in s 3(8) of the General Clauses Act 1897.

State Government

The expression 'state government' has been defined in s 3(60) of the General Clauses Act 1897. In Sarju Prasad, it was held that, with respect to a workman working in the irrigation department of the State of Bihar, the State of Bihar was the real employer.[68]

Local Authority

A 'Local Authority' has been defined by s 3(31) of the General Clauses Act 1897, as

> A municipal committee, district board, body of port commissioners or other authority legally entitled to, or entrusted by the government with, the control or management of a municipal or local fund.

The definition of an 'employer' clearly shows that a local authority may become an employer if it carries on an industry.[69]

'In relation to an industry carried on by'

The words 'in relation to an industry carried on by' used in the definition, have to be read with the word 'means' in both the sub-clauses. So read, the words 'in relation' make the intention of the legislature quite clear, ie, that they indicate that it was in relation to those particular industries only, that the expression 'employer' was defined. Thus interpreted, the expression 'employer' means the Central Government, the state government or the local authority 'in relation to' the industries carried on by them.[70]

'Carried on by or under the Authority of'

For the scope and meaning of this expression, see the notes and comments under the caption 'Carried on by or under the authority of' in the definition of 'appropriate government' in s 2(a).

Other Employers

The term 'employer' is not defined in the Act, except where the term is used in relation to an industry carried on by a department of the Central or state government or by some local authority.[71] The meaning given to an 'employer' by the definition, is only illustrative, not exhaustive.[72] But the manner in which the definition is drafted shows that the 'employers' include, within the ambit of the Act, governments as well as private persons, as it is clear that its elaborate machinery was devised not only for the industries run by the government and local authorities, but also for the industries run by private persons.[73] In other words, the term 'employer' must be given its ordinary grammatical meaning, namely a person who employs someone to work or to do something for him.[74]This construction is also consistent with the phraseology employed by the legislature in different sections of the Act and, any other construction of the expression 'employer' would create incongruity and repugnancy between the different sections.[75] Hence, in relation to a proprietary concern, the word 'employer' will mean the owner of the concern; in relation to a firm, it will mean the partners of that firm and in relation to a joint stock company, it will mean the corporate body.[76] Thus, in a case where an employee was employed by the branch office of a newspaper office establishment, while formal confirmation was made by the head office, for the purposes of the definition, the branch office was held to be the 'employer'.[77]But the Visakhapatnam Dock Labour Board, constituted under the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act 1948, in view of its functions under the relevant provisions of the Act and the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Scheme 1959 framed thereunder, was held not to be the 'employer' of the Dock Labour workmen, as there was no employer-employee relationship between the board and such workmen. Since the functions of the board did not come within the definition of an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j) of the Act, it could not fall within the meaning of an 'employer' as defined in this clause.[78] The president of a municipality has been held to be an 'employer'.[79] But a member of a club, which is registered as a society under the Societies Registration Act, is not an employer as contemplated by the definition in this provision.[80]

Change of Ownership: Successor-in-interest

An 'employer' in industrial law, means not only a person who engages another to work for him, but also his successors and legal representatives.[81] Industrial law regards the rights and obligations of the old concern as continuing and capable of being enforced as against the new management and is not affected by the substitution of a new management for the old. In other words, the transfer of a business ipso facto, does not terminate the services of the workmen employed in such business and a purchaser of such a concern as a going concern, with all its assets and liabilities, is bound to continue the old employees on the same emoluments and with a continuity of service.[82] Therefore, when there is a transfer of business from one (owner) management to another, the rights and obligations which existed between the old management and their Workers continue to exist vis-a-vis the new management, even after the date of transfer,[83] provided, however, that there is a continuity of service and identity of business.[84] Thus, a person who, on such transfer, becomes the owner of a concern, becomes the employer of the employees of the establishment and hence, becomes liable for the past services of its workmen.[85]This principle of industrial law finds recognition in statutory provisions like s 18(3)(c) of the Act and ss 114 and 115 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act.

As long as there is identity of the business itself, a mere change of name would not affect the rights of the Workers. For instance, where a banking company transferred some of its assets and liabilities to another concern and changed its name, it was held that it did not cease to be an employer.[86] Likewise, where a transfer is effected in favour of a benamidar, with a view to victimize the workmen, such a benamidar would not become the employer and the original employer would not cease to be the employer.[87] But where the business is not taken over as a going concern, or it does not retain its identity, the new management, though dealing in the same line, cannot be considered to be a successor or assignee of the old business.[88] In Anakapalle CAIS, the Supreme Court summed up the factors to be taken into consideration while determining the question as to whether a purchaser of an industrial concern can be held to be a successor-in-interest of the vendor.

Illustrations

Where the purchaser purchased only the machinery and plant of a concern and did not purchase the concern as a going concern, or its goodwill, such purchaser could not be considered as a successor-in-interest and no liability could be cast on him.[89] Likewise, where the running business is not taken over, even though the purchaser was dealing in the same line of business, he could not be considered to be a successor or assignee of the old business and the old workmen, who were employed by the purchaser, could not claim a continuity of service against the new management.[90] On the other hand, where there is merely a change in the management or the establishment, the new management is the successor of the previous management.[91] A change of partnership by an inclusion or retirement of a partner, although it legally changes the constitution of the firm, will not bring about change of business or employer.[92] Where the proprietorship business was taken over and continued by a private limited company, in which the former proprietor, his wife and his manager became directors and the new company was formed to carry on and continue the former business in the same style, though a different entity; under a different name, the new company was held to be the successor-in-interest of the old proprietorship business and was bound to continue to employ the former workmen.[93] Where a company sold its machineries and business to a co-operative society; but the co-operative society did not purchase the good-will of the company; nor did it purchase the outstandings and the liabilities of the company; but the society continued the same business in the same place, without any appreciable break and took in its employment, a number of employees of the company, the society was held to be a successor-in-interest of the company.[94]

In Industrial Paper ALE Union, the facts, which require a somewhat detailed narration, were: the union represented its members employed by AIDC in its Extensible Sack Kraft Paper Project ('ESKPP') under Industrial Paper (Assam) Ltd, ('IPAL'), raised a dispute for non-payment of salaries of its members by AIDA after October, 1998 on the plea that the members of the appellant were not the employees of Assam Industrial Development Corporation ('AIDC') but of the IPAL. Accordingly the appropriate Govt vide notification dated 20-2-1999 referred the following issues to the Labour Court for adjudication:

1. Whether the management of Assam Industrial Development Corporation (AIDC) is justified to deny as owner of the Sack Craft Paper Project of M/s Industrial Papers (Assam) Ltd (IPAL), though they have signed an agreement with a contractor as 'owner' of the Sack Kraft Paper Project, Dhing, District Nagaon, Assam.
2. Whether the AIDC is justified to deny to take the responsibility of the Industrial Papers (Assam) Ltd employees, though the employees were appointed by the AIDC through the advertisement published in the newspaper.
3. Whether the management of AIDC is justified by not absorbing or engaging the employees of the IPAL, in their other Promoted industries or give them salary regularly though they have failed to install or run the proposed Paper Mill in Dhing, Nagaon.
4. If not, then the said affected employees are entitled for either regular monthly salary from the management or absorption in the other Industrial Units promoted by the Assam Industrial Development Corporation, Guwahati.
5. And the AIDC should not recruit or appoint new employees to say other their Promoted Industries until and unless the employees of the Industrial Paper are engaged or absorbed by the Management.

AIDC raised preliminary objection against the issues figured in the government order, inter alia, questioning the very maintainability of the reference on the ground that the purported dispute was not an industrial dispute; that the notification issued by the Government could not constitute an industrial dispute because AIDC was not a proper or necessary party; and that the members of the union, being employees of a separate company ie IPAL, could not claim to be the employees of AIDC, which was merely a Promoter Company. The Labour Court in its Award held as follows:

1. There was no material on record to show that AIDC had transferred Sack Kraft Paper Project, Dhing, to IPAL at any point of time. It was observed that though both parties have approved the appointment of candidates at IPAL and AIDC none of them came within the categories of those post advertised.
2. The Issue is redundant as members of the Union do not come within the categories of posts advertised.
3. It was not incumbent of AIDC to absorb members of the appellant-Union to any other AIDC industry.
4. IPAL could not be run, it was incumbent for AIDC to terminate the services of the members of the appellant-Union giving them terminal benefits according to relevant industrial and labour laws.
5. Until that was done AIDC was obliged to give the members of the appellant-Union regular salaries.

The writ petition and writ appeal filed by the union were dismissed at both the tiers of the High Court on the ground that AIDC was not the owner of ESKPP of IPAL, and hence no liability could be fastened to AIDC for the absorption/engagement of the employees of IPAL in any other industry promoted by AIDC or to pay them salaries regularly after the closure of the project. Aggrieved by the decision, the union approached the Supreme Court. Dismissing the appeal, Pasayat J (for self and Kapadia J) held:

> In the written statement before the Labour Court, AIDC has taken specific stand in the following manner:
>
> "That when the employees were paid regular salary by IPAL Project from its own fund/account at that time no such demand was raised by the employees of IPAL. When they found that the Project is virtually closed and they are not getting salary from their own Project, they demanded that they belong to AIDC for the sake of getting salary from AIDC without doing any job for AIDC. In such situation the employees of IPAL cannot be treated as employees of AIDC. These employees were appointed/recruited against the Project as per the job specification and as per requirement and sanctioned strength of IPAL while seeking requisition from Employment Exchange the requisition was signed by General Manager, Sack Kraft Paper Project as the employer. All the employees have been appointed on behalf of the IPAL Project. They are employees of IPAL governed by all rules and regulations of Industrial Papers Assam Ltd. Under these circumstances stated above the management of AIDC cannot take any responsibility for the employees of IPAL."
>
> Above being the position, the judgment of the Division Bench affirming that of learned single Judge cannot be faulted and the appeal stands dismissed. Subject to what is stated above, dismissal of the appeal shall not stand in the way of the concerned employees or recognized Unions making claim for arrears of salaries or claims to be due from IPAL.[95] (paras 14 & 15)

Contract Labour

The definition of 'employer' in s 3(14) of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946, is wider than the definition in s 2(g) of the IDA and is capable of being applied in a wide and generic sense to any employee engaged at any time, in the industry concerned and to any employer in the same industry. In the under-noted cases,[96] the owners of certain undertakings have been held to be the employers qua the workmen employed by the contractors. The Bombay Dock Labour Board constituted under the Dock Workers' Regulation of Employment (Scheme) 1951, has been held to be the employer of the workmen working under the stevedores, though the wages of such workmen were paid by the stevedores.[97] On the other hand, a colliery manager was held not be the 'employer' of a workman working under a contractor in the colliery, merely by reason of the fact that he had suspended such workman in the exercise of the statutory duty cast on him under the Mines Act.[98]

3 Words and figures "the Agricultural Refinance Corporation established under s 3 of the Agricultural Refinance Corporation Act, 1963, (10 of 1963)" which were inserted by Act 10 of 1963, s 47 and Sch II, were omitted by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 19-12-1964).

4 The words "by the Federal Railway Authority" omitted by AO 1948.

5 Ins by Act 65 of 1951, s 32 (wef 8-5-1952).

6 The words "operating a Federal Railway" omitted by AO 1950.

7 Subs by Act No 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

8 Subs by Act 24 of 1996, s 2, for the words "the Industrial Finance Corporation of India established under s 3 of the Industrial Finance Corporation Act, 1948" (wef 11-10-1995).

9 The words and figures "or the Indian Airlines' and "Air India' Act, 1953 (27 of 1953)" omitted by Act 24 of 1996, s 2 (wef 11-10-1995). Earlier these words were inserted by Act 35 of 1965.

10 Subs by Act 24 of 1996, s 2, for "the Oil and Natural Gas Commission, established under s 3 of the Oil and Natural Gas Commission Act, 1959 (43 of 1959)" (wef 11-10-1995).

11 Subs by Act 24 of 1996, s 2, for the words "the International Airports Authority of India constituted under s 3 of the International Airports Authority Act, 1971 (43 of 1971)" (wef 11-10-1995).

12 Ins by Act 53 of 1987, s 56 and Second Sch, Part III (wef 9-7-1988).

13 Subs by Act 54 of 1949, s 3, for "a mine, oil-field".

14 Subs by Act 24 of 1996, s 2, for "a banking or an insurance company" (wef 11-10-1995).

15 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 19-12-1964).

16 Subs by Act 24 of 2010, s 2 (wef 15-9-2010 vide SO 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010), for the words "major ports, the Central Government, and".

17 Subs by Act 24 of 2010, s 2 (wef 15-9-2010 vide SO 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010). Before substitution, sub-clause (ii) stood as under:

> "(ii) in relation to any other industrial dispute, the State Government;".

18 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 19-12-1964).

19 Ins by Act 43 of 1953, s 2 (wef 24-10-1953).

20 Clause (aa) was relettered as "(aaa)" by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (ii) and clause (aa) was inserted.

21 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 3 (wef 10-3-1957).

22 Subs by Act 38 of 1959, s 64 and Sch III, Pt II, for cl (bb) which was inserted by Act 54 of 1949, s 3.

23 Now, see the Banking Regulation Act, 1949 (10 of 1949).

24 Ins by Act 28 of 1981, s 40 and Sch II, Pt II (wef 1-1-1982).

25 Ins by Act 62 of 1984, s 71 and Sch III, Pt II (wef 20-3-1985).

26 The words "the Industrial Development Bank of India" omitted by Act 53 of 2003, s 12 and Sch, Pt III (wef 2-7-2004).

27 Ins by Act 39 of 1989, s 53 and Sch II, Pt II.

28 Subs by Act 5 of 1970, s 20 for "and any subsidiary Bank" (wef 19-7-1969).

29 Subs by Act 40 of 1980, s 20, for "and any subsidiary bank" (wef 15-4-1980).

30 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

31 Ins by Act 65 of 1951, s 32 (wef 8-5-1952).

32 Clause (eee) omitted by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 19-12-1964). Earlier cl (eee) was inserted by Act 43 of 1953, s 2 (wef 24-10-1953).

33 Subs by the AO 1948 for the words "a Government in British India".

34 Ins by Act 45 of 1971, s 2 (wef 15-2-1971).

35 Clause (h) omitted by the AO 1950.

36 Ins by Act 18 of 1952, s 2 (wef 4-3-1952).

37 On the enforcement of cl (c) of s 2 of Act 46 of 1982, cl (j) of s 2 shall stand substituted as follows:—

"(j) "industry" means any systematic activity carried on by co-operation between an employer and his workmen (whether such workmen are employed by such employer directly or by or through any agency, including a contractor) for the production, supply or distribution of goods or services with a view to satisfy human wants or wishes (not being wants or wishes which are merely spiritual or religious in nature), whether or not,—

(i) any capital has been invested for the purpose of carrying on such activity; or

(ii) such activity is carried on with a motive to make any gain or profit, and includes—

(a) any activity of the Dock Labour Board established under section 5A of the Dock Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act, 1948 (9 of 1948);

(b) any activity relating to the promotion of sales or business or both carried on by an establishment, but does not include—

(1) any agricultural operation except where such agricultural operation is carried on in an integrated manner with any other activity (being any such activity as is referred to in the foregoing provisions of this clause) and such other activity is the predominant one.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this sub-clause, "agricultural operation" does not include any activity carried on in a plantation as defined in clause (f) of section 2 of the Plantations Labour Act, 1951; or

(2) hospitals or dispensaries; or

(3) educational, scientific, research or training institutions; or

(4) institutions owned or managed by organisations wholly or substantially engaged in any charitable, social or philanthropic service; or

(5) khadi or village industries; or

(6) any activity of the Government relatable to the sovereign functions of the Government including all the activities carried on by the departments of the Central Government dealing with defence research, atomic energy and space; or

(7) any domestic service; or

(8) any activity, being a profession practised by an individual or body of individuals, if the number of persons employed by the individual or body of individuals in relation to such profession is less than ten; or

(9) any activity, being an activity carried on by a co-operative society or a club or any other like body of individuals, if the number of persons employed by the co-operative society, club or other like body of individuals in relation to such activity is less than ten;"

38 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

39 Ins by Act 54 of 1949, s 3 (wef 14-12-1949).

40 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

41 Clause (kka) re-lettered as cl (kkb) by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984), earlier cl (kka) was ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 3 (wef 10-3-1957).

42 Ins by Act 43 of 1953, s 2 (wef 24-10-1953).

43 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 2, for "or for any other reason" (wef 21-8-1984).

44 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 2, for "closing of a place of a employment" (wef 21-8-1984).

45 Clauses (la) & (lb) ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 15-12-1964).

46 Ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 3 (wef 10-3-1957).

47 Ins by Act 45 of 1971, s 2 (wef 15-12-1971).

48 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 (wef 19-12-1964).

49 Ins by Act 45 of 1971, s 2 (wef 15-12-1971).

50 Subs by Act 36 of 1964, s 2 for "Schedule" (wef 19-12-1964).

51 Now the Railways Act, 1989 (24 of 1989).

52 Ins by Act 43 of 1953, s 2 (wef 24-10-1953).

53 Ins by Act 49 of 1984, s 2 (wef 18-8-1984).

54 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 3, for clause (p) (wef 7-10-1956).

55 Ins by Act 35 of 1965, s 2 (wef 1-12-1965).

56 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

57 Subs by Act 18 of 1957, s 2, for clause (r) (w.e.f. 10-3-1957), earlier cl (r) was amended by Act 36 of 1956, s 3 (wef 10-3-1957).

58 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

59 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

60 Ins by Act 43 of 1953, s 2 (wef 24-10-1953).

61 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 2 (wef 21-8-1984).

62 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 2, for cl (s) (wef 21-8-1984), earlier, subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 3 (wef 29-8-1956).

63 Subs by Act 24 of 2010, s 2 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010), for the words "one thousand six hundred rupees".

64 Kartick Chandra Malik v Rani Harsha Mukhi Dasi AIR 1943 Cal 345 (FB).

65 Rai Jogendra CG Bahadur v Bhawani Charan Law AIR 1945 Cal 425 (DB), per Mittel J.

66 N Subramania Iyer v Official Receiver AIR 1958 SC 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 72], 10, per Sinha J.

67 Bennett Coleman & Co Pvt Ltd v Punya Priya Das Gupta (1969) 2 LLJ 554 [LNIND 1969 SC 150] (SC), per Shelat J.

68 Gough v Gough [1891] QB 665, per Esher MR.

69 Hyderabad Asbestos Cement Products Ltd v EIC 1976 Lab IC 868 [LNIND 1975 AP 238], 874 (AP) FB), per Krishna Rao J.

70 Savoy Hotel Co v London County Council [1900] 1 QB 665.

71 Hyderabad Asbestos Cement Products Ltd v EIC 1976 Lab IC 868 [LNIND 1975 AP 238], 874 (AP) (FB), per Krishna Rao J.

72 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 39, para 6.38.

73 Firebricks & Potteries Ltd v Firebricks & Potteries Ltd Workers' Union (1956) 1 LLJ 571, 573 (Mys), per Venkataramayya CJ.

74 National Buildings Construction Corpn Ltd v MK Jain 1981 Lab IC 62, 67 (Del), per Anand J.

75 Continental Construction Pvt Ltd v Goi 1977 Lab IC 1199, 1200-01 (AP) (DB), per Jeevan Reddy J.

76 Ins by Amendment Act 24 of 2010 (wef 15-9-2010).

77 Subs. Ibid. prior to substitution, the sub-cl (ii) read as under:

> "(ii) in relation to any other industrial dispute, the State Government."

78 Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union v State of Bihar (1969) 2 LLJ 549 [LNIND 1969 SC 121], 552 (SC), per Shelat J.

79 Carlsbad Mineral Water Mfg Co Ltd v PK Sarkar (1952) 1 LLJ 488 [LNIND 1951 CAL 116] (Cal), per Harries CJ.

80 Abdul Rehman Abdul Gafor v E Paul (1962) 2 LLJ 693 [LNIND 1961 BOM 50] (Bom), per Desai J.

81 Bharat Glass Works Pvt Ltd v State of West Bengal (1958) 1 LLJ 467 [LNIND 1957 CAL 30], 470 (Cal), per Sinha J.

82 Indian Naval Canteen Control Board v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 366, 367 (Ker) (DB), per Menon CJ.

83 Mgmt of Bihar Khadi Gramodyog Sangh v State of Bihar 1977 Lab IC 466 [LNIND 1984 SC 252], 481 (Pat) (DB), per SK Jha J.

84 Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union v State of Bihar (1969) 2 LLJ 549 [LNIND 1969 SC 121], 553 (SC), per Shelat J.

85 Union of India v LC (1970) 1 LLJ 184, 186 (P&H), per Tuli J.

86 Administrative Officer, Electro Chemical Research Institute v State of TN 1990 Lab IC 1815, 1818 (Mad) (DB), per Venkataswami J.

87 Carlsbad Mineral Water Mfg Co Ltd v PK Sarkar (1952) 1 LLJ 488 [LNIND 1951 CAL 116] (Cal), per Harries CJ.

88 Abdul Rehaman Abdul Gafor v E Paul (1962) 2 LLJ 693 [LNIND 1961 BOM 50], 697 (Bom) : AIR 1963 Bom 267 [LNIND 1961 BOM 50]: (1963) 65 Bom LR 20, per Desai J.

89 Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union v State of Bihar (1969) 2 LLJ 549 [LNIND 1969 SC 121], 553 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 82 [LNIND 1969 SC 121]: (1969) SCC 765, per Shelat J.

90 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 336 [LNIND 1975 SC 249], 338-39 (SC), per Untwalia J.

91 Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh v Model Mills (1984) 2 LLJ 507 [LNIND 1984 SC 252], 514 (SC), per Desai J.

92 Food Corpn of India Workers Union v Food Corpn of India 1985 Lab IC 732, 73 & -37 (SC), per Khalid J.

93 Air India Statutory Corpn v United Labour Union (1997) 1 LLJ 1113 [LNIND 1996 SC 2076], 1128 (SC), per K Ramaswamy J.

94 Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union v State of Bihar (1969) 2 LLJ 549 [LNIND 1969 SC 121] (SC), per Shelat J.

1 Workmen Karnataka PF Employees Union v Addl IT (1983) Lab IC 1523, 1531-32 (Kant), per Malimath J.

2 Central Warehouse Corn v Delhi Admn (1983) 63 FJR 125 (Del), per Avadh Behari Rohatgi J.

3 Indian Naval CC Board v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 366, 368 (Ker) (DB), per Menon CJ.

4 Abdul Rehman Abdul Gafor v E Paul (1962) 2 LLJ 693 [LNIND 1961 BOM 50], 697 (Bom), per Desai J.

5 Mgmt of Bihar Khadi Gramodyog Sangh v State of Bihar 1977 Lab IC 466 [LNIND 1984 SC 252], 473 (Pat) (DB), per SK Jha J.

6 Swadeshi Cotton Mills Thozhilali Shemalana Padukappu Union v National Textile Corpn Ltd (1984) 1 LLJ 140 [LNIND 1983 MAD 83] (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

7 National Building Construction Ltd v Ram Pal Singh 1997 Lab IC 2667, 2672 (Bom), per Lodha J.

8 Bharat Glass Works Private Ltd v State of West Bengal (1958) 1 LLJ 467 [LNIND 1957 CAL 30] (Cal), per Sinha J.

9 DP Kelkar v Ambadas Keshav Bajaj, AIR 1971 Bom 124 [LNIND 1970 BOM 33], 143 DB, per Kotwal CJ.

10 National Textile Corpn v IT 1979 Lab IC 1024, 1027 (All) (DB), per Ojha J.

11 Cotton Corporation of India Ltd v GC Odusmath (1999) 1 LLN 382 : (1999) 1 LJ 19 : (1998) 6 Kar LJ 181 [LNIND 1998 KANT 158], (Kant) (DB).

12 Mgmt of Castrol (l) Ltd v P Ganesan (2001) 2 LLN 1107 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

13 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLN 235 (SC).

14 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v NW Union (2001) 4 LLN 269 (Bom), per Rebello J.

15 Saudi Arabian Airlines v Shehnaz Mudbhatkal (1999) 1 LLN 708, 715, 720 (Bom) : (1999) 2 LJ 109, per Srikrishna J.

16 Meenakshi Patel v EEPC (2001) 4 LLN 1276 (Bom), per Mhatre J.

17 Indian Council of Agricultural Research v Duryodhan H Ingole (2010) 4 LLJ 410 (Bom), per Bobde J.

18 Carlsbad Mineral Water Manufacturing Co Ltd v PK Sarkar (1952) 1 LLJ 488 [LNIND 1951 CAL 116] (Cal), per Harries CJ.

19 JR Jugele, Railway Contractor v Sitabaiatamaram 1990 Lab IC 1018, 1019 (Bom) (DB), per Ghodeswar J.

20 Bhowra Coke Plant v Bhowra Coke Plant Workers' Union (1956) 1 LLJ 195 (LAT).

21 Firebricks and Potteries Ltd v FPL Workers' Union (1956) 1 LLJ 571 (Mys), per Venkataramayya CJ.

22 Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 262 [LNIND 1960 SC 40] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 692 [LNIND 1960 SC 40], per Gajendragadkar J.

23 General Employees Assn v Union of India (1992) 1 LLJ 242, 244 (Bom) : (1991) 61 FLR 382, per Kantharia J.

24 Serajuddin & Co v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1962 SC 122], 453 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

25 Ambika Prasad v State of Orissa (1974) 1 LLJ 65, 67 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

26 Assam Rly Trading Co v CGIT 1970 Lab IC 488, 491, per Banerjee J.

27 Serajuddin & Co v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1962 SC 122], 453 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

28 Khas Jeenagora Coal Co Pvt Ltd v Salim M Merchant (1965) 2 LLJ 302 (Pat) (DB).

29 Mgmt of Jamadoba Colliery v PO, CGIT-cum-LC 1989 Lab IC (NOC) 113 (Pat), per SB Sinha J.

30 Mgmt of Indian Oil Corpn v State of Assam 1990 Lab IC (NOC) 137 (Gau) (DB).

31 Bisra Limestone Co Ltd v Central Labour Inspector (1969) 2 LLJ 112 [LNIND 1968 ORI 117], 115 (Ori) (DB), per Barman CJ.

32 State of Maharashtra v Mohanlal Devichand Shah (1965) 2 LLJ 157 [LNIND 1965 SC 98], 160-61 (SC), per Sikri J.

33 Ambika Prasad v State of Orissa 1974 Lab IC 805,807 (Ori) (DB), per Misra J.

34 Cement Works Karmachari Sangh v IT 1971 Lab IC 143, 14 & 47 (Raj), per Tyagi J.

35 Neyveli Lignite Corpn Ltd v Subbarayan 1984 Lab IC 1880 (Mad), per Pandian J.

36 Cantonment Board, Ambala v State of Punjab (1961) 1 LLJ 734 (Punj) (DB), per Falshaw J.

37 PK Pillai v Burma Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd AIR 1956 Kutch 9, per Dave CJ.

38 Tulsidas Khimji v Jeejeebhoy (1961) 1 LLJ 42 [LNIND 1960 BOM 39] (Bom) (DB), per Desai J.

39 Goa DL Union v Govt of UT of Goa, Daman & Diu (1968) 2 LLJ 536 (G, D & D), per Jetley JC.

40 Goa Sampling Employees Assn v General Superintendence Co of India (Pvt) Ltd 1985 Lab IC 666 [LNIND 1984 SC 338] (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 357 [LNIND 1984 SC 338]: (1985) 1 SCC 266, per Desai J.

41 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v State of UP, (2012) 2 LLJ 11 (All), per Shishir Kumar J.

42 Serajuddin & Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1962 SC 122], 452 (SC), per Gajendragdkar J.

43 Mgmt of Patiala Iron Works v Union of India 1975 LIC 1265 (Del) (FB), per Avadh Behari J.

44 India Tourism Dev Corpn v Delhi Administration 1982 Lab IC 1309, 1319 (Del) (FB), per Chadha J.

45 Paritosh Kumar Pal v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 1254, 1260 (Pat) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

46 Paritosh Kumar Pal v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 1254, 1260 (Pat) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

47 Lalbhai Tricumlal Mills Ltd v DM Vin (1956) 1 LLJ 557 [LNIND 1955 BOM 36], 558 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

48 Lipton Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 431 [LNIND 1959 SC 14], 436 (SC), per SK Das J.

49 Indian Cable Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 409 [LNIND 1962 SC 100], 413 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

50 Workmen of Sri Ranga Vilas Motors Pvt Ltd v Shri Rangavilas Motors (P) Ltd. (1967) 2 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1967 SC 26], 17 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1040 [LNIND 1967 SC 26], per Sikri J.

51 Paritosh Kumar Pal v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 1254, 1260 (Pat) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

52 Spencer & Co Ltd v Delhi Administration 1975 FLR 76, per Dalip Kapur J.

53 Emerald Valley Estates Ltd v Secy, Estates Staffs Union of South India 1979 Lab IC 86 (Ker), per Bhaskaran J.

54 Vinod Rao v PO, LC, 1980 Lab IC 1191, 1193-94 (Guj) (DB), per Sheth J.

55 Associated Traders & Engineers Pvt Ltd v Addl IT (1976) 49 FJR 187 (Del), per HL Anand J.

56 Juggat Pharma Pvt Ltd v Deputy Commissioner of Labour (1982) 2 LLJ 71, 72 (Kant), per Bopanna J.

57 J&J Dechane Distributors v State of Kerala (1974) 2 LLJ 9, 13-14 (Ker) (DB), 1973 KLJ 784, per Gopalan Nambiyar J.

58 Assn of Medical Representatives v IT (1966) 1 LLJ 614 [LNIND 1966 MP 107], 618-19 : AIR 1967 MP 114 [LNIND 1966 MP 107]: 1966 MPLJ 769 (MP) (DB).

59 Genl Superintendence Co of India Ltd v Goa Dock Labour Union, (1984) 1 LLJ 56 [LNIND 1982 BOM 219], 57 : (1984) 86 Bom R 30(Bom) (DB), per Jahagirdar J.

60 Godrej Soaps Ltd v State of Karnataka (1998) 3 LLN 709 (Kant), per Goud J.

61 BG Sampat v State of West Bengal, (1999) 3 LLN 160 (Cal), per Kundu J.

62 New Delhi General Mazdoor Union v Govt of Delhi (2000) II LLJ 1191(Del), per Sikri J.

63 DLF Universal Ltd v Government of NCT (2002) 2 LLN 596 (Del), per Kaul J.

64 S Ramesh v Tamil Nadu PP Ltd (2001) 1 LLN 557 [LNIND 2000 MAD 247] (Mad) (DB), per Jayasimha Babu J.

65 Mgmt of Best & Crompton Engg Ltd v PO, LC (2002) 2 LLN 306 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

66 Mohan R Matre v Udaipur Distillary Co Ltd (2003) 4 LLJ 1004.

67 Mining and AMC Employees Union. v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 872 (Cal), per Seth J.

68 IOL Limited, Kanpur v State of UP (2004) 4 LLJ 369 (All), per Ambwani J.

69 Kerala State EDC Ltd v Jayashree NK (2003) 4 LLJ 1067 (Bom), per Khandeparkar J.

70 Steel Authority of India Ltd v National Union of Waterfront Workers AIR 2001 SC 3527 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870]: (2001) 7 SCC 1 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870] : (2001) 5 SCALE 626 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870], per Qadri J.

71 Tata Memorial Hospital Workers' Union v Tata Memorial Centre AIR 2010 SC 2943 [LNIND 2010 SC 725]: (2010) 8 SCC 480 [LNIND 2010 SC 725] : (2010) 4 LLJ 830 [LNIND 2010 SC 725], per Gokhale J.

72 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, pp 37-38, para 6.24.

73 Chapter VA, in particular ss 25F, 25FF and 25FFF, Industrial Dispute Act 1947.

74 Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v K Palaniswami (1968) 1 LLJ 90 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1968 Mad 52 [LNIND 1966 MAD 206], per Anantanarayanan CJ.

75 Maharana Mill Kamdar Union v NL Vyas (1959) 2 LLJ 172, 175 (Bom) (DB), per Chainani CJ.

76 See, notes and comments under s 2(92), Mulla's Code of Civil Procedure, 1989, 14th ed, Vol 1, pp 13-25.

77 Andhra Handloom Weavers Co-operative Society v State of AP (1963) 2 LLJ 488, 490 (AP) : AIR 1964 AP 363 [LNIND 1963 AP 118], per Gopalakrishnan Nair J.

78 Cox & Kings (Agents) Ltd v Workmen (1977) 1 LLJ 471 [LNIND 1977 SC 142], 476 (SC) : AIR 1977 SC 1666 [LNIND 1977 SC 142]: (1977) 2 SCC 705 [LNIND 1977 SC 142], per Sarkaria J.

79 Sital v CGIT (1969) 2 LLJ 275 (MP) (DB), per Pandey J.

80 Coimbatore DMW Union v Dhanalakshmi Mills Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 556 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

81 Birla Cotton Spg & Weaving Mills Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 648 [LNIND 1962 SC 206] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1158 [LNIND 1962 SC 206]: (1963) 2 SCR 716 [LNIND 1965 SC 347], per Wanchoo J.

82 Asbestos Cement Ltd v PD Sawarkar (1970) 2 LLJ 129 [LNIND 1970 SC 65] (SC), per Shelat J.

83 Pallavan Transport Corpn Ltd v M Muthuchezian 1986 Lab IC 1541 -42 (Mad), per Sathiadev J.

84 Krishnarajendra Mills Workers' Union v ALC (1968) 1 LLJ 504, 509 (Mys) (DB), per Tukol J.

85 Divisional Forest Officer v Dy Commr of Labour (1999) 2 LLJ 282 (AP), per Sudershan Reddy J.

86 Notes under the caption 'Preliminary decree', Mulla's Code of Civil Procedure, 14th ed, pp 13-25.

87 Thakur Yugal Kishore Sinha v State of Bihar (1950) 1 LLJ 539 (Pat) (DB), per Meredith CJ.

88 Hotel Imperial v Hotel Workers Union (1959) 2 LLJ 544 [LNIND 1959 SC 136], 552 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

89 Mgmt of Bihar State Electricity Board v Workmen (1971) 1 LLJ 389, 393 (Pat) (DB).

90 Punjab National Bank Ltd v AN Sen Alr 1952 Punj 143(DB), per Harnam Singh J.

91 Mehar Singh v Delhi Administration (1973) ILR 1 (Del) 732, 737-38, per RN Agarwal J.

92 Jeewan Lal (1929) Ltd v State of WB 1975 Lab IC 1161 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharjee J.

93 Darshak Ltd v IT (1986) 1 LLJ 253, 257 (Kant) : ILR 1987 Karnataka 50, per Rama Jois J.

1 Manager, Jaipur Syntex Ltd v PO Industrial Tribunal (1990) 1 LLJ 323, 325 (Raj) : (1989) 59 FLR 99, per MB Sharma J.

2 Hotel Imperial v Hotel Workers Union (1959) 2 LLJ 544 [LNIND 1959 SC 136], 552 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

3 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v R Dayal, Addl IT (1960) 2 LLJ 712 [LNIND 1960 SC 283],715 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

4 Darshak Ltd v Industrial Tribunal (1986) 1 LLJ 253, 259 (Kant) : ILR 1987 Karnataka 50, per Rama Jois J.

5 Rajasthan SEB v IT (2002) 1 LLN 1251 (Raj), per Keshore J.

6 Mgmt of Bihar State Electricity Board, Patna v Workmen (1971) 1 LLJ 389, 393 (DB).

7 National Textile Corpn v State of Rajasthan (1989) 1 LLN 778 (Raj) (DB), per PC Jain J.

8 EID Parry (India) Ltd v IT, Madras (1993) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1992 MAD 89] (Mad) per Bakthavatsalam J.

9 Mgmt of Radio Foundation Engg Ltd v State of Bihar 1970 Lab IC 1119, 1121-1122 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

10 Jaswant Sugar Mills Co Ltd v Labour Court (1975) 2 LLJ 16 (All), per Gulati J.

11 Mgmt of Bihar State Electricity Board, Patna v Workmen (1971) 1 LLJ 389, 393 (Pat) (DB).

12 Debarata Sen v State of West Bengal, 1998 (4) LLN 941 (Cal).

13 Certain Tanneries in Dindigul v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 171 (LAT).

14 Mgmt of Ambala Cantantonment Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 854, 860 (P&H), per Tuli J.

15 BR Herman & Mohatta (I) Pvt Ltd v Seventh IT 1977 Lab IC (NOC) 13 (Cal) (DB).

16 Workmen of Swadeshi Cotton Mills Ltd v Mgmt 42 FLR 255, 262.

17 Cox & Kings (Agents) Ltd v Workmen (1977) 1 LLJ 471 [LNIND 1977 SC 142] (SC) : AIR 1977 SC 1966 : (1977) 2 SCC 705, per Sarkaria J.

18 Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 1969, 12th ed, pp 43-44.

19 Hindustan Motors Ltd v Janardan Singh (2001) 4 LLN 1066 (Cal) (DB), per Hrishikesh Banerji J.

20 Gurbhej Singh v State of Punjab (2004) 1 LLJ 16 : (2003) 135 PLR 188 (P&H) (DB).

21 State of Bihar v DN Ganguli (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92], 641 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1018 [LNIND 1958 SC 92]: [1959] SCR 1191, per Gajendragadkar J.

22 Maharana Mill Kamdar Union v NL Vyas (1959) 2 LLJ 172, 176 (Bom) (DB), per Chainani CJ.

23 Coimbatore DMW Union v Dhanalaxmi Mills Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 556 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

24 Sital v Central Government IT (1969) 2 LLJ 275, 280 (MP) (DB), per Pandey J.

25 Andhra Handloom weavers' Co-operative Society v State of AP (1963) 2 LLJ 488 (AP), per Gopalakrishnan Nair J.

26 Workmen of Indian Cable Co Ltd v ICC Ltd 1973 Lab IC 208, 210 (Pat) (DB), per Anwar Ahmad J.

27 Hindustan Housing Factory Employess Union v Mgmt (1971) 2 LLJ 222 (Del) (DB), per Hardy J.

28 Workmen of Government Silk Weaving Factory, Mysore v PO Industrial Tribunal (1973) 2 LLJ 144 [LNIND 1973 SC 143], 146 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 423 : (1973) 2 SCC 134, per Vaidialingam J.

29 Gandhidham Nagarpalika Adipur v RC Israni (1993) 1 LLJ 432, 439 (Guj) (DB) : (1992) GLH 423, per Divecha J.

30 Bargarh Coop Sugar Mills Ltd v PO , IT 2002 (4) LLN 934 (Ori) (DB).

31 Indian Bank v Central Government Industrial Tribunal (2003) 1 LLJ 331 : (2002) 95 FLR 83 (Cal), per Seth J.

32 Guman Singh v PO, LC, (2003) 4 LLJ 736 (P&H), per Mittal J.

33 Krishnankutty Nair v IT (1957) 2 LLJ 45, 48 (Ker), per Varadaraja Iyengar J.

34 Workmen of TR Ltd v Travancore Rayons Ltd (1967) 1 LLJ 518, 520 (Ker), per Gopalan Nambiyar J.

35 Maharana Mill Kamdar Union v NL Vyas (1959) 2 LLJ 172, 176 : (1961-62) 2 FJR 155 (Bom) (DB).

36 Sital v CCIT (1969) 2 LLJ 275, 279-80 (MP) (DB), per Pandey J.

37 Pandavapura SS Karkhane Ltd v State of Mysore 1969 Lab IC 729 (Mys) (DB), per Somnath Iyer J.

38 Glaxo Laboratories (India) Ltd v PO, LC 1977 Lab IC 1523,1533-34 (AP) (DB), per Sheth J.

39 Pandavapura SS Karkhane Ltd v State of Mysore 1969 Lab IC 729 (Mys) (DB), per Somnath Iyer J.

40 Andhra HWC Society v State of AP (1963) 2 LLJ 488 (AP), per Gopalakrishnan Nair J.

41 Workmen of Travancore Rayons Ltd v Mgmt (1967) 1 LLJ 518, 520 (Ker), per Nambiyar J.

42 KV Kumaran v LC, 1982 Lab IC 1241, 1243 (Ker), per Sukumaran J.

43 Nagar Palika Haldwani v Municipal Employees Union 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 13 (All), per SC Mathur J.

44 Ramjas College, v LC IV, Delhi 1987 Lab IC 1556 (Del), per Kirpal J.

45 RB Girap v Borivali GCH Society Ltd (1990) 2 LLJ 558, 559 (Bom), per Pendse J.

46 Ranigunj Chemicals Works v Fourth IT, 1998 (1) LLN 880 (884) (Cal), per Mitra, J.

47 Mukundbhai G Bhatt v Exeell Industries, (1998) 2 LLN 675 (Guj), per Keshote, J.

48 P Viyapuri v PO (1998) 3 LLN 349 (Mad), per Sathasivam J.

49 Anil Sood v PO Labour Court (2001) 2 LLN 611 (612) (SC) : (2001) 10 SCC 534 : (2001) 1 LLJ 1113.

50 LML Ltd v PO, Labour Court 2002 (2) LLN 585 [LNIND 2002 DEL 52] (Del) (DB).

51 Surajgarh KVS Samiti v Labour Court 2002 (2) LLN 698 (Raj), per Madan, J.

52 Ajit Singh v PO, LC200! (4) LLN 1165 (P&H), per Sudhalkar, J.

53 See, notes and comments under s 10(4), Caption: Jurisdiction to give relief.

54 India Paper Pulp Co Ltd v India Paper Pulp Workers, Union AIR 1949 FC 148 .

55 Bilash Chandra Mitra v Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd (1953) 1 LLJ 337 [LNIND 1952 CAL 141] (Cal), per HK Bose J.

56 KM Mukherjee v Secretary, State Bank of India 1968 Lab IC 127 (Cal), per Basu J.

57 All India Bank Employees' Assn v National IT (1961) 2 LLJ 385 [LNIND 1961 SC 283], 401-02 SC, per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

58 Bharat Nidhi Ltd v Ex-employees (1953) LAC 53.

59 Jwala Bank Ltd v Shitla Prashad Singh AIR 1950 All 309 [LNIND 1949 ALL 212], 311 (DB), per Malik CJ.

60 Glass Workers Mazdoor Sangh v PO, IT (2005) 4 LLJ 395 (All), per Tiwari J.

61 Nagarcoil Electric Supply Corpn v IT (1953) 1 LLJ 208 (TC), per Subramanya Iyer J.

62 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245, 246 (FC), per Mahajan J.

63 Maharashtra SRTC v Madhukar Narayanrao 1970 Lab IC 225, 235 (Bom) (DB), per Abhyankar J.

64 Heavy Engineering Mazdoor Union v State of Bihar (1969) 2 LLJ 549 [LNIND 1969 SC 121], 553 (SC), per Shelat J.

65 Somu Kumar Chatterjee v Dist Signal TC Engineer (1970) 2 LLJ 179, 185 (Pat) (DB), per Jha J.

66 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

67 Workmen of Swatantra Bharat Mills Canteen v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 1235 (Del), per GC Jain J.

68 Sarju Prasad v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 1264, 1266 (Pat) (DB).

69 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatulah J.

70 Somu Kumar Chatterjee v District Signal TC Engineer (1970) 2 LLJ 179 (Pat) (DB), per Jha J.

71 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245 -46 (FC), per Mahajan J.

72 Dahingeapara Tea Estate v Workmen (1956) 1 LLJ 187, 189 (LAT).

73 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245 -46 (FC), per Mahajan J.

74 Budge Budge Municipality v PR Mukherjee (1950-51) 2 FJR 80, 84 (Cal) (DB), per Harries CJ.

75 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245 -46 (FC), per Mahajan J.

76 Birla Bros Ltd v Modak (1948) ILR 2 Cal 209.

77 Narayana Pillai v IT (1959) 2 LLJ 182 -83 (Ker), per Vardaraja Ayyangar J.

78 Visakhapatnam Dock Labour Board v Stevedores'Assn (1970) 1 LLJ 46 [LNIND 1969 SC 324], 56 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1926 [LNIND 1969 SC 326]: (1969) 2 SCC 801 [LNIND 1969 SC 324], per Vaidialingarn J.

79 Natwarlal Vithaldas Patel v Municipality of Vadnagar (1965) 1 LLJ 608, 610 (Guj) (DB), per Mehta J.

80 Mgmtof Madras Gymkhana Club v PO, Addl LC (1986) 2 LLJ 415 -16 (Mad), per Sathiadev J.

81 Dahingeapara Tea Estate v Workmen (1956) 1 LLJ 187, 189 (LAT).

82 Ramjilal Nathulal v Himabhai Mills Co Ltd (1956) 2 LLJ 244 (LAT).

83 Odeon Cinema v Workers of Sagar Talkies (1954) 2 LLJ 314 [LNIND 1954 MAD 134] (Mad), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

84 Kays Construction Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

85 Bombay Garage Ltd v IT (1953) 1 LLJ 14 (Bom), per Tendolkar J.

86 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees (1952) 2 LLJ 420 (LAT).

87 VV Nakhte v SP Shinde [1953] LAC 67.

88 Bhanuvilas Theatre v Workmen (1956) 2 LLJ 176, 178.

89 Antony D'Souza v Sri Motichand Silk Mills (1954) 1 LLJ 793 (LAT).

90 Bhanuvilas Theatre v Workmen (1956) 2 LLJ 176, 178 (LAT).

91 Palace Theatre, Salem v LAT (1954) 1 LLJ 635 (Mad), per Rajagopala Ayyanagar J.

92 Alex A Apcar Or) & Co v MN Gan AIR 1960 Cal 14 [LNIND 1959 CAL 89], per PB Mukharji J.

93 Kays Comtruction Co (Pvt) Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124] (SC), per Gajendragadkhar J.

94 Anakapalle CA&IS v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 621 [LNIND 1962 SC 345] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

95 Industrial Paper (A) LE Union v Mgmt, Assam Industrial Dev. Corpn. Ltd, AIR 2007 SC 985 [LNIND 2007 SC 33]: AIR 2007 SC 985 [LNIND 2007 SC 33]: (2007) 3 SCC 73 [LNIND 2007 SC 33], per Pasayat J.

96 Maharashtra Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Bombay (1951) 2 LLJ 299 [LNIND 1951 SC 38] (SC), per Mahajan J.

97 Bombay Dock Labour Board v Stevedores Workers (1954) 1 LLJ 200 (LAT).

98 Chhota Nagpur Coalfields Workers Union v Kargali Colliery (1952) 2 LLJ 32.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

[20][S. 2A. Dismissal, etc., of an individual workman to be deemed to be an industrial dispute—

21[(1)] Where any employer discharges, dismisses, retrenches or otherwise terminates the services of an individual workman, any dispute or difference between that workman and his employer connected with, or arising out of, such discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination shall be deemed to be an industrial dispute notwithstanding that no other workman nor any union of workmen is a party to the dispute.]

22[(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in section 10, any such workman as is specified in sub-section (1) may, make an application direct to the Labour Court or Tribunal for adjudication of the dispute referred to therein after the expiry of forty-five days from the date he has made the application to the Conciliation Officer of the appropriate Government for conciliation of the dispute, and in receipt of such application the Labour Court or Tribunal shall have powers and jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute, as if it were a dispute referred to it by the appropriate Government in accordance with the provisions of this Act and all the provisions of this Act shall apply in relation to such adjudication as they apply in relation to an industrial dispute referred to it by the appropriate Government.

(3) The application referred to in sub-section (2) shall be made to the Labour Court or Tribunal before the expiry of three years from the date of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of service as specified in sub-section (1).]

Analysis

Extension of the Definition of Industrial Dispute

This section has been engrafted in the Act by the Amendment Act of 1965 and it has to be read as an extension of the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k). A long line of decisions had established that an individual dispute could not per se be an industrial dispute, but could become one if it was taken up by a trade union or a substantial number of workmen of the establishment.[23] This position of law created hardship for individual workmen who were discharged, dismissed, retrenched or whose services were otherwise terminated when they could not find support by a union or any appreciable number of workmen to espouse their cause. This provision does away with the requirement of espousal of an individual dispute for converting it into an industrial dispute in cases where the dispute arises out of: (i) discharge, (ii) dismissal, (iii) retrenchment, or (iv) otherwise termination of services of an individual workman. By introducing the legal fiction that the dispute of an individual workman connected with or arising out of his discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of his services by his employer will constitute an industrial dispute not with standing that no other workman nor any union of workmen is a party to the dispute, this provision enlarges the definition of industrial dispute. In enacting this provision, the intendment of the legislature is that a workman whose service has been terminated unlawfully by the employer, should be given relief without it being necessary for the relationship berween the employer and the whole body of employees being involved in that dispute and the dispute becoming generalised one between labour on the one hand and the employer on the other.[24] Any other type of dispute regarding an individual workman is not contemplated by s 2A[25] and will be governed by the principles of law laid down by the Supreme Court in connection with the conversion of an individual dispute into 'industrial dispute' by espousal. In BK Sharma, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that where the service of an employee automatically comes to an end on the expiry of a fixed period for which he was employed, it would not amount to discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination by the employer.[26]

The Amending Act 46 of 1982,[27] has inserted sub-cl (bb) in the definition of retrenchment under s 2(oo) which excludes the 'non-renewal of contract of employment between the employer and the workmen concerned on its expiry' and the contract of employment being 'terminated under a stipulation in that behalf contained therein, from the purview of the definition of retrenchment'. The Orissa High Court has held that a dispute relating to superannuation of a workman according to the rules is not one relating to 'termination' or 'retrenchment' of the service of a workman.[28] The retirement of a workman has also been excluded from the definition of retrenchment by sub-cl (b) of s 2(oo). In a case where the workman himself terminates the contract of employment either by resigning or abandoning the job, the termination of service would not fall within the definition of retrenchment which postulates the termination of contract of employment 'by the employer'. As a measure of abundant caution, 'voluntary retirement of the workman' from the service has been specifically excluded by sub-cl (a) from the ambit of the definition of'retrenchment'. Though, the termination of service of a workman in cases excepted from the definition of 'retrenchment' in s 2(oo) may not be 'retrenchment', the question arises whether it will not be covered by the expression 'where the employer...otherwise terminates the services of an individual workman', in s 2A. The test is whether the contract of employment had been terminated by the employer or the workman himself. If the service is terminated by the employer in any manner, that case will clearly be covered by this section. In cases where the service has not been terminated by the employer, the case will not fall within the purview of this section. However, if the employer secures resignation of a workman by force or coercion against his will, in substance, it would amount to the termination of the services of the workman by the employer. Therefore, if a workman complains that he has not tendered the resignation voluntarily, but his resignation was secured under threat or coercion and by that process, termination of his service brought about, such a dispute between the individual workman and the employer would be squarely covered by the words 'where any employer...otherwise terminates the services of an individual workman' used in the definition. The question, whether in a given case the resignation was tendered voluntarily or secured under duress etc, is a question of fact.[29] But such a fact is a jurisdictional fact which should be decided first before the tribunal proceeds adjudicate the merits. Therefore, it must be decided as a preliminary issue whether the workman, in fact, resigned his job. If the workman succeeds to prove that the resignation was procured from him under pressure, coercion or threats, etc, it will no longer be a case of voluntary termination of his service by the workman himself. It will be a case of termination of the service of the workman by the employer, which will attract the provisions of s 2A. The same principles will apply to abandonment of job. If, in fact, the workman has not abandoned the job but the employer purports to treat the termination of the service on account of such abandonment, the provisions of this section will be attracted. The Patna High Court in North Bihar Sugar Mills, took the view that removing a workman from permanent service and allowing him to continue as a seasonal worker will tantamount to his removal from his permanent service.[30]

The cases where the contract of service lapses on the expiry of the term of employment or in terms of stipulation contained in the contract of employment, presents some difficulty because in such a case the service is neither terminated by the employer nor the workman himself. It is terminated by the mutual contract of the parties. Now by virtue of sub-cl (bb) inserted in the definition of retrenchment by the Amending Act 46 of 1982, termination of service has been taken out of the purview of 'retrenchment'. It cannot also be said that such termination is by the employer. Such termination will not fall within the purview of s 2A. This section entitles an individual workman himself, to raise an industrial dispute regarding discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination of his services and it will be competent for the adjudicatory authorities under the Act to deal with such dispute as an 'industrial dispute' even though there is no espousal by his fellow workmen or any union comprised of them.[31]Though this provision brings an individual dispute within the scope of the Act, it does not make any difference with respect to the raising of the dispute. For raising an industrial dispute with respect to the termination of his service, etc, the individual workman must raise the dispute with the employer by making a demand,[32] but the Madhya Pradesh High Court took the view that an individual dispute relating to discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination of service of the workman arises immediately after the workman is discharged, dismissed, retrenched or his service is otherwise terminated without his consent or in the face of opposition. Such an individual dispute becomes an industrial dispute and it is not necessary, to make a demand on the management for making the dispute, an industrial dispute.[33] This view is not consistent with the decision of the Supreme Court in Sindhu Resettlement Corpn.[34]

In Ram Prasad Vishwakarama, the Supreme Court held that where an individual dispute becomes an 'industrial dispute' being sponsored by a trade union or a considerable number of co-workers of the workman, the individual workman is at no stage a party to the industrial dispute independently of the union or the workmen. After the enactment of s 2A, it is not necessary that a dispute relating to the discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of service of a workman must be sponsored by a trade union or a substantial number of workmen.[35] In other words, even if it is not sponsored by a trade union or a substantial number of workmen, such a dispute will be deemed to be an industrial dispute. From the use of the words 'notwithstanding that no other workman nor any union of workmen is a party to the dispute', it appears that the trade union or co-workmen are not precluded from sponsoring an individual dispute for the purpose of converting it into an industrial dispute. Thus, such a dispute can either ipso facto be deemed to be an industrial dispute on a demand made by the workman himself or by espousal of the dispute by a trade union or a body of workmen. In the former case, the dispute becomes an industrial dispute as soon as the demand is made by the workman that the termination of his service should be recalled and he should be reinstated while in the latter case, it becomes an industrial dispute when the dispute is sponsored by a trade union or a substantial number of workmen and such a demand is made. There is a pertinent distinction between these two types of disputes. In the former case, the dispute is between the workman concerned and the employer while in the latter, the dispute is between the workmen as a body and their employer. In other words, the first is an individual dispute deemed to be an industrial dispute by a fiat of s 2A, while the latter dispute is a collective dispute.

The Madhya Pradesh High Court in Mgmt of Katkona Colliery, held that a dispute relating to the discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of the service of a workman not sponsored by a trade union or a body of workmen will be industrial dispute falling within the purview of s 2A without making a demand on the employer for reinstatement because such a dispute becomes an industrial dispute immediately after the workman is discharged, dismissed, retrenched or his service is terminated without his consent on the face of his opposition. It is, therefore, not necessary in such cases to make a demand on the management for making the dispute an industrial dispute.[36] Likewise, in Ramakrishna Mills, the dispute relating to the dismissal of three workmen was not raised by the workmen concerned themselves with the employer but was, in fact, raised and espoused by the union of the workmen. The Madras High Court held that the demand was only that of the concerned workmen though it got projected through their union and that was how it was raised. Hence, the reference could be sustained as relating only to an individual workman.[37] In Best & Crompton, expressing a similar view, another Division Bench of Madras High Court upheld the common reference made by the government of 75 dismissals. The Bench further pointed out that reference to a wrong provision is no bar to uphold the validity of the reference in applying the correct provision of law. No litigant should be denied his legitimate rights by hyper technicalities or by the wrong quotation of the provisions of law.[38]

A single judge of the Delhi High Court in Dunlop, held that even if a dispute of an individual workman is referred to adjudication as a collective dispute having been espoused by a union or workmen, a workman can conduct the dispute before the tribunal to the exclusion of the union.[39] The learned single judge also justified the holding on the facts of the case. On the other hand, in Enfield India, the order of reference expressly stated that 'an industrial dispute had arisen between the workman, Thiru Mohan and the management of Enfield India Ltd. But in view of the fact that the union had been representing the workman before the management and the conciliation authorities, a single judge of the Madras High Court took the view that the dispute, in fact, was not between the workman and the management but it was between the workmen of the company as represented by the union and the management of the company. There was no finding that the dispute, in fact, had been sponsored by a substantial number of workmen or the union. Unless there was a valid espousal, the dispute was not of a collective character. Furthermore, an adjudicator has not the power to change or to add to the parties set out in the order of reference.[40] These decisions of the High Courts are neither warranted by the statute nor by precedent being in conflict with Ram Prasad Vishwakarma.

A single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that the definition of the industrial dispute in s 2(2) of the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947, was repugnant to s 2A of the Central Act. Therefore, s 2A of the Central Act will prevail over the definition of 'industrial dispute' as contained in the State Act.[41]But a Division Bench of the same High Court took the view that the effect of amending the Central Act, introducing s 2A in it, is to amend the definition of expression 'industrial dispute' in that Act and it does not follow that the definition of the expression 'industrial dispute' in the UP Act stands automatically amended and the extended definition in the Central Act should be confined to that statute only.[42] Another single judge of that court in Hari Fertilizers, held that a dispute relating to the termination of the service of a workman referred to adjudication under s 2A cannot be settled by the union by entering into settlement with the management pending such adjudication without the consent of the concerned workman.[43]

'Any Dispute...Connected with or Arising out of Such Dispute Etc'

From the language of the section, it is clear that only disputes relating to 'discharge', 'dismissal' 'retrenchment', or otherwise 'termination of services' of an individual workman will fall within its purview while other disputes are not comprehended in it. Thus, where a workmen is sought to be retired at a particular date on the ground of his attaining age of superannuation which is disputed by the employee claiming that according to his real date of birth, he has not attained the age of superannuation, the dispute will fall within the purview of the definition of 'industrial dispute' in this section.[44] On the other hand, claims for wages, dearness allowance, gratuity or bonus, will not fall within the ambit of this section.[45] A single judge of the Delhi High Court[46] has taken the view that the question whether the workman concerned is also to get wages as compensation or as a condition for terminating the contract of service, is a matter which arises directly whenever his services are terminated. Furthermore, when the services of a workman are terminated, it would be expected that he would be paid wages and other charges due to him for the period he worked. Accordingly, the bonus, travelling allowance, dearness allowance due to the workman for the period he worked are also connected with the question of termination of his service because 'when the contract of service is terminated, the workman is certainly entitled to get all remunerations due to him'.

The dispute relating to the transfer of an employee from one department to another or one place to another will not fall within purview of this section. Likewise, the disputes relating to the reduction in rank, demotion or promotion of a workman too will not fall in its purview. In all such cases, the remedy of such individual workman will only be in a civil court.[47]The machinery provided in the Industrial Disputes Act for resolution of disputes will not apply to such disputes, unless they are sponsored by a union or other workmen. In HS Rangaramu v Karnataka SRTC , Jain CJ., speaking for a three-judge Bench of Karnataka High Court, held that an industrial dispute arises the moment the order of dismissal or termination is passed, and that merely because the workman has a remedy against such order by way of appeal or revision, it could not be said that the said order of discharge or dismissal would not be effective until such remedy was exhausted. There is nothing like the said dispute maturing into an industrial dispute only after the aggrieved workman has exhausted the remedy of appeal and revision.[48]A Bench of the Supreme Court comprising Rajendra Babu and Shivraj Patil JJ, held that the steps taken by the governments of Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh to make a provision in the Act, enabling an individual workman to approach labour court or industrial tribunal directly without the requirement of reference by the government in a case covered by s 2A, would not be inappropriate.[49] Where the workman disputes the date of his superannuation as fixed by employer and the dispute relates to forcible termination of service before date of superannuation, such dispute of termination falls within the ambit of s 2A.[50] Dispute raised by the contract labour under s 2A(2) - as amended by the State of Andhra Pradesh - on the expiry of the labour contract is not maintainable before tribunal as there was no relationship of master and servant between contract labour and principal employer.[51] Where the dispute raised by a dismissed workman under s 2A was dismissed by the labour court for default on the part of the workman, a single judge of the AP High Court held that the subsequent raising of the dispute by the workman was not barred by res judicata, as the dismissal of the dispute in the first instance was for default and not on merits.[52] In yet another case relating to beedi workers, the learned judge held that s 31(2) of the Beedi and Cigar Workers (Conditions of Employment) Act 1966 does not operate as a bar to a dismissed workman, falling within the ambit of that Act, from raising a dispute under s 2A(2) of the ID Act.[53]

Application to Cases of Prior Discharge, etc

section 2A came into effect from 1 December 1965. Though the courts on the plain language of the statute are agreed that this section is not retrospective, there is conflict of opinion among different High Courts on the question: as to whether an individual dispute of a workman which arose before the day on which this provision came into force and was not sponsored "by his fellow workmen or any union up to that date, could become an industrial dispute after the section came into force? The conflict was set at rest by Supreme Court in Ruston and Hornsby, wherein it was held that it would be an industrial dispute with the meaning of s 2A and could be validl reffered for adjudication by approving the view of the Delhi and other High Courts as against that of Mysore High Court.[54]

Constitutional Validity

The constitutional validity of this section was challenged before a Full Bench of the Delhi High Court[55]on the ground that the Parliament had no power to change the meaning and concept of the expression 'industrial dispute' which had acquired a fixed meaning at the time when the Constitution was drafted and further that the amendment was repugnant to the basic scheme of the Act. The court held that the entry 22 in the list 3 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution includes the dispute of an individual workman and the amendment is not repugnant to the scheme of the Act. In view of this holding, the court did not express any opinion with respect to the point made out on behalf of the workmen that in any case, entry 97 of the list 1 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India would cover the amendment. A similar view has been taken by a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court.[56] Likewise, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the amendment engrafting s 2A is within the legislative competence of the Parliament under entry 22 of the list 3 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution.[57]The Mysore High Court also held that s 2A is not inconsistent with the object of the Act and under entry 22 the Parliament was competent to legislate upon a dispute relating to discharge, dismissal or retrenchment of an individual workman. It was also held that the section does not offend the guarantee of Art. 14 of the Constitution.[58] The Patna High Court held that s 2A is neither ultra vires nor does it suffer from the vice of untrammeled power of the government to make a reference nor is it discriminatory in its application.[59]

In the state of UP, there is a parallel Act known as the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947. Both these Acts simultaneously operate in relation to industrial disputes covered by both the Acts. But the UP Act has no provision like s 2A of the Central Act. Section 12 of the UP Act preserves the power of the state government to refer any industrial dispute or matters connected therewith under the Central Act or to deal with any report or settlement in accordance with the provisions of that Act. For the removal of doubts, s 12A declares that nothing in the State Act shall be deemed to preclude the Central Government from constituting a national tribunal under the Central Act for the time being in force or any such tribunal from exercising any powers conferred upon it under that Act. In Har Narain, the state government in exercise of its powers under the State Act referred an industrial dispute for adjudication under the Central Act invoking the provisions of s 2A. The High Court had to consider the question; whether s 2A of the Central Act could be invoked by the state government when it has its own enactment simultaneously operating in relation to industrial disputes? The High Court held that the provision is saved by the proviso to Art. 254 of the Constitution to operate in the State of UP, where the Central Act also is in force. By virtue of s 12 of the State Act, the state is competent to make the reference under the Central Act and to such references s 2A of the Central Act would apply.[60]As an obiter, the Bench also expressed the view that since s 2A had been added by Parliament in the Central Act which relates to a subject in the Concurrent List, it would operate on the UP Act as well. Later, a Full Bench of the High Court in Vishnu Dass,[61]while considering the question; whether s 2A of the Central Act would automatically be deemed to have been inserted in the UP Act also, so as to modify the definition of 'industrial dispute' contained in s 2(1) of the Act, dissented with the obiter of the Division Bench and observed that the operation of s 2A must be confined to matters governed by the Central Act and this section does not modify the definition of 'industrial dispute' in the state Act.

A Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that s 2A of this Act is pro tanto repugnant with the provisions of the Andhra Pradesh Shops and Establishment Act of 1966 because the dispute of an individual workman, in regard to termination of services, squarely falls within the field covered by ss 40 and 41 of the Andhra Act, and in view of the fact that the State Act has been assented to by the President, the provisions of that Act, relating to the termination of services of an employee of a shop establishment will prevail upon s 2A and other provisions of this Act insofar as they are attracted by reason of s 2A. But the court refrained from expressing any opinion on the legal position that would arise if the individual dispute of a workman is supported either by the union to which he belongs or in the absence of a union by a substantial number of workmen and such a matter is sought to be referred for adjudication under s 10 of this Act.[62] This question was considered by another Full Bench of the same High Court in Brindavan Hotels, in which a large number of workmen had been discharged from their service by the employer and their case was espoused by a union. The question was whether such a dispute was governed by the Industrial Disputes Act or by the Shops and Establishments Act? Answering the question, the High Court observed that there was no conflict between the relevant provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act and the relevant provisions of the Shops and Establishments Act. They do not operate in the same area. In other words, there are no two competing statutes in the field. It was, therefore, held that the workmen's union or a number of workmen can espouse a dispute of an individual workman only under the Industrial Disputes Act and they cannot espouse it under the Shops and Establishments Act. From these two full Bench decisions, on a comparative analysis of the relevant provisions of the two enactments, the following position emerges:

(1) if an individual workman governed by both these Acts wants to raise an individual dispute, he can do so only under the Shops and Establishments Act;

(2) if a workmen's union wants to espouse the dispute of an individual employee, it can do so only under the Industrial Disputes Act; and

(3) in the absence of a workmen's union if a number of workmen want to espouse a dispute of an individual workman, they can do so only under the Industrial Disputes Act.[63]

These two Full Bench decisions were reviewed by a five judge Bench of the court in APSWIC Society.[64] In this case, the controversy centered around the question of competence of the state government to refer and the jurisdiction of the labour court to adjudicate the dispute arising out of the termination of individual employees, not backed by the union or a group of workmen. In this situation, what actually was under examination was the correctness of the holding in Visakhapatnam Dim Marketing Cooperative Society case, and the holding in Sri Brindavan Hotel case relating to the legal position regarding the dispute arising out of the termination of service of workmen espoused by a union was not strictly relevant. The larger Full Bench held that there was an error in the holding of the Full Bench in Vishakhapatnam Dist Marketing Cooperative Society case where it held that there was a repugnancy between the State and the Central statutes as there was overlapping between ss 40 and 41 of the State Act on the one hand and s 2A of the Central Act on the other and that because the President's assent to the State Act was sought and obtained, the State Act prevailed over the Central Act under Art. 254(2) of the Constitution. The larger Bench held that the question of repugnany arises only when both the legislatures are competent to legislate in the same field with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the concurrent list in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution; and, therefore, Art. 254(1) cannot apply unless both the union and the state laws relate to a subject specified in the concurrent list, and they occupy the same field. The scope and ambit of the proceedings available to an individual employee by virtue of s 2A of the Central Act are not identical to those available to him under ss 40 and 41 of the State Act, The object behind the provision made in ss 40 and 41 of the State Act was not to deprive the shop employee of a right or remedy available to him, but only to provide the additional forum for seeking speedy solution to the problem arising out of the termination of his service. The option is left with the workman who is aggrieved by the termination of his service. He may at his choice and convenience either pursue the remedy under s 2A of the Central Act or approach the appellate court (in case of necessity, the labour court and also in second appeal).

In Shambhu Nath Mukherjee, the Supreme Court discountenanced the attack on s 2A, on the ground that it is ultra vires the powers of the legislature under entry 22 in list II of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution and that it was violative of the guarantee under Art. 14 of the Constitution, as order of reference did not ex facie show that it was a reference of an individual dispute under s 2A.[65] In N Shivashankarachari, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that, where the industrial dispute raised by the workman under s 2A alleging that his services were terminated on the basis of a fabricated document is pending before the labour on a reference made under s 10, a writ petition seeking an inquiry into the alleged fradulent document is not maintainable, as it is a question of fact which has to be gone into by the labour court.[66] Where the labour court recorded a finding that there were many contradictions in the statement of the workman regarding his employment on perusal of oral and documentary evidence, that he failed to establish the relationship of employer and employee with the management, and rejected the reference on that ground, the Bombay High Court held that the award of labour court did not warrant interference.[67] The NCL-II recommended that all matters pertaining to individual workers, be it termination of employment or transfer or any other matter, be determined by recourse to the grievance redressal committee, conciliation and arbitration/adjudication by the labour court. The commission further recommended that s 2A be amended by allowing individual disputes being taken up by the affected workers themselves or by TUS and collective disputes by the negotiating agent or an authorised representative of the negotiating college for resolution.[68]

Death of the Workman

In V Bhaskaran, a single judge of the Kerala High Court has taken the view that if after having raised the dispute, the workman dies, his legal representatives can further agitate and prosecute the dispute before the industrial authorities because, in law, a legal representative is not a different person from the deceased, but only continues the persona of the deceased. Though, in view of the death of the workman, the adjudicator may not be able to award reinstatement on holding that his dismissal was á illegal and invalid, he can award back wages and other benefits to which the workman would have been entitled if his service had not been illegally terminated. Such benefits can, therefore, be claimed by the legal representatives of the deceased workman in industrial adjudication.[69] But the Madras High Court in F Veeramani, dissented from this view and held that in the field of industrial adjudication governed by specific statutory provisions, there is no scope for the adjudication of a claim by the heirs or legal representatives of a deceased workman against the employer. Therefore, where the dispute referred affects an individual, the doctrine of actio personalis moritor cum persona is applicable.[70] This conflict was resolved by the legislature by inserting sub-s (8) in s 10 by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[71] No proceedings pending before any adjudicatory authority in relation to an industrial dispute shall not lapse merely by reason of the death of any of the parties to the dispute being a workman and the adjudicator is enjoined to complete such proceedings and submit his award to the appropriate government. In other words, even after the death of a workman, the proceedings before a tribunal will continue and an order on merits of the rival contentions shall have to be pronounced.[72]

---

20 Ins by Act 35 of 1965, s 3 (wef 1-12-1965).

21 section 2A re-numbered as sub-s (1) thereof by Act 24 of 2010, s 3 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010).

22 Ins by Act 24 of 2010, s 3 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010).

23 Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd v RG Patwardhan (1957) 1 LLJ 27 [LNIND 1956 SC 91] (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

24 Chemicals & Fibres India Ltd v DG Bhoir (l975) 2 LLJ 168, 170 (SC), per Alagiriswami J.

25 Mgmt of Samyuktha Karnataka v ML Satyanarayana Rao 1986 Lab IC 626 -27 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

26 BK Sharma v State of Uttar Pradesh 1976 Lab IC 1092 (All), per KN Singh J.

27 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

28 Gouri Charan Kanungo v PO, IT 1977 Lab IC 1154, 1157 (Ori) (DB), per Acharya J.

29 Southern Roadways Ltd, Bangalore v K Padmabhan 1979 Lab IC 234, 236 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

30 North Bihar Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Bihar 1980 Lab IC 669 (Pat) (DB), per BP Jha J.

31 Mgmt of Gauhati Transport Assn v LC 1969 Lab IC 1568, 1573 (Ass & Nag), per Goswami J.

32 Deepak Industries Ltd v State of WB (1975) 1 LLJ 293 [LNIND 1974 CAL 264] (Cal) (DB), per Salil K Roy Chowdhury J.

33 Mgmt of Katkona Colliery v PO, CGIT 1978 Lab IC 1531 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh J.

34 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn v IT (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268] (SC), per Bhargava J.

35 Ram Prasad Vishwakarama v Industrial Tribunal (1961) 1 LLJ 504 [LNIND 1960 SC 333], 507 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 857 [LNIND 1960 SC 333]:, per Das Gupta J.

36 Mgmt of Katkona Colliery, WCF Ltd v PO, CGIT 1978 Lab IC 1531 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh J.

37 Ramakrishna Mills Ltd v Govt of TN (1984) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1984 MAD 23], 266 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

38 Workmen of Best & Crompton Ltd v Mgmt. (1985) 1 LLJ 492, 494-95 (Mad) (DB), per Shanmukham J.

39 Dunlop India Ltd v BD Gupta 1975 Lab IC 702 (Del), per Rajinder Sachar J.

40 Mgmt of Enfield India Ltd v Second Addl LC (1981) 2 LLJ 287 (Mad), per Padmanadhan J.

41 Vishin Das v State of Uttar Pradesh 1971 Lab IC 769, 771 (All), per Srivastava J.

42 Cawnpore Sugar Works Ltd v Dr BP Mohindra (1971) 2 LLJ 169 (All) (DB), per Oak CJ.

43 Hari Fertilizers v State of Uttar Pradesh 1992 Lab IC 1877, 1880 (All), per Katju J.

44 Titagarh Jute Co Ltd v Sriram Tiwari 1979 Lab IC 513 (Cal), per Chakravorti J.

45 Mathur Aviation v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi (1977) 2 LLJ 255, 260 (Del), per Dalip Kapoor J.

46 Mathur Aviation v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi (1977) 2 LLJ 255, 259-60 (Del), per Dalip Kapur J.

47 Rajasthan SRTC v Krishna Kant 1995 Lab IC 2241, 2247 (SC), per Jeevan Reddy J.

48 HS Rangaramu v Kerala SRTC (2002) LLN 860 (Kant), per Jain CJ.

49 Hospital Employees Union v Union of India (2003) I LLJ 1127(SC) : (2002) 10 SCC 224.

50 Binda Prasad Singh v PO, LC (2003) 3 LLJ 544 (Gau) : 2004 (Suppl.) GLT 564, per Ansari J.

51 Oil and Natural Gas Corpn Ltd v N Satyanarayana (2003) 3 LLJ 289 (AP) : (2003) 3 ALD 711 [LNIND 2003 AP 107], per Narasimha Reddy J.

52 Venkataiah G v IT-cum-LC (2009) 2 LLJ 289 (AP), per Narasimha Reddy.

53 Mohd Jani Basha v Mitra Tobacco Products (2008) 3 LLJ 1022 (AP) : 2008 (4) ALD 519 : 2008 (4) ALT 9, per Narasimha Reddy J.

54 Rustom and Hornsby (I) Ltd v TB Kadam (1975) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1975 SC 231], 356 (SC), per Alagiriswami J.

55 Toshniwal Bros Pvt Ltd v PO, LC [1969] 19 FLR 352 (Del) (FB), per Dua CJ.

56 Atlas Cycle Industries Ltd v PN Thukral 1971 Lab IC 203, 205 (P&H), per Bal Raj Tulli J.

57 TV Sundaram Iyengar & Sons Pvt Ltd v State of Madras 1970 Lab IC 203 [LNIND 1968 MAD 149]-05 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

58 P Janardhana Shetty v Union of India (1970) 2 LLJ 738 (Mys) (DB), per Chandrasekhar J.

59 Tata Iron & Steel Co v L C 1978 Lab IC 1067 (Pat) (DB).

60 Har Narain Ashok Kumar v State of UP 1974 Lab IC 318 (All) (DB), per Satish Chandra J.

61 Vishnu Dass v State of Uttar Pradesh 1974 Lab IC 1287 (All) (FB), per Jagmohan Lal J.

62 Visakhapatnam Dist Mktg CS Ltd v Govt of AP 1977 Lab IC 959 [LNIND 1976 AP 249], 964 (AP) (FB), per Vimadalal J.

63 Brindavan Hotels v Conciliation Officer 1977 Lab IC 1572 [LNIND 1977 AP 132], 1578 (AP) (FB), per Sheth J.

64 Andhra Pradesh SWICS Ltd v LC, 1987 Lab IC 642 (AP) (FB), per Bhaskaran CJ.

65 Delhi Cloth & Gen Mills Ltd v Shambhu Nath Mukherjee 1977 Lab IC 1695 [LNIND 1977 SC 280] (SC), per Goswami J.

66 N Shivashankarachari v BMT Corpn (2001) 4 LLN 580 (Kant), per Gururajan J.

67 Gulab Narayan Tilekar v DV Industries (2002) 3 LLN 707 (Bom) (DB), per Lodha J.

68 Government of India 2002, Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 46, para 6.96.

69 V Bhaskaran v Union of India (1982) 1 LLJ 485, 486 (Ker), per Vadakkel J.

70 F Veeramani v Mgmt of MDCSM Society Ltd 1983 Lab IC 687, 694 (Mad) (DB), per Ratnam J.

71 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

72 Ambabai Manjunath Amin v PL Majumdar, PO, LC (1987) 1 LLJ 36, 39 (Bom) (DB), per SK Desai J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Clause (gg): EXECUTIVE

Executive

The body to which the management of the affairs of a trade union is entrusted is the 'executive' in relation to that trade union, whether it is called as an 'executive' or by any other name. This definition is relevant in the context of s 36(1) of the Act, for the purpose of representation of the workmen.

Clause (h): FEDERAL RAILWAY

Federal Railway

Clause (h), which defined 'federal railway', was deleted by the Adaptation of Laws Orders 1950.

Clause (i): INDEPENDENT

This clause is based on s 2(d) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. The proviso was added by s 2 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1952. 'For the purpose of his appointment' as the chairman or a member of a board, court or tribunal, a person must be unconnected with:

(i) The industrial dispute referred to it; or

(ii) Any industry directly affected by such dispute.

This clause was clumsily drafted. The words 'for the purpose of his appointment' indicate that the chairman or other member of a board, court or tribunal, should be unconnected with 'the industrial dispute' referred to such board, court or tribunal or with 'any industry to be affected by such dispute', at the time of his appointment. The qualification of being an 'independent person' is prescribed by s 7C, for being appointed to, or to continue in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court tribunal or national tribunal. The real intention of the legislature seems to be that a person who is connected with an 'industrial dispute' or with any industry directly affected by such dispute, should not deal with or adjudicate upon such a dispute as chairman, a member or a presiding officer of a board, court of inquiry, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, to whom such a dispute is referred. This intention has hardly been brought out by the language of this clause. To be appointed to or to continue in an office is one thing and to investigate, inquire into or adjudicate upon a particular dispute is altogether a different one. Then the definition in this clause does not refer to a labour court and the national tribunal. Further, this clause as well as s 7C do not refer to conciliation officers, who also need be independent persons, in as much as the chairman or a member of a board is required to be an 'independent person'. This definition as well as s 7C require recasting, clearly bringing out the intention of the legislature.

Proviso

This proviso is in the nature of an explanation, whereby it is clarified that merely on account of the fact that a person is a share-holder in an incorporated company, which is connected with, or is likely to be affected by, such an industrial dispute, he shall not cease to be 'independent'. He is, however, required to disclose to the 'appropriate government', the nature and extent of the shares held by him in the incorporated company as soon as he receives the order of reference of the industrial dispute, which is connected with or likely to affect such company.

Clause (j): INDUSTRY

Legislation

There was no definition of 'industry' in the Trade Disputes Act 1929. The present definition continues to be as originally enacted in the IDA. Though this definition has not undergone any amendment, it has undergone variegated judicial interpretations.

This definition is based on s 4 of the Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Act 1904-25 of Australia, which reads thus:

> (i) Any business, trade, manufacture, undertaking or calling of employers on land or water;
>
> (ii) any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation of employees on land or water; and
>
> (iii) a branch of an industry and a group of industries.

Hence, in construing the definition and opinion-making, the courts have been influenced by the Australian decisions,[1] which have been sub rosa all the time. Difficulty, however, in using Australian cases with a text book approach is perhaps not noticed, as in a great body of those cases the problem presented in its many facets and the approach was pragmatic.[2] The Amending Act 46 of 1982, which also amended the definition of 'industry', has been substantially brought into force wef 21 August 1984. But the definition of 'industry' has not been brought into force so far. In Des Raj, speaking for the court, RN Mishra J, lamented:

> Though almost six years have elapsed since the amendment came on the statute book, it has not been enforced yet. Bare Acts and commentaries on the Industrial Disputes Act have, however, brought in the new definition by deleting the old one, with a note that the new provision has yet to come into force. This situation has further added to the confusion. In the language of Krishna Iyer J, a definition 'is ordinarily, the crystallization of a legal concept, promoting precision and rounding off blurred edges but, alas, the definition in s 2(j), viewed in retrospect, has achieved the opposite.[3]

Industry

The definition of 'industry' in this clause is both exhaustive and inclusive and is ambivalently comprehensive in scope. It is in two parts. The first part says that it means any business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employees' and then goes on to say that it includes any calling, service, employment handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen.[4] Thus, one part defines it from the standpoint of the employer; the other from the standpoint of the employees. The first part of the definition gives the statutory meaning of industry, whereas the second part deliberately refers to several other items of industry and brings them in the definition in an inclusive way.[5] The first part of the definition determines an industry by reference to the occupation of the employers in respect of certain activities. The activities are specified by five words, namely, 'business', 'trade', 'undertaking', 'manufacture' or 'calling'. These words determine the scope of the word 'industry' and they describe what the cognate expression 'industrial' is intended to convey. This is the significance or denotation of the term.[6]

'Business' is a word of wide import.[7] This expression is wider than the term 'trade' and is not synonymous with it, and it means practically 'anything which is not an occupation, as distinguished from pleasure'.[8] 'Trade' is not only in the etymological or dictionary sense, but in legal usage as well, a term of a wide scope; it may mean the occupation of a smaller shopkeeper just as well as that of a commercial magnate, while it may also mean a skilled craft.[9] The word 'trade' in its primary meaning is an 'exchange of goods for goods or goods for money' and in its secondary meaning, it is 'any business carried on with a view to profiting, whether manual or mercantile, as distinguished from the liberal arts or learned professions or from agriculture'.[10] The occupation of men in buying and selling, barter or commerce, is generally considered as 'trade'. Occasionally, some work, especially skilled work, is also considered a 'trade', eg, the trade of a goldsmith. But in another sense, a 'trade' would include only persons in a particular line of business, in which persons are employed as workmen. But the word as used in the statute must be distinguished from professions, although even professions have trade unions.[11] Though 'trade' is often used in contrast with 'profession', 'a professional worker would not ordinarily be called a tradesman, but the word 'trade' is used in the widest application to the appellation 'trade unions'.[12] But an activity, whether it is a 'trade' or a 'business', will be an 'industry', because both have been included in the definition of an industry.[13]

The word 'undertaking' is the most elastic of all the words used in the definition.[14] According to the Webster's dictionary, an 'undertaking' means 'anything undertaken or any business, work or project which one engages in or attempts as an enterprise'. The word 'undertaking' in the context of the definition, has been understood to mean 'any business or any work or project which one engages in or attempts as an enterprise, analogous to business or trade.[15] Krishna Iyer J held:

> To be analogous is to resemble in functions relevant to the subject, as between like features of two apparently different things. So, some kinship through resemblance to 'trade' or 'business' is the key to the problem...Partial similarity postulates selectivity of characteristics for comparability.[16]

'Manufacture' is a kind of a productive activity, in which the making of articles or materials, often on a large scale, is by physical labour or mechanical power.[17] The word 'calling' is again a very wide word and it means one's usual occupation, avocation, business or trade.[18] In certain cases, the word has been given very wide signification meaning 'the way in which a man passes his life'.[19] According to Krishna Iyer J:

> An industry is a continuity, an organised activity, a purposeful pursuit-not any isolated adventure, desultory excursion or casual, fleeting engagement, motivelessly undertaken. Such is the common feature of a 'trade', 'business', 'calling', 'manufacture'-mechanical or handicraft-based 'service', 'employment', industrial occupation or avocation'. The expression 'undertaking' cannot be torn off from the words whose company it keeps. If birds of a feather flock together and noscitur a sociis is a commonsense guide to the construction the definition of an industry, 'undertaking' must be read down to conform to the restrictive characteristics shared by the society of words before and after it. A wide meaning must fall in line and discordance must be excluded from a sound system'.[20]

In an Australian case, Isaacs J, speaking for the High Court of Appeal, picturesquely illustrated the terms used in the definition of 'industry' as:

> a 'business' (as a merchant), a 'trade' (as a cutler), a 'manufacture' (as a flour miller), an 'undertaking' (as a gas company), a 'calling', (as an engineer) or a 'service' (as a carrier) or an 'employment' (a general term like 'calling'—embracing some of the others, and intended to extend to vocations which might not be comprised in any of the rest), all of these expressions so far indicating the occupation in which the principal...is engaged, whether on land or water...if the occupation so described is one in which persons are employed for pay, hire, advantage, or reward, ie, as employees, then, with the exceptions stated, it is an 'industry' within the meaning of the Act.[21]

The second part views the matter from the angle of the employees and is designed to include something more than what the term primarily denotes. By this part of the definition, any 'calling', 'employment', 'handicraft', 'industrial occupation' or 'avocation' of workmen, is included in the concept of an 'industry'. This part gives an extended connotation to the word. The word 'calling' finds place in both the parts of the definition. In the first part, it refers to the employers and in the second part, to the workmen. The word 'service' in the second part is again of a very wide import. The word 'employment' brings in the contract of service between the employer and the employee.[22] The word 'handicraft' means any manual labour exercised by way of trade or for purposes of gain in or incidental to the making of any article or a part of an article.[23] The word 'avocation' is a word of wide signification, meaning the way in which a man passes his life or spends his time.[24] According to Fowler's Modern English usage, a person's avocations are the things he devotes his time to, his pursuits or engagements, in general, the affairs that he has to see. The word 'occupation' is a word of a still wider signification. In other words, what does not amount to a vocation, may amount to an occupation. The phrase 'occupation or avocation' is, however, qualified by the word 'industrial', which indicates that the 'occupation or avocation' in which the workmen are employed should be of an 'industrial character'. It is thus clear that the first part defines an industry in relation to the activities of the undertaking ie, the employer, while the second defines it in relation to the work done by the employees, thus giving an extended connotation though this part standing alone, cannot define what an is 'industry' is. Discussing the two parts of the definition of an 'industry' in Gymkhana Club, the Supreme Court attempted to keep the two notions concerning the employers and the employees apart and expressed the opinion that the denotation of the term

'industry' is to be found in the first part, relating to the employers and the connotation of the term is intended to include the second part relating to the workmen and concluded:

> If the activity can be described as an industry with reference to the occupation of the employer, the ambit of the industry, under the force of the second part, takes in the different kinds of activity of the employees mentioned in the second part. Bur the second part standing alone cannot define 'industry'...By the inclusive part of the definition, the labour force employed in an industry is made an integral part of the industry for purposes of industrial disputes, although an industry is ordinarily something which employers create or undertake. [25]

But later on, the court realised the necessity of qualifying these observations and in Safdarjung Hospital, in fact, it did qualify them in the following words:

> It is not necessary to view our definition in two parts. The definition read as a whole, denotes a collective enterprise in which employers and employees are associated. It does not exist either by employers alone or by employees alone. It exists only when there is a relationship between employers and employees, the former engaged in a business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employers and the latter engaged in any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation. There must, therefore, be an enterprise in which the employers follow their avocation as detailed in the definition and employ workmen who follow one of the avocations detailed for workmen. The definition no doubt, seeks to define an 'industry' with reference to employers' occupation but includes the employees, for without the two, there can be no industry. An industry is only to be found when there are employers and employees, the former relying upon the services of the latter to fulfill their own occupations.[26]

In other words, the first and the second part of the definition are not to be read in isolation, as if there were different industries, but they are aspects of the occupation of both the employers and the employees in an industry. They are two counterparts of the same industry. They are the obverse and reverse of the same coin. In either case, the activity, whether of the employer or of the employees of an undertaking, has, therefore, to be determined in relation to its being a business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of the employer. The words, 'calling', 'service', 'employment', 'industrial occupation' or 'avocation' of workmen, used in the second part of the definition, read with the word 'undertaking' in the first part, obviously mean much more than what is ordinarily understood by the words 'trade' or 'business'.[27] Howsoever wide the sweep of the word 'service' may be, it cannot be taken to a mean 'service howsoever rendered, in whatsoever capacity and for whatsoever reasons'.[28] Likewise, if all the words used in the second part 'are given their widest meaning, all services and all callings would come within the purview of the definition; even services rendered by a servant, purely in a personal or domestic matter, or even in a 'casual' way, would fall within the definition'.[29]Such a wide construction would over-reach the objects for which the Act was passed.[30] Hence, the second part, standing alone, cannot define an industry. In other words, an 'industry' is not to be found in every case of employment or service.[31] In the words of Hidayatullah CJI:

> The definition of industry, read as a whole, denotes a collective enterprise in which employers and employees are associated. It does not exist either by employers alone or by employees alone. It exists only when there is a relationship between employers and employees, the former engaged in a business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of the employers and the latter engaged in a any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation. There must, therefore, be an enterprise in which the employers follow their avocations as detailed in the definition and employ workmen, who follow one of the avocations detailed for workmen. The definition no doubt seeks to define 'industry' with reference to employers' occupation, but includes the employees, for without the two, there can be no industry. An industry, is only to be found when there are employers and employees, the former relying upon the services of the latter to fulfil their own occupation.[32]

The history of industrial disputes and its legislation recognise the basic concept that the activity should be organised and not one which pertains to private or personal employment.[33] In interpreting the wide words of the definition, therefore, the necessity of employing certain limitations as to exclude some callings, services or undertakings from their scope, was felt. For this purpose, the Supreme Court evolved certain tests. A graph of the cases decided by the Supreme Court, if plotted on the background of the expressions used in the two parts of the definition of an 'industry', would represent a rather zig-zag curve. Krishna Iyer J, said:

> The rather zig-zag course of the landmark cases and the tangled web of judicial thoughts', 'have perplexed one branch of the industrial law, resulting from the obfuscation of the basic concept of an 'industry' under the Industrial Disputes Act 1947.[34]

The question as to what is an 'industry', has continuously baffled and perplexed the courts. According to Bhagwati J:

> There have been various judicial ventures in this rather volatile area of the law. The Act gives a definition of an 'industry' in s 2(j) but this definition is not very vocal and it has defied analysis, so that judicial effort has been ultimately reduced merely to evolving tests by reference to characteristics regarded as essential for constituting an activity as an 'industry'. The decided cases show that these tests have not been uniform; they have been guided more by empirical rather than a strictly analytical approach. Sometimes, these tests have been liberally conceived, sometimes narrowly.[35]

Most of the decisions have centered on the expression 'undertaking' as used in the definition. The earliest case decided by the Supreme Court, on the construction of the definition, was Banerji v Mukherjee , which dealt with the question as to whether the activities of a municipal corporation would fall within the ambit of the definition. In this case, the court held that though municipal activity could not be truly regarded as a 'business or trade', it would fall within the scope of the expression 'undertaking'. Hence, the non-profit undertakings of the municipality were included in the concept of an industry, even if there was no private enterprise.[36] In the second case, viz, Baroda Borough Municipality,[37] the court held that branches of work that can be regarded as analogous to carrying on of a trade or business, would fall within the meaning of an industry, as given in s 2(j) of the Act. The ratio of these two decisions is that for an activity to be an industry, it is not necessary that it must be carried on by private enterprise or must be commercial and result in profit. It is sufficient that the activity is an 'undertaking' analogous to the carrying on of a trade or business and involves co-operation between the employers and the employees. This result was reached at by extending the meaning of the expression 'undertaking' to cover adventures not strictly trades or businesses, but 'objects very similar'.[38] But it is not easy to answer the questions viz: when can an undertaking be said to be analogous to a trade or business and what are the attributes or characteristics which it must possess in common with trade or business, in order to be regarded as analogous to trade or business? The prescient words are: 'branches of work that can be said to be analogous to the carrying out of a trade or business'. Accordingly, in this perspective, the comprehensive reach of 'analogous' activities must be measured. The similarity stressed relates to 'branches of work', and moreover, the analogy with trade or business is to be in the 'carrying out' of the economic adventure.[39] As a working principle, it has been suggested that, in order to be recognised as an undertaking analogous to trade or business, the activity must be an economic activity, in the sense that it must be productive of material goods or material services.[40] The third case pertaining to the activities of a municipal corporation was Corporation of Nagpur, in which the court held that a municipal corporation would be an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(14) of the CP & Berar Industrial Disputes and Settlement Act 1947.[41]

Unlike the definition of industry in the IDA, the word 'undertaking', in this definition, is qualified by the words 'manufacturing or mining'. Therefore, the court could not press the expression 'undertaking' into service. But the municipal activity was brought within the ambit of the words 'business' or 'trade' and a distinction was drawn between the legal and municipal functions of the municipal bodies. In coming to the conclusion that the latter were analogous to business or trade, because the court observed that they were not legal, the activity was organised and a service was rendered. In discerning the import of the words 'analogous to the carrying out of a trade or business', the court emphasised the analogy in the nature of the organised activities implicit in a trade or business, rather than on equating the other activities with trade or business.[42] Thus, on the one hand, the court said that the non-legal municipal activities would fall within the expression 'business' or 'trade', as used in s 2(14) of the CP & Berar Act, while on the other hand, it said that such activities were analogous to 'business' or 'trade'. This exposition blurs the picture. In the subsequent cases, it viewed the matter a little differently and formulated further tests. The first test evolved was that an activity, business or trade is ordinarily organised. This test taken with the earlier test, that an 'undertaking' must be analogous to a 'business', 'trade' or 'calling', does not appear to widen the meaning of the term 'undertaking', but tends to narrow it down. The second test was that the activity need not necessarily be preceded by a procurement of capital in the business sense, and profit need not be a motive. Accordingly, so long as a relationship of an employer and his workmen is established with a view to the production of material goods or material services, the activity must be regarded as an undertaking analogous to trade or business.[43]

In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha, the court noted that the first part of the definition contains the statutory meaning and the second part means 'an enlargement of it by including other items of industry'. As a matter of fact, the expressions used in the second part are not items of industry, but are aspects of the occupation of the employees, which are intended to be an integral part of an industry, for the purposes of industrial disputes. The test that an 'industry' is 'an economic activity' involving an investment of capital and is systematically carried on for profit, for the production or sale of goods, by the employment of labour, was also discarded because a profit motive and an investment of capital were considered unessential. In the case of undertakings run by the government, a further inquiry was suggested, viz: 'Can such activity be carried on by a private individual or a group of individuals'? In view of the affirmative answer to this query in the case of hospitals, it was held that a hospital is an 'industry', even if it is run by the government without a profit motive and with public funds. While determining the question as to whether a particular activity is an 'industry' or not, the questions as to who conducts the activity or whether it is for profit were considered irrelevant. However, it was emphasised that for an 'undertaking', to be an 'industry', it must be analogous to trade or business. But the court recognised that a line must be drawn to exclude some 'callings', 'services', and 'undertakings' from the gambit of the definition of industry. Hence, domestic, personal or casual services were excluded from the definition and examples were given of such services. In this case, though the court rejected the application of the principle of noscitur a sociis while interpreting the words of wide amplitude, used in the definition of an 'industry', in reality, it applied this principle to constitute the rationale for the exceptions carried out by it.[44]

Distinguishing the exceptions, the court laid down that an activity, systematically or habitually undertaken for the production or distribution of goods or for rendering material services to the community at large or a part of such community, with the help of employees, is an undertaking. In this way, the connection between a trade and business on the one hand and an undertaking on the other, was established, which seems to indicate that the expression 'undertaking' must take its colour from the other expressions. An industry was thus said to involve co-operation between the employer and the employees, for the object of satisfying material human needs, though not for oneself or for pleasure, nor necessarily for profit. As a matter of fact, there has been a continuous consensus on the point that a lack of business and profit motive or of a capital investment, would not take an activity out of the sweep of 'industry', if other conditions are satisfied.[45] It is the activity in question which attracts the definition and the absence of the investment of any capital or the fact that the activity is or is not conducted for a profit motive, would not make any material difference. Conversely, the mere existence of a profit motive will not necessarily convert the activity into an 'industry', if the other tests are not satisfied.[46] Likewise, the doctrine of quid pro quo can have no application for determining the question as to whether an activity is an industry or not. In other words, a consideration for money while providing the services is not an essential characteristic of an 'industry' in a modern state.[47]

In the next case, Ahmedabad Textile Research Assn, the court held that the activity of the association was an 'industry' because it was an providing material services to a part of the community, was carried on with the help of employees, was organised in a manner similar to that in a trade or business and there was co-operation between the employers and the employees. For the first time, a fresh test was added: that the partnership should only be an association between the employers and the employees, and the employees should have no rights in the results of their labour or in the nature of the business or trade.[48] In the next case, ie, National Union of Commercial Employees, where the case satisfied the tests so far enumerated, a new test was added: that the association of capital and labour must be direct and essential. The services of a solicitor were regarded as those of an individual, depending upon his personal qualifications and ability, to which the employees did not contribute. The contribution of the employees in the case of a solicitor's firm, it was held, had no direct or essential nexus with the advice or services rendered by the solicitor. In this way, the liberal professions were excluded from the gambit of the definition. The reasons given by the court for excluding the liberal professions from the ambit of the wide words used in the definition of an industry were: the doctrine of direct co-operation and the special features of liberal professions.[49] At this point, the court started realising the difficulty of laying down tests from case to case. In the next case, ie, Harinagar Cane Farm, where a cane farm was purchased by a sugar factory and worked as a department for the agricultural operations of that firm, it was held to be an industry on the facts of the case. However, it was held that agriculture, under all circumstances, could not be called an industry.[50] Thus, it would appear that the court reversed its method of looking for tests from other cases and referred to them only after it had reached its conclusion on the facts of the case, observing that the court must refrain from laying down unduly broad or categorical propositions.

In University of Delhi, the question that came before the court was: whether the bus drivers employed by the Delhi University were workmen, and this question, in its turn, depended upon the jurisdictional question viz: whether the educational activity of the Delhi University would be an industry or not. Narrowing down the concept of 'service', the court held that educational institutions would not fall within the meaning of 'industry', because their aim was education and the teachers' profession was not to be equated to that of industrial Workers.[51] The court, however, reiterated that this must not be understood to be a general proposition laid down by it. Thus, though the words used in the definition of an industry, should have been given some definite meaning, they were made subservient to the tests laid down in the earlier dicta, which disclose a procrustean approach to the problem. Since the social norms are not static, the legal norms are not static either. Hence, in the exigencies in which the earlier tests were found unsatisfactory in covering the new situations, the court created new tests. For instance, the emphasis resulting from the extension of the definition in its latter part, to include the services of employees, received little recognition in the later cases. Too much insistence upon a partnership between employers and employees is evident in the case of National Union of Commercial Employees (supra), and too little in that of Ahmedabad Textile Research Association (supra).

As innovations of new tests in new fact-situations started blurring the picture, a fresh look at the matter became necessary. Hence, in Gymkhana Cub, the court reviewed all the earlier cases and made its own comments on them. The main question in the case was: whether the activities of the Club which was a members' club, fell within the definition of an 'industry'?

The claim was based on the contentions that the club was organised as an industry, as it was organised on a vast scale, with multifarious activities; that facilities of accommodation, catering, sale of alcoholic and non-alcoholic beverages, games, etc. were provided; that the club was running parties at which guests were frequently entertained; and that the club had established reciprocal arrangements with other clubs, for its members. Dealing with the above question, the court proceeded to notice the definitions of an 'employer' as given in s 2(g) and 'industrial disputes', in s 2(k) and also analysed and ascribed meanings to the constituent terms used in the definition of an 'industry' in s 2(k). Speaking for the court, Hidayatullah J summed up the principles, settled by the earlier dicta, in the following words:

> The principles so far settled, come to this: Every human activity in which enters the relationship of employers and employees, is not necessarily creative of an industry. Personal services rendered by domestic and other servants, administrative services of public officials, services in aid of occupations of professional men, such as doctors and lawyers, etc, employment of teachers and so on, may result in relationships in which there are employers on the one side and the employees on the other, but they must be excluded because they do not come within the denotation of the term 'industry. ... Where the activity is to be considered as an industry, it must not be casual, but must be distinctly systematic. The work for which labour of workmen is required, must be productive and the workmen must be following an employment, calling or industry avocation. The salient fact in the context is that the workmen are not their own masters, but render service at the behest of the masters. This follows from the second part of the definition of industry. Then again, when private individuals are the employers, the industry is run with capital and with a view to profits. These two circumstances may not exist when government or a local authority enters upon business, trade, manufacture or an undertaking, analogous to trade. … Industry is the nexus between employers and employees and it is the nexus which brings two distinct bodies together to produce a result. We do not think that the test that the workmen must not share in the product of their labours, adopted in one case, can be regarded as universal. There may be occasions when the workmen may receive a share of the produce, either as part of their wages or as bonus or as a benefit.[52]

Thus, having laid down the principles for determining as to what an industry is, the court proceeded to discuss the question of whether the club viz, the Madras Gymkhana Club, which was a member's club, was an 'industry'. It was held that though the activity of the club may be falling under the second part of the definition in as much as the work of the club is conducted with the aid of the employees, who follow a 'calling' or an 'avocation', it cannot be described as a 'trade', 'business', 'manufacture' or 'calling' of the members of the managing committees of the club. It was also held that the activity of the club was not an 'undertaking' which was analogous to trade or business, which element does not exist in a members' club. The members' club, therefore, was held not to be an industry. The tests laid down in this case were followed by the court in Cricket Club of India, without any further gloss. In this case, the club was incorporated as a company, but in view of the fact that it was not like an ordinary company, constituted for the purpose of carrying on some business, the court said that the club in fact, was a members' club and all services provided in the club for the members had to be treated as the activities of a self-serving institution.[53] A Bench of six judges of the Supreme Court, in Safdarjung Hospital, observed that in such cases, particularly in Gymkhana Club, it is the kind of establishment which the organisation has, with which the court is concerned. However, as all the earlier cases had been considered in Gymkhana Club, the court did not find it necessary to refer to those cases and observed that:

> ... there must be first established a relationship of employers and employees associating together, the former following a trade, business, manufacture, undertaking or calling of employers, in the production of material goods and material services and the latter following any calling, service, employment, handicraft, or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen, in aid of the employers' enterprise. [54]

In Bombay Pinjrapol, the facts disclosed that: (a) the value of the milk supplied to the sick and infirm cattle was infinitesimal compared to that sold in the market; (b) the expenses incurred in connection with the treatment of the sick and infirm animals were also negligible compared to the total expenses of the institution; and (c) the number of men employed for such treatment was very small, at all times. The mere fact, therefore, that the Pinjrapol had never purchased milch cows or stud bulls, except for one, made no difference to the determination of the question as to whether their activity of maintaining the cows and bulls could be considered only as an investment. On these facts, it was held that the activities carried on by the Pinjrapol constituted an 'industry'.[55] The objects of the trust from which the Pinjrapol was created were not considered relevant while determining the question whether the activities of the Pinjrapol constituted an industry or not. In Indian Chambers of Commerce & Industry, in view of the principles crystallised in the earlier cases, the court observed that there was no warrant to allow any other element to be added to the criteria already laid down for determining what an 'industry' is, and accentuated on the test of systematic activity and co-operation between the employers and the employees, resulting in production and material services.[56] The apparent divergence in judicial dicta became pronounced in the majority judgment in Indian Standards Institution, in which the court was confronted with the question as to whether the activities of the Indian Standards Institution, which was registered as a society under the Societies Registration Act and was established for fixing the Indian Standards, would fall within the ambit of the definition of an 'industry'.[57] In view of the law stated by the court in Madras Gymkhana, the tribunal held that the institution was not an 'industry' and hence, the reference was not competent. In appeal, Alagiriswami J, in his dissenting opinion, contented himself by adhering to the rationale of Madras Gymkhana and Safdarjung. But Bhagwati J, who delivered the majority opinion, preferred to have a second look on Hospital Mazdoor Sabha, Madras Gymkhana and Safdarjung and summarised the law in the following words:

> To summarise, an activity can be regarded as an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j), only if there is a relationship of an employer and employees and the former is engaged in a 'business', 'trade', 'undertaking', 'manufacture' or 'calling of employers' and the latter, 'in any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation'. Though 'undertaking' is a word of large import and it means anything undertaken or any project or enterprise, in the context in which it occurs, it must be read as meaning an undertaking analogous to trade or business. In order that an activity may be regarded as an undertaking analogous to trade or business, it must be organised or arranged in a manner in which trade or business is generally organised or arranged. It must not be casual, nor must it be for oneself or for pleasure. And it must rest on co-operation between the employer and employees, who associate together with a view to produce, sell or distribute material goods or material services. It is entirely irrelevant whether or not there is a profit motive or an investment of capital in such activity. Even without these two features, an activity can be an undertaking analogous to trade or business. It is also immaterial whether 'its objects are charitable or that it does not make profits or even where profits are made, they are not distributed amongst the members, or that its activity is subsidised by the government.' Again, it is not necessary that 'the employer must always be a private individual ...The Act, in terms, contemplates cases of industrial disputes where the government or a local authority or a public utility service may be the employer. … It also makes no difference that the material services rendered by the undertaking are in public interest or not. The concept of public interest in a modern welfare state, where new social values are fast emerging and the old are dying out, is indeed to be so wide and so broad and comprehensive in its spectrum and range, that many activities which admittedly fall within the category of 'industry', are clearly designed to subserve public interest. In fact, whenever any industry is carried on by the government, it would be in public interest, for the government can act only in public interest. Whether an activity is carried on in public interest or not can, therefore, never be a criterion for determining its character as an industry.[58]

This deviation from the dicta of Madras Gymkhana and Safdarjung Hospital provided the background for referring the question of the interpretation of the definition of 'industry' to a seven-judge Bench in Bangalore Water Supply.[59] In this case, in an application under s 33C(2), the management of the Board, took a preliminary objection that the board being a statutory body, discharging the regal functions of the state, was not an 'industry' in view of the ratio of the Madras Gymkhana and Safdarjung Hospital cases. The labour court rejected the objection and the aggrieved management appealed to the Supreme Court, by special leave. The three-judge Bench which initially commenced the hearing, felt it necessary to place the matter before the chief justice, for consideration by a larger Bench. Accordingly, the appeal was heard by a seven-judge Bench. The leading judgment was delivered by Krishna Iyer J for himself, Bhagwati and Desai JJ on 21 February 1978, while Beg CJI, in a separate concurring judgment, endorsed the majority decision in giving the widest possible amplitude to the words used in the definition and rejecting the rules of noscitur a sociis as well as ejusdem generis in interpreting the definition of 'industry'. But on that day, Chandrachud J (as he then was), pronounced an order on behalf of himself, Jaswant Singh and Tulzapurkar JJ, agreeing that the appeal should be dismissed. However, he further observed that the area of concurrence or divergence with the rest of the judgment will, if necessary, be indicated later. On 7 April 1978, Jaswant Singh J, delivered the opinion for himself and Tulzapurkar J, agreeing that the appeal should be dismissed, but indicating the area of their divergence. The learned judges expressed their sense of dismay on the earlier dicta, observing thus:

> we have struggled to find out its true scope and ambit in the light of the plethora of decisions of this court, which have been laying down fresh tests from time to time, making our task an uphill one.

They applied the principle of noscitur a sociis to the definition and observed:

> Expressed differently, it means that the meaning of a doubtful word may be ascertained by reference to the meaning of words associated with it, we are of the view that, despite the width of the definition, it could not be the intention of the legislature that categories 2 and 3 of the charities alluded to by our learned brother Krishna Iyer in his judgment, hospitals run on charitable basis or as a part of the functions of the government or local bodies, like municipalities and educational and research institutions, whether run by private entities or by government, and liberal and learned professions like that of doctors, lawyers and teachers, the pursuit of which is dependent upon an individual's own education, intellectual attainments and special expertise, should fall within the pale of the definition. We are inclined to think that the definition is limited to those activities systematically or habitually undertaken on commercial lines, by private entrepreneurs, with the co-operation of employees, for the production or distribution of > goods or for the rendering of material services to the community at large or a part of such community. It is needless to emphasise that in the case of liberal professions, the contribution of the usual type of employees employed by the professionals, to the value of the end product (viz, the advice and services rendered to the client) is so marginal that the end product cannot be regarded as the fruit of the co-operation between the professional and his employees.[60]

But on that day, Chandrachud CJI (as he had by then become) also delivered his opinion, expressing his disagreement with the area of divergence delineated in the judgment of Jaswant Singh J. The chief justice not only endorsed the opinion of Krishna Iyer J, but seems to have gone a step further by discarding the principle of noscitur a sociis in interpreting the words used in the definition of 'industry'. He expressed dissent with certain activities being treated as falling outside the definition in the Hospital Mazdoor Sabha case. He went to the extent of saying that even the state's regal activity will not fall outside the definition of an 'industry', But in view of the problem of the application of the definition being too policy-oriented to be satisfactorily settled by judicial decisions, the Chief Justice recommended that the Parliament must step in and legislate in a manner which will leave no doubt as to its intention, as 'that alone can afford a satisfactory solution to the question which has agitated and perplexed the judiciary at all levels'.[61] In his leading judgment, Krishna Iyer J, had in theory accepted the application of the principle of noscitur a sociis, while interpreting the words used in the definition of an 'industry' in observing:

> If birds of a feather flock together and noscitur a sociis is a common sense guide to construction, 'undertaking' must be read down to conform to the restrictive characteristic shared by the society of words before and after. Nobody will torture 'undertaking' in Section 2(j) to mean meditation or musheira, which are spiritual and aesthetic undertakings. Wide meanings must fall in line and discordance must be excluded from a sound system.[62]

But in application, he excepted very few categories from the ambit of the definition and discarded the tests laid down in the earlier dicta. It is not possible to understand as to how the principle of noscitur a sociis can be partially applied. If the principle is not applied, then there is no logical justification for the categories excepted by Krishna Iyer J in his judgment. Unless the principle is applied, even the services of domestic servants cannot be excluded from the definition of 'industry'. He appears to be conscious of the incongruity in the earlier dicta and the consequences of giving full meaning to the words used in the definition. That is why he indicated his frustration with the present definition and recommended legislative reform. He observed:

> So, the parity is in the modus operandi in the working-not in the purpose of the project, nor in the disposal of the proceeds, but in the organization of the venture, including the relations between the two limbs, viz, labour and management. If the mutual relations, the method of employment and the process of cooperation in carrying out of the work bear close resemblance to the organization, method, remuneration, relationship of employer and employee and the like, then it is an industry, otherwise not.[63]

In the leading judgment, Krishna Iyer J has, with a crusader's zeal and vehemence, reviewed the earlier dicta on the interpretation of the wide words encompassed in the definition, 'hopefully to abolish blurred edges, illumine penumbral areas' and overrule what the court regards as wrong. Then, he proceeded to formulate positively and negatively, decisive principles for identifying an 'industry' under the Act, which would be authoritative until overruled by a larger Bench or superseded by the legislative branch, which may best be set out in his own words:

I. 'Industry', as defined in section 2(j) and explained in Banerji case,[64] has a wide import.

   (a) Where there is a (i) systematic activity, (ii) organised by co-operation between employer and employee (the direct and substantial element is chimerical) (iii) for the production and/or distribution of goods and services calculated to satisfy human wants and wishes (not spiritual or religious but inclusive of material things or services geared to celestial bliss, ie, making, on a large scale, prasad or food) prima facie, there is an 'industry' in that enterprise.

   (b) Absence of profit motive or gainful objective is irrelevant, be the venture in public, joint, private or other sector.

   (c) The true focus is functional and the decisive test is the nature of the activity, with special emphasis on the employer-employee relations.

   (d) If the organisation is a trade or business, it does not cease to be one because philanthropy animating the undertaking.

II. Although section 2(j) uses words of the widest amplitude in its two limbs, the re-meaning cannot be magnified to overreach itself

(a) 'Undertaking' must suffer a contextual and associational shrinkage, as explained in Banerji and in this judgment; so also the words, service, calling and the like. This yields the inference that all organised activity, possessing the triple elements in I (supra), although not a trade or business, may still be an 'industry' provided the nature of the activity, viz, the employer-employee basis, bears resemblance to what we find in a trade or business. This takes into the fold, 'industry' undertakings, callings and services, adventures 'analogous to the carrying on of trade or business'. All features, other than the methodology of carrying on the activity, viz, in organising the co-operation between employer and employee, may be dissimilar. It does not matter if on the employment terms, there is analogy.

III. Application of these guidelines should not stop short of their logical reach by the invocation of creeds, cults or inner sense of incongruity or outer sense of motivation, for or resultant of the economic operations. The ideology of the Act being industrial peace, regulation and resolution of industrial disputes between employer and workmen, the range of this statutory ideology must inform the reach of the statutory definition. Nothing less, nothing more.

(a) The consequences are: (i) professions, (ii) clubs, (iii) education institutions, (iv) co-operatives, (v) research institutes, (vi) charitable projects and (vii) other kindred adventures, if they fulfil the triple tests listed in I (supra), cannot be exempted from the scope of section 2(j).

(b) A restricted category of professions, clubs, co-operatives and even gurukuls and little research labs, may qualify for exemption if they are simple ventures; substantially, and going by the dominant nature criterion, substantively, no employees are entertained but in minimal matters; and marginal employees are hired without destroying the non-employee character of the unit. If, in a pious or altruistic mission, many employ themselves, free or for small honoraria or like return, mainly drawn by sharing in the purpose or cause, such as lawyers volunteering to run a free legal services clinic or doctors serving in their spare hours, in a free medical center or ashramites working at the bidding of the holiness, divinity or like central personality, and the services are supplied free or at nominal cost and those who serve are not engaged for remuneration or on the basis of master and servant relationship, then, the institution is not an industry even if stray servants, manual or technical, are hired. Such eleemosynary or like undertakings alone are exempt-not any other generosity, compassion, developmental passion or project.

IV. The dominant nature test:

(a) Where a complex of activities, some of which qualify for exemption, others do not, involves employees in the total undertaking, some of whom are not 'workmen', as in the University of Delhi case[65] or some departments are not productive of goods and services if isolated, even then, the predominant nature of the services and the integrated nature of the departments, as explained in the Corpn of Nagpur,[66] will be the true test. The whole undertaking will be an 'industry', although those who are not 'workmen' by definition, may not benefit by the status.

(b) Notwithstanding the previous clauses, sovereign functions, strictly understood, (alone) qualify for exemption, not the welfare activities or economic adventures undertaken by government or statutory bodies.

(c) Even in departments discharging sovereign functions, if there are units which are industries and they are substantially severable, then they can be considered to come within section 2(j).

(d) Constitutional and competently enacted legislative provisions may remove from the scope of the Act categories which otherwise may be covered thereby.

V. We overrule the Safdarjung Hospital case,[67] the Solicitors' case,[68] the Gymkhana case,[69] the Delhi University case,[70] the Dhanrajgiryi Hospital case,[71] and other rulings whose ratio runs counter to the principles enunciated above, and the Hospital Mazdoor Sabha case,[72] is hereby rehabilitated.

In the light of the fact that several of the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court, which held that: (i) Hospitals run by Government - as in the case of Safdarjung Hospital, [73] (ii) Solicitors firms - as National Union of Commercial Employees,[74] (iii) Clubs - as in the case of Madras Gymkhana Club,[75]Cricket Club of India,[76] etc., (iv) Educational Institutions - as that of University of Delhi,[77] are not industries, were overruled comprehensively in Bangalore Water Supply, by a seven-Judge Bench, which was the largest Bench ever sat to decide the question, the said cases are not being discussed here, as the law laid down therein is no longer good law post-Bangalore Water Supply. Any reference made to them in the following paragraphs is for the limited purpose of analysis and, in passing, according as the context warranted.

It is obvious that even after the Bangalore Water Supply decision, the judges themselves have not been satisfied with the interpretation of the definition. The need for legislative reform, has been accentuated by all the judges. In Chief Conservator of Forests,[78] a suggestion was made to the court to reconsider the holding in the Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board case before a three judge Bench, which was discountenanced without much ado.

Material Services

In FICCI, holding that the several activities of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry were in the nature of material services to the business community, which were rendered with the co-operation of its workmen and as such, these activities fell within the ambit of the definition of 'industry'.[79] In Bangalore Water Supply (supra), the court held that since the professions cannot be excluded from industry, the services rendered for the professional persons must be 'material services'. However, so far, there is a consensus of dicta on the point that the services rendered by domestic and other servants are not 'material services'. The activities of the National Remote Sensing Agency, a research institution, mainly rendering consultancy services or survey facilities, viz, the carrying out of surveys by using remote sensing technology, for locating various natural resources, for agriculture, hydrology, meteorology, fisheries, minerals, oil, soils, environmental monitoring, forestry, ocean resources, topography, land sources and crop diseases, and other services, like surveillance and distribution of material to institutions and persons, have been held to be 'material services'.[80] In Umashankar Jaswal, a single judge of Bombay High Court held that a small up-marketing business activity, carried on by a petty businessman, could not be termed as a systematic activity, organised by the cooperation between the employer and the employee, for the distribution of goods, and hence, it would not fall within the definition of an 'industry'.[81]

Various Activities

Regal and Sovereign Functions of the State

After the decision of the Supreme Court in Bangalore WSSB (supra), the question to be asked is not what is an industry, but what is not an industry. Despite their efforts to find a working formula for determining as to what activity is an industry and what is not, practically all judges have cried in frustration for legislative guidance. The Act in terms, contemplates cases of 'industrial disputes' where the government or a local authority or a public utility service may be the employers. The expansion of the governmental or municipal activity, in fields of productive industry, is a feature of the developing welfare states. This is considered necessary because it leads to welfare, without exploitation of workmen and makes the production of goods and material services cheaper by eliminating profit. Government and local authorities Act as individuals do and the policy of the Act is to put the government and local bodies at par with private individuals. But the operations of the government which are of administrative or governmental character, cannot be regarded as an industry. Likewise, the local authorities also cannot be regarded as an industry, unless they produce goods or render material services and do not share by delegation, in governmental functions or functions incidental thereto.[82]

The regal power of the State has acquired a definite connotation. Lord Watson, in Richard Coomber, described such functions as the 'administration of justice, maintenance of order and repression of crime, as among the primary and inalienable functions of a constitutional government.[83] Isaacs J of the HCA of Australia, in his dissenting judgment in the School Teachers' Assn, concisely stated that regal functions are inescapable and inalienable. Such are the legislative powers, the administration of the laws, the exercise of the judicial power. This statement of law clearly marks out the ambit of regal functions, as distinguished from the other powers of the state.[84] Relying on this statement, in Corpn of Nagpur (supra), the Supreme Court observed that it could not have been in the contemplation of the legislature, to bring in the regal functions of the state within the definition of 'industry' and thus confer jurisdiction on the industrial tribunal to decide disputes in respect thereof the activities of the government, which can be properly described as regal or sovereign activities, are therefore, outside the scope of industry. In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (supra) the court adumbrated a new test which required the court to determine whether such activity could be carried on by a private individual or a group of individuals. If a business or activity could not be carried on by a private individual or a group of individuals, it would not be an industry, while if it could be, it might fall within the scope of an 'industry'. Since a hospital run by the government, can also be run by a private party, it is an 'industry', even if there is no profit motive in the case of a government run hospital. This test of regal and non-regal functions of the state was reiterated by Subba Rao J in Corpn of City of Nagpur. But this test was rejected by Hidayatullah J in Gymkhana Club, with the observation:

> ...but it is not enlightening, because there is hardly any activity which private enterprise cannot carry on ...Even the infrastructure of Adam Smith can be provided by private enterprise. The East India Company did both.[85]

A priori, in Safdarjung (supra), the learned judge held that the Safdarjung Hospital was not an 'industry' because it was run by the government. The obvious consequence of this holding was that any activity carried on by the government, whether regal or non-regal, would be de hors the definition of 'industry', but a majority of the three judge Bench, in Indian Standards Institution (supra), relied more on Hospital Mazdoor Sabha than on Safdarjung, while holding that the Indian Standards Institution which was 'run by the Government of India, is an industry'. In Bangalore Water Supply (supra), the court was not directly concerned with the categories of employees who came under departments charged with the responsibility for 'essential constitutional functions of the government', while formulating the principles for determining whether it was an industry. In this connection the court observed:

> ...sovereign functions, strictly understood, (alone) qualify for exemption, not the welfare activities or economic adventures undertaken by government or statutory bodies'. Even in departments discharging sovereign functions, if there are units, which are 'industry' and they are substantially severable, then they can be considered to come within s 2(j). (at p. 488)

As to which function could be, and should be, taken as a regal or sovereign function, in Chief Conservator (supra), the Supreme Court observed that the dichotomy of the labels such as 'sovereign' and 'non sovereign' or 'regal' or 'non-regal', 'state functions' or 'governmental functions', really does not exist. Therefore, extending the concept of 'sovereign functions', so to include all welfare activities, will erode the ratio of Bangalore Water Supply. Hence, except the strictly understood sovereign functions, other activities of the state, such as welfare activities, would fall within the purview of the definition of 'industry'; 'and not only this, even within the wider circle of sovereign functions, there may be an inner circle encompassing some units which could be considered as 'industry', if substantially severable'. Thus, these decisions have not only brought the non-regal functions of the state back into the fold of 'industry', but have also applied the doctrine of severability to the departments of the state discharging regal functions. In All India Radio, the Supreme Court held that the functions carried on by the All India Radio and Doordarshan could not be said to be confined to sovereign functions, as they carry on commercial activity for profit, by getting commercial advertisements telecast or broadcast through various kendras and stations for a fee.[86] Consequently, All India Radio and Doordarshan would fall under the definition of 'industry'. A Full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court, in Kuldip Singh, categorized the functions of the state into four categories viz:

(i) the sovereign or the regal functions of the state, which are the primary and inalienable rights of a constitutional government;

(ii) economic adventures clearly partaking the nature of trade and business, undertaken by it as part of its welfare activities;

(iii) organised activity not stamped with the total indicia of business, yet bearing a resemblance to or being analogous to trade and business; and

(iv) the residuary organised governmental activity which may not come within the ambit of the aforesaid three categories.[87]

Of these categories, the Full Bench held that the first and the last categories will not fall within the four corners of the definition of 'industry', while the second and the third would. In this case, the court was concerned with the question as to whether the activity of the state, with reference to construction, establishment and maintenance of the national and state highways can be brought within the definition of 'industry'. The court held that the activity is essentially a governmental function and is in no way even remotely analogous to trade or business. Hence, it cannot possibly come within the ambit of an 'industry'. In Sub-Divisional Inspector of Post, a two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that the functions of the postal department are a part of the sovereign functions of the state and the postal department is, therefore, not an 'industry' within the definition of s 2(j) of the Act.[88] However, in Bombay Telephone Canteen Employees Assn, dealing with the question as to whether the telecommunication department of the Government of India is an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j), another two judge Bench presided over by the same learned judge, deviated from 'the dominant nature test' with the observation that 'the consequence is catastrophic and would give a carte blanche power with laissez faire legitimacy, which was buried fathoms deep under the lethal blow of Art. 14 of the Constitution, which assures to every person, a just, fair and reasonable procedure before terminating the services of an employee'.[89] Both the above decisions rendered in Sub-Divisional Inspector, and Bombay Telephone Canteen Employees, were overruled by a three-judge Bench in Srinivasan Rao, in which the court observed that, since the amended definition of an 'industry', was not brought into force, the law stated by it in the Bangalore Water Supply, still held the field. Applying the 'dominant nature test', the court observed that, as a matter of judicial discipline, it was not permissible for it to take a view contrary to that of Bangalore Water Supply. It is significant to note that consequent to the decision in Bangalore Water Supply, the Parliament did amend the definition of 'industry' in 1982. The amended definition however, was sacrificed at the altar of political expediency.[90] In HR Thakur, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the telecom factory established by the Government of India, would fall within the definition of 'industry'.[91]

On the question as to whether the irrigation department of a state government is an industry, a two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court, in Des Raj (supra), by applying 'the dominant nature test', held that on the facts found in the case, the irrigation department clearly came within the ambit of industry. Contrary to this, in K Somasetty, another two-judge Bench of the court held that the irrigation department, being a regal function, is not an industry.[92] The law laid down by the court in Des Raj is correct and it is also sustainable on the rationale of the decision in Srinivasa Rao.

Thus in so far as the legal status of 'irrigation' department is concerned, we are saddled with two diametrically opposite decisions given by two coordinate Benches of Supreme Court in Des Raj and Somasetty (supra). A single judge of Bombay High Court held that that the project of the irrigation department of Maharashtra is an industry.[93] The following two cases decided by Gujarat High Court richly demonstrate the confusion and inconsistency infused by the Supreme Court on the legal status of 'irrigation' department. On the question whether 'irrigation' department of Gujarat State is an 'industry', two Benches of Gujarat High Court - one single judge and the other Division Bench - expressed two diametrically opposite views. In Maniben Viraji, a single judge held that 'irrigation' department of the State was an industry,[94] while Shethna J (for self and Dave, J.), held in Deenanji Bidhaji Thakore, that 'irrigation' department was not an industry.[95]Strangely, both these decisions were delivered by the same High Court on the same day, ie, 9th April 2003. In the latter case, counsel for respondent-workman drew the attention of the Bench to the apparent conflict between the two decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in Des Raj and Somasetty (supra). The Division Bench held that irrigation department was not an industry. A single judge of Rajasthan High Court held that the 'Women and Child Development' department - Neem ka Thana - of the State Government is an industry.[1] This is a gross misconception on the part of the learned single judge. Is it possible to hold that the development of women and children is an economic adventure? Is it possible that a learned judge at the level of the High Court is so ignorant of the fact that the Constitution declares India as a 'Welfare State'? By what legal principles could it be said that social welfare, women and child welfare, fall outside the sovereign functions of the State? A single judge of AP High Court held that the 'census' department of the Government is not an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j), and that a temporary employee engaged on census work on a consolidated salary could not seek relief under s 25F of the Act.[2] In Bangalore Turf Club, a Bench of the Supreme Court comprising Katju and Dattu JJ, while holding that the earlier decision of the Court in Hyderabad Race Club,[3] need review by a larger Bench, observed:

> The definition of 'industry' in the Industrial Disputes Act is very wide as interpreted in the aforesaid decision. We cannot apply the judgment given under a different Act to a case which is covered by the ESI Act. Under various labour laws different definitions have been given to the words 'industry' or 'factory' etc. and we cannot apply the definition in one Act to that in another Act (unless the statute specifically says so). It is only where the language used in the definition is in pari materia that this may be possible. ... Hence, we are of the opinion that the decision of this Court in the case of Hyderabad Race Club (supra) should be reconsidered by a larger Bench. In the meantime, the respondents shall not raise any demand against the appellant-clubs.[4]

The Agricultural Produce Market Committee, set up under the Karnataka Agricultural Produce Marketing (Regulation) Act, 1966, is not performing any sovereign functions and hence, is an 'industry' under s 2(j). The mere fact that the employees of the committee are government servants is not crucial, as the true test is the dominant object for which the functionaries are working.[5] While implementing the national malarial eradication programme, the directorate of health services of the state government cannot be said to be performing sovereign functions, and it satisfies the tests laid down in Bangalore Water Supply, and hence, it is an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j).[6] The activity carried on by the Tungabhadra board, Tungabhadra dam, is not a sovereign function. It is a commercial venture like any other corporation or industry, and falls within the meaning of s 2(j).[7] The Uttar Pradesh Jal Nigam is an 'industry'.[8] Public works department of state government is an 'industry'.[9] Projects undertaken by the irrigation department of the State of Maharashtra fall within the definition of 'industry', for the purpose of s 2(j).[10] In MP Kolharkar, the Supreme Court held that the Central Public Works Department is an industry within the meaning of s 2(j).[11]

The functions of the public service commission, being unalienable regal functions of the state, which by their nature, cannot be assigned to private bodies,[12] will not fall within the ambit of the definition of industry. Likewise, the functions of the judicial department of the government, being obviously in the nature of sovereign functions of the state, would not be an 'industry'.[13] Similarly, relief work undertakings, carried on by the state government, to provide sustenance to persons affected by natural calamities, being regal functions of the state, will not fall within the ambit of an 'industry', mainly because: (i) it is the primary and inalienable function of the state, to provide livelihood to the persons who are affected by natural calamities, such as famine, earthquake, epidemic, flood, scarcity, etc; and, (ii) admittedly, the relief work is not a 'business' or 'trade' and with regard to the undertaking, the activity is not analogous to trade or business, or that it is not a systematic activity, but is carried out casually, at different places, depending on the calamities in a particular area.[14] The activities of the department of industries, mines and power in the government secretariat, again being a regal function of the state, would not be an industry.[15]The activities of the Bombay, Iron and Steel Board, constituted under s 6(1) of the Maharashtra Mathadi, Hamal & Others, Manual Workers (Regulation of employment and Welfare) Act 1969, has also been held to be, regal function of the state.[16]

On the other hand, the activities of the Tamil Nadu Housing Board,[17] and those of the public health department of the government,[18] have been held to be non-regal business functions of the state, and therefore, they are industries. The activities of the social welfare department of a government,[19] or those tourist department of a state,[20] are also non-regal and therefore, are 'industries'. However, the nature of the actual function and of the pattern of organised activity is decisive. Therefore, it is for the employer to show by relevant evidence, that the activities in question are not analogous to trade or business, such as to take such activities out of the purview of industry. Likewise, in Chief Conservator of Forests, it was held that the activities of the forest department of the state, were not of a sovereign nature and therefore, would fall within the definition of an industry.[21] In Rajendrasinhji Institute, a single judge of Bombay High Court held that the activities of the Institute involve the co-operation between the managing committee and the employees appointed by it and its activities are calculated to supply pleasurable utilities to members and others. It could not therefore be said to be performing sovereign functions, and hence is an industry.[22]

In striking contrast, in PN Parmar, a Bench of the Supreme Court, comprising Pattanaik and Agrawal JJ, held that the forest department of a state government would not fall within the ambit of an 'industry' under s 2(j) and hence, the non-compliance with the provisions of s 25F of the IDA would not vitiate the termination of the services of the employees.[23] This decision is in direct conflict with the ratio of Chief Conservator of Forests case, wherein the Supreme Court had held that the work undertaken by the forest department was not a part and parcel of the sovereign functions of the state and as such, a termination of service, without complying with the provisions of s 25F was illegal. It, therefore, calls for some analysis. The facts of the case in PN Parmar were identical to those of C*hief Conservator of Forests.* In both the cases, the fundamental issue was, whether the work undertaken by the forest department of a state government could be regarded as a part of the sovereign functions of the state, on which the question of the applicability or otherwise, of the provisions of s 25F rested. In the Chief Conservation of Forests case, the issue was answered in the negative. Once it is ruled that the functions of the forest department cannot be regarded as a part of the sovereign functions, the conclusion that the activity falls within the ambit of the definition of an 'industry' in s 2(j), is inescapable, as it satisfies the triple-test laid down in Bangalore Water Supply. As a necessary corollary thereto, the provisions of the IDA apply in full flow to the employees of the forest department, who answer to the definition of a 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Act. Viewed in this perspective, the decision rendered in the case of Chief Conservator of Forests was right, even though it is possible to question the very premise on which the apex court proceeded, ie, whether the conservation of forests is or is not a part of the sovereign functions of the State. Adverting to the case of PN Parmar, the court strangely, observed as follows:

> Ordinarily, a department of the government cannot be held to be an industry and rather, it is a part of the sovereign function ...we find that there has not been an iota of assertion to that effect though; no doubt, it has been contended that the order of dismissal is vitiated for non-compliance with s 25F of the Act. The state, in its counter-affidavit, on the other hand, refuted the assertion of the respondent in the writ petition and took the positive stand that the forest department cannot be held to be an industry, so that the provisions of s 25F of the Act cannot have any application.[24]

The above observations are stale and, at any rate, are not expected of the highest court of the land. Merely because the state averred in its counter-affidavit and took a positive stand, would it mean that the court should accept it at its face value, when the facts disclose something contrary to its submissions? What about the contention of the respondent according to which, going by the ratio evolved by the very same court, in Chief Conservator of Forests, there was a manifest violation of s 25(F) on the part of the state government? Once it was found that the facts of both the cases were identical in every sense of the term, it is baffling that the court adopted a dynamic disposition and applied a different yardstick to the case, contrary to what was decided just four years earlier. Why should the respondent be required to separately assert the nature of duty or the job of the establishment, which was an admitted fact falling squarely within the four walls of its earlier decision in Chief Conservator of Forests, more so, when counsel for the respondents placed his reliance on the said ruling? As a matter of fact, the single judge and the Division Bench, themselves relied on the ratio of Chief Conservator of Forests, while coming to the conclusion that the forest department of a state was not a part of its sovereign functions, and that there was a violation of s 25F, which led to the appeal before the Supreme Court. Could it be said that all these incidents and admitted facts were inadequate for the learned judges to arrive at a fair and reasonable conclusion, consistent with the ratio evolved by a co-ordinate Bench of the same court? With great respect, the decision in PN Parmar is wholly perverse and is violative of the norms of judicial discipline. If the court were of the opinion that Chief Conservator of Forests was not rightly decided, it should have placed the papers before the Chief Justice, for constituting a larger Bench to review and lay down the correct law, instead of advancing untenable arguments in support of its own misconceptions. The dysfunctional effect of this decision can be stated thus: if any judge of a labour court or High Court is confronted with the dilemma of choosing between Chief Conservator of Forests and PN Parmar, he would be absolutely free to choose either this or that, as dictated by the tenor of the time, notwithstanding the fact that these decisions represent two extremes on the same issue, and thereby, dilute the whole judicial process. To illustrate, the Bombay High Court, in Haribhau, held that the State Forest Department was not an industry under s 2(j).[25]

Educational Institutions

The question that whether the activity of running an educational institution would fall within the definition of an 'industry', was touched upon, but left undecided by the Supreme Court, in the under-noted cases,[26] because it was not called upon to decide. But, in Corpn of City of Nagpur (supra),[27] decided by the same Bench on the same day, ie, 29 January 1960, the court included the education department of the corporation, in the departments held to be falling within the definition of an 'industry'. As already stated in the preceding paragraphs, the case of University of Delhi (supra), is not being discussed as it was conclusively overruled in Bangalore Water Supply. A single judge of the Kerala High Court,[28] has observed that the matter has to be considered in the light of the evidence, as to what type of work a teacher does. The duties which a teacher, in such a school, discharges, has to be proved by adducing the relevant evidence. The Punjab and Haryana High Court, in Sumer Chand, held that the section of the university in which a carpenter was employed is an industry.[29] The Kerala High Court, in Karthiam, held that despite the excessive commercialisation in the field of education, the statutory definition of an industry does not permit education to fall in its ambit.[30] But a single judge of Allahabad High Court, in Jagdish Prasad Sinha, held that the essential duty of a teacher in a school, is to impart education to students, and in view of the ratio of Bangalore Water Supply, there is no justification for taking the view that a teacher is not a 'workman', particularly when a school is owned by a company engaged in the sugar and oil manufacturing business.[31] Likewise, a single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that in the context of the law, as laid down by the Supreme Court, an educational institution will fall within the definition of an 'industry' and a clerk employed therein, would be a workman.[32] The Kerala State Science and Technology Museum which provided a service to the community by stimulating and encouraging scientific literacy among the masses, through its activities, is an industry.[33] The Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the activities of the Jiwaji University will fall within the definition of industry.[34]

But in these cases, the attention of the court does not appear to have had been drawn to the latest holding of the Supreme Court in Sundrambal, viz, that even if an educational institution is 'industry' as per the ratio of Bangalore Water Supply, the nature of the work of the teachers teaching in an educational institution, will not fall within the categories of work enumerated in s 2(s). Taking note of the nature of work done by a teacher, it was held that a 'teacher' is not a 'workman'.[35] In Ruth Soren, the Supreme Court held that an 'establishment', running an educational institution imparting education, as defined in the Bihar Shops and Establishment Act 1953, does not carry on a business, trade or profession. Such an activity, though might be an industry as defined in s 2(j), would not be a profession, trade or business for the purposes of Art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution, and would not be one falling within the scope of an 'establishment', under the Bihar Shops Act. Therefore, the labour court could have no jurisdiction under s 26(2) of the said Act to interfere with the order terminating the service of an employee of the establishment.[36] A technical teachers training institute, providing technical training to the candidates admitted to the institute, is an industry.[37]

In Kamyani Vidya Mandir, one of the two issues was "whether an educational institute for mentally challenged children, funded by business houses" fell within the definition of industry. Ms Mhatre J, of Bombay High Court surveyed the decision rendered in Bangalore Water Supply (supra) and observed that: (i) the dominant purpose of hiring employees by said institute was only to train mentally challenged children and to look after them; (ii) while so imparting training, goods are manufactured and sold, not with the object of making profit; (iii) that no regular employees were hired by the petitioner to produce the articles, such as, greeting cards, envelopes, candles, etc; (iv) that the articles which were sold in the stalls set up by the petitioner during the festive seasons were those made in the process of training the mentally challenged children; (v) that the articles were made by the children together with the teachers; (vi) there was no evidence to show that the mentally challenged persons, who were being trained, were paid any money for the products manufactured by them during the course of training; and (vii) that in these circumstances, it could not be said that there was any employer-employee relationship between them and the petitioner nor could it be said that there was any systematic activity for the production of the goods. On this view of the matter, the learned judge had set the order of the labour court aside.[38] These divergent views only go to establish that the seven-Judge Bench decision in Bangalore Water Supply had, far from giving finality to or clearing the cob-webs that shrouded the definition of 'industry' in s 2(j), made the issue even murkier and foggy as can be seen from the highly divergent views as to the legal status of (a) 'irrigation' departments of state governments, (b) 'forest' departments, (c) 'Agricultural' and 'Farm' Corporations, (d) Educational institutions, (e) 'Telecom' departments of the government, and several other activities and undertakings, resulting in judicial chaos and mess of grave magnitude.

Research Institutions

In Ahmedabad Textile IR Assn, the association was established to carry on research with respect to the textile industry, jointly, for the benefit of its members, by discovery of processes of manufacture, with a view to secure greater efficiency, rationalisation and reduction of cost. The activity, therefore, was held to be an 'industry'.[39] In Physical Research Laboratory, the court held that Physical Research Laboratory was not 'industry' because it is not engaged in an activity which can be called a business, trade or manufacture, nor is it an undertaking, analogous to business or trade. It is not rendering any services to others. It is engaged in pure research in space science.[40] A single judge of the Jharkhand High Court took a different view in Central Rainfed URR Institute, and held that the institute was not engaged in a commercial or industrial activity, nor was there anything on record to suggest any economic venture on the part of the workmen. It had no object to produce and distribute any service to satisfy the needs of the consumer community. Thus, the institute would not fall within the ambit of an 'industry', as defined in s 2(j), as it lacked all the elements that could to bring it within the purview of the definition.[41] This decision runs counter to the ratio of Bangalore Water Supply.

Municipal Corporations

A municipal corporation is a public corporation and primarily, a non-trading one, since it has mostly governmental functions to perform, within a specified territory. It is indeed a state in miniature.[42] The state may assume 'non-regal' functions by means of its legislative power and when such functions are assumed by the state, it acts simply as a huge corporation, with its legislation as the charter and its actions under the legislation, so far as they are not regal executions of the law, are merely analogous to that of a private company, similarly authorised.[43] Municipal corporations and local bodies too, therefore, have dual functions, ie, regal and non-regal. If such bodies indulge in trading or business or have to assume the calling of employers, they will be employers whether they carry on their business commercially, for the purpose of gain or profit, or not. The Act, therefore, contemplates cases of industrial disputes where the government or a local body or a public utility service, may be the employer. In other words, where the government and local authorities act as individuals do, the policy of the Act is to put the government and the local authorities at par with private individuals. But local authorities cannot be regarded as industries unless they produce material goods or render material services and do not share by delegation, in governmental function or functions incidental thereto.[44] In such a non-regal character, a municipal corporation is a mere entity or a juristic person and it stands for the community, in the administration of its local affairs, wholly beyond the sphere of the public purposes for which governmental powers are conferred upon it.[45]The definition of an 'employer' in s 2(g) of the Act, also indicates that a local authority may become an employer if it carries on an 'industry'. This means that a municipality, if it indulges in an activity which may properly, be described as an 'industry', may be involved in an 'industrial dispute'. It would, therefore, be incongruous and self-contradictory to exempt wholly, the activities undertaken by the government and municipal corporations, in the interest of the socio-economic progress of the country, as beneficial measures, from the operation of the Act, which itself is, in substance, a very important, beneficial measure.[46]

In Banerji, the court observed that though municipal activity per se cannot be regarded as a 'business' or 'trade', it would nevertheless fall within the expression 'undertaking' appearing in the definition. [47] This decision was next followed in Baroda Municipality.[48] The ratio of these two decisions is that it is not necessary that the activity must be carried on by private enterprise, or must be commercial, or must result in profit. It is sufficient if it is analogous to the carrying on of a trade or 'business' and it involves co-operation between the employers and the employees. This result was reached by extending the meaning of the word 'undertaking' to cover adventures not strictly 'trades' or 'businesses', but objects very similar. Later, in Corpn of Nagpur, the court had to consider whether a municipal corporation would be an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(14) of the CP and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act 1947. Justice Subba Rao analysed the activities undertaken by a municipal corporation in greater detail, and evolved the following cardinal principles:

(i) The regal functions described as primary and inalienable functions of the State, though statutorily delegated to a corporation, are necessarily excluded from the purview of the definition. Such regal functions shall be confined to legislative power, administration of law and judicial power.

(ii) If a service rendered by an individual or a private person would be an industry, it would equally be so in the hands of a corporation.

(iii) If a service rendered by a corporation is an industry, the employees in the departments connected with the service, whether financial, administrative or executive, would be entitled to the benefits of the Act.

(iv) If a department of a municipality discharges many functions, some pertaining to an industry as defined in the Act, and other, non-industrial activities, the predominant functions of the department shall be the criterion for the purposes of the Act. [49]

The question as to whether the octroi department (assessment and levying of octroi) is an 'industry' or not, was left undecided in the absence of any appeal against that part of the award of the tribunal.[50] The Punjab and Haryana High Court,[51] took the view that the fire brigade service, maintained by a municipal committee, is an industry, while the Bombay High Court, held that the fire brigade service, maintained by a municipal corporation is not an industry.[52] The running of a dispensary, sanitary and conservancy activities and that of administrative departments, looking after and connected with other departments, was also held to fall within the definition of an industry.[53] The corporation's activity of storing and distributing water, to satisfy human wants, is a systematic activity, falling within the definition of industry.[54] The High Court of Patna held that 'Town Development Authority' is an 'industry'.[55]

Hospitals

In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha the Supreme Court adopted the reasoning and the tests laid down by Bombay High Court and held that the activity of running hospitals was not a regal activity of the State, and hence, it would fall within the definition of an industry inasmuch as the activity would be an industry, if it were run by private citizens. The character of the activity was taken as the determinative test. The question as to who conducts the activity, was considered irrelevant. Likewise, the capital investment and the profit motive were also considered unessential.[56] Commenting on the observations of Hidayatullah CJI in Safdarjung, Iyer J, in Bangalore Water Supply, held that he could not possibly agree that running a hospital, which is a welfare activity and not a sovereign function, could not be an industry. Hospital facilities, research products and training services are 'services', and hence, 'industries' and an absence of profit or the performance of functions of training and research, would not take the institution out of the scope of industry.[57] Accordingly, the learned judge held that Safdarjung was wrong, and that Hospital Mazdoor Sabha was right. In Indraprastha Medical Corpn, the Delhi High Court held that a hospital, being an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j), could not be excluded from the purview of the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1948 and hence, it was required to adopt the model Standing Orders or submit its own Standing Orders for certification.[58]

Charitable and Humanitarian Institutions

The question, whether the institutions engaged in charitable or humanitarian activities, would fall within the definition of an industry has also engaged the attention of the courts. In Bangalore Water Supply, the Supreme Court posed the question: 'Can charity be an industry?', and answered it by stating:

> This paradox can be unlocked only by examining the nature of the activity of charity, for there are charities and charities ... Bedrocked on the ground norms, we must analyse the elements that are charitable economic enterprises, established and maintained for satisfying the human wants.[59]

In Madras Pinjrapole, the Madras High Court took into notice the amened objects of the society, which include receiving cows from owners for a fee; the starting a dairy farm was meant for supporting infirm cows, bullocks and horses; acquisition of stud-bulls for cattle breeding and sale of milk, etc. In the circumstances, it was held that the activity of the Pinjrapole did fall within the definition of an industry.[60] Likewise, in Bombay Pinjrapole, in view of the immovable properties held, the collection and sale of milk, the activities of the Pinjrapole were held to fall within the definition of an industry.[61] The UP Scheduled Caste FDC, set up for organising and working in various ways for the upliftment of the downtrodden, and to help them financially, for various purposes, including for starting industries, and organising and helping them in getting technical training, is an industry, since the activities are systematic and carried on with the cooperation of the employees.[62] In Bangalore Water Supply Iyer J, agreed with the decision that Bombay Pinjrapole was an industry. Iyer J stated three categories of charitable institutions. The first is where the enterprise, like any other, yields profits, but they are siphoned off for altruistic objects. The second is one where the institution makes no profit, but hires the services of employees as in other like businesses, but the goods and services, which are the output of that activity, are made available at low or no costs, to the indigent needy who are priced out of the market. The third is, where the establishment is orientated on a humane mission, which is fulfilled by men who work, not because they are paid wages, but because they share the passion for the cause and derive job-satisfaction from their contribution. He said that the first two categories would fall within the definition of an industry, while the third would not. The manner in which the activity in question is organised or arranged, the condition of the co-operation between the employer and the employee necessary for its success and objects, to render the material service to the community, is the pivotal test to identify whether the activity is an industry or not. The classification of charitable institutions, undertaken by Iyer J and the manner of distinguishing the institutions inter se, for the purpose of inclusion and exclusion from the coverage offered by the definition of s 2(j), deserves some analysis. Iyer J held that stray wage earning employees do not shape the soul of an institution into an industry and hence, the third category is not an industry.

This ruling raises the following questions: Applying the test of predominant activity, and not of numerical strength, what was the justification for excluding the third category? Does the definition of, 'workman' exclude stray wage earners from its purview? Is it one of the objects of the Act to price them out of its protective cover? How does this ruling align itself with the safeguards provided under ss 2(A) & 11 (A) of the IDA? And, finally, what kind of rationale underlies this judgment? Iyer J equated charity with trade and business, which is prima facie, a grave misconception on his part. The core attribute of any trade and business is the exchange of goods and services, for goods and services or for money, which necessarily presupposes a give-and-take, in which both the transacting parties give to, and at the same time take from, the other, something tangible. On the contrary, the concept of charity rests on the principle that the donor does not expect anything in return from the recipient and there can be nothing of the sort of a 'barter' or 'exchange' in the case of charity. The essence of the former is a two-way relationship of vendor-vendee or supplier-customer, whereas the latter is a one-way relationship of donor-recipient, with nothing flowing back from the recipient in the form of 'consideration', not even gratitude. If a charitable institution organises its activities on professional lines, it could be with a view to ensure a proper distribution of the benefits and to make the functionaries accountable for their actions. Does the mere fact that a charitable institution streamlines its administration, transform it into an activity analogous to trade or business? It is disappointing that, despite a clear mandate, the Bench took it upon itself to lay down the correct law. The entire line of reasoning of the majority judges proceeded on emotive lines, extending the iron-clad triple-test to charitable institutions in a straight-jacketed fashion, without appreciating the fines, yet substantial aspects that distinguish various activities.

Going by the maxim nemo dat quid non habet (no one can give, who does not possess), charity does not simply flow from orientation or passion as averred by Iyer J. In order that a positive orientation translates itself into a tangible help to the indigent needy, it requires something more concrete, whether that 'something' comes out of the surplus generated by an enterprise or the contributions of a handful of people. Does the sole fact, that a charitable institution is funded by an external agency, render the activity any less charitable? What role could the source of finance possibly play in determining the nature and the end-product of the activity, ie, taking care of the material needs of the sick, infirm and disabled, who cannot help themselves? The same logic applies to Pinjrapoles, which were also brought into the category of industries by reasoning of Iyer J. Even applying the rule of noscitur a sociis, which Iyer J so vehemently pressed into service, by holding that the word 'undertaking' must be read down to conform to the restrictive characteristic shared by the society of words before and after (at p 362), the 'undertaking' of a charity clearly falls outside the definition, for the simple reason that it does not share any of the characteristics of the words preceding or succeeding it, ie, 'trade', 'business', and 'manufacturing'. Regrettably, the judicial contradictions disclosed in the Bangalore Water Supply case cast their shadow on various High Courts, as could be seen from the decision rendered by a single judge of Bombay High Court in Shri Devadeveshwar, where it was held, that a charitable trust, registered under the Bombay Public Trusts Act 1950, which was maintaining four temples, getting donations from well wishers, providing low cost houses for poor, maintaining them and employing about 40 workmen, was an industry within the meaning of s 2(j).[63] There can be no doubt that the Bangalore Water Supply case was wrongly decided inter alia, insofar as it related to charitable institutions.

Religious and Spiritual Institutions

In many foundations, centers, monasteries, holy orders and ashrams, in the east and in the west, spiritual fascination pulls men and women into the precincts and they work tirelessly in the pursuit of their spiritual aspirations. Such people are not 'workmen' and such institutions are not 'industries', despite some menials and some professionals being hired in a vast complex. The test of the predominant character of the institution and the nature of the relations, resulting in the production of goods and services, are to be looked at. In such cases, stray wage-earning employees would not change the soul of an institution into an industry. The production and distribution of goods and services, calculated to satisfy human wants and wishes (not spiritual or religious, but inclusive of material things or services geared to celestial bliss, like making on a large scale, prasad or food), prima facie, would be an industry.[64] The Orissa High Court, held that the duties performed by the employees of the Harihar Bahinipati Temple, such as maintenance of peace and order and discipline amongst the pilgrims inside the Sri Jagannath Temple and to prepare sweets for offering to the deities in the temple, were not secular in nature, but were connected with the seva-pooja of the temple, and as such being of a spiritual nature, they did not fall within the ambit of an industry.[65]

Similarly, the Gujarat High Court, in Panchasara Jain Derasar, held that offerings of certain articles to the deity, is not a sale of such articles. If, assuming that certain articles are sold to persons who come for 'darshan', there is no material to show that they are sold for profit, in view of the nature of the activities carried on in the temple, it cannot be held that the temple is an industry.[66] After the decision in Bangalore Water Supply, this decision does not hold good. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the activities of the Shri Cutchi Visa Oswal Derawasi Jain Mahajan Trust, being of a commercial nature, despite the aims and objects of the trust, fell within the ambit of the expression 'undertaking', as used in the definition of an 'industry'.[67] Likewise, in Baikuntha Nath Debasthan, on the facts and circumstances of the case, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the activities of the temple trust fell within the definition of an industry.[68] The Himachal Pradesh High Court held that the Baba Balak Nath Temple Trust is an industry in view of the nature of its work and on applying the dominant on nature test.[69] The Madras High Court held that the Arulmigu Subramaniasamy Devasthanam is not an industry within the purview of s 2(j) of theID Act.[70] The Shiromani GP Committee performs purely religious functions, and hence is not an industry.[71]

Private and Domestic Activities

In Bangalore Water Supply, though the two judges, out of the seven, categorically discarded the principle of noscitur a sociis and ejusdem generis while interpreting the expressions used in the definition of an industry, in the leading judgment, while holding that domestic employment cannot fall within the scope of an industry, Krishna Iyer J admitted that the meaning of the words of the widest amplitude, used in the two limbs of the definition 'cannot be magnified to over-reach itself and emphasized:

> The literal latitude of the words in the definition cannot be allowed a grotesquely inflationary play, but must be read down to accord with the broad industrial sense of the nation's economic community, of which labour is an integral part. To bend beyond credible limits is to break with the facts, unless language leaves no option.

In this view of law, the learned judge stated the law relating to domestic and private employment, in the following words:

> The image of an industry or even a quasi-industry, is one of a plurality of workmen, not an isolated or single little assistant or attendant. The latter category is more or less like a personal avocation for livelihood, taking some paid or part-time assistance from another. The whole purpose of the Industrial Disputes Act is to focus on the resolution of industrial disputes and the regulation of industrial relations and not to meddle with every little carpenter in a village or blacksmith in a town, who sits with his son or assistant to work for the customers who trek in. The ordinary spectacle of a cobbler and his assistant or a cycle repairer with a helper we come across in the pavements of cities and towns, repels the idea of 'industry' and industrial dispute. For this reason, which applies along the line to small professions, petty handicraftsmen, domestic servants and the like, the solicitor or doctor or rural engineer, even like the butcher, the baker and the candle-stick maker, with an assistant or without, they do not fall within the definition of industry. [72]

The history of industrial disputes and its legislation recognises the basic concept that the activity should be an organised one and not that which pertains to private or personal employment.[73] The activity should, therefore, be predominantly carried on by the employment of an organised labour force, for the production or distribution of goods, or for rendering material services to the community at large or a part of such community.[74] Such activity should involve the co-operation between the employer and the employees, for the object of satisfying material human needs, and not for oneself or for pleasure.[75] In other words, where the services are meant for the employers themselves, for their own pleasure, and the material goods are for their own consumption, the activity cannot be an industry.[76] Hence, an activity pertaining to, or in relation to private and personal employment, has to be excluded from the definition of an industry.[77]

Domestic employment cannot be regarded as being in the course of an industry,[78]because the employment of a domestic servant has no resemblance to a trade, business or industry. Domestic servants have a calling or an occupation, but it cannot be said that their employment is an industry. Nor are the private householders, employers who carry on an 'industry' as contemplated by the Act. Further, there is no co-operation between capital and labour, which is necessary to constitute an industry. The domestic servant renders services purely of a personal nature.[79] A building let out on rent by a Palace Administration Board (a body corporate), which administers and manages the estate of a royal family, for the benefit of the junior members of the family, the building being constructed out of the surplus income, was held not to be an 'undertaking' within the meaning of s 2(j) of the Act.[80] But the question, whether the work of an employee is of a domestic nature or of an industrial nature, will depend upon the facts of each case.[81] or instance, in Hanshree Apartment Owners'Assn, the Calcutta High Court held that the services rendered by the employees of an apartment owners' association, who were engaged for the purposes of maintaining and keeping the common areas of the entire conglomeration of apartments, would fall within the definition of an industry, as in such a situation, the concept of domesticity of such employee vanishes.[82] In Som Vihar Apartment Owners, the issue before the Supreme Court was: whether the persons engaged by the society, which was formed mainly to maintain cleanliness in the apartments and to render certain other services personally to the apartment owners themselves could be characterized as workmen and whether the activity itself could be held to be an 'industry'? Negating the contentions, a Bench comprising Rajendra Babu and Phukan JJ Observed:

> Indeed this Court in Rajappa's case (supra) noticed the distinction between such classes of workmen as domestic servants who render personal service to their masters from those covered by the definition 2(J) of the Industrial Disputes Act. It is made clear if literally interpreted these words are of very wide amplitude and it cannot be suggested that in its sweep it is intended to include service however rendered in whatsoever capacity and for whatsoever reason.In that context it was said that it should not be understood that all services and callings would come within the purview of the definition; service rendered by a domestic servant purely in a personal or domestic matter or even in a casual way would fall outside the definition. That is how this Court dealt with this aspect of the matter. The whole purpose of the Industrial Disputes Act is to focus on resolution of industrial disputes and the regulation will not meddle with every little carpenter or a blacksmith, a cobbler or a cycle repairer who come outside the idea of industry and Industrial dispute. This rationale which applies all along the line to small professions like that of domestic servants would apply to those who are engaged by a group of flat owners for rendering personal services even if that group is not amorphous but crystallised into an Association or a society. The decision in Rajappa's case if correctly understood is not an authority for the proposition that domestic servants are also to be treated to be workmen even when they carry on work in respect of one or many masters. It is clear when personal services are rendered to the members of a society and that society is constituted > only for the purposes of those members to engage the services of such employees, we do not think its activity should be treated as an industry nor the workmen. In this view of the matter so far as the appellant is concerned it must be held not to be "industry". Therefore, the award made by the Tribunal cannot be sustained. The same shall stand set aside.[83]

Following the above ruling, another Bench of Supreme Court comprising Patil and Dharmadhikari, JJ, held that the respondent-Housing Society was not an 'industry' nor could it be said that the appellants employed therein were 'workmen'.[84]

Professions

The word 'professional' has not been defined in the Act. But the sense of the word can best be understood in the words of Scrutton LJ, in Commr of Inland Revenue.

> ...It seems to me as at present advised, that a 'profession' in the present use of language, involves the idea of an occupation requiring either a purely intellectual skill, or of a manual skill controlled, as in painting and sculpture, or surgery, by the intellectual skill of the operator, as distinguished from an occupation which is substantially the production or sale or arrangements for the production or sale of commodities. The line of demarcation may vary from time to time. The word 'profession' used to be confined to the three learned professions, the Church, Medicine and Law. It has now, I think, a wider meaning. [85]

The three learned professions, viz, the Church, Medicine and Law, cannot be the only professions for all times. Times change. The sphere of human activity and endeavour is constantly expanding, giving rise to problems which require specialisation and expertise. In the course of the last two centuries, trade, commerce and industry have vastly developed, bringing in its wake, problems which have to be tackled by experts. The old crystallised learned profession, viz, the Church, medicine and law were, by the very nature of their training, unable to solve the problems of the new developments in trade, commerce and industry. The new developments in trade, commerce and industry, therefore, inter alia, threw up a team of experts in the shape of consultant engineers, architects, chartered accountants and journalists, etc, having specialised knowledge in their field.[86] In other words, the essential idea of a 'learned profession', which cannot, in the modern context, be merely limited to the original categories, is that it is the pursuit of an avocation or occupation, substantially involving intellect. There is a complementary feature to this, that the services rendered by a 'learned profession' are primarily characterised by an equipment of learning, skill or judgment, acquired through intellectual means. So long as these criteria are fulfilled, such a profession is a 'learned profession'. In other words, in these liberal professions, the individual activity is characterised by personal skill and intelligence and is dependent upon personal study, character and integrity. These qualities, displayed by the practitioners of these liberal professions, inspire confidence in persons approaching them for advice or guidance. But in each case, the person who approaches a professional person, chooses him according to his conception of the skill, intelligence and integrity of the person. Since such a person approaches in entire confidence, the professional person has a corresponding obligation not to betray the confidence, and advise his client as best as he can.[87] 'A profession ordinarily, is an occupation requiring intellectual skill, often coupled with manual skill. Thus, a teacher uses, purely intellectual skill, while a painter uses both'.[88] In Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees' Union, Isaacs and Rich JJ, speaking for the Australian High Court of Appeal, observed:

> industrial disputes occur when, in relation to operations in which capital and labour are contributed, in co-operation, for the satisfaction of human wants or desires, those engaged in the co-operation dispute as to the basis to be observed, by the parties engaged, respecting either a share of the product or any other terms and conditions of their co-operation. It excludes,...the legal and the medical professions, because they are not carried on in any intelligible sense, by the co-operation of capital and labour and do not come within the sphere of industrialism.[89]

In Bangalore Water Supply, Krishna Iyer J pointed out that:

> the halo conjured up in the Solicitor's case, ..., hardly serves to 'de-industrialise' the professions. After all, it is not infra dig for lawyers, doctors, engineers, architects, auditors, company secretaries or other professionals, to regard themselves as Workers in their own sphere or employers or suppliers of specialised services to society. [90]

In view of the infrastructures of the offices or the clinics of the professional persons, the court observed that:

> the conclusion is inevitable that contribution to the success of the institution—every professional unit has an institutional good-will > and reputation—comes not merely from the professional or the specialist, but from all those whose excellence in their respective arts, makes for the total proficiency. We have, therefore, no doubt that the claim for exclusion on the score of 'liberal profession' is unwarranted from a functional or definitional angle.

He further observed that if the professions flow out of the scope of industry, flood-gates of exemption from the obligations under the Act will be opened. The court therefore, over-ruled the decision in Solicitors' case. But it hastened to add that a small category, perhaps large in numbers, in the Muffusil, may not squarely fall within the definition of an industry. A single lawyer, a rural medical practitioner or an urban doctor with a little assistant and/or a menial servant, may ply a profession, but may not be said to be running an industry. That is not because the employee does not make a contribution, nor because the profession is too high to be classified as a trade or an industry with its commercial connotations, but because there is nothing like an organised labour in such employment. In his separate judgment, Chandrachud CJI also observed that he found it difficult to infer from the language of the definition that 'the legislature could not have intended to bring a 'liberal profession' like that of an attorney, within the ambit of the definition of an industry'. And referring to National Union of Commercial Employees, he pointed out that the refinements of Law therein, exempting the liberal professions from the scope of industry, are not warranted by the words of the definition, apart from the consideration that in practice, they make the application of the definition to concrete cases dependent upon a factual assessment so highly subjective, as to lead to confusion and uncertainty in the understanding of the true legal position. He, however, observed that:

> The unhappy state of affairs in which the law is marooned, will continue to baffle the skilled professional and his employees alike, as also the judge, who has to perform the unenviable task of sitting in judgment over the directness of the cooperation between the employer and the employees, until such time as the legislature decides to manifest its intention by the use of clear and indubitable language.

He suggested that the Legislature might find a plausible case for exempting the learned and liberal professions of Lawyers, solicitors, doctors, engineers, chartered accountants and the like, from the operation of industrial laws. But until that happens, he considered that in the present state of law, it is difficult by judicial interpretation, to create exemptions in favour of any particular class.[91] A sports club run by a company, with the object of organising, promoting and affording facilities for indoor and outdoor games, athletics, recreation, social meetings, etc, satisfies the tests laid down in Bangalore Water Supply and hence, is an industry.[92] Some of the liberal professions are dealt with under the following topics:

Medical

Though in the light of the decision in Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees Union, and the decision of the Supreme Court in National Union of Commercial Employees, medical profession would not fall within the definition of an industry. The question was not free from doubt though, since there was no direct case dealing with the medical profession. In Safdarjung, with a view to decide the cases under consideration on their own merits, Hidayatullah CJI observed that:

> ... if a hospital, nursing home or dispensary is run as a business, in a commercial way, there may be found elements of industry there. Then, the hospital is more than a place where persons can get treated for their ailment. It becomes a business. [93]

In Bangalore Water Supply, over-ruling its decision in National Union of Commercial Employees, the court has now unequivocally said that liberal professions, including the medical profession, do not qualify for exemption from the ambit of industry.[94]

Legal

In National Union of Commercial Employees, the Supreme Court held that a firm of solicitors is not an industry. It also repelled the further contention that an organisation of professional services, in an institutionalised manner, rendering organised services, depending upon the co-operation of the employers and the employees, engaged by a firm doing different categories of work, would also not make it an industry in view of the nature of the services rendered by the work of the employers.[95] This case, having been over-ruled by the court in Bangalore Water Supply, the offices of the practitioners of the legal profession, like those of solicitors or advocates, would fall within the definition of an industry if they fulfil the triple test of: (a) systematic activity; (b) being organised by co-operation between the employers and the employees; and (c) producing or distributing goods and services calculated to satisfy human wants and wishes. The only exception indicated is where a single lawyer may be plying his profession with a little assistant or a menial servant, because in such an employment, there would be nothing like an organised labour.

Chartered Accountants

In Rabindra Nath Sen, a single judge of that High Court held that a chartered accountant, doing audit work, unassisted by stenographers, personal clerks or menial servants, that is to say, doing the entire auditing work, from the examination of the accounts to the making of the report, all by himself, with only such subsidiary and incidental help as may be rendered by his stenographers, typists, personal clerks and servants, may not be carrying on an 'industry', but, if a chartered accountant carries on some auditing work in a magnified scale, with more clients than he can manage himself, and he is perforce compelled to have a division of labour, his clerks doing the examination of the accounts and he himself drawing up the audit reports, on the result of such examination, it might not be said that this type of co-operation is not an industry, as it could cannot be said that such a report was his individualistic production, having no connection with the labour put in by his employees. It was also observed that the work of a chartered accountant was different from that of a solicitor, and therefore, the ratio of National Union of Commercial Employees was not applicable to the case of a chartered accountant.[96] But another single judge of same High Court in Ramakrishna Ayyar, followed the holding in National Union of Commercial Employees and on an analogy of the work of a solicitors firm, held that the aid or services which a chartered accountant might obtain from an audit clerk, or any clerk was by no means essential or indispensable to the practice of his profession. It is quite possible for a chartered accountant to practise his profession, unaided by the services of an audit clerk or any other clerk. That being the position, the test of an essential co-operation between the employer and the employee is entirely absent in the case of an undertaking of a chartered accountant. Applying the other test, namely, that of a co-operation between the capital and labour, to the facts of the case, the court further held that there was no such cooperation, as the only capital of the chartered accountant is his professional qualification, skill, training and reputation and there was, therefore, no co-operation between capital and labour.[1]

However, the court did not deal with the second part of the Raijndra Nath Sen's case, as it distinguished that case on facts. In this case, the evidence showed that the chartered accountants' firm was carrying on its business without the help or co-operation of any audit clerk at all and therefore, the co-operation between a chartered accountant and his audit clerks and other clerks, was by no means of an essential and indispensable character, whereas, in Rabindra Nath Sen's case, there was a clear evidence of co-operation between the audit clerks and their employers, namely, the chartered accountants, and it was for that reason, that it was held that the business carried on by the firm was an industry. The second part of the decision of the single judge, in Rabindra Nath Sen's case, was inconsistent with the ratio of the decisions in National Union of Commercial Employees and Madras Gymkhana cases. This view was also dissented from by the Kerala, Madras and Bombay High Courts. In TK Menon and Co, the Kerala High Court held that if the work of an individual chartered accountant, in case the entire work is done by him, is not an industry, the fact that in view of the volume of the work he has secured, he would have to maintain an employee, cannot make it an industry.[2] This view of the Kerala High Court was followed by the Madras High Court, in Fraser & Ross.[3] And a similar view has been taken by the Bombay High Court in NE Merchant.[4] But now, the decision in National Union of Commercial Employees having itself been over-ruled by the Supreme Court, the offices and activities of chartered accountants would fall within the definition of industry, unless excepted by the legislature. In Bangalore Water Supply, Iyer J rejected the test of 'direct and essential nexus' laid down in the Solicitors' case (supra), and held:

> ...a solicitor's firm or a lawyer's firm becomes successful not merely by the talent of a single lawyer, but by the co-operative operations of several specialists, juniors and seniors. Likewise, the ancillary services of competent stenographers, para-legal supportive services are equally important. The same test applies to other professions...We have, therefore, no doubt that the claim for exclusion on the score of liberal professions is unwarranted, from a functional or definitional angle. The floodgates of exemption from the obligation under the Act will be opened if professions flow out of its scope. The result of this discussion is that the Solicitors' case is wrongly decided and must, therefore, be overruled.[5]

The above reasoning of Iyer J is unassailable. But, having been eloquent about the employment relationship and the co-operation needed between the parties, Iyer J proceeded to draw a further distinction between solicitors employing a substantial number of employees and those operating with a skeleton staff. He went on to observe:

> A single lawyer, a rural medical practitioner or an urban doctor, with a little assistant and/or a menial servant, may ply a profession but may not be said to run an industry...The image of an industry or even a quasi-industry is one of a plurality of workmen, not an isolated or single little assistant or attendant.[6]

The above observation raises some interesting points of analysis in view of the earlier judgment of Iyer J. The phraseology of s 2(j), which includes business and trade, leaves no option than to take the single shop into its fold, regardless of the number of Workers employed therein. Secondly, once it is conceded that it is the nature of the activity that determines whether it is an industry or not, within the meaning of the Act, then the number of employees engaged therein becomes irrelevant in the light of the fact that s 2(j), as it stood then and as it stands now, does not prescribe the minimum number of workmen as one of the criteria in determining whether a particular activity is industry or not. Thirdly, is it possible to reconcile the above line of reasoning with the critical comments he made against the decisions in Solicitors and Safdarjung? Strangely, Iyer J seems to have adopted the concept of 'arbitrary differentiation'-not on the basis of the nature of activity-but on the numerical strength of the persons employed. This distinction drawn by him, between solicitors' firms or medical units, engaging one or two Workers and others engaging a higher number of Workers, seems to transcend the scope of the definition of industry.

In this connection, it is pertinent to note that he overruled Solicitors on the sole ground that the employer-employee cooperation need not be 'direct and essential' in order to make it an 'industry'. Once the element of 'direct and essential nexus' stands eliminated from the scene as being irrelevant, what remains for inquiry is whether the profession conforms to the triple-test or not, and nothing more. If the answer is in the affirmative, then the activity has to fall within the range of the definition. There is no question of any further classification on the basis of numerical strength. Is it not a hitherto unknown test? Where exactly should it be placed in the triple-test matrix devised by the learned judge? If the same logic is extended to, say, shops and commercial establishments, then those units engaging 'one single little assistant' can rightfully claim exemption from the terms 'business' and 'trade', appearing in the definition. This part of the ruling of Iyer J requires more analysis due to the contradictions that seem to arise therefrom.

Architects

The decision of the Supreme Court in Bangalore Water Supply has left no doubt that the offices and activities of architects, if they answer the triple tests laid down therein, would fall within the ambit of industry.

Agriculture

'Agriculture' or 'land' are the exclusive fields of the state legislature.[7] The Parliament, therefore, has no power to legislate with respect to 'agriculture' or 'land' but the Parliament has the concurrent power with the state to legislate with respect to 'industrial and labour disputes',[8] as well as the 'welfare of labour'.[9]The Parliament is, therefore, competent to legislate with respect to labour disputes, even if such legislation affects the labour employed in 'agriculture' or 'agricultural operations'. In the Australian Act, 'agriculture' has specifically been excluded from the definition of industry in s 4, on which our definition is based. On the other hand, in the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946, 'agriculture' and 'agricultural operations' have been specifically included in s 3(9) in the definition of 'industry'. But in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, 'agriculture' has neither been included nor excluded. The Madras High Court, however, held that the State Farm Corporation of India, which is engaged in agricultural operations, is an industry in view of the fact that s 2(j), as amended in 1982 by which 'agriculture' was sought to be excluded from the definition, has not been given effect to.[10] A single judge of Delhi High Court held that Agricultural Marketing Board is an industry.[11] In striking contrast, the Delhi High Court in Baljeet Singh, held that State Farm Corporation was 'industry', as it was engaged in the production of high quality seeds. It was decided in an earlier case in which the petitioner was a party, though ex parte, that it was not an industry as the predominant purpose of the corporation was 'agricultural' in nature. Sikri J, held that being so, he was barred by the principle of res judicata to plead that the said corporation was an industry.[12] It is important to note, though with dismay, that these two decisions of two High Courts manifest the two diametrically opposite views on the same issue.

In Harinagar Cane Farm, the court left the question, whether all agriculture and operations connected with it are included within the definition of industry or not, undecided. But on the facts of the case, the activities of the two companies registered under the Indian Companies Act, who were engaged in 'agricultural operations', ie, in one case, the production of sugarcane, wheat, paddy and other articles for sale in the market, to the consumers or to wholesale dealers; and in the other case, of producing sugarcane for use in its sugar factories, were held to be falling within the definition of industry, because the companies had invested capital for carrying on their 'agricultural operations', for the purpose of making profits and the workmen employed by them in their respective operations, contributed to the production of agricultural commodities, which brought in profit to the companies and the 'agricultural operations' in question were carried on by the companies like any other 'trade' or 'business'. However, the court made it clear that agriculture cannot be called an industry under all circumstances.[13] The Orissa High Court held that 'unless agriculture is adopted as a business or calling, the operation ... cannot partake the character of industry'.[14] Now, after the decision of the Supreme Court in Bangalore Water Supply, any activity connected with 'agriculture' or 'agricultural operations', affecting 'industrial and labour disputes' or 'welfare of labour', might fall within the ambit of industry, if it satisfies the triple test laid down therein.

Clubs

The Calcutta High Court,[15] took the view that incorporated companies, running clubs for profit and business, would fall within the definition of industry. He further made obiter observations that even a proprietary members' club would be an industry. The decision of Supreme Court in Madras Gymkhana Club, to the effect that it was not an industry on the ground that the activity of the club did not fall within the expressions 'trade', 'business', 'manufacture' or 'calling' of the members or its managing committee, was rejected and overruled in Bangalore Water Supply, hence the said decision is no longer a good law.[16] The same is the case with Cricket Club of India,[17] In Bangalore Water Supply, while over-ruling Madras Gymkhana, etc., Iyer J, proceeded to observe:

> if a club or other like collectivity, has a basic and dominant self-service mechanism, a modicum of employees at the periphery will not metamorphose it into a conventional club, whose verve and virtue are taken care of by paid staff, and the members' role is to enjoy.

For instance, the small man's Nehru Club, Gandhi Granthasala, Anna Manram, Netaji Youth Centre, Brother Music Club, Muslim Sports Club and like organs, often named after national or provincial heroes and manned by members themselves, as contrasted with the upper bracket's Gymkhana Club, Cosmopolitan Club, Cricket Club of India, National Sports Club of India, whose badge is pleasure paid for and provided through skilled or semi-skilled catering staff, might not fall within the definition. In Cricket Club of India, it was further urged that since the club was an incorporated body, the doctrine of 'self-service' would not apply. But in view of the constitution of the membership of the club, the court took the view that the activities of the club were still of a self-serving nature. Thus, instead of confining itself to the corporate personality of the club, the court pierced the corporate veil and looked into the membership of the club, without assigning any reason for doing so. By this device, the activities of the Cricket Cub of India were brought within the ratio of the Madras Gymkhana Club case. But this is not correct. With a view to further buttress this point, in Safdarjung,[18] the court found support from certain observations of Lord Denning MR, in Hotel & CIT Board, to the effect that a member of a club, when he goes to his club to have a meal and pays for it, 'is not engaging in a transaction of sale or purchase, the members are just distributing their own property amongst themselves' and the incorporation of the club is only machinery. [19] In taking this view, Lord Denning MR, relied on certain observations of Warrington LJ, in an income-tax case.[20] But in income-tax cases, lifting of the corporate veil is permissible for seeing the economic realities behind the legal facade.[21] In piercing the corporate veil in industrial cases, Lord Denning MR deviated from the established principles relating to the doctrine of lifting the corporate veil.[22] Trade disputes or industrial disputes do not fall within the cases in which lifting of the corporate veil is permissible. The law, in India, on this subject, is laid dow by the Supreme Court in Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co, holding that the corporate veil can be lifted where fraud is intended to be prevented or trading with an enemy is sought to be defeated.[23] But in Cricket Club of India, neither any fraud was intended to be prevented, nor any trading with an enemy was sought to be defeated. Nor was this a case under a taxing statute. The question of lifting the corporate veil, even without considering the question of whether the corporate veil should he lifted or not, was not justified. If the corporate veil could not be lifted, the club would not fall within the doctrine of a 'self-serving institution'.

Co-operative Societies and Credit Unions

In Bangalore Water Supply, relying on the decision of the Australian High Court, in Queen v Marshall .[24] Iyer J held that co-operative societies, ordinarily, could not fall outside the scope of the definition of industry, because a society is the employer and the members or others are the employees and the activity partakes the nature of a 'trade'. Merely because co-operative enterprises deserve State encouragement, they do not qualify for an exemption. Even if a co-operative society is worked by the members only, the entity (save where the members are few and self-serving) is an industry because the member-Workers are paid wages and there can be disputes about rates and the different scales of wages among the categories ie, Workers and Workers or between Workers and employer. Likewise, credit unions would also fall within the ambit of the definition of 'industry'. For example, the Rajasthan Co-operative Credit Institutions Cadre Authority is an industry.[25]However, a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the Chandigarh State Co-operative Bank is neither an 'industry' nor an 'industrial establishment' as envisaged in the ID Act.[26]

Miscellaneous Activities

The following activities have been held to fall within the definition of industry: A pharmacy attached to a hospital and a college selling its products to the hospital as well as in the market;[27] the activities carried on by the Employees' State Insurance Corporation (constituted under the Employees' State Insurance Corporation Act 1948), which includes provisions for medical facilities for insured persons and their families;[28] a labour indentor, carrying the business of recruiting labourers,[29] a co-operative milk society,[30] a hair cutting saloon,[31] the Marmat section of the Travancore Devaswom Board, engaged in the construction of buildings for dairy farms, schools, hostels, cottage industries and workshops and building and shops,[32] the activities of the Grain Dealers' Association, whose principal activity is to transport goods from the government godowns to the respective ration shops of its members,[33] a milk supply scheme, a government undertaking supplying milk to the city of Jaipur, under the animal husbandry department,[34] the activities of the

Khadi Gramodyog Sangh,[35] the activities of the survey and investigation division of the irrigation department of the government,[36] the Chambal Hydel Irrigation Project,[37] the Salandi Irrigation Project,[38] the Railways,[39] the activities of the lining division of the irrigation department of the government,[40] the tea board constituted under the Tea Act 1953,[41] the Bihar Relief Committee, which undertook minor irrigation schemes in the State of Bihar, with all ancillary systematic operations,[42]a shop governed by the provisions of the Uttar Pradesh Shops and Establishments Act,[43] the construction work of the Tenughat dam, carried on by the Government of Bihar,[44] the Balemala Dam project, which has the ultimate objective of generating electrical power to run different businesses and industries,[45] the telephone,[46] and telegraph services,[47] Hindustan Dwakhana,[48] Security Paper Mills,[49] and the activities of the irrigation department of the Public Works department.[50] The Bombay High Court held that in the absence of any provision of law, it is 'conceivable that a trade union may, in certain circumstances, be an industry.[51] Likewise, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the activities of a society promoting family planning programmes of the state government, in the circumstances of a case, could be an industry.[52]

The Central Institute of Yoga is an industry in view of the fact that it is carrying out a systematic activity.[53] The activities carried on by the Rajasthan State Text Book Board bring it within the purview of the definition of industry.[54] The wool and shawl making factory managed by Kumaon Regimental Centre is an industry.[55] Forest department's work of manufacturing polythene bags is an industry.[56] The activities of the Police Housing Corporation fall within the definition of industry in s 2(j), and hence the Corporation is an 'industry'.[57] The activities of the Uttar Pradesh Scheduled Caste Finance and Development Corporation, such as organising work in various ways, for the upliftment of the down-trodden, helping them in getting technical training etc, have been held to fall within the definition of industry.[58] The activities of a company owning a number of flats in an estate, in rendering services like supply of water, electricity, lifts, sanitation to the tenants etc, has been held to be an industry.[59] The activity of papad making, carried on by a cooperative society, has all the trappings of trade and business, viz, women Workers being engaged in the preparation of papad, under the supervision and control of the society and being paid wages by it. The mere fact that such Workers were styled as 'members' would not exclude the relationship of employee and employer.[60] In Visakhapatnam DLB, the Supreme Court held that the Dock Labour Board, constituted under the Dock Workers Regulations and Employment Act 1948, was not an industry.[61] This decision was followed by the court in Calcutta DLB.[62] But, by the principles laid down by the Supreme Court in Bangalore Water Supply, the Visakhpatnam DLB case was overruled by implication, while Madras Gymkhana was specifically overruled by a larger Bench. Therefore, in Management of Dock Labour Board, Visakhapatnam,[63] on a precise and illuminating analysis of the ratio of these dicta, a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the activities of the Dock Labour Board would fall within the purview of the definition of industry.

The following activities were held not to be industries within the meaning of s 2(j). A retail cloth shop run by two partners, with the assistance of one salesman,[64] a firm of trade marks agents,[65] a building let out on rent by a palace administration board, managing the estate of a royal family, for the benefit of the junior members of the family,[66] the activities of the Farashkhana and Baggikhana, including kapatdwara, the horse breeding and riding section of the city palace of the Jaipur Maharaja, maintaining the motor garage, museum, gardens, nursery and dairy farms belonging to the Maharaja,[67] a canteen run by a bar association,[68] canteens an hostels run by an educational institution, exclusively meant for its students,[69] the locust warning organisation of the Government of India,[70] the constructional work of a cement factory,[71]a village panchayat, constituted under the Bombay Village Panchayat Act,[72] the Visakhapatnam Dock Labour Board, constituted under the Dock Workers (Regulation Employment) Act 1948—a trust consisting of the shareholders of a property for managing the same on a no profit no loss basis,[73] the National Highways Project, controlled and managed by the public Works department of the government,[74] the activities of the public Works department of a government, relating to the construction of government buildings, such as hospitals, colleges, schools and court buildings,[75] a defence laboratory, engaged in the research for the benefit of the defence organisation of the country,[76] the activities of a Gurukul (residential school), where the students do most of the work and employees are hired only for doing heavy work; and that too only in minimal matters, so as not to destroy the non-employee character of the institution,[77] and a blacksmith in a town, working with the help of his son or assistant.[78] The activities of the Central Institute of Fisheries, Nautical and Engineering Training, which is not engaged in research, but engaged only in imparting training to personnel, in deep sea fishing and allied operations, hiring marginal employees to attend to certain minimal matters in the institute, were held not to be an industry.[79] The relief work undertaken by a state, to provide relief to drought affected people,[80] or the activities of a circulating library, run on the premises of the central railway, employing two persons, are not industries.[81] Khadi and village industries,[82] and a District Red Cross Society are industries within the meaning of s 2(j).[83] The plea, that the Posts and Telegraphs Department is not an industrial establishment, cannot be raised for the first time in appeal to the Supreme Court, in view of the fact that it did not raise the point before the industrial tribunal and no such point was argued before it, nor did it raise the plea before the High Court.[84]

'Industry' to be replaced by 'Establishment' - NCL-II

The NCL-II has recommended that the proposed Labour Management Relations Act should be made applicable to all establishments employing 20 or more Workers, irrespective of the nature of the activity in which the establishment is engaged. The commission felt that, in view of this recommendation, there was no need to define the term 'industry'.[85] The commission recommended that the term 'establishment' may be defined as 'a place or places where some activity is carried on with the help and co-operation of Workers.'[86] A registered society used as a home for children with government aid and donations is an 'industry'.[87] An auditorium, which is a recreation centre, is an 'industry' notwithstanding the fact that it is run by Army.[88]

Clause (k): INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE

Evolution

The definition of the term 'industrial dispute' is, it is no exaggeration to say, a key concept of literally, central importance in the law relating to industrial disputes. The term 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k) was defined in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, and has remained unamended since. This definition is a modification of the definition of 'trade disputes' in s 2(j) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, which in its turn, was a reproduction of s 8 of the Industrial Courts Act 1919, of the United Kingdom, which defined a 'trade dispute' as meaning:

> Any dispute or difference between employers and workmen or between workmen and workmen, connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment, or with the conditions of Labour of any person.

The definition also adds to the list of disputes, the one between 'the employers and employers'. It is rather difficult to comprehend why the Indian Parliament chose to insert the phrase 'between employers and employers' in the definition. The definition of 'trade dispute' (UK) underwent radical changes during the past three decades. Presently, it stands defined in s 218 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, as under:

> A dispute between Workers and their employer, which relates wholly or mainly, to one or more of the following:
>
> (1) terms and conditions of employment or the physical conditions which any Workers are required to work in;
>
> (2) engagement or non-engagement, or termination or suspension of employment or the duties of employment, of one or more Workers;
>
> (3) allocation of work or the duties of employment as between Workers or groups of Workers;
>
> (4) matters of discipline;
>
> (5) the membership or non-membership of a trade union, on the part of Workers;
>
> (6) facilities for officials of trade unions;
>
> (7) machinery for negotiation or consultation, and other procedures, relating to any of the foregoing matters, including the recognition by employers or employers' associations, of the right of a trade union to represent Workers in any such negotiation or consultation or in the carrying out of such procedures.

The 1992 Act of the UK replaced the phrase 'employers and workmen' by 'workers and their employer', and deleted the phrase 'between workmen and workmen'. These two changes, together with the sharp enumeration of the subjects, limit the range of disputes that can be raised or settled. It goes to the credit of the British Parliament that it has been prompt and responsive to the changing demands of the British economy. In striking contrast, the Indian Parliament left the definition of 'industrial dispute' in the same state in which it was enacted more than five decades ago. The trend in the UK is clearly in favour of a continuous monitoring and a progressive shift towards the simplification and consolidation of Labour laws, whereas, industrial law in India is left to languish for ages, with no salvation in sight, tall claims notwithstanding.[89] The definition has been the subject-matter of numerous decisions of the courts and one feature common to all the decisions is that, in the words of Desai J:

> the expression has been so widely defined as not to leave anything out of its comprehension and purview, involving the areas of conflict that may develop between the employer and the workmen and in respect of which a compulsory adjudication may not be available.[90]

This definition stated broadly, contains two limitations. Firstly, the adjective 'industrial' relates the disputes to an 'industry', as defined in s 2(j) of the Act; secondly, the definition expressly states that not disputes and differences of all sorts, but only those which bear upon the relationship of employers and workmen and the terms of employment and conditions of labour, are contemplated.[91] In other words, the definition discloses that disputes of a particular kind alone are regarded as industrial disputes. Though the definition does not refer to an industry, on the grammar of the expression 'industrial dispute' itself, the dispute means a dispute in an 'industry.[92]If such an empirical statute as the IDA can be said to be influenced by a theory of labour relations and industrial conflict, that theory is to be found in the definition of an 'industrial dispute'. The Act contemplates the resolution of industrial disputes through several modes, which include: (i) collective bargaining; (ii) conciliation or mediation; (iii) arbitration by a single or team of arbitrators chosen by the parties; and (iv) adjudication by judicial /quasi-judicial authorities. Collective bargaining is, of course, far superior to all other modes of dispute resolution in view of the fact that the parties negotiate and reach a settlement voluntarily in a spirit of give and take without any intervention from a third party. Viewed thus, community of interest is the essence of collective bargaining. This policy of the legislature is also implicit in the definition of 'industrial dispute', A collective bargaining agreement has been broadly defined by Ludwig Teller as an agreement between a single employer or an association of employers on the one hand and a labour union upon the other, which regulates the terms and conditions of employment. He further points out:

> The term 'collective', as applied to 'collective bargaining agreement', will be seen to reflect the plurality not of the employers, who may be parties thereto, but of the employees involved therein. Again, the term 'collective bargaining' is reserved to mean bargaining between an employer or a group of employers and a bona fide labour union.

In the language of Ludwig Teller again:

> The collective bargaining agreement bears in its many provisions, the imprints of decades of activity, contending for labour equality through recognition of the notions underlying collective negotiation.[1]

Indeed, in the collective bargaining agreement is to be found a culminating purpose of labour activity.[2] It is well-known how, before the days of 'collective bargaining', labour was at a great disadvantage in obtaining reasonable terms for its contract of service from its employer. As trade unions developed in the country and collective bargaining became the rule, the employers found it necessary and convenient to deal with the representatives of the workmen, instead of the individual workmen, not only for the making or modification of the contracts, but also in the matter of taking disciplinary action against one or more workmen and as regards all other disputes[3] Hence, having regard to the modern conditions of the society, where capital and labour have organised themselves into groups for the purpose of fighting their disputes and settling them on the basis of the theory that 'union is strength', collective bargaining has come to stay.[4] Collective bargaining being the order of the day in a democratic social welfare state, legitimate trade union activities, which must shun all kinds of physical threats, coercion or violence, must march with a spirit of tolerance, understanding and grace in its dealings with the employer. Such activities can flow in a healthy channel only with mutual co-operation between the employer and the employees and cannot be considered as irksome by the management, in the best interests of its business. Dialogues with the representatives of a union help in striking a delicate balance in the adjustment and settlement of various contentious claims and issues.[5] The policy behind this Act is to protect the workmen as a class, against unfair labour practices. What imparts to the dispute of a workman, the character of an 'industrial dispute', is that it affects the rights of the workmen as a class.[6] Griffith C J said:

> The word 'industrial' ... as used to the nature of quality of the disputes, ... denotes two qualities which distinguish them from ordinary private disputes between individuals, namely: (i) that the dispute relates to industrial matters, and; (ii) that on one side at least of the dispute, the disputant are a body of men acting collectively and not individually.[7]

In other words, 'an element of collective bargaining, which is the essential feature of the modern trade union movement, is necessarily involved in industrial adjudication'.[8]

Components of Definition

The definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k), can be divided into four parts for the purpose of discussion in this section as detailed below:

(a) Factum of dispute

(b) Parties to dispute;

(1) employer and employers; or

(2) employers and workmen; or

(3) workmen and workmen;

(4) individual dispute versus industrial dispute;

(5) number of workmen required for espousal of a dispute;

(6) espousal by trade unions;

(7) time of espousal;

(8) effect of subsequent support or withdrawal of support to the dispute;

(9) burden of proof.

(c) Subject-matter of dispute:

(1) employment or non-employment;

(2) contract of employment;

(3) determination of contract of employment;

(4) terms of employment, or the conditions of labour;

(5) of any person.

(d) Industry and Industrial dispute:

> The dispute should relate to an 'industry'. It is not possible to conceive an industrial dispute within the meaning of the Act, unless and until all the four conditions stand satisfied.[9]

Factum of Dispute

The key words of the definition are 'dispute' or 'difference'.[10] In Beetham v Trinidad Cement Ltd , Lord Denning, speaking for the privy council, observed:

> By definition, a 'trade dispute' exists, wherever a 'difference' exists and a 'difference' can exist long before the parties become locked in a combat. It is not necessary that they should have come to blows. It is sufficient that they should be sparring for an opening. [11]

The 'dispute' or 'difference', however, must be something fairly definite and of real substance and not a mere personal quarrel,[12] a grumbling or an agitation.[13] 'The term 'industrial dispute' connotes a real and substantial difference, having some element of persistency, and likely, if not adjusted, to endanger the industrial peace of the community'.[14] The expression 'dispute or difference', as used in the definition, therefore, means a controversy, fairly definite and of real substance, connected with the employment or non-employment, with the terms of employment or with the conditions of Labour of any person, and is one in which the contesting parties are directly interested in maintaining the respective contentions. In other words, only those controversies would fall within the definition 'in which the contestants are seeking to raise definite disputes of substance, in which both the parties are themselves directly and substantially interested'. Further, it must also be a grievance felt by the workmen, which the employer is in a position to remedy. Both the conditions must be present: it must be a grievance of the workmen themselves and it must be a grievance which the employer as an employer, is in a position to remedy or set right.[15]

Since such a dispute may arise between different parties, the definition equally contemplates disputes between 'employers and employers', or between 'employers and workmen' or between 'workmen and workmen'. The definition further shows that certain types of disputes can never fall within its ambit. For example, disputes between a government and an industrial establishment or between workmen and non-workmen, are not the kinds of disputes of which the definition takes notice.[16] As a dispute raised by the workmen by making certain demands on the employer, which he declines, becomes an industrial dispute, so also a dispute arising out of demands made by the employer and rejected by the workmen becomes an industrial dispute.[17] An 'industrial dispute' comes into existence when the employer and the workmen are at variance and the 'dispute or difference' is connected with the employment or non-employment, the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour. In other words, a dispute or difference arises when a demand is made by the workmen on the employer and it is rejected by him and vice versa.[18] In Sindhu Resettlement Corpn, the Supreme Court held that a mere demand, asking the appropriate government to refer the dispute for adjudication, without a dispute being raised by the workmen with their employer, regarding such demand, cannot become an 'industrial dispute'. Hence, an 'industrial dispute' cannot be said to 'exist' until and unless a demand is made by the workman or workmen on the employer and it has been rejected by him.[19] The Delhi High Court, in Fedders Lloyd, went a step further and held:

> "...a demand by the workmen must be raised first on the management and rejected by it, before an 'industrial' dispute can be said to arise and 'exist' and that the making of such a demand to the conciliation officer and its communication by him to the management, who rejected the demand, is not sufficient to constitute an industrial dispute."[20]

In other words, if the workmen do not make a demand on the employer, no 'industrial dispute' will come into existence. Rejection of the claim of the workmen by the employer, in the conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer, will not give rise to an 'industrial dispute'. This decision has been followed by the Orissa High Court[21] and the majority of a Full Bench of the Himachal Pradesh High Court.[22] But other High Courts have not subscribed to this view.[23] The view of the Delhi High Court, that an industrial dispute does not come into existence when the claim of the workmen made for the first time, in conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer, is rejected by the employer, is not the correct view of the law. This decision overlooks the law laid down by the Supreme Court in Bombay Union of Journalists, that an industrial dispute must be in existence or apprehended on the date of the reference. If, therefore, a demand has been made by the workmen and it has been rejected by the employer before the date of the reference, whether directly or through the conciliation officer, it would constitute an industrial dispute.[24] For making a valid reference, it is sufficient that the dispute partakes the character of an 'industrial dispute', before the date of reference[25]

In Shambhu Nath Goyal, though the workman had not made a formal demand for his reinstatement, he had contested his dismissal before the inquiry officer and claimed reinstatement. Against the findings of the inquiry officer, he preferred an appeal to the appellate authority, claiming reinstatement on the ground that his dismissal was bad in law. Then again, he claimed reinstatement before the conciliation officer in the course of the conciliation proceedings, which was contested by the employer. From these facts, the court inferred that there was unimpeachable evidence that the workman had persistently demanded reinstatement, the rejection of which brought the 'industrial dispute' into existence.[26] From this holding, it would appear that the Supreme Court has, by implication, overruled the view of the Delhi High Court. After Shambhu Nath Goyals case, another single judge of the Delhi High Court noted that Shambhu Nath Goyal had not overruled Sindhu Resettlement, but had distinguished it on facts.[27] As a matter of fact, in Shambhu Nath Goyal, the demand had actually been made on the management. The court also pointed out that the decision of the three-judge Bench in Sindhu Resettlement, could not have been overruled by a two judge Bench in Shambhu Nath Goyal. Therefore, the holding in Sindhu Resettlement, in case of any conflict between the two decisions, must prevail. In this view of law, the court held that the making of the demand by the workman on the management, was a sine qua non for giving rise to an industrial dispute. In this case, even before the conciliation officer, it was not pleaded that the termination of the service of the workman was unjustified. But the Guwahati High Court, in Animesh CD Roy, swung to the other extreme and held:

> since the employer controverted the validity of the reliefs claimed by the workman, firstly, before the chief labour officer and thereafter, before the labour court and since he is persisting in that stand right upto this date, it looks quite evident that there was a dispute between the parties of the nature referred by the lieutenant governor to the labour court.[28]

From these observations, it would appear that even if the workmen had raised no demand, either directly or before the conciliation officer, an industrial dispute will come into existence when the employer controverts the claim of the workmen before the labour court or industrial tribunal. In a dismissal case in Needle Industries, the Madras High Court held that a dispute or difference, between the management and the workman, automatically arises, when the workman is dismissed from service. The court further observed that 'it is nowhere stipulated in the Act, particularly in s 2(k), that the existence of the dispute as such, is not enough, but then there should be a demand by the workman on the management, to give rise to an industrial dispute.[29] The Calcutta High Court, in Andrew Yule, held that the contest of an application filed by the employer, under s 33(2)(b), for the approval of the action of dismissal, would itself give rise to an 'industrial dispute' with the management. No doubt, for the existence of an industrial dispute, there should be a demand by the workmen and a refusal to grant it by the management.[30] In Ramakrishna Mills, it was observed:

> How the demand should be raised cannot be a legal notion of fixity and rigidity. The grievance of the workmen and the demand for its redressal must be communicated to the management. The means and mechanism of the communication adopted are not matters of much significance, so long as the demand is that of the workmen and it reaches the management.[31]

Nowhere does the Act contemplate that an industrial dispute can come into existence in any particular, specific or prescribed manner. Nor is there any particular or prescribed manner in which the refusal should be communicated. For an 'industrial dispute' to come into existence, a written claim is not a sine qua non; except, in the case of public utility service, because s 22 forbids going on a strike without giving a strike notice. To read into the definition, the requirement of a written demand, for bringing an 'industrial dispute' into existence, would tantamount to re-writing the section. In other words, an oral demand and its rejection will as much bring into existence an industrial dispute as a written one. If the facts and circumstances of the case show that the workmen had been making the demand, which the management had been refusing to grant, it can be said that there was an 'industrial dispute' between the parties.[32] Merely because the dispute referred was not included by the workmen in their charter of demands, it could not be concluded that there was no dispute subsisting on the basis of which a reference could be made.[33]

An 'industrial dispute' need not be a 'conflict of interest' or an economic dispute; it may also be a 'conflict of rights' or a 'legal' dispute. This is to say, while an 'industrial dispute' is most usually thought of as a dispute concerned with what the terms of employment ought to be, ie, with the negotiation of New terms of employment (conflict of interest,) a dispute is equally 'connected with' the terms of employment if it is concerned with the interpretation of the existing terms or with their enforcement (conflict of rights). However, the expression 'dispute or difference' is not intended to include mere metaphysical, theoretical or philosophical controversies between employers and employees or between workmen and workmen; it will also not include mere ideological contests or differences.[34] Thus, 'a workman may have ideological differences with the employers, a workman may feel sympathetic for an employee in his own industry or in another industry; a workman may feel seriously agitated about the conditions of Labour outside our own country; but it is absurd to suggest that any of these factors would entitle a workman to raise an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of s 2(k) of the Act.[35] A dispute about whether a particular union alone, is competent to represent them, is obviously not an industrial dispute.[36] If the dispute is indefinite or vague, it might disqualify itself as an 'industrial dispute', 'by reason of its own extravagance'.[37]

In England also, from the interpretation of the expression 'trade dispute' as used in Trade Disputes Act 1906, in Conway v Wade ,[38] and Huntley v Thornton ,[39] it appears that a dispute falling literally within the four corners of the statutory definition, but having racial, religious or national discrimination as its true predominant purpose, will not be a 'trade dispute'. This, of course, is deduction; no case is directly on the point.[40] Occasionally, it may be difficult to divorce political activities from industrial activities. However, this difficulty is partly overcome by interpreting the term 'industrial dispute' by distinguishing between a political and an 'industrial dispute', as the disputes with a predominantly political purpose cannot be given the protection of the Act. However, it must be emphasised that in complex situations, found near the borderline between industrial and political disputes, the decisive legal factor is the nature of the available evidence, of the predominant purpose of either or both the disputants. In the words of Prof Grunfield:

> It need clearly be said how profoundly difficult the elucidation of a motive may be, especially when the dispute is at the heart of an economic or social crisis. It is as well that such elucidation has not yet proved necessary.[41]

A dispute not covered by anyone of the items enumerated in the Second Schedule or the Third Schedule, by itself, would not mean that it is not an 'industrial dispute'. An industrial dispute not covered by any of the items in these schedules shall be covered by the residuary item No 6, in the Second Schedule.[42] The question, whether a particular dispute is an 'industrial dispute' or not, is a question of fact.[43] The further question, whether the demand had, in fact, been made by the workmen on the employer, at the appropriate time, or the dispute was properly espoused by an adequate number of workmen etc, are also questions of fact. Such points cannot, for the first time, be raised in judicial review, but should be raised before the tribunal so that the opposite party has an opportunity to meet them and the tribunal may record a finding on the determination of facts.[44] However, such facts are jurisdictional facts, and the jurisdiction of the tribunal will depend upon their correct determination. It is well settled that a tribunal cannot give itself jurisdiction by erroneously deciding such a question of fact[45] and the determination of such facts is always open to judicial review.

In ANZ Grindlays Bank, the facts were: A long-term settlement was entered into between the Bank and All India Grindlays Bank Employees Association, which was a majority union having a membership of 66% of the employees, admittedly under s 18(1). The minority union, ie, All India Grindlays Bank Employees Federation (second respondent) did participate in the negotiations, but backed out in the last minute and refused to sign the settlement, with the result the management signed the settlement on 18-8-1996 with the majority union, ie, the Employees Association. On 6 December 1997 Grindlays Bank Employees Union, Calcutta, a constituent of the Employees Federation representing 13% of the workmen of the Bank accepted the terms of the settlement dated 18 August 1996 by signing a separate settlement on 6 December 1997. The Bank offered to extend the benefits of the said bi-partite settlement to the employees, who were not members of the Association, subject to the condition that they accept the terms of settlement in writing. The Federation thereafter informed the conciliation officer on 19 August 1996 that it had not signed the settlement and that the signing of the settlement by the Bank with the Association (third respondent) amounted to unfair labour practice The Government referred the dispute raised by the Federation for adjudication in December 1998 in terms: "Whether the terms of bipartite settlement dated 18-8-1996, between the management of ANZ Grindlays Bank Limited, and All Indian Grindlays Bank Employees Association which bound withholding of benefits of settlement to workmen who are not members of All India Grindlays Bank Employees Association until the individual gives acceptance of the settlement in the given format is legal and justified? If not, what relief are the workmen entitled to?" The writ petition filed by the Bank challenging the said reference was dismissed at both the tiers of the Bombay High Court. The contention of the Bank before the Supreme Court centred round, inter alia, the question was whether there was any dispute or difference at all between the parties as defined in s 2(k), which calls for a reference and adjudication?

It is considered expedient to discuss this case in some detail, if for nothing else, to expose the gross abuse of power by the government, while functioning under s 10(1) in vital matters which affect the lives of workmen and the industrial community, not to speak of industrial peace and harmony. The case disclosed a complex set of facts, such as: (i) multiple unions in the Bank; (ii) negotiations between the Bank and the unions and the consequent settlement arrived at under s 18(1) with the majority union, ie, the Employees Association; (iii) the minority union, ie, the Employees Federation, backing out in the last minute and refusing to sign the settlement; (iv) management's offer to extend the increases agreed to in the settlement even to the employees who are not members of any union, subject to their giving individual letters (receipts) to the effect that they accept the terms of settlement as binding on them; (v) contrary to the stand taken by the Employees Federation, one of its constituents, ie, Employees Union, representing 13% of employees, accepting the terms of settlement by signing a separate settlement with the Bank in December 1997; (vi) a substantial number of employees, who were not members of either union, also accepting the terms of settlement by granting individual receipts to the Bank; (vii) in all, some 99% of the Award staff accepting the settlement and/or granting the receipt and receiving the benefits accruing therefrom; and (viii) a small minority of 29 employees, out of the total complement of the Bank, refusing to sign the settlement and raising objections thereto. Adverting to the issues raised in the case: the Bank expressed its willingness to extend the benefits agreed to under the settlement to even the workers not belonging to any union including the members of the Federation. In order to facilitate the extension of said benefits, the Bank prepared a draft undertaking, which ran thus:

> To
>
> The Manager
>
> ANZ Grindlays Bank Limited.
>
> Sir,
>
> The terms and conditions of the settlement dated August 18, 1996 between the Management of ANZ Grindlays Bank and their workmen represented by All India Grindlays Bank Employees' Association in respect of the various demands have been perused by me. I accept the settlement and the same will be binding on me. I undertake to receive the benefits in terms of the conditions set out in the settlement. I, therefore, request you to release the benefits accruing to me under the same.
>
> This may be construed as my receipt towards payment/receipt of grant under the subject settlement.
>
> Sd/-
>
> SIGNATURE

This draft undertaking proposed by the management, though perfectly reasonable, was contested by the Employees Federation, which informed the conciliation officer that, in signing a settlement with the Employees Association (which was the majority union), the Bank committed an unfair labour practice. On the failure of the conciliation, the Central Government made a reference of the so-called dispute in a mechanical fashion with absolutely no application of mind and without assessing whether, in the first place, any industrial dispute existed at all between the parties. What dispute could be there in a situation where a settlement was signed between the management and the majority union and some 99% of the employees accepted the terms of the settlement? Is it possible that the Government of India was so blind to this glaring fact that it should proceed to make a reference of the so-called dispute, which never existed in substantial terms, given the fact that collective bargaining is one of the modes through which disputes are resolved between the employer and his employees in a spirit of give-and-take? Is it what s 18(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act stands for? While quashing the flawed reference made by the Central Government, which reference struck at the root of collective bargaining and bipartism, Mathur J (for self and Sema J), observed:

> ... learned counsel for the Federation (second respondent), has submitted that under the settlement such employees of the bank, who were not members of the Association (third respondent), were required to give a receipt in writing in order to avail of the benefits of the settlement and this was clearly illegal. We are unable to accept the submission made. As already stated, the settlement was arrived at between the Bank and the Association (third respondent) and by virtue of sub-section (1) of Section 18 of the Act it bound only the members of the Association (third respondent). However, the Bank also extended the benefit of settlement to such other employees, who were not members of the Association. In order to avail of the benefit they had to give a receipt that they were accepting the settlement and the same shall be binding upon them and the format of the receipt, which has been reproduced earlier, does not contain any such term, which may be of detriment to them. To protect its interest the Bank was perfectly justified in asking for a receipt from those employees, who were not members of the Association (third respondent), but wanted to avail of the benefit of the settlement. Therefore, we do not find anything wrong in the Bank asking for a receipt from the aforesaid category of employees. ... A plain reading of the reference made by the Central Government would show that it does not refer to any dispute or apprehended dispute between the Bank and the Federation (second respondent). It does not refer to any demand or claim made by the Federation or alleged refusal thereof by the Bank. In such circumstances, it is not possible to hold that on account of the settlement dated 18-8-1996 arrived at between the Bank and the Association (third respondent), any dispute or apprehended dispute has come into existence between the Bank and the Federation (second respondent). The action of the Bank in asking for a receipt from those employees, who are not members of the Association (third respondent) but wanted to avail of the benefit of the settlement, again does not give rise to any kind of dispute between the Bank and the Federation (second respondent). Thus, the reference made by the Central Government by the order dated 29-12-1997 for adjudication by the Industrial Tribunal is wholly redundant and uncalled for.[46] (Paras 9 & 11) (Italics supplied).

The above observations are self-explanatory and do not call for separate analysis. It goes to the credit of Mathur J, that he categorically rejected the executive perversions of alarming proportions that manifested in the said reference, which were more frivolous and vexatious than the dispute raised by the Employees Federation. This case was rightly decided and Mathur J, deserves full compliment from the industrial community for upholding the cause of collective bargaining as well as the sanctity of a fair settlement reached in the course thereof. Yet another illustration of arbitrary and callous exercise of power by the government is furnished by Sindhu Resettlement Corporation (supra) - in which the government enlarged the scope of the dispute unilaterally by making a reference in terms "whether the retrenchment effected by the management was justified and if not to what relief the workman is entitled", whereas the dispute raised by the workman was merely confined to the payment of retrenchment compensation and not to the legality or justifiability of retrenchment. This case has already been discussed above. ANZ Grindlays Bank is the second case of abuse of Executive power and is worse than Sindhu Resettlement Corporation, in so far as the government referred a non-existent dispute for adjudication!

Parties to the Dispute

Employers and Employees

The words 'employers and employers' have presumably been enacted with a view to widen the scope of the definition of 'industrial dispute', to take into its scope and ambit, the eventualities in certain types of disputes connected with the employment or non-employment, the terms, employment or the conditions of labour of any person, in which there may be some interest; for instance wage war-fare in an area where labour is scarce and disputes of like character.[47] These words appear to have been added ex abundanti cautela. In the analogous definitions of 'trade dispute' in the English statutes and 'industrial dispute' in the Australian statutes, these words do not find place. These words did not even occur in the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. There is, so far, no decided case on the construction of these words.

---

1 Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees' Union of Australia v Melbourne Corpn 26 CLR 508.

2 Madras GCE Union v Gymbkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

3 Des Raj v State of Punjab (1988) 2 LLJ 149 [LNIND 1988 SC 240], 162 (SC) : AIR 1988 SC 1182 [LNIND 1988 SC 680]: (1988) 2 SCC 537 [LNIND 1988 SC 680], per Ranganath Misra J.

4 Mgmt of FICCI v RK Mittal (1971) 2 LLJ 630 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], 635 (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

5 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 257 (SC), per Gajendragadkhar J.

6 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 271 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

7 Mgmt of FICCI v RK Mittal (1971) 2 LLJ 630 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], 635 (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

8 Mazagon Dock Ltd v CIT (1958) 34 ITR 367 -68 (SC), per Venkataramaayyar J.

9 National Assn of Local Governmmt Officers v Balton Corpn [1943] AC 166, 184 (HL), per Lord Wright J.

10 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1962, 3rd ed, Vol 38, p 9.

11 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180] (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

12 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 486 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

13 Mgmt of Bihar KG Udyog Sangh v State of Bihar (1971) Lab IC 466, 478 (Pat) (DB), per SK Jha J.

14 Madras GCE Union v Mgmt (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 730 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

15 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee (1953) 1 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1952 SC 85], 199 (SC), per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

16 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 486 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

17 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

18 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 256 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

19 Partidge v Mallandaine (1886) 18 QBD 276; Krishna Menon v CIT (1959) 35 ITR 48 [LNIND 1958 SC 122] (SC), per Sarkar J.

20 Bangalore WSSSB v A Rajappa (1978) Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 477 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

21 Jumbunna Coal Mine, No Liability v Victorian Coal Miners' Assn 6 CLR 309, 370 (HCA), per Isaacs J.

22 Shankar Balaji Waje v State of Maharashtra (1962) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1961 SC 342] (SC), per Raghubar Dayal J.

23 Ingham v Hie Lee 15 CLR 267, per Griffith CJ.

24 Partridge v Mallandaine [1886] 18 QBD 276.

25 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 729 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 554 [LNIND 1967 SC 291]: [1968] 1 SCR 742 [LNIND 1967 SC 291], per Hidayatullah J.

26 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 272 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

27 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee (1953) 1 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1952 SC 85], 199 (SC), per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

28 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoorsabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 257 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

29 Ahmedabad TI Research Assn v State of Bombay (1960) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1960 SC 273], 722 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

30 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 531 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

31 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

32 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 272 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

33 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 535 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

34 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89],475 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

35 Workmen of Indian Standards Institution v Mgmt (1976) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], 39 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

36 DN Banerjee v PR Mukherjee (1953) 1 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1952 SC 85] (SC), per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

37 Baroda Borough Municipality v Workmen (1957) 1 LLJ 8 [LNIND 1956 SC 94] (SC), per Das J.

38 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 725 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

39 Bangalore WSS Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 484 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

40 Workmen of Indian Standards Institution v Mgmt of Indian Standards Institution (1976) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], 46 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 145 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], per Bhagwati J.

41 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Its Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 675 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], per Subba Rao J.

42 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 488 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

43 Madras GCE Union v Mgmt (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 726 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

44 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 610 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], per Gajendragadkar J.

45 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245 (FC), per Mahajan J.

46 National Union of Commercial Employees v Meher (1962) 1 LLJ 241 [LNIND 1962 SC 66], 247 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

47 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 534 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

48 Ahmedabad Textile Industry's Research Assn v State of Bombay (1960) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1960 SC 273] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 484 [LNIND 1960 SC 273], per Wanchoo J.

49 National Union of Commercial Employees v MR Meher (1962) 1 LLJ 241 [LNIND 1962 SC 66] (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1080 [LNIND 1962 SC 66], per Gajendragadkar J.

50 Harinagar Cane Farm v State of Bihar (1963) 1 LLJ 692 [LNIND 1963 SC 71] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 903 [LNIND 1963 SC 71], per Gajendragadkar J.

51 University of Delhi v Ramnath (1963) 2 LLJ 335 [LNIND 1963 SC 89] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1873 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], per Gajendragadkar J.

52 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (727-32) (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 554 [LNIND 1967 SC 291], per Hidayatullah J.

53 Cricket Club of India v Bombay Labour Union (1969) 2 LLJ 775 (SC), per Shelat J.

54 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 274 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

55 Bombay Pinjrapol v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 393 [LNIND 1971 SC 382] (SC), per Mitter J.

56 Mgmt of the ICCI v RK Mittal (1971) 2 LLJ 630 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], 645 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 763 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], per Jaganrnohan Reddy J.

57 Workmen of Indian Standards Institution v Management of Indian Standards Institution, (1976) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], 39 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 145 [LNIND 1975 SC 389]: (1975) 2 SCC 847 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], per Bhagwati J.

58 Workmen of Indian Standards Institution v Management of Indian Standards Institution (1976) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], 46 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 145 [LNIND 1975 SC 389].

59 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

60 Ibid. 1978 Lab IC 778 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

61 Ibid. 780-81 (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

62 Ibid, 477-78.

63 Ibid, 484.

64 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee AIR 1953 SC 58 [LNIND 1952 SC 85]: [1953] 4 SCR 302 [LNIND 1952 SC 85].

65 AIR 1963 SC 1873 [LNIND 1963 SC 89].

66 AIR 1960 SC 675 [LNIND 1960 SC 32].

67 AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180].

68 AIR 1962 SC 1080 [LNIND 1962 SC 66].

69 AIR 1968 SC 554 [LNIND 1967 SC 291].

70 AIR 1963 SC 1873 [LNIND 1963 SC 89].

71 AIR 1975 SC 2032 [LNIND 1975 SC 280].

72 AIR 1960 SC 610 [LNIND 1960 SC 19].

73 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 273 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

74 National Union of Comml. Employees v M.R. Meher (1962) 1 LLJ 241 [LNIND 1962 SC 66], 246 (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1080 [LNIND 1962 SC 66], per Gajendergadkar J.

75 Madras GC Employees Union v Madras Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292]-21 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

76 Cricket Club of India v Bombay Labour Union, (1969) 1 LLJ 775 [LNIND 1968 SC 198] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 276 [LNIND 1968 SC 198], per Bhargava J.

77 University of Delhi v Ram Nath AIR 1963 SC 1873 [LNIND 1963 SC 89]: (1963) 2 LJ 335 (SC).

78 Chief Conservator of Forests v JM Kondhare (1996) 1 LLJ 1223 [LNIND 1995 SC 1252]-25 (SC), per Hansaria J.

79 Mgmt of FICCI v RK Mittal (1971) 2 LLJ 630 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], 645 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 763 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

80 R Sreenavasa Rao v LC, Hyderabad 1990 Lab IC 174, 179 (AP), per Jagannadha Rao J.

81 Umashankar Jaswal v Royalauto Centre (1998) 2 LLN 755 (Bom), per Lodha J.

82 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees' Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 731, per Hidayatullah J.

83 Richard Coomber v Justices of the County of Berks (1883-84) 9 AC 61, 74.

84 Federated State School Teachers' Assn v State of Victoria 41 CLR 569, 585, per lsaacs J.

85 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 726 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

86 All India Radio v Shri Santosh Kumar (1998) 1 LLJ 817 (SC).

87 State of Punjab v Kuldip Singh (1983) 1 LLJ 309, 314 (P&H) (FB) : (1982) ILR 2 P& H 544, per Sandhawalia CJ.

88 Sub-Divisional Inspector of Post, v Theyyam joseph (1996) 2 LLJ 230 [LNIND 1996 SC 256] (SC) : (1996) 8 SCC 489 [LNIND 1996 SC 256] : AIR 1996 SC 1271 [LNIND 1996 SC 256].

89 Bombay Telephone Canteen Employees Assn v Union of India (1997) 2 LLJ 647 [LNIND 1997 SC 904] (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 2817 [LNIND 1997 SC 904]: (1997) 6 SCC 723 [LNIND 1997 SC 904].

90 General Manager, Telecom v Srinivasan Rao AIR 1998 SC 656 [LNIND 1997 SC 1448]: (1997) 8 SCC SCC 767, per Verma CJI.

91 GM Telecom Factory v HR Thakur (1998) 3 LLN 154 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

92 Executive Engineer v K Somasetty (1997) 2 LLJ 698 [LNIND 1997 SC 778]-99 (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 2663 [LNIND 1997 SC 778]: (1997) 5 SCC 434 [LNIND 1997 SC 778].

93 Dhyaneshwar B Ganwat v Karyakari AGP Vibhag (2010) 4 LLJ 403 (Bom), per Ms Mhatre J.

94 State of Gujarat v Maniben Viraji (2003) 4 LLJ 936 (Guj) per Rathod J.

95 State of Gujarat v Deenani Bidhaji Thakore (2003) 3 LLJ 630 (Guj) (DB), per Shethna J.

1 State of Rajasthan v Judge, LC, (2003) 4 LLJ 897 (Raj), per Sharma J.

2 Mohd Rajmohammad v IT-cum-LC, (2003) 2 LLJ 1149 (AP), per Ramulu J.

3 Employees' State Insurance Corpn v Hyderabad Race Club, (2004) 6 SCC 191 : AIR 2004 SC 3972 : (2004) 3 LJ 547.

4 Bangalore Turf Club v Regional Director, ESIC, AIR 2009 SC 2965 [LNIND 2009 SC 1021]: (2009) 15 SCC 33 [LNIND 2009 SC 1021] : (2009) 3 LJ 570.

5 Agricultural Produce Market Committee v Ashok Harakuni (2000) 2 LLJ 1382 [LNIND 2000 SC 1293] (SC), per Misra J.

6 CA Ribeiro v Directorate of Health Services, Govt of Goa (1999) 3 LLN 517 (Bom) (DB), per Batta J.

7 Tungabhadra Board v Easu (1999) 4 LLN 1051 [LNIND 1999 KANT 132] (Kant) (DB), per Ashok Bhan J.

8 ZCE, UP fal Nigam v PO, LC (2001) 4 LLN 1190 (All), per Anjani Kumar J.

9 Centre of Indian Trade Unions v State of Madhya Pradesh (2002) 2 LLN 256 (MP), per Mishra J.

10 Exec Engineer, YMP Division v Anant (1999) 1 LLN 155 (Bom), per Rebello J.

11 Exec Engineer, CPWD v MP Kolharkar (2000) 2 LLJ 1410 (SC).

12 Najeema Beevi v Public Service Commission (1983) 1 LLJ 433, 435 (Ker), per Subramanian Poti Ag CJ.

13 Umayammal v State of Kerala (1982) KLT 829 [LNIND 1982 KER 202] (Ker) (FB).

14 HK Makwana v State of Gujarat (1995) 1 LLT 801, 816 (Guj) (FB), per MB Shah J.

15 Vinodrai N Ratnotar v State of Gujarat (1995) 1 LLJ 388, 392 (Guj) (DB), per P Bhat J.

16 Hussen M Mhasvadkar v Bombay Iron and Steel Labour Board 1991 Lab IC 1385 (Bom), per Dhanuka J.

17 Rathinam v Tamilnadu State Housing Board (1996) 1 LLJ 155, 159 (Mad), per PS Mishra CJ.

18 Baljit Singh v State of Haryana (1996) 1 LLJ 246 (P&H), per GS Singhvi J.

19 Kanhaiya Lal v State of Rajasthan (1994) 2 LLJ 474, 477 (Raj), per GS Singhvi J.

20 Mohanan v State of Kerala (1994) 2 LLJ 1041 -42 (Ker), per Thulasidas J.

21 Chief Conservator of Forest v Jagannath Maruti Khondhari (1996) 1 LLJ 1223 [LNIND 1995 SC 1252] (SC).

22 Rajendrasinhji Institute v Maharashtra Labour Union (2003) 4 LLJ 379 (Bom), per Mhatre J.

23 State of Gujarat v PN Parmar (2001) 2 LLN 41 (SC).

24 Ibid, 43.

25 Haribhau v State of Maharashtra (2002) 2 LLN 689 (Bom) (DB), per Lodha J.

26 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 261 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

27 (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32]-40 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

28 Muthayyan v Manager, Kuilur Estate (1982) 1 LLJ 23, 27 (Ker), per Khalid J.

29 Sumer Chand v LC, 1990 Lab IC 85 [LNIND 1989 PNH 391] (NOC) (P& H) (DB).

30 Karthiam v Union of India (1984) 1 LLJ 259, 271 (Ker) (DB) : ILR 1984 (1) LJ 259, per Sivaraman Nair J.

31 Jagdish Prasad Sinha v PO, LC (1992) 2 LLJ 33 -35 (All) : (1991) 62 FLR 562, per Sahay J.

32 Ramkishan v Samrat Ashok Technical Institute (1995) 1 LLJ 944 [LNIND 1994 MP 92], 947 (MP), per Dwivedi J.

33 T Rajan v State of Kerala (1994) 2 LLJ 236, 238; 1994 Lab IC 1321 (Ker), per Guttal J.

34 Suresh Chandra Mathe v Jiwaji University, Gwalior (1994) 2 LLJ 462 (MP) (DB), per Chawla J.

35 Miss A Sundrambal v Government of Goa, Daman & Diu (1988) 1 LLJ 61 -62 (SC), per Venkatarariah J.

36 Ruth Soren v Managing Committee, East ISSDA (2001) 1 LLN 918 (SC), per Rajendra Babu J.

37 Technical Teachers Trg Institute v HN Ghatt (1998) 2 LLN 891 (MP), per Dharmadhikari J.

38 Kamyani Vidya Mandir v Sangeeta E Sanghpal (2008) 1 LLJ 712 [LNIND 2007 BOM 1145] (Bom .): (2007) 6 Bom CR 500 [LNIND 2007 BOM 1145], per Ms Mhatre J.

39 Ahmedabad Textile IR Assn v State of Bombay (1960) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1960 SC 273] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 484 [LNIND 1960 SC 273], per Wanchoo J.

40 Physical Research Laboratory v KG Sharma (1997) 2 LLJ 625 [LNIND 1997 SC 648] : AIR 1997 SC 1855 [LNIND 1997 SC 648]: (1997) 4 SCC 257 [LNIND 1997 SC 648].

41 Central Rainfed URR Institute v Union of India (2002) 2 LLN 655 (Jhar), per Mukhopadhyaya J.

42 Workmen of Fire Brigade Section of Municipal Committee v KL Gosain 1970 Lab IC 863 -64 (P&H), per Sodhi J.

43 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 531 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

44 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 725 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

45 Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees Union of Australia v Melbourne Corpn 26 CLR 508, 530.

46 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 258 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

47 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee (1953) 1 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1952 SC 85] (SC), per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

48 Baroda Borough Municipality v Workmen (1957) 1 LLJ 8 [LNIND 1956 SC 94] (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 110 [LNIND 1956 SC 94]: (1957) 1 SCR 33 [LNIND 1956 SC 94], per SK Das J.

49 (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 531 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

50 Municipal Committee, Raikotv Ram Laljain (1965) 1 LLJ 652 (Punj) (DB), per Grover J.

51 Municipal Committee, Bhiwani v Padam Singh 1973 Lab IC 1512 (P&H) (DB), per Pandit J.

52 Administrator of the City of Nagpur v LC 1967 Lab IC 107 (Bom) (DB), per Deshmukh J.

53 Sirur Municipality v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 657 [LNIND 1960 BOM 38] (Bom) (DB), per Desai J.

54 Rajendarnagar Municipality v BV Perraju 1995 Lab IC 2102, 2106 (AP), per BK Somasekhara J.

55 Muzaffarpur Regional Dev Authority v Jagannath Jha (2009) 1 LLJ 783 (Pat) (DB) : (2008) 2 PJR 120.

56 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 610 [LNIND 1960 SC 19]: [1960] 2 SCR 866 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], per Gajendragadkar J.

57 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 510-11 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

58 Indraprastha Medical Corpn v Govt of NCT, Delhi (2001) 3 LLN 562 (Del), per Sen J.

59 Bangalore WSSB v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 778, 782 (SC) per Chandrachud CJI.

60 Madras Pinjrapole v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 399 (Mad), per Kailasarn J.

61 Bombay Pinjrapole v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 393 [LNIND 1971 SC 382] (SC), per Mitter J.

62 Nathaniel Masih v UP Scheduled Caste Finance and Development Corpn Ltd (1991) 2 LIJ 347(All) (DB), per UC Srivastava J.

63 Shri Devadeveshwar Sansthan v SR Kadu (2002) 3 LLN 945 (Bom), per Mhatre J.

64 Ibid, 505, 513.

65 Harihar Bahinipati v State of Orissa (1965) 1 LLJ 501 (Ori) (DB), per Barman J.

66 Mgr, SP Jain Derasar v MG Balock (1993) 1 LLJ 523, 525 (Cuj) (DB), per Nanavati J.

67 Shri Cutchi Visa Oswal Derawasi Jain Mahajan Trust v BD Borude, IT (1987) 1 LLJ 81 [LNIND 1986 BOM 231], 84 (Bom), per Pendse J.

68 Workmen of Baikuntha Nath Debasthan Trust v State of WB 1990 Lab IC 1586 (Cal).

69 Jagbir Singh v State of Himachal Pradesh (1999) 2 LLJ 304 (HP) (DB), per Sharma J.

70 Tiruchendur ASKOP Sangam v EO, AS Devasthanam (2003) 4 LLJ 390 (Mad .) per Kanakaraj J.

71 Shiromani GP Committee v PO, LC (2003) 4 LLJ 1060 (P & H), per MS Gill J.

72 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89], 486 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 358 : 1986 Supp SCC 698, per Krishna Iyer J.

73 Corpn of City of Nagpur v Employees (1960) 1 LLJ 523 [LNIND 1960 SC 32], 535 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

74 PMM Mudaliar, Rathina Mudaliar and Sons v Raju Mudaliar (1965) 1 LLJ 489, 500 (Mys) (DB), per Govinda Bhatt J.

75 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 258-59 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

76 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees' Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

77 Firm Tulsiram Sadanand Sarda v ACL (1961) 1 LLJ 711 (Bom) (DB), per Badkas J.

78 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1910) 2 LLJ 266 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

79 Rangaswamy v Registrar of Union (1961) 1 LLJ 599 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

80 Palace Administration Board v State of Kerala (1960) 1 LLJ 178 (Ker), per TK Joseph J.

81 Bhowra Colliery v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 378 [LNIND 1962 SC 38] (SC), per Sarkar J. .

82 Hanshree Apartment Owners'Assn v Hanshree Apartment Owner's Employees' Union (1992) 2 LLJ 423 [LNIND 1991 CAL 68], 425 (Cal), per Ganguli J.

83 Mgmt of Som Vihar Apartment Owners v Workmen (2002) 9 SCC 652 : AIR 2002 SC 2530 .

84 Md Manjur v Shyam Kunj Occupants Society AIR 2005 SC 1501 [LNIND 2004 SC 1340].

85 Commr of Inland Revenue v Maxse (1919) 1 KB 647, 657, per Scrutton LJ.

86 NE Merchant v Bombay Municipal Corpn (1968) 1 LLL 187, 190 (Bom), per Palekar J.

87 Fraser & Ross v Sambasiva Ayyar (1968) 1 LLJ 682 [LNIND 1968 MAD 1], 689 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1968 Mad 134, per Ananthanarayanan CJ.

88 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 273 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

89 Federated Municipal...Employees' Union v Melbourne Corpn 26 CLR 508, 554, per Isaacs and Rich JJ.

90 Ibid, 497-99, per Chandrachud CJI.

91 Bangalore Water Supply and Sewerage Board v A Rdjappa 1978 Lab IC 778, 783 (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

92 Ratilal B Ravji v Tata Sports Club (1998) 1 LLJ 485, 492 (Bom), per Lodha J.

93 Manat of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 275 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

94 Bangalore Water Supply v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 548 [LNIND 1978 SC 70]: (1978) 2 SCC 213 [LNIND 1978 SC 70], per Krishna Iyer J.

95 National Union of Commercial Employees v MR Meher (1962) 1 LLJ 241 [LNIND 1962 SC 66] (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1080 [LNIND 1962 SC 66], per Gajendragadkar J.

96 Rabindra Nath Sen v First IT of WB (1963) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1962 CAL 172], 579 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

1 Ramakrishna Ayyar Vaidyanathan v Fifth Industrial Tribunal of WB (1968) 2 LLJ 597 [LNIND 1967 CAL 98] (Cal) : AIR 1968 SC 159, per DC Misra J.

2 TK Menon and Co v District Labour Officer (1966) 2 LLJ 613 (Ker) (DB) : AIR 1967 Ker 31, per Krishnamurthi Ayyar J.

3 Fraser & Ross v Sambasiva Ayyar (1968) 1 LLJ 682 [LNIND 1968 MAD 1], 693 (DB), per Ananthanarayanan CJ.

4 NE Merchant v Bombay Municipal Corpn (1968) 1 LLJ 187 (Bom) (DB), per Palekar J.

5 Bangalore WSSB v A Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 387 -88 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

6 Ibid, 388.

7 Entries 14 and 18 of the list 2 of the seventh schedule of the Constitution of India.

8 Entry 22 of list 3 of the seventh schedule of the Constitution of India.

9 Entry 24, Ibid.

10 Rajamanickam M v Mgmt of State Farm (2010) 1 LLJ 54 [LNIND 2009 MAD 2388] (Mad), per S J Mukhopadhyaya J.

11 Delhi Agricultural Mktg Board v Satya Pal Singh Dabas (2003) 4 LLJ 1039 (Del), per Mudgal J.

12 Baljeet Singh v Mgmt of State Farms Mgmt of India Ltd (2009) 1 LLJ 63 [LNIND 2008 DEL 1286] (Del) : (2010) 1 SLR 349, per Sikri J.

13 Harinagar Cane Farm v State of Bihar (1963) 1 LLJ 692 [LNIND 1963 SC 71] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 903 [LNIND 1963 SC 71]: [1964] 2 SCR 458 [LNIND 1963 SC 71], per Gajendragadkar J.

14 Maheshwar Rao v State of Orissa (1974) 2 LLJ 127, 129 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

15 Royal Calcutta Golf Club Mazdoor Union v State of West Bengal (1957) 1 LLJ 218 [LNIND 1956 CAL 118], 222 (Cal), per Sinha J.

16 (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

17 (1969) 1 LLJ 775 [LNIND 1968 SC 198] (SC), per Bhargawa J.

18 (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180] (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

19 Hotel & CIT Board v Automobile Proprietary Ltd, (1968) 3 All ER 399 (CA), per Lord Denning MR.

20 Inland Revenue Commr v Eccentric Club Ltd [1924] 1 KB 390, 421.

21 Juggilal Kamlapat v Commr of Income-Tax AIR 1969 SC 932, per Ramaswami J.

22 LCB Gower, Gower's Principles of Modem Company Law, 4th ed, 1979, p 112 et seq.

23 Tata Engg and Loco Co Ltd v State of Bihar AIR 1965 SC 40, 47 : [1964] 6 SCR 885 [LNIND 1964 SC 49], per Gajendragakdar CJI.

24 Queen v Marshall and Exp Federated Clerks Union of Australia (1975) 132 CLR 595.

25 Rajasthan RSS Vyavasthapak Union v IT 1985 Lab IC 1023 (Raj) (DB), per Kasliwal J.

26 Abhimanu v Union Territory of Chandigarh (2002) 4 LLJ 1204, per MS Gill J.

27 Lalit Hari AC Pharmacy v Lalit Hari ACP Workers' Union (1960) 2 LLJ 250 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

28 Registrar of Trade Unions v Mihir Kumar Gooha (1963) 1 LLJ 100 [LNIND 1962 CAL 145] (Cal) (DB), per Sinha J.

29 KC Das v State of West Bengal (1960) 2 LLJ 505 [LNIND 1959 CAL 145] (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

30 Co-operative Milk Societies' Union Ltd v State of WB (1958) 2 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1958 CAL 65] Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

31 Central Hair Cutting Saloon v Hrishikesh Pramanik (1956) 1 LLJ 596 (LAT).

32 Travancore Devaswom Board v State of Kerala (1963) 2 LLJ 218 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

33 VA Chedda v Bambai Mazdoor Union 1973 Lab IC 697 (Bom), per Vaidaya J.

34 Jaipur Milk Supply Scheme v LC 1976 Lab IC 863, 866 (Raj), per Lodha J.

35 Mgmt of Bihar KG Udyogsangh v State of Bihar 1977 Lab IC 466 [LNIND 1984 SC 252], 473 (Pat) (DB), per SK Jha J.

36 State of Rajasthan v IT (1970) Raj LW 137 (Raj).

37 Madhya Pradesh IK Sangh v State of MP (1972) 1 LLJ 374 (MP) (DB), per SMN Raina J.

38 Chief Engineer, Irrigation, Orissa v Harihar Patra 1977 Lab IC 1033 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

39 Somu Kumar Chatterjee v District STC Engineer (1970) 2 LLJ 179, 187 (Pat) (DB), per Jha J.

40 Executive Engineer, CLA Division v Surjit Raj, Store Chowkidar (1995) 1 LLJ 41, 42, per Bala J.

41 Tea Board v First IT, West Bengal 1978 Lab IC (NOC) 179 (Cal) (DB).

42 Bihar Relief Committee v State of Bihar 1979 Lab IC 445 (Pat) (DB), per BS Sinha J.

43 JN Singh & Co Pvt Ltd v SN Saxena 1976 Lab IC 840 (All), per Hari Swarup J.

44 Mgmt of RFE Ltd v State of Bihar 1970 Lab I C 1119, 1123 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

45 Ananda Chandra Swain v State of Orissa (1973) 1 LLJ 508, 510 (Ori) (DB), per Panda J.

46 Tapan Kumar Jana v General Manager, Calcutta Telephones 1981 Lab IC (NOC) 68 (Cal) (DB).

47 Kunjan Bhaskaran v SDO, Telegraphs Changanassery 1983 Lab IC 135, 141 (Ker), per MP Menon J.

48 Shops & Commercial Workers' Union v Mgmt of AUTC Board 1980 Lab IC 892 (Del), per Sachar J.

49 Security Paper Mill v Hari Shankar Namdeo (1980) 2 LLJ 61, 63 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

50 PWD Employees Union v State of Gujarat 1987 Lab IC 89, 96 (Guj) (DB), per Mehta JJ.

51 Vasudeo Ambre v State of Maharashtra (1988) 1 LLJ 464 [LNIND 1987 BOM 469], 465 (Bom) (DB), per Bharucha J.

52 Mahila Samiti, Tikamgarh v State of Madhya Pradesh 1989 Lab IC 891 (MP) (DB), per BC Verma J.

53 Suresh Kumar v Union of India (1989) 2 LLJ 110 [LNIND 1989 DEL 18], 112 (Del), per Kirpal J.

54 Satyendra Singh Rathore v Rajasthan RPP Mandal (1989) 2 LLJ 289, 292 (Raj) (DB), per Byas J.

55 Union of India v Rajendra Kumar (2005) 4 LLJ 808 (Utt), per Tandon J.

56 State of Gujarat v Ramesh M Rathod (2004) 2 LLJ 434 (Guj .) (DB).

57 MP Police Housing Corporation v Sher Singh (2012) 4 LLJ 146 (MP) (DB) : (2013) 1 SCT 78.

58 Nathaniel Masih v UP Scheduled Caste FDC td 1989 Lab IC 2276, 2278 (All) (DB), per Srivastava J.

59 Karnani Properties Ltd v State of WB 1990 Lab IC 1677 [LNIND 1990 SC 449], 1682 (SC), per SC Agarwal J.

60 Mahila Griha Udyog v Ratantmala D Koken 1996 Lab IC 644 (Bom), per Lodha J.

61 Visakhapatnam Dock Labour Board v Stevedor's Assn (1970) 1 LLJ 46 [LNIND 1969 SC 324], 57 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1625 : (1969) 2 SCC 801, per Vaidialingam J.

62 Workmen of Calcutta Dock Labour Board v Employers (1973) 2 LLJ 254 [LNIND 1973 SC 177], 258 (SC), per Grover J.

63 Mgmtof DLB, Visakhapatnam v IT (1996) 1 LLJ 5 -6 (AP), per Rama Krishnan Raju J.

64 PM Murugappa Mudaliar, RM & Sons v P Raju Mudaliar (1965) 1 LLJ 489, 500 (Mys) (DB), per Govinda Bhatt J.

65 William Frederic De Penning v Third Industrial Tribual AIR 1959 Cal 749, per Sinha J.

66 Palace Administraton Board v State of Kerala (1960) 1 LLJ 178 (Ker), per TK Joseph J.

67 Bhawani Singh v judge, IT 1976 Lab IC 76 (Raj), per Lodha J.

68 Bar Assn Canteen v Chief Commr, Delhi (1967) 2 LLJ 226 (Punj), per SK Kapur J.

69 Brahma Samaj Education Society v WBC Employees' Assn (1964) 1 LLJ 326 [LNIND 1963 CAL 120] (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

70 Bhopal Singh v Union of India 1977 Lab IC 494 (Raj), per Rajinder Sachar J.

71 Jamul Cement Works v State Industrial Court (1968) 1 LLJ 131 (MP) (DB).

72 Gram Panchayat, Sawargaon v Jamnaprasad R Prasad (1968) 1 LLJ 222 (Bom) (DB), per Abyankar J.

73 Atma Ram v IT 1968 Lab IC 1546 (Del), per Shankar J.

74 Suptdg Engineer, National Highway Project v Baidar Lenka 1973 Lab IC 553, 554 (Ori) (DB), per GK Misra CJ.

75 D Padmanabhan v State of Tamil Nadu (1976) 2 LLJ 83, 89-90 (Mad), per V Ramaswami J.

76 Kishana Ram v Union of India 1973 Lab IC 1577 (Raj), per Shinghal J.

77 Raj Ratna Seth v Ashok Bhasin 1982 Lab IC 338 (Guj) (DB), per Divan CJ.

78 Mohd Akil v RK Baweja 1983 Lab IC 69 (NOC) (Del), per ML Jain J.

79 P Jose v Director, Central Imtitute of Fisheries 1986 Lab IC 1564, 1566 (Ker), per Radhakrishna Menon J.

80 JJ Shrimali v District Development Officer, Jilla Panchayat 1989 Lab IC 689, 697 (Guj) (DB), per Ahmadi J.

81 Subhas Bhaskar Cadre v Second LC (1993) 1 LLJ 1001 [LNIND 1993 BOM 98] (Bom) (DB), per Pendse J.

82 A Pichal Nadar v PO, LC (2002) 3 LLN 1107 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

83 District Red Cross Society v PO, LC (2001) 2 LLN 554 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

84 Senior Supdt Telegraph (Traffic) v Santosh Kumar Seal AIR 2010 SC 2140 [LNIND 2010 SC 397]: (2010) 3 LJ 600 : (2010) 6 SCC 773 [LNIND 2010 SC 397], per RM Lodha J.

85 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, para 6.38, p 39.

86 Ibid, para 6. 39, p 39.

87 Thangavati S. v Presiding Officer, Labour Court (2010) 1 LLJ 101 [LNIND 2009 MAD 1464] (Mad) : (2009) 4 MLJ 893 [LNIND 2009 MAD 1464], per Ms Aruna Jagadeesan J.

88 Field Marshal Manekshaw Auditorium v Presiding Officer, Labour Court, (2010) 2 LLJ 220 (P&H) : (2009) 156 PLR 291, per Kannan J.

89 EM Rao, Globalisation and Dispute Settlement Process, Indian Journal of Labour Economics 2001, Vol 44, No 3, p 459.

90 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Hindustan Lever Ltd 1984 Lab IC 1573, 1575 (SC), per Desai J.

91 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 728 (SC), per Hidayattulah J.

92 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 271 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

1 Ludwig Teller, The Law Governing Labor Disputes and Collective bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 476, s 154.

2 Titagarh Jute Co Ltd v Sriram Tiwari 1979 Lab IC 513 (Cal), per Chakravorty J.

3 Ram Prasad Viswakarma v Chairman, Industrial Tribunal (1961) 1 LLJ 504 [LNIND 1960 SC 333], 507 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 857 [LNIND 1960 SC 333], per Das Gupta J.

4 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee (1953) I LLJ 195, 199, per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

5 Bharat Iron Works v Bhagubhai Balubhai Patel 1976 Lab IC 4 [LNIND 1975 SC 406] (SC), per Goswami J.

6 Indian Cable Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 409 [LNIND 1962 SC 100], 414 (SC) : (1962) Supp (3) SCR 589, per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

7 Federated Saw Mill TYGWWE Assn v James Moore & Sons Proprietary Ltd 8 CLR 465, per Griffith CJ.

8 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1960) I LLJ 491, 494-95 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 777 [LNIND 1960 SC 60], per Gajendragadkar J.

9 State Banks Staff Union v State Bank of India (1991) 2 LLJ 163, 169 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

10 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda, Jullundur (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] (SC), per Desai J.

11 (1960) 1 All ER 274, 279 (PC), per Lord Denning.

12 Huntley v Thornton (1957) 1 All ER 234.

13 Conway v Wade (1909) AC 506, 509 (HL).

14 Federated Saw Mill, Timber Yard and General Wood Workers Employees' Assn v james Moore & Sons Proprietary Ltd 8 CLR 465, 488, per Grifith CJ.

15 NK Sen v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1953) 1 LLJ 6, 12 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

16 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 728 (SC), per Hidyatullah J.

17 Burmah Shell Oil Storage & Distributing Co of India Ltd v Government of Tamil Nadu (1978) 2 LLJ 230, 235 (Mad), per G Ramanujan J.

18 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda, Jullundur (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], 486 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

19 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v Industrial Tribunal of Gujarat (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 529 [LNIND 1967 SC 267], per Bhargava J.

20 Fedders Lloyd Corpn Pvt Ltd v Lt Governor 1970 Lab IC 421 [LNIND 1969 DEL 112], 427 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

21 Orissa Industries Pvt Ltd v PO, IT 1976 Lab IC 285, 289 (Ori) (DB), per GK Misra CJ. J.

22 Village Papers Pvt Ltd v State of HP 1993 Lab IC 99, 117-28 (HP) (FB), per Divinder Gupta J.

23 Mgmt of Radio Foundlltion Engineering Ltd v State of Bihar 1970 Lab IC 1119, 1125 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

24 Bombay Union of Journalists v The Hindu, Bombay (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 439 (SC), per Shah J.

25 C Manuel v Mgmt of Needle Industries (India) Ltd (1981) 2 LLJ 102, 115 (Mad), per Sundaram J.

26 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

27 New Delhi Tailoring Mazdoor Union v SC Sharma & Co Pvt Ltd [1979] 39 FLR 195.

28 Animesh Chandra Dutta Roy v Labour Court, Tripura 1975 Lab IC 1065 (Gau) (DB), per Bindra J.

29 Mgmt of Needle Industries v PO, Labour Court (1986) 1 LLJ 405, 407 (Mad) (DB), per Shanmukam J.

30 Andrew Yule and Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1979 Lab IC 204 (Cal) (DB), per Pyne J.

31 Ramakrishna Mills (C) Ltd v Govt of TN (1984) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1984 MAD 23], 265 (Mad) (DB), per Naimar Sundram J.

32 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda, Jullundur (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

33 Chairman, Bank of Cochin v All Kerala BE Federation 1978 Lab IC 262 -63 (Ker) (DB), per Gopalan Nambiyar CJ.

34 NK Sen v Labour Appellate, Tribunal (1953) 1 LLJ 6 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

35 Ibid, 9 per Chagla CJ.

36 TK Padmanabha Menon v PV Kora 1968 Lab IC 1134 (Ker), per Isaac J.

37 JT Stratford & Son Ltd v Lindley [1965] 3 All ER 102 (HL).

38 (1909) AC 506, 510; White v Riley [1921) 1 Ch 15, 19.

39 [1957) 1 All ER 234, 254.

40 British Broadcasting Corpn v Hearn [1978) 1 All ER 111, 117, 120, 122 (CA).

41 Cyrile Grunfield, Modern Trade Union Law, p 364.

42 Gen Secy, National & Grindlays BE Union v I Kannan 1978 Lab IC 648, 651 (Mad), per NS Ramaswami J.

43 Conway v Wide [1909) AC 506, 509, 513, 516, 519 (HL).

44 Khanna Talkies v IT, Delhi 1974 Lab IC 831, 833 (Delhi), per PN Khanna J.

45 PMM Mudaliar, Rathina Mudaliar & Sons v Raju Mudaliar (1965) 1 LLJ 489, 496 (Mys), per Hegde J.

46 ANZ Grindlays Bank Ltd v Union of India 2005 AIR SCW 5785, per Mathur J.

47 Madras GCE Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292], 731 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Employers and workmen

The definition of 'industrial dispute' expressly states that not disputes and differences of all sorts, but only those which bear upon the relationship of employer and workmen, are contemplated. Except in the last case, ie, a dispute 'between the workmen and workmen', one of the parties to an 'industrial dispute' must be an 'employer' or a 'class of employers'. The first point, therefore, to be noticed, which is perhaps self-evident, is that in the phrase 'employer and workmen', the plural may include the singular, on either side or any permutation of singular or plural, the masculine including the feminine. The expression, employer, has to be understood to mean any industrial employer. The definition of 'industrial dispute' is worded in very wide terms and unless they are narrowed by the meaning given to the word 'workmen', it would seem to include all 'employers', all 'employment' and all 'workmen', whatever the nature or scope of the employment may be.[48] The words of the definition may be paraphrased thus: 'any dispute which has connection with the workmen being in, or out of service or employment'.[49]In order, therefore, to determine whether a controversy, difference or a dispute is an 'industrial dispute' or not, it must first be determined whether the workman concerned or workmen sponsoring the cause, satisfy the conditions of s 2(s) of the Act. workmen have been given the right of collective bargaining with regard to various matters in which they are interested; their terms of service, the security of their service, their pay, their wages, their bonus, etc, which places limitations upon the rights of the employer but the limitation placed upon the employer is not with regard to all his employees. The limitations are confined to a limited class, constituted by the expression 'workmen' as used in the Act, and outside the class of 'workmen', the Act imposes no liability on the employer.[50] In the absence of an employer-employee relationship, between the contract workers and the principal employer, a dispute regarding the regularisation of the service of contract Workers, cannot be brought within the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k) of the IDA.[51]

In Rajaji Nagar Co-op Bank, Bhoruka J of the Karnataka High Court held that a dispute between the employees of a cooperative society and the management of the society, relating to their employment, is clearly excluded from the purview of the definition of 'industrial dispute', within the meaning of s 2(k). Under the ID Act, the reference for the resolution of the said dispute has to be made either to the industrial tribunal or to the labour court, whereas, under the co-operative law, it has to be made to the registrar of co-operative societies.[52] The learned judge distinguished the decision rendered in Co-operative Central Bank, in which the Supreme Court had held that, on a close examination of the provisions of the Andhra Pradesh Co-operative Societies Act, it would appear that the registrar could not have granted any relief in respect of the service conditions of the employees and therefore, a reference under the ID Act was maintainable.[53] It is the community of interest of the class as a whole-class of employers or class of workmen who furnish the real nexus between the dispute, and the parties to the dispute.[54] In the words of Isaac J:

> The very nature of an 'industrial dispute', as distinguished from an individual dispute, is to obtain new industrial conditions, not merely for the specific individuals then working from the specific individuals then employing them, and not for the moment only, but for the class of employees from the class of employers ... It is a battle by the claimants, not for themselves alone.[55]

Notwithstanding the fact that the language of s 2(k) is wide enough to cover a dispute between an employer and a single employee, the scheme of the Act appears to contemplate that the machinery provided therein should be set in motion to settle only such disputes as involve the right of workmen as a class and that a dispute touching the individual rights of a workman, was not intended to be the subject of an adjudication under the Act.[56] The term 'industrial dispute' conveys the meaning that the dispute must be such as would affect large groups of workmen and employers, ranged on opposite sides. Even a single employee's dispute may develop into an industrial dispute, when it is taken up by a union or a number of workers, who make a concerted demand for redress.[57]The applicability of the Act to an individual dispute, as distinguished from a dispute involving a group of workmen, is excluded, unless the workmen, as a body or a considerable section of them, make common cause with the individual workman.[58] But, as Shelat J observed:

> The community of interest does not depend on whether the concerned workman was a member of the union or not, at the date when the cause occurred, for, even without his being a member, the dispute may be such that other workmen, by having a common interest therein, would be justified in taking up the dispute as their own and espousing it.[59]

Workmen and Workmen

Here also, like 'employers and workmen', the plural may include the singular on either side, or any permutation of singular or plural, the masculine including the feminine. But it may happen, though rarely, that the dispute is between two sets of workmen in the same establishment; such a dispute has been brought within the ambit of the industrial dispute.[60] The dispute must be between the workmen as such, for whom trade unions may, of course, act in a representative capacity, but a dispute between trade unions as such, is a pure inter-union dispute and cannot be an industrial dispute.[61] From the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in Beetham,[62] and the decision of the court of appeal in R v National Arbitration ,[63] it would appear that the union may take the initiative, provided its workmen subsequently, adopt or ratify its conduct. Lord Sterndale MR, observed:

> A dispute between 'workmen and workmen' in connection with the employment of a person, namely, the plaintiff, the dispute being that the men in the shop insisted that no skilled man should be employed unless he belonged to the currier's union, was a 'trade dispute' within the definition. [64]

The House of Lords held that a controversy between two unions, which was not connected with the employment or non-employment or with the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour of any person, did not fall within the meaning of trade dispute, as defined in s 5(3) of the Trade Disputes Act 1906,[65] but a dispute springing out of the rivalry of one union with another, has been held to be a trade dispute by the court of appeal. In India, so far, there is no decision of any High Court or the Supreme Court, dealing with a dispute between 'workmen and workmen'. The words have been used for providing for contingencies of such disputes arising when the trade union movement in the country gets properly organised, on the lines of that in England, USA and Australia.

Individual Dispute v Industrial Dispute

The concept of 'trade dispute' in England, did not have any uniform or well-settled connotation. It depended upon its definition in each of the statutory enactments, in the light of the scheme of the particular statute. 'Trade disputes' were not the subject-matter of the Common Law of England. The earliest definition of a 'trade dispute' is to be found in the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. With minor changes in the punctuation, this definition was adopted in the Trade Disputes Act 1906 and then, in the Industrial Courts Act 1919. In the subsequent legislation, viz, the National Arbitration Order 1940 and the Industrial Disputes Order 1951, the same definition was retained. The definition in these orders was considered in Rex v National Arbitration Tribunal , where the dispute between a town clerk and the municipal corporation was referred to the national arbitration tribunal, under the Order of 1940. But, under the Industrial Disputes Order 1951, the national arbitration tribunal was superseded by the industrial disputes tribunal, which proceeded with the adjudication of the reference. The municipal corporation applied to the King's Bench Division for an order prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding with the adjudication, on the plea that as the dispute in question was between a single workman and the employer, it was de hors the scope of the expression 'trade dispute', as defined in the orders of 1940 and of 1951, hence, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the matter. Construing the provisions of the order of 1940, Lord Goddard held that the definition of the term 'trade dispute' had to be read in the light of s 1(1) of the Interpretation Act of 1889 and so, an 'individual dispute' would be included in the purview of the expression 'trade dispute'. Hence, the dispute between one employer and one workman was a 'trade dispute' within the meaning of the order of 1940. But while construing the various provisions of the order of 1951, it was held that an 'individual dispute' was not a 'trade dispute' within the meaning of that order, because the whole tenor of the order of 1951 and the fact that throughout that order, the word 'employer' in the singular is used in conjunction with the word 'workers' in the plural, indicates the intention that these words should be interpreted literally and in consequence, s 1(1) of the Interpretation Act 1889 should not apply. In Australia, sub-s 35 of s 51 gave legislative power with respect to 'conciliation' and 'arbitration', for the prevention and settlement of 'industrial disputes' extending beyond the limits of any one state. The expression 'industrial dispute' in the context of this entry, was construed to be confined to collective disputes only.[66] In other words, the term 'industrial dispute' was construed in its broad sense, in the context of the constitutional provisions.

In India, the expression 'industrial dispute', contained in this Act, has been construed by the Supreme Court so as to exclude individual disputes because of the scheme of the Act. The view taken by Supreme Court in Central Provinces Transport Services, was affirmed in Newspapers Ltd.[67] In Dimakuchi Tea Estate, the court held that the liberal construction of the expression 'any person', used in the definition of 'industrial dispute', was impermissible, despite the wide amplitude of these words, and evolved the test of community of interest of the workmen of the establishment, with the concerned workman.[68] In Dharam Pal Prem Chand, the court said that notwithstanding the width of the words used in s 2(k), a dispute raised by a single workman cannot become an industrial dispute, unless it is supported either by his union or in the absence of a union, by a substantial number of the workmen.[69] This principle was reiterated in Indian Express.[70] In WIMCO, the court said that after the Dimakuchi case, there is no doubt that a dispute relating to 'any person' becomes a dispute where the person in respect of whom it is raised, is one in whose employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour, the parties to the dispute have a direct or substantial interest.[71]

A dispute relating to the house rent allowance and revision of the pay-scale of the employees in a particular establishment, is a dispute of a particular category of workmen borne on a staffing pattern. The union which collectively represents the cause of the employees, has an interest in their conditions of service. This interest does not depend upon the association or disassociation of some of the employees who may be affected by such dispute. For being an industrial dispute, the consent or interest of the holder of a particular post is irrelevant. Therefore, the refusal of an individual employee to participate in the industrial dispute, does not affect the validity of the dispute.[72]Section 2A introduces a fiction to the effect that an individual dispute connected with a 'discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination', is deemed to be an 'industrial dispute' notwithstanding that no other workman, nor any union of workmen, espouses such a dispute. Hence, a workman who has been discharged, dismissed or retrenched, or whose services have been otherwise terminated, can himself raise a dispute with respect to such dismissal etc but that does not mean that such a dispute can be raised by such workman alone and not by the workmen of the establishment collectively. The workmen of the establishment can always raise an 'industrial dispute' with respect to the discharge or dismissal etc of a workman, if they have a community of interest in his employment or non-employment. However, the distinction that in the former case, the dispute is between the individual workman and the employer and in the latter case, it is between the workmen of the establishment as a class, and the employer is to be borne in mind. In the former case, the concerned workman himself is a party to the dispute and not the workmen collectively, while in the latter case, the workmen collectively, are the party and not the concerned workman, individually. A dispute relating to the termination of service, discharge or dismissal of a workman, referred to adjudication under s 2A, cannot be settled by the union with the management, by entering into a settlement, pending such adjudication, without the consent of the worker.[73]

However, except the disputes relating to the 'discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of service', all other disputes relating to the terms of employment or conditions of labour of an individual workman, such as transfer, wages, bonus, increments or promotion etc, will require espousal, by a substantial number of fellow workmen, in order to partake the character of an industrial dispute.[74] Similarly, a dispute which does not relate to the action of the employer discharging, dismissing, retrenching or otherwise terminating the service of a workman, but involves the question, whether there was a relationship of employment between the employer and the workman, cannot be the subject-matter of s 2A, and would require a valid espousal.[75] All other disputes, enumerated in Schs 2 and 3, are of, a collective nature and as such, would not call for the espousal of a substantial number of workmen or the union. For instance, a dispute about the necessity to frame a gratuity scheme for the workers of a concern, is from its very nature and from the very outset, a collective 'industrial dispute' and there is no question of the necessity of sponsoring such a dispute, either by the majority of the workmen or by a substantial number of them, before a reference can be made.[76]

Number of workmen required for espousal of a dispute

There is nothing in the Act requiring that the dispute or difference should be raised by all the workmen of the industry, or by everyone of them, or even by a majority of them. It is enough if the controversy is between the employer on the one side and the workmen on the other. So also, there is nothing in the Act to require that the workmen raising the controversy, should form a majority of the employees. If the controversy affects, or will affect the interests of workmen as a class, the law envisages that, in the interests of the industrial peace, it should be examined and decided in one of the modes provided by it. An individual dispute cannot, however, be said to be an industrial dispute, unless the other workmen associate themselves with it. No hard and fast rule can possibly be laid down in such circumstances, to decide when and by how many workmen, an 'industrial dispute' can be raised within the meaning of the Act, or whether a minority union or even an unrecognised union, can raise an industrial dispute. It is enough if there is a potential cause of disharmony, which is likely to endanger industrial peace and a substantial number of workmen raise a dispute about it, for then, it is permissible to take the view that it is an 'industrial dispute,[77] In order that an individual dispute may become an industrial dispute, it has to be established that it had been taken up by the union of employees or by an appropriate number of employees of the establishment.[78]

A collective dispute, however, does not mean that all the workmen or a majority of them, from the establishment concerned, should sponsor and support the dispute. All that is necessary is that the dispute, in order to become an industrial dispute, should have the support of a substantial section of the workmen concerned in the establishment.[79] But for this purpose, the employees, who have already been dismissed and whose cause is not in question, cannot be taken into account while constituting an appreciable section of the employer's establishment, as they are not members of the employer's establishment at all and cannot be considered as such for the purpose of deciding whether there is an industrial dispute or not.[80] Even a minority group of workmen of an establishment, can make a demand and thereby, raise an industrial dispute which, in a proper case, may be referred for adjudication.[81] However, no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the number of workmen whose association will convert an individual dispute into an industrial dispute. It must depend upon the facts of each case and the nature of the dispute. The number of workmen must, however, be such as to lead to an inference that the dispute is one which affects the workmen as a class.[82] In Indian Express (supra), the Supreme Court held that about 25 per cent of the workmen of the establishment, would constitute the requisite number for a valid espousal of the dispute. But in a case of espousal by a union, it is not sufficient that the union had in its membership, a substantial number of workmen from the establishment in which the concerned workman was employed. It must further be shown that a substantial number of such workmen participated in or acted together and arrived at an understanding by a resolution or by other means, and collectively supported the dispute. The tribunal has, therefore, to consider the question as to how many of the fellow workmen actually espoused the cause of the concerned workman, by participating in the particular resolution of the union. In the absence of such determination by the tribunal, it cannot be said that the individual dispute has acquired the character of an industrial dispute. The tribunal will not acquire jurisdiction to adjudicate upon such dispute.[83]

Espousal by Trade Unions

The unions are generally of two types, the first type consists of the unions of workmen of a particular establishment, and the second type consists of general unions of which the workmen of a particular establishment become members. As far as a union of the workmen of the establishment itself is concerned, the problem of espousal by them generally presents little difficulty, as the workmen who are members of such unions generally, have the community of interest with an individual employee who is one of their fellow workmen. However, the difficulties arise when the cause of a workman, in a particular establishment, is sponsored by a union which is not of the workmen of that establishment, but is one of which membership is open to workmen of other establishments as well, in that industry. In such a case, a union which has only a microscopic number of workmen as its members, cannot sponsor any dispute arising between the workmen and the management.[84] In The Hindu, the facts disclosed that the management of the 'Hindu' had inter alia three working journalists. Two of the three working journalists, ie, Salivateswaran and Venkateswaran, had become members of the Bombay Union of Journalists. The third working journalist, ie, Tiwari, had not become a member of that union. An 'industrial dispute', with respect to the dismissal of Salivateswaran, was espoused by the union. The Supreme Court observed thus:

> Firstly, the Act excluded its application to an 'individual dispute', as distinguished from a dispute involving a group of workmen, unless such a dispute is made a common cause by a body from a considerable section of workmen, (ii) the members of a union who are not workmen of the employers against whom the dispute is sought to be raised, cannot, by their support, convert an 'individual dispute' into an 'industrial dispute'.

The court further observed that, in each case while ascertaining whether an individual dispute has acquired the character of an 'industrial dispute', the test is whether on the date of the reference the dispute was taken up as supported by the union of the workmen or by an appreciable number of workmen. In order, therefore, to convert an 'individual dispute' into an 'industrial dispute', it has to be established that it had been taken up by the union of the employees of the establishment or by an appreciable number of employees of the establishment. The dispute in question being an individual dispute, could only be converted into an industrial dispute by espousal by a union of the employees or by an appreciable number of the employees of the 'Hindu', as the Bombay Union of Journalists was a union of the employees in the industry of journalism in Bombay, it was not a union of employees of the 'Hindu', Bombay. On this view of the matter, the court held that the support of Bombay Union of Journalists could not convert the 'individual dispute' into an 'industrial dispute'. The members of such a union could not be said to be the persons substantially and directly interested in the dispute between the workman concerned and his employer.[85] In Dharampal Premchand, however, Gajendragadkar CJI observed that the 'Hindu' case should not be read as laying down any hard and fast rule:

(i) Notwithstanding the width of the words used in section 2(k) of the Act, a dispute raised by an individual workman cannot become an 'industrial dispute' unless it is supported either by his union or in the absence of a union, by a substantial number of workmen;

(ii) a union may validly raise a dispute though it may be a minority union of the workmen in an establishment;

(iii) if there is no union of workmen in an establishment, a group of employees can raise the dispute, which becomes an industrial dispute even though it is a dispute relating to an individual workman; and

(iv) where the workmen of an establishment have no union of their own and some or all of them have joined a union of another establishment, belonging to the same industry, if such a union takes up the cause of the workmen working in the establishment, the dispute can become an 'industrial dispute', if such a union can claim a representative character in a way that its support would make the dispute an industrial dispute.[86]

The learned Chief Justice held that a dispute of 18 workmen, could validly be espoused by the union in which only these 18 workmen of the employer were members, as these workmen could raise a dispute by themselves in a formal manner, because 18 out of 45 is a substantial number. The rationale of this holding is that, if a large number of workmen of a particular establishment become members of a union which is not strictly speaking, a union of that establishment, such union can espouse the cause of an individual workman who is its member, provided that a substantial number of his co-workers have espoused his cause through that union. It is thus clear that the sponsoring of an individual dispute by any union is not enough to convert it into an 'industrial dispute'. In Nellai Cotton Mills, the Madras High Court held that the mere fact that a substantial number of the workmen of the establishment in which the concerned workman was employed, were also members of the union, would not constitute an espousal. It must be shown that they participated in or acted together and arrived at an understanding by a resolution or by other means and collectively supported the dispute. The tribunal has, therefore, to consider the question as to how many of the fellow workmen actually espoused the cause of the concerned workman by participating in the particular resolution of the union. In the absence of such determination by the tribunal, it cannot be said that the individual dispute acquired the character of an industrial dispute, and the tribunal will not acquire jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute.[87] What a substantial or considerable number of workmen would be, in a given case, would depend on the particular facts of the case. The fact that an 'industrial dispute' is supported by other workmen will have to be established either in the form of a resolution of the union of which the workman may be a member, or of the workmen themselves, who support the dispute or in any other manner. From the mere fact that a general union, at whose instance an 'industrial dispute' concerning an individual workman is referred for adjudication, has on its rolls, a few of the workmen of the establishment as its members, it cannot be inferred that the individual dispute has been converted into an 'industrial dispute'.[88] Nevertheless, in order to make the dispute an 'industrial dispute', it is not necessary that there should always be a resolution of a substantial or an appreciable number of workmen. What is necessary is that there should be some expression of collective will of a substantial or an appreciable number, of workmen, treating the cause of the individual workman as their own cause.[89] A retired workman cannot raise an industrial dispute against his former employer, it would however be open to the trade union to raise a dispute, and the workmen could espouse the cause of a person, who at one point of time had been workman and only ceased to be so on retirement.[90]

The decision of Supreme Court in Forbes Gokak, is a standing illustration of the misconceptions that creep so frequently into the judicial decision-making process. Before analysing the decision, it is necessary to state the facts in brief: the workman, who was employed in the company, claimed promotion as a clerk. When this was not granted, the appellant raised an industrial dispute, which was referred for adjudication. In their written statement before the tribunal, the management denied the workman's claim for promotion on merits, apart from contending that the individual dispute raised by the appellant was not an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 2(k), as the workman was neither supported by a substantial number of workmen nor by a majority union. On the other hand, the workman claimed that his cause was espoused by the Gokak Mills Staff Union. Before the tribunal, apart from examining himself, the General Secretary of the Union was examined as a witness in support of the workman's claim. The General Secretary affirmed that the appellant was a member of the union, duly supported by documentary evidence. The tribunal came to the conclusion that in view of the evidence given by the General Secretary and the documents produced, it was clear that the appellant's cause had been espoused by the union which was one of the unions of the company. It also noted that no record had been produced by the respondent to show that the management had taken into account the workman's production records, efficiency, attendance or behaviour while denying him promotion. The tribunal concluded that the act of the respondent in denying promotion to the appellant amounted to unfair labour practice. An award was passed in favour of the appellant and the respondent was directed to promote the appellant as a clerk from the date his juniors were promoted and to give him all consequential benefits. A single judge of Karnataka High Court dismissed the writ petition by the employer, which was reversed by a Division Bench in appeal. The Division Bench came to the conclusion that an individual dispute is not an industrial dispute unless it directly and substantially affects the interest of other workmen. Secondly, it was held that an individual dispute should be taken up by a Union which had representative character or by a substantial number of employees before it would be converted into an industrial dispute neither of which had happened. The Division Bench held that there was nothing on record to show that the workman was a member of the union or that the dispute has been espoused by the union by passing any resolution in that regard. In appeal by the workman, Ms Ruma Pal J (for self and Thakker J) observed thus:

> In the present case, it was not questioned that the appellant was a member of the Gokak Mills Staff Union. Nor was any issue raised that the Union was not of the respondent establishment. The objection as noted in the issues framed by the Industrial Tribunal was that the Union was not the majority Union. Given the decision in Dharam Pal's case, the objection was rightly rejected by the Tribunal and wrongly accepted by the High Court (para 6) ... As far as espousal is concerned there is no particular form prescribed to effect such espousal. Doubtless, the Union must normally express itself in the form of a resolution which should be proved if it is in issue. However proof of support by the Union may also be available aliunde. It would depend upon the facts of each case. The Tribunal had addressed its mind to the question, appreciated the evidence both oral and documentary and found that the Union had espoused the appellant's cause. (para 7) ... The Division Bench misapplied the principles of judicial review under Article 226 in interfering with the decision. It was not a question of there being no evidence of espousal before the Industrial Tribunal. There was evidence which was considered by the Tribunal in coming to the conclusion that the appellant's cause had been espoused by the Union. The High Court should not have upset this finding without holding that the conclusion was irrational or perverse. The conclusion reached by the High Court is therefore unsustainable. (para 8). ... For all these reasons the decision of the High Court cannot stand and must be set aside.[91] (para 9).

The above decision merits some analysis. In the first place, the reliance placed on the decision in Dharampal Premchand,[92] itself is misplaced for the reason that the said case was about the dismissal of some 18 workmen. Secondly, at the time of deciding that case, s 2A was not there in the ID Act, with the result an individual workman could not get any relief even in the case of dismissal and discharge, if the dispute raised by him was not espoused by a union or a group of workmen. Thirdly, the said section was inserted in 1965 with a view to rectify a major lacuna surfaced in Central Provinces Transport Services,[93] in which a dismissed workman was denied relief on the ground afore-stated, in the face of the plural orientation of s 2(k). Fourthly, the language of s 2A is clear in so far as it covers a case of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination, and does not take into its fold other industrial actions such as promotions, transfers, etc. Fifthly, even while acting under s 11A, a labour court has no jurisdiction to adjudicate a dispute, other than discharge or dismissal, and grant relief. Sixthly, the facts of the case disclose that it is a case of individual promotion to a higher grade position, which calls for an evaluation of the relative skill, competency and merit of the candidates vis-à-vis the demands of the higher grade job carrying higher responsibilities. Seventhly, it is a well settled law, as laid down in several cases including Brooke Bond, in which Gajendragadkar J held:

> There can be no doubt that promotions to which industrial employees are entitled normally would be treated as the function of the management…in the absence of mala fides, normally it must be left to the discretion of the management to select which of the employees should be promoted at a given time subject of course to the formula to which we have just referred…interference by Industrial Tribunal with the order of management in regard to such promotion must be held to be unjustified… In dealing with these disputes, however anxious industrial adjudication may and must be to protect the legitimate rights of the employees, regard must always be had to the fact that in matters of promotion, discretion has primarily to be left to the employer.[94]

The above principles have been followed in several decisions by courts in India in respect of transfers and promotions, which are essentially managerial functions, except in cases where there was material in the possession of a workman to show that the management was actuated by mala fide considerations or there was victimization on its part. Eighthly, barring a bald and nude allegation that it was a case of unfair labour practice, no evidence was let in by the workman before the tribunal. Ninthly, given that the workman alleged unfair labour practice against the management, the burden of proof was on him, which he did not discharge. Tenthly, the tribunal misdirected itself in drawing the conclusion that there was 'unfair labour practice' de hors any evidence led before it to that effect. Eleventhly, mere putting in a given number of years in a grade and position is no indication of 'promotability' and, by the same token, seniority plays little role in promotion to higher grade positions. Twelfthly, the question, 'who is having potential to discharge higher order functions should be left to the decision of the employer, who alone has the opportunity of observing his employees from close quarters and is capable of assessing their overall abilities. At any rate, such decisions should not be wrongfully - repeat, wrongfully - interfered with by tribunals, High Courts and the Supreme Court by relying on misplaced notions and irrelevant considerations. Thirteenthly, the issue in the instant case was not so much 'whether the union had passed a resolution or not' in favour of espousing the cause as 'whether the company, having invested a few Crores, had the legitimate right to manage its affairs in a competitive business environment or should that function be delegated to labour courts and tribunals, which are neither qualified nor competent to discharge that function'. Here is yet another decision of late 1950s on the issue from SS Dhavan J of Allahabad High Court, which, it is hoped, would be an eye-opener to the Higher Judiciary:

> Promotion generally necessitates a consideration of comparative suitability of the eligible workmen and such a selective process would require a consideration not only of the best performance of those eligible, but necessitates the making of a comparative estimate of their skill, sometimes of a technical nature, their personality, capacity to discharge heavier responsibilities and similar other factors... If the choice of the management is not malafide and no element of victimisation has entered into it, there would be no scope in such cases for interference... If those not suited to discharge the function of higher posts are promoted by industrial adjudicators who do not possess the requisite background qualifying them to undertake the task of making selections, industrial progress is bound to be jeopardised to the detriment of national economy.[95]

The above decision is not only a masterpiece of judge-made law, but also a proposition which brings to bear a high degree of professionalism upon industrial relations management. Whatever may be the compulsions of 'social justice' and 'state regulation', industrial jurisprudence cannot be stretched to a point where the power to promote and transfer is delegated to labour courts and tribunals which are, in the context of an industrial undertaking, pre-eminently incompetent to perform the task. And lastly, could it be canvassed, even from a common sense point of view, that the union or a group of workmen can have a direct and substantial interest in the promotion or the non-promotion of an individual workman? This point can be illustrated by a specific example: take, for instance, there is a dispute between an individual workman and the management on (i) whether House Rent Allowance is payable only on his basic pay or on the dearness allowance also; or (ii) on the rate at which production incentive has to be calculated in the event of down-time due to machinery breakdown or power-cuts, resulting in a fall in output. A dispute of this kind, though essentially 'individual' at its start, assumes the character of an 'industrial' dispute in view of the fact that all workmen, who are placed in the same grade and scale or are working in the same production operation, will be affected by the outcome. In such an event, it is not necessary that there should be a trade union in existence for transforming the 'individual' dispute into an 'industrial' dispute. Those few co-workmen of the same grade and scale or, as the case may be, those working in the same production shop, can come together and raise an industrial dispute for the reason that they have a direct and substantial interest in the issue relating to the percentage of HRA or the rate at which the production incentive has to be calculated. And that verily is the acid test for the espousal of an individual dispute. The only exception is that of dismissal, discharge, etc., which have been provided for in s 2A, as an exception to the general rule. Applying this test to the facts of the case, the answer is too obvious to need elaborate elucidation. On this point, the Division Bench very rightly held that the union or a group of workmen could not be said to have a direct or substantial interest in the individual promotion in the instant case. The decision of Division Bench is consistent with the letter and spirit the law relating to s 2(k). Is it possible to conceive a situation in which the Supreme Court digresses from the core criteria of the issue and deals with peripheral aspects in an attempt to justify an otherwise unjust and mediocre decision? With great respect, the learned judge did not apply her judicial mind to the weighty questions which have a significant bearing on organizational efficiency and comparative advantage of business organisations. The Division Bench of Karnataka High Court was right, whereas the tribunal, the learned single judge of the High Court and the Supreme Court were patently wrong. This decision needs to be reviewed by a larger bench and overruled.

It is not necessary that the sponsoring union is a registered trade union or a recognised trade union. Once it is shown that a body of a substantial number of workmen, either acting through a union or otherwise, had sponsored the workman's cause, it would be sufficient to convert it into an industrial dispute.[1] The definition of an industrial dispute is not restricted to a dispute between an employer and a recognised majority union, but it takes within its wide sweep, any 'dispute or difference' between the employer and the workmen, including a minority union of workmen which is connected with the employment or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour of the workmen.[2] In Pradip Lamp Works,[3] the complaints regarding the dismissal of 10 workmen were filed before the conciliation officer by the individual workmen themselves. But their cause was subsequently taken up by a new union formed by a large number of the co-workmen, if not a majority of them. Since this union was not registered or recognised, the workmen elected five representatives to prosecute the cases of the 10 dismissed workmen. Thus, the cases of the dismissed workmen were espoused by the new union, as yet unregistered and unrecognised. The Supreme Court held that the fact that these disputes were not taken up by a registered or recognised union, does not mean that they were not 'industrial disputes'. The mere fact that some workmen had not paid the subscription would not bar them from sponsoring the dispute, in the absence of proof that they had ceased to be members of the union for the non-payment of the subscription dues.[4]

A single judge of the Allahabad High Court, in Imperial Electric, took the view that a general union of which all the workmen of the company were members, could not raise an 'industrial dispute' with respect to the payment of 'bonus', because the nature of the trade of the company was different from the trade which the union represented.[5] This holding is inconsistent with the decision of the Supreme Court in Dharampal Premchand. On the other hand, in Miss Kotval, the Calcutta High Court took the view that the dispute of an individual employee became an 'industrial dispute' on being espoused by a union representing the employees engaged in the industry of air transport, even though no other employee of the company was a member of the union. In taking this view, the court interpreted the word 'industry' occurring in the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Act, to mean the entire air transport industry, in contrast to the particular establishment of the employer company.[6] This construction is far-fetched and is not warranted by the language of the statute, as it loses sight of the word 'employed' used in that definition. Furthermore, this view is inconsistent with Dharampal Premchand and the Indian Express, and is diametrically opposed to the decision rendered in The Hindu, which was not overruled in Dharampal Premchand, but was only distinguished on its facts. Another Bench of that court, in Reckitt & Coleman, took the view that a dispute relating to the service conditions of 12 car drivers of a company employing about 1000 workers, was validly raised by a union in which no other workman than the 18 drivers employed by the company was a member.[7]

It is not necessary that the same union should remain in charge of that dispute till adjudication. In this connection, the distinction between espousal and representation is to be borne in mind. The dispute may be espoused by the workmen of an establishment through a particular union, for making such a dispute an industrial dispute, while the workmen may be represented before the tribunal, for the purpose of s 36, by a member of the executive or office-bearer of an altogether different union. The crux of the matter is that the dispute should be a dispute between the employer and his workmen. It is not necessary that the dispute must be espoused or conducted only by a registered trade union. Even if a trade union ceases to be a registered trade union during the continuance of the adjudication proceedings, that would not affect the maintainability of the order of reference.[8] A new trade union, by amalgamation or otherwise, may come into existence which, from that date, may represent the workmen of the industry and in such a case, if the new union takes over the dispute, then the dispute does not cease, to be an 'industrial dispute'.[9] It may happen in some cases, that a number of workmen of an establishment, may take up the dispute of an individual workman and thus, make it an 'industrial dispute'. A trade union may be organised representing the workmen of that establishment, and may take up the dispute further before its settlement. The dispute would not thereupon, become a new 'industrial dispute'. The whole point is, whether the employer is fighting a dispute with a large number of his workmen or not, but until this test is passed, an individual dispute cannot be transformed into an industrial dispute.[10]

In Paarthy Ratnam, the AP High Court held that a dispute simpliciter, between an employer and a workman, might develop into an industrial dispute, if the cause is espoused by a union of which the latter is a member and that the membership of the union which would give it the jurisdiction to espouse his cause, must be anterior to the date of dismissal and not subsequent to it.[11] A similar view was taken by the High Court of Kerala in Shamsuddin,[12] and by the Punjab High Court in Khadi Gram Udyog.[13] In Muller and Phipps, the dispute related to the retrenchment of a workman and the failure of the employer to re-employ him, in spite of its having re-employed two other employees out of their turn, as against the turn of the concerned workman. The High Court rejected the employer's contention, that the espousal of the union was not valid as it was made after the retrenched workman had ceased, on his being retrenched, to be a member of the union, on the ground that if that contention were to be upheld, it would mean that no union could ever espouse the cause of a retrenched workman.[14] A similar view was also taken by the Patna High Court, in Jamadoba Colliery, in which the union which espoused the cause of the workman, came into existence after his dismissal. The workman naturally became its member after his dismissal. The High Court disagreed with the tribunal, which had rejected the reference, and held that even if on the date of the dismissal of the workman, the dispute was an individual dispute, but may, under some circumstances, become an industrial dispute on the date of the reference; that the validity of the reference was to be judged on the facts as they stood on the date of the reference and not on the date of the workman's dismissal. Therefore, even if there was no union on the date of the workman's dismissal, to espouse his cause, if such a union comes into existence before the reference and the dismissed workman becomes its member and the union then espouses his cause, that would be sufficient. It was also held that there was no principal in support of the view that the union must be in existence at the time of the dismissal.[15]

Time of espousal

In The Hindu, the Supreme Court observed:

> In each case, on ascertaining whether an individual dispute has acquired the character of an industrial dispute, the test is whether on the date of the reference, the dispute was taken up as supported by the union of the workmen of the employer against whom the dispute is raised by the individual workman, or by an appreciable number of workmen.[16]

In other words, the validity of the reference of an industrial dispute must be judged on the facts as they stood on the date of the reference. This is because a reference can validly be made only if an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended and an 'individual dispute' becomes an 'industrial dispute' only when it is supported by a union, or a considerable number of workmen. That support must necessarily precede the reference and act as a foundation for it.[17] In other words, the existence of the interest of the workmen as a community, evidenced by the espousal of the cause, must be on the date when the reference is made and not necessarily on the date when the cause occurs, otherwise, in some cases, a dispute which was originally an individual one may never be able to become an industrial dispute.[18]

Effect of Subsequent Support or Withdrawal of Support to Dispute

In Working Journalists of the 'Hindu', the Madras High Court observed that:

> ...having regard to the statutory provisions, as interpreted by us, the jurisdiction of the labour court, to proceed with and adjudicate upon an 'industrial dispute', stems from and is sustained, until it makes an award and the same becomes enforceable, by the reference itself which has been made on the basis of an 'industrial dispute' existing or 'apprehended' on the date of the reference and that the jurisdiction of the labour court to proceed in the matter is not in any way affected by the fact that subsequent to the date of the reference, the workers or a substantial section of them, who had originally sponsored the cause, had resiled and withdrawn from it. [19]

These observations were cited with approval by the Supreme Court in The Hindu, as correctly setting out the effect of a subsequent withdrawal of support by the workmen, to a cause previously espoused by them. For determining the question as to whether an individual dispute has acquired the character of an 'industrial dispute', in this case, the court laid down the crucial test that on the date of reference, the espousal and support of the dispute by the union of workmen or by an appreciable number of them, must be present. A corollary to this was that a subsequent withdrawal of support will not take away the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal. Conversely, on the same reasoning, subsequent support too, will not convert what was an individual dispute at the time of the reference, into an industrial dispute. In the words of Veeraswami J,

> ... it will be subversive of industrial justice, labour relations and fair-play, if the jurisdiction of the labour court to proceed with the matter referred to it for adjudication, is to depend on the shifting convictions, exigencies and strength of the rival parties, to the industrial dispute.[20]

Besides, it will also not be in consonance with the object and policy of the Act, namely, to conserve and promote industrial peace and welfare. A request by the worker to reconsider or withdraw the dispute also, will have no relevance, because the dispute being raised by the union, the mere fact that subsequently, the workers request for a withdrawal or reconsideration, will not make the dispute any less than industrial dispute.[21] The principle is that when an industrial dispute is raised by union or a group of workmen, in respect of the grievance of an individual workman, and a reference is made by the Government, the dispute is not between the management and the individual workman concerned. The legal position is that when an individual Worker is a part to an industrial dispute, he is a party not independently of the union which has espoused his cause and the main parties to the industrial dispute before the labour court are, therefore, the employer and the union or the workmen, as a class, who took up the cause of the individual workman.[22] Hence, the individual workman is at no stage, a party to the individual dispute, independently of the union. The union or those workmen who have, by their sponsoring, turned the individual dispute into an industrial dispute, can, therefore, claim to have a say in the conduct of the proceeding before the tribunal.[23]

Burden of Proof

There is some conflict of judicial opinion on the question of whether it is for the workman to prove that the dispute in question is sufficiently and properly sponsored, so as to convert it into an industrial dispute, or it is for the employer to show that the dispute is not properly or sufficiently sponsored and as such, is not an industrial dispute at all. The Madras,[24] Andhra Pradesh[25] and Mysore[26] High Courts have taken the view that when the validity of a reference relating to a single workman is challenged on the ground that what is referred is only an individual dispute and not an industrial dispute, it is for the workman to show that the cause has been sponsored by his union or by a number of workmen of his class, before the order of reference. In other words, it is for the party who contends that the dispute is an industrial dispute, to establish that fact, upon which the jurisdiction of a tribunal rests. On the other hand, the Labour Appellate Tribunal,[27] the Punjab,[28] Calcutta,[29] and Allahabad,[30] High Courts have taken the view that there must be a presumption that when the union takes an action, it is as a representative of, and with the support of, its members, and that it is for the employer to prove that the facts are otherwise and the members of the union are not behind it in its action. Thus, the onus to prove, according to this view, that the dispute raised is not an 'industrial dispute', is on the employer. There is no case of the Supreme Court directly on the point, so far, though there are some obiter dicta, which also appear to be conflicting. In Newspapers Ltd, Kapur J, observed that:

> In spite of the fact that the making of a reference by the Government under the Industrial Disputes Act, is the exercise of its administrative powers, that is not destructive of the rights of an aggrieved party to show that what was referred was not an > 'industrial dispute' at all ...[31]

On the other hand, in The Hindu, Shah J, observed that:

> The dispute, in the present case, being prima facie, an individual dispute, in order that it may become an industrial dispute, it had to be established that it had been taken up by the union of employees...or by an appreciable number of employees...[32]

In Rohtak General Transport, Gajendragadkar J, observed that:

> Before this point is decided in favour of the respondent (employer), it would be obviously necessary to give the appellants (workmen) a chance to prove that their cause had been espoused by the five workmen before the date of reference. [33]

In Hindustan Lever, the labour court, dealing with the preliminary issue whether there was a proper espousal of the dispute, found that no evidence was adduced by the employer to that effect and, hence, decided the issue against the employer.[34] The Calcutta High Court held that when the authority of a union was challenged by the employer, it must be shown by production of material evidence, before the tribunal to which such a dispute has been referred, to prove that the union was duly authorised, either by a resolution of its members or otherwise, and that it had the authority to represent the workmen whose cause it was espousing.[35] From these observations, it is obvious that the burden of proof to establish the valid espousal is on the workman. This is the correct view of the law. After the insertion of s 2A, a dispute relating to the 'discharge', 'dismissal', 'retrenchment' or otherwise 'termination' of the service of an individual workman, is to be deemed to be an 'industrial dispute' and such dispute will not require espousal by the other workmen or any union. But this statement of law will still hold good in respect of other disputes, such as the disputes relating to promotion, increment, grading, leave hours of work, transfer, etc, of individual workmen, still which would require a valid espousal.

Subject-matter of Dispute

It is only that 'dispute or difference' between 'employers and employers' or between 'employers and workmen' or between 'workmen and workmen' which is connected with the employment or non-employment, or the terms of employment, or with the conditions of labour, of any person, which would fall within the ambit of the definition of 'industrial dispute'. In other words, a dispute or difference must relate to either the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour, of any person. Unless a dispute is connected with these matters, it will not satisfy the requirements of law and will not fall within the ambit of industrial dispute,[36] but the phrase, 'any dispute ...which is connected with the employment or non-employment ...of any person', used in the Act, is of unqualified width. The use of the present tense in the expression 'which is connected', in the definition, is significant and indicates the continuing character of an industrial dispute. It follows that a dispute which, in the past, was an industrial dispute, cannot be a dispute which is connected with ... so as to fall within the ambit of an industrial dispute, as defined in the Act.[37] Where a discharged workman, having settled his claim under an agreement with the company, made after he had obtained a favourable judgment ex parte in a writ application, contested the validity of the said agreement in a subsequent writ petition, the Calcutta High Court held that the question as to the legality of the said agreement could be determined by an industrial dispute, as it would come within the purview of s 2(k) of the Act.[38]

Employment

Various matters which may give rise to an 'industrial dispute', have been enumerated in the second and the Third Schedules to the Act. 'Employment or non-employment' constitutes the subject-matter of one class of industrial disputes, the other two classes of disputes being those connected with the 'terms of employment' and the 'conditions of labour'. The words 'employment or non-employment' are of the widest amplitude and have been put in juxtaposition, to make the definition of 'industrial dispute' thoroughly comprehensive. The mere fact that the two terms 'employment' and 'non-employment' are connected by 'or' does not imply that they mean or refer to the same process. The rights and liabilities are different in the matter of raising an industrial dispute and the limitations imposed on the workmen. Hence it is proposed to discuss these two expressions under separate Heads. The concept of 'employment' involves three ingredients.

(1) Employer—one who employs, ie, engages the services of other persons;

(2) Employee—one who works for another for hire; and

(3) Contract of employment—the contract of service between the employer and the employee, where under the employee agrees to serve the employer, subject to his control and supervision. [39]

In Western India Automobile Assn, the federal court discussed the import of these words and paraphrased the definition of an 'industrial dispute' as any dispute which has connection with the workmen being in, or out of service or employment. Mahajan J observed:

> Non-employment' is the negative of 'employment' and would mean that the disputes of workmen out of service, with their employers, are within the ambit of the definition. It is the positive or the negative act of an employer, that leads to employment or to non-employment or it may relate to an existing fact of non-employment. It may relate to the existing employment or to a contemplated employment, or it may relate to an existing fact of non-employment or a contemplated non-employment.[40]

The learned judge further elucidated the point by giving the following four illustrations:

(1) An employer has already employed a person and a trade union says: 'please don't employ him'. Such a dispute is a dispute as to employment or in connection with 'employment'.

(2) An employer gives notice to a union, that he wishes to employ two particular persons. The union says: 'No'—This is a dispute as to 'employment'. It arises out of the desire of the employer to employ certain persons.

(3) An employer may dismiss a man or decline to employ him. This matter raises a dispute as to 'non-employment'.

(4) An employer contemplates turning out employees who are already in his employment. It is a dispute as to a contemplated 'non-employment'.

Employment vs The Doctrine of Legitimate Expectation

In Sukhnandan Thakur, Ramaswamy J of Patna High Court (as he then was) observed that 'employment' refers to a condition in which a man is kept occupied in executing any work and it means not only an appointment to any office for the first time, but also the continuity of the appointment.[41] The need for continuity of employment or job security is a basic need of every employed person. The Bombay Textile Labour Enquiry Committee observed:

> There is no fear which haunts an industrial worker more constantly than the fear of losing his job as there is nothing which he prizes more than economic security. The fear of being summarily dismissed for even a slight breach of rules of discipline or for interesting himself in the trade union activity disturbs his peace of mind. It is a notorious fact that dismissals of workers have been the originating causes of not a few industrial disputes and strikes. The provision of effective safeguards against unjust and wrong dismissals is, therefore, in the interest as much of the industry as of the workers.[42] (Italics supplied)

Adverting to the definition in s 2(k), a dispute about 'employment', which is the first of the four subject-matters stipulated in the definition in s 2(k), cannot normally be raised by an unemployed stranger against an employer. In order for a claim to be treated as an industrial dispute relating to 'employment', it should, in the first place, be shown that the person was employed in some capacity by the same employer at some point of time in the past or in the present. The desire for a permanent relationship with the employer and uninterrupted income in the form of wage/salary form the foundation of such a claim. To illustrate, persons engaged on daily wages and/or on casual basis intermittently and are continued as such for a few years stake their claim for permanency of their tenure so that they can get the status and benefits available to permanent employees without interruption. This general presumption is, however, subject to one exception. It is not uncommon that the dependents of employees, who died in harness or who suffered permanent total disablement, also prefer a claim for employment in the organisation on compassionate grounds, even though they have never been employed in the past in any capacity. Quite a few organisations - both in public and private sector - have some sort of regulations which provide for employment of the dependents on compassionate grounds in certain circumstances.

In addition, the Government announces from time to time short-term employment schemes to help the rural and urban poor, such as, Jawahar Rozgar Yojana (JRY) and the like, with a view to provide succour to the unemployed poor. It is also a fact that the normal rules of recruitment and selection are not followed, in view of the fact that the schemes are purely temporary in nature lasting a few months at the most and the work itself is of casual nature. During the past few decades, several disputes were raised by the persons so employed on daily wages and/or casual basis by different departments of the Government, claiming regularization of their services. In most of these cases, the doctrine of 'legitimate expectation' was invoked in support of their claim for regular appointment. The expression "legitimate expectation" was first used by Lord Denning in 1969. In the course of time, it has developed into a significant doctrine all over the world.

The Supreme Court employed this doctrine to check the arbitrary exercise of power by the administrative authorities. Thus the doctrine of legitimate expectation belongs to the realm of Administrative Law. In proceedings of judicial review, it applies the ethics of fairness and reasonableness to the situation where a person has an expectation or interest in a public body retaining a long-standing practice or keeping a promise. As per this doctrine, the public authority can be made accountable on the ground of an expectation which is legitimate. For example, if the Government evolves a scheme for providing electric poles in the villages of a certain area but later on changed it so as to exclude some villages from the purview of the scheme then in such a case what is violated is the legitimate expectations of the people living in the villages excluded from the scheme and the Government can be held responsible if such exclusion is not fair and reasonable. Thus this doctrine becomes a part of the principles of natural justice enshrining the right to hearing to a person to be affected by an arbitrary exercise of power by the public and no one can deprive a person of his legitimate expectations without following the principles of natural justice.[43] It is important to note that the courts have repeatedly emphasized that 'legitimate expectation' is not a legally enforceable right. Even so, non-consideration of a plea for legitimate expectation of a person, who has been adversely affected by a decision, may invalidate the decision on the ground of arbitrariness or irrationality. The plea of legitimate expectation relates to procedural fairness in decision-making and forms part of rule of non-arbitrariness.

In Uma Devi, counsel for respondent employees, who were engaged as temporary and/or contractual and/or casual basis, pressed inter alia the doctrine of legitimate expectation into service in support of the plea for their regularisation in Government service. Rejecting the contention, Balasubramanian, J (for self, Sabharwal, CJI, Arun Kumar, Mathur and Thakker, JJ), observed that the doctrine can be invoked if the decisions of the Administrative Authority affect the person by depriving him of some benefit or advantage which either (i) he had in the past been permitted by the decision-maker to enjoy and which he can legitimately expect to be permitted to continue to do until there have been communicated to him some rational grounds for withdrawing it on which he has been given an opportunity to comment; or (ii) he has received assurance from the decision-maker that they will not be withdrawn without giving him first an opportunity of advancing reasons for contending that they should not be withdrawn. The learned judge further held:

> There is no case that any assurance was given by the Government or the concerned department while making the appointment on daily wages that the status conferred on him will not be withdrawn until some rational reason comes into existence for withdrawing it. The very engagement was against the constitutional scheme. … When a person enters a temporary employment or gets engagement as a contractual or casual worker and the engagement is not based on a proper selection as recognized by the relevant rules or procedure, he is aware of the consequences of the appointment being temporary, casual or contractual in nature. Such a person cannot invoke the theory of legitimate expectation for being confirmed in the post when an appointment to the post could be made only by following a proper procedure for selection and in concerned cases, in consultation with the Public Service Commission. Therefore, the theory of legitimate expectation cannot be successfully advanced by temporary, contractual or casual employees. It cannot also be held that the State has held out any promise while engaging these persons either to continue them where they are or to make them permanent. The State cannot constitutionally make such a promise. It is also obvious that the theory cannot be invoked to seek a positive relief of being made permanent in the post.[44] (Paras 37 & 38)

It is submitted that the learned judge had summed up the principle, which constitutes the perfect essence of the doctrine of 'legitimate expectation', brilliantly and candidly, while deciding the above case against the respondents. During the recent past, several such instances of 'back-door' entry in the name and form of 'casual', 'work-charged', 'contractual' and 'temporary' employees had come to the notice of the apex court with the further claim for regularisation in the permanent service of Government and other public bodies on the only ground that they had been working for a given number of years, in derogation of the rules and regulations governing public employment. In almost all these cases, the plea of 'legitimate expectation', where there was none either express or implied, was pushed into the forefront by the employees in support of their contention for absorption in the permanent service. The Supreme Court rightly unearthed the mischief played by the political establishment and the executive, and came down heavily against such malpractices.

Compassionate Appointments

In Delhi Municipal Workers Union,[45] Cyriac Joseph J of the Delhi High Court held that a dispute relating to a compassionate appointment, raised by the son of a deceased employee, was an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of s 2(k). The learned judge relied on the decision rendered in Kays' Construction Co, in which it was held that in order to be an industrial dispute, it need not be a dispute directly between the employer and his workmen and that the definition of an 'industrial dispute' was wide enough to cover a dispute raised by the employer's workmen, in regard to the non-employment of others who may not be his workmen at the material time.[46] This is a complete contradiction of the decision rendered in Kays' Construction. Joseph J, distinguished 'non-employment' from 'unemployment'. The definition in s 2(k) includes the former and not the latter. There was no policy in the corporation for the appointment of the dependents of workmen who died in harness. The industrial tribunal rightly dismissed the claim for compassionate appointment on the grounds that: (1) the said person was never in the employment of the corporation, (2) he was not a workman as defined in s 2(s) of the Act, and (3) there could be no industrial dispute between him and the corporation. Another ground, which seems to have been appreciated by Joseph J, was the slender fact that the union raised the dispute, and hence, it was an industrial dispute within the meaning of the Act, notwithstanding the fact that the subject matter of the dispute was outside the scope of s 2(k) and the person who preferred the demand, had no nexus, whatsoever, with the corporation. This ruling is not consistent with the spirit of the Act and, hence, requires review and reversal.

In Delhi Development Authority, Khanna J, held that the dispute relating to the compassionate appointment of the son of a deceased workman is an industrial dispute.[47] This decision too, like the one given by Joseph J of the same High Court (supra), is inconsistent with the ratio laid down in Kay's Construction (supra) and other cases. The learned judge observed that the definition in s 2(k) was wide enough 'to cover non-employment of others who might not be employed as workmen at the relevant time' (para 8). This very observation exposes the hollowness of his reasoning as well as his conclusion, for the reason that it implies that the said 'others' might have been employed as workmen by the employer at some point of time in the past. Applying the said argument to the case at hand, could it be said that the 'son' of the deceased workman was employed as a workman in DDA at any time in the past? And could it further be argued that, having been so employed in the past, he has been deprived of his right to continue in employment by an act of the employer, which had given rise to the dispute? At a more basic level, does the definition refer to 'non-employment' or 'unemployment'? Do these two expressions refer to the same thing or different things?

His further observation (para 12) that the tribunal had the power, in the interest of industrial peace, to direct appointment of a candidate on compassionate grounds is no less whimsical and capricious. In what manner could 'industrial peace' be a relevant factor to a case like this? Can a judge bring into play a consideration, which is so trite on the face of it in order to justify an otherwise tenuous argument founded on a wild interpretation placed on the words 'any person' to the point of taking into their fold any person and every person of whatsoever standing and legal status under the ID Act? Both Joseph J, and Khanna J, had misdirected themselves and decided the cases in a reckless manner by patently transgressing their legitimate confines, as if they were messiahs sent to solve the problems of the multitude. These two decisions reflect nothing but a patent abuse of judicial power on their part. Both the decisions deserve to be rejected as being baseless, apart from being repugnant to the letter and spirit of s 2(k).

In striking contrast, Mukul Mudgal J, of the same High Court, in Municipal Employees' Union,[48] peremptorily held that 'a person in respect of whom employer-employee relationship never existed cannot be the subject-matter of industrial dispute'. The facts of the case were identical to those of Delhi Development Authority, ie, compassionate appointment to the son of a deceased workman, whose cause was espoused by the petitioner-union. The Government declined to refer the dispute the reason being that the person concerned was not a 'workman'. The union challenged the order in this petition. Mudgal J, while dismissing the petition, observed that 'any person' in s 2(k) could not be read without limitation and a person in respect of whom the employer-workman relationship never existed and could never possibly exist, could not be the subject matter of dispute between employers and workmen. It goes to the credit of the learned judge that he rightly interpreted the essence and personality of the definition 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k).

In IDPL, the union took up the case of appointment of the dependents of the employees who died in harness. The management agreed to consider the request of the union sympathetically, and to start with engage them as contractors for maintenance of records, cleaning, etc. After a few months of carrying on with the arrangement, the management dispensed with the said system. On a reference, the labour court held that they were the workmen of the company and accordingly directed their reinstatement. The writ petitions filed by the company were dismissed by the High Court on the ground that the minutes of the meeting recorded on 12 August 1988 amounted to settlement and in view thereof, the said workers ceased to be contractors and became the workers of the company. Quashing the order of the courts below, Pasayat J (for self and Chatterjee J) held:

> No production is going on in the company since 1994. These are factors which have been completely lost sight of by the Labour Court and the High Court. ... On bare reading of the minutes of the meeting it is clear that there was in fact no settlement. The relevant portion reads as follows:
>
> The Union demanded that the widows/dependants of deceased employees should be given employment in the plant as was done earlier. They have written several letters in this regard but no fruitful result has come out. The widows/dependants are waiting for employment for the last 2 years and are at the verge of starvation. Till such time, the decision for their employment is received from the corporation office, the management should employ them as contract labour so that they may earn their bread and avoid starvation. Further, the management should ensure payment of minimum wages. The number of such needy widows/dependants of deceased employees is about thirteen. The management agreed to consider the Union suggestion sympathetically. On the request of > Union the Management informed that this will be done in a week's time. (para 15) ...

>
> To provide sustenance to the family members of the deceased workmen certain job works were given. The agreements have been placed on record. The cost of the contract, the nature of the work and the time allowed have been clearly indicated in each of the contracts. It also clearly indicates the number of persons who are to be engaged for carrying out the job contract work. There was no material before the Labour Court to conclude that the contract was not a job contract and in fact employment had been given. There is no foundation for such a conclusion. (para 16) ... Above being the position, the Labour Court and the High Court were not justified in holding that the respondent in each case was a workman and/or that there was retrenchment involved. The award of the Labour Court and the judgment of the High Court are therefore set aside.[49] (para 17)

Non-employment

The words 'employment' or 'non-employment' have not been defined in the Act but 'employment' refers to a condition in which a man is kept occupied in executing any work and it means not only an appointment to any office for the first time, but also the continuity of the appointment.[50] In other words, the concept of employment brings in the contract of service between the employer and the employee.[51] The real test for deciding whether the contract is of employment or not, is to find out whether the agreement was for the personal labour of the person engaged and if that be so, the questions as to whether the contract was one of employment and whether the work was 'time work' or 'piecework', or whether he obtained the assistance of other persons also for the work, are immaterial.[52] A dispute relating to the non-employment of a workman, raised by a union of which he is a member and relating to his employment by other union is an industrial dispute. The failure to employ or the refusal to employ, are actions on the part of the employer, which would be covered by the terms 'employment or non-employment'.[53]Though 'refusal to employ' is not specified in the second or the Third Schedules to the Act, it would be covered by the residuary item in the Second Schedule, viz, item no 6—'all matters other than those specified in the Third Schedule'. Hence, a tribunal will have jurisdiction to adjudicate on an 'industrial dispute' arising out of the 'refusal' of an employer to employ a workman.[54]

In Crompton Engineering, Ismail J of Madras High Court held that the question of 'non-employment' will arise only when the employer refuses to give work to a person who is entitled to work. For instance, where certain workmen are appointed only for a specific period or for a particular work, their employment will automatically come to an end as soon as the period is over or the work is over.[55]

The first part of the observation of Ismail J does not appear to be correct. Employment and non-employment are mutually exclusive and are, in a sense, the opposite of each other. Non-employment in the context of s 2(k) presupposes involuntary unemployment caused by an overt act on the part of the employer as, for instance, discharge, dismissal, retrenchment, etc. In other words, it implies a condition of complete severance of employer-employee relationship by an action attributable to the employer, whereas no such involuntary unemployment is predicated in a dispute relating to 'employment'. That precisely is the basic difference between the two expressions 'employment' and 'non-employment'. That takes us to the question, what is meant by the expression 'employment' appearing in s 2(k) ? It simply means that a group of workmen (or the trade union on their behalf) can, even while being in active employment with the employer as casual workers or on daily wages or even as temporary workmen, raise an industrial dispute seeking regularisation in the permanent service of the establishment. Thus, in a dispute relating to employment, 'termination of service' by a positive act on the part of employer is not a condition precedent for raising an industrial dispute for regularization. In striking contrast, 'non-employment', as the very expression connotes, implies that the factual termination of employment and the consequent severance of relationship are the essential pre-requisites for raising a dispute. The second important difference lies in the fact that, whereas an individual workman can raise a dispute in the event of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination under s 2A which will be deemed to be an industrial dispute, there is no such provision in the Act which confers a right on an individual workman to raise an industrial dispute for his own regularization, during the currency of his employment. Such a dispute relating to 'employment' has to be necessarily espoused either by a trade union or a group of workmen who have a direct and substantial interest in the dispute.

A dispute relating to a termination of service, by discharge,[56] or retrenchment,[57] of workmen and their reinstatement,[58] are disputes connected with their employment or non-employment. Suspension also amounts to a non-employment of a workman.[59] Likewise, a dispute regarding the demand of workmen, that the contract system of labour should be abolished, is also a dispute connected with employment or non-employment[60] but the demand for an equal representation on the Board of Provident Fund Trustees—a statutory body—is not in any way, connected even remotely, with the employment or non-employment of a workman.[61] The dispute regarding the refusal to employ the persons who were promised to be employed, is not connected with the employment or non-employment of any person, within the meaning of s 2(k) of the Act.[62] The refusal of an employer to put pressure on his employees to join a particular union, is not a dispute connected with the employment or non-employment.[63] Similarly, a dispute between a union and an employer, where the employer induced his employees by legal means, to leave the union, is not a dispute connected with the employment or non-employment of the workmen.[64]

There is nothing, either in the statutory definition of an 'industrial dispute', or in the phrase: 'any dispute or difference ... which is connected with the employment or non-employment ... of any person', to suggest that the word 'dispute' excludes a dispute about the discharge simpliciter of a workman. It is one thing to give words in a statute, a restricted meaning; it is another thing to give them a meaning they do not bear. In the context of Indian labour relations, there is no good reason of policy, to gloss the definition so as to protect the preconceived notion of the employer's right to hire and fire. This view is supported by the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in Bird v O'Neal , a case coming from the Leeward Island. The relevant facts were, that a woman clerk, employed in the employer's drug stores, was lawfully dismissed with a week's wages in lieu of a notice. In determining the legality of the picketing that supervened, one of the questions that arose was whether there existed a 'trade dispute', in furtherance of which, the pickets had acted? It was pointed out that there can be no 'trade dispute' between a dismissed employee and a dismissing employer, if the dismissal was lawful, ie, if the period of notice required by law is given or payment in lieu thereof, made. The trial judge rejected this contention, but it was upheld by the West Indian Court of Appeal. In their turn, however, the judicial committee of the Privy Council held:

> their Lordships ... agreed with the trial judge's rejection of the submission that the lawful dismissal of a workman cannot be the subject-matter of a trade dispute.[65]

No specific reasons were given, as in view of the unqualified width of the wording of the definition, none was really required; in this respect, the Act may be allowed to speak for itself. A dispute about the parties to the process of bargaining for the terms and conditions of employment, or for determining the employment or non-employment of any person, will occur when an employer, though allowing the employees to join a trade union, refuses to negotiate with the union, ie, it refuses to recognise the union as a bargaining agent of its employees. Such a dispute has been described by Lord Denning as a 'recognition dispute'. Can such a dispute be an 'industrial dispute'? This question has been considered by the judicial committee in Trinidad Cement, which dealt with the definition of a 'trade dispute', as defined in the Trade Disputes (Arbitration and Inquiry) Ordinance 1950 of Trinidad and Tobago. The judicial committee did not directly answer the question of whether the dispute was connected with the employment or non-employment of any person. It simply held that the recognition dispute was a 'trade dispute'.[66] The acceptance of the principle by the judicial committee in Trinidad Cement, that a recognition dispute is a 'trade dispute', was subsequently approved obiter, both by the court of appeal and by the House of Lords in Stanford.[67] This rule has again been followed by the court of appeal in Torquay Hotel, in which Lord Denning MR said:

> The defendant union claimed that it should be recognised as having authority to negotiate on their behalf. The Torquay hotel refused to recognise them. Such a recognition dispute is, I think, clearly a 'trade dispute' ... and nonetheless so, because, it springs out of the rivalry of one union with another union.[68]

A single judge of the Kerala High Court, in TCC Ltd, held that a 'recognition dispute' is an industrial dispute.[69]

Contract of Employment

The contract of employment is the 'corner-stone of the edifice of industrial law.[70] The general principles of the contract law apply to the creation of the contract of industrial employment, and an agreement of service is equally enforceable, whether it be expressed in writing, in a deed, by word of mouth or by conduct. The ordinary principles of contract law, therefore, apply, so that a right to claim remuneration for services rendered, does not arise in law, unless in fact, there is an agreement, express or implied, to pay for them. Hence, no contract can arise until the minds of the parties are brought together in agreement, which is evidenced by the making of an offer by one party (the offerer) and the acceptance of that offer by the other party (the offeree). Unless the process is completed, there can be no binding obligation between the parties. Cooper and Wood observe:

> The law regards the contract of employment as a personal matter between the two parties. It follows, that agreements arising from collective bargaining, between employers and trade unions, do not ipso facto become part of the individual contracts of employment. The terms agreed, however, will be acted upon by the two sides and will then, by implication, be incorporated as terms in each appropriate contract of employment. Only in an indirect sense, does the system of collective negotiation have a legal effect and the lawyer's interest is strictly confined to the agreement between employer and workman.[71]

The contract of service in industrial employment, therefore, can be entered into by the parties having capacity to do so and for a consideration. A contract of service with an infant will be void ab initio. A contract not supported by consideration, will also have no force of law. Likewise, a contract, the object of which is illegal, will also be void. But a contract entered into under mistake, by misrepresentation, duress and undue influence will be voidable depending upon the circumstances of the case. In construing a contract of industrial employment, like any other contract of service, the court will, if necessary, supply an implied condition as to reasonableness, where duties are not fully defined. If, on the facts, this cannot properly be done, the contract is not binding.[72]One of the recurring problems in industrial law is, how far the relationship between an industrial employer and his employees is explicable in terms of contract. The relation is partly contractual, in that mutual obligations may be created by an agreement made between the employer and the workman. For instance, the agreement may create an obligation on the part of the employer to pay a certain wage and a corresponding obligation on the workman, to render services. The relation of industrial employment is also partly non-contractual, in that the state, by means of legislation or through industrial adjudication, may prescribe many of the obligations that an employer may owe to his employees. Instances of legislations, prescribing statutory terms and conditions of employment are: the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946; the Minimum Wages Act 1948; the Payment of Bonus Act 1965 and the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972, etc. The payment of dearness allowance, enhanced wages and the employee's right to reinstatement in cases of illegal and wrongful discharge and dismissal, are instances of the obligations created by industrial adjudication, through the machinery of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 or analogous state statutes. Industrial adjudication 'may involve extension of an existing agreement, or the making of a new one, or in general, the creation of new obligations or modifications of old ones ...[73] but apart from the statutory obligations or the obligations created by industrial adjudication, there is another sense in which the relation of employer and employee is non-contractual, viz, the terms agreed upon in a collective agreement. According to Gayler:

> 'The substitution of the collective bargaining for the individual contract, has long since modified the traditional relation of employer and employee. A contract of employment today is, in most cases, a standardised contract'. ... The terms of agreement are adhered to, not only by the member of employers' associations and trade unions-pressure of ten ensures that non-members of associations also conform to the agreement ... even in cases where collective bargaining does not lay down particular terms of employment in an industry, trade usage may be so strong that an individual employer will find it difficult in practice, to deviate some terms universally recognised by other employers in the industry.[74]

Indeed, it is sometimes contended that:

> the contract of employment ... has long since become irrelevant and unworkable ... Only by an open admission of a status of employment, can the law hope to keep pace with the practicability of the industrial scene.[75]

In general, a contract of employment does not require any particular form. It may be made by deed, or in writing, or orally, according to the desire of the parties. In practice, most large-scale establishments have standard terms of employment, for at least their lower grade of workers. The intending workmen will be presented with a form containing the stipulations as to the pay, general conditions, and notice, and will be asked to affix his signatures to the form. If the workman refuses his signatures, the employer will not employ him, as there will be no deviation from the terms contained in the document. On the other hand, if the applicant for a job, appends his signatures to the form, even without reading it, then he will be bound by its terms, except in cases where the agreement has been brought about by a mistake, fraud, duress or undue influence, in which case the contract will be voidable.

Contract of employment v Standing Orders

The contract of industrial employment is quite often constituted by the so-called 'letter of appointment', which, besides being one-sided, rarely states anything beyond the date of employment, probationary period, period of notice of termination of service and the wages. In many industrial establishments, the conditions of service are not uniform and sometimes, are not even reduced to writing. Previously, employees were free to contract different terms and conditions of service, with their employees. As Shelat J pointed out:

> Such a state of affairs led to confusion and made possible, discriminatory treatment between employees and employees, though all of them were appointed in the same premises and for the same or similar work. Such a position is clearly incompatible with the principles of collective bargaining and renders their effectiveness difficult, if not, impossible.[76]

In the words of Desai J:

> In the days of laissez-faire, when industrial relation was governed by the harsh weighed law of hire and fire, the management was the supreme master, the relationship being referable to a contract between unequals and the action of the management treated almost sacrosanct. The developing notions of social justice and the expanding horizon of socio-economic justice, necessitated statutory protection to the unequal partners in the industry, namely, those who invest blood and flesh, against those who bring in capital.[77]

This led to conflicts, resulting in unnecessary industrial disputes. For achieving industrial harmony and peace, the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 was enacted by the Parliament, requiring employers in industrial establishments, to define formally, the conditions of employment under them with sufficient precision and to make them known to the workers. The Act applies to every industrial establishment wherein 100 or more workers are employed or were employed on any day of the preceding 12 months. In Salem-Erode, Gajendragadkar CJI observed that the object underlying this Act is to introduce a uniformity of terms and conditions of employment, in respect of workmen belonging to the same category and discharging the same or similar work, under an industrial establishment and to make the said terms and conditions known to the employees before they accept the employment.[78] In Glaxo Laboratories, Desai J observed that moving from the days when the whim of the employer was supreme lex, the Act took a modest step to compel the employer to prescribe the minimum conditions of service, subject to which the employment is given'.[79]

The Act is a beneficent piece of legislation, its object is to require, as its preamble and its long title lay down, the employers in industrial establishments, to define with sufficient precision, the conditions of employment of workmen employed under them and to make them known to such workmen.[80]The movement was from status to contract, the contract not being left to be negotiated by two unequal persons, but statutorily imposed. The Act makes it compulsory for the establishments to which it applies, to reduce in writing, the conditions of employment and get them certified. Section 2 defines various terms, particularly 'certifying officer', 'employer', 'industrial establishment' and 'Standing Orders', while the expression 'workman' carries the same meaning as is assigned to it in the Industrial Disputes Act. Section 3 makes it obligatory upon every industrial establishment to frame Standing Orders in respect of matters set out in the schedule to the Act and submit the same to the 'certifying officer', who shall, after making the necessary inquiry, certify the same, on being satisfied that they have been framed in accordance with the Act. Upon such certification, the Standing Orders become binding upon both the employer and the employees. They are required to be published in the manner prescribed by the Act. Model Standing Orders have been framed, which are to be effective till the certified Standing Orders are made and published under the Act. A failure to submit or frame Standing Orders by the employer, is made punishable by s 13, while s 13A prescribes the forum for the determination of questions arising with respect to the application or interpretation of the certified Standing Orders. The schedule to the Act specifies the matters which have to be provided for in the Standing Orders. Rules have been made that are called Industrial Employment Standing Orders (Central) Rules 1946. The matters in respect of which, conditions of employment are to be certified, have been specified in the schedule appended to the Act. The schedule contains 11 matters in respect of which Standing Orders have to be made.

Originally, the jurisdiction of the certifying officer and the appellate authority was very limited; they were called upon to consider whether the Standing Orders submitted for certification conform to the model Standing Orders or not. Thus, the original jurisdiction of the certifying authorities was limited to examining the draft Standing Orders submitted for certification and compare them with the model Standing Orders.[81] In 1956, the Parliament affected radical changes in the Act, widening its scope and altering its very complexion. Now s 4 casts a duty on the certifying officer or the appellate authority, to adjudicate upon the fairness or reasonableness of the provisions of any Standing Orders. Thus, after the amendment, the jurisdiction of the certifying authorities has become much wider and the scope of the inquiry also, has become correspondingly wider. The inquiry, when such Standing Orders are submitted for certification, is now two-fold:

(1) Whether the Standing Orders are in consonance with the model Standing Orders? and;

(2) Whether they are fair or reasonable?

The workmen, therefore, can raise an objection as to the 'reasonableness of fairness' of the draft Standing Orders submitted for certification. Section 10(2) gives the right, both to the workmen and the employer, to apply for modifications and by reason of the change made in s 4, a modification has also to be tested by the yard-stick of 'fairness and reasonableness'. The Act provides a speedy and cheap remedy to the individual workman, to have the conditions of his service determined and modified. The Parliament has not only broadened the scope of the Act, but has also given a clear expression to the change in its legislative policy.[82]It has also conferred the right on an individual workman, by amending ss 4 and 10, to contest the draft Standing Orders submitted by the employer for certification, on the ground that they are either not fair or not reasonable. And more important still is the right to apply for their modification, despite the finality of the order of the appellate authority under s 6. The Parliament thus, deliberately gave a dual remedy to the workmen, both under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 as well as under the Industrial Disputes Act 1947.[83]

One of the issues debated extensively was the status of CSOS—are they merely contractual terms governing the day-to-day employer-employee relations or should they be considered as having 'statutory force'. The evolution of judge-made law on this question was by no means scientific or rational. Out of the several decisions, a few important decisions which have a bearing on the question have been identified for discussion here. In Bagalkot Cement, Gajendragadkar J, held that IESOA has made relevant provisions for making standing orders which, after they are certified, constitute the statutory terms of employment between the industrial establishments in question and their employees. That is the principal object of the Act.[84] It is important to note that the learned judge clothed the standing orders with 'statutory force'. In Buckingham and Carnatic Mills, the learned judge, however, toned down the said view and held that the CSOS represent the relevant terms and conditions of service in a statutory form and they are binding on the parties at least as much, if not more, as private contracts embodying similar terms and conditions of service.[85] In Dewan Tea, rejecting the contention that Standing Order 8(a)(i) of the company, which were certified before inserting the definition of 'layoff' in IDA, should be construed in the light of the said definition, the learned judge observed:

> ... Section 10(1) of the Standing Orders Act provides that the Standing Orders finally certified under this Act shall not, except on agreement between the employer and the workmen, be liable to modification until the expiry of six months from the date on which the Standing Orders or the last modification thereof came into operation. If the Standing Orders thus become the part of the statutory terms and conditions of service, they will govern the relations between the parties unless, of course, it can be shown that any provision of the Act is inconsistent with the said Standing Orders.[86] (italics supplied)

In a later case involving Buckingham and Carnatic Mills, the Labour Court took the view that the certified standing orders, though binding on the employer and workers, had no statutory force and that they were merely directive and not mandatory. Quashing the said order, Vaidialingam J, held that CSOS become part of the statutory terms and conditions of service between the employer and his employees.[87] In DK Yadav, Ramaswamy J, held that CSOS have statutory force and do not expressly exclude the application of the principles of natural justice.[88] In RSRTC, the question raised was: 'whether the CSOS could be elevated to the status of a statutory provision or do they have statutory force so as to be amenable to a decree by a civil court in the event of their violation by the employer'. Justice Jeevan Reddy (for self, Sen and Nanavati JJ) summed up the legal position thus:

> The Act does not say that on such certification, the Standing Orders acquire statutory effect or become part of the statute. It can certainly not be suggested that by virtue of certification, they get metamorphosed into delegated/subordinate legislation. ... The consensus of these decisions is: the certified Standing Orders constitute statutory terms and conditions of service. Though we have some reservations as to the basis of the above dicta as pointed out supra, we respectfully accept it both on the ground of stare decisis as well as judicial discipline. Even so, we are unable to say that they constitute "statutory provisions" within the meaning of the dicta in Sukhdev Singh,[89]...if it is held that certified Standing Orders constitute statutory provisions or have statutory force, a writ petition would also lie for their enforcement just as in the case of violation of the Rules made under the proviso to Article 309 of the Constitution. Neither a suit would be necessary nor a reference under Industrial Disputes Act. We do not think the certified Standing Orders can be elevated to that status. It is one thing to say that they are statutorily imposed conditions of service and an altogether different thing to say that they constitute statutory provisions themselves.[90]

The above decisions, when read together present a foggy and even clumsy picture, conveying all things to all people, and for that very reason merit some analysis. As discussed in the preceding paragraphs, standing orders are merely a set of 'express' and 'general' terms governing employment relationship in the industrial realm. They imply nothing more than an extended individual contract of employment, the only difference being that they apply across-the-board to all 'workmen' employed in the establishment, whereas the former may, and often do, contain special terms as negotiated and contracted between the employer and the individual workmen. The second important difference lies in the fact that while the contract of employment is a negotiated instrument between the employer and an individual workman, the CSOS are certified by an independent officer representing the Government under the provisions of the IESOA.

The decision of Gajendragadkar J, in Bagalkot that certified standing orders constitute statutory terms of employment seems to be an extreme view as the expression 'statutory' has its own heavy-weight connotation in contra-distinction to 'contractual'. The mere fact that the standing orders are certified by the certifying officer cannot transform the otherwise 'contractual' terms into those having 'statutory force', any more than the signing of a 'settlement' by the conciliation officer u/s 12(3) of the IDA can transform it into an 'award'. With great reverence to the eminent judge, it is submitted that this ruling is misconceived and is wrong. His observation in Buckingham and Carnatic Mills is, though milder than that of Bagalkot Cement, still not free from 'statutory' overtones. What is meant by the expression 'statutory form', if not something having the force of a statute? Is it possible to differentiate, qualitatively, the expression 'statutory form' from 'statutory force', which are inseparable like 'word and meaning' or 'fire and heat'? The subsequent decisions of Vaidialingam J, and Ramaswamy J, had only aggravated the uncertainty. Between the two, Vaidialingam J, was more moderate in his observation that the CSOS become part of 'statutory terms and conditions of service', whereas Ramaswamy J., went thus far as to hold that they have 'statutory force'. With great respect for the learned judges, all these expressions are nebulous and obscure.

It was Jeevan Reddy J, who rightly observed that, though the Bench had some reservations as to the basis of the above dicta, it was respectfully accepting them on the ground of stare decisis as well as judicial discipline. The learned judge further held that it is one thing to say that certified standing orders are 'statutorily imposed conditions of service' and quite another to suggest that they constitute 'statutory provisions' themselves. The correctness of the view of Jeevan Reddy J, can be testified from another angle also. Since the issue related to a State Road Transport Corporation, which is a public sector undertaking amenable to writ jurisdiction, let us take the illustration of public sector undertakings for the purpose of analysis. Let us assume that there are two public sector undertakings 'A' and 'B' located side-by-side with 'A' having less than 100 workmen and 'B' employing more than 100. As required by the Act, 'B' has to frame the standing orders and get them certified, whereas in respect of 'A' there is no such requirement, which means there are no standing orders at all. Let us also assume that the two units dismissed a few workmen for certain acts of misconduct. If the court were to rely on Sukhdev Singh as contended by counsel for respondent, it would produce an anomalous situation inter se in so far as the workmen of unit 'B' could get relief of reinstatement by knocking at the doors of civil court or by directly approaching the High Court under Art. 226, whereas the workmen of unit 'A' will be left with no relief, as there were no standing orders with the so-called 'statutory force'. Justice Jeevan Reddy had in fact highlighted this absurdity. It is not out of place to mention that the majority decision in Sukhdev Singh itself was wrong, which is plagued by a battery of misconceptions and perverse reasoning. It is not within the scope of this book to analyse the perplexing observations made by Ray CJI in that case, hence it is left at that. It is submitted that the CSOS constitute merely general terms and conditions of service formulated under IESOA and certified or, more appropriately, 'sanctified' by the certifying officer; nothing more and nothing less. It is also necessary to note that the CSOS are neither exclusive nor exhaustive, and that they operate coextensively with the special terms and conditions between the employer and the individual workmen, some of which may involve a deviation from, or exception to, the CSOS. Viewed thus, the decision of Jeevan Reddy J in RSRTC is right in so far as the legal status of the CSOS is concerned, and those of the earlier judges are clearly wrong.[91] However, the other part of the decision of Jeevan Reddy J, which touches upon the concurrent jurisdiction of civil courts in respect of industrial disputes, is clearly out of step with the spirit of industrial relations law and is inconsistent with Premier Automobiles,[92] which is an authority for the proposition that the jurisdiction of civil courts stands ousted by necessary implication. Thus, the decision of the learned judge in so far as it related to the so-called concurrent jurisdiction of civil courts is wholly repugnant to the scheme and objects of the ID Act.

The terms of the certified Standing Orders will prevail over the terms of a contract which conflict with the Standing Orders.[93]The Act being a socially beneficent Act and enacted for ameliorating the conditions of the weaker partner, the conditions of service prescribed thereunder must receive such interpretation as to advance the intention underlying the Act and to defeat the mischief.[94] In Hindustan Steel,[95] Desai J observed that a Standing Order which confers arbitrary, uncanalised and drastic powers to dismiss an employee, by merely stating that it is inexpedient or against the interest of security, to continue to employ the workman, is violative of the basic requirements of the principles of natural justice, inasmuch as that the employer cannot impose a penalty of such a drastic nature as to affect the livelihood and put a stigma on the character of a workman, without recording the reasons as to why the disciplinary inquiry was dispensed with and what the misconduct alleged against him was. Though in this case, the court did not consider it necessary to go into the vires of the relevant Standing Order, because the order of dismissal in terms of the Standing Order itself was found to be unsustainable, it exhorted the management, which was a public sector undertaking, to bring the Standing Order in tune with the philosophy of the Constitution, failing which the vires of the Standing Order may be examined in a proper proceeding. In Tulsiram Patel, a Constitution Bench upheld the validity of a similar provision under Art. 311 of the Constitution.[1] In Hari Pada Khan, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of a Standing Order of the Indian Oil Corporation, which permitted the removal or dismissal from service, without following the procedure of inquiry etc. The Standing Order provided that where a workman had been convicted of a criminal offence or where the general manager was satisfied for reasons to be recorded in writing, that it was not expedient or in the interest of security to continue the workman, the workman may be removed or dismissed from service, without following the prescribed procedure. The court observed that:

> The doctrine of principle of natural justice has no application when the authority concerned is of the opinion that it would be inexpedient to hold an enquiry and that it would be against the interest of security of the Corporation to continue in employment the offender workman when serious acts are likely to affect the foundation of the institution. In Tulsi Ram Patel v Union of India .... a Constitution Bench of this Court upheld the validity of the similar provisions under Article 311 of the Constitution. Recently, in SLP [C] No.11659/92 ... where the validity of pari materia provision was questioned. This Court upheld the validity stating that > the above clause will operate prospectively. ... A contention has been raised by Mr. Krishnamani that in Tulsi Ram Patel's case [supra] this Court had upheld the validity of the Rule subject to the principle of natural justice. It is needless to mention that the principle of natural justice requires to be modulated consistent with the scheme of the Rules. It is settled law that the principle of natural justice cannot supplant but can supplement the law. In that view of the matter, the Rule having been made to meet specified contingency the principle of natural justice by implication, stands excluded. We do not think that the Rule is ultra vires of Articles 14 and 21 as stated earlier.[2]

Determination of the Contract of employment

There is a variety of modes in accordance with which, the contract of employment gets determined. An employer may terminate the contract of employment according to the terms of the contract itself or he may terminate the contract as a measure of punishment, inflicted by way of a disciplinary action, for an act of misconduct. Apart from the death of one of the parties,[3] the contract of employment may be determined by impossibility,[4] frustration or voluntary retirement. The contract may also be determined on a transfer or closure of the undertaking. The employee, may, on the other hand, terminate the contract of employment by voluntarily retiring, ie, resigning or abandoning the job. The contract may also be determined on reaching the age of superannuation or by the continuous ill health of the employee. In cases where the contract is determined by the volition of the employee, it is not a termination of the contract by the employer. In such cases, the employer is merely acceding to the employees' request or action.[5] The determination of a contract is the major cause of industrial disputes and has produced a good bit of judicial grist. These topics, therefore, are being discussed in detail:

By the Employee

The employee may determine the contract of employment by voluntarily retiring from service, viz, by resigning his job or abandoning the job. Voluntary retirement means the determination of the contract of employment by the volition of the employee himself, in contradistinction to an act on the part of the employer, to terminate the service. 'Termination of service' and 'voluntary retirement' are two different concepts. A mere submission of the employee to the termination of his service by the employer, is not a 'voluntary' act on the part of the former. By and large, an employee is said to have determined the contract of employment voluntarily, when he resigns his job or abandons the same. The expression 'voluntary retirement' has been used in the exclusionary sub-cl (a) of the definition of retrenchment in cl (oo) of s 2 of the Act. This expression comprehends both the topics, viz, 'resignation' and 'abandonment of the job'.

(i) Resignation:

It is the common law right of an employee to determine the contract of service by resigning his job. In the language of Madon J:

> By entering upon a contract of employment, a person does not sign a bond of slavery and a permanent employee cannot be deprived of his right to resign. A resignation by an employee would, however, normally, require to be accepted by the employer in order to be effective.[6]

If on the other hand, the resignation is not accepted, then in the absence of any other terms to the contrary, the law implies that the contract of service could be terminated by a reasonable notice and unless the employer complies with this implied term of law, it cannot be said that the contract of service has been put to an end to and consequently, the resignation will not be effective, but before a resignation could be effective, it must terminate the contract of service in a legally defined mode. If the resignation is accepted, then the contract of employment will be discharged by the consent of the parties. The view that the moment an employee tenders his resignation, it becomes effective and the bond of service is completely snapped, is likely to introduce chaos in the sector of employment.[7] In JK Cotton, Ahmadi J observed that the resignation is not complete until it is accepted by the appropriate authority. In other words, 'before such acceptance, an employee can change his mind and withdraw his resignation, but once the resignation is accepted, the contract comes to an end and the relationship of master and servant stands snapped. The learned judge further observed:

> If an employee makes his intention to resign his job known to the employer and the latter accepts the resignation, the contract of employment comes to an end and with it stands severed, the employer-employee relationship.[8]

The general rule regarding resignations is that when an employee has invited by his letter of resignation, the determination of his employment, his services normally stand terminated from the date on which the letter of resignation is accepted by the appropriate authority or from any other date in the letter of resignation. In the absence of any law or rule governing the conditions of service to the contrary, it will not be open to the employee to withdraw his resignation after it has been accepted by the appropriate authority or after the date indicated in the letter of resignation. Till the resignation is accepted by the appropriate authority, in accordance with the rules governing the acceptance or on the expiry of the date indicated in the letter of resignation, the employee has locus poenitentiae, but not thereafter.[9] Any undue delay in intimating the acceptance of the resignation, may justify an inference that the resignation has not been accepted.[10] However, in the case of a resignation which remains unaccepted, the employee cannot be deemed to be in service for months or years together. After the lapse of a reasonable period of notice, the contract would be deemed to have come to an end, whether the resignation is accepted or not.[11] A resignation by an employee can be validly withdrawn before its acceptance by the employer is communicated[12] but he cannot be permitted to withdraw the resignation after it has been accepted by the employer, because after the acceptance, the contract of employment gets determined and the employee thereafter, is no longer in service.[13]The legal position is that the resigner has a right to resign, but the resignation can be effective only after its acceptance as it is a bilateral act. In other words, the resignation is by the employee, while the acceptance is by the employer. Unless the two acts are completed, the transaction remains in an inchoate form. Thus, a resignation sent by the employee is no resignation in the eye of the law until accepted by the employer and so long as it is not an effective resignation, there is no bar on withdrawing the same.[14]

In Sudha Nagaraj, the employer tendered his resignation due to domestic reasons but the acceptance was not communicated to him till he applied for a withdrawal of the resignation. A single judge of the Andhra High Court held that a mere oral information regarding the acceptance of the resignation, was not sufficient and valid. Hence, he was entitled to withdraw his resignation.[15] In JK Cotton, the Supreme Court held that the determination of the contract of employment by the resignation of the employee himself, was not retrenchment, because it was not brought about by the employer. The court discountenanced the holding of the High Court that by accepting the resignation of the employee, the employer had brought about the termination of his service. The principle will squarely apply to the cases of abandonment of job as well, as both resignation and abandonment of job are species of the same genesis, viz, voluntary retirement.[16]

If the employee resigns in praesenti, the resignation terminates his office tenure forthwith, on an acceptance by the employer and cannot be withdrawn or revoked after acceptance but if the employee chooses to resign from a future date, the act of resignation is not complete, because it does not terminate the tenure of his service forthwith on acceptance and the employee can, before the arrival of the prospective date on which it was intended to be effective, withdraw the resignation. In other words, in the absence of a legal, contractual or constitutional bar, a 'prospective' resignation can be withdrawn at any time before it becomes effective and it becomes effective when it operates to terminate the office tenure of the resigner.[17] In a case where the resignation is withdrawn before being accepted and the withdrawal is effective, the result would be that the resignation shall be deemed to have been not in force at any time and the employee shall be deemed to have been in service throughout the period. The consequential order that he is entitled to the arrears of salary, need not be specifically mentioned in the order. It is a claim which flows from the relief of a deemed declaration that the employee has been in service throughout and, therefore, he shall be entitled to the wages and all the other benefits for that period.[18]

In JN Srivastava, the Supreme Court held that even if a voluntary retirement notice is moved by an employee and it gets accepted by the authority within the time fixed, then, before the date of retirement is reached, the employee has locus penetentiae to withdraw the proposal for voluntary retirement.[19] The Supreme Court reiterated the same view in Nand Keshwar Prasad.[20] In Shambhu Murari Sinha, the facts were: the employee gave a letter exercising his option of voluntary retirement, on 18 October 1995, which was accepted by the management vide their letter dated 30 July 1997 but the employee was not relieved from service and was allowed to continue in service till 26 September 1997. In the meantime, the employee withdrew his letter opting for voluntary retirement vide his letter dated 7 August 1997, which was refused by the management. Allowing the appeal, the Supreme Court held that for all practical purposes, 26 September 1997 was the effective date on which he was supposed to be relieved, and that the employee could withdraw the option exercised by him before the effective date.[21] In State of Haryana, the Supreme Court, referring to rr 2.2 and 5.32(B) of the Punjab Civil Service Rules, held that if a permission to retire was not refused within the period specified in sub-cl (1) of r 5.32(B), the retirement would become effective from the date of expiry of the period and that there was no provision in the rules to withhold the permission in certain contingencies and the voluntary retirement would take effect automatically, on the expiry of the period specified in the notice. The court further held that there was no need to communicate the acceptance of the notice to the employee, nor could it be said that non-communication of the acceptance should be treated as amounting to a withholding of the permission.[22]

In KSRTC, the facts were: the employee submitted his resignation of 5 February 1994. The same was accepted by the management on 8 February, but the employee withdrew the resignation on 9 February, ie, before the acceptance was communicated to him and before it became effective. The management, however, relieved him on 11 February, by communicating the order of acceptance. The Karnataka High Court held that the resignation could become effective only on communication and from the date on which the communication was received, and hence, the relieving of the employee by the management was illegal.[23] The resignation, if tendered voluntarily, can be withdrawn by the employee before it is accepted.[24] Where the employee gave the letter of resignation voluntarily, which was accepted immediately and the same was communicated to him orally, on the same day, and the employee also understood it that his resignation was accepted and, therefore, he did not return to duty from that date onwards, the argument that the contract cannot be brought into existence or terminated except in writing, could not be accepted. Once the offer of resignation has been accepted, the termination of service is complete.[25] Where the employee submits his resignation letter, to be effective on a future date, the employer would not be entitled to relieve the employee before the date fixed by him, that the request, for resignation remains inchoate till the date fixed by the employee and that he has the right to withdraw the resignation at any time before the effective date.[26]

The above rulings warrant an examination. Where an employee offers to resign from a future date, and if the employer is willing to pay the employee the wages for the remainder of the notice period and relieve him immediately, there is no justification for the court to permit such employee to continue. The courts have yet to realise the fact that an employee, who has decided to leave the services of a company for whatever personal or official reasons or other frustrations, could cause irreparable damage to the company's interests, as for instance, by passing on classified information or trade secrets or formulae to a competitor or to his prospective employer, or tampering with the records and other sensitive documents, or canvassing among his colleagues, against the company and so forth. The employer has the inherent right to accept the resignation and relieve him forthwith, without having to wait for the period of notice to expire, however, he should pay the employee the wages or salary for the unserved portion of the notice period. The proposition, that the employer should necessarily retain an employee till the expiry of the period of notice, revolts against common sense and borders on tyranny, apart from seriously imperiling the security of the employer's business in the context of a highly competitive environment.

In Haryana SCD Federation (supra), the High Court applied the ratio evolved by the apex court in Gopal Chandra Misra,[27] and Balram Gupta,[28] both of which were wrongly decided. The learned judges of the Supreme Court grossly failed to appreciate the highly sensitive issues touching upon the interest and security of the employer and his business, and proceeded to decide the cases in a casual manner. All the above decisions require to be reviewed and correct legal position laid down consistent with the settled law governing the determination of the contract of employment. In Jayakodi Jacob, the Madras High Court held that once the option in favour of voluntary retirement has been exercised and the benefits have been received by the employee, nothing remains to be done by the employer, in view of the fact that the employee has accepted the compensation without any protest, reservation or demur.[29]

In the absence of any Standing Orders, bye-laws or rules governing the resignation of employees in a company, it has to be judged with reference to the ordinary law of the land, that is the law of contract. A resignation submitted by an employee is in the form of an offer. It is open to the management to accept the offer or reject it but it is not open to the management to accept the resignation with effect from a date different from the one indicated in the letter of resignation. Such an acceptance would not really be the acceptance of the offer, but would amount to a counter-offer, which must again be accepted by the employee. If the employer accepts the resignation from the date indicated in the letter of resignation, it would not amount to a termination of service by the employer. However, if the resignation is accepted from a date different than the one indicated in the resignation letter; the termination of the service from such date would be deemed to be an independent action, which would amount to a termination of the service by the employer.[30] The termination of the service of an employee, by accepting his resignation, cannot tantamount to a discharge as a punishment,[31] but, if before accepting the resignation, the employer starts disciplinary proceedings against the employee and dismisses him, the resignation will have no effect in the event of the dismissal being held wrongful, as the contract of service would not have been discharged.[32] By voluntarily resigning his job, an employee himself determines the contract of employment. Hence, he cannot validly raise an industrial dispute with respect to a termination of his service and reinstatement[33] but cases do arise where employees allege that the resignation had been obtained under coercion, duress, misrepresentation or fraud or is a forged one. In such cases, what is normally in issue is the genuineness of the resignation. If the resignation has been procured by such methods or threats or intimidation, the consequential termination of service will be invalid, because such a resignation is no resignation in the eye of law.

In JK Cotton, the employee had determined the contract of his employment by a resignation but subsequently, he raised an 'industrial dispute' with respect to the termination of his employment, which was referred to the labour court for adjudication. The labour court held that the resignation of the employee was not voluntary and, therefore, the termination of his service was illegal. Consequently, the labour court awarded a reinstatement. In a writ petition though, the High Court came to the conclusion that the resignation tendered by the employee was voluntary and without any threat or coercion. On a construction of the definition of 'retrenchment', it was held that the termination of the employment amounted to retrenchment, as the service was terminated by the employer, by accepting the resignation of the employee. Setting aside the orders of the courts below, the Supreme Court held that it was a case of 'voluntary retirement' on the part of the employee and not a case of termination of his service by the employer.[34]

(ii) Abandonment of Job:

The contract of service comes to an end where the workman abandons his job but 'abandonment of service' has not been defined in the Act. Etymologically, the word 'abandonment' has been explained to mean 'to leave completely and finally'; forsake utterly; to relinquish, to renounce, to give up all concern in something;[35] relinquishment of an interest or claim;[36] abandonment when used in relation to an office means 'voluntary relinquishment'.[37] In order to constitute an 'abandonment', therefore, there must be a total or complete giving up of the duties, so as to indicate an intention not to resume the same. Abandonment must be total and under circumstances which clearly indicate an absolute relinquishment. A failure to perform the duties pertaining to an office, must be with an actual or imputed, intention on the part of the officer to abandon and relinquish the office. In Buckingham & Carnatic, Gajendragadkar CJI held that abandonment or relinquishment of service is always a question of intention and, normally, such an intention cannot be attributed to an employee without adequate evidence in that behalf. A temporary absence is not, ordinarily, sufficient to constitute an 'abandonment of an office'. Under common law, an inference that an employee has abandoned or relinquished service, is not easily drawn, unless from the length of absence and from the other surrounding circumstances, an inference to that effect can be legitimately drawn and it can be assumed that the employee intended to abandon his service. However, where the parties agree upon the terms and conditions of service or they are included in the certified Standing Orders, the doctrine of common law or considerations of equity would not be relevant. It is then, a matter of construing the relevant term itself.[38] However, the 'intention may be inferred from the acts and conduct of the party'. The question as to whether the job, in fact has been abandoned or not, is a question of fact which is to be determined in the light of the surrounding circumstances of each case.[39] A mere absence of a workman from duty, cannot be treated as an 'abandonment' of service. The word 'absent', according to the dictionary meaning, means 'not present' or 'not being in a particular place at a particular time'. 'Absence' therefore, would mean to be 'absent from a specified position and not physically present'. The meaning of the word 'abandoned' depends upon the context in which it is intended to be used.[40]

The presumption of the employee having abandoned the job on his own accord, on account of an absence from duty, for a period exceeding a certain number of consecutive days, without leave or permission, may be made rebuttable by a Standing Order or a rule. In such a situation, it would be open to the workman to contend, in the first instance, that in fact, he was not absent for the prescribed number of days. It is further open to him to satisfactorily explain the reasons for his absence from work.[41] When an employee loses his lien on the job upon the happening of a contingency, ie, absenting without leave for a certain number of days, under the Standing Orders, that would bring an automatic termination of the contract of service. On a construction of the relevant Standing Order, which provided that a workman who does not report for duty within eight days of the expiry of the sanctioned leave, will lose his lien on the appointment, the Wanchoo CJI held that the service of the concerned workman stood automatically terminated when he did not appear for eight days after the expiry of his leave.[42] In Indian Iron and Steel Co, the concerned workmen were taken in police custody and they applied for leave from the custody, which was refused by the employer. On the construction of the relevant Standing Order, which provided that any workman who was absent for 14 consecutive days without permission, will be automatically discharged from service, the Supreme Court held that on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the automatic discharge of the workmen was unassailable. The court pointed out that:

> ... if the workmen are arrested at the instance of the company, for the purpose of victimisation and in order to get rid of them on the ostensible pretext of continued absence, the position will be different. It will then be a colorable or mala fide exercise of power under the relevant Standing Order...[43]

In Binny,[44] the workman was held to have himself left the service, terminating his contract under the relevant Standing Order, for 'absenting himself without leave for eight consecutive working days' but a single judge of the Delhi High Court, in Delhi Cloth Mills, held that where the absence of the workman from work, was due to any reason beyond his control and it was possible for the employer to grant leave without pay, it would be unreasonable and mala fide for the employer to decline to grant leave to the 'extent necessary'.[45] In this case, the workman had been detained under the Defence of India Rules and the employer refused to grant leave without pay, for an indefinite period of about six months or so. In the circumstances of the case, the court held that the refusal of the employer to grant leave without pay was unreasonable and amounted to an act of victimisation or unfair labour practice.

The Gujarat High Court, in Bata India, where the workman, suffering from a protracted illness due to a fracture of a leg, in a foreign country, could not join duty as required by the Standing Order, before the expiry of the granted leave, because after a further check up, he was advised further rest and the certificate of such advice was received by the employer after the order of termination, held that since the workman was prevented from joining duty for a sufficient cause, the termination of service on the basis of the Standing Order was not sustainable.[46] In Dabur, the workman had applied for an extension of his sanctioned leave but the employer neither granted nor refused to grant the leave. In this situation, the Calcutta High Court held that it was a case of an automatic termination of service under the relevant Standing Order.[47] In Shambhu Nath Mukherjee, the relevant Standing Order provided that where a workman absents himself for 'more than eight consecutive days', his name will be automatically struck off the rolls of the company. The workman first attended the work on 14 August 1965 and 15 August 1965 was a holiday. His name was struck off the rolls of the company on 24 August 1965. In the circumstances, the court observed that the Standing Order was not attracted, because the workman was not absent for more than eight consecutive days.[48].

On the other hand, in Shambhoo Singh, in the circumstances of the case, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the workman concerned, had lost his lien on his appointment due to an over-stay of the granted leave, in terms of the relevant Standing Order.[49] Similarly in Freewheels India, where the workman remained absent for eight consecutive days, without offering any explanation for his absence and only submitted a certificate of fitness, he was deemed to have left the service of the employer, in terms of the relevant Standing Order. The court observed that the certificate of fitness, without anything more, could not be said to amount to an explanation or an absence without leave as envisaged in the relevant Standing Order, particularly when the provision therein was that such explanation had to be to the satisfaction of the departmental head.[50] The Bombay High Court, in Baba Saheb Devgonda Patil, held that striking off the name of a workman from the rolls, who had remained absent for about three years without any justification, would not constitute retrenchment. The court observed that though striking the name of a workman off the roll, without anything more, would constitute retrenchment, every striking off of a name from the rolls would not constitute retrenchment. The intention to abandon the job is normally not to be attributed to an employee. It would ultimately depend on the established facts and circumstances of each case. It is not possible to lay down a universal proposition, that a long and continuous absence for years together, without any reasons or justification whatever and without anything more, cannot give rise to an inference of abandonment.[51] In WB Board of Secondary Education, the employee absented himself without notice and did not resume duties in spite of requests. Consequently, he was discharged from service. Another employee was appointed in his place. After a lapse of seven years, he filed an appeal under the relevant regulations. The appellate committee rejected the prayer for a reinstatement and the consequential reliefs. The committee, however, directed the employer to pay gratuity to the employee, calculated at the rate of one month's salary, for each year of the completed service; this direction was upheld by the Calcutta High Court.[52]

In cases where an employer company seeks to terminate the service of a workman, in terms of a Standing Order or a regulation, it has to give effect to the whole of the Standing Order or the regulation and cannot close its eyes to the restrictions prescribed in such Standing Order or regulation. For instance, where, in addition to providing that a workman who remains absent for a certain number of days without leave, shall be deemed to have abandoned the service without notice, thereby terminating his contract of service, the Standing Order further provides that if the workman gives a satisfactory explanation of his absence, his absence shall be converted into leave, the whole of the Standing Order has to be given effect to.[53] Occasionally, there are alternative provisions in the Standing Orders, dealing with the absence of a workman beyond a certain specified period of time. In Travancore Rayons, one of the Standing Orders of the company provided that a workman who is absent without permission, for more than 20 days in aggregate in a year, and for eight days continuously, will be deemed to have voluntarily left the company's service, even though he has applied for leave and his leave had not been sanctioned while, another Standing Order provided that an absence without leave, for more than eight consecutive days, was also a misconduct in respect of which a penalty could be imposed by the management. The Kerala High Court held that the correct way to understand the scheme of the Standing Order was that in case where an employee is found to have been absent from duty without leave, for eight consecutive days, the management has the option to enforce the provisions of the former Standing Order and treat the employee as having voluntarily left the services, or treat him as still continuing in the service of the company and to impose a penalty on him regarding his absence, treating it only as a misconduct.[54]

In Hamdard Dawakhana, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that if a workman overstays his leave by the period prescribed by the Standing Orders, he loses his lien on the appointment and his services stand automatically terminated and if there is any other clause for treating his absence as a misconduct, the management is entitled to proceed against the workman under either of the clauses. In other words, it is open to the management to take recourse to one or the other provision, according to its discretion. If there is a provision for rejoining, the workman can rejoin duty within the period prescribed, after the expiry of his leave, if he offers an explanation that satisfies of the management, as required by the Standing Order.[55] The absence of workmen from work, when they go on a strike, with the specific object of enforcing the acceptance of their demand, cannot lead to the conclusion that they have abandoned their employment, as a strike, in law, does not bring the contract of industrial employment to an end.[56]There is no such thing as a lien on service. A lien is always on a post. Lien is the right of an employee to resume or return to duty, a substantive or acting appointment, from which he was relieved. But once a workman has terminated the contract of employment by abandoning his job, the question of lien would not arise.[57]

The abandonment of job by an employee is also comprehended in the expression 'voluntary retirement', used in the definition of retrenchment in s 2(oo). The words 'voluntary retirement' in the context, is accentuated. In other words, in such cases, the determination of the contract of employment must have been brought about by a voluntary abandonment of the job. In common law, an inference that an employee has abandoned or relinquished his job, is not easily drawn, unless from the length of his absence and from other surrounding circumstances, an inference to that effect can be legitimately drawn and it can be assumed that the employee intends to abandon his service.[58] The measure of the length of the time required before making such inference, may vary in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. In order to obviate uncertainties, provisions are made in the service rules or the Standing Orders of the commercial and industrial establishments, to the effect that an absence of the employee, for a certain number of days, will be deemed as an abandonment of the employment, unless otherwise explained by him. The certified Standing Orders of an industrial establishment would have the force of statutorily imposed conditions of service. In such cases, the doctrine of common law or the consideration of equity would be relevant. It would be a matter of construction of the relevant terms of the Standing Orders themselves, that would matter.

In Robert D'Souza, the management struck the name of an employee, off its rolls, stating that 'you have absented yourself from 18 September 1974 and hence, your services are deemed to have been terminated from the day you have absented yourself'. From the language of this order, the court inferred that the service was terminated by the employer and as such the act came under retrenchment.[59] In Ram Samujh Maurya, the employee remained absent for more than two years without leave and despite a number of letters sent to him, he neither cared to join, nor contacted the employer. From such long absence, without any rhyme or reason, the court inferred that the workman had abandoned his job. As such, his services stood terminated automatically, which termination was brought about by the workman himself and not by the employer and, hence, it would not fall within the definition of retrenchment. The learned single judge of the Allahabad High Court, observed:

> In cases where services stand terminated automatically, principles of retrenchment cannot be applied. Abandonment of job is one such instance. If the workman himself willingly abandoned his job, it cannot be said that he has been retrenched and the question of paying compensation in these circumstances, does not arise.[60]

In DK Yadav, the relevant clause of the certified Standing Orders of the employer company provided that if a workman remained absent without sanctioned leave or beyond a period of leave granted or subsequently extended, 'he shall lose his lien on the appointment, unless he returns' 'within 8 calendar days of the commencement of the absence, or the expiry of the leave originally granted or subsequently extended' and he 'explains to the satisfaction of the manager or the management, the reasons of his absence or his inability to return on the expiry of the leave'. In the absence of a compliance with these requirements, the workman shall be deemed to have 'automatically abandoned the service and lost his lien on his appointment. Thereafter, his name will be struck off from the muster rolls'. In this case, the employer, by its letter dated 12 December 1980, which was received by the workman on 19 December 1980, intimated to him that he had wilfully absented from duty continuously, for more than eight days, from 3 December 1980, without leave or prior information or intimation or previous permission from the management and therefore, he was 'deemed to have left the service of the company' on his account and lost lien on his appointment with effect from 3 December 1980, in terms of cl 13(2)(iv) of the certified Standing Order of the company. On the other hand, the workman averred that despite his reporting on duty on 3 December 1980 and every day continuously, thereafter, he was prevented from entering through the gate and he was not allowed to sign the attendance register, without assigning any reason. In these peculiar circumstances, a three judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that the procedure adopted by the employer was not just, fair and reasonable, inasmuch as no opportunity was given to him and no inquiry was held. The court further observed that the principles of natural justice must be read into the relevant Standing Orders, otherwise, they would be arbitrary, unjust and unfair. Hence, the impugned order was liable to be struck down. In the peculiar circumstances of the case, the court ordered reinstatement, with only fifty per cent back wages.[61] On the other hand, on the facts and in the circumstances of Amgauda Sidram Hakke, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the inference of a voluntary abandonment of service was justified and even assuming that the termination was for an act of misconduct, without having held an inquiry, it was not a fit case for a judicial review, because the petitioner's case of sickness was not true.[62] In Gouranga Acharjee, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the right guaranteed to the management, to terminate the services of a workman, in this case a probationer, for a continuous, unauthorised absence or overstaying of leave, was not absolute and the principles of natural justice, which have to be read into the offending clause, must be complied with, and that past absence should not be a ground for invoking the relevant rule of the Standing Orders, for terminating the services of a workman.[63] In Syndicate Bank, the Supreme Court had to interpret a provision of Sastri Award. The said provision stipulates: "in the event of an unauthorised absence from duty for 90 or more days beyond the sanctioned leave, the management may at any time thereafter give a notice to the employee to report for duty within 30 days of the notice; that, if, the employee does not report for duty or offer a satisfactory explanation within 30 days, he should be deemed to have voluntarily retired." The Supreme Court held that it does not amount to a punishment for misconduct, but is only a recognition of the realities of the situation and does not result in the violation of the principles of natural justice, and that the termination order passed by the management was valid.[64]

In striking contrast, Venkatarama Reddi J, in National Aluminium, held that there could be nothing like an 'automatic termination' of service in law (in the instant case, for unauthorised absence), without inquiry or even a show-cause notice. Where the employee remains absent with impunity, without prior sanction or approval, for days and months together, it is rather for the court to hold that the employer should patiently wait till the employee reports for duty, at his own convenience.[65] Where did the learned judge get the material from in order to sustain his observation, 'there can be nothing like an automatic termination'? Was it from the Act or any legal treatise or a judicial precedent or from his own fertile imagination? If such misplaced benevolence was to be extended to a situation in which a substantial number of employees handling vital operations remain absent for days together without authorisation, the employer would be left with no alternative than to shut down the operations and close down the undertaking till such time the absconding workers resume duties at their sweet will! That would be the terrible consequence of this decision. Secondly, the aforesaid observation is repugnant to the standing orders, in so far as the Model Standing Orders (appended to the Standing Orders Act) and the Certified Standing Orders (certified under the provisions of the said Act) both of which stipulate in terms: 'unauthorised absence or overstay of leave without permission, for more than 8 consecutive days, amounts to a loss of lien on appointment and the workman shall be deemed to have left the services on his own accord, and his name shall stand struck off from the muster rolls of the establishment.' If Model Standing Orders, which are an inseparable part of the Act, were not to be regarded as law or as rules having the force of law, what else could they be? To say the least, the decision rendered in National Aluminium is wholly perverse, capable of producing great public mischief, and deserves to be rejected without a second look. It is well-settled in a host of decisions that the principles of natural justice could have operation only in unoccupied interstices of law and not in a case where the provisions clearly spell out the rights, duties and obligations of the parties and also the consequences of their actions or omissions. It is disquieting that the apex court should have applied two diametrically opposite standards, while dealing with cases involving an identical set of facts, as is disclosed in Syndicate Bank and National Aluminium Co. If the principles of natural justice had no application to a case of a continued unauthorised absence, as held in the former case, by what standard of logic or law, could they be applied to the latter? In Balbir Singh, the facts were: the workman applied for leave for a period of six months, for being treated for a stomach ailment and also tendered his resignation in the alternative, stating that the same was conditional. The employer did not communicate any decision on the leave application and the workman went on applying for leave. A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the events indicated that the resignation tendered in the first instance stood withdrawn, the employer could not thereafter, inform the workman that his resignation was accepted, and the workman was deemed to be in service.[66]

(iii) Retirement on Superannuation:

Meaning of—The word 'retire' has been defined in the Concise Oxford Dictionary as 'cease from or give up office or profession or employment'. The meaning of the word, therefore, postulates a voluntary act on the part of the employee. Generally, the age of retirement is fixed, either in the standing orders applicable to the establishment or the service rules of the employer. It is open to the employer and the workmen, to raise an industrial dispute with respect to the fixing of the age of retirement and the tribunals have jurisdiction to fix the age of retirement, after taking into consideration the relevant factors. But where, in an establishment, the age of retirement is not fixed at the time of employing a workman, he cannot successfully contend that a subsequent fixation of the age of retirement will not apply to him. It is not open to a workman to continue to serve the employer at his own sweet-will, till whatever age he likes.[67] In Guest Keen Williams, the Supreme Court has laid down the following important factors that industrial adjudication has to take into consideration, for fixing the age of superannuation:

i. nature of the work assigned to the employees in the course of their employment;

ii. nature of the wage structure paid to them;

iii. the retirement benefits and other amenities available to them;

iv. the character of the climate where the employees work;

v. the age of superannuation fixed in comparable industries, in the same region; and

vi. the practice prevailing in the industry in the past, in the matter of retiring its employees.[68]

All these and all other relevant factors have to be weighed by the adjudicator in every case, while fixing the age of superannuation in an industrial dispute but as to what factor should be given more weight and importance, would depend upon the facts of each case. No hard and fast rule can be laid down for fixing the age of retirement. The decision on the question would always depend on a proper assessment of the relevant factors, which may conceivably vary from case to case. Some of the considerations which may be relevant while fixing the age of retirement of factory workers, may not necessarily apply in fixing the age of retirement for the clerical and subordinate staff.[69] It is generally recognized, in industrial adjudication, that where an employer adopts a fair and reasonable pension scheme, that would play an important part in fixing the age of retirement at a comparatively younger age. If a retired employee can legitimately look forward to the prospects of earning a pension, then the hardship resulting from an early compulsory retirement is considerably mitigated; that is why, cases where there is a fair and reasonable scheme of pension in vogue, would not be comparable or even relevant in dealing with the age of retirement in concerns where there is no such pension scheme.[70] However, in British Paints, the Supreme Court observed that:

> ...generally speaking, there is no reason for making a difference in the age of retirement as between clerical and subordinate staff on the one hand and factory workmen on the other, unless such differences can be justified on cogent and valid grounds. It is only where the work in the factory is one of a particularly arduous nature, that there may be reason for fixing a lower age of retirement for factory workmen, as compared to clerical and subordinate staff.[71]

In view of the fact that the work in the paint factory was not considered to be arduous, as compared to the work of the clerical and subordinate staff, the retirement age at sixty was considered fair and proper, both for the clerical and the subordinate staff, as well as for the factory workmen (existing as well as future). This rule was reiterated in Jeewanlal, where the court observed that:

> ... the present day tendency is to fix the age of superannuation generally, at 60, unless the tribunal feels that the work of the operatives is particularly arduous or hazardous, where workmen may lose efficiency earlier.[72]

However, in the absence of materials on record, the court could not assess the actual nature of the work of the operatives, to find out whether it was really arduous or hazardous, so as to lead to the conclusion that the proper age of superannuation should be left at 58 years. Hence, the case was remanded for inspecting the conditions in the factory, for deciding the question as to whether the age of superannuation should be left at 58 years or whether it should be raised to 60 years.

(iv) Region-cum-Industry Basis:

In Guest Keen Williams, the Supreme Court laid down, inter alia, the regional practice as one of the factors for fixing the age of superannuation. This formula was applied in Dunlop,[73] while fixing the age of retirement for the clerical staff at 60 years consistent with the trend prevailing in the Bombay region. In Imperial Chemical Industries (supra), the court again emphasised that region-cum-industry formula is one of the important material considerations while fixing the retirement age. In GM Talang, it was observed that in the delicate task of adjusting the needs of the employees, to the interests of the employers, and, what is even more important, to the general interest of the country at large, industrial adjudication has to pay special attention to the prevailing practice in the industrial region concerned. In this case, the Supreme Court, while raising the age of superannuation fixed by the tribunal from 58 to 60 years, held:

> If in any particular region, employees have been successful in their claim for fixing the age of retirement at 60, this very success is bound to raise in others in the region, similar expectations. Refusal of similar relief to them is likely to create discontentment. It is the endeavour of industrial adjudication to prevent this. That is why, on questions of age of retirement and hours of work and to other similar matters, industrial tribunals attach much weight to what has been done in the industrial concerns in the neighbourhood, in recent times—whether by agreement or by adjudication.[74]

In Balmer Lawrie, the court observed:

> We feel that the time has now come for increasing the age of retirement in the case of clerical staff and the subordinate staff generally, from 55 to 58. [75]

In British Paints, the facts were: the tribunal fixed the age of retirement for the clerical and subordinate staff at 58 years and for the workmen in the factory, at 55 years. The Supreme Court, modified the award fixing the age of retirement for the clerical, subordinate staff and factory workmen at 60 years. Wanchoo J observed:

> Considering that there has been a general improvement in the standard of health in this country and also considering that longevity has increased, fixation of the age of retirement at 60 years, appears to us to be quite reasonable in the present circumstances. Age > of retirement at 55 years was fixed in the last century, in Government service, and had become the pattern for fixing the age of retirement everywhere. But time, in our opinion, has now come, considering the improvement in the standard of health and the increase in longevity in this country during the last fifty years, that the age of retirement should be fixed at a higher level, and we consider that, generally speaking, in the present circumstances, fixing the age of retirement at 60 years, would be fair and proper, unless there are special circumstances justifying a fixation of a lower age of retirement. [76]

However, in Bengal Chemicals, relying on the holding of the court in Jessop & Co's case, the court declined to increase the retirement age of the workmen in the West Bengal region, from 58 to 60 years.[77] In Hindustan Times, the Supreme Court fixed the age of retirement at 58 years for the employees working in the Delhi region.[78] In Burmah-Shell, the court reviewed the earlier dicta with reference to the trend obtaining in the Delhi area where there were as many as 22 concerns in which the age of superannuation of workmen had been fixed at 60 years, either by settlements or by industrial awards. Accordingly, the court raised the age of superannuation to 60 years. Hegde J observed:

> In fixing the age of superannuation, the most important factor that has to be taken into consideration is the trend in a particular area ... in the matter of fixing the age of superannuation, the trend in a particular area was the most important factor, though in the matter of determining the other conditions of service of workmen, the principle of region-cum-industry is by and large, the determinative factor ... The needs of a workman are likely to be greater between the age of 50 to 60 years, as during that period, he has to educate his children, marry his daughters, in addition to maintaining his family. If one looks at the world trend, it is obvious that the age of superannuation is gradually being pushed up ...[79]

In Bharat Petroleum, the court, by a majority, reiterated the same principle while fixing the retirement age of clerical staff in its refinery division situated in Bombay at 60. Apart from noticing the factors in favour of raising the retiral age to 60 years, the court clearly noticed the countervailing factors as well. One of such factors is the effect on the employment of the younger generation. The court posed the question: Can the nation afford to have an army of unemployed young men, necessarily leading to bitterness and frustration? Can the nation afford to allow them to fritter away their energies in unhealthy pursuits, to which they may be tempted? Then, the court observed that these questions require deep investigation, research and study, which could not be undertaken in the absence of the relevant evidence on these points.[80] In Tejinder Singh, the management staff of BPCL moved the Supreme Court under Art. 32 challenging the fixation of their retirement age at 58 years as against 60 years for clerical staff. Repelling the contention, it was held that the clerical staff and the officers of the management staff belonged to separate classifications; that the classification made on the basis of reasonable differential was not reviewable; that, while exercising writ jurisdiction, it did not have the adjudicatory jurisdiction. The court finally held that the differential age of superannuation fixed for workmen and officers did not amount to discrimination.[81]

(v) Superannuation under the Standing Orders

In Guest Keen Williams (supra), one of the issues was: if the system of forced retirement of workmen at the age of 55 as introduced by the management in May 1954 is justified? The company was an ongoing company and the draft standing orders were certified in December 1953 in terms of which the retirement age was fixed at 55 years. In terms of the said standing order, the company retired some 47 workers in May 1954. The labour court upheld the action of the management, which was reversed by the LAT. The Supreme Court observed that the tribunal had to consider not only the propriety, reasonableness and fairness of the rule, but it had also to deal with the question as to whether the said rule could and should be made applicable to the employees, who had already been employed without any limit as to the age of retirement. Hence, the court, while affirming the age of superannuation as fixed at 55 years, for the future entrants, itself fixed a superannuation age of 60 years for the employees who had joined service before the relevant Standing Orders came into force.

In Kettlewell Bullen, the court reiterated that the age of superannuation, as fixed by the rules framed by the company, would have no application to its employees who had joined service prior to the promulgation of the rules.[82] The age of superannuation fixed by the Standing Orders or rules if accepted or acquiesced in by the previously employed workmen, would be perfectly valid.[83] In Salem-Erode, the court observed that the matters covered by the certified Standing Orders, including the age of superannuation, would be uniform and would apply to all the workmen who were employed in an industrial establishment.[84] However, in Agra Electric Supply, Shelat J candidly said that the view in Guest Keen, Williams, that the certified Standing Orders would not bind the workman previously employed, 'was not a correct view of law, as clarified in Salem-Erode, removing any possible misapprehension'. He further observed that the Act was meant for making the Standing Orders binding not only on those who were employed subsequent to their certification, but also on those who were already in employment, and if any other result were to follow, there would be different conditions of employment for different classes of workmen, which would render the conditions of their service as indefinite and diversified, just as before the Act.[85] Accordingly, in Dunlop, the court held that the workman concerned, who had entered the service of the company before the Standing Orders of the company were framed and certified, will be bound by the Standing Orders.[86] In UP Electric Supply, the court reiterated that the view in Guest Keen Williams was no longer good law. Grover J said that it was not the intention of the Legislature, that different sets of conditions should apply to the employees, depending on whether a workman was employed before the Standing Orders were certified or after, which would defeat the very object of the legislation and 'in the very nature of thing, a great deal of irritation and annoyance between the employees inter se, could result, if any such discrimination is made in any of the items of the schedule.[87] The principles laid down in these cases were again followed in Avery (India).[88]

In British Paints, the age of superannuation was fixed by the industrial tribunal. Prior to that, there was no retirement age in the company and the workmen were entitled to work as long as they were physically and mentally fit. In appeal, dealing with the question as to whether the retirement of future workmen should also be fixed at the same level as of that existing workmen, the Supreme Court observed that, generally speaking, there should be no difference in the age of retirement for the existing workmen and that for the others, to be employed in the future, unless there are special circumstances justifying such difference and in the absence of any valid and cogent reasons for having different ages of retirement for the existing and future workmen, it was held that the future workmen should also have the benefit of the same superannuation age.[89]Neither the schedule to the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, nor the model Standing Orders, contain any provision regarding superannuation or retirement on attaining a certain age. The question as to whether, in the absence of any provision in the schedule or the model Standing Orders, relating to superannuation, the certifying officer could certify a provision relating to superannuation, in the Standing Orders of an industrial establishment, has given rise to a divergence of judicial opinions. A single judge of the Madras High Court, in The Hindu, took the view that the expression, 'termination of employment', in item No 8 of the schedule, is wide enough to include retirement of any employee at the age of superannuation. In support of this, reliance was placed on para 16 of the model Standing Orders, which stated that, 'every permanent workman shall be entitled to a service certificate at the time of his dismissal, discharge or retirement from service'.[90]

On the other hand, in Saroj Kumar Ghosh, the Orissa High Court held that, in the absence of a provision relating to the age of superannuation in the schedule to the Act or in the model Standing Orders, the certifying officer could not validly certify a Standing Order relating to superannuation under s 4 of the Act. The court observed that the expression 'termination of employment', in item No 8 of the schedule, cannot be equated with the word 'superannuation', because 'superannuation' is an event which comes more or less, by an automatic process, as on reaching the fixed age, the holder of the office has no option but to go out of the office and there is no volition involved in that act. It was further observed that the employer and the employee have notice of the matter long before the event is to occur and the event is such that it cannot be arrested by either one of them, if the rule is to be followed, while a termination of employment, on the other hand, is a positive act by which one party, even against the desire of the other, can bring the employment to an end.[91] The question came for consideration before the Supreme Court in UP Electric Supply Co (supra), the court observed that after the insertion of the item in the schedule, which made a provision for the age of retirement and superannuation, the certifying officer had validly certified the clause relating to retirement and superannuation, and fixed the retirement age at 58. Consequently, the workmen concerned, though they could not have been retired on the ground of superannuation in 1959, could be validly retired on or after April 1961, in accordance with the modified Standing Orders. Therefore, those out of the workmen, who had attained the age of 58 years in April 1961, were regarded as having been validly retired, having reached the age of superannuation on that date, under the clause.

In SP Dubey, the age of superannuation of the employees, in the service of the Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd, was 60 years. The company was taken over by the state Government by a notification, stating that the service conditions of the employees would not be adversely affected. But, after the take-over of the company, the corporation framed certain regulations and by regulation 59, it purported to fix the retirement age of all the employees, including those who were employed in the former company, at 58. In accordance with this regulation, the corporation sought to retire the appellant on completion of the age of 58. But in view of the assurance given to the employees of the company, that their conditions of service would not be adversely affected, which was incorporated in the directions issued by the Government under s 34 of the Road Transport Corporations Act 1950, the Supreme Court held that the corporation could not frame regulations which were contrary to the directions issued by the state Government. Therefore, regulation 59, framed by the corporation, was not applicable to the appellant and he was entitled to continue in service upto the age of 60 years.[92]

(vi) Proof of Age:

When the age of retirement and superannuation are fixed by the Standing Orders, rules of the establishment or by industrial adjudication, it is incumbent on the workman to furnish adequate proof of his age, as it is a matter within his knowledge. But the employer has the right to rebut this proof. In IGN Rly, a workman had subscribed to an agreement containing a declaration about the day and date of his birth, for the purpose of provident fund accounts. The employer treated such date as conclusive and on the strength of the same, retired the workman. Before the industrial tribunal, the workman neither pleaded that the day and date of birth declared by him was the result of some inadvertence or mistake, nor did he go into the witness box to explain the admission made by him in the declaration. The correctness of the exact age was also not properly proved before the tribunal, from an examination of the school register produced on behalf of the workman. But, completely ignoring these aspects of the matter, the tribunal accepted the contention of the workman and held that such date and day must have been given by the workman from memory only and ordered his reinstatement. The award of the tribunal was set aside by the Supreme Court.[93]

In UP State Sugar Corpn, the relevant Standing Order provided that the 'entry of the date of birth, in records pertaining to the provident fund scheme, was presumed to be correct'. The Allahabad High Court held that the authority concerned, called upon to adjudicate upon the age of the workman, would have jurisdiction to consider the date of birth on any other relevant material or materials.[94] If a person is retired on a wrong date, he would be entitled to reinstatement and to all the service benefits which were wrongfully denied to him and the adjudicator may even award interest on such benefits.[95] In Punjab and Sind Bank, the Delhi High Court held that the date of birth entered in a cut list, was valid evidence and the mere fact that the surname of the employee was not mentioned in the matriculation certificate produced by him, was no ground to doubt his identity.[96] In Ahmed Hussain, the date of birth of the employee was shown as being in the year 1929, in the record. Giving a benefit of doubt to the weaker side, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court presumed that the last day of the year, ie, 31 December 1929, could be taken as the date of birth of the employee, because even if he is continued for sometime more, no harm would be caused. The court accepted the certificate issued under the signature of the deputy inspector of schools, as the correct date of birth.[97] Normally, when an industrial award increases the age of retirement, the benefit of such increase takes effect prospectively, from the date when the award becomes operative. Hence, in a case where certain workmen had already retired and had received all their retirement benefits, before the date on which the award became operative, they were not held to be entitled to the benefit of the increase in the age of retirement.[1]

---

48 National Assn of Local Govt Office v Bolton Corpn [1943] AC 166, 185 (HL), per Lord Porter.

49 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) LLJ 245, 248 (FC), per Mahajan J.

50 NK Sen v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1953) 1 LLJ 6, 7 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

51 Indian Oil Corpn Ltd PO, IT (1999) 2 LLJ 904 (Gau) (DB)), per Biswas J.

52 Rajaji Nagar Co-op Bank Ltd v PO, Labour Court (2001) 4 LLN 1214 (Kant) (DB), per Bhoruka CJ.

53 Cooperative Central Bank Ltd v Addl Industrial Tribunal AIR 1970 SC 245 [LNIND 1969 SC 152]: (1969) 2 LLJ 698 [LNIND 1969 SC 152] : (1969) 2 SCC 43 [LNIND 1969 SC 152].

54 Workmen of Dimakuchi Tea Estate v Dimakuchi Tea Estate (1958) 1 LLJ 500 [LNIND 1958 SC 1], 510 (SC), per SK Das J.

55 George Hudson Ltd v Australian Timber Workers Union 32 CLR 413, 441, per Isaac J.

56 Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd v Raghunath Gopal Patwardhan (1957) 1 LLJ 27 [LNIND 1956 SC 91] (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

57 DN Banerji v PR Mukherjee (1953) 1 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1952 SC 85], 199, per Chandrasekhara Aiyar J.

58 Bombay Union of Journalists v 'Hindu' (1961) 2 LLJ 436, 439 (SC), per Shah J.

59 Western India Match Co Ltd v Western India Match Co Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], 261 (SC), per Shelat J.

60 Y Mohanakumaran Nair v Hindustan Latex Ltd 1987 Lab IC 950,952 (Ker), per KT Thomas J.

61 Statford v Lindley (1965) AC 269, 326, 330, 341-42; Conway v Wade (1909) AC 506, 517.

62 Beetham v Trinidad Cement Ltd (1921) 1 All ER 274 (PC), per Lord Denning.

63 R v National Arbitration, ex p, Keable Press Ltd (1943) 2 All ER 633 -34,636 (CA).

64 White v Riley (1921) 1 Ch D 1.

65 JT Stratford & Son Ltd v Lindley (1964) 3 All ER 102 (HL).

66 Jumbunna Coal Mines v Victorian Coal Miners' Assn 6 CLR 209, 375, per Isaac J.

67 Newspapers Ltd v State Industrial Tribunal (1957) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 28] (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 532 [LNIND 1957 SC 28], per Kapoor J.

68 Workmen of Dimakuchi Tea Estate v Mgmt of Dimakuchi Tea Estate (1958) 1 LLJ 500 [LNIND 1958 SC 1]-01 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 353 [LNIND 1958 SC 1], per SK Das J.

69 Workmen v Dharam Pal Prem Chand (1965) 1 LLJ 668 [LNIND 1965 SC 83], 670 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 182 [LNIND 1965 SC 83], per Gajendragadkar CJI.

70 Workmen of Indian Express Newspaper Pvt Ltd v Management (1970) 2 LLJ 132 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 737 [LNIND 1968 SC 355]: (1969) 1 SCC 228, per Shelat J.

71 Western India Match Co v WIMCO Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], 260-61 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1205 [LNIND 1970 SC 4]: (1970) 1 SCC 225 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], per Shelat J.

72 Branch Manager, Lipton India Ltd v State of Maharashtra 1992 Lab IC 1090 (Bom), per AS Desai J.

73 Hari Fertilizers v State of Uttar Pradesh 1992 Lab IC 1877, 1880 (All), per Katju J.

74 Praga Tools Ltd v Govt of Andhra Pradesh 1976 Lab IC 190, 192 (AP), per V Shastri J.

75 Swapan Das Gupta v First LC 1976 Lab IC 202, 206 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

76 Southern India Tannery v IT (1969) 2 LLJ 157 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

77 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen 1979 Lab IC 585 [LNIND 1979 SC 4], 588-89 (SC), per Singhal J.

78 Bombay Union of Journalists v 'Hindu' (1961) 2 LLJ 436, 439 (SC), per Shah J.

79 Working Journalists of the 'Hindu' v 'Hindu' (1961) 1 LLJ 288, 294 (Mad) (DB), per Veeraswami J.

80 Gondhara Transport Co Pvt Ltd v State of Punjab AIR 1966 Punj 354, 362, per Narula J.

81 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 491 [LNIND 1960 SC 60], 496 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Indian Cable Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 409 [LNIND 1962 SC 100], 415 (SC) : (1962) Supp (3) SCR 589, per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

83 Nellai Cotton Mills v LC (1965) 1 LLJ 95 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

84 Wingswear Pvt Ltd v Workmen 1988 Lab IC (NOC) 50 (Del), per Balui J.

85 Bombay Union of Journalists v 'Hindu' (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 443 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 318 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], per Shah J.

86 Workmen of Dharampal Premchand v Dharampal Premchand (1965) 1 LLJ 668 [LNIND 1965 SC 83], 672-3 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 182, per Gajendragadkar CJI.

87 Nellai Cotton Mills v LC (1965) 1 LLJ 95 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

88 Tirupathi Cotton Mills Ltd v LC (1968) 2 LLJ 723, 727 (AP), per Kumarayya J.

89 P Somasundaram v LC (1970) 1 LLJ 558 (AP), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

90 Eastern Coalfields Ltd v Niranjan Chatterjee (2008) 3 LLJ 438 (Cal).

91 JH Jadhav v Forbes Gokak Ltd AIR 2005 SC 998 [LNIND 2005 SC 133]: (2005) 3 SCC 202 [LNIND 2005 SC 133] : (2005) 1 LLJ (1089), per Ms Ruma Pal J.

92 Workmen of Dharampal Premchand v Dharampal Premchand AIR 1966 SC 182 [LNIND 1965 SC 83]: (1965) 1 LLJ 668 [LNIND 1965 SC 83] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

93 Central Provinces Transport Services Ltd v RG Patwardhan AIR 1957 SC 104 [LNIND 1956 SC 91]: (1957) I LLJ 27, per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

94 Brooke Bond (India) (Private) Ltd v Workmen (1963) I LLJ 256(SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

95 LH Sugar Factories & Oil Mills Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1961) I LLJ 686 (All) : AIR 1962 All 70 [LNIND 1961 ALL 21], per SS Dhavan J.

1 Newspaper Ltd v State IT (1960) 2 LLJ 37, 38 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

2 Tata Chemicals Ltd v Workmen 1978 Lab IC 637 [LNIND 1978 SC 113],642 (SC) per Jaswant Singh J.

3 Pradip Lamp Works v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 507 [LNIND 1969 SC 299] (SC), per Shelat J.

4 National Asphalt Products & Construction Co v NM Kothari 1977 Lab IC 1300, 1302 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

5 Imperial Electric Trading Co v IT 1969 Lab IC 531 (All), per Gulati J.

6 Air France v Miss Kotval (1970) 2 LLJ 68 (Cal) (DB) : 74 CWN 304 : (1971) ILR (1) Cal 295, per D Basu J.

7 Reckitt & Coleman of India Ltd v Fifth IT 1980 Lab IC 92, 94-95 (Cal) (DB), per M Dutt J.

8 Mgmt of Gammon (India) Ltd v State of Orissa (1974) 2 LLJ 34 -36 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

9 Ram Lal Guramal Textile Mills v State of Punjab (1958) 2 LLJ 245 (Punj), per Bishan Narain J.

10 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v First Labour Court (1959) 1 LLJ 600 [LNIND 1958 CAL 239], 603 (Cal) : AIR 1959 Cal 265 [LNIND 1958 CAL 239]: 64 CWN 37, per Sinha J.

11 Paarthy Ratnam & Co v Industrial Tribunal (1958) 2 LLJ 290 (AP) : (1958) 2 Anwr 421 : 1958 ALT 776, per Satyanarayana Raju J.

12 Shamsuddin v State of Kerala (1961) 1 LLJ 77 (Ker) (DB), per Ansari CJ.

13 Khadi Gram Udyog Bharan Workers Union v E Krishnamurthy (1966) 2 LLJ 261 (Punj) : AIR 1966 P&H 173, per SK Kapur J.

14 Muller and Phipps (India) (P) Ltd v Employees (1967) 2 LLJ 222 (Punj) : (1966) 1 LR (2) P& H 918, per SB Kapoor J.

15 Workmen of Jamadoba Colliery v Jamadoba Colliery (1967) 2 LLJ 663 (Pat) (DB), per Narasimham CJ.

16 Bombay Union of Journalists v The Hindu (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 442-43 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 318 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], per Shah J.

17 Indian Cable Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 409 [LNIND 1962 SC 100], 415 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

18 Western India Match Co Ltd v WIMCO Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4] (SC), per Shelat J.

19 Working Journalists of the 'Hindu' v 'Hindu' (1961) 1 LLJ 288 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138], 296 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1961 Mad 370 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138]: (1961) 1 MLJ 260 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138], per Veeraswami J.

20 Working Journalists of 'Hindu' v 'Hindu' (1961) 1 LLJ 288 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138], 296 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1961 Mad 370 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138]: (1961) 1 MLJ 260 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138], per Veeraswami J.

21 Workmen of Dalmia Cement (Bharat) Ltd v State of Madras (1969) 1 LLJ 499 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

22 Eastern Manganese and Mineral Ltd v Industrial Tribunal (1968) 2 LLJ 817 (Pat) (DB) : (1968) 1 PLJR 416, per BN Jha J.

23 Ram Prasad Vishwakarama v IT (1961) 1 LLJ 504 [LNIND 1960 SC 333], 507 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

24 Sri Ram Vilas Service Ltd v State of Madras (1956) 1 LLJ 498, 507 (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

25 Sri Kripa Printing Press v LC (1960) 1 LLJ 53 -54 (AP), per Bhimsankaram J.

26 PMM Mudaliar, Rathina Mudaliar & Sons v Raju Mudaliar (1965) 1 LLJ 489, 496 (Mys) (DB), per Hegde J.

27 Lipton Ltd v Workmen (1956) I LLJ 319(LAT).

28 Hindustan Times Ltd v Chief Commr Delhi (1957) 2 LLJ 466, 470 (Punj), per Falshaw J.

29 Reckitt & Colman of India Ltd v Fifth IT 1980 Lab IC 92, 95 (DB), per MM Dutt J.

30 Uttar Pradesh State Electricity Board, Lucknow v LC 1984 Lab IC (NOC) 120 (All), per Dhaon J.

31 Newspapers Ltd v State Industrial Tribunal (1957) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 28], 8 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 532 [LNIND 1957 SC 28], per Kapur J.

32 Bombay Union of Journalists v The Hindu (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 439 (SC), per Shah J.

33 Workmen of Rohtak Genl Transport Co v Mgmt (1962) 1 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1962 SC 90], 636 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 318 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], per Gajendragadkar J.

34 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen AIR 1974 SC 769 [LNIND 1973 SC 307]: 1974 Lab IC 465 : (1974) 3 SCC 514 [LNIND 1973 SC 307], per Dwivedi J.

35 Deepak Industries Ltd v State of WB 1975 Lab IC 1153, 1157 (Cal) (DB), per SK Roy Chowdhury J.

36 State Banks Staff Union v SBI (1991) 1 LLJ 163 [LNIND 1990 MAD 579] (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

37 Bihar Working Journalists' Union v HK Chaudhuri 1968 Lab IC 515, 518 (Pat) (DB), per GN Prasad J.

38 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Tarak Nath Sen Gupta (1999) 2 LLJ 291 [LNIND 1999 CAL 98] (Cal) (DB), per Sinha J.

39 Chinataman Rao v State of Madhya Pradesh (1958) 2 LLJ 252 [LNIND 1958 SC 11], 256 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 388 [LNIND 1958 SC 11], per Subba Rao J.

40 Western India Automobile Assn v Industrial Tribunal (1949) LLJ 245, 249 (FC), per Mahajan J.

41 Sukhnandan Thakur v State of Bihar AIR 1957 Pat 617 (DB), per Ramaswamy J.

42 Government of India (1940), 'Report of the BTLEC', cited in the Report of the LIC, 1946, p 115.

43 Clerk, In Pursuit of Fair Justice, (1995) 11.

44 State of Karnataka v Uma Devi (2006) 4 SCC 1 : AIR 2006 SC 1806 : (2006) 2 LLJ 722, per Balasubramanian J.

45 Delhi Municipal Workers Union v Municipal Corpn of Delhi (1999) 3 LLN 609 (Del), per Joseph J.

46 Kays Construction Co (P) Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 208 [LNIND 1958 SC 124], per Gajendragadkar J.

47 Delhi Development Authority v Sudesh Kumar (2009) 2 LLJ 641 (Del) : (2009) 2 LJ 641 : (2009) 121 FLR 366, per Khanna J.

48 Municipal Employees' Union v Secretary (Labour), GNCTD (2003) 4 LLJ 1038 (Del) : (2003) 106 DLT 47 [LNIND 2003 DEL 378], per Mudgal J.

49 Indian Drugs and Pharmaceuticals Ltd v Devki Devi AIR 2006 SC 2691 [LNIND 2006 SC 470]: (2006) 5 SCC 523 [LNIND 2006 SC 470] : (2006) 3 LLJ 783 [LNIND 2006 SC 470], per Pasayat J.

50 Sukhnandan Thakur v State of Bihar AIR 1957 Pat 617 (DB).

51 Shankar Balaji Waje v State of Maharashtra (1962) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1961 SC 342] (SC), per Raghubar Dayal J.

52 Dhrangadhara Chemical Works Ltd v State of Saurashtra (1957) 1 LLJ 447 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

53 S Palani Chamy v National Textile Corpn (TN&P) Ltd 1993 Lab IC 1101, 1105, per Srinivasan J.

54 Naihati Electric Supply Co v State of WB (1974) 2 LLJ 179, 181 (Cal), per Debiprasad Pal J.

55 Crompton Engineering (M) Pvt Ltd v Addl Labour Court (1975) 1 LLJ 207 [LNIND 1974 MAD 180], 209 (Mad), per Ismail J.

56 Indian Paper Pulp Co Ltd v Indian Paper Pulp Workers Union 1949 LLJ 258 (FC), per Kania CJI.

57 Cownpore Tannery Ltd v S Guha (1961) 2 LLJ 110 [LNIND 1960 SC 266] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

58 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) LLJ 245, 249 (FC), per Mahajan J.

59 B Kalyanasundaram v LC (1966) 2 LLJ 430 [LNIND 1965 MAD 89],432 (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

60 Standard Vaccum Refining Co v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 233 [LNIND 1960 SC 109] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

61 Muzaffarpur Electric Supply Workers Union v Muzaffarpur Electric Supply Co Ltd (1957) 2 LLJ 542 (LAT).

62 Workers of Sagar Talkies v Odeon Cinema (1957) 1 LLJ 639 (Mad) (DB), per Rajamannar CJ.

63 Ryan v Cooke & Quinn (1930) IR 512.

64 Sheriff v Mcmulten (1952) IR 236.

65 Bird v O'Neal (1960) 3 All ER 254.

66 Beetham v Trinidad Cement Ltd (1960) 1 All ER 274, per Lord Denning.

67 Stanford v Lindley (1965) AC 269, 334 (HL).

68 Torquay Hotel Co Ltd v Cousins (1969) 1 All ER 522, 528 (CA), per Lord Denning, MR.

69 TCC Thozhilali Union v TCC Ltd (1982) 1 LLJ 425, 427-29 (Ker), per Vedakkel J.

70 O Kahn-Freund, The System of Industrial Relations in Great Britain, 1954, p 54.

71 Mansfield Cooper and John C Wood, Outlines of industrial Law, 1962, 4th ed, p 18.

72 Francis Raleigh Batt, The Law of Master and Servant, 1967, 5th ed, p 52.

73 Ludwig Teller, Labour Disputes and Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 536.

74 Gayler, Industrial Law, 1955, p 20.

75 Rideout, Current Legal Problems, 1967, p 127.

76 Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd v Alladin (1969) 2 LLJ 540 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], 544 (SC), per Shelat J.

77 Glaxo Laboratories (I) Ltd v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1909, 1914 (SC), per Desai J.

78 Salem-Erode Electricity Distribution Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 443 [LNIND 1965 SC 293], 446 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

79 Glaxo Laboratories (1) Ltd v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1909, 1914 (SC), per Desai J.

80 Shahdara Saharanpur Light Rly Co Ltd v Shahdara-Saharanpur Rly Workers' Union (1969) 1 LL J734 (SC), per Shelat J.

81 Rohtak & Hissar District Electric Supply Co v State of UP (1966) 2 LLJ 330 [LNIND 1965 SC 350], 334-35 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

82 Shahdara Saharanpur Light Rly Co Ltd v Shahdara-Saharanpur Rly Workers' Union (1969) 1 LLJ 734 [LNIND 1968 SC 281], (SC), per Shelat J.

83 Bangalore Woollen, Cotton and Silk Co Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 555 [LNIND 1967 SC 274] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

84 Bagalkot Cement Co Ltd v RK Patha, AIR 1963 SC 439 [LNIND 1962 SC 22]: (1962) 2 LLJ 203 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 697, per Gajendragadkar J.

85 Buckingham and Carnatic Co Ltd v Venkataiah AIR 1964 SC 1272 [LNIND 1963 SC 177]: (1963) 2 LLJ 638 [LNIND 1963 SC 177] : [1964] 4 SCR 265 [LNIND 1963 SC 177], per Gajendragadkar J.

86 Workmen of Dewan Tea Estate v Mgmt AIR 1964 SC 1458 [LNIND 1963 SC 264]: (1964) 1 LLJ 358 [LNIND 1963 SC 264] : [1964] 5 SCR 548 [LNIND 1963 SC 264], per Gajendragadkar J.

87 Workmen of Buckingham & Carnatic Mills v Mgmt (1972) I LLJ 26(SC), per Vadialingam J.

88 DK Yadav v JMA Industries Ltd 1993 AIR SCW 1995, per Ramasway J.

89 Sukhdev Singh v Bhagat Ram AIR 1975 SC 1331 [LNIND 1975 SC 79]: 1975 Lab IC 881 : (1975) 1 SCC 421 [LNIND 1975 SC 79], per Ray CJI.

90 Rajasthan SRTC v Krishna Kant AIR 1995 SC 1715 [LNIND 1995 SC 618]: (1995) 5 SCC 75 [LNIND 1995 SC 618] : (1995) 2 LLJ 728 [LNIND 1995 SC 618], per Jeevan Reddy J.

91 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 103-5.

92 Premier Automobiles Ltd v KS Wadke (1975) 2 LLJ 445 [LNIND 1975 SC 299] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2238 [LNIND 1975 SC 299]: (1976) 1 SCC 496 [LNIND 1975 SC 299], per Untwalia J.

93 SP Srivastava v Banaras Electric Light and Power Co Ltd (1968) 2 LLJ 483 [LNIND 1968 ALL 12] (All) (FB), per Beg J.

94 Glaxo Laboratories (I) Ltd v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1909, 1914 (SC), per Desai J.

95 Workmen of Hindustan Steel Ltd v Hindustan Steel Ltd 1985 Lab IC 534 (SC), per Desai J.

1 Union of India v Tulsiram Patel (1985) 2 LLJ 206 [LNIND 1985 SC 219], 236-37 : AIR 1985 SC 1416 [LNIND 1985 SC 219]: (1985) 3 SCC 398 [LNIND 1985 SC 219], per DP Madon J.

2 Hari Pada Khan v Union of India (1996) 1 LLJ 1044 -45 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 1065 [LNIND 1995 SC 1234]: (1996) 1 SCC 536 [LNIND 1995 SC 1234].

3 Grayes v Cohen (1929 J 46 TLR 121.

4 Morgan v Manswer (1948) 1 KB 148, 191, per Streatfield J.

5 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v State of UP 1990 Lab IC 1511, 1515 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

6 Central Inland WTC Ltd v Brojo Nath Ganguly 1986 Lab IC 1312, 1360-61 (SC), per Madon J.

7 Savabhai Kanjibhai v DM Vin (1964) 2 LLJ 201 (Guj), per Shah J.

8 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh 1990 Lab IC 1511, 1515 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

9 Raj Kumar v Union of India (1970) 1 LLJ 13, 15 (SC), per Shah J.

10 Chotelal v State of Uttar Pradesh (1956) 1 LLJ 543 [LNIND 1955 ALL 221] (All), per Mehrotra J.

11 Cochin Port Shipping Clearing Staff Assn v Harrisons & Crossfield Ltd 1962 Lab IC 902 (Ker), per MP Menon J.

12 K Sudha Nagarj v CM, Andhra Bank 1996 Lab IC 1228, 1231 (AP), per Bikshapathy J.

13 Jai Ram v Union of India AIR 1954 SC 584 [LNIND 1954 SC 293].

14 Union of India v Gopal Chandra Misra 1978 Lab IC 660 (SC), per Fazal Ali J.

15 K Sudha Nagaraj v CM, Andhra Bank 1996 Lab IC 1228, 1231 (AP), per Bikshapathy J.

16 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v State of UP 1990 Lab IC 1511, 1517 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

17 Union of India v Gopal Chandra Misra 1978 Lab IC 660, 670 (SC), per Sarkaria J.

18 Anil Kumar v Food Corpn of India 1988 Lab IC 1121, 1123 (P&H) (DB).

19 JN Srivastava v Union of India (1998) 9 SCC 559 [LNIND 1997 SC 1243] : AIR 1999 SC 1571 [LNIND 1997 SC 1243].

20 Nand Keshwar Prasad v IFFCO Ltd (1999) 1 LLN 618 (SC) : AIR 1999 SC 558 : (1998) 5 SCC 461.

21 Shambu Murari Sinha v PDI (2000) 3 LLN 513 (SC) : AIR 2000 SC 2473 [LNIND 2000 SC 658]: (2000) 4 SCC 621.

22 State of Haryana v SK Singhal (1999) 2 LLN 660 (SC) : AIR 1999 SC 1829 [LNIND 1999 SC 430]: (1999) 4 SCC 293 [LNIND 1999 SC 430].

23 Mgmt of KSRTC v MB Ramakrishna (2001) 3 LLN 608 (Kant) (DB), per Mohan Kumar J.

24 Ramesh Kumar v State of Uttar Pradesh (2002) 2 LLN 38 (All), per Pradeep Kant J.

25 T Ravindran v PO, LC (2002) 2 LLN 313 (Mad), per Rajan J.

26 Haryana SCD Federation Ltd v Rajbir Singh (1999) 1 LLJ 975 (P&H) (DB), per Gupta J.

27 Union of India v Gopal Chandra Misra (1978) 1 LLJ 492 [LNIND 1978 SC 54] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 694 [LNIND 1978 SC 54]: (1978) 2 SCC 301 [LNIND 1978 SC 54].

28 Balram Gupta v Union of India (1987) 2 LLJ 541 [LNIND 1987 SC 619] (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 2354 [LNIND 1987 SC 622]: 1987 Supp SCC 228.

29 Jayakodi Jacob D v Presiding Officer, Labour Court (1999) 1 LLJ 1025 [LNIND 1998 MAD 765] (Mad) (DB).

30 Coromandal Fertilizers Ltd v P Venugopal (1986) 1 LLJ 417 [LNIND 1985 AP 132], 426 (AP) (DB), per Jeevan Reddy J.

31 Thiruangadam v Indian Institute of Science (1957) 1 LLJ 285 (Mys) (DB), per Vasudevamurthi J.

32 Chotelal v State of Uttar Pradesh (1956) 1 LLJ 543 [LNIND 1955 ALL 221] (All), per Mehrotra J.

33 Chatge & Patil Concerns' Employees Union v Management (1968) 1 LLJ 566 [LNIND 1967 SC 239] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

34 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v State of UP 1990 Lab IC 1511, 1517 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

35 Random House Dictionary.

36 Earl Jowitt, English Law Dictionary, 1959.

37 Black's Law Dictionary.

38 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Venkatayya (1963) 2 LLJ 638 [LNIND 1963 SC 177], 642 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

39 GT Lad v Chemicals and Fibres of India 1979 Lab IC 290 [LNIND 1978 SC 582], 292 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

40 Sita Ram v LC 1995 Lab IC 2446 -47 (P&H) (DB), per RP Sethi J.

41 Kamlesh Sharma v Union of India 1988 Lab IC 1543 (Del) (DB), per YK Sabharwal J.

42 National Engineering Industries Ltd v Hanuman (1967) 2 LLJ 883 [LNIND 1967 SC 213] (SC), per Wanchoo CJI.

43 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], 268 (SC), per SK Das J.

44 Binny Ltd v Workmen 1973 Lab IC 1119 -20, per Grover J.

45 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Piara Lal 1976 Lab IC 21, 25 (Del), per Rangarajan J.

46 Bata India Ltd v BH Nathani 1978 Lab IC 386, 388 (Guj) (DB), per Obul Reddi CJ.

47 Dabur (Dr SK Burman) v State of WB 1978 Lab IC 1581, 1587 (Cal) (DB), per Anil K Sen J.

48 Delhi Cloth & Gen Mills Ltd v Shambhu Nath Mukherjee 1977 Lab IC 1695 [LNIND 1977 SC 280] (SC), per Goswami J.

49 Shambhoo Singh v CIT-cum-Labour Court (1981) 2 LLJ 376, 379 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

50 Freewheels India Ltd v State of Haryana 1984 Lab IC (NOC) 82 (P&H), per SS Sodhi J.

51 Baba Saheb Devgonda Patil v MD, SPSSK Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 413 [LNIND 1987 BOM 491] (Bom) (DB) : (1988) 2 Bom CR 235 [LNIND 1987 BOM 491] : (1988) 90 Bom LR 131.

52 Secy, WBB of Secondary Education v NC Bhattacharjee 1991 Lab IC 819, 824 (Cal), per SK Sen J.

53 Management of Spencer & Co Ltd v Addl LC (1980) 2 LLJ 469 -70 (Mad), per Mohan J.

54 Travancore Rayons Ltd v Travancore RE Union (1978) 1 LLJ 84, 87 (Ker), per Eradi J.

55 Hamdani Dawakhana (wakf), Delhi v LC (1985) 1 LLJ 57 (Del), per Sultan Singh J.

56 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Michael Mark (1962) 2 LLJ 220 [LNIND 1962 SC 242], 223 (SC), per Mudholkar J.

57 K Ananthan Pillai v State of Kerala 1968 Lab IC 1059, 1063 (Ker) (FB), per Raman Nayar J.

58 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Venkatayya (1963) 2 LLJ 638 [LNIND 1963 SC 177], 642 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

59 L Robert D'Souza v Executive Engineer, Southern Rly (1982) 1 LLJ 330 [LNIND 1982 SC 47], 333-34 (SC) : AIR 1982 SC 854 [LNIND 1982 SC 47]: (1982) 1 SCC 645 [LNIND 1982 SC 47], per Desai J.

60 Kshetriya Sri Gandhi Ashram v Ram Samujh Maurya 1990 Lab IC 1406, 1408 (All), per Sharma J.

61 DK Yadav v JMA Industries Ltd (1993) 2 LLJ 696 [LNIND 1993 SC 443] : (1993) 3 SCC 259 [LNIND 1993 SC 443] : (1993) 3 SCALE 39, per K Ramaswamy J.

62 Amgauda Sidram Hakke v Maharashtra SSIDC Ltd 1995 Lab IC 498 : (1995) 2 Bom CR 595 [LNIND 1994 BOM 698] : (1995) 2 LLJ 948 (Bom), per Sri Krishna J.

63 Gouranga Acharjee v Third Industrial Tribunal (2001) 3 LLN 160 (Cal), per Bhattacharya J.

64 Syndicate Bank v General Secretary, Syndicate Bank Staff Association (2000) 2 LLN 942 (SC) : (2000) 5 SCC 65 [LNIND 2000 SC 715] : (2000) 1 LLJ 1630 [LNIND 2000 SC 715].

65 National Aluminium Co Ltd v DK Panda (2002) 3 LLN 759 (SC) : 2002 LLR 928, per Venkatarama Reddi J.

66 (2001) 4 LLN 628 (P&H), per Sudhalkar J.

67 Mange Ram v National and Grindlays Bank Ltd 1987 Lab IC 1560, 1563 (Del) (DB), per Kapur.

68 Guest, Keen, Williams Pvt Ltd v PJ Sterling (1959) 2 LLJ 405 [LNIND 1959 SC 127], 415 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1279 [LNIND 1959 SC 127], per Gagendragadkar J.

69 Imperial Chemical Industries (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 716 [LNIND 1960 SC 268] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1175 [LNIND 1960 SC 268], per Gajendragadkar J.

70 Workmen of Kettlewell Bullen & Co Ltd v Mgmt CA No 845 of 1966 (12-21969) (SC), per Shelat J.

71 British Paints (India) Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1965 SC 296], 409 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 732 [LNIND 1965 SC 296], per Wanchoo J.

72 Jeewanlal (1929) Ltd v The Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 472 [LNIND 1972 SC 113] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1210 [LNIND 1972 SC 113], per Mitter J.

73 Dunlop Rubber Co (India) Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 826 [LNIND 1959 SC 186], 828 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

74 GM Talang v Shaw Wallance & Co Ltd (1964) 2 LLJ 664 [LNIND 1964 SC 96] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 1886 [LNIND 1964 SC 96]: [1964] 7 SCR 424 [LNIND 1964 SC 96], per Das Gupta J.

75 Workmen of Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1964) 1 LLJ 380 [LNIND 1963 SC 248] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 728 [LNIND 1963 SC 248]: [1964] 5 SCR 344 [LNIND 1963 SC 248], per Gajendragadkar J.

76 British Paints Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1965 SC 296], 409-10 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 732 [LNIND 1965 SC 296]: [1966] 2 SCR 523 [LNIND 1965 SC 296], per Wanchoo J.

77 Bengal Chemical & Pharmaceutical Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 751 [LNIND 1968 SC 279] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 360 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], per Vaidialingarn J.

78 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 119 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451], per Das Gupta J.

79 Burmah-Shell OSD Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 363 (SC), per Hegde J.

80 Workmen of Bharat Petroleum Corpn Ltd v BPCL (1984) 1 LLJ 35 [LNIND 1983 SC 290] (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 356 [LNIND 1983 SC 290]: (1983) 4 SCC 470 [LNIND 1983 SC 290], per Chinnappa Reddy J.

81 Tejinder Singh v Bharat Petroleum Corpn Ltd 1987 Lab IC 19 -20 (SC), per Ranganath Misra J.

82 Workmen of Kettlewell Bullen & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1964) 2 LLJ 146 [LNIND 1964 SC 126], 148 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

83 Workmen of Kankanee Colliery v Employers (1967) 1 LLJ 714 [LNIND 1967 SC 19] (SC), per Bhargava J.

84 Salem-Erode ED Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 443 [LNIND 1965 SC 293] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 808 [LNIND 1965 SC 293], per Gajendragadkar CJI.

85 Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd v Alladin (1969) 2 LLJ 540 [LNIND 1969 SC 261] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 512 [LNIND 1969 SC 261]: (1969) 2 SCC 598 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], per Shelat J.

86 Dunlop India Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1972 SC 151] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2326 [LNIND 1972 SC 151]: (1972) 3 SC 616, per Vaidialingam J.

87 UP Electric Supply Co Ltd v Their Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 9 [LNIND 1972 SC 154], 14 (SC) : (1972) 2 SCC 54 [LNIND 1972 SC 154] : 1972 Lab IC 644 [LNIND 1972 SC 154], per Grover J.

88 Avery (India) Ltd v Second Industrial Tribunal (1972) 2 LLJ 255 [LNIND 1972 SC 303] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1626 [LNIND 1972 SC 303]: (1972) 3 SCC 585 [LNIND 1972 SC 303], per Mathew J.

89 British Paints Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1965 SC 296] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 732 [LNIND 1965 SC 296], per Wanchoo J.

90 The 'Hindu' v The 'Hindu' Officers' & NPE' Union (1960) 1 LLJ 187 [LNIND 1959 MAD 86] (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

91 Saroj Kumar Ghosh v Chairman, Orissa SEB 1970 Lab IC 1000 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

92 SP Dubey v Madhya Pradesh SRTC 1991 Lab IC 1373 [LNIND 1990 SC 611], 1375 (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

93 Indian Genl Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen, (1965) 2 LLJ 437 [LNIND 1964 SC 298] (SC) : (1965) 10 FLR 250, per Gajendragadkar CJI.

94 UP State Sugar Corpn Ltd. v DCL 1991 Lab IC 750, 754 (All), per Dhaon J.

95 Kanpur Electric Supply Administration v LC 1988 Lab IC 667 -68 (All), per RS Dhavan J.

96 CMD, Punjab & Sind Bank v JS Dhillon 1991 Lab IC 2457, 2463 (Del) (DB), per MC Jain CJ.

97 Ahmed Hussain v MD, UPSRTC 1991 Lab IC 2078, 2080 (All), per Trivedi J.

1 Associated Power Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 743 [LNIND 1963 SC 253], 746 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

(vii) Continuing in Service after Superannuation:

In Guest Keen Williams, the demand of the workmen, for an option to continue in service, even after the age of superannuation, was held by the Supreme Court to be wholly unreasonable and entirely inconsistent with the notion of fixing the age of superannuation itself. Gajendragadkar J observed:

> Once the age of superannuation is fixed, it may be open to the employer, for special reasons, to continue in its employment, a workman who has passed that age; but it is inconceivable that when the age of superannuation is fixed, it should be in the option of the employee to continue in service thereafter.[2]

In Hindustan Antibiotics, while raising the age of superannuation, the tribunal gave discretion to the employer, to continue the employee in service or not, even after the age of superannuation. But the court did not think it proper to give discretion to the employer, to raise the age of retirement or not, because vesting him with such uncontrolled power might have led to manipulation or victimisation.[3] The effect of Guest Keen Williams and Hindustan Antibiotics is that after the age of superannuation, neither the employer can have the discretion to retain the employees in service, nor can the employees have the option to continue in service.

By the Employer

It is to be borne in mind that the service of an employee cannot be terminated either in terms of the contract or as a measure of punishment, merely because the other employees do not like him to be in the employment. In other words, even if the other employees boycott an employee, this will not provide a justifiable ground to the employer, to terminate the service of such an employee. In Atlas Copco, the Bombay High Court observed that if the services of an employee are not satisfactory, the employer can get rid of him in accordance-with the law. Likewise, if he is guilty of any misconduct, the employer will be entitled to take the appropriate disciplinary proceedings and dismiss him from service. But the fact that the other employees or the union do not pull on with him, can be no reason to justify the termination of the service of the employees.[4] Some of the modes of determining the contract of employment by the employer, have been discussed in the following heads:

(i) Discharge under Contract-Discharge Simpliciter:

The expression discharge simpliciter, as understood in industrial law, is used in contra-distinction to a punitive discharge or a discharge by way of punishment. In common law, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, subject to certain exceptions, either of the parties to the contract of employment, is ordinarily, entitled to terminate the contract at any time, by giving notice to the other. In theory, this principle governs industrial employment as well and the guarantees provided by various labour laws and the safeguards evolved by industrial adjudication, do not abrogate the right of an industrial employer to terminate the employment of his workmen. Such safeguards are meant for regulating that power, so that it is not abused.[5] The contract of industrial employment, therefore, can also be ordinarily terminated, in accordance with the terms of the contract of service. In the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> If the contract gives the employer, the power to terminate the services of his employee, after a month's notice or subject to some other conditions, it would be open to him to take recourse to the said term or condition and terminate the services of the employee.[6]

A contract may be indefinite as to the time during which it is to endure, and yet stipulate the length of notice to be served. Such stipulation must be observed and a deviation from its terms will constitute a breach of the contract. Where, however, there is no stipulation as to notice, the contract is terminable by a reasonable notice.[7] It is, however, necessary to note that a termination of employment, whether of a permanent or of a temporary nature, cannot be effected with retrospective effect.[8] Discharge under the contract may be effected for various reasons and under various circumstances, as may be provided for in the contract of service, Standing Orders, or a statute or rules thereunder, governing such service.

An employer has two distinct and independent powers. One is the power to punish an employee for an act of misconduct, while the other is the power to terminate simpliciter, the service of an employee in accordance with the contract, without any adverse consequences. As far as possible, neither should be construed so as to emasculate the other or to render it ineffective. In other words, a discharge simpliciter is not punitive in character. Conversely, if the termination is punitive in character, for an act of misconduct, it is not a discharge simpliciter. The termination simpliciter must be for relevant and valid reasons. This power should not be exercised arbitrarily, capriciously or for any irrelevant or extraneous reasons. The mere fact that the employer is required to give reasons for terminating the service of an employee, under the contract, does not necessarily, in every case, make the order of termination punitive in character, ushering in the requirement of holding a domestic inquiry etc. Otherwise, the power of termination of the service of an employee, under the contract, would be rendered meaningless and futile, for in no case would it be possible to exercise it. Of course, if a misconduct of the employee constitutes the foundation for the termination of his service, then, even if the order of termination is purported to be discharged simpliciter, it may be liable to be regarded as punitive in character.[9] The test to find out whether the impugned termination is innocuous or punitive is to inquire as to whether the vitiating cause was the foundation for the action or was it merely a motive for action. If it was the foundation for the action, the order is mala fide and punitive; if it was only a motive for the action, it is not.[10] If two factors co-exist, an inference of punishment is reasonable, though not inevitable. In the words of Krishna Iyer J:

> If the severance of service is effected, the first condition is fulfilled and if the foundation or causa causans of s uch severance is the servant's misconduct, the second is fulfilled ... If the basis or foundation for the order of termination is dearly not turpitudinous or stigmatic or rooted in misconduct or visited with evil pecuniary effects, then the inference of dismissal stands negated and vice versa.[11]

Where the termination of service puts a stigma on the competence of the employee, the order is by way of punishment. On the other hand, if the employer proceeds against the employee in a direct way, without casting any aspersion on his honesty or competence, his discharge would not have the effect of removal by way of punishment.[12] The consequence of a discharge simpliciter is, that though the employee loses his present employment, apart from the protection of his terminal benefits, his future prospects of employment are not affected.[13] In the absence of a lawful order terminating the services of an employee under the contract, there can be no automatic termination of the services of an employee, unless the procedure recognised under the law for termination of employment is resorted to and the workman will be entitled to continue in service.[14] Once the service of a workman has been terminated by an order, no second order of termination of service can be passed, unless the former order of termination is withdrawn by the employer, or that order of termination has been set aside by an adjudicator and the workman is reinstated.[15] Though the right of the employer, to manage his own affairs in the best way he chooses, has been recognised and it has not been considered proper to trespass on that right or in the field of management functions, unless compelled by overriding considerations of social justice, this right has been subjected to control by industrial adjudication, when social justice and industrial peace require such regulation,[16] to see whether the employer has acted bona fide. The right of an employer to discharge an employee is, therefore, no longer absolute and it is subject to severe restrictions. In cases of wrongful termination of service, purporting to be under the contract, industrial adjudication is competent to grant relief, on the ground that the exercise of Power was mala fide or colourable. Krishna Iyer J pointed out:

> It is not unknown that an employer resorts to camouflage, by garbing or cloaking a punitive discharge in the innocuous words of a discharge a simpliciter ... In such situations, courts have to interpose in order to ascertain whether the discharge is simpliciter or a punitive discharge, and in doing so, the veil of language is lifted and the realities perceived. [17]

In such cases, industrial adjudication can award, by way of relief to the concerned employee, either reinstatement or compensation.[18] 'All this obviously, is aimed at ensuring that protection and the security of service afforded to the employee, under the industrial legislation, is not subverted by making a pretence of the discharge being innocent'.[19] The doctrine of absolute freedom of contract, has thus, to yield to the higher claims of social justice; the right to discharge an employee has, therefore, been controlled, subject to the well-recognised limits, in order to guarantee security of tenure to industrial employees.[20] Industrial adjudication tries to protect the security of service of industrial workman by regulating the claim of the employer 'to hire and fire' an employee, as he pleases.[21] In Assam Oil Co, Gajendragadkar J held that industrial adjudication has, therefore, made the bona fides of the employer, a sine qua non for regulating the exercise of the power under the contract, if his action in terminating the service of an industrial employee is to be unassailable. The learned judge observed:

> just as the employer's right to exercise his option in terms of the contract has to be recognised, so also the employee's right to exercise his option in terms of the contract has to be recognised; so also the employee's right to expect security of tenure has to be taken into account.[22]

The continuity of service of an industrial employee, cannot be made dependent upon the contingency of the happening of some stringent conditions of service, stipulated in the contract of service and 'it is too late in the day to stress absolute freedom of an employer, to impose any condition which he likes.' It is, therefore, open to industrial adjudication to consider the conditions of employment of labour and to vary them if it is found necessary, unless the employer can justify the extraordinary condition.[23]Thus, the right of the employer, to terminate the service of an industrial employee under the contract of employment, has been subjected, by industrial adjudication, to the requirements of job security, social justice and industrial peace. On the construction of the words 'for any reason whatsoever', in the definition of 'retrenchment' in s 2(oo) of the Act, some smaller benches of the Supreme Court deviated from the law laid down by a Constitution Bench in Barsi Light Rly,[24] and have held that every termination of service, except the case excepted by the definition of 'retrenchment', will fall within the ambit of 'retrenchment'. The consequence of this holding is that even for terminating the service of a single employee, under the terms of the contract or the Standing Orders, an employer will have to comply with the requirements of s 25F or s 25N, and s 25G. The requirements of r 76A and forms PA and PB makes it well-nigh impossible to terminate the service of an individual workman, either under the contract or in terms of a Standing Order. For toning down the hardship caused by these dicta, the Legislature stepped in by inserting cl (bb) in the definition of 'retrenchment', excluding the termination of the service in the terms of contract from the purview of retrenchment'. But this statutory provision has been castrated by the ratio of the under noted dicta of the Supreme Court,[25]holding that a clause providing for a termination of service by giving notice for a specified period of time, will be void as being arbitrary and as such, violative of the guarantees of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution and also repugnant of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, being opposed to the public policy. Though the termination of service of a workman due to his absence from duty for a certain number of days, in terms of a Standing Order, on account of his arrest by the police under s 120B, read with s 489(a) and (b) of the Indian Penal Code, would not amount to retrenchment, such termination will not be justified because the workman would be absent for circumstances beyond his control and the situation was not of his creation.[26] Apart from a termination of the service of an employee in terms of the stipulation provided in the contract, the contract of employment can also be determined by frustration of the contract or impossibility to perform the contract. In the language of Lord Radcliffe:

> Frustration occurs whenever the law recognizes that without default of either party, a contractual obligation had become incapable of being performed because the circumstances in which the performance is called for, would render it a thing radically different from that which was undertaken by the contract.[27]

Frustration operates automatically. The most usual circumstance that produces a frustration of the contract of employment is that of illness. Anand Bihari, provides a rich illustration of frustration of contract on account of illness. The facts of the case were: the services of some bus drivers were terminated by the Rajasthan SRTC, on the ground that they had developed eye sight below the standard required to drive the buses. The Supreme Court held that the termination of the service of such drivers was on account of 'continued ill-health', as contemplated by sub-cl (c) of s 2(oo) of the Act and was, therefore, not 'retrenchment'. The court, however, held that the termination was not justified as it was discriminatory vis-a-vis other employees. In view of the fact that the workmen had put in long years of service and most of them were above 40 years of age, the court proposed a scheme of compensatory relief for such workmen, suitable to the peculiar loss that they had suffered on account of premature retirement, necessitated by their unfitness to work as drivers.[28] In a similar case, where the labour court ordered the reinstatement of a driver, whose services were terminated on the basis of a medical report to the effect that his vision was defective as a result of cataract, a single judge of Bombay High Court upheld the order of the labour court, and held that, subsequent to his termination, the driver had his cataract removed by surgery and judicial notice could be taken of the fact that cataract can be removed and the eye-sight can be restored.[29]

The genesis of the law relating to adjudication of discharge simpliciter is to be found in the decision of the labour appellate tribunal in Buckingham & Carnatic, where it had the occasion to consider the right of an industrial employer, to discharge his workman by notice or in lieu thereof, by payment of wages for a certain period, without assigning any reason. Though the labour appellate tribunal recognized the right of an employer to discharge an employee from his service in accordance with the contract of service, it accentuated the requirements of acting bona fide. If the termination of service is a colourable exercise of the power or is a result of victimisation or an unfair labour practice, the industrial tribunal would have the jurisdiction to intervene and set aside such a termination. Further, it was held that where the termination of service is capricious, arbitrary or unnecessarily harsh on the part of the employer, as judged by the normal standard of a 'reasonable man', that may be cogent evidence of victimisation or unfair labour practice.[30] If the order of termination is, in fact, punitive or vindictive or arbitrary in character, such a termination, though appears to be discharge simpliciter under the contract of employment,[31] or under the standing orders,[32] would amount to a colourable exercise of power. In such cases, the order of discharge is not conclusive and the industrial adjudicator can examine the substance of the matter and determine for himself, the real nature of the discharge, despite the veil of innocence of a discharge simpliciter, covering the face of the order, and may discard such an order, if it is a colourable exercise of the power under the contract. The form of the order would not be conclusive and the adjudicator will have jurisdiction to go behind the order, to find out the actual reason which led to the order and then consider whether the termination of service was a colourable exercise of the power, resulting in victimisation or an unfair labour practice.[33] In Gujarat Steel Tubes, Iyer J observed:

> The court will find out from other proceedings or documents connected with the formal order of termination, what the true ground for the termination is. If, thus scrutinized, the order has a punitive flavour in course or consequence, it is dismissal. If it falls short of this test, it cannot be called a punishment. To put it slightly differently, a termination effected because the master is satisfied of the misconduct and of the consequent desirability of terminating the service of the delinquent servant, it is a dismissal, even if he had the right in law, to terminate with an innocent order, under the Standing Order or otherwise. Whether, in such a case, the grounds are recorded in a different proceeding from the formal order, does not detract from its nature. Nor the fact that, after being satisfied of the guilt, the master abandons the inquiry and proceeds to terminate. Given an alleged misconduct and a live nexus between it and the termination of service, the conclusion is dismissal, even if full benefits as on simple termination, are given and non-injurious terminology is used. On the contrary, even if there is a suspicion of some misconduct, the master may say that he does not wish to bother about it and may not go into his guilt, but may feel like not keeping a man he is not happy with. He may not like to investigate, or take the risk of continuing a dubious servant. Then, it is not dismissal, but a termination simpliciter, if no injurious record of reasons or punitive pecuniary cut-back on his full terminal benefits, is found. For, in fact, the misconduct is not then the moving factor in the discharge. We need not chase other hypothetical situations here. What is decisive is the plain reason for the discharge, not the strategy of a non-inquiry or clever avoidance of stigmatizing epithets. If the basis is not misconduct, the order is saved.[34]

In Ravindra Kumar Misra, Ranganath Misra J noted:

> In several authoritative pronouncements of this court, the concepts of 'motive' and 'foundation' have been brought in for finding out the effect of the order of termination. If the delinquency of the officer in temporary service, is taken as the operating motive in terminating the service, the order is not considered as punitive, while, if the order of termination is founded upon it, the termination is considered to be a punitive action. This is so on account of the fact that it is necessary for every employer to assess the service of the temporary incumbent, in order to find out as to whether he should be confirmed in his appointment or his services should be terminated. It may also be necessary to find out whether the officer should be tried for some more time, on temporary basis. Since, both in regard to a temporary employee or an officiating employee in a higher post, such an assessment would be necessary merely because the appropriate authority proceeds to make an assessment and leaves a record of its views, the same would not be available to be utilised to make the order of termination following such assessment, punitive in character. [35]

The principles so stated, appear to be quite simple, but their application by the courts, particularly the Supreme Court, leaves one in a maze of bewildering perplexity. Hardly one case can be said to be a precedent for a subsequent case, even in similar fact-situations. It may, therefore, be apposite to analyse some of the leading cases and discuss their ratio decidendi. In Assam Oil Co,[36] the question was: whether the industrial adjudicator has no jurisdiction to deal with the validity, propriety or legality of the order terminating the service of an employee, purporting to be under the contract of service? The facts were: the employer found that the work of the concerned employee was thoroughly unsatisfactory, as there was a long series of instances of bad work and failure to carry out orders of insolence, untruthfulness and disobedience. It was also thought that the employee, being in a confidential position in the office, should not have become a member of the union. In the circumstances, the services of the employee were terminated in terms of the contract of service, which provided that the employment may be terminated on one month's notice, on either side. In the order of termination, it was also stated that the employee had not matched up to the standard of work required by the job, by correcting the faults that the employer had pointed out. In view of the fact that the services of the employee were terminated in terms of the contract, no domestic inquiry was held. The Supreme Court, on the basis of the evidence of the manager of the employer company, came to two conclusions, firstly, that the employer was thoroughly dissatisfied with the work of the employee, and secondly, the employer did not approve of the employee's conduct in joining the union. In this situation, the court was inclined to the view that the order of discharge, passed against the employee, proceeded on the basis of a misconduct, hence the discharge was of a punitive nature, as it amounted to punishment for the alleged misconduct. The employer, therefore, was not justified in discharging the employee without holding a proper inquiry. Furthermore, since the circumstance that the employee had joined the union, had at least, partially weighed in the mind of the employer in terminating the services of the employee, the termination was not justified, as it would not be open to the employer to dismiss any employee solely or principally, for that reason. The plea of the employer, that whenever the employer purports to terminate the services of his employee, by virtue of the power conferred on him by the terms of contract, the industrial adjudicators cannot question its validity, propriety or legality, was specifically rejected. In Chartered Bank, Wanchoo J observed:

> There is no doubt that an employer cannot dispense with the services of a permanent employee by a mere notice and claim that the industrial tribunal has no jurisdiction to inquire into the circumstances in which such termination of service simpliciter took place...and approved the rule that in order to judge this, the tribunal will have to go into all the circumstances which led to the termination simpliciter and the employer cannot say that it is not bound to disclose the circumstances before the tribunal. The form of the order of termination is not conclusive of the true nature of that order, for it is possible that the form may be merely a camouflage for an order of dismissal for misconduct. It is therefore, always open to the tribunal to go behind the form and look at the substance; and if it comes to the conclusion, for example, that though in form, the order amounts to a termination simpliciter, it in reality, cloaks a dismissal for misconduct, it will be open to it to set it aside as a colourable exercise of the power.[37]

In this case, the cash department of the bank was headed by the chief cashier, under whom a number of assistant cashiers were working. The chief cashier alone, gave security for the safe working of the cash department. Hence, no individual guarantees or fidelity bonds were taken from the assistant cashiers working in the cash department. The assistant cashiers were entertained in service only on the recommendation of the chief cashier. There was a long-standing practice followed in the cash department, that all the assistant cashiers on duty, should remain present at the end of the day, when the cash was checked and locked up under the supervision of the chief cashier, so that any shortage in cash could be easily checked. There was a department circular issued to the above effect also. The chief cashier reported to the management that the concerned employee was leaving the bank without his permission for some time past, before the cash was checked and locked up, in spite of the circular, hence, he was unable to continue to guarantee him and unless his services were dispensed with, his conduct would affect the security of the cash department. Two courses were open to the bank, it could have taken disciplinary action, as provided in para 521 of the bank award, or it could have resorted to the power vested in it by para 522(1) of the award. But with a view to avoid going into the wrongs and rights of the dispute between the chief cashier and the assistant cashier, the bank terminated the services of the assistant cashier, purporting it to be within terms of para 522(1) of the award. In the course of the adjudication proceedings on the dispute relating to the discharge of the concerned assistant cashier, before the tribunal, no allegations of victimisation or unfair labour practice were made out against the bank, though it was alleged that the bank exercised the power under para 522(1) of the award, mala fide. The order of discharge was set aside by the tribunal on the ground that when there were allegations which might amount to misconduct, against the employee of the bank, the procedure of disciplinary action under para 521 of the award ought to have been followed and the procedure under para 522 (1) could not have been resorted to. But, in appeal, the Supreme Court held that, the order of discharge, in the circumstances of the case, was unassailable and it could not be contended that there was a colourable exercise of power by the employer, as the termination of the services of the concerned employee was not on account of any misconduct on his part, and the order of termination could not be considered to be merely a cloak to avoid holding a proper inquiry under para 571 of the award. It was, therefore, held that the bank had no option but to terminate the service of the assistant cashier, under para 522(1) of the award, as it was faced with the report from the chief cashier, otherwise, its system in the cash department, would have required a change, which was not possible. The court declined to infer mala fides of the employer from the squabbles between the cashier and the concerned workman or from the fact that the bank had not provided an alternative employment to the concerned employee.[38]

In UB Dutt & Co, the facts were: the workman concerned came drunk to the mill and abused the engineer, the secretary and others and threatened them with physical violence. He was caught hold of by other workmen and taken outside. But shortly afterwards, he came back again and abused the same officials of the company. Thereupon, the company served a charge-sheet on him, setting out the above facts and asked him to show cause why his service should not be terminated on account of the grave indiscipline and misconduct. As the workman denied these allegations, he was informed that a departmental inquiry would be held and he was placed under suspension, pending the inquiry. But later on, instead of holding the inquiry, the company terminated his services under the relevant Standing Order. The Supreme Court held that it was too late in the day for an employer to raise a claim to terminate the services of his employee at any time, by just giving a notice or paying wages in lieu of such notice, for it would amount to a claim 'to hire and fire' the employee, as the employer pleases, and thus completely negate security of service, which, has been secured to the industrial employees, through industrial adjudication, for a long period of time. The explanation of the employer, namely, that the proposed inquiry, if it had been conducted, would have led to further friction and deterioration in the rank and file of the employees in general, and that maintenance of discipline in the undertaking would have been prejudiced if the workman had been retained in service, was discountenanced by the court. Wanchoo J, observed:

> If the employer wanted to take action for misconduct and then suddenly, dropped the departmental proceedings, which were intended to be held, and decided to discharge the employee under r 18(a) of the Standing Orders, it was clearly a colourable exercise of the power under the rule, inasmuch as that rule was used to get rid of an employee, instead of following the course of holding an inquiry for misconduct, notice for which had been given to the employee and for which a departmental inquiry was intended to be held.[39]

In Jabalpur Electric Supply, the facts were: the workman was charge-sheeted for substituting certain quantities of coil and cable in the stores of the company and even the inquiry into the misconduct had been held. Then the company discharged the workman from service, on the ground that it did not find it possible to retain him in service. This order was challenged by the workman inter alia on the ground that the order of 'discharge' was really an order of dismissal and as such, was bad in law. In the circumstances the, Supreme Court drew a distinction, in fact and in law, between an order of discharge under the contract and an order of dismissal or suspension as punishment and observed that though, from the inquiry, the employer might have been satisfied that the act of misconduct for which the employee was liable to be dismissed had been proved, he took a merciful view of his conduct in view of the previous clean record of the employee and accordingly, proceeded to 'discharge' him from service under the relevant Standing Order instead of dismissing him and in so doing, the employer had, in fact, acted fairly and even generously.[40] Thus, in Jabalpur Electric Supply, the Supreme Court resiled and took a softer view as compared to its hard-nosed decision rendered in UB Dutt.

It is impossible to reconcile these two decisions. In the former case, the employer had dropped the intended disciplinary proceedings after serving the notice of misconduct on the workman, while in the latter case, though the inquiry had been held and the finding that the act of misconduct had been proved, had, in fact, not been recorded by the inquiry officer, as imagined by the Supreme Court. It is also therefore, probable that the act of misconduct might not have been proved, which prompted, the employer to resort to the power of a discharge simpliciter, under the relevant Standing Order. If the 'merciful view' of the employer, in preferring the discharge simpliciter to the disciplinary dismissal, could prevail in this case, perhaps with more justification, it could have prevailed in UB Dutt. However, given that the earlier harder stand had yielded place to a softer view in a later case discloses the fact that the judicial view was becoming more alive to the ground realities and this change can be seen as part of the gradual evolution in the judicial decision-making process.

Then in Murugan Mills, where the services of the concerned employee were terminated under the relevant Standing Order without assigning any reason, the Supreme Court held that since the services of the workman, in fact, had been terminated for dereliction of duty and an attitude of go-slow in his work, which clearly amounted to a punishment for misconduct, the order of discharge simpliciter, under the relevant Standing Order, in such circumstances, was clearly a colourable exercise of the powers to terminate the services of workmen, under the provisions of the relevant Standing Order and the tribunal, therefore, was justified in going behind the order and deciding for itself, whether the termination of the workman's services could be sustained.[41] In Utkal Machinery, a Bench of five judges of the Supreme Court, again emphasised that the termination of the service of a workman under contract, by an industrial employer, must be in bona fide exercise of the contractual rights and then reiterated that in case the power is exercised mala fide or as a measure of victimisation or unfair labour practice or it is so capricious or unreasonable as to lead to an inference of motive or a lack of bona fide, it would be open to an industrial adjudicator to interfere with such a termination. In the case, the termination of the service, purporting to be in terms of the contract of employment, was found to be of a punitive character and was therefore, held to be mala fide and a colourable exercise of power.[42]

In Tata Oil Mills, the court again accentuated the bona fide aspect of the employer's action. In this case, the services of an employee were terminated after informing him that the company had lost confidence in him. The labour court came to the conclusion that the workman's plea about the mala fides of the company, was not proved and that the termination of service could not be said to amount to an act of victimisation or unfair labour practice. In spite of these findings, the labour court held that the discharge was not justified and directed the company to reinstate the workman. In appeal, the court recapitulated the principles enunciated in the earlier dicta, and in view of the definite finding of the labour court, in favour of the company, that the action in terminating the services of the workman was not mala fide and did not amount to victimisation, it was held that the employer company was justified in discharging the workman from service, in accordance with the power vested in it by the relevant rule of service and the holding of the labour court was not sustainable. Speaking for the court, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> The test always has to be, whether the act of the employer is bona fide or not. If the act is mala fide, or appears to be a colourable exercise of the powers conferred on the employer, either by the terms of contract or by the Standing Orders, then, notwithstanding the form of the order, industrial adjudication would examine the substance and would direct reinstatement.[43]

In Agra Electric Supply, the termination of the service of the concerned workman, under the contract of service, without any notice and without assigning any reason, was set aside. It was held that the termination was of a punitive character, for an act of misconduct, viz; having used the vehicle of the superior officer without his consent. It was further held that the termination was not bona fide, but was a colourable exercise of power, inasmuch as the report of unsatisfactory work of the employee was made at the instance of the superior officer and at any rate, was inspired by the fact that the workman had used the vehicle of that officer without his consent and got it damaged. The court observed that in view of the facts and circumstances of the case, the form and language of the order were of no consequence and it was open to the tribunal to find out whether the order was, in fact, passed with a view to punish the workman.[44] Likewise, in Jagdish Prasad, the services of the employee were terminated for the reason that he, at the time of his employment, had concealed the fact that his service had been terminated by his previous employer for his involvement in a corruption case. The Supreme Court held that this order casts a stigma on the character of the employee and since no opportunity to defend himself was given by holding a domestic inquiry, the termination of his service was vitiated and illegal.[45]

In Brooke Bond, the workman was charge-sheeted, alleging that he had abused the position of trust and responsibility as the company's employee and had brought down, thereby, its reputation, by committing certain acts. After holding a domestic inquiry into the charges, the workman was dismissed from the service of the company, for the misconduct 'committed and proved' against him. It is thus obvious that the 'discharge' being for an act of 'misconduct', was of a punitive nature. The workman filed a complaint before the labour court, under s 26 of the Bihar Shops and Establishment Act 1953. The labour court took the evidence of the domestic inquiry on to its record and also, itself, recorded certain other evidence, led by the parties. From this evidence, the labour court recorded certain findings on the basis of which it allowed the workman's claim and set aside the order of 'discharge' passed by the management and directed the reinstatement of the workman. In appeal, against the order of the labour court, the employer took the plea before the Supreme Court, that the termination of the service of the workman, was a discharge simpliciter and not by way of punishment, and since the workman had abused his position in the company, it was not possible to continue to repose trust and confidence in him and to continue him in service. But the court noticed that the charge-sheet contained allegations of acts of 'misconduct' against the workman and the findings of the inquiry officer were that the acts of misconduct charged against him, were proved and that the order of discharge consequent upon those findings, in clear terms, stated that it was passed as a punishment and further, that even in the written statement filed by the management before the labour court, it had averred that the workman was found guilty of the charges of misconduct levelled against him and the company preferred to punish him by 'discharging' him from service, instead of dismissing him. In the face of all these facts, the plea of the company, that the order terminating the service of the workman, was of a discharge simpliciter, and not by way of punishment, was held to be inconsistent with the record, and therefore, manifestly untenable. The order of 'discharge', in fact, was by way of punishment and not discharge simpliciter.[46]

On the other hand, in Tata Engg, the discharge simpliciter was held to be proper. An officer of the company had been grievously assaulted. The police charge-sheeted the delinquent workman and the committal order passed by the magistrate, recited that the relations between the workman and the assaulted officer were strained before the incident of assault. From this, the management inferred that the workman had, in one way or the other, a hand in the assault, and decided that it was not in the interest of the company to retain him in service, particularly in view of the fact that he was a terror in the division where he was employed. In these circumstances, the management discharged the workman from service, in exercise of the contractual power vested in it, under the provisions of the relevant Standing Order. The Supreme Court held that it was manifestly wrong to say that the company had acted mala fide, to victimise the workman, because he was a leading member of the union and observed that to hold so, would tantamount to saying that even if the employer was satisfied that it was prejudicial to the interests of his concern, to continue the workman in his service, the order of discharge must be deemed to be mala fide or passed to victimise him, merely because he was an active union worker. Furthermore, from the mere fact that certain other workmen concerned with some other acts, had been reinstated, it would not follow that the management had the intention to victimise the concerned workman, or that the order of discharge was a colourable exercise of power, to discharge under the Standing Orders. In the circumstances of the case, a grievous assault of the officer by those working under him, could be seriously viewed by the company, as against the acts committed by other employees. If the management, therefore, preferred to discharge the workman under the relevant Standing Order, instead of holding an inquiry into the alleged act of misconduct, parallel to criminal proceedings, it would not be reasonable to say, as the tribunal held, that the company could have charged the workman with misconduct and held an inquiry. The fact that it did not hold an inquiry, but exercised its power under the relevant Standing Order, could not render the order mala fide or one passed in colourable exercise of the power to discharge the workman from service. Relying on Jabalpur Electric Supply Co, in the circumstances of the case, the court held that the company had properly and justifiably exercised its power to terminate the service of the workman and there was no warrant for the tribunal to come to the conclusion, that it had acted mala fide or so as to victimise the workman.[47]

Likewise, in Gujarat MDC, the validity of a discharge simpliciter was upheld. The services of the concerned workman were terminated, as the management considered him to be arrogant, careless, negligent and having scant respect for the management, in view of certain events that had happened. The Supreme Court set aside the award of the labour court, which had held that the discharge was in pursuance of the threatened disciplinary action, for acts of misconduct and did not amount to a discharge simpliciter and, in fact, the real nature of the action taken against him was for the misconduct and was punitive. Since the requirement of holding a domestic inquiry was not complied with, the action of discharge was violative of the rules of natural justice. While quashing the findings of the labour court as perverse, the supreme court observed:

> If the corporation has been merciful in terminating his services by discharging him simpliciter, that is not a fault to be laid at their door, nor can it be a ground for imposing on them, the services of the respondent, who was indisciplined and arrogant—a conduct subversive of the smooth functioning of any commercial or industrial undertaking.[48]

In Municipal Corpn of Greater Bombay, the facts were: under the relevant Standing Orders, the employer corporation had a two-fold power; one, to impose punishment for misconduct after a disciplinary inquiry, under Standing Orders 21 and 23; and the other, to terminate the service of an employee by one month's written notice or pay in lieu thereof under Standing Order 26. The proviso to Standing Order 26 required the employer to give reasons for termination of the employment, in writing to the employee. The services of the concerned employee were terminated on the ground that her 'record of service was not satisfactory', though in the communication, it was stated that she would be paid 'one month's wages in lieu of notice and would also be eligible for all the benefits as may be admissible under the Standing Orders and service regulations of the undertaking'. While upholding the validity of the termination, the Supreme Court observed that merely because the reasons for terminating the service of the employee were required to be given and the reasons must not be arbitrary, capricious or irrelevant—it would not necessarily make the order of termination punitive in character, so as to require the compliance of the disciplinary procedure under Standing Orders 21 and 23; otherwise, the power of termination of service of an employee under Standing Order 26 would be rendered meaningless and futile, for, in no case, would it be possible to exercise it. It was further pointed out that:

> If the misconduct of the employee constitutes the foundation for terminating his service, then, even if the order of the termination is purported to be made under Standing Order 26, it may be liable to be regarded as punitive in character and hence, attracting the procedure of clause (2) of Standing Order 21, read with Standing Order 23, though, even in such a case, it may be argued that the management has not punished the employee, but has merely terminated his service under Standing Order 26.[49]

In a similar fact-situation, in Gujarat Steel Tubes, a majority of a three judge Bench took a diametrically opposite view. In this case, the workmen had gone on an illegal strike and they continued to be on strike despite all efforts of the management, in the face of the threat of the mill being taken over by the Government, having been declared a sick unit. In these circumstances, the management discharged 853 workmen and recruited some freshers to take their place, to keep the wheels of production moving. The management in this case, also had a two-fold power with respect to a workman guilty of misconduct, under the model Standing Order No 25(1), viz, to discharge a workman under sub-cl (l)(f) of cl 4 of model Standing Order 23, by giving him one month's notice or by payment of one month's wages in lieu thereof, while cl 4(A) of model Standing Order No 23 required the employer to record and communicate the reasons to the workman, for the termination of his service; and, to dismiss the workman by following the procedure of charge-sheet and inquiry etc. The management preferred the former course in the prevailing circumstances. Krishna Iyer J, who delivered the majority opinion, took the view that it was a case of dismissal, rather than of a discharge simpliciter, because the background of the illegal strike was the real foundation for the termination of the service of the workmen and the resort to the discharge simpliciter was a colourable exercise of the relevant model Standing Order.[50] But Koshal J, took the view that it was a clear case of a discharge simpliciter, as made out by the order and could not be a case of dismissal. Instead of focussing its attention on the relevant Standing Order, the majority pursued a rather prolix process of reasoning. The model Standing Order 25(1) gave the employer an option under cl (f), to 'discharge under Standing Order 23,' by giving the workman one month's notice or wages in lieu thereof, or under cl (g), to 'dismiss without notice', by complying with the disciplinary procedure under Standing Order 25(4). In case he adopts the former option, he is required to indicate his reasons for the termination of the service of the workman by cl 4(A) of model Standing Order 23. In case the reasoning of the majority is correct, the first option of discharge simpliciter gets emasculated and ineffective. The employer had exercised its option by giving valid reasons, the arbitrator had on facts, found that the order was not founded on the misconduct of strike, but on the intransigence of the workmen in not returning to work, which led the management to discharge the workmen en bloc. So also, on the basis of the evidence led by the management, the arbitrator came to the conclusion that it was a case of discharge simpliciter. The High Court, therefore, was wrong in interfering with the arbitral award. A priori, the majority opinion was absolutely perverse and clearly wrong, while the dissenting view of Koshal J was right.

In MK Ravi, the services of the employee were terminated in terms of the contract of employment without assigning any reason. Before the labour court, the employer justified the termination of service as a discharge simpliciter and also alternatively, took the plea that the termination, though apparently a discharge simpliciter, in fact, was a punishment for misconduct. The labour court held that if it was a case of a termination simpliciter, the termination, being in the nature of retrenchment, was not valid for non-compliance with the requirements of s 25F of the Act. But dealing with the alternative plea, the labour court permitted the management to adduce independent evidence to justify the order and also allowed the workman to lead evidence to rebut the case of the employer. On the basis of such evidence, the labour court held that the dismissal of the workman was justified. A single judge of the High Court upheld the validity of the award and held that the workman, having acquiesced to the hearing of the alternate case and also let in evidence to demolish the same, raised the plea against the labour court considering the alternate case of the management on after the verdict went against him.[51]

In Ruby General Insurance, the order of discharge simpliciter, under the contract, was set aside by the tribunal, as it took the view that the order punishing the workman, amounted to a dismissal. In coming to this conclusion, the tribunal was impressed by two allegations made by the workmen; firstly, that the management felt resentful against him for his having complained to the authorities against their failure to issue the letter of appointment, and secondly, that they were annoyed with him for his having demanded extra payment in respect of the work he was made to do in relation to certain concerns, in which the company was interested. Since the order of termination was passed without holding any inquiry, the tribunal held it to be invalid and directed the reinstatement of the workman. The award of the tribunal was affirmed in appeal by the Supreme Court, because the point was not pressed.[52] Likewise, in Hindustan Steel, the tribunal held that though the order of the termination of the service of the workmen was, in form, one of termination of service in terms of the contract, it was, in fact, punitive in nature and it was a case of victimisation. It was not in a bona fide exercise of the employer's right to do so, as it was based on the adverse report of the police. Consequently, the tribunal held the order to be illegal and unjustified and directed the reinstatement of the workmen, with full back wages. In writ proceedings, the High Court affirmed the holding of the tribunal, that the termination of the service of the workman was not in a bona fide exercise of the power of the employer to terminate the employee's service and that it was punitive in character. The High Court also held that the relief of reinstatement was the appropriate relief, as the case did not fall in one of the exceptions to the normal rule of reinstatement. In appeal, the Supreme Court did not consider it proper to interfere with the holding that the order terminating the service was not in a bona fide exercise of the power of the employer and was punitive in character and it limited the appeal only to the question, whether the tribunal should have granted the relief of reinstatement or compensation.[53]

In Bihar SRTC, the facts of the case were: the workman concerned was discharged from service in accordance with the terms of the contract to the effect that 'the appointment was purely temporary and was terminable without notice and without assigning any reason'. The labour court relied on a letter addressed by the management to the conciliation officer in which it stated that the service of the workman was terminated as it was found that he had committed various irregularities in the discharge of his duties. Accordingly, the labour court held that the said termination was illegal as no enquiry was conducted into the irregularities alleged, and accordingly ordered reinstatement. The Supreme Court upheld the award of the labour court.[54] It is pertinent to note that both Bihar SRTC and Tata Engineering, were decided by the same judge. From the juxtaposition of these cases, it would appear that diametrically opposite stands were taken in the two cases, having similar fact-situations.

In Sudder Office, the workman concerned was charged with removing some used pulleys from the company's godown and loading them in the godown lorry and for instructing the driver to drop them at the godown of some one else. Subsequently, some sort of investigation was made by the management, which was loosely called an inquiry. Then an order was passed, stating that the charges had been satisfactorily proved against the workman and the management had lost confidence in him, as it was unsafe to retain him in the post of trust and responsibility occupied by him, in the interest of the company, and it was decided to terminate his service under the contract, as provided in the relevant Standing Order. The labour court held that the enquiry conducted by the management was not valid, because no evidence was adduced before it by the management, to prove the charges against the workman, and held that the said termination was a camouflaged dismissal. On this view of the matter, it ordered reinstatement of the workman with full back wages and continuity of service. The High Court held that the order terminating the service of the workman was an order of discharge simpliciter and not one of dismissal and the award of the labour court, therefore, was erroneous. The Supreme Court upheld the order and observed that the High Court had acted within its jurisdiction, in setting aside the order of the labour court, especially so, when no finding of victimisation, unfair labour practice or mala fide, was recorded against the management. The court, therefore, upheld the order terminating the service of the workman, for loss of confidence, who was at the relevant time, holding a very responsible post, where integrity and honesty were quite essential.[55] In Motipur Sugar Factory, in cases of dismissal, 'no inquiry' or 'defective inquiry' situations stand on the same footing. It is further stated that even in cases where no inquiry has been held, it is open for an employer to satisfy the tribunal, by adducing evidence about the validity of the order of discharge or dismissal. In other words, even in cases of a discharge simpliciter, it is open to an employer to satisfy the tribunal that the services of the employee were terminated in a bona fide exercise of the powers under the contract or for a loss of confidence in him.[56].

Where an employer terminates the service of a workman who shows a consistent indifference to work and discipline and gets annoyed when he is asked to give an explanation, an inference of mala fides cannot be justified. The fact that the workman happens to be an office-bearer of a union will make no difference. There is no ambiguity in law on this highly sensitive question of 'discharge'. The employer may have a right to discharge his employee under the contract or rules. But the existence of a good reason, based on objective facts, is indispensable for a discharge. There can be a myriad of reasons for discharging including an act or omission, amounting to a misconduct. The employer is not bound to hold an inquiry and visit the employee with penal action, even if such reason happens to be a misconduct of the employee. It is only the absence of such reason, and not a mere failure to hold an inquiry, that would render such discharge mala fide or an act in colourable exercise of power, raising an inference of victimisation. Not the law, but its application to the facts of each case, presents the real difficulty. The possibilities for an employer seeking to eliminate the thorn of an active trade union worker, or for an employee, seeking to cover his misconduct under his trade union activity, always exist. The assessment of evidence becomes difficult when a guilty employee happens also to be an active trade union worker and the employer takes recourse to a discharge simpliciter, rather than to a long winding, and dilatory course of inquiry and punitive action. The dividing line between the motive for and the basis of the order, becomes very thin in such cases. The law is also liable to be misapplied, when a few observations in a judgment intended to emphasise some peculiar features of any particular case, are misread or misunderstood, by tearing them from their context.[57]

In Sadasivan, Raju J for a Division Bench of the Madras High Court, held that a termination of service in terms of a clause in an agreement, providing that the 'management can terminate the service of an employee, without giving reasons, by giving one month's notice or salary in lieu of notice', was void and unenforceable, being ultra vires of Art. 14 of the Constitution, apart from being opposed to public policy and violative of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.[58] This decision calls for some analysis. In the first place, according to the admitted facts, it was not a case of termination of service of a public servant and hence, the observation of Raju J that such a clause would offend Art. 14 of the Constitution, is without any merit whatsoever. Secondly, the right of an employer, to terminate the service by invoking a term of the contract of employment and by giving one month's notice or paying wages in lieu thereof, is coextensive with the right of an employee to resign and leave the service by giving one month's notice or paying wages in lieu thereof. In terms of such a contract, neither the employee, nor the employer was required to give reasons for the resignation or the termination, respectively. Thirdly, given the fact that the certified Standing Orders, as well as the contract of employment, provided for the determination of the contract by giving the prescribed notice or wages, could it be said that such a contract fell within one of those forbidden contracts enumerated in s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872? Could it, by any stretch of imagination, be canvassed that an employment contract of this nature is opposed to public policy or that it defeats the provision of any law or that it causes injury to any person or his property or is immoral or fraudulent?Would it be wrong if one draws an adverse inference to the effect that the learned judge was absolutely ignorant of the fact that there is nothing in industrial law, or in any branch of law, like a 'compulsive life-time employment', bordering on slavery and serfdom, with neither party having the right to terminate a contract once made? It is only when the termination of service is found to be punitive and a colourable exercise of powers on the part of the employer, that the issue acquires a different complexion, giving a right to the courts to lift the veil and set the order aside, if it is found that it was not a case of a termination simpliciter, but one of a camouflaged dismissal. This much is the settled law, as laid down in a catena of decisions by the Supreme Court, for instance, Assam Oil Co,[59]Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay,[60]Shamsher Singh Gujarat Steel Tubes,[61] and others. For that matter, even in a case involving a public servant, who is governed by the provisions of Art. 311 of the Constitution, Sinha CJI, speaking for a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court, held that if the Government proceeds against the employee, in the direct way, without casting any aspersions on his honesty or competence, his discharge would not, in law, have the effect of a removal from service by way of punishment and the employee could have no grievance to ventilate in any court.[62] Viewed thus, the decision rendered by Raju J in Sadasivan is wholly misconceived, perverse, clumsy and is wrong. In Chandra Prakash Gautam, the Supreme Court reiterated the earlier judicial dicta on the subject and held that if a person is appointed on a temporary basis and the order of termination is not casting any stigma, then such order would be an order of termination simpliciter and the same cannot be challenged on the ground that no opportunity to show cause was given.[63] In Dainik Navbharat, a single judge of the MP High Court held that the termination of a workman, who was appointed on the specific understanding that his appointment was for the Bhopal office only, on the ground that he refused to report at the Jabalpur office, would not amount to defiance of any lawful order on his part and the termination of his service on that count, was illegal.[64]

(ii) Loss of Confidence:

In VA Rebellow, the court upheld the validity of the termination of the service of an employee of the Air India Corporation, in terms of the relevant regulation framed under the Air Corporations Act 1953, by paying his salary for thirty days in lieu of the notice. The relevant regulation did not lay down any pre-requisite for invoking its application. Action under this regulation could be validly taken by the employer corporation at its sweet-will, without assigning any reason and it was not bound to disclose why it did not want to continue in service, the employee concerned. The order of termination of the service of the workman, did not, therefore, refer to any act of misconduct on the part of the workman. But the written statement filed by the corporation before the labour court, disclosed the fact that the corporation had lost confidence in the workman, due to a grave suspicion regarding his private conduct and behaviour with the air hostesses employed by the corporation. The labour court, therefore, held that the discharge of the workman was not a discharge simpliciter, but was of a punitive nature. In appeal, Dua J observed:

> It may be conceded that an employer must always have some reason for terminating the services of his employee. Such reason, apart from misconduct, may, inter alia, be a want of full satisfaction with his overall suitability in the job assigned to the employee concerned. The fact that the employer is not fully satisfied with the overall result of the performance of his duties by his employee, does not necessarily imply a misconduct on his part. The only thing that remains to be seen is, if in this case, the impugned order is mala fide. ... Once bona fide loss of confidence is affirmed, the impugned order must be considered to be immune from challenge. The opinion formed by his employer, about the suitability of the employee for the job assigned to him, even though erroneous, if bona fide, is in our opinion, final and not subject to review by industrial adjudication. Such opinion may legitimately induce the employer to terminate the employees' services; but such termination can, on no rational grounds, be considered to be for misconduct and must, therefore, be held to be permissible and immune from challenge.[65]

It was, therefore, held that the labour court was not right in holding that the termination of the service of the workman, for an act of misconduct, was not a discharge simpliciter. From this decision, it appears that the court assumed the bona fides of the employer corporation in the discharge simpliciter of the workman, under the relevant regulation, by accepting its plea of loss of confidence in the workman. The court did not address itself to the specific contention of the workman, that the discharge, though purported to be under the relevant regulations, in fact, was for the misconduct of his alleged misbehaviour towards the air hostesses. This yardstick has not been adopted and applied in many other cases already discussed. In Binny Ltd, the plea of loss of confidence by the employer was again given more credibility than the plea of the workman that the discharge was of a punitive character.[66] The concerned workman took leave for eight days for going to his native place to settle a land dispute. But in fact, he did not go to his village. During the period of such leave, he, as a matter of fact, participated in a hunger strike before the Government secretariat. The management, therefore, cancelled his leave and directed him to join duty forthwith. The workman, however, did not comply with this direction. Consequently, the management terminated his services, under the relevant Standing Order, for being absent from duty for more than eight consecutive days. Though the labour court found that the workman took leave on a false pretext and the management had not acted mala fide, with the object of victimisation or as an unfair labour practice in discharging the workman, still, it ordered his reinstatement with Rs 5,000 by way of back wages, as it took the view that the management had no right or power to revoke the leave once granted to the workman. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the labour court and held that the management could not possibly have any confidence in the workman for the future, because he had taken leave on a false pretext and observed, that in view of the well-settled law, neither reinstatement, nor backwages could have been ordered.

In Johnson Pumps, the facts were: the services of the concerned workman were terminated by a notice in terms of the contract of service. This order was challenged by the workman in industrial adjudication, as mala fide, and calculated to victimise him for his trade union activities. His case was that although he was efficient and the management had given him merit increments, his services were terminated because he took active part in the formation of an employees' union, of which he became a treasurer. Furthermore, the termination of service was wrongful and illegal, because the workman had not been given an opportunity to defend himself. The counter case of the management was that since the workman had not been dismissed from service for any act of misconduct, it was a case of discharge simpliciter, which required no inquiry. In other words, the action being a simple termination without a stigma, the process and consequence of a disciplinary action were not attracted. Hence, there was no illegality invalidating the order. Furthermore, the allegations of the workman, that the termination of his services was on account of his trade union activities, was a concoction in self-defence, made more 'to create ground for the workman's claim and levelled as a matter of habit and routine', and the management did not even have the knowledge of the formation of the union. The management's further plea was that it had lost confidence in the workman, because he had misused his position by passing on 'very important and secret information about the affairs of the company, to certain outsiders' and also made attempts to 'elicit information from the section, with a view to pass it on to the outsiders'. The order terminating the services of the workman was, therefore, sought to be sustained as bona fide, on the ground of unreliability of the workman. In view of the suspicion, that the workman was passing information regarding certain tenders to some outsiders, lurking in the mind of the employer, which motivated the termination of the service, the labour court accepted the plea of loss of confidence advanced by the employer and upheld the validity of the order of discharge. In appeal, against the order of the labour court, the Supreme Court posed to itself the questions: Whether the order of termination in this case, was innocuous and bona fide or an oblique circumvention of the processual protection the law provides, to a workman before he is dismissed for misconduct and whether the ipse dixit of the employer, that he had lost confidence in the employee, was sufficient justification to jettison the latter, without leveling and proving the objectionable conduct which had undermined his confidence, so that the tribunal may be satisfied about the bona fides of the 'firing', as contrasted with the colourable exercise of power, hiding a not so innocuous purpose. From the fact that the employer had not informed the worker or the union about the loss of confidence, nor had it taken this plea before the conciliation officer, the court drew the inference of a lack of bona fides. It also went into the evidence and held that the increments given to the workman in the relevant period, militated against the plea of loss of confidence, apart from taking the view that the evidence on record, was not sufficient to establish the bona fides of the plea of loss of confidence. Consequently, the discharge simpliciter on the basis of loss of confidence, was held to be mala fide.[67]

The decision in Johnson Pumps is diametrically opposed to the approach of the court in Jabalpur Electric Supply Co, Tata Engineering, Hindustan Steel, VA Rebellow, Gujarat MDC and Municipal Corpn of Greater Bombay. No effort was made to reconcile the conflicting dicta. Rather curiously enough, the court 'discerned' 'harmony' and 'consistency' in the case law from the Chartered Bank case to the Air India Corpn case. But this 'discernment' of harmony is not borne out by any analytical scrutiny of those dicta. Instead of noticing the glaringly irreconcilable inconsistencies in its approach in the various cases, the court contented itself by referring to three cases and with the observation that 'the plethora of precedents need not be covered in extenso, as the law laid down is the same, except that judicial response to each case situation leads to emphasis on different facets of the principle'. The law in this vexed area requires restatement, with precision and clarity. The Bombay High Court, in Siddhanath Kadam, observed that Johnson Pumps only registered a warning against accepting a plea of loss of confidence, when it is unsupported by any material and proves to be a mere pretence for getting rid of an unwarranted employee. The attack was directed not against the doctrine of 'loss of confidence' itself, but against the indiscriminate use thereof, without investigation to whether the same is a cover for a capricious, arbitrary and fanciful 'hire and fire' strategy and without regard to whether it is a colourable exercise of the power.[68]The High Court held that the plea of a loss of confidence is not liable to be rejected when it is based on good grounds and dependable material, as found by the tribunal. It is not open to an employer in despair, as a last resort, to raise the plea of loss of confidence, when he finds that the finding of guilt entered in the domestic inquiry, on the basis of which the order of dismissal was passed by the management, was bound to be set aside by the tribunal. In other words, the action initiated on grounds other than a loss of confidence, cannot to converted into or developed into a case of loss of confidence, to suit the convenience of the employer, so as to sustain the act of termination, which the tribunal, on the facts established, found to be illegal. Furthermore, the success or failure of the plea of loss of confidence, essentially depends upon the assessment of the facts and circumstances, considering the nature of the duty of the workman, the trust reposed by the management on the workmen, and the fiduciary relationship, if any, involved between the management and the workmen, in the day-to-day work of the workmen.[69] The plea of a 'loss of confidence' need not necessarily be confined only to the employees holding confidential posts and not to others. Every contract of employment implies trust and confidence as its ingredients. Some posts, no doubt, happen to be of a highly confidential nature. But that does not mean that confidence in an employee is a dispensable element in the other posts.

In Rable v Green , it was held that an employee is expected to promote the employer's interests, in connection with which he has been employed and a necessary implication which must be engrafted on such a contract is, that the servant undertook to serve his master with good faith and fidelity.[70] In Tata Engineering, the workman was not holding 'any such' position of confidence and still, his discharge was held justified on the ground of loss of confidence. It is not possible to underestimate the element of such confidence in the harmonious, smooth and effective working of any undertaking. The court has, however, to ensure that any such claim of 'loss of confidence' is genuine and is based on objective facts, lest the protection afforded to the workman becomes illusory. However, well-founded suspicions against employees holding posts of a high confidential nature, may be considered enough for a loss of confidence, while in other cases, proof that the workman has done some act or omission, should be required for the employer's loss of confidence in him. The questions as to in what respect the employee was found by the employer, to be unreliable and how his business was liable to be affected adversely, or how any loss was caused to him, are matters of rational inference and prudent calculations, from the facts discovered, for the employers and cannot be matters of pleadings and evidence. On a review of some of the above cases, a single judge of the Gauhati High Court,[71] has stated the following principles of adjudication:

(i) A loss of confidence is still a valid ground of termination, though not applicable to all categories of workmen.

(ii) the plea of a loss of confidence cannot, however, be used as a cloak, but must be bona fide.

(iii) An order of termination would not cease to be so, if reasons for the same, even casting aspersions, are given in those cases where it is required by the Standing Orders.

(iv) Where reasons are not required to be given by the Standing Orders, it is, to put it mildly, doubtful that the termination order would be regarded as one of discharge, if it casts a stigma.

(v) If the order be due to victimisation or an unfair labour practice, it would be bad in the eye of law.

(vi) The form of order is never decisive in such cases.

(vii) An order founded on misconduct would be punitive in nature and not a termination simpliciter.

(viii) The management could lead evidence to prove the misconduct, even if it had not held any inquiry into the misconduct, as required by the relevant Standing Orders.

In Chandulal, the Supreme Court disagreed with the findings of the labour court, that when a service is terminated on the basis of a 'loss of confidence', the order does not amount to one with stigma and does not warrant a proceeding as contemplated by law, preceding the termination. Speaking for the court, Ranganath Misra J said:

> Want of confidence in an employee does point to an adverse facet in his character, as the true meaning of the allegation is that the employee has failed to behave up to the expected standard of conduct, which has given rise to a situation involving a loss of confidence. In any view of the matter, it amounts to a dereliction on the part of the workman and therefore, the stand taken by the management, that a termination for loss of confidence does not amount to a stigma, has to be repelled. [72]

In this case, the court deviated from the trodden path, that the service of an employee could be terminated in terms of the contract for a loss of confidence. In other words, the plea of 'loss of confidence' in the employee, casts a stigma on the character of the workman. In the absence of a statutory definition of the word 'stigma', in Kamal Kishore Lakshman, the same judge, referring to the etymological meaning of the word, held that a stigma is:

> something that detracts from the character or reputation of a person, mark, sign etc, indicating that something is not considered normal or standard ... blemish, defect, disgrace, disrepute, imputation, mark or disgrace of shame ... a mark, a label, indicating a deviation from a norm ... a matter for moral reproach.[73]

In these cases, the court has given a penal hue to the termination of service for a 'loss of confidence'. Consequently, when an employer terminates the service of a workman, for loss of confidence in him, such termination is not innocent in terms of the contract. It casts a stigma on the character of the workman. Therefore, the requirement of having disciplinary proceedings before dispensing with the service of the employee, is attracted. These requirements have been elaborated in an illuminating opinion by the Delhi High Court, in Amarjeet Singh, in which Anand J, observed:

> It is well-settled that in determining the challenge to the validity of an order, which purports to be an order simpliciter, the language is not determinative and the court has the power, as indeed, the obligation, to go behind the order and examine the circumstances antecedent and subsequent to the impugned order ... If the impugned order is, therefore, stigmatic, either on the face of it or in any event, in the context of the circumstances antecedent and subsequent to it, it would be liable to be void on the simple ground that such an order could not have been made without giving the petitioner a reasonable opportunity of being heard, on the principle of audi alteram partem.[74]

In D Seeralan, of the Madras High Court held, that the termination of the service of the employee for 'loss of confidence', being of a punitive character, was invalid for 'non-compliance' with the relevant Standing Orders, prescribing the procedure for inflicting the disciplinary punishment. However, in view of the fact that the termination of service was not mala fide, the court awarded compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[75] In Jagatpal Dhuria, where the labour court, despite holding that the order of termination, passed against the workman, without conducting an inquiry, was illegal, noted the fact that there was a shortage of stock when the workman was in charge of the cash collections, and ordered a payment of compensation in lieu of reinstatement. A single judge of the Bombay High Court accepted the management's plea, that it had lost confidence in the workman and approved the award passed by the labour court.[76]

(iii) Discharge of Probationers:

The purpose of placing a person on probation is to try him during the period of probation and to assess his suitability for the job concerned. It is settled that an order of discharge is not an order of punishment and, therefore, there is no question of giving a hearing before a termination of his service.[77] If an employee who is on probation or holding an appointment on a temporary basis, is removed from the service with stigma, because of some specific charge, then the plea that his service was temporary or his appointment was on probation, is not sustainable. In such a case, it is necessary to hold an inquiry, affording him an opportunity to show that the charge levelled against him is either not proved or is without any basis. But when the service of an employee is terminated during the period of probation or while his appointment is on a temporary basis, by an order of termination simpliciter, after some preliminary inquiry, it cannot be said that some inquiry had been made against him before the issuance of the order of termination. It really amounted to his removal from service on a charge and as such, the termination was penal in nature.[78] The principle of law relating to discharge under the contract of discharge simpliciter, was extended to the discharge of probationers as well, by the Supreme Court in Express Newspapers. The probationer in this case, was appointed as a journalist on a probation for six months and had to be confirmed if he was found suitable for the job during this period. But before the expiry of the probationary period, the employer terminated his service on the ground that his work was unsatisfactory. The discharge was challenged by the workman as mala fide and a measure of unfair labour practice. The plea of the management was that the journalist, having been appointed only as a probationer, the termination of his service for unsatisfactory work, was well within the rights of the management. Speaking for the Supreme Court, Das Gupta J stated the law in the following words:

> There can, in our opinion, be no doubt about the position in law, that an employee appointed on probation for six months, continues as a probationer even after the period of six months, if at the end of the period, his services had either not been terminated or he is confirmed. It appears clear to us that without anything more, an appointment on probation for six months, gives the employer no right to terminate the service of an employee before the six months have expired, except on the ground of misconduct or other sufficient reasons, in the which case, even the services of a permanent employee could be terminated. At the end of the six months' period, the employer can either confirm him or terminate his services, because his service is found unsatisfactory. If no action is taken by the employer, either by way of confirmation or by way of termination, the employee continues to be in service as a probationer. [79]

From these observations, it appears that the court maintained the distinction between the cases of termination of employment of a probationer, before the period of probation have expired and the cases where the employer exercises his inherent right, either to confirm or to terminate the employment of the probationer, at the end of the period of probation.[80] The employer's right to terminate the service of a probationer, at the end of the probationary period, without anything more, was recognised. It is also clear that when the first appointment is on probation for a specific period and the employee is allowed to continue in the post after the expiry of that period, without any specific order of confirmation, he continues in his post as a probationer only and acquires no substantive right to hold the post in the absence of any indication to the contrary, in the original order of appointment or promotion or the service rules. When, therefore, after the period of probation, an appointee is allowed to continue in the post, without an order of confirmation, the only possible view to take is that by implication, the period of probation has been extended. The fact that an appointee is allowed to continue after the end of the period of probation, cannot lead to the conclusion that he should be deemed to have been confirmed. An express order of confirmation is necessary to give the employee a substantive right to the post, and from the mere fact that he is allowed to continue in the post after the expiry of the specified period of probation, it is not possible to hold that he should be deemed to have been confirmed. The reason for this is that where, on the completion of the specified period of probation, the employee is allowed to continue in the post without any order of confirmation, the only possible view to take, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the original order, appointment, promotion or the service rules, is that the initial period of probation has been extended, by necessary implication. Where the service rules fixed a definite time beyond which the probationary period cannot be extended and the employee appointed or promoted to a post on probation was allowed to continue in that post after the completion of the minimum period of probation, without an express order of confirmation, he cannot be deemed to continue in that post as a probationer by implication. In such a case, the implication is negatived by the service rules, forbidding the extension of the probationary period beyond the maximum period fixed by it and it is permissible to draw an inference that the employee allowed to continue in the post on completion of the maximum period of probation, has been confirmed in the post, by implication.[81]

The only difference between a probationer whose term of probation has not expired and the one who is continuing in the service after the expiry of the stipulated period of probation, without any order of confirmation having been passed, is, that the former has the guaranteed period of trial, namely, the probationary period during which he is not liable to be discharged on the ground of unsuitability, whereas the latter is liable to be discharged any time. It will be totally meaningless to refer to a person's employment on probation, if the management has a right to terminate his services only on the ground of proved misconduct. It is of the very essence of the concept of probation, that the person is on trial, regarding his suitability for a regular appointment and is liable to be discharged on being found to be unsuitable for permanent absorption, on the expiry of the probationary period.[82] In Utkal Machinery, where the terms of employment of the probationer provided that the employer could terminate the services of the employee during the probationary period, without notice and without assigning any reason, the Supreme Court said that when the validity of such termination is challenged in industrial adjudication, it would be competent for the industrial tribunal to find out whether the order of termination was a bona fide exercise of the power conferred by the contract. In such a case, like the case of a permanent employee, it would be open to the tribunal to consider whether the order of termination is mala fide or whether it amounts to victimisation or an unfair labour practice or is so capricious or unreasonable as would lead to the inference that it had been passed with an ulterior motive and not in a bona fide exercise of the power arising out of the contract, and to afford a proper relief to the probationer employee.[83] In Brooke Bond, the facts were: the workman was appointed in the first instance, for a probationary period of six months, extendable for a further period of three months or more. The letter of appointment further provided that the company had the right to terminate the services of the probationer, 'during the period of probation or the extended period of probation or before confirmation in writing, without notice and without assigning any reasons whatsoever'. The industrial tribunal held that the employer was not justified in discharging the probationer workman from service, without holding a proper inquiry. Jaganmohan Reddy J, observed:

> While there may be some justification on the terms of appointment in the case, for the court to observe that the employer had no right to terminate the service before the expiry of the six months, it makes no difference to the principle that the employer cannot terminate the services, even of a probationer, on any grounds which have not been recognised as a justification for such termination. [84]

Applying the rule laid down in Utkal Machinery, the court held that the order terminating the services of the probationer, was capricious and unreasonable and the termination was not justified. Affirming the direction of the tribunal, the court observed that on the reinstatement of the workman, the employer will have an opportunity of watching his work and 'will have the right and freedom to make up its mind as to whether the services of the respondent should be retained or dispensed with, on justifiable grounds'. The effect of the Utkal Machinery and the Brooke Bond, is that despite a provision in the contract of employment, to the effect that during the period of probation, an employer has the right to terminate the services of the probationer without any notice and without assigning any reason, it would be open to the industrial adjudicator to consider whether the order of termination is mala fide or whether it amounts to victimisation or an unfair labour practice. From the observations of the court in the Brooke Bond case, extracted above, one is left with an impression that even on the expiry of the probationary period, the employer can dispense with the services of the probationer only 'on justifiable grounds' but this observation has to be understood to be confined to the particular facts of that case alone. This cannot be understood to lay down a general proposition of law, because it would cut at the very root of the concept of probation. In Gujarat MDC, where the validity of the termination of the service of a temporary employee was upheld, which employee was discharged from service in view of the misconduct of 'malingering' and 'other acts subversive of discipline'. It is a well-settled law that at the end of the probationary period, it is open to the employer to continue the employee in his service or not, as per his discretion, otherwise, the distinction between a probationary employment and a permanent one will be wiped out.[85] Even if on the expiry of the probationary period, the work of the employees has been satisfactory, it does not confer any right on them to be confirmed. Furthermore, the extension of any facilities to such employees, during the period of their probation or extension thereof, or their being treated as confirmed, will not ipso facto make them confirmed, which can only be done by a valid order of confirmation.[86] The law on the termination of the services of probationers has been elaborately stated by a Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court in Shamsher Singh.[87]The same principles will apply to probationers in industrial employment as well. The only difference is that in the case of Government employees, the requirement of Art. 311 of the Constitution have to be complied with, whereas, in the case of industrial employees, the rules of natural justice have to be complied with, when the termination of service is for an act of misconduct. The principles discernible from Shamsher Singh are:

i. The termination of the service of a probationer in the Government will not, ordinarily and by itself, be a punishment, because the Government servant so appointed, has no right to continue to hold such a post any more than a servant employed on probation by a private employer, is entitled to do so.

ii. Such a termination does not operate as a forfeiture of any right of a servant to hold the post, if he has no such right, because such a termination cannot be described as a dismissal, removal or reduction in rank by way of a punishment.

iii However, if the right exists, under a contract of service, rules to terminate the service, and the motive operating on the mind of the Government, are wholly irrelevant. The reason is that it inheres in the state of mind, which is not discernible.

iv. On the other hand, if the termination of service is sought to be founded on misconduct, negligence, inefficiency or any other disqualification, then it is a punishment. In such a case, the motive becomes relevant, since the termination is founded on misconduct, it is objective and manifest.

v. But no abstract proposition can be laid down, that where the services of a probationer are terminated without saying anything more, in the order of termination, than that the services are being terminated, it can never amount to punishment.

vi If a probationer is discharged on the ground of misconduct or inefficiency or for similar reasons, without a proper inquiry and without him getting a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against his discharge, it may in a given case, amount to a removal from service.

vii Before a probationer is confirmed, the authority concerned is under an obligation to consider whether the work of the probationer is satisfactory or whether he is suitable for the post. In the absence of any rules governing a probationer in this respect, the authority may come to the conclusion that on account of his inadequacy for the job or for any temperamental or other object, not involving moral turpitude, the probationer is unsuitable for the job and hence, must be discharged. No punishment is involved in this.

viii The authority may, in some cases, be of the view that the conduct of the probationer may result in a dismissal or a removal, on an inquiry. But in such cases, the authority may not hold an inquiry and may simply discharge the probationer, with a view to giving him a chance to make good in his walk of life, without a stigma at the time of the termination of his service. Thus, if the Government proceeds against the probationer, in a direct way, without casting any aspersions on his honesty or competence, his discharge would not have the effect of punishment.

ix. If, on the other hand, the probationer is faced with an inquiry, on charges of misconduct or inefficiency or corruption, and if his services are terminated without following the provisions of Article 311 (2), then he can claim protection. Even the fact of having held an inquiry is not always conclusive. What is decisive is whether the order is really by way of punishment.

x. If there is an inquiry, the facts and circumstances of the case will have to be looked into, in order to find out whether the order is of dismissal, in substance. The probationer whose terms of services provided that it could be terminated without any notice and without any cause being shown, cannot claim the protection of Article 311.

xi. A preliminary inquiry to satisfy that there was reason to dispense with the service of the probationer, would not tantamount to an inquiry into the acts of misconduct, alleged against the employee. On the other hand, a statement in the order of termination of a probationer, that he is undesirable, would impart an element of punishment. If, therefore, the facts and circumstances of the case indicate that the substance of the order is that the termination is by way of punishment, then the probationer is entitled to the protection of Article 311 of the Constitution.

xii. In other words, the substance of the order, and not the form, would be decisive. The order terminating the services of a probationer under the rules of employment and without anything more, will not attract Article 311.

xiii. Where a departmental inquiry is contemplated and if an inquiry is not in facts proceeded with, Article 311 will not be attracted, unless it can be shown that the order, though unexceptionable in form, is made following a report based on a misconduct.

In Prakash Mishra, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that though a probationer can be weeded out without an inter-party inquiry, his service cannot be terminated without inquiry, if the termination is by way of punishment for an act of misconduct. The termination of the service of a probationer in a public sector undertaking, though appearing to be innocuous, was made in the background of an act of misconduct. The impugned order was, therefore, quashed.[88] The principle will apply to industrial adjudication as well. In K Veerasha, the Kerala High Court held that an order of dismissal of an employee for misconduct, is entirely different in nature from an order terminating the probation of such an employee.[89] An order of termination in innocuous terms, which does not cast any stigma on the employee, nor does it visit him with any evil consequences and is also not founded on any act of misconduct, is not, open to challenge.[90] Likewise, in the absence of the rules which equate a termination of service during or at the end of the probation, with removal, no proceeding is necessary to terminate the service of a probationer.[91] If the contract of service provides that the probation can be terminated if the work of the employee is found to be unsatisfactory, the probation can be terminated after calling for an explanation from such an employee and after giving him a reasonable opportunity of being heard, and to explain himself. In such a case, the discharge would be based on the contractual terms and would not be an order of dismissal.[92] But the Patna High Court, in Indian Oil Corpn,[93] had taken the view that if a probationer has not been taken in service substantively or his service has been terminated in terms of the contract, the principles of natural justice are not automatically attracted, because an appointment on probation is meant to assess the capacity of the probationer and if he is not continued in the service, it would inferentially indicate that his work was not found satisfactory. An assessment of satisfactory work is inherent in the probationer's employment.

The period of probation, however, in excess of the period provided in the Standing Orders, would not be valid in law, as the Standing Orders have statutory force.[94] In Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd v Alladin , the employee was taken on probation for a period of six months. However, in the letter of his appointment, it was provided that even during the period of probation, his services could be terminated without notice and without assigning any reason. The Supreme Court held that the provisions in the letter of appointment, with respect to the termination of the service of a probationer, must be read to mean that the appointment was subject to the management's power of termination, as provided in the Standing Orders.[95] In Western India Match Co, the facts were, the workman was appointed as a watchman and in his letter of appointment, a period of six months was stipulated as the probationary period, while the certified Standing Orders defined a 'probationer' as a workman who was 'provisionally employed to fill a permanent vacancy and has not completed two months service'. After the expiry of the period of probation of six months, the probationary period of the employee was extended by two months retrospectively, and, during this extended period, his services were terminated. The labour court found that the discharge was neither mala fide, nor an act of victimisation for trade union activities. Nevertheless, it set aside the order of discharge, holding that the term regarding the six months probation, in the letter of appointment, was inconsistent with the definition of a 'probationer' in the Standing Orders, and therefore, was invalid. After the completion of the probationary period of two months, as provided in the relevant Standing Orders, the workman had become a permanent employee. Affirming the holding of the labour court, in appeal, the Supreme Court observed that 'the terms of employment specified in the Standing Orders would prevail over the corresponding terms in the contract of service in existence, on the enforcement of the Standing Orders'. On a parity of reasoning, it was observed:

> If a prior agreement, inconsistent with the Standing Orders, will not survive, an agreement posterior to and inconsistent with the Standing Orders, will also not prevail ... and 'the employer cannot enforce two sets of Standing Orders governing the classification of workmen, it is also not open to him to enforce simultaneously, the Standing Orders regulating the classification of workmen and the special agreement between him and an individual workman, setting his categorisation. (infra)

In this case, another fundamental point was submitted to the court. It was suggested that the Standing Orders, certified under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, cannot be said to have statutory force, because they can be modified by an industrial adjudicator, on a reference in this regard being made to him under s 10 of the IDA. The argument was that a statutory provision cannot be modified by industrial adjudication on the theory that the courts or tribunals can only interpret the law and not legislate; furthermore, if the terms or conditions of employment, covered by the Standing Orders, could be modified by an adjudicatorunder the Industrial Disputes Act, they could equally well be modified by a private agreement between the parties. It was, therefore, urged that if the subject-matter of the Standing Orders could be amended or modified by industrial adjudication or private agreement, it cannot have statutory force; hence, the contract between the parties, overriding the provisions of such Standing Order, was not invalid. The court does not appear to have grasped or grappled with the import of this argument, and it seems to have contented itself by observing:

> It is true that the labour court may determine the terms and conditions of employment, which may be inconsistent with the Standing Orders. But in the present case, the reference did not give jurisdiction to the labour court, to determine the terms and conditions of the employment of Prem Singh. The reference directed the labour court to decide whether the discharge of Prem Singh from service, was legal or justifiable.[96]

This obviously is no answer to the argument, as there is neither law nor logic to sustain it. What is worse is that the court has not even set out the argument, adumbrated on behalf of the employer, in the judgment.[97] In order to sustain the validity of an order terminating the services of a probationer, before an industrial adjudicator, in terms of the contract, the employer has to specifically plead that his work during the probationary period was found to be unsatisfactory. For instance, in WIMCO, on behalf of the employer company, it was contended that even if the order of termination of the services of the probationer, was held to be invalid, in any event, the labour court should not have made an order of reinstatement of the probationer. But in view of the fact that no plea was taken by the employer company, before the labour court, or even in the special leave petition, that the work of the employee was unsatisfactory during the probationary period, nor did it lead any evidence in proof of his unsatisfactory work, the court discountenanced the contention. In Life Insurance Corporation, a two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court reviewed the law relating to probationers and held that the services of a probationer could not be equated with that of a permanent employee and no regular departmental inquiry was required before his services were terminated.[98]

In Dipti Prakash Banerji, another Bench of the Supreme Court observed that, where the order of termination disclosed a stigma, it could not be ignored, because it would have an effect on the future of the employee. In this case, it was observed that the termination order referred to three other letters issued earlier, one of which explicitly referred to an act of misconduct on the part of the employee and also referred to an inquiry committee's report, which found that the employee was guilty of misconduct. On these facts, the court observed, that the stigma need not be contained in the termination order itself, but could also be contained in an order or proceeding referred to in the termination order or in an annexure thereto and further observed that it would vitiate the termination order, and accordingly, set aside the order.[1] In VP Ahuja, the Supreme Court reversed the earlier view expressed in LIC and held that a probationer or a temporary servant would also be entitled to certain protection against an arbitrary termination or a punitive termination, without complying with the principles of natural justice. On this view of the matter, the court held that a termination order, founded on the ground that the 'probationer failed in the performance of his duties, administratively and technically' was ex facie, stigmatic; that such an order could not have been passed without holding a regular inquiry and giving an opportunity of hearing to the employee; and that the plea that the probationer had no right to the post, as his services could be terminated at any time during the period of probation, without notice, as set out in the appointment, was not acceptable.[2]

This particular decision of the Supreme Court deserves some critical analysis, in view of the fact that the perplexing range of arguments advanced by the court are capable of inducing grave misconceptions about 'probation' and the rights of a 'probationer'. 'Probation' means 'trial' and a probationer is an employee who has been provisionally employed to fill a permanent vacancy and whose probation, ie, fitness for the post, has not been confirmed or declared. The concept of 'fitness for the post' includes three main ingredients, viz, performance or productivity, discipline or conduct and attendance. Whether a particular probationer has measured up to the required standards, in terms of performance, discipline and attendance, is a matter which has to be judged by the employer, who has to put up with him for 35-38 years after confirmation, ie, until he attains the age of superannuation. Under no circumstances can this responsibility be delegated to a judge of any court or tribunal, whatever may be his intellectual credentials, for the simple reason that he is neither familiar with, nor has the occasion to closely monitor, the way a particular probationer is progressing and performing during the period, nor is he competent to superimpose his own private notions of good and bad, fairness and unfairness, upon an employer who has much higher stakes in the confirmation or termination of a probationer, than the judge himself. To hold that 'an order to the effect that the probationer failed in the performance of his duties is stigmatic', is a judicial pronouncement without a parallel. What stigma does an intimation of a 'failure in the performance of one's duties' presumably cast to such an extent, as to affect the future of the probationer? It is understandable that where a probationer was to be terminated for an act of misconduct, such termination would cast a stigma and adversely affect his employment prospects, and hence, he should be given an opportunity to explain and defend himself, before his services are dispensed with. But why should an opportunity be given in case a probationer is not able to measure up to the required job standards? What does the Supreme Court propose to achieve by directing the employer to go through with such a 'useless, bureaucratic formality'? Assuming that an opportunity has been given, would it help the probationer to unshackle himself from the so-called 'stigma'? As a matter of fact, what the Supreme Court proposed was in the nature of converting an otherwise invisible simple termination, into a prolonged inquiry commencing with a show cause notice, followed by a domestic inquiry and finally, by a termination order, all of which together, will give a wide publicity, thereby condemning the probationer forever and adversely affecting his employment prospects.

This defective decision was followed by a single judge of the Karnataka High Court, in Parimala, where the facts disclosed that the workman was appointed as a typist on probation, in a bank. While on probation, she was placed in judicial custody in connection with a complaint filed against her, in her earlier employment. She was charged with misconduct and disciplinary proceedings were initiated against her. Subsequently, her services were terminated on ground of unsatisfactory performance, and the disciplinary proceedings were dropped. Shetty J, held that the said termination was punitive in nature and cast a stigma on the petitioner.[3] This is a wholly misconceived decision on the part of Shetty J. What stigma could presumably have been cast on the probationer, in the face of the fact that the disciplinary proceedings were dropped by the employer, and the termination order did not contain even a whisper about her past record of discipline, except mentioning that her services were being terminated on ground of 'unsatisfactory performance'? If the termination of a probationer, for 'unsatisfactory performance' were to be prohibited on the flimsy ground of it casting a stigma, what other ground is available, which falls outside the range of the so-called 'doctrine of stigma' and which does not require an opportunity being given to the probationer before dispensing with his services? The law on probation was laid down clearly and firmly by a catena of decisions of the Supreme Court, during the 1960s itself, and there is no reason for the judges of the Supreme Court, to display their judicial heroics or dispense uncalled for charity, and produce judicial chaos in respect of a matter that had been settled conclusively. In JF Awardai, another single judge of the same High Court, held that the termination of a probationer-conductor, on the ground of unsuitability, was illegal, and directed the management to reinstate him.[4] In Bharat Fritz Werner, the same judge upheld a patently disturbing direction of the labour court, granting 'last drawn wages' as interim relief to a probationer, on the ground that the dispute relating to his termination was pending for over three years.[5] The granting of last drawn wages as interim relief, while the adjudication proceeding was still pending, amounted to granting the whole relief, which the labour court, or even the High Court cannot admittedly order, in the face of settled law on the subject. Is it possible that a High Court judge was operating from a position of abject ignorance of the rudimentary legal principles? It is all the more disquieting that this ruling comes from the learned judge, despite the specific plea raised by the counsel for the petitioner-employer, that the labour court had granted the whole relief in the guise of an interim relief, against all canons of law. Gururajan J was blissfully silent on this vital aspect and gave a decision, which reflects anything but law or justice. The decisions rendered in VP Ahuja, Parimala, JF Awardai and Bharat Fritz Werner are products of self-misdirection on the part of the learned judges, and cannot be supported on any principle known to law. These decisions need a review by a larger bench. In Pavanendra N Verma v SGPGIM Sciences , Ms Ruma Pal J posed the question: 'what language in a termination order would amount to a stigma', and answered it thus:

> Generally speaking, when a probationer's appointment is terminated, it means that the probationer is unfit for the job, whether by reason of misconduct or ineptitude, whatever the language used in the termination order may be. Although, strictly speaking, the stigma is implicit in the termination, a simple termination is not stigmatic. A termination order, which explicitly states what is implicit in every order of termination of a probationer's appointment, is also not stigmatic … In order to amount to a stigma, the order must be in a language which imputes something over and above a mere unsuitability for the job. [6]

The learned judge held that, in this view of the matter, the language used in the termination order, ie, the employee's 'work and conduct has not been found to be satisfactory', was almost exactly the same as that in Dipti Prakash Banerji, and thus, clearly fell within the class of non-stigmatic orders of termination, and thus, the impugned order was not ex facie, stigmatic. Though this decision is right, the attempt made by Ruma Pal J, to draw it parallel with Dipti Prakash Banerji, is not free from fallacy. For instance, an order of termination which runs in the terms 'your work and conduct has not been found to be satisfactory' falls as much within the class of the so-called 'stigmatic' orders, as held in VP Ahuja, as in the class of, non-stigmatic' orders, as held in Dipti Prakash Banerji, by two different benches of the same court and, still worse, within an interval of an year or so. In other words, Ruma Pal J, appears to have preferred Dipti Prakash Banerji, while rejecting, though succinctly and rightly so, the ratio of VP Ahuja. In ABT Parcel, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that in the case of an employee, who was appointed as a probationer for six months, which was extended by another six months, no hearing was necessary before terminating his probation, as there was no reference to any misconduct in the termination order and hence, no stigma could be said to be attached to such termination.[7]

In Davender Arora, another single judge of the Delhi High Court, took a similar view and held that the order terminating the service of a probationer, on the ground that his performance was not up to the expectation, was not ex facie stigmatic.[8] In CR Kuppalli, the Karnataka High Court held that the termination of a probationer, on the ground of unsuitability, was perfectly within the right of the corporation and there was no need to conduct an inquiry before terminating his services. The Bench further observed that courts should shy away from insisting on proof of the unsuitability of the workman to do a particular job, when the employer, having had the opportunity to weigh his performance individually and in comparison with others of the same ilk, had formed an opinion in that regard.[9] The above cases, ie, ABT Parcel, Devender Arora and CR Kuppalli, have been rightly decided, being consistent with the law relating to the termination of probationers. Even so, in the face of such a bewildering range and variety of rulings, touching upon the same issue, how the apex court expects the employers to mould their own processes and procedures while dealing with probationers is an altogether perplexing question. At a more basic level, the noisily for the Supreme Court to import notions of benevolence into employment relationships is equally baffling. For that matter, the law laid down in Raghavendra S Kulkarni expounded the correct law, free from half tones, wavering and wandering.

In Kusum Products, the facts were: a workman was appointed as a probationer for six months, which, according to the certified Standing Orders' could be extended by another 9 months, before being terminated. The probation of the workman was terminated at the end of one year from the date of appointment, on the ground that his performance was not satisfactory. The tribunal ordered a reinstatement, holding that in terms of the model Standing Orders, he was deemed to have been confirmed, as he had worked for 240 days. Allowing the writ petition, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court quashed the order of the tribunal and held that the workman was governed, not by the model Standing Orders, but by the terms of the appointment and the certified Standing Orders, which did not contemplate such a deemed confirmation; and that, in view of the fact that no order of confirmation was issued, it should be presumed that the period of probation stood extended. It is submitted that this case was rightly decided.[10] In a case where the termination of the service of a workman purporting to be discharged simpliciter is held to be improper or invalid, the workman will be entitled to reinstatement and backwages, with continuity of service.[11] In adjudicating these reliefs, the same principles will govern as in cases of wrongful punishment of dismissal, which aspect has been covered under s 11A.

(iv) Retrenchment:

Although, every termination of service of an industrial 'workman' may not be 'retrenchment', as defined in s 2(oo), every 'retrenchment', as is obvious from the language of the definition, is a termination of service of a 'workman', by the employer. For validly terminating the service of a 'workman', as a measure of retrenchment, therefore, the employer must comply with the requirements of s 25F, or s 25N and s 25G of the Act. The question, whether the termination of service of a particular workman amounts of 'retrenchment' or not, must be determined on the facts and circumstances of each case.[12]

(v) Discharge on Transfer of the Undertaking:

An establishment or undertaking may be transferred from one owner to another, either by the operation of law or by any agreement between the parties. A contract of service being incapable of transfer, the relationship of employment between a quondam employer and his employees in such establishment or undertaking, comes to an end upon the transfer of the establishment or undertaking. Section 25FF, therefore, provides compensation to the workman whose services are terminated upon such transfer of the establishment or undertaking. However, the transfer of service from the quondam employer to the new employer of the workman working in the establishment, may be effected by a tripartite agreement between the quondam employer, the workmen and the new employer, the effect of which would be to terminate the original contract of service by mutual contract and to make a new contract between the employees and the new employer.[13] The proviso to s 25FF, therefore, provides that where, by a tripartite agreement, the services of the employee of the establishment or undertaking, are transferred from one owner to another, on the conditions prescribed therein, the provisions of that section will not apply and the quondam employer will not be liable to pay compensation.

(vi) Discharge on Closure of the Undertaking:

The closure of the establishment or undertaking brings about the end of the contract of service between the employer and the employee, as it becomes impossible to perform the contract or nothing remains to be performed. The incidents of closure have been discussed under s 25FFF, which provides for the payment of compensation to the workmen, on the termination of their services as a result of closure.

(vii) Discharge or Dismissal as Punishment for Misconduct:

This topic has been discussed under s 11A post.

Terms of employment or the Conditions of Labour

The 'terms of employment' of any person refer to all the matters covered by the contract of employment, either express or implied.[14] In the language of Lord Denning MR:

> Terms and conditions of employment may include not only the contractual terms and conditions, but those terms also, which are understood and applied by the parties in practice, or habitually, or by common consent, without ever being incorporated in the contract.[15]

Basically, 'terms of employment' include such straightforward industrial issues as bonus, wage rates (in all forms, including dearness allowance and other allowances), hours of works, overtime, holidays with pay, sickness benefits, superannuation benefit, grading and promotion, dismissal and retrenchment procedures. But 'terms of employment' is a wide-ranging phrase, which also extends to aspects of labour relations that are less obvious than these. The juxtaposition of the expressions 'terms of employment' and 'conditions of labour', however, indicates the kinds of conflicts that could arise between those engaged in the industry, on opposite, but cooperating sides. The line of demarcation between the expressions 'terms of employment' and 'conditions of labour' is very thin in so far as there is a great deal of overlap between the two. While terms of employment include all the terms and conditions of service, such as probation, promotion, transfer, wage/salary, allowances, leave, holidays, bonus, termination of employment, etc., the expression 'conditions of labour' generally refers to the physical conditions of work, which include hours of work, spreadover, interval for rest, overtime, hazardous operations, safety, health, welfare, social security, non-monetary benefits and facilities, etc. In this section, however, both the sets have been discussed together. In Madras Gymkhana Club, it was held that these words take in disputes as to the share in which the receipts in a commercial venture shall be divided and generally cover hours of work and rest, recognition of representative bodies of workmen, payment for piece-work, wages ordinary and overtime, benefits, holidays, etc.[16] The word 'terms' pre-supposes the existence of a contract of employment. The expression 'terms of employment' has reference to the proposition of premises, in the contract of employment, which, when assented to or accepted, settle the contract between the parties. Where a contract of employment is in existence, all that can form the subject-matter of the contract are the terms of employment.[17]

The Assam and Nagaland High Court, in Borokai Tea Estate, took the view that the right of the workers to fish in the tank adjoining the manager's bungalow, to the exclusion of the manager, was a 'term of employment' and as such, formed the subject-matter of an 'industrial dispute'. The correctness of this holding is not free from doubt. The dispute was: 'whether the workers of the Borokai tea estate were justified in claiming that they had traditionally, enjoyed exclusive fishing rights in the tank adjoining the manager's bungalow and that the manager had no right to fish therein.' The labour court held that the particular right was an amenity, coming under the definition of 'wages' under s 2(rr). The award of the labour court was challenged before the High Court by a writ petition, on the ground that the dispute regarding the exclusive fishing right in the tank in question, centered around a civil right, which might be agitated in a civil court, but could not be taken to an industrial forum and the conclusion of the labour court, that the workers were justified in their claim, could not be arrived at in an industrial adjudication. But it does not appear to have been pointed out to the labour court, or to the High Court, that if the said amenity fell within the definition of 'wages' in s 2(rr), the labour court will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the same, as 'wages' is item No 1 in the Third Schedule of the Act which is a subject-matter under the jurisdiction of the tribunal, rather than that of the labour court. But the High Court, in the writ proceedings, observed, that the dispute would appropriately come under item 4 of the Second Schedule, as the management was resisting the claim of the workmen and asserting its right to the exclusion of the workers' right to fish in the tank. It was, therefore, held that the dispute in question was an 'industrial dispute'. In coming to this conclusion, the High Court appears to have overlooked the language of s 2(k).[18]

Before a dispute can be an 'industrial dispute', it must be connected with 'the terms of employment or the conditions of labour' of any person; it is only then that the question would arise as to under what item of the Second Schedule or the Third Schedule, such a dispute would fall. If a dispute is not connected with the 'terms of employment or conditions of labour' of the workmen, the mere fact that the claim falls under a particular item in the second or the Third Schedules, will not convert it into an 'industrial dispute'. In other words, the connection of the dispute with the 'terms of employment or conditions of labour' of the workers, is a condition precedent. If the dispute is so connected and it falls in any item in the second or the Third Schedule, then alone can it partake the character of an 'industrial dispute'. The mere fact that an item is enumerated in the Second or the Third Schedule, will not be sufficient to make it an industrial dispute.[19] The law does not work the other way around—that every item enumerated in the second and Third Schedule, whether connected or not, with the 'terms of employment or conditions of labour' of the workmen, will ipso facto, become an 'industrial dispute'. The High Court did not consider the question as to whether the right to fish in the pond was in any way connected with the 'terms of employment' or 'conditions of labour' of the workmen.

The meaning of the phrase 'conditions of labour', has never been litigated. The word 'conditions' is a word of a wide import and it means 'that which must exist as the occasion or concomitant of something else; that which is requisite in order that something else should take effect: an essential stipulation; terms specified. The word 'condition' includes the idea conveyed by the word 'term', but goes beyond it and is not confined to what is included in the latter. The expression 'conditions of labour' is, therefore, much wider in its scope as compared to the expression 'terms of employment' and it has reference to the amenities to be provided to the workmen and the conditions under which they will be required to work Clearly, 'conditions of labour', or to use the modern expression, 'conditions of employment' mean something different from the 'terms of employment'.[20] In an Irish case, viz, Brendan Dunnae, 'conditions of employment' were described obiter, as 'the physical conditions under which a workman works, such as those that appertain to matters of safety and physical comfort'. This interpretation appears to be comprehensive enough to include 'safety', 'health', and 'physical comfort' and to include all forms of welfare, like sports clubs, dramatic societies and colour schemes, as well as lockers, seats, showers and canteens, crèches, lighting, heating, air-conditioning, ventilation, overcrowding, rest periods, etc. 'Conditions of labour' would clearly include, too, an off-beat situation like that of dancing instructresses, who refused to obey their employer's order to drink a pint of milk a day, to offset the undue wear and tear due to their employment.[21] The phrase might as well include, the general psychological environment of work, as in the case of the psychological discomfort of the coloured musicians in Scala Ballroom, who might have been required to play in a hall from which coloured dancers had been barred by the management. In other words, the 'conditions of labour' of any person, may be said to refer to the safety, health or welfare of any employee, and probably, the psychological environment of the job too, at least where it is within the control of the management and relevant to the efficiency or enjoyment of the employee's work.[22] The combined effect of these two expressions, viz, 'terms of employment' and 'conditions of labour', is to bring a very large number of subject-matters of dispute between the employers and employers, between employers and their workmen and between workmen and workmen, within the perimeter of the definition of an 'industrial dispute'. Thus, the disputes and differences regarding bonus, wages, dearness allowance, various other allowances, gratuity, provident fund, residential accommodation, leave holidays, medical facilities, working hours, employment of seasonal labour, uniformity in conditions of service, hygienic and comfortable working conditions, various fringe benefits etc, have been brought within the scope of 'industrial dispute'. Some of these terms of employments or conditions of labour are discussed under the following heads:

Continuity of Service:

In NJ Chavan, Tendolkar J of Bombay High Court held that the right of an industrial workman to continue in his employment, has been jealously protected and safeguarded by industrial adjudication. It is one of the most vital and important terms or conditions of industrial employment. Even on the transfer of an undertaking, from one owner to another, its employees will continue to be entitled to all the rights and privileges acquired by them, by reason of their past service, if (a) there is a continuity of service, and (b) there is an identity of business. The learned judge observed:

> By continuity of service, it is not meant necessarily a legal continuity, but only a continuity in fact, ie, the employees must continue to serve the business, without a substantial break in their service. Thus, if the transferor gives notice of termination of service and the transferee makes a fresh appointment, this, by itself, although it may in law, amount to a break in continuity, will not affect the continuity of service for the purpose of determining the industrial relation. Nor does it constitute a break in service, if a short time > elapses between such termination of service by the transferor and the appointment by the transferee (which are legal forms resorted to by the employers, in an attempt to deprive the employees of the rights and privileges they have acquired by reason of past service), so long as the employees continue to serve the business even after the termination, and before re-employment. ... Regarding the identity of business, what is required is that the same business, which was carried on by the transferor, must be carried on by the transferee. It is not sufficient that the business is similar or of the same nature, if the business carried on by the transferee is a new one. ... Where the object of the lease was to enable the lessee to continue the same cinema business, which the lessor was carrying on, in the same premises, with the same machinery and equipment, with the same licenses and with the same business, the identity of the business was held to be the same and in the circumstances, the workmen were held to be entitled to a continuity of service, qua the lessee.[23]

A partnership business was taken over and continued by a private limited company. In the new company, three directors out of five were the old partners, ie, proprietor, his wife and the former manager. It was found that the business was continued in the same style, though under the name of a private limited company and the company was not a different entity in fact. The company, however, refused to continue the workmen employed by the partnership, in service. It was held that the company was not justified in refusing to continue the workmen in service.[24] In Shankar Textiles, the factory was initially taken on lease and was eventually purchased by the lessee. The facts disclosed that the workmen employed by the lessor were re-employed by the lessee, though at the time of the purchase, the factory was lying closed. The labour court believed the evidence of the workmen that they had worked in the factory without any break in service. The Supreme Court upheld the conclusion of the labour court, that the continuity of service of the workmen was not disturbed.[25] The business of the company, including its goodwill, trade rights, properties, assets and stock in trade, was taken over by a new company. The services of the workmen under the old company, were treated as having been terminated and their accounts with the old company, including the provident fund etc and the arrears of salaries, were finally settled. The new company entertained such workmen in service, without giving any express or implied undertaking regarding the continuity of their service. The workmen joined the provident fund scheme of the new company afresh. In the circumstances, it was held that the workmen were not entitled to claim a continuity of service.[26]

Permanency of Tenure:

An industrial workman is entitled to job security. Permanency of tenure, therefore, is an implicit condition of industrial employment, unless the employment has expressly been stated to be of a 'temporary', 'casual' or 'seasonal' nature. Where the employment is of a 'temporary' nature, it is normally in the desecration of the employer, as to who should be made permanent and who should not be.[27] In Jaswant Sugar Mills v Badri Prasad ,[28] reading the definitions of 'permanent workmen', 'seasonal workmen' and 'temporary workmen', in the Standing Orders, together, the Supreme Court observed that whilst a 'seasonal workman' is one who is engaged in a job which lasts during the particular season only, a temporary workman may be engaged either for work of a temporary or casual nature or temporarily, for work of a permanent nature; but a permanent workman is one who is engaged in work of a permanent nature only.

The distinction between a permanent workman engaged in a work of a permanent nature and a temporary workman, engaged in a work of a permanent nature is, in fact, that a temporary workman is engaged to fill in a temporary need of extra hands for permanent jobs. Thus, when a workman is engaged on a work of a permanent nature, which lasts throughout the year, it is expected that he would continue there permanently, unless he has been engaged to fill in a temporary need. In other words, a workman is entitled to expect permanency of his service. In a later case, ie, Sone Valley,[29] the court upheld the industrial award directing the employer to place half of the temporary workmen on a permanent basis, where such temporary workmen were employed on a work of a permanent nature, which went on forever. Likewise, in Hindustan Lever, on the facts of the case, the court affirmed the award of the labour court, directing the employer to make the temporary workman as permanent, with the relevant grade and dearness allowance.[30] But a temporary workman would not acquire permanency of tenure merely because he is employed in a permanent department or is given some benefit ordinarily enjoyed by permanent workmen.[31] Permanency of tenure can be claimed only by such employees, as have to work for all the working hours on all the working days, and it cannot be claimed by such workmen as are employed only for a part-time work. For instance, the musicians working in a gramophone company, who were required only when there was a recording of songs, were not held to be permanent workmen.[32] In Hindustan Aeronautics, the workmen sought some casual workmen employed in the canteen to be made permanent and the tribunal directed that from a particular date, they should be treated as probationers and appointed in permanent vacancies, without going into the question as to whether more permanent workmen were necessary to be appointed in the canteen, over and above the existing, permanent strength, to justify the making of the casual workmen, permanent, in the canteen where they were working. Neither was there any permanent vacancy in existence nor did the tribunal give any direction for the creation of new posts. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the tribunal was not justified in making these directions. The workmen could be made permanent only against permanent vacancies, not otherwise.[33]

Transfer

It is now well settled that transfer orders being a managerial prerogative, ought not to be, in the normal circumstances, interfered with by the tribunals or courts.[34] No employee can insist that he must continue at a particular place, except when the transfer is mala fide.[35] The right to transfer an employee from one department to another or from one part of the establishment to another or from one branch to another, is incidental to the managerial functions. It is an inherent power of the management of an organisation which has several branches and where there is no indication in the contract of employment that the employee would not be subject to transfer.[36] Transfer of an employee is an implied condition of the contract of industrial employment. Even if transferability from one place to another, in which employment has been secured, is not an express condition of the service, it can be read into the contract as an implied term, if having regard to the very nature of the employment, there is some compulsion to read it into a contract of service by implication. Not otherwise. One must be able to say: what is obvious need not be explicitly stated and may be taken to have been understood by both the sides.[37] Transfers are not to be made on the basis of the seniority of the employees or on the basis of some serial order, to be arranged according to the length of service at a particular place. It is a matter of adjustment and accommodation, to be made by the administrative authority concerned, and is solely within the powers of the executive and it is not to be normally, interfered with by the courts.[38] A transfer of an employee from one department to another or from one place to another is, therefore, in the discretion of the management, provided the terms and conditions of his service are not adversely affected.[39] But once the mode and manner of transfer is provided in the contract of employment, that would be binding on the employer as well as the employee. Any deviation from that will invalidate the transfer. In L Raghupathy, the transfer of the employee, in violation of the service rules formulated pursuant to the powers under the articles of association of the company, was held to be invalid. The fact that the workman had accepted the relieving order and had drawn the travelling allowance after the order of transfer, did not amount to acquiescence to the transfer. Speaking for the Madras High Court, Nainar Sundaram J said:

> Acquiescence denotes conduct, which is evidence of an intention of a party to abandon a right legitimately due to him. It may also denote a conduct from which the opposite party is justified in inferring such an intention. Acquiescence is only a form of estoppel, and it is of the essence of acquiescence that the party acquiescing should be aware of his rights; and by words or his conduct, should represent that he assents to what is a violation of his rights and that the person to whom such representation is made, should be ignorant of the other party's right, and should have been deluded by the representation into thinking that his wrongful action was assented to by the other party. The question of estoppel or acquiescence is essentially a question of fact, which is to be decided on proper materials placed before the court. Once the facts are established, acquiescence is a matter of legal inference by the court. It is fundamental that the plea of acquiescence should have been specifically expressed by the party, who wants to build a case on it, and there should be an issue on the point at the appropriate stage, so that the opposite party, who is asked to face the plea of acquiescence, could meet it effectively. Acquiescence cannot be a matter of bare presumption and assumption. It is a question of fact, which has got to be pleaded and further, has got to be proved. The burden of proof of the ingredients of acquiescence is on the party who relies on the same. If there was no plea of acquiescence and if there had been no opportunity for the opposite party to counter plead and place counter evidence on this question, it would not be proper for the court to permit the party, who wants to rely on the theory of acquiescence, to press forth the same, at any stage he likes.[40]

The employer is in the best position to judge how to distribute his employees between different jobs, departments or branches. He is entitled to decide on a consideration of the necessities or exigencies of his business, whether the transfer of an employee should be made from one particular job, department or branch to another. It is for the administration to take the proper decision and such decisions shall stand unless they are vitiated either by mala fides or by extraneous considerations, without any factual background or foundation. It is not possible for industrial tribunals or courts to have before them, all the materials which are relevant for this purpose and even if this can be made available, the tribunals and the courts should be very careful before they interfere with the orders of the employers, made in discharge of their managerial functions.[41] The question of such transfers depend on the internal arrangement of the management.[42] In SSKourav, the Supreme Court pointed out that courts or tribunals are not appellate forums to decide on administrative grounds and they are not expected to interdict the working of the administrative system, by transferring the officers to proper places.[43] It is not for the industrial tribunal to sit in appeal over the exigencies of business and find out whether they demanded the transfer or not. The issues relating to how best to secure efficiency of service and whether it would be desirable, in the interests of administrative convenience, to effect transfers - are all matters which the management alone can decide.[44]

The orders of transfer and posting are not usually to be examined by the industrial adjudicators or courts in judicial review, unless manifest injustice, gross illegality, absolute arbitrariness etc, are apparent in the proceedings. It is not the subjective assessment of the importance of the posting held by the employee that is determinative in such matters. The far more important consideration is the tangible benefit attached to each of the posts.[45] A transfer is an incident of service. The management has every right to transfer an employee from one place to another, under the same management, on the same pay scale, etc. The employer is the best judge to decide upon the utilisation and distribution of its manpower. Inconvenience to the transferred employee cannot be a ground for refusing to go on a transfer. The decision of the employer in such cases, is conclusive and, except in the rarest of rare cases, courts should not interfere with transfer orders.[46] In the context of employment under the state, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court, in JK Dave, pointed out that the courts would be the least appropriate authority to decide upon the question of transfer or non-transfer of employees. In matters of transfer, other employees are also likely to be affected and the stay of an order of transfer is likely to have a chain reaction. Therefore, the maximum possible restraint is called for, to avoid common damage to public administration, while attempting to redress certain supposed or blown-up hardships of an individual employee. Even if there is some difficulty or irregularity or a lapse in passing certain orders of transfer, it has to be ignored. Unless an order of transfer is ex facie, shown to be passed as a measure of penalty or by way of victimisation, the tribunal or the court should not interfere in their adjudicatory or reviewing powers. If a sufficient leeway is not granted to the employer in the matter of the transfer of employees, the administrative machinery may collapse or work of the same, may come to a grinding halt.[47]

Restrictions on the Right of the Employer to Transfer

It would, ordinarily, be proper for industrial adjudication to accept as correct, the submission of the employer that an impugned transfer has been made only because it was found unavoidable. Transfers being a part of the managerial function, it is ordinarily, for the management to determine the time and place of a transfer, having regard to the exigencies of business and where the workmen is transferred in a bona fide exercise of such function, such transfer is not open to challenge in industrial adjudication.[48] The right of the employer to transfer an employee from one place to another, may also be governed by a contract or settlement. Any transfer in violation of the terms of the contract or settlement, would be illegal. It is, however, equally well-settled, that the right of the management to transfer a workman in terms of contract, is not untrammeled, though this is one of the areas of industrial relations where there has been minimal judicial interference. However, the tribunals or the courts will be failing in their duty, if they do not interfere when the transfer orders are malicious or mala fide. In cases where a transfer is found to be tainted by ulterior motives or is otherwise arbitrary, it is open to judicial scrutiny, in proceedings based on a challenge to its validity or to the validity of the termination of service, based on a refusal to comply with such an order of transfer. Malice, in ordinary common parlance, means ill-will against a person, and in legal sense, a wrongful act done intentionally, without just cause or reason.[49] Industrial adjudication will be justified in scrutinizing the validity of a transfer, where there is reason to believe that the management resorted to the transfer as mala fide, by way of victimisation, unfair labour practice or for some other ulterior motive, not connected with the business interests of the employer.[50] Nothing can be more mala fide than a transfer order being made by the head of a department, at the behest of another authority, without applying his own mind to it at all. Such transfers cannot be sustained as they are arbitrary and vitiated by malice, in law.[51] An order of transfer made mala fide, or for some ulterior purpose, like for punishing an employee for his trade union activities, would be vitiated, because of a mala fide exercise of power.[52]

The charge of mala fides, whether by way of victimisation or otherwise, has necessarily to be examined by the tribunal for the purpose of finding out whether the transfer is properly made or not.[53]Prima facie, therefore, an order of transfer is valid, unless it is shown that it was mala fide or was a measure of victimisation or an unfair labour practice. A mere allegation of mala fide or discrimination, will not make it either discriminatory or mala fide. To make out a case for an interference in matters of transfer, there should be concrete materials, which should be unimpeachable in character.[54] The burden of proof lies on the workman to show that the order of transfer was mala fide or was a measure of victimisation or an unfair labour practice.[55] In the absence of a specific contract to the contrary, it is not incumbent upon the employer to consult the union before transferring an employee from one place to another. In Shankar Ambedkar, a settlement provided that the transfer of a workman was in the sole discretion of the employer, depending upon the exigencies of the work and it was further provided that 'in the event of any difficulty, the matter shall be sorted out in consultation with the association.' In this case, no such difficulty was expressed by the workman, at any stage. The Bombay High Court held that the transfer was not invalid.[56]

A finding of mala fide has to be reached by the industrial tribunal, only after sufficient reliable evidence is led in support of it. Such a finding should not be made light-heartedly, in a casual manner, on flimsy grounds or capriciously.[57] The deployment of labour after an assessment of the aptitudes of each of the employees, involves quite a large amount of managerial discretion. In the very nature of things, it is not possible to prescribe inflexible standards in this regard. If, therefore, an employer feels that a particular employee will be better suited as an executive on one particular job, than on the other, or his performance in the latter was not satisfactory, the consequent posting cannot be treated as punitive. Nor can such measure be treated as victimisation or mala fide. An order of transfer and posting from one post to another or from one place to another, can be said to be a 'reduction in rank' when the employee concerned loses emoluments, seniority, chances of promotion and other such discernible advantages attached to a post. In a case where a person is shifted from one post to another, in the same organisation and both posts carry the same emoluments, it would not be proper to assume that the transfer is punitive in character or tantamounts to a 'reduction in rank'. However, the scale of a salary attached to the post, may not be finally determinative of the question of whether the transfer was mala fide or not. A reduction in the status and a change in the duties attached to the post, may also be relevant.[58] The finding of victimisation or mala fides, based on no evidence, must be held to be perverse and vitiated in law.[59] But where the tribunal, on sufficient and reliable evidence being led before it, comes to the conclusion that the transfer was mala fide, an act of unfair labour practice or victimisation for some ulterior purpose, like punishing an employee for trade union activities, the conclusion would be inescapable, that the transfer was not made for the exigencies of the business. Where such mala fides are established, it would be reasonable to hold that if proper business interests of the employer had been considered, the transfer would not have been necessary and could have been avoided. In such a case, the order of transfer would be liable to be set aside.[60]

On the other hand, if the tribunal does not find that the transfer was made with any mala fide intention, the order of transfer cannot be assailed. The finding of mala fides, unfair labour practice or victimisation or otherwise, is a finding of fact and cannot be interfered with by the High Court in its jurisdiction under Arts. 226 and 227, or by the Supreme Court, under Art. 136 of the Constitution, unless of course, the finding is perverse or is in violation of the rules of natural justice.[61] The mere fact that the workman is an office-bearer of a trade union or a trade union activist, cannot lead to the inference of mala fides. If however, the transfer is made solely to prevent him from participating in trade union activities, the transfer will be liable to be interfered with, as being a case of victimisation and a mala fide exercise of power. But such trade union activities must be legitimate and in the interest of the trade union. Under the guise of trade union activities, an employee cannot black-mail or coerce the employer to act according to his dictates and threaten to do physical harm to the officers or co-employees and still claim special privileges regarding the transfer, because such activities are not legitimate trade union activities. The order of transfer in such situations, would not be reviewable, either by industrial adjudication or by the reviewing courts. Each order has to be judged on its own particular facts and circumstances, bearing in mind the general principles.[62]

Once the tribunal finds an order of transfer to be legal and valid, it will have no jurisdiction to issue any further direction regarding the payment of arrears of salary or release orders.[63] Even an order of transfer appearing to be innocuous, can be treated as an order of punishment, provided that the allegations or the conduct of the employee is the foundation for the transfer and not a mere motive. The allegations would be the foundation for the order, if the record of the case reveals that, before issuing the order of transfer, the employer came to the conclusion about the truth of the allegations against him and then issued the order of transfer. However, if the employer merely noted the allegations and did not want to go into the truth of the allegations and thought that it would be better if the officer is transferred, it cannot be said that the allegations were the foundation for the order of transfer. In such a case, the allegations were a mere motive for the transfer. In Kundan Sugar Mills, the Supreme Court said that an employer has no inherent right to transfer a workman from one place of business to another, if he starts a new business subsequent to the date of employment of the workman, unless it was an express or implied condition of service at the time of the employment.[64] In the field of industrial jurisprudence, the right to transfer a workman from one factory to another, cannot be treated as implicit in the contract of employment and 'there is, it will appear, no recognition given to such right as an abstract proposition, divorced from the facts and circumstances of each case'.[65]

In the absence of any statutory or contractual right, a transfer of the workmen en masse, without their consent, would be unjustified. Furthermore, there may be circumstances where industrial adjudication may be called upon to consider whether in the peculiar conspectus of events facing a particular fact-situation, the transfer is justified and warranted. In other words, the exercise of the prerogative of the employer to transfer his servants from one station to another, is not an inexorable rule. Where a lowly paid employee is sought to be transferred from one station to another, where the transfer would have disastrous consequences on his economic and family life, the transfer cannot be said to be a justifiable exercise of the right of the employer.[66] However, the mere fact that the workman would have difficulties in securing accommodation in a far off place or that he may have to look after his family and that the transfer would add to his plight or that he will not be able to make both ends meet, may not, in all cases, be a ground for holding that the order of transfer was actuated by mala fides, because every case of transfer involves a certain amount of dislocation and hardship.[67] Likewise, where a workman is asked to discharge duties which do not pertain to his employment, his dismissal for the disobedience of such order cannot be justified.[68] If an unjustified and unwarranted order of transfer results in a termination of the service of a workman, then industrial adjudication is not helpless and it can extend its arm of justice to meet a particular circumstance or situation.[69] However, if the conditions of service provide that the employee can be transferred, from one place to another or from one company to another, under the same management, such order of transfer cannot be questioned, unless it is mala fide.[70] For instance, in KSR Datta, the employee was transferred from the post of principal of a college to the department doing editing of sanskrit works. It was held that there was no loss of prestige and no humiliation in the transfer and on the other hand, it was a recognition of his merit. In this situation, the transfer was held to be valid.[71] The Calcutta High Court has laid down the following principles regarding transfer of workmen:

(a) A transfer of a workman from one department to another or from any job to another, cannot be made if his service conditions or terms of service contract expressly negate the right of such transfer or if the Standing Orders of the employer prohibit such transfer;

(b) a transfer must not operate to the prejudice or detriment of a workman, unless expressly authorised, in other words, the transfer must not occasion to a workman, economic loss in wages, bonus or other monetary benefits;

(c) a transfer must not be made by way of a punishment, that is to say there must not be a colourable exercise of a power of transfer of a workman, so as to victimise him;

(d) a transfer of an employee to an inferior position and the imposition of an unaccustomed and onerous duty, must not be allowed to be made, particularly, where there is an unexplained co-incidence in the employee's involvement in trade union activities; and

(e) it is never an implied condition of service of a workman, that the employer has the right to transfer him to a new concern, started by the employer subsequent to the date of the employment of the workman.[72]

Where a transfer of employees is found to be tainted, the tribunal has the jurisdiction to grant the interim relief of a stay of the transfer.[73] The employer cannot transfer an employee from one place to another, in the absence of a provision to that effect, either in the Standing Orders or in the contract of employment.[74]

Transfer to Another Employer

Though an employer has the right to make internal transfers of his employees, no workman or employee can, however, be transferred from one employer to another, because an employee has always the right to choose his employer and no one can be compelled to serve a master whom he does not like.[75] The general rule, in respect of the relationship of master and servant, is that a subsisting contract of service with one master, is a bar to service with another master, unless the contract otherwise provides or the master consents. A contract of employment involving a personal service, is incapable of transfer. A contract of service being thus incapable of transfer unilaterally, the transfer of service of an employee from one employer to another can only have effect by a tripartite agreement between the employer, the employee and the third party, the effect of which would be to terminate the original contract of service, by mutual consent, and to make a new contract between the employee and the third party. Therefore, so long as the contract of service is not terminated, a new contract cannot be made and the employee continues to be in the employment of the original employer, even if the employer orders the employee to do certain work for another person. The employee still continues to be in his employment. The only thing that happens in such cases is that the employee carries out the order of the master; hence, he has a right to claim his wages from the employer and not from the third party to whom his services are lent or hired from. It may be that such third party may pay his wages during the time he was hired for his services, but that is because of his agreement with his real employer. However, that does not have the effect of transferring the service of the employee, to the other employer. The hirer may exercise control and direction in the doing of the thing for which he has hired the employee, or even the manner in which it is to be done. But if the employee fails to carry out his direction, he cannot dismiss him and can only complain to the actual employer. The right of dismissal vests in the employer.[76]

Adjudication

In adjudicating a case of transfer, it is necessary for the tribunal to consider each case on its own merits. While doing so, it has to consider whether the employee had accepted the employment, knowing that his services are liable to be transferred or whether the agreement between the employer and the employee contained any specific terms regarding transfers, and if so, whether corresponding benefits are given to the employee. No doubt, the adjudicator has the jurisdiction to modify an agreement relating to transfers, but he cannot disregard or omit to take such an agreement into consideration, as a relevant factor in the process of reasoning, to come to his conclusion. The adjudicator, therefore, has to allow the parties to lead evidence on the question of transfer and then only, after considering all the relevant factors on the point, he has to decide that question and make an award accordingly, having stated his reasons.[77]

Hours of Work

A long standing traditional goal of trade unions has been to reduce the existing hours in the standard working day and working week, without loss of wages. Elaborate provisions regarding rest periods, spread over the total number of hours per week, over-time and the manner of intimation of these hours and holidays have been made by various statutes, such as the Factories Act, the Indian Mines Act, various Shops and Establishments Acts, etc. Normally, weekly hours under the existing labour enactments, do not exceed 48 hours. In practice, hours of work in establishments working three shifts daily, amount to 45 per week, as each shift is generally of eight hours' duration, including the half hour rest interval. The trade unions have been striving to seek and suggest a 40-hour week, a five-day week with eight hours a day. For commercial offices, still shorter hours are demanded. An interesting question, for the near future, is: whether there will be a strong demand for a shorter work week, without reduction in the weekly wage? The recent relatively high unemployment rates have stimulated interest in increasing employment by this device. There is nothing in these statutes which enjoins that these working hours could be changed only by mutual agreement. It is the function of the management of an establishment to adjust or vary their hours of work, within the limits prescribed by law.[78]

It is not the policy of the legislation to leave to mutual agreement, the determination of such vital matters as daily and weekly working hours and holidays and over-time, for in a factory or establishment, where labour is not so well-organised, it is possible to obtain agreements to adverse working conditions, due to pressures of economic necessity. This would be contrary to public policy. But within the prescribed limits, the management has the right to alter the period of work, provided it gives the necessary intimation of the change, as required by the Standing Orders and other provisions of law applicable to it.[79] In May & Baker, the working hours of the company were from 9 am to 5 pm, with three rest intervals-one hour for lunch, 15 minutes for the morning tea, and 15 minutes for the afternoon tea. The tribunal changed these hours to 9.30 am to 5 pm with one hour's interval for lunch. Theoretically, there did not appear any reduction in the working hours, but practically, there was one because the tribunal directed that instead of two intervals of 15 minutes each for tea, which was supplied by the company to its workmen, it should see that tea is supplied to the workmen at their tables. The Supreme Court, in appeal, noticed that the tribunal had, in fact, reduced the working hours by half an hour each day, as obviously the workmen will take their time for tea, because they cannot do both-work and take tea, at the same time. In the circumstances of the case, the reduction in the working hours was held to be unjustified.[80]

In BOAC, the company, which was an airlines concern, had, for the purpose of weekly hours of work, divided the employees into two categories, viz, (i) office staff, with 36 working hours a week; and (ii) operational staff, with a working week of 39-42 hours. Adjudicating upon the dispute relating to wages for overtime, in view of the special nature of the work at the airport, the tribunal directed that the company was entitled to fix 48 hours per week, as normal duty 'hours and the payment for overtime work should be made to the workmen on the basis of work done beyond the normal duty hours of 48 hours in a week. In appeal, in view of the peculiar incidents of the airline industry, the problem of regulating the hours of work, which are quite different from those obtaining in any other establishment, the Supreme Court held that the direction of the tribunal, taking 48 hours as the basis for payment for overtime work to the office staff, was not justified and modified it to the effect that the office staff should be paid overtime work at the rates calculated on the basis of 36 hours a week. But the direction of the tribunal with respect to the operational staff, whose work was directly connected with the arrival and departure of the aircraft of the company, was held to be reasonable.[81]

In Karamchand Thapar, the direction of the tribunal, that the subordinate staff should attend office half an hour before the normal time, to be regulated by a system of rotation, subject to over-time wages being paid at the rate fixed by the award, was affirmed by the Supreme Court holding that for a proper working of the office, it was necessary that sweepers and peons should start their work sometime before the other employees come and should stay on for sometime after the other employees depart, as having regard to the duties of the peons and sweepers, it was not practical to observe the same hours for them as for the other employees.[82] In Remington Rand, the working hours of the employees of Trivandrum and Ernakulam, as prevalent, were from 9 am to 1 pm and from 2 pm to 5.30 pm on week days and from 9 am to 1 pm on Saturdays. At Madras, the company's workers worked only for five days in a week, from 9 am to 1 pm and from 1.45 pm to 5.30 pm. The total working hours at Madras were, therefore, somewhat less than those at Trivandrum and Ernakulam. The company had, by a circular, fixed the working hours from 9.30 am for clerks and 9 am for mechanics and peons. But, in fact, the circular was not given effect to and the company was extracting half an hour's work per day extra. The direction of the tribunal to the company, to give effect to the circular and to have the clerical staff work from 9.30 am to 1 pm and from 2 pm to 5.30 pm on working days and from 9.30 am to 1 pm on Saturday, was affirmed by the Supreme Court.[83]

In ONGC, the facts were: ONGC had a central workshop at Baroda. When the workshop was under construction and there was insufficient accommodation at the site of the workshop, the office and administrative staff used to work in a shed, at a distance of about two kilometers from the workshop. The working hours of the administrative staff, at that time, were from 10 am to 5 pm, with an interval of half an hour. These working hours lasted from December 1964 to June 1965, when, on the completion of the construction at the site of the workshop, the administrative staff shifted there. Consequently, the working hours of the administrative staff were fixed from 8 am to 5 pm, with an interval of an hour. The workmen claimed that the working hours of the administrative staff should continue to be six-and-a-half hours per day and complained that the fixation of eight hours per day, with effect from June 1965, was violative of s 9A of the Industrial Disputes Act. It was further claimed that the fixation of eight hours per day, was not justified from the point of view of convenience and was also at variance with the practice uniformly prevailing in other administrative offices of the workshops of the ONGC. Though the tribunal took the view that s 9A was inapplicable, on the second contention, it held that the change in the hours of work was not justified from the point of view of convenience and the hours should not have been changed from 6½ hours, including the half an hour's rest interval, to nine hours, including the rest interval of one hour. But, in appeal, the Supreme Court held that the tribunal was not justified in interfering with the employers' decision in fixing the hours of work as the view of the tribunal, that reduction in the hours of work from 8 to 6½ hours, would not adversely affect the work of the office, was not only not supported by any evidence on record, but was contrary to it.[84]

Work Load

Work load is a matter which relates to the 'terms of employment' or 'conditions of labour' of the workmen. Disputes quite often arise out of the adjustment of work-loads. A detailed consideration of this subject would be out of place here, as it involves industrial and economic problems, rather than legal questions. The legal questions with respect to work-loads arise when the interpretation of some statutory provision is involved or the principles laid in some cases have to be applied. In Remington Rand (supra), in connection with the dispute relating to work-loads, the employees alleged that the method of calculation of work-load was arbitrary and the work-load fixed by agreement between the company and its employees in Delhi and Lucknow, was seven mechanics per day or 150 mechanics per month, while the work-load at Trivandrum was ten mechanics per day. The case of the management was that ten mechanics per day was not too much. The award of the tribunal on the basis of the negotiations between the parties, directing the company to reduce the work-load to seven mechanics per day or 150 mechanics per month, with a rider that 'all the mechanics attended to, whether new or old, whether under the service contract, or not, will be counted for the sake of work-load', was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Shifts

In Pfizer, the Standing Orders enabled the employer to introduce more shifts than one. The Supreme Court found that the evidence on record clearly showed that the pattern of work in similar concerns in the area (Bombay, Poona and Baroda), not confining only to the area in Greater Bombay, where the factory was situated, justified the introduction of a third shift. Besides, the expert evidence adduced on behalf of the company also showed that the manufacture of a particular drug involved a continuous process and the company was incurring loss and was not in a position to cope with the demand for their products in the absence of the third shift. The evidence further showed that the quality and quantity of the particular drug had suffered for want of the third shift. In view of this evidence, it was held that the company had made a clear case for the introduction of three shifts. The plea of social disutility of night work was also rejected as being a theoretical controversy in the context of the emergency in the country. Gajendragadkar J, observed:

> In dealing with industrial adjudication, it would be undesirable to reach conclusions purely on doctrinaire or theoretical consideration ... such a theoretical or doctrinaire approach has, in the context of today, lost some of its validity.

Referring to the question of the additional work-load being imposed on the employees by additional shifts, the court observed that it may constitute a change in the conditions of service. It would, therefore, be open to the industrial tribunal to examine the reasonableness of the change proposed to be made. Both the extreme contentions of the employer and of the employees, ie, on the one hand, that the employer's right under the Standing Orders to adopt more than one shift made it a matter of entire and absolute discretion of the management and on the other hand, that the introduction of three shifts would make a departure from the pattern prevailing in a particular industry, hence, the change could not be permitted, were rejected. The learned judge held:

> After all, the question must be considered in the light of the relevant facts adduced before the court, and in doing so, the importance and the necessity of more production must be borne in mind.[85]

Promotion

Right to Promotion:

In England, the claim for promotion has been held to be connected with the terms of employment of the employee.[86] But in India, the judicial opinion is that promotion, in the course of industrial employment, is the prerogative of the management.[87] In Brooke Bond, a Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court held that it is a matter of discretion of the management, to select persons for promotion. In the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> It may be recognised that there may be occasions when a tribunal may have to interfere with a promotion made by the management, where it is felt that persons superseded have been so superseded on account of mala fides or victimisation.[88]

But in Hindustan Lever, a three-judge Bench of the court, pointed out that the expression 'terms of employment and conditions of labour', used in s 2(k), would ordinarily include not only the contractual terms and conditions, but also those terms which are understood and applied by the parties in practice or habitually or by common consent, without ever being incorporated in the contract. Accordingly, the court suggested that it was time to reconsider this archaic view of the laissez faire days, that promotion is a management function, because the whole gamut of labour legislation is 'to check, control and circumscribe any uncontrolled managerial exercise of power, with a view to eschew the inherent arbitrariness in the exercise of such functions.[89] Whether a particular employee should be promoted from one grade to the higher grade, depends not only on the length of his service, but also on his efficiency and other qualifications for the post, to which he seeks to be promoted. And in the matter of promotion, the intimate knowledge of the higher authority, empowered to promote, has a greater value. If a higher post is created in any department and a new man is to be appointed to it, even the senior most workman working in such department, has got no right to claim promotion to it. Seniority only plays a small part in the matter of promotion.[90] In the absence of any mala fides, unfair labour practice or victimisation, the discretion of the management cannot be questioned.[91] Therefore, without recording a finding of mala fide, victimisation or unfair labour practice, the adjudicator cannot arrogate to himself, the promotional function of the management.[92] On the other hand, the workers also want that the claim of the employees who are eligible for promotion, should be duly considered. If at a given time, more than one person is eligible for promotion, seniority should be taken into account and should prevail, unless the eligible persons are not equal in merit.[93] Even though promotion or up-gradation is a managerial function, it must not be on the subjective satisfaction of the management, but must be on some objective criteria. If there is no scope for any promotion or upgradation or increase in salary, in a private undertaking, it may be conceivable to think that promotion is not a condition of service. But if, under the Standing Orders, rules or conventions prevailing in an undertaking, there are grades and scopes of upgradation or promotion and there are different scales of pay for different grades and, in fact, promotion is given or upgradation is made, there should be no arbitrary or unjustified and unreasonable upgradation or promotion of persons, superseding the claims of persons who may be equally or even more suitable.[94] There should be no arbitrary or unjust and unreasonable upgrading of some persons, superseding the claims of persons who may be equally or even more suitable. The expression 'victimisation' must be given its normal meaning, of someone being the victim of an unfair and arbitrary action.[95]

Automatic Promotion

A promotion generally necessitates a consideration of the comparative suitabilities of the eligible workmen and such a selective process would require a consideration not only of the best performance of those eligible, but necessitates the making of a comparative estimate of their skill, which could be of a technical nature, their personality, their capacity to discharge heavier responsibilities and similar other factors. Promotion to higher grades, in a large majority of cases, results not only in better wage-scales for the promoted workmen, but usually, if not invariably, necessitates a process of selection from out of those eligible, because the higher post would carry a greater responsibility and would call for keener capabilities. The labour court and industrial tribunals are hardly fit or equipped technically or otherwise, to take upon themselves, the task of making such selections. The entrepreneur, on the other hand, is best equipped to discharge this function. If the choice of the management is not mala fide and no element of victimisation has entered into it, there would be no scope in such cases, for any interference, merely because those not selected are dissatisfied and discontented. If those not suited to discharge the function of the higher posts, are promoted by industrial adjudicators, who do not possess the requisite background, qualifying them to undertake the task of making the selections, industrial progress is bound to be jeopardised, to the detriment of the national economy. In cases of this type, the management has no discretion and there is no element of choice involved. Promotions in such cases cannot be characterised as a managerial function.[96]

The decision of the Supreme Court in River Navigation, illustrates the adjudication of a dispute relating to automatic promotion. The industrial tribunal revised the B grade as Rs 90-6-138-7-194 (16 years) and recast the A grade as Rs 110-8-174-10-244 (15 years). It then directed that clerks reaching the maximum of grade B, would automatically be promoted to grade A. In an appeal against the award of the tribunal, the employer contended before the Supreme Court, that the A grade consisted of head-clerks, a class doing comparatively more work than the class in the B grade, and that an automatic promotion from B grade to A grade would be destructive of the efficient working of the department. But the court observed that a perusal of the revised scales showed that a person takes 16 years to reach the maximum of the B grade. Hence, a clerk who has worked in the C grade and after a number of years of service therein, passed to the B grade, after 16 years of service therein, could hope to pass into the A grade and after 15 were years therein, he could be promoted to the two special grades. If, therefore, service in the A grade was of a similar nature as that of the B grade, the principle of promotion by selection might work hardships for many experienced workers. The court further observed that the tribunal, presumably on that basis, accepted the principle of automatic promotion from the B grade to the A grade. Further, from the award, it was clear that only senior clerks were to be placed in the A grade and their work would consist mainly of assisting the junior members, with their advice and instructions. In view of this position of the personnel in the A grade, the court held that the tribunal was right in applying the principle of automatic promotion, instead of the principle of promotion by selection. However, it was pointed out that 'which principle will be applicable to a particular situation, depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[97] In other words, it is a matter of discretion to be exercised by an industrial adjudicator, whether to apply the principle of automatic promotion or that of promotion by selection, on the basis of the facts of a particular case. In Hindustan LM Sabha, a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court has precisely stated the law, in this connection, in the following words:

> Promotions are normally granted on the basis of performance. Automatic promotion would, therefore, undermine the very raison d'etre of promotions. There will be hardly any incentive left to put in good performance, if the promotions are taken for granted, whatever the nature of the performance. Instead, what was in the circumstances necessary, was a monetary compensation in the nature of increments, which the learned judge has rightly granted ... It is, therefore, both in the interest of the welfare of the workmen, as well as in the larger interest of the company, that some additional incentive, in the form of a stagnation increment, is granted to the workmen.[98]

In Hindustan Lever, the Supreme Court held that the demand of the workman, for his confirmation in the promoted post, after the lapse of certain time, would be a dispute connected with the terms of employment of the workman. It would not be a dispute relating to promotion.[99]

Adjudication of Promotions

Therefore, the question, whether a person has been superseded or not, or whether he is entitled to the promotion or not, would constitute an 'industrial dispute', as the 'difference' or 'dispute', on this question, would be comprehended in the words 'employment or non-employment'. Hence, it would be within the jurisdiction of the adjudicator to consider the respective merits of the workmen promoted by the employer.[1] However, the promotion, primarily, being a management function, cannot normally be interfered with by industrial adjudication but if it is shown that the management was actuated by malicious considerations in promoting one employee in preference to another or in failing to promote an eligible person, it would amount to an unfair labour practice. Thus, the industrial adjudication can interfere with this exclusive function of the employer only if the promotion given to one and withheld from another, is mala fide or an act of unfair labour practice or victimisation.[2] In the absence of a clear proof of mala fides or discrimination on extraneous grounds, on the part of the employer, it would be wholly inappropriate for any outside authority to attempt to weigh the relevant merits of the individual who might be holding higher posts and those who are aspiring for the same. It would be laying down a dangerous principle, if an outside authority were to substitute the internal authority, in matters of promotion. Any such attempt on the part of the outside authority, is likely to foster a spirit of distrust, among the employees, in the capacity and authority of the employer to administer fairly and effectively the affairs of his establishment and to maintain discipline. In the absence of a finding of mala fide or victimisation of a workman, for trade union activities, or an unfair labour practice, the industrial tribunals, therefore, cannot arrogate to themselves, the promotional function of the management.[3] Therefore, when mala fide, unfair labour practice or victimisation is alleged by the workmen, the adjudicator will have to inquire into the allegation.[4] If he finds that the promotions in question, have been made so that they are unjustified on anyone of the above-mentioned grounds, the proper course for him is to set aside the promotions and ask the employer to consider the cases of the superseded employees and decide for himself, whom to promote, after considering the records of all the employees worth consideration, except of course, the person whose promotion has been set aside. In other words, where the tribunal finds that some workers are being superseded on account of mala fides or victimisation, it may have to cancel the promotions made by the employer.[5] But even after a finding of mala fides or victimisation, it is not the function of a tribunal to consider the merits of the various employees itself and then to decide whom to promote.[6] An award interfering with the promotion of a workman, without giving notice to him, would be invalid inasmuch as it would be violative of the rules of natural Justice.[7]

In case, as a result of the award of the tribunal, the promotion of one person affects the status of another person, that other person must be impleaded as a party to the proceedings and should be given an opportunity of being heard before an award, adverse to him, is made.[8] It is established law that a pendency of disciplinary proceedings against a workman, does not create a bar to his being considered for promotion. In such a situation, the proceedings for promotion in connection with the delinquent workman, are to be kept in a sealed cover, to be opened after the disciplinary proceedings are over and the recommendations of the promoting authority are to be worked out, depending upon the outcome of the disciplinary proceedings. Once an employee is promoted with effect from a retrospective date, on being completely exonerated, he cannot be deprived of the pay and the other benefits, to which he would have been entitled, had he, in fact, been promoted to the said post on the date from which, retrospectively, he had been subsequently promoted. Any condition imposed to the effect, that the employee would not be entitled to the pay and allowances arising from the promotion, would be illegal and unsustainable.[9] Where a workman, having been promoted to a higher grade post and placed on probation, is not confirmed in the promotion position, on the ground of unsatisfactory performance, no inquiry will be required for refusing the confirmation in the promotion post.[10]

The payment of backwages or arrears of salary of the employee, in a case of retrospective promotion, where the case of the employee has been considered after the completion of a disciplinary proceeding, is at the discretion of the disciplinary authority, depending upon the ultimate result of the disciplinary proceeding. If the employee has been completely exonerated and there is no blemish whatsoever, and he is not visited with any penalty, even that of censure, he has to be given the benefit of the salary, from the date on which he would have been normally promoted, but for the disciplinary proceedings. In other cases, where the promotion is given with retrospective effect, after the conclusion of a departmental inquiry, but where there are other factors, such as dragging of the proceedings by the delinquent, exoneration because of technical defects or non-proving of charges due to peculiar circumstances, the question of whether backwages are to be paid, has to be determined by the competent authority, in the light of the facts and circumstances of the case. The grant of backwages is not intrinsically inherent in a retrospective promotion. However, when no punishment is visited and there is no other factor concomitant, the employee is entitled to full backwages. Where a promotion is denied illegally and later on a notional promotion is given, with retrospective effect, without financial benefits, it would be arbitrary, because 'no one can be penalised for no fault of his and the employer cannot take advantage of an illegal action, on his part. However, the claim of a workman of being considered for the next higher post, from the date his junior was considered for the promotion, was held to be not tenable, as the latter had become junior to him in 1985. But the plea of the workman that his case for the promotion should be considered if promotees of 1985, or thereafter, had been considered for the promotion, was accepted by the court. In such a case, the workman should also have been considered from the date his juniors were considered. In Mcleod & Co, the facts disclosed that the company was having a practice of re-employing senior, retired clerks, at reduced salaries. Adjudicating the dispute raised by workmen against the practice, on the ground that such re-employment hampered the prospects of junior employees, the tribunal directed the employer to stop re-employment of retired clerks, in the categories of clerks above 'C' grade. This award was affirmed by the Supreme Court, in appeal.[11]

Burden of Proof

In case workmen allege mala fides, unfair labour practice or victimisation, they have to prove the allegations by adducing satisfactory evidence, before the tribunal. It would not be sufficient barely to make these allegations or aver that the relations between the employer and the employees have been strained on account of the employees being the members of a trade union. The evidence led by the parties on the question of mala fides, etc, has to be considered by the tribunal before recording its conclusions. If the tribunal records its findings without considering the relevant evidence or its conclusions are based on extraneous or irrelevant considerations or on no evidence, such conclusions will be perverse and the resulting award will be liable to be quashed.[12]

---

2 Guest Keen Williams Ltd v PJ Sterling (1959) 2 LLJ 405 [LNIND 1959 SC 127], 415 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1279 [LNIND 1959 SC 127]: [1960] 1 SCR 348 [LNIND 1959 SC 127], per Gajendragadkar J.

3 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 131 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 948 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], per Subba Rao CJI.

4 AG Kher v Atlas Copco (India) Ltd (1992) 1 LLJ 423, 428 (Bom), per S Manohar J.

5 Gokulananda Tripathy v Mgmt of Sundardas D Hans Raj (1975) 1 LLJ 133, 135 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

6 Assam Oil Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 587 [LNIND 1960 SC 108], 590 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

7 Re African Assn Ltd and Alien (1910) 1 KB 396.

8 Sri Assaram Raibhah Dhage v Executive Engineer (1990) 1 LLJ 48 -49 (Bom) (DB), per Lentin J.

9 Municipal Corpn of Gr Bombay v PS Malvenkar (1978) 2 LLJ 168 [LNIND 1978 SC 157], 172 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1380 [LNIND 1978 SC 157]: (1978) 3 SCC 78 [LNIND 1978 SC 157], per Jaswant Singh J.

10 Divl Supdt, Southern Rly v Sasidharan 1978 Lab IC 1042, 1044 (Ker) (DB), per Gopalan Nambiyar CJ.

11 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], 149-50 (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464]: (1980) 2 SCC 593 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], per Krishna Iyer J.

12 State of Bihar v Gopi Kishore Prasad AIR 1960 SC 689 [LNIND 1959 SC 209], 692, per Sinha CJI.

13 Maharashtra SRTC v Madhukar Narayanarao (1969) 2 LLJ 619, 629 (Bom) (DB), per Abyankar J.

14 Naihati Electric Supply Co v State of West Bengal (1974) 2 LLJ 179, 183 (Cal), per Debiprasad Pal J.

15 Sehkari Upbhokta Wholesale Bhandar Ltd v Pannalal Bordia (1988) 2 LLJ 123, 126 (Raj), per Lodha J.

16 RB Diwan Badri Das v IT (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], 371 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

17 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], 154 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

18 Hindustan Steel Ltd v AK Roy (1970) 1 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1969 SC 497], 232 (SC), per Shelat J.

19 Siddhanath K Kadam v DD & Co Pvt Ltd 1977 Lab IC 602, 604 (Bom) (DB), per Deshmpande J.

20 RB Diwan Badri Das v IT (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], 370 (SC), per Gajendrajadkar J.

21 UB Dull & Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 374 [LNIND 1962 SC 33], 376 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

22 Assam Oil Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 587 [LNIND 1960 SC 108], 591 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

23 Bombay Labour Union v Intnl Franchises Pvt Ltd (1966) 1 LL J 417, 419 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

24 Barsi Light Rly Co Ltd v KN Joglekar (1957) 1 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1956 SC 104], 247 (SC), per SK Das J.

25 West Bengal SEB v Shri Desh Bendhu Ghosh (1985) 1 LLJ 373 [LNIND 1985 SC 64], 375, per Chinnappa Reddy J.

26 Binny Ltd v PO, LC (1986) 1 LLJ 237 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

27 Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC (1956) AC 696, per Radcliffe.

28 Anand Bihari v Rajasthan SRTC 1991 Lab IC 494 (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 1003 : (1991) 1 SCC 731, per Sawant J.

29 Divisional Controller MSRTC v PC Kamble (2002) 3 LLN 193 (Bom), per Kochar J.

30 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Workmen (1951) 2 LLJ 314 (LAT).

31 Assam Oil Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 587 [LNIND 1960 SC 108], 590 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1264 [LNIND 1960 SC 108], per Gajendragadkar J.

32 UB Dutt & Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 374 [LNIND 1962 SC 33] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 411 [LNIND 1962 SC 33], per Wanchoo J.

33 Gujarat MDC v PH Brahmbhat (1974) 1 LLJ 97 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], 102-03 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 136 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

34 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], 150-51 (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464]: (1980) 2 SCC 593 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], per Krishna Iyer J.

35 Ravindra Kumar Misra v UP State Handloom Corpn Ltd 1988 Lab IC 56, 61 (SC), per Ranganath Misra J.

36 Assam Oil Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 587 [LNIND 1960 SC 108] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

37 Chartered Bank v CB Employees Union (1960) 2 LLJ 222 [LNIND 1960 SC 106], 226 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

38 Siddhanath K Kadam v Dadajee Dhackjee and Co Pvt Ltd 1977 Lab IC 602, 604 (Bom) (DB), per Deshpande J.

39 UB Dutt & Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 374 [LNIND 1962 SC 33] (SC) : AIR 163 SC 411 : 1962 Supp (2) SCR 822, per Wanchoo J.

40 Jabalpur Electric Supply Co Ltd v SP Srivastava (1962) 2 LLJ 216 [LNIND 1962 SC 246] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1288 [LNIND 1962 SC 246], per Das Gupta J.

41 Murugan Mills Ltd v IT (1965) 1 LLJ 422 [LNIND 1964 SC 320] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1051 [LNIND 1965 SC 433], per Wanchoo J.

42 Utkal Machinery Ltd v Shanti Patnaik (1966) 1 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1965 SC 277], 400 (SC), per Ramaswami J.

43 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1966) 2 LLJ 602 [LNIND 1965 JNK 9] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1672 [LNIND 1963 SC 46], per Gajendragadkar J.

44 Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd v Alladin (1969) 2 LLJ 540 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], 548 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 512 [LNIND 1969 SC 261]: (1969) 2 SCC 598 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], per Shelat J.

45 Jagdish Prasad v Sachiv Zila Ganna Committee 1986 Lab IC 1377 (SC), per BC Ray J.

46 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Chandranath Choudhary (1969) 2 LLJ 387 [LNIND 1968 SC 255] (SC), per Shelat J.

47 Tata Engg & Loco Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 806-08 (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 372 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], per Shelat J.

48 Gujarat MDC v PH Brahmbhatt (1974) 1 LLJ 97 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], 102-03 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 136 [LNIND 1973 SC 318]: (1974) 3 SCC 601 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

49 Municipal Corpn of Gtr Bombay v PS Malvenkar (1978) 2 LLJ 168 [LNIND 1978 SC 157] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1380 [LNIND 1978 SC 157]: (1978) 3 SCC 78 [LNIND 1978 SC 157], per Jaswant Singh J.

50 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v Gujarat Steel Tubes Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464]: (1980) 2 SCC 593 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], per Krishna Iyer J.

51 MK Ravi v MD, Kerala State Bamboo Corpn 1987 Lab IC 355, 357 (Ker), per Menon J.

52 Ruby General Insurance Co Ltd v PP Chopra (1970) 1 LLJ 63 [LNIND 1969 SC 333] (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 653 [LNIND 1969 SC 334], per Shelat J.

53 Hindustan Steel Ltd v AK Roy (1970) 1 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1969 SC 497], 232 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1401 [LNIND 1969 SC 497]: (1969) 3 SCC 513 [LNIND 1969 SC 497], per Shelat J.

54 Bihar SRTC v State of Bihar (1970) 2 LLJ 138 [LNIND 1970 SC 53] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1217 [LNIND 1970 SC 53]: (1970) 1 SCC 490 [LNIND 1970 SC 53], per Shelat J.

55 Workmen of Sudder Office Cinnamara v Mgmt of Sudder Officer (1971) 2 LLJ 620 [LNIND 1971 SC 493] (SC) : (1972) 4 SCC 746 [LNIND 1971 SC 493], per Vaidialingam J.

56 Workmen of Motipur Sugar Factory v Motipur Sugar Factory (1965) 2 LLJ 162 [LNIND 1965 SC 109] (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 1803 [LNIND 1965 SC 109]: (1965) 3 SCR 588 [LNIND 1965 SC 109], per Wanchoo J.

57 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114]-808 (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 372 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], per Shelat J.

58 V Sadasivan v Binny Ltd (1998) 1 LLN 235 (Mad) (DB), per Raju J.

59 (1960) 1 LLJ 587 [LNIND 1960 SC 108] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

60 (1978) 2 LLJ 168 [LNIND 1978 SC 157] (SC), per Jaswam Singh J.

61 (1980) 2 LLJ 137 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

62 State of Bihar v Gopi Kishore Prasad AIR 1960 SC 689 [LNIND 1959 SC 209], per Sinha CJI.

63 Chandra Prakash v State of Uttar Pradesh (2001) 1 LLN 50 (SC).

64 Dainik 'Navbharat' v AP Gupta (1999) 3 LLN 255 (MP), per Kulshreshtha J.

65 Air India Corpn v VA Rebellow (1972) 1 LLJ 501 [LNIND 1972 SC 128] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1343 [LNIND 1972 SC 128]: (1972) 1 SCC 814 [LNIND 1972 SC 128], per Dua J.

66 Binny Ltd v Workmen 1973 Lab IC 1119 (SC), per Grover J.

67 L Michael v Johnson Pumps Ltd (1975) 1 LLJ 262 [LNIND 1975 SC 55], 266 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 661 [LNIND 1975 SC 55]: (1975) 1 SCC 574 [LNIND 1975 SC 55], per Krishna Iyer J.

68 Siddhanath K Kadam v Dadajee Dhackjee & Co Pvt Ltd 1977 Lab IC 602, 605-6 (Bom) (DB), per Deshpande J.

69 Mgmt of the Arya Vaidya Pharmacy (Coimbatore) Ltd v Secretary, Arya Vaidya Pharmacy Employees' Union 1982 Lab IC 261 -62 (Ker), per Bhaskaran J.

70 Rable v Green (1985) 2 QB 315.

71 Assam Chah Karamachari Sangha v PO, LC 1981 Lab IC 1026, 1031 (Gau), per Hansaria J.

72 Chandulal v Mgmt of Pan American World Airways Inc (1985) 2 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1985 SC 138]-82 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 1128 [LNIND 1985 SC 138]: (1985) 2 SCC 727 [LNIND 1985 SC 138], per Ranganath Misra J.

73 Kamal K Lakshman v Mgmt of Pan American World Airways Inc (1987) 1 LLJ 107 [LNIND 1986 SC 491], 109 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 229 [LNIND 1986 SC 491]: (1987) 1 SCC 146 [LNIND 1986 SC 491], per Ranganath Misra J.

74 Amarjeet Singh v Punjab National Bank (1986) 2 LLJ 354, 371-72 (Del) (DB) : (1987) 54 FLR 261, per HL Anand J.

75 D Seeralan v Mgmt of Facit Asia Ltd 1991 Lab IC 362, 366 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundram J.

76 Jagatpal Dhuria v Madhav Corpn (2001) 3 LLN 165 (Bom), per Dr Chandrachud J.

77 Unit Trust of India v T Bijaya Kumar (1993) 1 LLJ 240 [LNIND 1992 SC 508], 242 (SC) : (1992) 3 SCALE 100.

78 Governing Council of KMIO v Dr Pandurang Gadwalkar (1993) 1 LLJ 308 [LNIND 1992 SC 765], 310 (SC), per NP Singh J.

79 Express Newspapers Ltd v LC (1964) 1 LLJ 9 [LNIND 1963 SC 303], 11 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

80 Stanley Mendex v Giovanola Binny Ltd (1968) 2 LLJ 470, 472 (Ker), per Balakrishna Eradi J.

81 State of Punjab v Dharam Singh AlR 1968 SC 1210, 1212, per Bachawat J.

82 Giovanola Binny Ltd v IT (1970) 1 LLJ 450, 452 (Ker), per Balakrishna Eradi J.

83 Utkal Machinery Ltd v Santi Patnaik (1966) 1 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1965 SC 277] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1051 [LNIND 1965 SC 433], per Ramaswami J.

84 Mgmt of Brooke Bond India Pvt Ltd v YK Gautam (1973) 2 LLJ 454 [LNIND 1973 SC 244] (457) (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 2634 [LNIND 1973 SC 244]: (1974) 3 SCC 451 [LNIND 1973 SC 244], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

85 Gujarat MDC v PH Brahmbhatt (1974) 1 LLJ 97 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], 102-03 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 136 [LNIND 1973 SC 318]: (1974) 3 SCC 601 [LNIND 1973 SC 318], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

86 Sunilkumar SP Sinha v Indian Oil Corpn Ltd 1983 Lab IC 1139 [LNIND 1982 GUJ 114], 1145, per Nanavati J.

87 Shamsher Singh v State of Punjab (1974) 2 LLJ 465 [LNIND 1974 SC 246], 479 (SC), per Ray CJI.

88 Prakash Mishra v Sports Authority of India (1990) 2 LLJ 416, 423 (MP) (DB) : 1989 MPJR 34, per TN Singh J.

89 K Veerasha v Executive Officer, Feroke Panchayat (1964) 1 LLJ 573 (Ker) (DB), per Madhavan Nair J.

90 Ravindra Kumar Misra v UP State Handloom Corpn Ltd 1988 Lab IC 56, 62 (SC), per Ranganath Misra J.

91 State of Gujarat v Sharadchandra Manohar Neve (1988) 2 LLJ 97 -98 (SC), per Ranganath Misra J.

92 V Durairaj v Neyvelli Lignite Corpn Ltd (1964) 2 LLJ 158, 159 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

93 Workmen of Indian Oil Corpn Ltd v Mgmt 1982 Lab IC 155, 157 (Pat) (DB), per LM Sharma J.

94 Behar Journals Ltd v Ali Hasan (1959) 2 LLJ 536 (Pat) (DB), per Choudhary J.

95 Agra Electric Suply Co. Ltd. v Sri Alladdin (1969) 2 LLJ 540 [LNIND 1969 SC 261] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 512 [LNIND 1969 SC 261]: (1969) 2 SCC 598 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], per Shelat J.

96 Western India Match Co Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 403 [LNIND 1973 SC 241], 407, per Dwivedi J.

97 This comment is based on the author's personal knowledge, as he was present in the court throughout the hearing of this appeal and he was not holding any brief for either side.

98 Life Insurance Corporation of India v Raghavendra S Kulkarni (1998) 1 LLN 56 (SC) : AIR 1998 SC 327 : (1997) 8 SCC 461 : (1998) 2 LLJ 1161.

1 Dipti Prakash Banerji v SNBNC for Basic Sciences (1999) 2 LLN 44 (SC) : AIR 199 SC 983 : (1999) 3 SCC 60 [LNIND 1999 SC 131] : (1999) 1 LLJ 1054 [LNIND 1999 SC 131].

2 VP Ahuja v State of Punjab (2000) 2 LLN 47 (SC) : AIR 2000 SC 1080 [LNIND 2000 SC 2073]: (2000) 3 SCC 239 [LNIND 2000 SC 2073] : (2000) 1 LLJ 1099 [LNIND 2000 SC 430].

3 Parimala v Banking Service Rectt Board (2001) 4 LLN 589 (Kant), per Shetty J.

4 North-West Karnataka RTC v JF Awardai (2002) 2 LLN 207 (Kant), per Gururajan J.

5 Bharat Fritz Werner Ltd v CG Patil (2002) 2 LLN 209 (Kant), per Gururajan J.

6 Pavanendra N Verma v SGPGIM Sciences (2002) 1 LLN 45, 51 (para 28) (SC) : (2002) 1 SCC 520 [LNIND 2001 SC 2509], per Ruma Pal J.

7 ABT Parcel Service v PO, I Addl LC (2002) 3 LLN 580 (Mad), per Rajan J.

8 Davender Arora v Mgmt of Albert and David Ltd (2002) 3 LLN 660 (Del), per Sarin J.

9 Divisional Controller, Karnatka SRTC v CR Kuppalli (2002) 4 LLN 820 (Kant) (DB), per Srinivasa Reddy J.

10 Kusum Products v State of West Bengal (2002) 4 LLN 131 (Cal), per Kundu J.

11 Navinchandra S Shah v Ahemdabad Coop Deptt Stores (1979) 1 LLJ 60 [LNIND 1977 GUJ 35] (Guj) (DB), per DA Desai J.

12 Hindustan Steel Ltd v State of Orissa (1977) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1976 SC 330], 3-4 (SC) : (1976) 4 SCC 222 [LNIND 1976 SC 330], per Gupta J.

13 Pyarchand KP Bidi Factory v Onkar Laxman Thenge AIR 1970 SC 823 [LNIND 1968 SC 299], 827, per Shelat J.

14 Bredan Dunne Ltd v Fitzpatrick 1958 IR 29, 37.

15 British Broadcasting Corpn v Hearn (1978) 1 All ER 116, 118 (CA).

16 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

17 Ram Nath Koeri v Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills (1956) 2 LLJ 11, 18 (All) (DB), per Mootham CJ.

18 Mgmt of Borokai Tea Estate v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 1217 (Ass & Nag) (DB), per Goswami CJ.

19 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], 276-77 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

20 Ram Nath Koeri v Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills (1956) 2 LLJ 11, 18 (All) (DB), per Mootham CJ.

21 Brendan Dunnae Ltd v Fitzpatriek (1958) IR 29, 37.

22 Scala Ballroom (Wolver Hampton) Ltd v Ratcliffe (1958) 1 WLR 1057.

23 NJ Chavan v PD Sawarkar (1958) 1 LLJ 36, 40 (Bom) (DB), per Tendolkar J.

24 Kays Construction Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

25 Shankar Textile Mills v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 68 [LNIND 1962 SC 344] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

26 Ispahani Ltd, Calcutta v Ispahani Employees Union (1959) 2 LLJ (SC), per Wanchoo J.

27 Hindustan Lever v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC), per Dwivedi J.

28 (1961) 1 LLJ 649 [LNIND 1960 SC 343]-51 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

29 Sone Valley Portland Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 218 [LNIND 1962 SC 31], 229 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

30 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 17 [LNIND 1973 SC 307]: (1974) 3 SCC 510 [LNIND 1973 SC 307], per Dwivedi J.

31 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Brijnandan Pandey (1956) 2 LLJ 444 [LNIND 1956 SC 77] (SC), per SK Das J.

32 Gramophone Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 131 [LNIND 1964 SC 114] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

33 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v The Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 336 [LNIND 1975 SC 249] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1737 [LNIND 1975 SC 573]: (1975) 4 SCC 679 [LNIND 1975 SC 573], per Untwalia J.

34 Nikhil Chandra Dey v Steel Authority of India Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 419 -20 (Cal), per UC Banerjee J.

35 State Bank of India Staff Registered Congress v Union of India 1992 Lab IC 1062 [LNIND 1991 PNH 235], 1067 (P&H), per Mongia J.

36 A Bouzourou v Ottaman Bank AIR 1930 PC 118, per Thankerton J.

37 Automotive Manufactures Ltd v Nanalal P Vakharia 1977 Lab IC 1188 [LNIND 1976 GUJ 27] (Guj) (DB), per Thakkar CJ.

38 JK Dave v State of Gujarat (1990) 1 LLJ 95 -96 (Guj), per Ravani J.

39 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC), per Dwivedi J.

40 L Raghupathy v Addl CWC (1991) 1 LLJ 364 [LNIND 1990 MAD 34], 367 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1995 SC 1056 [LNIND 1995 SC 122]: (1995) 3 SCC 270 [LNIND 1995 SC 122] : (1995) 2 LLJ 849 [LNIND 1995 SC 122], per Nainar Sundaram J.

41 Syndicate Bank Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 440 [LNIND 1965 SC 298] (SC), per Ramaswami J.

42 Bareilly Electricity Supply Co Ltd v Sirajuddin (1960) 1 LLJ 556 [LNIND 1960 SC 83]-57 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

43 State of Madhya Pradesh v SS Kourav 1995 Lab IC 1574 (SC).

44 Carvan Goods Carriers Pvt Ltd v LC (1977) 2 LLJ 199, 210 (Mad), per Mohan J.

45 PN Bahulayan v Plantation Corpn of Kerala 1986 Lab IC 1707, 1710 (Ker), per Sivaraman Nair J.

46 Damodar Prasad v Rajasthan SRTC (2001) 4 LLN 440 (Raj) (DB), per Dr Lakshmanan CJ.

47 JK Dave v State of Gujarat (1990) 1 LLJ 95, 96 (Guj), per Ravani J.

48 National Buildings Construction Corpn Ltd v MK Jain 1981 Lab IC 62, 67 (Del), per Anand J.

49 Nikhil Chandra Dey v Steel Authority of India (1988) 2 LLJ 419 -20 (Cal).

50 Canara Banking Corpn Ltd v U Vittal (1963) 2 LLJ 354 [LNIND 1963 SC 125] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

51 Om Parkash Sharma v State of Rajasthan (1992) 1 LLJ 422 -23 (Raj), per NC Sharma J.

52 Syndicate Bank Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 440 [LNIND 1965 SC 298] (SC), per Ramaswami J.

53 Canara Banking Corpn Ltd v U Sridhar Rao CA No of 1962, decided on 22 April 1963 (unreported).

54 JK Dave v State of Gujarat (1990) 1 LLJ 95, 97 (Guj), per Ravani J.

55 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC), per Dwivedi J.

56 Shankar S Ambedkar v Shakti Insulated Wires Pvt Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 416 (Bom) (DB), per Vaze J.

57 Syndicate Bank Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 440 [LNIND 1965 SC 298] (SC), per Ramaswami J.

58 PN Bhulayan v Plantation Corpn of Kerala 1966 Lab IC 1707, 1709-10 (Ker), per Sivaraman Nair J.

59 Madhuband Colliery v Workmen (1966) 1 LL J738, 741 (SC), per Ramaswami J.

60 Canara Banking Corpn Ltd v U Sridhar Rao CA No 756 of 1962 (22-4-1963).

61 National Radio Corpn v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 282 [LNIND 1963 SC 1], 285 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

62 VSN Raju v Non-Conventional EDC Ltd (1990) 1 LLJ 163, 166 (AP), per Jagannadha Rao J.

63 Union of India v HN Kirtania (1989) 2 LLJ 585 [LNIND 1989 SC 337] (SC).

64 Kundan Sugar Mills v Ziya Uddin (1960) 1 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1960 SC 31] (SC), per Subba Rao J.

65 Obeetee Pvt Ltd, Mirzapur v State of UP 1986 Lab IC 829, 832-33 (All), per BD Agarwal J.

66 Automotive Manufactures Ltd v Nandlal P Vakharia 1977 Lab IC 1188 [LNIND 1976 GUJ 27] (Guj) (DB), per Thakkar J.

67 Caravan Goods Carriers Pvt Ltd v LC (1977) 2 LLJ 199, 201 (Mad), per Mohan J.

68 Boots Pure Drug Co (I) Ltd v KC Bastian (1977) 2 LLJ 113, 115 (Ker) (DB), per Govindan Nair CJ.

69 Mgmt of Central Fisheries Ltd v LC 1975 Lab IC 634 -35 (Mad) (DB), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

70 Madhuband Colliery Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 738 [LNIND 1965 SC 303] (SC), per Ramaswami J.

71 Dr KSR Datta v TTD 1989 Lab IC 648 (AP), per MN Rao J.

72 New India Flour Mills v Sixth Industrial Tribunal (1963) 1 LLJ 745, 750 (Cal), per Banerjee J.

73 First Flight Couriers Ltd v KCCGE Union (2001) 4 LLN 1221 (Kant), per Chinnappa J.

74 BDK Process Controls (P) Ltd v BM Sangha (2002) 1 LLN 288 (Kant), per Chandrasekharaiah J

75 New India Flour Mills v Sixth IT (1963) 1 LLJ 745, 750 (Cal), per Banerjee J.

76 Pyarchand Kesarimal Porwal Bidi Factory v Onkar L Thenge AIR 1970 SC 823 [LNIND 1968 SC 299], 825, per Shelat J.

77 Transport Corpn of India Ltd v State of Maharashtra 1993 Lab IC 507, 510 (Bom), per M Cazi J.

78 Workmen of Hindustan Shipyard Pvt Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 526, 531 (AP), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

79 Section 9A. Infra.

80 May & Baker (India) Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], 96 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 678 [LNIND 1961 SC 18]: (1961) 2 FLR 594, per Wanchoo J.

81 Workmen of BOAC v British Overseas Airways Corpn (1962) 1 LLJ 257 [LNIND 1962 SC 51] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Karamchand Thapar & Bros Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 178] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

83 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 866 [LNIND 1967 SC 226] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 224 [LNIND 1967 SC 425]: [1968] 1 SCR 168, per Mitter J.

84 Oil & Natural Gas Commission v The Workmen (1973) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1972 SC 470] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 968 [LNIND 1972 SC 470]: (1973) 3 SCC 535 [LNIND 1972 SC 470] : 1973 IC 233, per Dua J.

85 Pfizer Pvt Ltd, Bombay v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 543 [LNIND 1962 SC 400], 551-52 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1103 [LNIND 1962 SC 400]: [1963] Supp (2) SCR 627, per Gajendragadkar J.

86 R v ID Tribunal, exp QM College, University of London (1957) 2 All ER 776, per Lord Delvin.

87 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC), per Dwivedi J.

88 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1962 SC 251] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

89 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Mgmt of Hindustan Lever Ltd 1984 Lab IC 1573, 1577 (SC) : (1984) 4 SCC 392 [LNIND 1984 SC 235] : [1985] 1 SCR 641 [LNIND 1984 SC 235], per Desai J.

90 All India RB Employees' Assn v RBI (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 196 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

91 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 402 [LNIND 1965 SC 287] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

92 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC), per Dwivedi J.

93 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1962 SC 251]-57 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

94 Workmen of Williamson Magor & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1982) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1981 SC 452], 38 (SC), per Baharul Islam J.

95 Ajudhiya SMM Sabha v Ajudhiya Sugar Mills 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 47 (All), per TS Misra J.

96 Anand S Misra v Indian Turpentine & Rosin Co 1977 Lab IC 584, 587 (All) (DB), per Yashoda Nandan J.

97 River Navigation Co Ltd v Workmen CA No 691 &692 (1967) (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

98 Hindustan LM Sabha v Hindustan Lever Ltd 1990 Lab IC 950, 978 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

99 Workmen employed by Hindustan Lever Ltd v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 1573, 1575 (SC), per Desai J.

1 Upper Doab Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1962) 1 LLJ 1 (All), per Jagdish Sahai J.

2 Brooke Bond (India) Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1962 SC 251]-57 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

3 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1973 SC 307] (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 17 [LNIND 1973 SC 307]: (1974) 3 SCC 510 [LNIND 1973 SC 307], per Dwivedi J.

4 LH Sugar Factories & Oil Mills Pvt Ltd v State of UP (1961) 1 LLJ 686 (All), per SS Dhavan J.

5 Workmen of Williamson Magor & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1982) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1981 SC 452], 38 (SC), per Baharul Islam J.

6 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 402 [LNIND 1965 SC 287] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

7 Shyam Lalli Bir Singh 1973 Lab IC 957, 959 (Del), per Dalip Kapur J.

8 Jamwant Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh 1987 Lab IC 663, 659 (All), per VK Mehrotra J.

9 Amarendra Kumar Das v Orissa Forest Development Corpn Ltd 1996 Lab IC 1503, 1505-8 (Ori) (DB), per Dipak Misra J.

10 Secretary, ESU of South India v PO, LC (2001) 1 LLN 497 (Mad), per Dinakaran J.

11 Mcleod & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 386 [LNIND 1963 SC 272], 388 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 1449 [LNIND 1963 SC 272]: [1964] 5 SCR 568 [LNIND 1963 SC 272], per Gajendragadkar J.

12 Brooke Bond (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 402 [LNIND 1965 SC 287] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Increments

A periodical increment in wages, being a normal incident of industrial employment, is a term of employment. Terms or conditions relating to increments may be implied or expressed in the contract of employment, or provided for in the rules of service or the Standing Orders of the establishment, or they may be provided for in a 'settlement' or an industrial award. A dispute relating to an increment in wages, will fall within the ambit of item No 1 in the Third Schedule to the Act. Where the dispute relating to the introduction of a scheme of increments is referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication, the tribunal has to apply the same principles as it would apply for a construction or revision of wages. In other words, the principles of the financial capacity of the employer and the region-cum-industry basis, will have to be borne in mind while awarding any incremental scales in the wages. Increments in wages cannot, therefore, be awarded unless the financial capacity of the employer is properly ascertained and before the result of the impact of such increments in the future, is judged.[13] But once it is found that the employer has the necessary financial capacity to sustain the burden of increments, the award of an annual increment is held to be a normal rule. The scales of increments fixed by the employer, by a settlement or by an award, cannot be stopped, unless it is proved that the employer is incapable of bearing the financial burden of such increments.[14] The increments, however, are subject to the efficiency bar in the incremental scales.[15]

The employer has the right to withhold the increments of a workman as a measure of punishment or for proved inefficiency or any act of misconduct.[16] But such punishment can be inflicted on a compliance with the procedural rules of natural justice and in a bona fide exercise of the disciplinary power of the employer. However, the increment that can be stopped, can only be the one which has fallen due since the workman has been found guilty, in a proper departmental inquiry. The increment which had already accrued to the workman, before his being found guilty, cannot be withheld retrospectively.[17] A stoppage of increments, in contravention of s 33(1) of the Act, shall also be illegal.[18] Generally, annual increments in the wages of piece-rated workers, are not provided, as these workers are paid by the work which they do, though rates fixed for such payment might legitimately be increased in proper cases. In Praga Industries, in view of the peculiar circumstances of the case, the award of the labour court, granting four per cent interim increase in the wage-rates of the piece rated workers, with the annual increments at the same rate, till the wage rate reached a particular level, was held justified with the modification that the future annual increments at four per cent should not be granted to the piece-rated workers, until all the concerned workmen were classified and their scales introduced.[19]

Fringe Benefits

Traditionally, the obligation of an employer to the workmen, was considered complete with the payment of the basic wage-viz-the wage for each unit of time spent on the job or each unit of work completed. With increasing industrialisation, rising prices, rising incomes and other historical vicissitudes, the interests of the workmen in compensation have considerably widened, so as to include more than the basic wage payment, and consequently, the employer's liability to provide supplemental items of compensation, has increased. Such supplemental items of compensation have generally come to be known as 'fringe benefits'. It is a term embracing a variety of employees' benefits, paid by the employers and supplementing the workers' basic wage or salary'. There is no universally accepted group of practices embraced by the term 'fringe benefits'. Broadly speaking, a 'fringe benefit' has to meet a twofold test, viz, it must provide a specific benefit to an employee and it must represent a cost to the employer.[20] Various types of allowances, benefits and amenities are comprehended in the concept of 'fringe benefits'. Some such benefits are directly financed by the employer, while some are paid to the workmen, indirectly. The benefit of group insurance falls in the former category, while certain types of allowances fall in the latter. In India, there are various types of 'fringe benefits', given by various employers or industries, in various regions and it is impossible to deal with them all. Some typical types of such benefits are being discussed as illustrative cases, under the following heads:

Leave and Holidays

There is a fundamental distinction between leave and holidays. Holidays are off-days, granted by the employer to the workmen, either voluntarily or compulsorily, under the force of law. On a holiday, the entire business is closed and no one works, while leave facilities deal with leave for individual workers, while the business as a whole is running. In other words, on leave, a workman is entitled to absent himself from duty only with the leave of his employer, for such period of time as the employer may allow or as the rules and conditions of the employment may permit.[21] Holidays are always with pay, while leave may be with or without pay. Section 52 of the Factories Act 1948 requires that every week, workmen should have at least one day as a holiday, either on Sunday or on any other day. Therefore, salary paid to a workman by week or month, includes the salary paid by way of holiday pay, in respect of Sundays and other declared holidays.[22]Further, from item 4 in Sch 3 to the Act, it is clear that holidays stand on a different footing altogether from leave with wages.[23] Thus, 'leave facilities' would neither include 'holidays', nor would 'holidays' be incidental to a dispute regarding leave. Hence, a reference with respect to 'leave facilities', cannot be construed to mean or include 'holidays'.

Leave

Leave with wages, with reduced wages and without wages in certain contingencies, is one of the terms of employment or conditions of labour of the industrial workmen, which occasionally gives rise to industrial disputes. The development of paid leave practices, consisting largely of paid leave and paid holidays, reflects what might be called 'a quest for leisure'.[24] Various enactments have made provisions for leave with wages, for the commercial as well as industrial workmen. For instance, s 79 of the Factories Act, makes provisions for an annual leave with wages. The earned leave provided for in s 79 of the Factories Act, or in other analogous provisions, is the minimum statutory leave to which employees are entitled. The employer or industrial adjudication may provide for additional earned leave to the workmen.

The ultimate object of industrial adjudication is to help the growth and progress of the national economy and it is with that ultimate object in view, that industrial disputes are settled by industrial adjudication, on principles of fair-play and justice. On the basis of these principles, industrial adjudication has made reasonable provisions for leave in respect of workmen, who may not strictly fall within the purview of the Factories Act or the Shops and Commercial Establishment Acts or any other analogous Act.[25] In the words of Das Gupta J, emphasis in the country should be more on increased production, the absence from work should not be unduly encouraged.[26] In Alembic Chemical Works, the industrial tribunal fixed the quantum of privilege and sick leave for the clerical staff of a manufacturing concern, on a scale more liberal than the one in force for the operators of the same concern and also made directions regarding the accumulation of such leave. The quantum of leave so fixed by the award, was larger than the quantum of leave prescribed by the provisions of s 79 of the Factories Act. In appeal, Gajendragadkar J held that the practice prevailing in the comparable concerns and the trend of industrial awards, both seemed to show that a distinction is generally made between two categories of employees, viz, the clerical staff and the operators. Since such distinction was perfectly justifiable, no question of discrimination could arise. It was further observed that in appropriate cases, the tribunal can fix the quantum of leave on a scale more liberal than the one provided by s 79 of the Factories Act. These are matters primarily for the industrial tribunal to consider and decide, as it is more familiar with the trends prevailing in comparable concerns and in deciding what would be a reasonable provision for the privilege leave or sick leave. The tribunal has to take into account all the relevant factors and unless it is shown that the leave rules fixed by an award cannot be sustained on the above considerations or on any reasonable grounds, or they make a violent departure from the prevailing practice or trend, the award cannot be interfered with. The learned judge further observed that, in matters of leave, either in the form of a privilege leave or a sick leave, tribunals should not ignore the consideration that unduly generous or liberal leave provisions would affect production and obviously, the production of essential commodities is in the interests not only of the employers and the employees, but also of the general community.[27]

In Rai Bahadur Dewan Badri Das, the workmen in the press section of the tribune, other than the line-operators, were not entitled to any leave, but were only entitled to claim 30 days wages, plus dearness allowance, if they worked for 11 months. Later, the employer modified the leave rule under which the workmen in service on 1 July 1956, were given the benefit of a 30 days' leave and the workmen joining the service after that date, were given leave in accordance with the provisions of s 79 of the Factories Act 1948. The workmen of the press section, therefore, demanded leave facilities, irrespective of the date of their joining the service. The tribunal directed that all the workmen in the press section should be given the same quantum of leave, viz, 30 days leave with wages, irrespective of the question as to whether they took up employment after 1 July 1956 or before that date. In view of the fact that the different provisions with respect to leave in the same concern, when other terms and conditions of service were the same, in respect of both the categories of employees, would lead to dissatisfaction and frustration amongst the new employees, the Supreme Court held that it was not right that there should be such discrimination and affirmed the award.[28]

In Mohammed & Sons, the tribunal provided for a ten days' paid casual leave per year, while there was none previously. The Supreme Court affirmed the award, because, the increased burden on the employer by the institution of the ten days' paid casual leave, along with eight festival holidays, resulted in the increase of wages to the extent of 20 per cent, hence, this factor was taken into consideration in fixing the wage-structure for the employees.[29] In Indian Oxygen, the tribunal directed that the union representatives should be allowed special leave to attend law courts for matters connected with the workers and the management, to attend to annual conventions of their federation, to attend executive committee meetings of the union federation, and conventions of the central organisation, ie, the INTUC. According to the tribunal, such facilities to conduct the administration of the union, would be in the interest of a proper growth of the trade union movement and the promotion of harmony in industrial relations, as there would be a lesser possibility of outside elements establishing their hold on their union. In appeal, the Supreme Court noticed that the company had been allowing union representatives to attend conciliation and adjudication proceedings with full pay and observed that this was fair. On facts, the court held that it the leave granted by the company with full pay was fair and even liberal. The court held that the tribunal had not taken into account the adverse effect on production, if further absenteeism was allowed. It was, therefore, held that the tribunal was not justified in directing the company to grant the special leave demanded by the union. Shelat J said:

> Industrial adjudication ... cannot and should not ignore the claims of social justice, a concept based on socio-economic equality and which endeavors to resolve the conflicting claims of the employers and the employees, by finding not a one-sided, but a fair and just solution. A demand for special leave has, however, nothing to do with any disparities or inequalities, social or economic. On the other hand, too much of absenteeism harms both the employers and the employees, inasmuch as it saps industrial economy.[30]

In UP Electric Supply, the court set aside the award of the industrial tribunal, directing the employer company to pay wages for 30 days for the earned leave not enjoyed by the workmen before the closure of its undertaking, as no such compensation was statutorily payable. So long as the company was carrying on the business, it was obliged to give the facility of the earned leave to its workmen. However, after the closure of its business, the company could obviously, not give any earned leave to those workmen, nor could the workmen claim any compensation for not availing themselves of the leave. In the absence of any provision in the statute, governing the right to compensation for earned leave not availed of by the workmen before a closure or transfer of an undertaking, no compensation was payable.[31]

In Otis Elevators, the workmen of the Delhi establishment of the company, claimed that all its employees should be entitled to a 30 days' paid privilege leave for every completed year of service, with a right to accumulate the same up to 90 days and further claimed that the leave should be given in at least, three instalments, if desired by the employees and may be prefixed or suffixed to Sundays and holidays. The tribunal dealt with the claims of the staff and of the hourly rated employees, under two different heads. So far as the staff employed in the company was concerned, the tribunal, upon reference to the provisions of the Delhi Shops and Establishment Act and other material on record, directed that the privilege leave allowable to the staff working in the Delhi office will be the same as that obtaining in Bombay, to its office staff. Regarding the hourly rated workmen at Delhi, the tribunal took into account the practice obtaining at the Bombay office of the company, regarding such workmen and applied the same to the hourly rated workmen at Delhi, on the ground that it was reasonable. These directions were impugned by the workmen in Delhi, in appeal before the Supreme Court, on the ground that they made a distinction in the quantum of leave granted to the two sets of workmen employed in the same establishment, namely, one method of leave applied to the staff and another, to the hourly rated workmen, which was contrary to the uniform practice that had been adopted by the company itself, at Delhi, to all its employees, as was clear from the evidence on record. But, in the circumstances of the case, the court observed that if the practice now in force in the Bombay office, is applied, the quantum of the annual leave to the daily-rated workmen in the Delhi office, will have to be worked out on a basis slightly different from the one adopted by the tribunal. Consequently, the court modified the directions of the tribunal, with respect to the hourly rated workmen in Delhi, entitling them to an annual leave with wages, in a calendar year, in the same manner as was available to the hourly rated workmen in the field, in the Bombay office, in accordance with the prevailing settlement.[32]

Region-cum-Industry basis for Fixing Leave and Holidays

It is well-known that both legislation and industrial adjudication, seek to attain similarity or uniformity in the terms of service in the same industry, existing in the same region, as far as it may be practicable or possible, without doing injustice or harm to any particular employer or a group of employers. Generally, in the matter of providing leave rules, industrial adjudication prefers to have the same conditions of service in the same industry, situated in the same region.[33] In Gramophone Co, the company's rules provided for casual leave for 15 days and privilege leave for 21 days in the year. In addition to the privilege leave, the company also used to grant sick leave for one month, on full pay and for two months, on half pay, per year, which could be accumulated up to 42 days, in accordance with the provisions of the Bombay Shops and Establishments Act 1948. Casual leave, however could not be accumulated. The tribunal increased the privilege leave to 30 days per year, subject to an accumulation of up to 42 days. In appeal, the Supreme Court, on a comparison of the total casual leave and privilege leave allowed in the various comparable concerns in the region, found that the total of privilege leave and casual leave as provided by the award of the tribunal, was higher than in the other concerns, though in some other concerns, the accumulation allowed of the privilege leave, was higher than that of the company. For instance, in some concerns, an accumulation of privilege leave was allowed for more than 42 days, in some concerns it was 56 days and in others 63 days. In some other concerns, an privilege leave was allowed for 28 days per year. In view of the varying patterns prevalent in the comparable concerns, regarding privilege leave, casual leave, and sick leave, the court did not feel inclined to interfere with the award of the tribunal.[34] In Indian Oxygen, the industrial tribunal directed that the workmen should get 15 days leave with full pay and 30 days leave with half pay, as medical leave during the year and accumulation should be allowed to the extent of 45 days with full pay or 90 days on half pay. It further directed that the monthly-rated staff of the company, working in the office of the factory, should get 30 days in a year, which could be accumulated to the extent of 90 days in the case of both the categories. Comparing this award with the pattern in the comparable concerns in the same area (Jamshedpur city), the Supreme Court set aside the award in respect of the annual leave and directed that the existing leave, ie, 21 days, should continue and it could be accumulated for 63 days, ie, for three leave periods. However, the direction with respect to medical leave was affirmed, as it was in consonance with other comparable concerns in the region.[35]

In Buckingham & Carnatic, in allowing the claim of the workmen regarding annual leave and casual leave, the tribunal compared the establishment of the employer company, which was in the city of Madras, with various textile mills in Bangalore, Bombay and Hyderabad, while accepting the position that Madura Mills was a unit comparable with the Madras establishment of the company. The Supreme Court affirmed the direction that the workmen should be entitled to get wages and dearness allowance when they availed themselves of the specified casual leave. But dealing with the casual leave and the annual leave, the court said that though normally, it does not interfere with the directions given by the industrial adjudicators in such matters, nor meticulously calculates as to what would be the proper number of days that could be granted as leave, in view of the fact that in Madura Mills, the workmen who had put in over five years of service, were entitled to avail themselves of only a period of 33 days as casual leave and privilege leave, it held that after granting 15 days as casual leave to the workmen, they would be eligible only for 18 days as privilege leave with pay and dearness allowance. In the absence of any valid reasons given by the tribunal, it was held that the quantum of leave that could be reasonably claimed by the workmen as annual or privilege leave, could only be 18 days, as against 25 days as fixed by the tribunal and in such a case, the workmen will be getting a total number of 33 days as privilege leave and casual leave, as was available in Madura Mills.[36] In Dalmia Cement, dealing with casual leave provided by s 22(1)(b) of the Delhi Shops and Establishments Act 1954 the Supreme Court observed that the pre-emptory direction of the legislature, fixing a maximum of 12 days of total leave for sickness or casual leave, could not be disregarded by the tribunal and held that the award of the tribunal, fixing casual and sick leave at more than the statutory requirement, was illegal.[37]

In May and Baker, again dealing with the same provision, the court observed that it is not open to the tribunal to allow accumulation of leave up to 12 weeks, as against the statutory maximum fixed at 30 days. The award was, therefore, accordingly modified and the accumulation of privilege leave was allowed for up to 30 days, as provided by the statute.[38] In Cinema Theatres, while following the decision in Dalmia Cement, the court went a step further and said that leave cannot be fixed in excess of the maximum fixed by the statute, even on the concession of the employer.[39] In Alembic Chemical Works, interpreting s 79 of the Factories Act 1948, the court held that, on the construction of the language of the section, the said provision provided for the minimum, rather than for the maximum leave which may be awarded to the workmen. On this construction, the court upheld the award of the tribunal, fixing the quantum of leave at a higher number than the one prescribed under that section.[40] In Calcutta Insurance, the tribunal awarded leave to the employees, in excess of the limits prescribed by s 11 of the West Bengal Shops and Establishments Act, which was more akin to s 79 of the Factories Act than to s 22 of the Delhi Shops Establishments Act 1954. In appeal, the Supreme Court repelled the contention on behalf of the employer, that the tribunal could not direct that the employees should have leave in excess of the limit specified in the West Bengal Shops and Establishments Act 1963.[41] Similarly, in Remington Rand, on a construction of ss 14 and 15 of the Mysore Shops and Establishments Act, the Supreme Court affirmed the award of the tribunal, fixing leave in excess of the limits prescribed by the statute.[42]

Sick Leave

Sickness is a serious misfortune to a workman, for it not only prevents him from earning his normal wages, but is a drain on his meager financial resources by way of additional expenditure on food, nursing and visits to the medical center etc. In awarding sickness leave, the adjudicator has to take into account the relevant factors. The 'region-cum-industry basis' is suitable in the adjudication of sick leave cases.[43] In Karam Chand Thapar, the Supreme Court set aside the direction of the industrial tribunal to the effect that, in case of a protracted illness, an employee who had served the company for less than five years, should be allowed leave without pay, for upto six months, as it recognised the difficulty of the employer, that even though such leave would be without pay, for a period of six months, the employer would not be able to engage new men on a permanent basis, in place of such employees.[44] In Hindustan Times, the court held that the sick leave and casual leave permissible under the provisions of the Delhi Shops and Establishments Act 1954, should be awarded to all the workmen, as it would not be right to have two separate leave rules for the two classes of workmen, one to whom the Delhi Shops and Establishment Act 1954 applies and the other to whom it does not.[45]

In Associated Cement Companies, the industrial tribunal had directed that the employer shall not insist on the production of a medical certificate for obtaining sick leave, when the illness of a workman was of the duration of a day and expressed the hope that the workman would not abuse this concession and that it would be open to the employer to take disciplinary action against the workman, when there was satisfactory proof that the concession had been abused. This direction of the tribunal was challenged by the employer company, before the Supreme Court, on the ground that if, for an illness of the duration of a day, no medical certificate was insisted upon, it will be open to a workman to avail of all the 15 days' sick leave, without producing any medical certificate, by taking sick leave for a day, at intervals. It was also pointed out that there was a provision for a 15 days' casual leave in the employer company and if a workman was indisposed and could not attend to work for that reason, it was open to him to take a casual leave, though sick leave with full pay could be availed of only in case of real sickness and that there was nothing wrong in the company insisting upon a medical certificate for obtaining a sick leave, even if it be for a day and that to dispense with the requirement of a medical certificate would lead to grave abuses. But the court did not accept this contention, just as the tribunal, on a consideration of all the materials placed before it, having regard to the overall picture, had arrived at its conclusion. Speaking for the court, Mathew J, who delivered the opinion of the court, observed:

> Generally speaking, no workman will get himself treated by a doctor on the very first day of an illness. For minor ailments, no workman would go to a doctor for treatment and it would be a great hardship to the workman if a medical certificate from a qualified doctor is insisted upon for sick leave, for a day's illness. From a practical point of view, we do not think that it would be expedient to insist that a workman should produce a medical certificate from a qualified doctor, to avail himself of sick leave for a day, on the ground of illness. We do not say that the apprehension entertained by the appellant, that the workmen would abuse the provision for sick leave with full pay, in some cases at least, if no medical certificate is insisted upon for the leave, even if the duration of the illness is for a day, is unfounded. But, at the same time, one has to consider the practical inconvenience and the hardship to the workmen if a medical certificate is insisted upon for availing of sick leave for illness of the duration of a day.[46]

The court does not appear to have appreciated the difference between the purpose of casual leave and sick leave. Casual leave is meant to cover sudden and emergent situations, which essentially, should include sudden illnesses. In cases of sudden illness, therefore, a workman may take casual leave and then if the illness prolongs, he may take sick leave, on being medically certified to be sick. The purpose of sick leave is to allow a sick workman, time for rest and treatment. It would, therefore, be proper that before availing himself of this type of leave, the workman should be medically certified sick. In such a situation, the possibility of the abuse of sick leave, as apprehended by the employer, would be obviated. But the risk of an abuse of this type of leave is inherent in the view taken by the court. In Hindustan Times, the issue related to the absence of any provision for sick leave in the ESI Act 1948 was dealt with. section 46 merely provides for a periodical treatment of an insured person, in case of his sickness, if certified by a duly appointed medical practitioner. Sections 47, 48 and 49 deal with the eligibility of workmen for sickness benefits and the extent of the benefit that may be granted. Section 56 of the Act provides for medical benefits to the insured workmen and in certain cases, to the members of their families. Das Gupta J held that the provisions of this Act do not bar a demand for sick leave by the workmen, as the first proviso to s 49 of the Act states that a person qualified to claim a sickness benefit, shall not be entitled to the benefit of an initial waiting period of two days, except in the case of a spell of sickness, following, at an interval of not more than 15 days, the spell of sickness for which benefit was last paid. It is, therefore, apparent, that the Act does not cover all the contingencies of sickness.[47]Hence, the adjudication of a dispute relating to sickness leave is permissible under the Industrial Disputes Act.[48] In Alembic Glass, Singhal J observed that from the scheme of the Act, it appears that the benefits admissible under the Act, cannot be said to cover a workman's demand for sick leave. In other words, the provisions for the benefits to an insured worker, in case of sickness (sickness benefit), of medical treatment, of attendance to him or the members of his family, do not constitute a substitute for the workman's right to get leave on full pay on the ground of sickness.[49]

A provision for the grant of leave is generally made in the Standing Orders or the service rules of industrial establishments. Normally, when leave has accrued to an employee, it is his right to get it. But from what time leave should be sanctioned, has to be determined according to the exigencies of the business of the employer. Unless a leave has been sanctioned, the employee cannot absent himself from work. Leave cannot be sanctioned as and when it accrues or is applied for, irrespective of any consideration of the business necessities and exigencies. It is apt to dislocate and even paralyse the work of the employer, if, for instance, on a particular day, all the workmen to whom privilege leave has accrued, apply for such leave. Unless leave is applied for, the question of its sanction would not arise. If a workman remains absent from work, without leave having been sanctioned to him, or overstays the sanctioned leave, he exposes himself to disciplinary action. If a workman knows that he has been granted leave up to a particular date and remains absent beyond that date, his absence beyond that date will not be covered by the leave.[50] Judicial dicta have gone to the extent to say that even if a workman could not apply for leave on account of his having been arrested by the police, it may be unfortunate for him, but it would be unjust to hold in such a case, that the employer must always give leave when an application for a leave is made, because if a large number of workmen are arrested by the authorities in charge of the law and order, by reason of their questionable activities in connection with a labour dispute, or otherwise, the work of the employer will be paralysed, if he is forced to give leave to all of the workmen, for a more or less indefinite period. Such a principle will not be just, nor will it facilitate harmony between labour and capital, or ensure a normal flow of production. It is immaterial whether the charges on which the workmen were arrested by the police, were ultimately proved or not, in a court of law; the employer has to carry on his work and in certain cases, may find it difficult to carry on his business if a large number of workmen are absent. It is a matter of the discretion of the employer, to grant leave or not. If, however, the workmen are arrested at the instance of the employer, for the purpose of victimisation and in order to get rid of them on the ostensible pretext of a continued absence, the position will be different, as it will then be a colourable or mala fide exercise of power under the relevant Standing Order.[51]

But a single judge of the Delhi High Court has gone to the extent to say that if the absence of a workman from work is due to any cause beyond his control, it would not be reasonable for the management to decline leave to him, to the 'extent necessary'. The refusal to grant leave in such circumstances would be unreasonable and mala fide, justifying interference with the order of termination of the service of the workman on the ground of absenting without leave. But this cannot be treated as a general proposition of the law.[52] A corollary to the proposition that leave must always be sanctioned before it can be availed of, is, whether the leave once granted can be cancelled. It is a managerial function to grant leave at a particular time. Likewise, if the exigencies of the business of the employer require it, the leave can also be cancelled. But in case the cancellation of the leave is contested by the workmen, the employer has to make out a strong case to justify the action, based on the non-compliance by the workmen, with the direction cancelling the leave. For instance, obtaining leave on a false pretext, would be a valid justification to cancel the leave, on finding out the true state of affairs. This point is illustrated in Binny, in which the workman obtained leave from the employer on the false pretext that he wanted to go to his native place, to settle a land dispute. But, in fact, he participated in a hunger strike called by a trade union, before the Government secretariat. On coming to know of this, the employer company cancelled the leave and directed the workman to resume his duty forthwith. On his failure to comply with the direction, the company took the stand that the workman had left the service, terminating his contract under the relevant Standing Order applicable to the establishment, by absenting himself without leave, for eight consecutive working days. The tribunal held that the employer had no right to cancel the leave once granted and, on this view of the matter, ordered reinstatement of the workman with back wages. The Supreme Court quashed the order of the tribunal and restored the action taken by the employer.[53] The Bombay High Court held that if the service conditions or the Standing Orders of an industrial establishment provide that at the time of his retirement, a workman shall be entitled to the balance of the leave to his credit, he can claim money compensation in terms of the salary, for the leave to his credit, after his retirement.[54] But where an establishment has been closed or transferred, the claim for compensation for the unavailed earned leave, cannot survive, as such a claim is not warranted by any statute. The facility of enjoying leave can be given to the workman, by an employer, only so long as he is carrying on his business.[55] The question as to whether an encashment of leave was allowed from a particular year and in a particular manner, is a question of fact, which cannot be interfered with, in a judicial review.[56]

Holidays

Various states have fixed the number of holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act 1881. Some of such holidays are national holidays, some are sectional holidays. The holidays declared under the Negotiable Instruments Act 1881 are usually applicable to Government institutions only and they have a certain financial statutory implication, envisaged by the Act itself. Commercial establishments and industrial undertakings do not usually adopt these holidays.[57] Employers generally fix the number of holidays in their Standing Orders or the service conditions. In Associated Cement Staff Union, the Supreme Court held that the number of holidays to be given, has to be fixed so as to be consistent with the change in the concept of the country's economic position and the need for more production. On this view of the matter, the number of holidays fixed by the tribunal at 21 was reduced by Supreme Court, to 16, as 21 holidays were held to be too many.[58] Apart from the national holidays and festival holidays, there are weekly holidays. Some employers do not grant paid weekly holidays to their employees. But paid holidays should be the goal of industrial adjudication, bearing in mind, however, the financial burden upon the employer caused due to such paid holidays.[59] The Supreme Court accepted the recommendation made by NCL-I to the effect that every employee shall be allowed in a calendar year three paid national holidays; viz, 26th January (Republic Day), 15th August (Independence Day) and 2nd October (Mahatma Gandhi's Birth Day) and five paid festival holidays, as may be fixed by the appropriate Government in consultation with the representatives of employers and employees.[60]

A reduction in the number of holidays would be a step in the direction of increasing the continuous productivity.[61] In Pfizer, the tribunal reduced the number of public holidays from 28 (as under the Negotiable Instruments Act 1881) to 16, and this was upheld by the Supreme Court.[62] In National Tobacco, the claim of the workmen was only in respect of the Visvakarama Puja day, which, according to the demand, should be a paid holiday for the daily-rated and weekly-rated workmen. The existing arrangement was that if such workmen wanted to enjoy this holiday, they were allowed to do so, but without wages. However, the Vishvakarma Puja day was not a holiday for workmen who were paid at the monthly rate. The tribunal rejected the claim on the ground that there was no justification for making an exception in the case of daily-rated and weekly-rated workmen, in respect of the holiday. Nor was it proved before the tribunal that other industrial concerns in the region were allowing Vishvakarma Puja day as a paid holiday for the daily-rated and weekly-rated workmen. The direction of the tribunal was affirmed by the Supreme Court.[63] In Bhiwani Textile, the industrial dispute was as to whether the workmen could be called upon to work on Sundays, in batches, and if so, would they be entitled to any extra remuneration for such work. From the evidence before the tribunal, it appeared that in other textile mills in the same region, Sunday was a working day and the workmen were not paid any extra remuneration for such work on Sundays. Though the tribunal held that the workmen could be called upon to work on Sundays, it directed the management to pay a 20 per cent extra remuneration, over and above the consolidated wages, for such work on Sundays. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the direction and observed that the tribunal erred in not taking into consideration, two relevant factors, viz, the financial capacity of the employer to bear the extra burden and the practice prevailing in the industry in the region, and the factors taken into account by it, in awarding the extra payment to the workmen, were of much less importance.[64]

In Federation of S&ME Industries, it was held that the tribunal, in the circumstances of the case, was not justified in granting two additional days as festival holidays, departing from the original number of festival holidays granted by the industries.[65] In Bijli Cotton Mills, the Supreme Court emphasised the need for increasing production, particularly, in the matter of utility concerns and concerns that produce goods for essential services. In this context, it has been observed that there are too many public holidays in this country and, that when the need for industrial production is urgent and paramount, it may be advisable to reduce the number of such holidays in industrial concerns. In this case, the tribunal directed the employers to pay wages to each one of their daily-rated and piece-rated workmen, for seventeen festival holidays, besides the three national holidays. If the employers substituted festival holidays on a rest day, for that day, they shall pay double the wages. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the award and remanded the matter to the tribunal for fresh adjudication; as it had not taken into consideration the fact that the award of seventeen festival holidays would impose a very heavy additional burden on the establishment. Speaking for the court, Dua J, observed:

> Custom, practice and uniformity in the industry, without prejudicially affecting efficiency and increased production, are some of the relevant factors which have to be taken into account in determining the number of paid festival holidays per year. The question affects national economy and the present instance may well be cited in future, in deciding similar questions in other allied concerns in the region. The effect of such instances, therefore, does not remain confined only to the estab1 ishment concerned, but has its impact on other concerns as well. [66]

In Hindustan Steel, the demand of the workmen was that the ten holidays sanctioned by the certified Standing Orders of the company, should be increased to eleven, by the addition of May day as a compulsory national holiday. The relevant issue framed by the tribunal, in this connection, read:

> Whether the workmen had acquired the right through custom, usage, etc, to enjoy the May day 1970, as a national holiday, as defined in the certified Standing Orders of the company or as an additional paid holiday in excess of the number of paid holidays prescribed by the said Standing Orders. [67]

The tribunal held that the workmen had acquired a customary right to enjoy May day as a compulsory holiday and also as an additional paid holiday. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the evidence on record did not show any custom in the matter of recognising May day as a compulsory holiday and set aside the award. In Saxby and Farmer,[68] at the instance of the employer company, the appropriate Government referred for adjudication the industrial dispute relating to a 'curtailment of unpaid festival holidays' on the ground that the company allowed nine festival unpaid holidays and the continuance of these holidays would not only entail a loss of wages to the workmen, but also a loss of production, which would prejudicially affect the country's economy. It was also asserted that the system of granting unpaid holidays was no longer being followed in the engineering industry. Moreover, other holidays enjoyed by the workmen of the establishment, along with the workmen of other similar units, were far in excess of what prevailed in other countries. This was contested by the workmen, who took the position that the curtailment of the holidays would be in disregard of the principle and practice followed so far, in the matter of giving benefits to the industrial workmen. The main ground taken by the workmen was that, in the interests of industrial peace, production and better relations between the workmen and the management, the workmen should be kept contented and any attempt to curtail the existing benefits, according to the time honoured practice, would provoke discontent and labour unrest. The tribunal was impressed by the contention of the workmen, that they had enjoyed the facility of unpaid holidays for a long time and held that there was no good ground to cut down the number of festival holidays by curtailing the unpaid holidays, simply because the overall number of holidays was large. Setting aside the award of the tribunal, the Supreme Court discontinued the system of unpaid holidays and observed that there was no reason or justification for unpaid holidays not being curtailed in this case, particularly when the employer was carrying on a kind of work which required efficiency and increased production and the prosperity of the country depended more upon increased production and efficiency, than on enjoying holidays.

Wage Incentives or Production Bonus

The incentives given to the labour by their employers, for achieving higher productivity, are generally known as incentive bonus or production bonus. In other words, the incentive for increased production is generally known as 'production bonus'. Broadly, the basis of remuneration for work in an industry, is based on two fundamental arrangements, viz, (i) payment by time, and (ii) payment by output. In the former case, a worker is paid a predetermined amount for a specified unit of time, which may be an hour, a day, a week, or a month. Under this arrangement, there is no direct control on the amount of work done by the workers, except perhaps, to a certain extent, through supervision, so long as they are engaged on tasks specified by the employer. In the latter arrangement, the worker is remunerated according to his output or the output of the group to which he belongs. It may assume complex forms, such as 'differential piece work, wherein rates of remuneration per unit of output, may be either progressive or regressive. According to NCL-I:

> There are also other types of remuneration that are not directly dependent on production, like bonuses for regular attendance, length of service, quality of production and elimination of waste, all constituting an area of wage incentives.[69]

There are advantages in incentive payments. They serve a double purpose, viz, (i) to increase the earnings of workers, and (ii) to improve the efficiency of the unit, thus lowering costs and if properly executed, they may have an effect on prices in a manner which will benefit the community. But on the other hand, the use of a system of payment by results, accentuates the differences between the management and the unions. Such incentives provide additional remuneration for workers, as production proceeds from day to day. There is a wide variety of incentive systems in force in different parts of the world and various countries, for this purpose, have evolved various wage plans, worked out on various bases.[70] The main feature of all such production incentives or production bonuses is that its payment depends upon production and is in addition to the guarantee of the minimum wage. In effect, it is an incentive to higher production and is in the nature of an incentive wage. The name 'incentive bonus' or 'production bonus' indicates that it is given as a cash incentive, for a greater effort on the part of the labour,[71] for more production.

The first and second five year plans recommended the introduction of incentives to promote more efficient work in industries, with due safeguards to protect the interests of workers, through the guarantee of the minimum (fall-back) wage and protection against fatigue and undue speed up. The second plan further recommended that earnings beyond the minimum wage should be necessarily related to results and workers should be consulted before a system of payment by results was introduced in such an establishment. The third plan accentuated the need for higher productivity and reduction in the unit cost of production and put the responsibility on the management, to provide the most efficient equipment, correct conditions and methods of work, as well as adequate training and suitable psychological and material incentives for the workers. These recommendations do not appear to have been implemented, though certain individual employers or group of employers, have endeavoured to do their bit in this connection.[72] There is a base of standard, above which, extra payment is made for extra production, in addition to the basic wage. Such a plan typically guarantees time-wage up to the time represented by standard performance and gives workers a share in the savings represented by a superior performance. But whatever may be the nature of the plan, the payment in effect, is extra emoluments for extra effort put in by the workmen, over and above the standard that may be fixed. Therefore, all these plans are known as incentive wage plans and, generally speaking, have little to do with profits. This type of bonus was recognised by the Supreme Court in Titaghur Paper Mills, in which Wanchoo J observed:

> The extra payment depends not on extra profits, but on extra production. The extra payment calculated on the basis of extra production, is in a case like the present, where the payment is made after the annual production is known, in the nature of emoluments paid at the end of the year. Therefore, generally speaking, payment of production bonus is nothing more nor less than a payment of further emoluments, depending upon the production, as an incentive to the workmen to put in more than the standard performance.[73]

In this case, referring to Smith's Labour Law where various plans prevalent in other countries, known as incentive wage plans, have been worked out on various bases, the court observed:

> The simplest of such plans is the straight piece-rate plan, where payment is made according to each piece produced, subject, in some cases, to a guaranteed minimum wage for so many hours' work. But the straight piece-rate system cannot work where the finished product is the result of the co-operative effort of a large number of workers, each doing a small part which contributes to the result. In such cases, production bonus by tonnage produced, as in this case, is given. There is a base or standard above which, extra payment is made for extra production, in addition to the basic wage ... But whatever may be the nature of the plan, the payment in effect, is extra emoluments for extra effort put in by workmen, over the standard that may be fixed ... The extra payment depends not on extra profits, but on extra production ... Therefore, generally speaking, payment of production bonus is nothing more or less than a payment of further emoluments, depending upon production, as an incentive to the workmen to put in more than the standard performance. Production bonus in this case also, is of this nature and is nothing more than additional emoluments paid as an incentive for higher production.[74]

In connection with the question as to whether there should be increased production in a particular concern, the court further observed that it is 'a matter to be determined entirely, by the employer and depends upon a consideration of so many complex factors, namely, the state of the market, the demand for the product, the range of prices, and so on. As to the question of whether a scheme for an incentive bonus should be introduced or not, is, therefore, entirely for the employer to decide. But the further question, as to whether the industrial adjudicators have jurisdiction to introduce a production bonus at all, was left undecided by the court. However, it was held that where there was a scheme of production bonus in existence, the tribunal would have jurisdiction, under the Industrial Disputes Act, to deal with it and to make suitable amendments or modifications to it, where necessary. From the point of view of economics, the employees in non-production departments, like the clerical and subordinate staff in an industry, are deemed to contribute towards the production and on this hypothesis, the scheme of incentive and production bonus should be extended to cover them.[75]

In a case where the management has introduced a scheme for incentive bonus, it is open to the tribunal to vary the terms of the scheme, if the circumstances of the case justify its doing so and the refix the rates of the incentive bonus, if it finds that the targets are too high or the rates are wholly incommensurate to the additional performance put in by the workman. Where necessary, the tribunal may, for the determination of technical matters, take assistance from persons who are familiar with the subject, by appointing them as accessories.[76] The payment of an incentive wage is a payment of further emoluments to the workmen, depending not upon extra profit, but on extra production, as an encouragement to put in more labour than normal incentive bonus or wage cannot be linked with the earning of profits, because profits depend upon many economic factors ruling at the time, for instance, there may be a slump in the market or a fall in the demand of finished goods or non-availability of raw materials and these and such other prevailing factors may affect the earning of profits, with which the workman who increased the output, is not concerned. Likewise, the vehicle drivers of an industrial establishment, partly on this principle and partly on the finding that they put in more than their standard performance, have been held to be entitled to the benefit of the incentive bonus scheme.[77] In this connection, in Sone Valley (supra), the court observed:

> It would of course, always be open to the legislature, to introduce any kind of bonus, not so far recognised by industrial law, evolved either by the tribunal or by this court. But that must rest on a solid foundation and express words must be used to that effect. Although it is not necessary to express any final view on the subject, we are inclined to think that apart from a legislation on incentive bonus for increase of production, irrespective of the question as to whether the industry was making profit or not, is one that must be introduced by the particular unit of industry. It would be for the management to fix that incentives should be given to different departments, to step up production. An industrial tribunal would not be justified in holding that merely because there had been an augmentation in the production, the labour would be entitled to make a claim to a bonus, because of such increase. Labour would undoubtedly be entitled to a revision of its wage scales, dearness allowance and other terms and conditions of service, as also profit bonus; but in the absence of any legislation or a scheme for incentive production, industrial tribunals would not be justified in laying down a scheme themselves.[78]

In this case, the workmen demanded a share in the incentive payment allowed by the Government, to the cement producers, claiming it to be an incentive bonus. The tribunal, on an examination of the special circumstances of the case, awarded that the demand of the workmen was justified. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court observed that, even if the central control order offered some inducement to the producers to step up their production, the terms thereof did not entitle the tribunal to treat it as and by way of an incentive bonus, in which the workmen could claim a share. The Court observed that an industrial tribunal could only award that which the law allows. In the absence of any legislation on the subject and in the absence of a scheme for incentive payment, introduced by the management, in the particular facts and circumstances of the case, the court negatived the claim of the workmen. The NCL-I has suggested the following guidelines for the introduction of incentive schemes, which found general acceptance in the industry and labour:

(a) Employers and workers should formulate a simple incentive system at the unit level and implement it on some agreed basis, through collective bargaining. In every case, the introduction of the incentive schemes should be preceded by an agreement with the trade unions.

(b) In evolving wage incentive schemes, it should be ensured that these do not lead to rate-cutting. The worker's normal wages should be protected, where it is not possible for him, for circumstances beyond his control, to earn an incentive.

(c) Individual or group incentives can be framed to cover both direct and indirect groups of workers.

(d) An incentive scheme cannot be evolved without undertaking a work-study, with the co-operation of the workers. Nevertheless, it should always be open to the employers and the workers to evolve a scheme by agreement, or on any other acceptable basis.

(e) Efforts should be made to reduce time-rated categories to the minimum. This will ensure that all employees have an equal chance to increase their earnings, with the increase in productivity.

(f) Wage incentives should generally provide extra earnings only after a mutually agreed level of efficiency has been achieved.

(g) To ensure quality of production, incentive payments should be generally allowed only if the output has been approved on inspection by the management. Relevant norms in this connection should be laid down and made known to the workers.

(h) Incentive earnings should not fluctuate too much. This requires a certain degree of planning, so that material delays, machine-breakdowns, etc, are controlled.

(i) The scheme should itself safeguard adequately, the interest of the worker, if he is forced to remain idle due to circumstances entirely beyond his control, such as non-supply of raw materials, and machine-breakdown.

(j) Apart from financial incentives, non-financial incentives, like better security of employment, job satisfaction, and job status, have also a place in increasing productivity.[79]

In Raza Buland Sugar, the company had withdrawn its scheme for payment of incentive bonus, known as premium in the sugar industry, and in adjudicating on the dispute arising out of that, the tribunal effected certain modifications in the scheme. It held that the wage board had not recommended the payment of any particular kind of incentive in sugar the industry, hence, the standardisation by the wage board had nothing to do with the payment of an premium as an incentive for higher production. In appeal by special leave, in the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court affirmed the award of the tribunal.[80] In Unichem, the tribunal suggested certain modifications to the originally existing scheme of incentive bonus, while not accepting most of the recommendations of the assessor appointed on the joint application of both the parties. But, since the tribunal did not have the necessary material for that purpose, before it, it was not possible to devise a scheme, calculated to afford protection to the incentive earned by a workman, at the raised base performance index. In the circumstance, the tribunal directed that a scheme should be worked out, if possible, by the consent of the parties, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the workmen, at the increased base performance index. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed that, though it would have been desirable for the tribunal to have actually evolved a scheme, in the circumstances of the case, the court could not do anything in the matter and the directions of the tribunal were affirmed.[81]

Puja Bonus and Customary Bonus

Puja bonus or customary bonus is quite distinct from the profit sharing bonus, which has now been codified in the Payment of Bonus Act 1965. Section 17(a) of the Act entitled an employer to deduct 'any puja bonus or other customary bonus' paid by him to an employee, in a particular accounting year, from the 'profit sharing' bonus payable to him, under that Act in the year but the Payment of Bonus Act provides no machinery for the qualification of Puja bonus or customary bonus, for the adjudication of which, different considerations arise. The puja bonus or other customary bonus is, therefore, to be adjudicated upon by the tribunal on a reference being made to it under s 10(1), read with item 5 of the Third Schedule of this Act. This has been made specifically clear by the Supreme Court in Mumbai Kamgar Sabha.[82] It may, however, not be irrelevant to point out that though the holding of the court in this case is correct, the process of its reasoning is rather arduous and prolix and sounds like an exercise in the rhetoric. Instead of adverting to the clear language of s 17 of the Payment of Bonus Act, the court unnecessarily got ensnared into the cobwebs of empty phrases and 'the gravitational pull on judicial construction of pt 4 of the Constitution'.

Industrial adjudication has broadly treated puja bonus or customary bonus under two heads: (i) An implied contract between the employers and the employees, creating a term of employment, for the payment of bonus; or (ii) A customary and traditional payment, even though no implied agreement can be inferred. These two heads, on the face, appear to be distinct, but in practice, they overlap to a certain extent. Puja Bonus as an Implied Term of Contract: In the year 1949, there was a dispute between the Bengal Chambers of Commerce, Calcutta and its employees. The industrial tribunal which adjudicated upon the dispute, observed that Durga Puja was a national festival and it was customary to make presents to near and dear ones and to relatives at that time. As it was difficult for poorly paid employees to make savings out of this monthly incomes for this purpose, it had become traditional and customary in Bengal, for employers to make a monetary grant at the time of the Puja. The Bengal Chambers of Commerce had appreciated this position and had been granting a bonus equivalent to one month's pay, and the tribunal had been assured that there was no intention to discontinue it. In Mahalaxmi Cotton Mills, the labour appellate tribunal stated the following tests for determining that there was an implied term of employment, for the payment of bonus at the time of the annual Durga Puja:

1. The payment must have been unbroken;
2. It must have continued for a sufficiently long period;
3. The length of the period would depend upon the circumstances of each case and what may be a short period, not justifying an inference of an implied term of employment in one case, may be long enough in another; and
4. The circumstance in which the payment was made should be such as to exclude the ground that it was paid out of bounty.[83]

These tests were approved and applied by the Supreme Court in Ispahani.[84] In this case, a company, since its inception in 1934, had been paying one month's wages as Puja bonus every year, irrespective of its trading results. A new company was incorporated in 1947, which took over the trading rights and goodwill of the old company and also purchased its properties, assets and stock-in-trade. The new company carried on its business in the same manner, in the same premises, with the same set of workers, on the same remuneration and also continued the payment of one month's wages as Puja bonus, till the year 1952. As no bonus was paid in 1953, a dispute arose between the new company and its workmen, which was referred for adjudication, along with other matters. Since it was not established that the Puja bonus had been paid at a uniform rate of one month's wages, for a sufficiently long time of unbroken period, the industrial tribunal rejected the claim for a Puja bonus for 1953. But the labour appellate tribunal, in appeal, took the view that it had been proved that the Puja bonus had become a term of employment and the workmen were, therefore, entitled to a bonus at the rate of one month's wages, for the year 1953. In appeal, against the award of the labour appellate tribunal, the Supreme Court said that such a condition can be implied if it has existed over an unbroken and sufficiently long period, even in years of loss and not paid as a bounty, and it is not essential that it should have been paid at a uniform rate. In the circumstances of the case, it was held that there was an implied term of employment for the payment of the Puja bonus, at the rate of one month's wages in a year. The condition of payment at a uniform rate, discarded in this case, was adopted by the court in Grahams Trading, and it was further held that there can be a customary bonus, unconnected with a festival.[85] In Ispahani Ltd, Wanchoo J held that the question as to whether there exists an implied term of employment, is a mixed question of a fact and law and it is not a pure question of fact. The tribunal would, therefore, have jurisdiction to consider whether on the facts proved before it, it could draw an inference in law, that an implied term of employment for the grant of a Puja bonus has been established. If, on the facts proved before it, the tribunal commits an error of law, apparent on the face of the record, in drawing an inference that an implied term of employment for the grant of a Puja bonus has been established, such an error of law will be reviewable. With regard to the claim for puja bonus, the learned judge observed thus:

> The claim for a Puja bonus in Bengal, is based on either of two grounds. It may either be a matter of a implied agreement between the employers and the employees, creating a term of employment for the payment of the Puja bonus, or secondly, even though no implied agreement could be inferred, it may be payable as a customary bonus.[86]

Explaining Isphani, the court held that once it is proved that there was an implied condition of service to pay a bonus on a festival, some amount has to be paid under the said implied term. What the minimum would be in that behalf, must be decided as a question of fact.[87] The expression 'customary bonus' has not been defined in law. The dictionary meaning of the word 'customary', as in the Oxford English Dictionary, is 'usual, habitual, accustomed', etc, as also a 'commonly used practise'. However, what is customary, can become contractual as well. Therefore, the two expressions are not absolutely exclusive. Cases regarding customary bonus have often been treated as regarding festival bonus and such bonus has a reference to a special occasion, like a festival, for example, the Durga Puja or Kali Puja in Bengal and 'Diwali' in Western India—occasions which are generally utilised by employers, to reward the service of their employees.[88] Thus festival bonus or Puja bonus is not exactly synonymous with customary bonus. In Grahams Trading Co, the Supreme Court observed that when a question of customary and traditional bonus arises for adjudication, the considerations may be somewhat different from those applicable to a payment of Puja bonus as an implied term of employment. In this case, the court stated the following tests for determining the liability of the employer to pay customary or traditional bonus:

1. Whether the payment has been made over an unbroken series of years;
2. whether it has been for a sufficiently long period, though the length of the period might depend on the circumstances of each case; even so, the period may normally, have to be longer to justify an inference of a traditional and customary Puja bonus than may be the case for a Puja bonus based on an implied term of employment;
3. the circumstance that the payment depended upon the earning of profits, would have to be excluded and therefore, it must be shown that payment was made in the years of loss also;
4. in dealing with the question of custom, the fact that the payment was called ex-gratia by the employer, when it was made, would make no difference in this regard, because the proof of custom depends upon the effect of the relevant factors and it would not be materially affected by unilateral declarations of one party, when the said declarations are inconsistent with the course of conduct adopted by it; and
5. the payment must have been at a uniform rate throughout, to justify an inference that the payment at such and such rate had become customary and traditional in the particular concern.[89]

The court also pointed out that these tests were more stringent than those in the case of Puja bonus as an implied term, which need not be uniform, as pointed out in Isphani's case. But in BN Elias, the court pointed out that it would be difficult to introduce a customary payment of bonus between an employer and his employees, where the terms of service are governed by contract, express or implied, except where the bonus may be connected with a festival, whether a Puja in Bengal or some equally important festival in any other part of the country.[90] In Jardine Henderson, it was reiterated that customary bonus must always be connected with some festival.[91] Later, in Tulsidas Khimji (supra), a majority of the court clarified that the four so-called conditions laid down in Grahams Trading Co, are not really in the nature of conditions precedent, but are mere circumstances which have to be taken into account for coming to the conclusion as to whether or not a claim to the customary or traditional bonus has been made out. Hence, 'loss', substantial or otherwise, is not a sine qua non for the grant of a Puja bonus, as there is no rational ground for holding that 'payment even when there were loses' is a condition precedent, because a company or a firm may have an unbroken record of profits, ever since it started working. It was held that a claim for a customary bonus may be negatived on the proof that the payment was made ex-gratia and accepted as such, or that it was unconnected with any such occasion as a festival.[92]

In Tocklai Experimental Station, the court again reiterated the tests laid down in Grahams Trading Co, that the amount by way of a Puja bonus, must be shown to have been consistently paid by the employer, to his employees, from year to year, at the same rate and it should have been paid even in the years of loss and further, that it should have had no relation to the profits made by the employer during the current year.[93] The period of payment might normally be longer to justify the inference of a traditional customary payment of bonus, than in a case of bonus based on the implied terms of employment. It is also necessary to prove that the payments were not dependent on the earning of profits by the management. The fact that the payments were made even in the years of loss, is an important consideration for coming to the conclusion that the payments were not made out of bounty.[94]

In Tulsidas Khimji (supra) the court candidly suggested that a claim for bonus may be negatived only on proof that a the payment was made ex-gratia and accepted as such. In this case, the union of workmen claimed a share, at the rate of six months' wages, and a traditional or customary bonus, at a rate which was not clear, but which could be said to be either three months' or one month's wages, plus dearness allowance, on the occasion of the Diwali festival. According to the tribunal, the workmen had proved that such bonus had been paid at a uniform rate of one month's basic wages plus dearness allowance, on the occasion of the Diwali festival, for 15 years commencing from 1940-41 to 1956-57. Referring to the arguments advanced on behalf of the employer company, that the four circumstances mentioned in the Grahams Trading Co's case, had not been established, the court remarked:

> ...what is more important to negative a plea for a customary bonus would be proof that it was made ex-gratia, and accepted as such, or that it was unconnected with any such occasion like a festival, as laid down by this court in the case of BN Elias.[95]

What is relevant for the present discussion is the consistency and predictability of the decisions rendered on the same issue by five successive Benches presided over by the same judge of Supreme Court, ie, BP Sinha CJI. For example, in Tulsidas Khimji, the issue related to the nature and scope of 'customary' or 'puja' bonus and the conditions governing the payment thereof. Counsel relied on the following four conditions laid down in Grahams Trading Co: (i) that the payment has been made over an unbroken series of years; (ii) that it has been so made for a sufficiently long period; (iii) that it has been paid even in years of loss, and did not depend upon the earning of profits; and (iv) lastly, that the payment has been made at a uniform rate throughout. Chief Justice Sinha (for self, Subba Rao, Mudholkar and Venkatarama Ayyar JJ, Rajagopala Ayyangar J, dissenting) held that the said four conditions, and particularly condition (iii), were not conditions precedent, but only circumstances which should be taken into account by the court. The observation of the learned Chief Justice ran thus:

> ...it has been contended that according to the judgments of this Court, in order to establish the claim for a bonus of this kinds four conditions must be fulfilled, namely, (1) that the payment has been made over an unbroken series of years; (2) that it has been so made for a sufficiently long period; (3) that the payment has been made at a uniform rate throughout, and (4) lastly, that it has been paid even in years of loss, and did not depend upon the earning of profits. It has been found by the Tribunal that the first three conditions, if they can be so called, have been fulfilled, but that the last one has not been established and could not be established because the firm was singularly fortunate in having an unbroken record of profits, year after year. ...Firstly, the four so-called conditions are not really in the nature of conditions precedent but are circumstances which have been taken into account by this Court in ...That those are circumstances, and not conditions precedent, is shown by the fact that this Court has pointed out that the length of the period will depend upon the circumstances of each case.[96] (italics supplied)

Justice Ayyangar J, dissenting, cited Ispahani, Elias, Grahams and Tocklai and observed:

> The extracts...from the judgment of this Court in the Graham Trading Co. ...where it is referred to as the third condition and the specific reference to loss in the three other decisions, particularly bearing in mind the fact that the same members of the Court had taken part in these several decisions, and Gajendragadkar, J, took part in all the four, I feel unable to hold that the learned Judge did not intend this to be an essential condition. In the Graham case ..., the reason for the insistence of this condition is stated, viz, that it is only a payment during a year when there is loss that would negative the payment being a bounty. In these circumstances I do not consider it possible to construe these judgments as laying down that payment during a year of loss, was merely a relevant circumstance and not a necessary condition. If ... what the Court is now called on to do is only to construe these decisions, and not consider the question afresh, I feel compelled to hold that in these several decisions this Court did lay down that this was a sine qua non for making good the claim.[97]

The majority judgment delivered by Sinha CJI, in Tulsidas Khimji requires detailed analysis vis-à-vis the dissenting view of Ayyangar J. For a better appreciation of the law, it is necessary to look at all the landmark cases. It is not in doubt that the law relating to puja or customary bonus had evolved over a long time finally culminating in the quadruple test laid down in Grahams Trading Co. In fact, Sinha J, as he then was, presided over the three-judge Benches that decided Ispahani and Grahams Trading. Viewed in this background, the observation of Sinha CJI, in Tulsidas Khimji that 'the above four conditions prescribed in Grahams Trading were not really in the nature of conditions precedent, but were only circumstances to be taken into account by the court' not only sounds strange, but also runs counter to the very principles enunciated in the earlier decisions. The further fact that the quadruple test was applied in the subsequent cases in BNElias and Tocklai Experimental Station bears ample testimony to the proposition that all the four conditions were 'conditions precedent', and not merely 'relevant circumstances'. The dissenting view of Ayyangar J, was consistent with the settled legal principles and was right, while that of Sinha CJI, was not only misconceived but also repugnant to the very principles evolved by him. With great respect for the eminent Chief Justice, the seeds of inconsistency and unpredictability were sown, though unwittingly, by him in the early 1960s itself, which acquired alarming proportions during the 1970s at the hands of Iyer J, and others.[1]

In Vegetable Products, the facts were: the case of the workmen was that 'puja bonus' had become either an implied term of employment between them and their employer and, hence it was customary to pay such bonus. On the basis of the evidence, the court found that the payment for the year 1959 was ex-gratia and accepted as such by the workmen. For the year 1960-61, the evidence further showed that the payment had been made at the rate of 30 days wages, the workmen had given a receipt stating that the payment was a made as advance, to be adjusted against the profit bonus for the previous year. In these circumstances, the court found itself unable to hold that there had been any payment for an unbroken number of years, before the dispute was referred to the tribunal, for the payment of the customary or traditional bonus, on the occasion of the Puja festival. In this case, the court reiterated the tests laid down in Grahams case, for determining as to what exactly is a customary or festival bonus.[2] In Upendra Chakraborty, the court held that the workmen had not succeeded in persuading it that the bonus they had received, had the characteristics of a customary bonus, as known to law and that therefore, they were entitled to the quantification of that amount on the basis of the existence of a legal right in them. Payment for a few years past, would not give rise to a continuing obligation to make such payment, particularly when, from the pleadings of the parties, no custom could be spelled out. As a matter of fact, a collection backed by intimidation and threat is most obnoxious in its nature.[3] A third party, who is not the employer of the workers, represented by the union, cannot be liable for continuing the obligation.[4]

In Churakulam, there was, at first, an agreement in the year 1946, relating to a bonus for the years 1947, 1948 and 1949. The agreement was extended for the years 1950 and 1951 and there were subsequent agreements as well. But there was no controversy in that the company had paid the bonus for nine years and that it was not at a uniform rate. So far as the year 1952 was concerned, the company's case was that it had not paid any bonus as such, but on the other hand, it had been an ex-gratia payment of Rs 3 to each workman. But the tribunal did not accept this plea and held that the said payment must be treated as one having been made towards the bonus. The Supreme Court, in appeal by special leave, came to the conclusion that the tribunal was wrong in holding that an inference could be drawn that the payment of bonus had become an implied condition of service, in the circumstances of the case, when the payment admittedly, was not uniform and was not connected with any festival. The court also negatived the plea of the workmen, to treat the bonus as a customary or traditional bonus, because, apart from the fact that it was not connected with any festival, one of the essential ingredients, viz, that the payment should have been at a uniform rate throughout, was admittedly, lacking in the case.[5]

In Jabalpur BK Punchayat, the workmen claimed a festival bonus at the rate of 10 per cent of their earnings, which was claimed as an implied term of the contract of employment and as an established practice, it having been paid to them, irrespective of profit or loss, before Diwali, every year, continuously, from 1940-41, without any break. The tribunal found itself unable to allow this claim. In appeal by special leave, from the evidence on record, the Supreme Court found that it was amply clear that although the employees had been receiving at least 10 per cent of their total earnings by way of bonus, for the years 1940-41 to 1959-60, there had been no consistency in the claim to bonus throughout this period, nor had been there any uniformity, either in the amounts paid or the grounds under which the several awards of bonus came to be made. The only award, which indicated that the bonus was to be regarded as a Diwali bonus, was that of Bhat J, for the period 1957-58 to 1959-60. For the period 1940-41 to 1956-57, the company never paid the bonus as a festival bonus, on the occasion of Diwali. The amount was mostly paid under awards, but in between the awards, there was a period when it was paid by an express agreement between the parties. Nevertheless, it was argued on behalf of the workmen that, since a bonus payment of 10 per cent was made for a long period from the years 1940-41 to 1959-60, it had become an implied term of contract of employment and it was to be regarded as a festival bonus. But the Supreme Court negatived the contention in view of the law laid down in its earlier dicta. The claim of the workmen that they should be paid 10 per cent, either as a festival bonus or under any implied term of employment, therefore, could not be accepted. Thus, for negativing the claim of the workmen to a customary bonus, the following five factors have to be proved by the employer:

(1) The payment was made ex-gratia, by the employer;

(2) the payment was accepted by the workman as such, ie, ex-graita;

(3) the payment was not connected with the Puja or any other festival;

(4) the payment was not strictly made from year to year, at the same rate; and

(5) the payment was not made in the years of loss, it had relation to the profits made by the employer.[6]

The fourth circumstance mentioned in Grahams Trading is that the payment should have been made at a uniform rate, throughout. It does not mean that uniformity should be established from the beginning to the end. For instance, take a case where for the first few years, payment at some different, but uniform rate, had been made. However, after those first few years, the payment was made at a new rate, which has been strictly followed till the current year. In such circumstances, the tribunal may very well come to the conclusion that the payment was at a uniform rate, ignoring the first few years. Where, however, it appears, for example, that the payment for a few years was at one rate, say X, for the next few years, at the rate of X minus Y, for another few years at the rate of Y, and for the last years, at the rate of X plus Y and then a dispute arises, it may be said, in those circumstances, that the payment had not been made at a uniform rate.[7] Hence, where an implied condition of service for the payment of a festival bonus is established, but the amounts so paid in the past years are not the same from year to year, the tribunal has to determine the minimum amount which has always been paid, for an unbroken period of time.[8] Once it is proved that there was such an implied condition of service, some amount has to be paid under the said implied term, and what the minimum amount would be in that behalf, must be decided as a question of fact, on the evidence produced by the parties. The amount of the minimum bonus so payable as a condition of service, has to be paid to the workmen, even if there has been a loss in any given year. Likewise, since the payment of such bonus does not have any of the incidents of a profit bonus, even when the profit position of the employer, in any year in the future, is such as to enable him to pay more, he cannot be compelled to pay anything more, by way of the festival bonus, than the minimum which has been determined.[9]

In New Maneckchowk, the Supreme Court was considering the terms of an agreement, the latter providing for the calculation of the bonus for each of the member units of the textile industry, in a manner fundamentally different in some respects, from the manner evolved by the Full Bench Formula. The agreement had expired by afflux of time, but was extended by the Bombay Industrial Court for another period of one year, between the same parties, on the ground that it had worked out satisfactorily and fairly for both the parties. The question, therefore, arose: whether the payment of such goodwill bonus could be imposed by industrial adjudication, on an unwilling employer, on the ground of industrial peace? Wanchoo J, speaking for the majority of the court, observed:

> In particular, by extending the agreement, the tribunal has made it possible for the payment of a minimum bonus, even when there was either insufficient available surplus to pay bonus or no available surplus at all or even an actual loss; the tribunal was thus, definitely going against the industrial law relating to bonus, as laid down by the court.[10]

It was, however, urged on behalf of the union, that there is a fifth kind of bonus, namely, a goodwill bonus and that the agreement, when it provides for a minimum bonus, irrespective of the availability of profits, provides for such bonus in the interests of industrial peace. But the court said that it is enough to say that so far as what is called the goodwill bonus is concerned, it pre supposes that it is given by the employer out of his own free will, without any compulsion by an industrial court. As its very name implies, it is a bonus which is given by the employer out of his free consent, in order that there may be goodwill between him and his workmen; but there can be no question of imposing a good will bonus by industrial courts, as imposition of such a bonus would be a contradiction of its very concept. But Subba Rao J, dissented and said:

> An industrial tribunal can extend an existing agreement or make a new one, if, for good reasons, it comes to the conclusion that such extension promotes industrial peace, if as I have held, the impugned pact was lawful and did not contravene the law as laid down by this court. The industrial court, in the present case, was certainly within its rights, to extend that pact for another year, for the very good reasons given by it for doing so. [11]

Thus, according to Subba Rao J, the tribunal had the jurisdiction to extend the agreement (providing for goodwill bonus) for another year, whereas, according to the majority, the tribunal did not have the jurisdiction. Profit Sharing Bonus: a profit sharing bonus is one of the main fringe benefits. Starting as a gratuitous payment, it has now become a statutory term of employment of a workman. The Payment of Bonus Act 1965, covers the subject-matter of payments and computation of the profit sharing bonus. Any dispute between the employer and his employees, regarding the payment of bonus under the Payment of Bonus Act, with respect to the application of that Act to an establishment in the public sector, is, by virtue of s 20 of that Act, to be deemed to be an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 2(k) of the IDA. For instance, an industrial dispute regarding 'payment of different amounts of bonus, in cash, to employees of the same company, in its different units' would be deemed to be an industrial dispute.[12]

The dissenting judgement of subba Rao J calls for some analysis. As rightly pointed out by Wanchoo J, the formula for calculating the available surplus was substantially different from the Full Bench Formula ('FBF'), and was devised and incorporated in an agreement reached by the parties much before the FBF became the law of the land. The said agreement was to be in operation for a period of five years. In the appeal, the power of tribunal extending the said agreement was challenged. Justice Subba Rao proceeded to deal with the issue on the sole ground that the tribunal had the power to extend an existing agreement and/or create new obligations, which was not disputed by the majority decision delivered by Wanchoo J. What was materially at issue was not so much the power of tribunal to extend an existing agreement as the very formula to be applied for arriving at the 'available surplus'. The said agreement between the parties differed from the FBF in three vital aspects, ie: (a) rehabilitation; (b) payment of bonus even when there is no available surplus and even when a mill had incurred loss; and (c) treating each year as a self-sufficient unit with no provision for set-on and set-off. That being the factual position, the Tribunal had no locus standi to extend the agreement for one more year, as it would prejudicially affect the interests of employers, given the fundamental fact that, for the purpose of computing 'profit-sharing bonus', it is only the accounting year which constitutes the unit, and not the performance of the company in the previous years. That apart, such extension of the agreement would run counter to the FBF to the detriment of the employer. This position is further buttressed by the fact that during the period, there was no provision for set on and set off of allocable surplus, and the courts accepted the principle of calculating bonus on the basis of gross profits and available surplus of each accounting year independent of any other factor.

The concern voiced by Subba Rao, J, for maintaining industrial peace was not a relevant factor and, at any rate, not at the cost and annihilation of one party in favour of the other. Once the FBF was approved by the Supreme Court its totality, which also prescribed the mode of computing gross profits and available surplus, any other formula that was in vogue and was repugnant to it should yield place to the one laid down by the Supreme Court in the larger interests of maintaining uniformity. The very fact that a staggering 58 Special Leave Petitions were filed against the tribunal's award shows the volatile character of 'bonus' and the magnitude of the issue involved. With great respect for the eminent judge, it is submitted that Subba Rao J, based his dissent on the narrow view of the 'power to extend existing agreements' and 'maintaining industrial peace', to the exclusion of other issues of vital significance, which alone had a bearing on the question of 'profit-sharing bonus'. His further observation at (4) above to the effect that 'the impugned five-year pact is not contrary to industrial law as laid down by this Court; indeed, it expressly followed the principles laid down in the Full Bench Formula which was subsequently affirmed by this Court' is equally misplaced and factually incorrect in the face of a glaring departure on three counts, as discussed above. The majority decision is right and that of Subba Rao J, wrong.

General Amenities

The provision for various welfare amenities to be made available to the working class, is enshrined in the Directive Principles of the State Policy in our Constitution, and in its application to the working class, it secures for them, just and humane conditions of work. But what these actually imply, cannot be specified in rigid terms for all times, because the concept of 'welfare' is necessarily dynamic, bearing a different interpretation from country to country and from time to time, and even in the same country, according to its value system, social institutions, degree of industrialisation and general level of social and economic development. Even within one country, its concept may be different from region to region.[13] According to the pre-independence notions, it could cover, apart from known amenities, items like housing, medical and educational facilities, cooperative societies, holidays with pay and social insurance measures.[14] The study team appointed by the Government of India in 1959, to examine the labour welfare activities then existing, divided the entire range of these activities into three groups, viz, (i) welfare within the precincts of an establishment-medical aid, crèches, canteens, supply of drinking water, etc, (ii) welfare outside the establishment-provision for indoor and outdoor recreation, housing, adult education, visual instruction, etc and (iii) social security. The committee of experts on welfare facilities for industrial workers, convened by the ILO in 1963, had divided welfare services into two groups, viz, (1) those within the precincts of the establishment and (2) those outside the establishment, which are reproduced as follows:

1. Welfare and amenities within the precincts of the establishment. (l) Latrines and urinals, (2) washing and bathing facilities, (3) crèches, (4) rest shelters and canteens, (5) arrangements for drinking water, (6) arrangements for prevention of fatigue, (7) health services, including occupational safety, (8) administrative arrangement within a plant, to look after welfare, (9) uniforms and protective clothing, and (10) shift allowance.
2. Welfare outside the establishment. (1) Maternity benefit, (2) Social insurance measures, including gratuity, pension, provident fund and rehabilitation, (3) benevolent funds, (4) medical facilities, including programmes for physical fitness and efficiency, family planning and child welfare, (5) education facilities, including adult education, (6) housing facilities, (7) recreation facilities, including sports, cultural activities, library and reading rooms, (8) holidays homes and leave travel facilities, (9) workers' co-operatives, including consumers' co-operative stores, fair price shops and co-operative thrift and credit societies, (10) vocational training for dependents of workers, (11) other programmes for the welfare of women, youth and children, and (12) transport to and from the place of work[15]

Though the provision of schools, canteens, crèches and recreation-homes, reading rooms, games, including indoor games, etc, have become a part of the amenities generally provided by the industries to the workmen, industrial adjudication has to take various facts into consideration before directing an employer to provide such facilities. In Dharangadhara, the demand that the employer should himself establish a school for the education of the children of the workmen, was rejected by the Supreme Court, as it was impossible to put a permanent structure for a school in the land where the industry was situated, particularly when there was a school already in existence, within a distance of three to four miles and furthermore, when the workmen were getting fair wages and the employer was not in a position to bear the burden of the cost of providing a school. In view of these facts, the court also rejected the demand of the workmen, for being provided with a recreation home with a canteen, a reading room and indoor games for their use.[16] In IGN Rly, the company had already provided canteen facilities to the workmen. But the industrial tribunal directed the company to improve and enlarge the arrangements and further, that the workers should be given wholesome food at prices lower than the prevailing market rates. The Supreme Court modified the award and applied the provisions of the Bengal Factory Rules 1949, which contained provisions on the question of accommodation to be provided in r 67 and provisions as regards the prices to be charged in r 69 in ch V, and directed the company accordingly.[17]

Retiral Benefits

Retiral benefits, such as provident fund, gratuity and pension schemes, have been common in certain governmental employments. Such schemes were also introduced for their employees, by certain enlightened employers. In addition to such benefits, the Industrial Disputes Act also makes statutory provisions for compensation on the termination of the service of an employee by way of retrenchment, on a transfer or closure of an undertaking. Such social security measures have introduced an element of stability and protection in the midst of the stress and strains of modern industrial life. In this connection, the following observations of the national commission on labour are noteworthy:

> It is a major aspect of public policy today and the extent of its prevalence is a measure of the progress made by a country towards the ideal of a welfare state ... social security envisages that the members of a community shall be protected by collective action, against social risks causing undue hardship and privation to individuals, whose private resources can seldom be adequate to meet them. It covers, through an appropriate organisation, certain risks to which a person is exposed. These risks are such that an individual of small means cannot effectively provide for them by his own ability or foresight alone, or even in private combination with his colleagues. The concept of social security is based on the ideals of human dignity and social justice. The underlying ideal behind social security measures is that a citizen who has contributed or is likely to contribute to his country's welfare, should be given protection against certain hazards.[18]

Provident Fund

The provision of provident fund has also been recognised as a term of condition of employment, for industrial workmen. Legislative measures have imposed the requirements of creating a provident fund, on the employers and employees statutorily, in certain types of industries. But in the industries where these statutes do not apply, the provision for provident fund schemes by industrial adjudication on the lines of the Employees' Provident Fund Act, has become almost a normal feature.[19] However, in such cases, the provident fund schemes can only be awarded, if the establishment has the financial capacity to bear the burden. In introducing a retrial benefit like a provident fund scheme, industrial adjudication has, therefore, to consider first and foremost, the financial capacity of the employer to bear the burden imposed. For this purpose, the adjudicator has also to take into account, the future prospects of the concern.[20] But the burden of proof to show that the employer does not have the financial capacity, is on the employer. In other words, it is for the employer to show, by adducing the relevant evidence, that the liability imposed by the introduction of the provident fund scheme is excessive and is beyond his paying capacity. After ascertaining the financial capacity of the employer, he has further to consider the practice prevailing in the other comparable units of the same industry in the region.[21]

French Motor Car, provides an instance where the Supreme Court curtailed the unwarranted enhancement made by the tribunal in the rate of the provident fund contribution to be made by the employer. The company had a scheme of provident fund under which the rate of contribution by the employer was 8½ per cent of the basic pay. But, on the Employees' Provident Fund Act 1952 and the Employees' Provident Fund Scheme 1952 being applied to the motor car industries in 1960, the company changed the rate to 6¼ per cent of the gross earnings, ie, basic pay plus dearness allowance, in accordance with the Act and the scheme. The tribunal fixed the employers' contribution at eight per cent of the gross earning, ie, basic wage plus dearness allowance. The only reason given by the tribunal for raising the contribution was that such a rate was, recommended by the technical committee some time before the award after a thorough study of the problem from all points of view as being fit for adoption by well-established and prosperous concerns like the company, and, legislation on the lines of the committee's recommendations, was under contemplation. While modifying the award fixing the rate of contribution at 6¼ per centum of the gross earnings (basic pay plus dearness allowance), Wanchoo J observed:

> ... but the fact remains that no law has so far been made, making any change in the rate of contribution. We see no reason why simply because some recommendation, which is still to be implemented, has been made by a committee, that the contribution should be increased to eight per centum in the case of the appellant company only, when the general rate is only 6 per cent per centum. [22]

Gratuity

In the early stages of industrial adjudication, gratuity was treated as a gift of payment, gratuitously made by an employer to his employees at his pleasure and the workman had no right to claim it. But gradually gratuity came to be treated as a term of employment and industrial adjudication started treating it as a reward paid to the workmen for the long, good, efficient, faithful and meritorious service rendered by them to the employer, for a fairly substantial and long period.[23] It came to be regarded as a legitimate claim which the industrial workmen could make and which, in appropriate cases, might give rise to an industrial dispute. Thus, industrial jurisprudence came to recognise gratuity as some sort of retrial benefit available to an employee, for his long and continuous meritorious service.[24] The object of so providing a gratuity scheme was to provide a retiring benefit to workmen, who had rendered a long and unblemished service to the employer and thereby, contributed to his prosperity. It is one of the efficiency devices and is considered necessary for an 'orderly and humane elimination' from industry, of superannuated or disabled employees who, but for such retiring benefit, would continue in employment even though they function in-efficiently.[25] The general principle underlying gratuity was that by virtue of the length of their service, workmen were entitled to claim a certain amount as their retiral benefit.[26] But, since the Parliament passed the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972, which comprehensively covers the law relating to gratuity, most of these decisions do not hold the field. A detailed discussion of the subject of gratuity is beyond the scope of this work.

Retrenchment Compensation

Section 25F makes a provision for the payment of compensation to industrial employees when their services are terminated by way of retrenchment, on their becoming surplusage. Section 25FF makes provision for a similar compensation being paid to the workmen, on the transfer of the undertaking from one employer to another, Likewise, s 25FFF makes a provision for the payment of similar compensation to workmen, on the closure of the undertaking of the employer. Compensation under these provisions has been made a statutory term of employment or condition of labour of the industrial employees. For a detailed discussion, see the notes and comments under those sections.

Pension

Like the provident fund, pension is also a measure of security for old age, inability and death of the bread-winner. The provident fund is not an adequate cover. for the contingencies of death and inability. Hence, in certain industries, where the financial capacity permits, the employers introduce pension schemes for providing such security to their workmen. A scheme of pension is different in scope and content from a provident fund scheme and a gratuity scheme. A provident fund scheme postulates a certain amount of contribution by the employer and equivalent amount of contribution by the employee, payable on his retirement or death. A pension is a periodic payment of a stated sum. These schemes have much in common, as they are all 'efficiency devices', and are considered necessary for an 'orderly and humane elimination' from industry, of superannuated or disabled employees. A single judge of the Assam and Nagaland High Court held that after the scheme has been brought into force by an employer, it is no longer a matter of bounty and the scheme has to be enforced and the management cannot refuse pension as a condition of service to the retired employees. A mere mention of certain period in the hypothetical illustration contained in the scheme, for the purpose of calculation and computation of pension, did not limit the time regarding the pension, and from that it could not be inferred that, the scheme was not for life.[27]

Miscellaneous Service Conditions

It is not permissible for an industrial establishment to have two sets of Standing Orders to govern the relevant terms and conditions of the service of its employees. Such a change would not be permissible under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, even if the proposed changes do not affect the existing rights of the employees.[28] The condition of service, that an unmarried woman in a particular department, has to resign on her marriage, was held to be unreasonable and was abrogated in the interests of social justice.[29] On the facts of the under-noted case,[30] certain workmen who were not given employment in a particular season in a sugar factory, as provided in the relevant Standing Orders, were held to be entitled to the compensation awarded by the labour court, and were also entitled to preferred for employment, in the succeeding seasons, over those to whom compensation had been awarded by the labour court, subject, however, in the instance of a preference being given to the workmen to whom compensation had been awarded, over new men, in case such workmen applied for employment in the succeeding seasons. The demand of the workmen that the office-bearers of a trade union should not be transferred, so long as they are office-bearers, can be the subject-matter of an industrial dispute, as it is intimately connected with the conditions of service.[31] Similarly, a dispute relating to a change of the designations of employees and increase of the pay-scales, relate to the terms of employment.[32] 'The badli workmen have no right to claim to be made permanent.[33] The deployment or reduction of cabin crew complement, as also the matter of standard force or pattern of crew scheduling in an airline service, is essentially a managerial function and cannot be interfered with in industrial adjudication.[34] A concession given to some workmen to do full time work for the trade union, will not constitute a term of employment or condition of labour. Nor will it fall within the meaning of item 8 of Sch, IV of the Act.[35] Likewise, duty relief granted to an office-bearer of a trade union, would not constitute a condition of service.[36] A dispute as to who is the elected President of a trade union of workmen, will not fall within the ambit of the definition of an 'industrial dispute', because it is not connected with the employment or non-employment or terms of employment or with the condition of labour of any person. Such a dispute is for the civil court to decide.[37]

'Any Person'

The expression 'any person', in the end of the definition of an 'industrial dispute', is not subject to any qualification, restriction or limitation as to its scope. The word 'person' has not been limited to 'workman', nor is it co-extensive with 'any workman', potential or otherwise. Though the expression must receive a more general meaning, it cannot mean

'anybody or everybody in this wide world'. If the expression is given its ordinary meaning, then the definition will become inconsistent with the objects and other provisions of the Act and also the other parts of the definition itself. The requirement of the definition, that the dispute must relate to the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour of 'any person', necessarily, therefore, imports a limitation in the sense that a 'person' in respect of whom the employer-employee relation never existed or can never exist, cannot be the subject-matter of an industrial dispute between the employer and the workmen.[38] It, therefore, cannot include an outsider.[39] In other words, it does not mean any person unconnected with the disputants in relation to which the dispute is not of the kind described in the definition. It is not the intention of the legislature to create a situation where, though the dispute does not concern them in the least, workmen are entitled to fight it out on behalf of the 'non-workmen'.[40]

In NK Sen, Chagla CJ of the Bombay High Court illustrated the absurdity of construing these words without any limitation or qualification, whatsoever, and expounded the crucial test of direct and substantial interest of the workmen in the employment, non-employment or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour of the person concerned and further observed that in the absence of such interest, no industrial dispute could be raised with regard to such a person. The dispute, in this case, arose out of the dismissal of the medical officer of a tea estate, who was not a workman as defined in s 2(s). From the context of the definition of 'industrial dispute' and its setting in the Act, the court applied limitations on the construction of the expression 'any person', in the sense that a person in respect of whom the employer-employee relation never existed or can never possibly exist, cannot be the subject-matter of a dispute between the employers and the workmen. It was, therefore, held that 'any person' in the definition clause, means a person in whose employment or non-employment, terms of employment, or conditions of labour, the workmen as a class, have a direct and substantial interest—with whom they have, under the scheme of the Act, a community of interest. It is the community of interest of the class as a whole—the class of employers or class of workmen—which furnishes the clear nexus between the dispute and the parties to the dispute, it was observed that in cases where a party to the dispute is composed of aggrieved workmen themselves and the subject-matter of the dispute relates to them or any of them, they clearly have a direct interest in the dispute. Likewise, where a party to the dispute, composed of workmen espousing the cause of another person, whose employment or non-employment etc, may prejudicially affect their interest, the workmen have a substantial interest in the subject-matter of the dispute. In both such cases, the dispute is an industrial dispute.[41] Thus, the majority not only approved the view of the Bombay High Court, but also, on its own reasoning, reached the same conclusion by approaching the question from a somewhat different standpoint. On a review of the earlier decisions of the labour' appellate tribunal and various High Courts, the court stressed that the crucial test is one of community of interest with the concerned person, and subjected the construction of the expression 'any person' to the following two limitations:

> (1) The dispute must be a real dispute between the parties to the dispute (indicated in the first two parts of the definition clause) so as to be capable of settlement or adjudication by one party to the dispute, giving the necessary relief to the other; and
>
> (2) The person regarding whom the dispute is raised, must be one in whose employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour, (as the case may be) the parties to the dispute have a direct or substantial interest.[42]

In the absence of such direct and substantial interest, the dispute cannot be said to be a real dispute between the parties. The person with respect to whom a dispute is raised by the workmen, must be one in whose employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour, the workmen as a class, have a direct or substantial interest, though he need not be, strictly speaking, a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) of the Act. The majority decision in the Dimakuchi Tea Estate case was approved by a larger Bench of five judges of the Supreme Court, in Dahingeapara Tea Estate.[43] In Kays Construction, the court reiterated that the expression 'industrial dispute' is wide enough to cover a dispute raised by the employer's workmen in regard to the non-employment of others, also who may not be his workmen at the material time.[44] In Standard Vacuum, it was held that the workmen had a community of interest with the employees of the contractor and they had also a substantial interest in the subject-matter of the dispute, in the sense that the class to which they belonged, namely, workmen, was substantially affected thereby and the company could give relief in the matter.[45] In Bombay Union of Journalists, the court elucidated that the 'community of interest' must be regarding a direct or substantial interest, viz, that the workmen who seek to support the cause of a person, must themselves be directly and substantially interested in the dispute. But what a direct and substantial interest is, would depend on the facts and circumstances of each particular case.[46] In Reserve Bank of India, on the construction of the word 'person' in s 2(k), Hidayatullah J, held:

> It may, however, be said that if the dispute is regarding employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour of non-workmen, in which workmen are themselves vitally interested, the workmen may be able to raise an industrial dispute. Workmen can, for example, raise a dispute that a class of employees, not within the definition of workmen, should be recruited by promotion from workmen. When they do so, the workmen raise a dispute about the terms of their own employment, > though incidentally, the terms of those who are not workmen, are involved. But workmen cannot take up a dispute in respect of a class of employees who are not workmen and in whose terms of employment those workmen have no direct interest of their own. What direct interest suffices is a question of fact, but it must be a real and positive interest and not fanciful or remote.[47]

In Greaves Cotton, Jaganmohan Reddy J observed:

> The consistent view of this court is that non-workmen as well as workmen, can raise a dispute in respect of matters affecting their employment, conditions of service etc, where they have a community of interest provided they are direct and are not remote.

This statement of law is not only vague, but is positively wrong and runs counter to the spirit of the ID Act and the earlier decisions of the Court. In Andhra Bank, an industrial dispute raised by the clerical staff of the bank, who were workmen, relating to the grade III officers, was referred for adjudication. Their grievance was that the promotion made to the category of grade III officers, who were, admittedly, non-workmen, by fitment, was discriminatory. Reversing the holding of the single judge, the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that while raising a dispute about the terms of their own employment, though incidentally, the terms of employment of the grade III officers (who were not workmen) were also involved, the clerical staff were not agitating for a revision of the pay scales of the grade III officers. The clerical staff, therefore, had a direct interest in the matter, for their next stage of promotion, to the category of grade III officers by fitment. In the circumstances, the dispute was validly raised and referred.[48] In Indian Bank, the facts were: by an agreement between the bank and the union, the bank was bound to fill a fixed percentage of the posts of officers from amongst the clerical cadre staff. The bank promoted certain members of its clerical cadre staff as officers and posted them in its branches. These officers were not allowed the benefit of two additional increments, which were, however, given to the officers of the same grade, who were not promoted from the clerical cadre staff. This discrimination led to a dispute, between the bank and its workmen, which culminated in a reference of the dispute for adjudication. The tribunal over-ruled the preliminary objection of the bank that the dispute was not an industrial dispute, because the officers whose terms of employment were disputed before it, were not 'workmen'. In writ proceedings, the High Court discountenanced the contention of the employer that the dispute could not be an 'industrial dispute' because it related to the conditions of service of the employees who were non-workmen out and out, and held that the workmen who raised the dispute were really fighting for their own conditions of service ie, the conditions of service which would obtain for them when they would be promoted as officers. Accordingly, the interest of the workmen in the determination of the conditions of service of the promotee officers, was neither remote nor unsubstantial, but was direct and vital in view of the fact that a fixed percentage of the higher posts had to go to them. The court further observed that Andhra Bank was based on a misunderstanding of the dicta of the Supreme Court. But the person in whose employment or non-employment etc, the workmen are directly or substantially interested, must be a definite person. Logically, there can be no interest of the workmen in indefinite or vague persons.[49]

In Hindustan Lever, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that there can be no interest or nexus between the workmen and the vacancies resulting from resignations or retirements of the employees under the management. Such interest in filling up the vacancies, was 'fanciful or remote' and was in no sense, direct. The dispute raised by the workmen relating to the filling up of such vacancies, was abstract and amorphous.[50] The Act has used the expression 'any person' and not 'any post', and the workmen could not fight a battle for those nonexistent persons, who might or might not be appointed by the management to the vacant posts. On the other hand, a single judge of the Madras High Court, held that a dispute relating to the fixing of a ratio between the heirs and dependents of the workmen, and the outsiders, in the matter of recruitment, would constitute an industrial dispute, because the workmen as a class, have a substantial community of interest in the employment of their heirs and dependents.[51] In other words, the heirs and dependents of the workmen would fall within the ambit of the expression 'any person'. Therefore, the dispute is an 'industrial dispute'. If this holding is correct, then a demand by the workmen, that nobody other than the heirs or dependents should be employed, would also fall within the ambit of an 'industrial' dispute, which will lead to a logical absurdity. Furthermore, the heirs and dependents of the workmen cannot be definite persons, in whose employment or non-employment, at the time of making the demand of fixing the ratio, the workmen could have been interested. The dispute, therefore, was relating to the employment or non-employment of vague and non-existent persons. This decision is clearly wrong. It was for the employer to plead and prove that there was no 'community of interest' between the person concerned and the other workmen of his establishment, in order to establish that the dispute or question was not an 'industrial dispute' but on general principles of pleading and evidence, the burden of proof should be on the workmen, to show that they have a 'community of interest' with the person concerned, for bringing the dispute within the purview of the definition of an industrial dispute.[52]

Illustrations

A tea estate was sold as a going concern and the purchaser continued to employ the labour and some members of the staff of the vendor. The dispute raised by such workmen, regarding the discharged workmen, was held to be an industrial dispute, as the discharged workmen were the persons in whose employment or non-employment, the actual workmen of the purchaser of the estate, had a direct and substantial interest, though the discharged workmen were not, strictly speaking, workmen of the purchaser.[53] A proprietary business was taken over by a private limited company, in which the former proprietor, his wife and the former manager became directors. The new company refused to take into service, certain workmen employed by the former concern. The dispute raised by the workmen of the company with respect to the non-employment of the workmen of the previous concern, was held to be a dispute in connection with the non-employment of the persons in whose employment and non-employment, the workmen of the company had a direct and substantial interest.[54] The workmen employed in Standard Vacuum Refining Co, raised a dispute that the contract system of labour, adopted by the company, for the cleaning and maintenance of the refinery (plant and machinery) belonging to the company, should be abolished. It was held that, though the persons working under the contractor were not the workmen of the company, the workmen of the company had a real and substantial interest in the question of the employment of contract labour for the work of the company.[55] A dispute between the workmen of a company managed by a managing agency company, regarding the promotion of a person employed as an assistant factory supervisor in another company, managed by the same managing agency company, was held to be an industrial dispute, because the workmen raising the dispute had a real and substantial interest in the dispute, as there was a common register of the employees, for the purposes of granting promotion to the senior most workmen in the common register.[56] A claim put up on behalf of the retrenched employees of an establishment, for additional bonus, was held to be an industrial dispute, because the workmen had a direct and substantial interest in the matter of such bonus being paid in future, to the retrenched workmen.[57] A dispute regarding the employment of casual workmen, taken up by the regular workmen employed in an establishment, was held to be an industrial dispute, as the workmen had a community of interest with the cause of the casual workmen.[58] The cause of a dismissed member of the clerical staff, ie, a time-keeper, in a textile mill, espoused by other non-staff workmen, through their union was held to have assumed the character of an industrial dispute, notwithstanding the fact that the workmen who espoused the cause were not members of the clerical union, because such workmen had a community of interest with the dismissed workman.[59]

In Mukand Ltd, the brief facts, to the extent they are relevant to the present discussion, were: The company concluded a Settlement with Mukand Staff and Officers Association in 1974 whereby the welfare scheme framed for the staff and officers, jointly funded and managed by the company and the Association did not create any condition of service. Admittedly, it appears that the Association is a composite union of employees who answer to the definition of 'workman' and a few other employees, who did not strictly fall within the ambit of the said definition. The company concluded a Settlement in 1982 covering service conditions of all staff and officers including those in grades 01 and 00, and another settlement in 1989, which inter alia stipulated:

> It is the Company's contention that a substantial number of the staff, not being 'workmen' under Section 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (hereinafter referred to as 'the Act') are not covered by the provisions of the Act. Without prejudice to the rights and contentions of both the parties with regard to the applicability of the provisions of the Act, the parties have reached a comprehensive Settlement covering in addition to the demands made in the said 'Charter of Demands', the issue of annual bonus as well, under Sections 12(3) and 18(3) of the Act read with Rule 62 of the Industrial Disputes (Bombay) Rules, 1957 in conciliation proceedings on the following terms. ...This Settlement did not cover employees in Grade 01 and 00 who are General Foremen or Senior Officers and Asstt. General Foremen or Officers. (Italics supplied)

The disposition of the management towards the Association and the quality of drafting manifested in the above settlement, which are considered critical in the overall management of industrial relations in an undertaking, are not being dealt with here. What is relevant for the topic under discussion is that on 4 November 1991, the Association served a Charter of Demands on the Company. Failure report was submitted by Conciliation Officer followed by reference by the Government of Maharashtra on 17 February 1993, which ran thus:

> ...Whereas the Government of Maharashtra has considered the report submitted by the Conciliation Officer under sub-section (4) of Section 12 ... in respect of the dispute between M/s Mukand Ltd. ... and the workmen employed under them, over the demands mentioned in the schedule appended hereto. ... after considering the aforesaid report is satisfied that there is a case for reference to the dispute to an Industrial Tribunal....[60] (Italics supplied).

Before the tribunal, the management contended that, barring a few employees, the bulk of them were not 'workmen' as defined in s 2(s) and that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to grant any relief to the employees who fell outside the scope of the said definition. Despite this, the tribunal proceeded to pass the award covering all the grades, ie, Grade 12 to Grade 01

& 00 (in the ascending order, the Grades 01 & 00 representing General Foremen/Senior Officers and Asst General Foremen/Officers), directing the company to pay (i) an ad hoc amount to Rs 500/- per month to all employees in Grades 12 to 00; and (ii) by its interim Award Part-II, directed payment of employees on the basis of basic pay slab an ad hoc amount ranging from Rs 375/- to Rs 1050/- per month to employees who had not been granted additional ad hoc payment by the appellant-Company. After prolonged litigation in the High Court, the matter landed in the Supreme Court. Quashing the orders of the lower courts and remanding the matter to the tribunal with a direction to adjudicate the matter in accordance with law, Dr Lakshmanan J (for self and Sabharwal J), held:

> The dispute referred to by the order of Reference is only in respect of workmen employed by the appellant-Company. It is, therefore, clear that the Tribunal, being a creature of the Reference, cannot adjudicate matters not within the purview of the dispute actually referred to it by the order of Reference. In the facts and circumstances of the present case, the Tribunal could not have adjudicated the issues of the salaries of the employees who are not workmen under the Act nor could it have covered such employees by its award. Even assuming, without admitting, that the Reference covered the non-workmen, the Tribunal, acting within its jurisdiction under the Act, could not have adjudicated the dispute insofar as it related to the 'non-workmen'. ... In the instant case, the employer and the employees by their conduct in concluding settlements in the past could not create for, or confer upon, an adjudicating authority jurisdiction, where none existed, in respect of employees to whom the provisions of the Act are not applicable. This apart, the employer had not waived his right to raise the issue of the status of the employees under the Act in any of these settlements. The employer cannot held (sic) to have waived his rights regarding the issue of the status of the employees under the Act in the absence of any of the settlements concluded by them with their employees. The High Court has come to the conclusion that there are grave and fundamental errors, including the errors in assessing financial capacity, burden etc. in the award of the Tribunal. ... The Division Bench has erred in holding that there is a community of interest between the workmen and the non-workmen and holding further that the workmen can raise a dispute regarding the service conditions of non-workmen. This reasoning, in the absence of any pleading regarding the community of interest, is fallacious. (Paras 23 & 49) (Italics supplied).

It is submitted that this case was rightly decided. The tribunal, while adjudicating the dispute, lost sight of the essential features of the case, and proceeded to decide the issue relating to 'non-workmen', who clearly fall outside the pale of ID Act, thereby exceeding its legitimate confines.

'Industry' and 'Industrial Dispute'

The statutory definition of an 'industrial dispute' makes no mention as to the purpose that an industrial dispute must have. But union affairs and activities have revealed that though certain types of disputes may be urged as falling within the ambit of 'industrial dispute', yet, they cannot be treated as 'industrial disputes'. To meet such cases, the courts have, in effect, established that the word 'industrial' in the phrase 'industrial dispute', implies that a dispute connected with the 'terms and conditions' or the questions of employment of any person is an industrial dispute only if it relates to an 'industry'. In other words, the definition discloses that disputes of particular kinds alone are regarded as industrial disputes. It may be noticed that the definition of 'industrial dispute' does not refer to an 'industry'. But an industrial dispute, on the grammar of the expression itself, means a dispute in an industry.[61] Moreover, the expressions 'employers' and 'workmen' used in the definition of 'industrial dispute', carry the requirements of an 'industry' in that definition by virtue of their own definitions in ss 2(g) and 2(s) of the Act.[62] The definition of 'industrial dispute', therefore, pre-supposes the continued existence of the industry.[63] In Madras Gymkhana, Hidayatullah J held that the adjective 'industrial' in the definition of 'industrial dispute', relates the dispute to an 'industry, as defined in s 2(j) of the Act, "industry is the nexus between employers and employees and it is this nexus, which brings two distinct bodies together". The learned judge further observed:

> Primarily, therefore, industrial disputes occur when the operation undertaken rests upon the co-operation between employers and employees, with a view to production and distribution of material goods, in other words, wealth, but they may also arise in cases where the co-operation is to produce material services. The normal cases are those in which the production or distribution is of material goods or wealth and they will fall within the expressions 'trade', 'business' and 'manufacture'. [64]

It, therefore, follows that before an 'industrial dispute' can be raised between employers and employers or between employers and their workmen or between workmen and workmen, in relation to the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour of any person, there must first be established a relationship of employer and employees associating together, the former following a trade, business, manufacture, undertaking or a calling of employers, in the production of material goods and material services and the latter following any calling, service, employment, handicraft or industrial occupation or avocation of workmen, in aid of the employer's enterprise.[65] In other words, besides the requirements of s 2(k), unless the dispute is related to an 'industry' as defined in s 2 (j), it will not be an industrial dispute.

Clause (ka): INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENT OR UNDERTAKING

General

The expression 'industrial establishment', 'undertaking' and 'industry', have been synonymously used at various places in the Act. The expression, was not defined in the Act. The expression 'undertaking' occurs in ss 25FF, 25FFA, 25FFF, 25-O and 25R. Section 25F uses the word 'industry', while s 25G uses the word 'industrial establishment'. Since these two sections are cognate, the word 'industrial establishment' as used in s 25G, has to be understood to mean an 'industry' as used in s 25F. The term 'industry', as defined in s 2(j) of the Act includes, inter alia, an 'undertaking'. Thus 'undertaking' is a narrower concept than 'industry'. In other words, 'industry' is a whole of which an 'undertaking' may be a part. The expression 'undertaking' as used in the definition of 'industry' was given a restricted meaning in Bangalore water Supply.[66] Thus, reading down this expression as used in the context of s 25FFF, it must mean, a 'separate and distinct business or commercial or trading or industrial activity'. In Hindustan Steel, the court pointed out that the word 'undertaking', as used in s 25FFF, appears to have been used in its ordinary sense, connoting thereby, 'any work, enterprise, project or business undertaking'. It is not intended to cover the entire 'industry' or business of the employer.[67] A closure or stoppage of a part of the business or activity of the employer would seem, in law, to be covered by this sub-section. The question, however, is to be decided on the facts of each case. But the expression 'undertaking' cannot comprehend an infinitesimally small part of a manufacturing process.[68] The present definition brings in the ambit of an 'industrial establishment' or 'undertaking', any establishment or undertaking in which any 'industry', as defined in s 2(j), is carried on. Thus, it is the character of an activity as an 'industry', which brings any establishment or undertaking within the ambit of the definition. What was hitherto implicit has now been made explicit by this definition.

Proviso

The proviso contemplates multifarious activities of certain establishments or undertakings, some of which may be comprehended within the definition of 'industry' and some of which may not. In the circumstances:

(a) where the activities of any unit of such establishment or undertaking, which is an 'industry', is severable from the other units of the establishment or undertaking which are not 'industry', such unit shall be deemed to be a separate 'industrial establishment or undertaking', while the rest of the units will not fall within the definition of an 'industrial establishment or undertaking'. For instance, the activities of a university, which may be an establishment or undertaking, being education, will not fall within the definition of industrial establishment or undertaking. But if the University carries on a transport service and also maintains a workshop for the up-keep and repairs of the buses, the unit carrying on the transport activity will be an 'industrial establishment or undertaking', for the purposes of this clause.

(b) if the predominant activity or each of the predominant activities carried on by an establishment or undertaking is an 'industry' and the other activities carried on by such undertaking or establishment are not severable from the predominant activity, the entire establishment or undertaking shall be deemed to be an industrial establishment or undertaking.

Clause (kk): INSURANCE COMPANY

To fall within the meaning of this definition, an 'insurance company' has to satisfy the following two requirements:

(i) It should be an insurance company as defined in section 2 of the Insurance Act 1938 (4 of 1938), and

(ii) it should have branches or other establishments in more than one state.

Clause (kka): KHADI

This clause has been inserted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[69] It assigns the same meaning to the expression 'khadi' as in cl (d) of s 2 of the Khadi and Village Industries Commission Act 1956, which reads:

> 'Khadi' means any cloth woven on handlooms in India from cotton, silk or woollen yarn handspun in India or from a mixture of any two or all of such yarns;

Clause (kkb): LABOUR COURT

This clause has been renumbered as cl (kkb) by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[70]Labour courts are constituted under s 7 of the Act. There may be one or more of such courts in a state. The Second Schedule to the Act specifies the matters within the jurisdiction of the labour courts. But by the first proviso to sub-s (1) of s 10, the 'appropriate Government' has been given the discretion to refer any matter in the Third Schedule also, to a labour court, where the dispute is likely to affect more than one hundred workmen. Besides, the 'appropriate Government' has also been vested with the power to assign certain other functions, to labour courts under the Act. Section 33C(2) confers jurisdiction on such labour courts, as may be specified in this behalf, to determine the amount of any benefit, which is capable of being computed in terms of money. Like industrial tribunals or national tribunals, labour courts are quasi-judicial bodies. Their functions, powers and duties are also similar to those of industrial tribunals or national tribunals.

Clause (kkk): LAY-OFF

The Concept of Lay-off

Under the common law, an employer can terminate the services of an employee at any time, even though his business or his industry may only be temporarily stopped and there is every prospect of a resumption of that business or industry. There is no obligation upon the employer to temporarily, suspend the services of his employee and reinstate him when his business or industry is resumed. He is perfectly free to dismiss him and employ new men when the business or industry was resumed. Nor does the common law impose any obligation upon the employer, to give any compensation to an employee, if his services are retrenched.[71] But now the industrial law has made inroads in the common law right of the employer. Though the Act, as originally enacted, did not contain a definition of 'lay-off', the term 'lay-off' was well-recognised in the industrial arena and disputes were often raised in relation to a 'lay-off' of workmen, in various industries. Industrial adjudicators sometimes awarded compensation for the period of 'lay-off'. But many a time, when the 'lay-off' was found to be justified, workmen were not awarded wage-compensation.[72]

In Gaya Cotton Mills, the labour appellate tribunal refused to award compensation, because the Standing Orders of the company provided that the company could, under certain circumstances, stop any machine or machines or department or departments, wholly or partially, for any period or periods, without notice or without compensation in lieu of notice.[73]Even where a compensation for the 'lay-off' was awarded, there was no uniformity. In order to ameliorate the difficulties of workmen who were laid-off in such situations, the legislature made a provision for the payment of compensation for the 'lay-off' period and also defined 'lay-off' by inserting this clause in s 2 of the Act, by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1953 (Act 43 of 1953). The provision for compensation to workmen for the 'lay-off' period was made by s 25C in ch VA inserted by the Amending Act. However, s 25A exempts 'industrial establishments' employing less than fifty workmen and establishments of seasonal character or establishments in which the work is performed only intermittently, from the application of the provisions of s 25C to 25 E. The Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1976 (Act 32 of 1976) 'has engrafted ch VB in the Act, which not only narrows down the definition of 'lay-off' as applicable to the industrial establishments covered by that chapter but also subjects a 'lay-off' to certain stringent conditions in such establishments.

Failure, Refusal or Inability - Meaning and Implications

In its etymological sense, a 'lay-off' is a 'period during which a workman is temporarily discharged'. In other words, even according to the dictionary meaning, 'lay-off' means to discontinue work or activity: to dismiss or discharge temporarily. When workers are in employment and they are 'laid-off', that immediately results in their unemployment, however temporary, and such unemployment will fall within the definition of a 'lay-off'.[74] But in its statutory sense, it is not a temporary discharge. It means the 'failure, refusal or inability' of the employer, on account of shortage of coal, power or raw materials, or the accumulations of stock, a breakdown of machinery, or for any other reason, to give employment to a workman.[75] The key to understand the definition is to be found in the words 'failure, refusal or inability of an employer'. From these words, it is clear that the unemployment has to be on account of a cause which is independent of any action or inaction on the part of the workmen.[76] Further, the unemployment must result from a failure, refusal or inability of an employer, on account of the causes enumerated in the definition.[77] 'Lay-off' means the failure, refusal or inability of the employer, to give employment to his workmen, on account of the contingencies mentioned in the definition. It is neither a temporary discharge of a workman, nor a temporary suspension of his contract of service. It is merely a fact of a temporary unemployment of the workmen, in the work of the industrial establishment.[78] Under the general law of master and servant, an employer may discharge his employee, either temporarily or permanently, but that cannot be done without adequate notice. A mere refusal or inability to give employment to a workman, when he returns for duty, on one or more grounds mentioned in this definition, is not a temporary discharge of the workman.

(i) On Account of Shortage of Coal, Power etc

In order to attract the definition of a lay-off, the temporary unemployment must be on account of a shortage of coal, power or raw materials, or the accumulation of stocks, or a break down of machinery. These are the specific causes for which the failure, refusal or inability of the employer to give work to the workmen may the justified and termed as a 'lay-off'.[79] By the Amending Act 46 of 1982,[80] the factor of vis major has been introduced by the use of the words 'natural calamity' to the already specified causes. Now causes such as fire, floods and earthquakes are also comprehended in the definition.

(ii) For Any Other Connected Reason

The Amending Act 46 of 1982, has substituted the words 'for any other connected reason', for the words 'for any other reasons'. The use of the words 'any other reason' indicates that it was not the intention of the legislature to bring within the definition, every possible circumstance which could result in the unemployment of the workers. The Bombay High Court, in Central India Spg, though expressed the view that the words 'or for any other reason' should be limited or restricted for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the Act, further observed that:

> If, in point of fact, the 'lay-off' was occasioned because of strikes or go-slow tactics or absenteeism of workers in other section of the mill on which the particular section in which some workers were 'laid-off', was dependent, then their 'laying-off' could not be deemed to fall within the definition of section 2(kkk) of the Act.[81]

But construing the words 'any other reason', the Supreme Court applied the principle of ejusdem generis in Kairbetta, where it observed that:

> Any other reason to which the definition refers must ..., be a reason which is allied or analogous to the reasons already specified' and 'if there is a strike or slowing down of production in one part of the establishment and if lay-off is the consequence, the reason for which 'lay-off' has taken place, would undoubtedly be similar to the reason specified in the definition.[82]

These observations by implication, overruled the holding of the Bombay High Court in Central India Spinning. Even on the plain reading of the language of the definition, read with s 25E(iii), the view of the Bombay High Court is untenable. However, the question as to whether the expression 'any other reason' used in the definition would include a case of 'lay-off' effected on account of the difficulties of the employer to secure financial assistance, was left undecided in Dewan Tea Estate.[83] The financial crisis faced by the employer, on account of the refusal of the Government to develop its land and sell it, is absolutely irrelevant for effecting a 'lay-off'. But a single judge of the Madras High Court has taken the view that a temporary stoppage of roving bobbins to the weaving unit of a textile mill, pending the dismantling of the preparatory machines at the mills and the installation of the same at such unit, amounted to a 'lay-off as the reason was allied to or analogous with the other specific reasons mentioned in the definition.[84]The Act 46 of 1982 has made explicit what was implicit in the definition, by the use of the words 'any other connected reason'. The reason for a 'lay-off' must be connected with a reason specified in the definition. Since the financial difficulties of the employer cannot be one of the causes connected with any of the enumerated causes, it will not fall within the ambit of the definition. The Madhya Pradesh High Court, in Hope Textiles, held that a financial contingency is not a cause for which a 'lay-off' could be imposed.[85] The Gauhati High Court held that the old age or illness of the managing director, is not a permissible ground for a lay-off.[86] In SAE Mazdoor Union, a single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the application for a lay-off, on account of 'lack of adequate orders' would fall within the scope of 'connected reasons', and the continuance of production, would only lead to an accumulation of stocks, and that it furnished a sufficient ground for the labour commissioner to consider for, the grant of permission.[87]

Explanation

The explanation introduces a fiction in the definition, according to which, every workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of the industrial establishment and who presents himself for work at the establishment at the time appointed for the purpose, during the normal hours on any day and is not given employment by the employer within two hours of his presenting himself, shall be deemed to have been 'laid-off' for the day. The explanation along with the two provisos, contains three deeming provisions. The first is that if a worker who has presented himself for work at the commencement, is not given employment within two hours of his presenting himself, he will be deemed to have been laid off for the entire day. The second part of this explanation provides that if the workman, instead of being given employment at the commencement of the shift, is asked to present himself for work during the second half of the shift and is given employment in the second half, he shall be deemed to have been 'laid-off' only for the first half of the day. The third part of the explanation provides that if a workman is not given work even after presenting himself at the commencement of the second half of the shift, he shall not be deemed to have been laid-off and he shall be entitled to full basic wages and dearness allowance for that second half.[88]

A perusal of the definition, together with the explanation, merely shows that it lays down the circumstances in which a 'lay-off' can come about, but without limiting it to any particular period of time. The three deeming provisions in the explanation, with regard to the mode of calculation of the period of 'lay-off', would either be independent substantial provisions, or would be by way of raising a presumption, and a conclusion with regard to the period for which the 'lay-off' is supposed to have been effective. This explanation has nothing to do with the 'quality of the lay-off'. In other words, without affecting or in any other manner, quantifying the circumstances in which a 'lay-off' would come under the main definition, the explanation purports to raise a quantitative presumption with regard of the extent of the time during which the 'lay-off' is deemed to be effective. In other words, there is nothing in the definition of 'lay-off' which prescribes the presentation of a workman for work during the first two hours or his coming for work again at the beginning of the second part of the shift, as a condition precedent to 'lay-off'.[89]

Workman who can be Laid-off

Workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of his industrial establishment and who has not been retrenched: the refusal, failure or inability of an employer to give work, refers only to a workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of his industrial establishment and who has not been retrenched. Section 25D casts a duty on the employer for maintaining the muster rolls of the workmen. If, therefore, an employee's name is not borne on the muster rolls of the establishment or he has been retrenched, even if his name was borne on the muster rolls, the question of his 'lay-off' would not arise.

Employer's Right to 'lay-off' Workman

The Bombay High Court, in MA Veiyra, expressed the view that under the general law, the management is free to dispense with the services of a workman, but under the Act, it is under an obligation to lay him off; that being so, the action of 'lay off' by the employer cannot be questioned as being ultra vires.[90] In KT Rolling, dealing with a case to which the provisions of Ch VA did not apply, as the employer at the relevant time, had employed less than fifty workmen, a majority of the Full Bench of that High Court held that it was not open to the industrial tribunal, under this Act to have awarded 'lay-off' compensation to the workmen employed in an industrial establishment to which s 25C did not apply.[91] A single judge of the Kerala High Court, in South India Corpn, also observed that an industrial tribunal will have no jurisdiction to award lay-off compensation to the workmen of an establishment, to which the Act did not apply. In this case, the Standing Orders of the employer company provided that the normal working of the factory would be for 8 or 9 months. Hence, it could not be held that an employer should provide work for 245 days in a year and that he would be liable, on principles of social justice, to pay compensation for any period which falls short of it, and the statute could not be circumvented by calling the claim compensation as unemployment compensation.[92] But in Dewan Tea Estate, the Supreme Court held that s 25C does not recognize a common law right of an industrial employer to 'lay-off' his workmen because the laying off under s 25C, refers to a 'laying off' as defined in s 2 (kkk) and so, the workmen who can claim the benefit of s 25C must be workmen who are laid-off and laid-off for reasons contemplated in s 2(kkk), and in the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> If any case is not covered by the Standing Orders, it will necessarily be covered by the provisions of the Act, and 'lay-off' would be permissible only where one or the other of the factors mentioned in section 2(kkk) is present and for such 'lay-off' compensation will be awarded under section 25C. [93]

The last observation was made by the court, in Firestone, implies that:

> If the power of 'lay-off' is there in the Standing Orders but the grounds of the 'lay-off' are not covered by them, rather are covered by the provisions of the Act, then, 'lay-off' would be permissible only on one or other of the factors mentioned in clause (kkk).[94]

The court found further support for the proposition from the fact that 'there is no provision in the Act, specifically providing that an employer would be entitled to 'lay-off' his workmen, for the reasons prescribed by s 2(kkk) '. In this case, at the relevant time, the establishment of the employer employed less than fifty workmen. Hence, the provisions of s 25C were not applicable. The question for consideration, therefore, was, whether the management had a right to 'lay-off' their workmen and whether the workmen were entitled to claim wages or compensation for the period of 'lay-off'? In the absence of any power conferred on the employer by the Act to 'lay-off' a workman, the court observed, such power must be found out from the terms of contract of service or Standing Orders governing the establishment. Since the Standing Orders Act was not applicable to the establishment and the contract of employment was silent in this behalf, it was held that the workmen would be entitled to their full wages for the period of 'lay-off'.[95]

Adjudication

'Lay-off' has to be resorted to by an employer as a trade exigency, when the conditions stated in s 2(kkk) occur. The tribunal, therefore, will undoubtedly have jurisdiction to see whether any of these contingencies, in fact, did exist, due to which the employer was unable or he failed or refused to give employment to the workmen concerned. If the requisite conditions did not exist, the 'lay-off' will not be a 'lay-off' as defined in the Act, but it will be a mere sham. Then the tribunal will have power to interfere and give the necessary relief to the workmen. In dealing with a 'lay-off', it will not be open to the tribunal to inquire as to whether the employer could have avoided the 'lay-off' by being more diligent, more vigilant or more farsighted. That is a matter relating to the management of the undertaking and unless mala fides are alleged and proved, the tribunal can have no jurisdiction to sit in judgment over the acts of management of employer and investigate whether a more prudent management could have avoided the situation which led to the 'lay-off'. If the tribunal embarks upon an inquiry as to whether the employer had shown sufficient, farsightedness in managing his affairs, it would exceed its jurisdiction, which will be amenable to be corrected by judicial review. If the 'lay-off' is mala fide, in the sense that the employer had deliberately and maliciously brought about a situation where the 'lay-off' became necessary, then it is no 'lay-off' as contemplated by the definition. In other words, mala fides of the employer in declaring a 'lay-off', really means that no 'lay-off' has taken place, so a finding as to mala fides of the employer in declaring a 'lay-off', naturally takes such lay off out of the definition. Likewise, if a 'lay-off' has been declared in order to victimise the workmen or for some other ulterior purpose, the position would be the same and it would not be a 'lay-off'.[96] But a 'lay-off', which merely exceeds any particular period, is not necessarily illegal, contrary to law or mala fide. Mala fides of an employer, with respect to his act of 'laying-off' his employees, have necessarily to be specifically alleged and proved before the tribunal. In such a case, the relief provided to the laid-off workmen, under s 25C, would not be the only relief to which they would be entitled. The workmen will be entitled to their full wages for the period of such purported 'lay-off'.

Lay-off v Contract of Employment

The very essence of 'lay-off' is that it is a temporary stoppage and that within a reasonable period of time, the employer expects that the business or industry would continue and his employees, who have been laid-off, will be restored to their full rights as employees. In 'lay-off', the vinculam juris of the relationship of employment is not broken, though, for the time being, it goes under suspended animation. In other words, when there is a stoppage of work due to any reason specified in this clause, or any other analogous reason, all that the employer can do is to suspend the contract, for the time being. Thus, as soon as the temporary stoppage comes to an end, the employees are entitled to resume their service and receive full wage. It is not open to the employer, under the cloak of a 'lay-off', to keep his employees in the state of suspended animation and not to make up his mind as to whether the industry or business would ultimately continue or there would be a permanent stoppage and thereby, deprive them of their full wages.[1] The employees continue to be in the muster roll of the employer and they have to be reinstated as soon as normal working is resumed.[2]

'Lay-off' and 'Lockout'- Distinction

In Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam , the Supreme Court considered the concept of 'lay-off', vis-a-vis that of a 'lockout' and observed:

> The concept of a 'lockout' is essentially different from the concept of a 'lay-off', and so, where a closure of business amounts to a lockout under section 2(1), it would be impossible to bring it within the scope of a 'lay-off' under section 2(kkk). The points of distinction between a 'lay-off' and a 'lockout' may be broadly stated as follows:
>
> (a) A 'lay-off' generally occurs in a continuous business, whereas, 'lockout' is a closure of business for the time-being.
>
> (b) In the case of a 'lay-off', owing to the reasons specified in section 2(kkk), the employer is unable to give employment to one or more workmen, whereas, in the case of a 'lockout', the employer deliberately closes the business and locks out the whole body of workmen for reasons which have no relevance to the causes specified in section 2(kkk).
>
> (c) In the case of a 'lay-off', the employer may be liable to pay compensation, as provided by sections 25C, 25D and 25E of the Act, but the liability for compensation cannot be invoked in the case of a 'lockout', as the liability of the employer in cases of 'lockout' would depend upon whether the 'lockout' was justified and legal or not.
>
> (d) But whatever the liability, the provisions applicable to the payment of 'lay-off' compensation cannot be applied to the cases of 'lockout'.
>
> (e) A 'lockout' is resorted to by the employer as a weapon of collective bargaining and also, ordinarily, involves an element of malice or ill-will, while 'lay-off' is actuated by the exigencies of the business.[3]

There are also certain points of resemblance between a 'lay-off' and a 'lockout', namely:

(a) Both 'lay-off' and 'lockout' are of a temporary nature and both arise out of and exist during an emergency, though the nature of the emergencies in each case, is different.

(b) Both in 'lay-off' and in 'lockout', the relationship of employment is only suspended and is not severed.

(c) A 'lay-off' resorted to in contravention of the provisions of section 25M is illegal and punishable under section 25Q while a 'lockout' declared in contravention of the provisions of sections 10(3), 10A(4A), 22 or 23 is illegal and punishable under section 26.

'Lay-off' and 'Closure' - Distinction

The distinction between a 'lay-off' and a 'closure, has been considered by the Madras High Court in Kaleeswara Mills.[4] The distinction between the two is clearly evident. A 'lay-off' is a failure, refusal or inability of an employer, due to reasons beyond his control, to give employment to a workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls, while a 'closure' is the closing of the business permanently or temporarily, for an indefinite period by the management. The question as to whether a particular case would come under 'closure', 'lockout' or 'lay-off', would depend on the facts of each case.

Clause (l): LOCKOUT

General

The expression 'lockout' was more comprehensively defined in s 2(e) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, which is reproduced below:

> 'Lock-out' means the closing of a place of employment or the suspension of work, on the refusal of an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him, when such closing, suspension or refusal occurs in consequence of a dispute and is intended for the purpose of compelling those persons or of aiding another employer, in compelling persons employed by him, to accept the terms or conditions of or affecting employment.

The definition was based on the definition of 'lockout' as defined in s 8(b) of the repealed Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act 1927, which ran thus:

> Lock-out' to mean 'closing of a place of employment or suspension of work or a refusal by an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him, in consequence of a dispute done with a view to compelling those persons or to aid another employer in compelling persons employed by him, to accept terms or conditions of or affecting employment.

The present definition in Indian statute omits the words 'when such closing, suspension or refusal occurs in consequence of a dispute and is intended for the purpose of compelling those persons or of aiding another employer, in compelling persons employed by him, to accept the terms or conditions of, or affecting employment', from the old definition of 1929 Act. The deletion of these words has left the definition in a mutilated and truncated form of the concept. In Sri Ramachandra Spg Mills, the Madras High Court has vividly pictured the consequences of construing the definition of a 'lockout' as it stands and without reading the effect of the deleted words into it, in the following words:

> As the words of the definition stand, whatever be the circumstances in which he finds himself placed and whatever the strength of the agencies that forced on him the step and however important he may be to avoid the result, if an employer closes the place of employment or suspends work on his premises', a 'lockout' would come into existence. A flood may have swept away the factory; a fire may have gutted the premises; a convulsion of nature may have sucked the whole place under ground, still, if the place of employment is closed or the work is suspended or the employer refuses to continue to employ his previous workers, there would be a 'lockout' and the employer would find himself exposed to the penalties laid down in the Act. [5]

The High Court then read the effect of the deleted words into the definition and observed that where the shut-down, suspension or refusal is used as a weapon corresponding to a strike, then only it will be a lockout and said:

> ...If an employer shuts down his place of business as a means of reprisal or as an instrument of coercion or as a mode of exerting pressure on the employees or, generally speaking, when his act is what may be called an act of belligerency, there would be a 'lockout'. If, on the other hand, he shuts down his work because he cannot, for instance, get the raw materials or the fuel or the power necessary to carry on his undertaking or because he is unable to sell the goods he has made or because his credit is exhausted or because he is losing money, that would not be a lockout.

Similarly, in Kairbetta (supra), the Supreme Court also observed that 'the essential character of 'lockout' continues to be substantially the same', and further read the effect of the deleted words into the definition by saying that in 'the struggle between capital and labour, the weapon of strike is available to labour and is often used by it, so is the weapon of a lockout available to the employer and can be used by him'. By the Amending Act 46 of 1982,[6] the word 'temporary' has been inserted before the word 'closing'. The legislature has made it clear that under the present definition, three alternative acts of the employer, in the process of collective bargaining, constitute a 'lockout', namely: (a) a 'temporary' closure of a place of employment, in contradistinction to a 'closure', as defined in s 2(cc), where the closure is of a 'permanent' nature; (b) suspension of work; or (c) refusal to continue to employ any number of persons employed by the employer. The phrase 'refusal by an employer to continue to employ' in the definition, corresponds to the phrase 'cessation of work' or 'refusal to continue to work or accept employment' occurring in the definition of a 'strike'.[7] Just as a 'strike' is a weapon available to the employees for enforcing their industrial demands, a 'lockout' is a weapon available to the employer to persuade by a coercive process, the employees, to see his point of view and to accept his demand.[8] A 'lockout' can, therefore, be described as the antithesis to a strike.[9] It may, however be pointed out that a mention of the strike or lockout aspect of collective bargaining, warrants a note of caution regarding the danger of a distorted perspective. It is a commonly accepted axiom that 'the power to strike and to lockout is the motive force of collective bargaining'. A corollary is that 'there is no bargaining power if there is no freedom and opportunity to refuse to continue the relationship'.[10] As RE Mathews says:

> It is easy to accept this axiom and its corollary too uncritically, as it is to ignore what is at least the percentile truth they incorporate. Collective bargaining is a catch-as-catch-can kind of business in which disdain for such uncouthness as is labelled 'duress' in more polite contract circles, has no place.[11]

There is no doubt that a lockout is an instrument of coercion or a weapon of oppression or a means of reprisal or a pressure-valve to revolve the workmen round, to coerce them to come to terms with the management. Therefore, the possibility of creating artificial circumstances as a justification for a declaration of a lockout, cannot be ruled out. But a lockout by itself, is not an industrial dispute as defined in s 2(k) of the Act. From a juxtaposition of the definitions of a 'lockout' in s 2(l) and that of an 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k), it is evident that a lockout is a unilateral and volitional act on the part of the employer, while an 'industrial dispute' is bilateral in character, as it arises when a demand of the workmen is rejected by the employer.[12] The words 'refusal by an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him' in the definition of a 'lockout', have to be read with the rest of the definition and also the word 'lockout' In other words, these words have to be given a restricted meaning, viz, 'refusal by the employer to allow any number of persons employed by him, to attend to their duties, without effecting a termination of service'.[13]

The expression 'refusal to employ' in the context of the definition, does not mean a refusal to find work for the workmen, but it only means a refusal or an intention not to pay. It will not be a 'lockout' if the employer pays the workmen, but does not give them any work.[14] The definition of a 'lockout' postulates the existence of the relationship of employer and employee. In other words, if the relationship of employer and employee does not exist between the parties, there can be no 'lockout'. A 'lockout' can exist only during the continuance of such relationship between the parties. Accordingly, when the contract of employment is (rightly or wrongly) terminated by an employer, the conditions of a 'lockout' cannot continue to exist. Therefore, in cases where the employer sets up a plea of termination of the services of the workman, it would be necessary for the adjudicator to investigate into the facts relating to the termination of service and decide that the termination was binding and legal. In cases in which the termination is found to be binding and legal, it would be impossible for him to hold that the 'lockout' had continued and required to be lifted. If, however, the termination is found to be illegal and not binding on the workmen, it would be open to him to come to the conclusion that the termination being illegal, was of no consequence, hence, the 'lockout' had continued by failure of the employer to continue to employ the concerned workmen.[15]

Lockout v Contract of Employment

Hence, as a 'strike' does not contemplate a severance of the relation of the employer and employee; so also, a 'lockout' does not sever the relationship.[16]The Act treats 'strikes' and 'lockouts' on the same basis; it treats one as the counterpart of the other. In a 'lockout', the relationship of employer and employee remains as before; only some links in that chain of relationship are broken.[17] A 'lockout' is neither an alteration to the prejudice of the workman, of the conditions of service applicable to him, nor a discharge or punishment, whether by dismissal or otherwise, of the workman.[18]

'Lockout' and 'Closure' - Distinction

The distinction between a 'lockout' and a 'closure' has been explained by the Supreme Court in Express Newspapers.[19]

In the case of 'closure', the employer does not merely close down the place of business, but he closes the business itself, finally and irrevocably. A 'lockout' on the other hand, indicates the closure of the place of business and not a closure of the business itself, a lockout is usually used by the employer as a weapon of collective bargaining, to compel the employees to accept his proposals, just as a strike is a weapon in the armoury of labour in the process of collective bargaining, to compel the employer to accept their demands. Though the distinction between a 'closure' and a 'lockout' appears to be clear in theory, in actual practice, it is not always easy to decide whether the purported 'closure' is a real and genuine closure, properly so-called, or whether it is a sham or a disguise for a 'lockout'.[20] Closure is a matter of policy of the employer, whether to run his business or not. The employer may close down an industrial activity bona fide on such eventualities as suffering continuous loss, no possibility of a revival of the business or an inability for various other reasons, to continue the industrial activity. There may be a closure for any of these reasons. These reasons are not exhaustive, but are merely illustrative. But it cannot be said that a closure must always be permanent and irrevocable, as that would be ignoring the causes which may have necessitated the closure. A change of circumstances may encourage an employer to revive the industrial activity which was really intended to be closed.[21] If, instead of effecting a closure, the employer takes recourse to a lockout, to avoid the statutory liabilities, including payment of compensation or for bargaining, he cannot claim such a right, nor can his action be said to be bona fide.[22] To merely say that there was no 'lockout' is quite different from saying that it was a case of a 'closure'. It may or may not be a case of a 'lockout', that is a matter which the tribunal has to decide; but it cannot be a case of closure unless a closure has been specifically pleaded by the employer. If, however, a case of closure is pleaded, that has to be decided by the tribunal as a jurisdictional issue, because the jurisdiction of the tribunal to adjudicate the points of reference will depend upon the decision of this jurisdictional issue. In other words, on the finding, the tribunal may record on this preliminary issue, it may decide whether it has jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the dispute or not. But if closure has not been pleaded, the tribunal is under no obligation to decide this as a preliminary issue.[23] If it is a closure, then the matter ends there. The court cannot go into the question of the propriety of such an order. The finding whether a particular case is a case of 'closure' or of a 'lockout' is not a pure question of fact, but it is a mixed question of fact and law. Such a finding is amenable to a writ jurisdiction, if it is perverse.[24]

Illustrations

The closure of a place of business for a short duration of three days, which was done in retaliation to certain acts of workmen, was held to be a lockout.[25] A temporary suspension of work, necessitated by a lack of stock, was held not to constitute a lockout.[26] Likewise, a temporary stoppage of work for a lack of raw material, was held not to be a lockout.[27] A closure of a section of an industry carried on by an employer, on account of trade reasons, was held not to be a lockout and the closure of another section also, as a result of the refusal of the workmen to work in sympathy for the workmen of the former section, was not held to be a lockout.[28] The suspension of certain workmen, with the ultimate view of the termination of their services, for misconduct, was held not to constitute a lockout.[29] Likewise, retrenchment and discharge of workmen have been held not to be a lockout.[30]

Legality v Justifiability of Lockouts

Sections 22 & 23 impose certain restrictions on the commencement, and ss 10(3) & 10A(4A) prohibit the continuance of a lockout. Section 24 lays down that a lockout commenced or continued in contravention of these provisions, would be illegal. Likewise, there are restrictions in state statutes, the contravention of which renders lockouts illegal. Apart from these statutory restrictions, there is nothing in law that prohibits employers from locking out workmen as a measure of collective bargaining. The prevalent view appears to be thus:

> In the absence of a prohibitory statute or a contract governing the situation, the employer has the legal right to lockout his employees or to close down or to remove his factory, because of a labour dispute or to avoid anticipated labour difficulties.[31]

Although, there are cases which tend to indicate that 'such a statement is too broad and should be confined in its application, to the facts involved'; because in general, public policy is, opposed to the closing or removal of factories for the purpose of discouraging, intimidating or punishing employees for union activities.[32] In other words, a lockout may be legal inasmuch as it is declared in compliance with the statutory requirements, but it may be unjustified, as it might have been declared with the ulterior motive of victimising workmen for their trade union activities, or it may be unjustified for having been continued for an unreasonably long time. Whether a lockout is legal or illegal is a question of law. But the question as to whether a lockout is justified or unjustified, is a mixed question of law and fact. In the cases referred to above, the court has not adverted to the statutory definitions of 'wages' in s 2(rr) and of 'lockout' in s 2(1) of the Act. From a juxtaposition of these two definitions, it is evident that by 'closing a place of employment' or a 'suspension of work' or a refusal 'to continue to employ any number of persons', the employer disables the workmen from fulfilling the 'terms of employment', which would have entitled them to wages. Having himself disabled the workmen to fulfill the terms of employment, the employer cannot disentitle them to the wages which they would have earned. The questions of legality or illegality, justifiability or unjustifiability of the 'lockout' are relevant for the entitlement of the workmen to wages during the period of a lockout. The principle, as applicable to the entitlement of the workmen, to wages for the period of 'strike', will equally apply to the entitlement of the workmen for the period of a 'lockout'.

Note: For a detailed discussion, see notes and comments under s 2(q), 'Wages for the Period of Strike'.

Illustrations

In one case, the workmen assembled near the office of the establishment during the recess period, stayed away from their work, and continued there till late in the evening, shouting slogans, so much so that the members of the office staff and some workers who wanted to return home after the working hours, were prevented from leaving the factory premises, till the police arrived on the scene and dispersed the workmen. In these circumstances, it was held that the lockout declared by the employer from the following day, was justified as the action on the part of the workmen was a strike. Similarly, a lockout necessitated by the 'go-slow tactics' or 'improper conduct of the workmen', was also held to be justified.[33] A lockout declared as a result of a hunger strike by certain workmen of a factory, who held key-posts, was held to be legal and justified, despite the fact that notice as required by section 22, was not given.[34] The management declared that instead of Sundays, Saturdays would be off-days, because the State Government had imposed restrictions on the use of electricity and curtailed the supply of electricity on Saturdays. The workers not only remained absent on a Saturday, but refused to work even on Sunday, which constituted a strike and the work of the factory consequently, came to a standstill. The lockout declared by the management consequent upon such strike, was held to be justified.[35] On the other hand, a lockout, declared as a consequence of the refusal of the workmen to do additional work, which the employer had no right in law, to ask them to do, by altering the conditions of service, in the implementation of the rationalisation scheme, was held to be unjustified and the workmen were held to be entitled to wages for the period in question.[36] Locking out the workmen without any prior notice by the employer to them, as a retaliatory measure to terrorise them, was held to be an illegal and unjustified lockout. It was illegal because no prior notice, as required by law, was given, and unjustified, as it was retaliatory in nature.[37] Some of the workmen staged a stay-on-strike and subsequently, came to join their duties, but they were asked to sign a good conduct bond, which the workmen refused to sign, as they objected to the use of the words 'at the instigation of others' in the bond. The refusal of the employer to give work to the workmen in the peculiar circumstances of the case, was held to be an unjustified lockout.[38]

Wages for the Period of Lockout

The Act imposes certain prohibitions and restrictions on 'lockouts', as well as on 'strikes'. Chapter V; s 10(3), s 10A(4A), s 22 and s 23 impose certain prohibitions on the commencement or continuance of 'strikes' and 'lockouts' and s 24 renders the 'strikes' or 'lockouts' continued and commenced in contravention of these prohibitions, illegal. Chapter VI prescribes the penalties for illegal strikes and lockouts. But unlike 'lay-off', 'retrenchment', 'transfer of the undertaking' or 'closure of the undertaking', there is no provision in the Act providing for any compensation to the workmen affected by a 'strike' or a 'lockout'. The reason is plain. 'Layoff', 'retrenchment', 'transfer of the undertaking' or 'closure of the undertaking' arise out of trade exigencies. None of these acts is a measure of collective bargaining. But 'lockouts' and 'strikes' are weapons of collective bargaining, in which both the sides stand to gain or lose, depending upon various circumstances. Hence, in using these weapons of collective bargaining, the party using them takes its own risk in the process of pressurising the other to concede to its demands. Thus, if a 'lockout' is legal and justified, for instance, it is precipitated by certain acts on the part of the workmen themselves, the employer will not be liable to pay and the employees will not be entitled to receive wages for the duration of the 'lockout'. In Hindustan Steel, the Orissa High Court held that mere change in hours of work from 7 am to 8 am would not amount to lockout of workmen, as none of the elements indicated in the definition of a 'lockout' was satisfied, particularly, when the place of the employment had not been closed, nor had the work been suspended.[39]

But if, on the other hand, the 'lockout' is illegal, the employer will be liable to pay full wages to the workmen. Even if the lockout is legal, but it is unjustified, for instance, it is declared with a view to victimising the workmen, or is continued for an unduly protracted period of time, the employer will be liable to pay and the workmen will be entitled to receive the full wages and other benefits, for the period of the 'lockout'. The same principle applies when a 'lockout' is declared in consequence of a legal strike. But when an unjustified or illegal strike is followed by a 'lockout', which becomes unjustified on account of its unreasonably long duration, a case of the apportionment of the blame between the employer and the workmen, arises.[40] However, in deciding the quantum of wages, for the period of the lockout, to be paid to the concerned workmen, their conduct at the relevant time has to be taken into consideration.[41] It is incumbent upon the tribunal, to apply its mind to the question of apportionment of the blame on the two parties and to its effect on the amount of wages to be awarded to the workmen, for the period of the unjustified 'lockout', after allowing the relevant evidence being adduced before it.[42] In case a 'lockout' is illegal or unjustified, it is not necessary for the workmen, for being entitled to wages for the period of the lockout, to show that they had been reporting for work during such period.[43]

Clause (la): MAJOR PORT

A 'major port' has been defined in s 3(8) of the Indian Ports Act 1908 (15 of 1908), as follows:

> A 'major port' means any port which the Central Government may, by notification in the Office Gazette, declare, or may, under any law for the time being in force, have declared to be a major port.

Clause (lb): MINE

This definition adopts the definition of a mine as in s 2(j) of the Mines Act 1952, which is as follows:

> 'A mine' means any excavation where any operation, for the purpose of searching for or obtaining minerals, has been carried on, and includes, unless exempted by the Central Government by notification in the Office Gazette, any premises or part thereof, on which any process ancillary to the getting, dressing or preparation for sale of minerals or of coke is being carried.

A plant manufacturing tar and industrial coke from coal purchased from outside, has been held to be a mine within the meaning of s 2(lb) of the Act.[44] On the other hand, a cement factory working at a distance of 15 miles from the mines, using limestone quarried from the mines, was held not to fall within the definition of a 'mine' as in s 2, despite the fact that the mine and the cement factory were under the same management.[45]

Clause (ll): NATIONAL TRIBUNAL

By the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 (Act 36 of 1956), a provision has been made for the constitution of a National Industrial Tribunal under s 7B of the IDA. This definition has also been inserted by the amending Act. The amending Act abolished the Labour Appellate Tribunal, established under the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act 1950. National Industrial Tribunals are constituted to adjudicate upon industrial disputes of concerns having all-India establishments and also to deal with disputes between banks and their employees.

Clause (lll): OFFICE BEARER

Any member or the executive of a trade union is an 'office bearer' for the purpose of s 36(1). But the definition expressly excludes an auditor.

Clause (m): PRESCRIBED

This definition is the same as in s 2(j) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, under which the rule-making power was given to the government by s 19. Now, s 38 of the Industrial Disputes Act, gives power to the appropriate government to make rules for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this Act.

Clause (n): PUBLIC UTILITY SERVICE

Legislation

This clause is based on cl (g) of s 2 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929 and was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947, with a view to assure special attention to disputes relating to 'public utility service' industries, for which special provisions have been enacted in the Act. Section 12(1) makes it obligatory on a conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings in the prescribed manner, when the dispute relates to a 'public utility service' and notice under s 22 has been given. The proviso to s 10(1) enjoins on the 'appropriate government', that it must make a reference of an industrial dispute, when the dispute relates to a public utility service. With respect to strikes and lockouts in 'public utility' services, s 22 contains special provisions.

Sub-Clause (i): Railway and Air Service

This sub-clause makes the railway and transport services for the carriage of passengers or goods, public utility services. These services being the life arteries of the nation, the legislature thought it fit to make these services, public utility services.

Sub-Clause (ii): Section of an Establishment involving Safety

In each industry or industrial establishment, there is a particular section, on the working of which, the safety of the establishment or the workmen employed therein, depends; for instance, the power house, the sanitation and conservancy section and the watch and ward etc. Even if a particular industry or industrial establishment is not a 'public utility service', by the sub cl (ii), the particular section of it, on the working of which its safety or the safety of the workmen employed therein depends, has been made a 'public utility service'.

Sub-Clause (iii): Postal, Telegraph or Telephone Service

The postal, telegraph and telephone services, again being modes of communication of thought and information, have been made 'public utility services', with a view to allow these services to work in an uninterrupted manner.

Sub-Clause (iv): Power, Light and Water Services

Industries supplying power, light or water to the public, are very essential for the living of men in the society and the interruption of the regular flow of power or water is likely to cause disturbance in the normal living of the members of the society. Hence, the establishments supplying power, light or water to the public, have been made 'public utility services'.

Sub-Clause (v): Public Conservancy or Sanitation System

The system of public conservancy or sanitation have been brought within the purview of 'public utility services', because the disruption of these systems again, is likely to cause disturbance to normal human life. The mere fact that instead of the word 'service', the word 'system' has been used in relation to conservancy or sanitation, cannot lead to an inference that a system of public conservancy or sanitation would not be a 'public utility service'.[46]

Sub-Clause (vi): First Schedule Industries

The present First Schedule was substituted for the former First Schedule, by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 (Act 36 to 1956). The schedule as originally enacted, had only five items. The present schedule is headed: 'Industries which may be declared to be public utility services under sub-cl (vi) of cl (n) of s 2 ', and now, it includes ten, items namely:

(a) Transport (other than railways) for the carriage of passengers or goods, 'by land or water'

(b) Banking

(c) Cement

(d) Coal

(e) Cotton textiles

(f) Foodstuffs

(g) Iron and steel

(h) Defence establishments

(i) Service in hospitals and dispensaries, and

(j) Fire brigade service.

Some of the states have added certain other items to the list by amending enactments. Thus, it is only the 'industries' as specified in the First Schedule, that can be declared to be 'public utility services' under this sub-clause. The proviso to this sub-clause further confines this power with respect to time, ie, any of these scheduled industries can be declared in the first instance, for a maximum period of six months, by a notification in the Office Gazette. In case the period is to be extended, it can only be done again, by a similar notification. For the exercise of the power by the 'appropriate government', to declare a scheduled industry to be a 'public utility service' for the purpose of this Act, the following requirements must be satisfied:

(i) The activity with respect to which the notification is made, is an 'industry' within the meaning of section 2(j).

(ii) The appropriate government must be satisfied that public emergency or public interest require a particular scheduled industry to be declared a public utility service.

(iii) Such declaration must be made by a notification published in its Office Gazette.

(iv) The notification should specify-the period for which the declaration is made and such period should not exceed six months in the first instance.

(v) After the expiry of the period specified in the notification, in case the government considers it necessary to extend the period, it can do so. But the period can only be extended by a fresh notification, after having applied its mind afresh, to the requirement of public emergency or public interest, in extending the time and the extended period should not exceed six months. There is no limit on the number of times the government can extend the period, provided that the period is extended each time, after considering the requirement of public emergency or public interest and the extension is made for a period not exceeding six months at anyone time and by notification in its Office Gazette.

In terms of cl (i) of s 2(n) 'any railway service' or 'any transport service for the carriage of passengers or goods by air', is comprehended in the definition of a 'public utility service'. Entry 1 in the First Schedule is 'transport other than railways, for the carriage of passengers or goods by land or water'. In other words, any transport (other than railways) for the carriage of passengers or goods, by land or water cannot be a 'public utility service' unless a notification, as required by cl (vi) of s 2(n), has been issued by the appropriate government.[47]

Clause (o): RAILWAY COMPANY

This clause is the same as cl (h) of s 2 of the repealed Trade Dispute Act 1929. It was enacted in the original IDA and it has remained unamended so far. Section 3(5) of the Indian Railways Act 1890 reads as follows:

> 'Railway company' includes any persons, whether incorporated or not, who are owners or lessess of a railway or parties to an agreement for working a railway.

The expression 'railway' has been defined in s 3(4) of the Railway Act. Under s 2(n) of the IDA, a 'railway service' is a 'public utility service'. Under s 2(a) of the Act, the 'appropriate government' in relation to a 'railway company', shall be the Central Government.

Clause (oo): RETRENCHMENT

Evolution of the Concept

'Retrenchment' was not defined either in the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, or in the IDA, as originally enacted. The definition was inserted by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1953. The definition has to be read with the relevant section in Chs VA and VB. The definition of the term 'retrenchment' is very wide and is in two parts. The first part is exhaustive, which lays down that 'retrenchment' means the termination of the service of a workman by the employer, 'for any reason what-so-ever', otherwise than as a punishment inflicted by way of a disciplinary action. Thus, the main part itself, excludes the termination of the service as a measure of punishment, inflicted by way of a disciplinary action, from the ambit of the definition of retrenchment.[48] The second part further excludes:

(i) a voluntary retirement of the workman;

(ii) a retirement of the workman on reaching the age of superannuation;

(iii) a termination of the service of the workman as a result of non-renewal of the contract of employment; or

(iv) a termination of service on the ground of continued ill health of the workman.[49]

Retrenchment can occur only in a Live Industry

In Pipraich Sugar Mills, the Supreme Court held that 'retrenchment' means a termination by the employer, of a service of a workman, who is a 'workman' as defined in s 2(s), according to which a workman is a person who is employed 'in an industry'. 'Industry' means a 'live industry', and not a closed one. The entire scheme of the Act assumes that there is in existence, an industry and then proceeds to provide for various steps to be taken when a dispute arises in the industry. Thus, the provisions of the Act relating to 'lockout', 'strike', 'lay-off', 'retrenchment', 'conciliation' and adjudication on proceedings', have meaning only if they refer to an 'industry' which is running and not to one which is closed. Therefore, s 2 (oo) and s 25F have no application to a closed or a dead industry. In other words, there can be no 'retrenchment' unless there is a discharge of the surplus labour or staff, in a continuing or running industry.[50] The underlying assumption, of course, is that the undertaking is running as an undertaking and the employer continues as an employer, but where, either on account of a transfer of the undertaking or on account of the closure of the undertaking, the basic assumption disappears, there can be no question of retrenchment, within the meaning of the definition contained in s 2(oo) of the Act.[51] A single-judge of the Calcutta High Court, in Bharat Coking Coal,[52] has held that the loss of employment of workers on the closure of an undertaking, will amount to 'retrenchment'. This holding is not correct. From the text of the judgment, it appears that the attention of the court was not drawn to the language of s 25FFF, which specifically says that 'wherever an undertaking is closed down, for any reason whatsoever, every workman who has been in continuous service for not less than one year in the undertaking, immediately before such closure, shall…, be entitled to 'notice' and 'compensation' in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, as if the workman had been retrenched'. From this language, it is evident that upon closure of an undertaking, the workmen who lose their employment, are only entitled to notice and compensation in terms of s 25F. But this language does not lead to the conclusion that the loss of employment of the workmen, on the closure of an undertaking, would constitute 'retrenchment'. If that was the intention of the legislation, it could have been expressed in a clear and unambiguous language.

Judicial Interpretation of 'Retrenchment' - Initial Trends

In Pipraich Sugar Mills, dealing with the question of whether the discharge of the workmen on a closure of the undertaking would constitute 'retrenchment' and, hence, the workmen were entitled to retrenchment compensation, the Supreme Court observed:

> Retrenchment connotes, in its ordinary acceptation, that the business itself is being continued, but that a portion of the staff or the labour force is discharged as surplusage; and the termination of the services of all the workmen, as a result of the closure of the business cannot, therefore, be properly described as retrenchment...Retrenchment means, in ordinary parlance, discharge of the surplus, it cannot include discharge on closure of business.[53]

Though these observations were made in connection with a case where the closure took place before the amendment of the Act, the court left open the question as to the correct interpretation of the definition of 'retrenchment'. Glossing on these observations, a five-judge Bench, in Barsi Light Rly,[54] observed that they explained 'the meaning of retrenchment, in its ordinary acceptation'. In this case, the court had specifically to interpret the term 'retrenchment' as defined in s 2(oo), while dealing with the two appeals, one relating to a claim for compensation, made by an employee on the transfer of a railway undertaking and the other relating to a claim for compensation, made on the closure of a mill. The question before the court was: Whether the definition of 'retrenchment' merely gives effect to the ordinary accepted notion of 'retrenchment' in an existing or running industry, by embodying the notion in apt and readily intelligible words, or does it go so far beyond the accepted notion of 'retrenchment' as to include the termination of service of all workmen in an industry, when the industry itself ceases to exist, on a bona fide closure or discontinuance of his business by the employer? Answering this question on behalf of the court, SK Das J said:

> What, after all, is the meaning of the expression 'for any reason whatsoever'? When a portion of the staff or labour force is discharged as surplusage, in a running or continuing business, the termination of service which follows, may be due to a variety of reasons, eg, for economy, rationalization in industry, installation of a new labour-saving machinery, etc. The legislature, in using the expression 'any reason whatsoever', says, in effect: 'It does not matter why you are discharging the surplus; if the other requirements of the definition are fulfilled, then it is 'retrenchment'... What is being defined is 'retrenchment', and that is the context of the definition. It is true that an artificial definition may include a meaning different from or in excess of the ordinary acceptation of the word which is the subject of the definition; but there must then be compelling words to show that such a meaning, different from or in excess of the ordinary meaning, is intended. Where, within the framework of the ordinary acceptation of the word, every single requirement of the definition clause is fulfilled, it would be wrong to take the definition as destroying the essential meaning of the word defined... For the reasons given above, we hold... that retrenchment, as defined in section 2(oo) and as used in Section 25F has no wider meaning than the ordinary, accepted connotation of the word: it means the discharge of the surplus labour or staff by the employer, for any reason whatsoever, otherwise than as a punishment inflicted by way of a > disciplinary action, and it has no application where the services of all workmen have been terminated by the employer, on a real and bona fide closure of his business...or where the services of all the workmen have been terminated by the employer, on the business or undertaking being taken over by another employer... On our interpretation, in no case is there any retrenchment, unless there is a discharge of surplus labour or staff in a continuing or running Industry.[55] (Italics supplied).

On this interpretation, the expression 'for any reason whatsoever', must necessarily be read in conjunction with reasons like economy, rationalisation in industry, installation of new labour-saving machinery etc. The essential and basic element of 'retrenchment' is, therefore, surplusage. In other words, when an employer, in an existing and running concern or industry, finds that he has staff or labour which is in excess of the number required and hence, is surplus, the services of such workmen as are in excess, can be terminated and such termination would be 'retrenchment'. Surplusage in a running business or industry, is the very basis of 'retrenchment'. For instance, where an employer wants to cut down on expenditure or he wants to introduce new labour saving devices, he may have to prune the labour or staff found to be in excess, that is the concept of 'retrenchment'. If the termination is for any other reason, it cannot be 'retrenchment'. Thus, the expression 'for any reason whatsoever', even though seemingly wide, must necessarily draw within its ambit, not any act of commission and omission on the part of the employer, but the concept of termination of the surplus workers' services due to reasons such as economy, rationalisation in industry, installation of new labour-saving machinery or device, standardisation or improvement of plant or technique and the like. It is the conjunction with such reasons that the words 'any reason whatsoever' must be read and construed.[56] Consequent upon the decision in Barsi Light Rly, the legislature amended the Act by the Amending Act 18 of 1957, substituting the present ss 25FF and 25FFF for the previous s 25FF, which make provisions for notice or payment of wages in lieu of notice and compensation to be given to a workman discharged from service, on a transfer or closing down of an industrial undertaking, 'as if the workman had been retrenched'. But the definition of retrenchment in s 2(oo) was not amended. After this amendment, another five-judge Bench, in Anakapalle, affirming the ratio of Barsi Light Rly, observed that retrenchment 'necessarily postulates the termination of the employees' services on the ground that the employees had become surplus'.[57] Thus, even after the amendment by the Amending Act of 1957, the interpretation of retrenchment in Barsi Light Rly was affirmed. The Bombay High Court, in Municipal Corpn of Greater Bombay, observed:

> It is clear from these observation that in their Lordships' view, the expression 'retrenchment' meant discharge of surplus labour or staff and did not mean a termination of the contract of employment for other causes.[58]

In this case, the discharge of the concerned workmen, for behaviour prejudicial to the interests of the concern, was not considered to be 'retrenchment'. A contrary view was taken by another Division Bench of the same High Court.[59] In National Garage,[60] a Full Bench of that High Court, therefore, considered these cases and affirming the holding in Municipal Corporation, Grt Bombay, held that a termination of services simpliciter, whether on giving a month's notice under the provisions of the Standing Orders or otherwise, would not amount to 'retrenchment'. It was further observed that the question-whether the termination of service amounts to 'retrenchment' or not-must be determined in each case, on the facts and circumstances of that case and if the termination of service is found to be due to the reason that the workman discharged was surplus, ie, in excess of the requirements of the business or industry concerned, it would amount to 'retrenchment', while the termination of his service due to any other reason, will not constitute 'retrenchment'. A similar view was taken by the Punjab,[61] Calcutta,[62] Patna,[63] Rajasthan,[64] Madras,[65] Orissa,[66] Assam and Nagaland[67] and Kerala[68] High Courts.

Misinterpretation of 'Retrenchment' - Later Trends

But in later decisions, the courts started deflecting from this principle, to suit the exigencies of various fact-situations. In Digwadih Colliery, the Supreme Court held that the termination of the service of a badli workman, who had worked for more than 240 days, was 'retrenchment' and he was entitled to the benefits of the provisions relating to retrenchment.[69] Following this decision, in Wilcox Buckwell, the court held that even the termination of the services of the a temporary employee, on the ground of surplus labour, amounts to retrenchment.[70] In Shambhu Nath Mukherjee, the court went a step further in holding that the striking-off of the name of a workman constituted retrenchment.[71] Likewise, in State of Punjab, on the construction of the expression 'retrenchment', which has been defined in s 2(q) of the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972, to mean a 'termination of service of an employee otherwise than on superannuation', a two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that except for superannuation, any termination of service would amount to 'retirement' for the purposes of the Act, hence, retrenchment, since 'retrenchment' is a 'termination of service', the court observed: 'It is immaterial that the termination is occasioned by the need to discharge surplus labour.'[72] The court further observed that 'retrenchment' implies the discharge of surplus labour, as explained in Barsi Light Rly, nonetheless, it amounts to a termination of service. This case appears to have put the ratio of Barsi Light Rly up side down. Explaining the phrase 'termination by the employer', Balasubramanian J, of the Madras High Court, observed that where an employer directs the employee to leave the job and quit the place, it is not an act done by the employee, but is an act done by the employer, and hence, it cannot be characterised as a voluntary resignation. In such an event, the employee would be entitled to retrenchment compensation.[73]

The NCL-II recommended that the term 'retrenchment' should be defined precisely, to cover only a termination of employment arising our of a need for a reduction of surplus workers in an establishment, such surplus having arisen out of one or more of several reasons.[74] The Calcutta,[75] Bombay,[76] Punjab,[77] Assam and Nagaland[78] High Courts took the view that a discharge of a workman, in accordance with the terms of the Standing Orders or discharge simpliciter, under the contract, will not constitute 'retrenchment'. Likewise, a single judge of a Madras High Court, in AS Kannan,[79] held that the discharge of a casual labourer, on the ground of medical unfitness, would not amount to retrenchment. On the other hand, the High Courts of Kerala,[80] Andhra Pradesh,[81] Madras,[82] and Patna,[83] held that the termination of the service of certain temporary workmen, who were surplus staff, is retrenchment. Another point which has engaged judicial attention is, whether the termination of service on the expiry of the time stipulated in the contract of service, is 'retrenchment'. The labour appellate tribunal, in Balkrishna Ganpat,[84] held that such termination would not constitute 'retrenchment', but it did not reason out the decision. In Hindustan Steel, the Orissa High Court held that the termination of service in terms of the contract of employment, is also 'retrenchment' and 'no distinction is available to be made...between a termination of service by the efflux of time, in terms of the contract of employment, and a termination of service under a living contract.[85] In this case, the termination of service of the head time-keeper, at the end of the contracted period was, therefore, held to be retrenchment. In Sundaramony, the High Court took the view that the temporary hands, drafted in exceptional or extraordinary contingencies or in temporary vacancies, would become surplus on the return of the permanent incumbents to the jobs. In appeal, the Supreme Court based its decision on the construction of the words 'for any reason whatsoever' as 'very wide and almost admitting of no exception', and held that the termination of service of a temporary workman, even if employed only for a certain number of days, would constitute retrenchment.[86] Apart from this bare observation, there was no discussion in the judgment, nor was there any reference to the limitations imposed on these words by the larger Benches in Pipraich Sugar Mills,[87] and Hariprasad.[88]

In Hindustan Steel,[89] the Supreme Court held that automatic termination of service, on the expiry of the contractual period of three years would constitute 'retrenchment'. From the proviso to s 25F(a), which provides that no notice required thereunder, shall be necessary if the 'termination is under an agreement which specifies a date for the termination of service', the court inferred that the proviso would have been unnecessary if retrenchment, as defined in s 2(oo), was intended not to include a 'termination of service by efflux of time in terms of an agreement between the parties'. In this view of law, the court held that such a termination would fall within the purview of 'retrenchment'. This, however, was considered as an additional reason. On behalf of the employer, it was conceded that the point was covered by Sundaramony, though it was pointed out that that case was in conflict with the decision of a larger Bench in Barsi Light Rly. But the court observed that it did not find anything in Barsi Light Rly, which was inconsistent with Sundaramony and held that giving full effect to the words 'for any reason whatsoever', would be consistent with the scope and purpose of s 25F and not contrary to the scheme of the Act. The decision of the court was actuated by the fact that in order to 'streamline the organisation and to effect economy wherever possible, the company had chosen not to renew the contract of the concerned workman'. The Patna High Court also, for similar reasons, held that the termination of the services of a substituted carriage khalasi, who had continued in service for five years, in the circumstances of the case, was 'retrenchment'.[90] But Nambiyar CJ, though subscribing to the view of Eradi J, went a step further and said that the Bench was bound to follow the larger Bench decision in the Barsi Light Rly, in preference to Sundaramony, Hindustan Steel and Delhi Cloth Mills.[91]

---

13 Williamsons (India) Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 302 [LNIND 1962 SC 94], 306 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

14 Yamna Mills Co Ltd v MM Mandai (1957) 1 LLJ 620 [LNIND 1957 BOM 57] (Bom) (DB), per Tendolkar J.

15 Uttar Pradesh Electric Supply Co Ltd v Mohd Gause 1970 Lab IC 438, 440 (All), per Khare J.

16 Associated Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1957) 2 LLJ 559 (LAT).

17 Workmen of SBI v Secy & Treasurer of SBI (1984) 2 LLJ 239, 241 (Mad) (DB), per KBN Singh CJ

18 Rasiklal Mondial joshi v Bank of Baroda (1956) 1 LLJ 103 (LAT).

19 Praga Industries Ltd v Workers (1959) 2 LLJ 379 [LNIND 1959 SC 110] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1194 [LNIND 1959 SC 110]: [1960] 1 SCR 161 [LNIND 1959 SC 110] per Gajendragadkar J.

20 International Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, 1968, Vol 16, p 424.

21 Salkia Transport Agency Pvt Ltd v Fifth IT (1963) 1 LLJ 722 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

22 Madura Coats Ltd v Mathan (1987) 2 LLJ 388, 390 (Ker) (DB), per Malirnath CJ.

23 DCM Chemical Works v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 388 [LNIND 1962 SC 97] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

24 International Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, 1968, Vol 16, p 425.

25 JK Cotton Spg and Wvg Mills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 157], 444 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

26 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 264 [LNIND 1963 SC 2] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

27 Alembic Chemical Works Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 328 [LNIND 1960 SC 348], 334 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 647 [LNIND 1960 SC 348]: [1961] 3 SCR 297 [LNIND 1960 SC 348], per Gajendragadkar J.

28 RB Diwan Badri Das v Industrial Tribunal (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 630 [LNIND 1962 SC 293]: [1963] 3 SCR 930 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], per Gajendragadkar J.

29 Mohammed & Sons v Workmen CA No 338 of 1966 (27-7-1967) (SC), per Wanchoo CJI.

30 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1968 SC 193], 240-42 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 306 [LNIND 1968 SC 193]: [1969] 1 SCR 550 [LNIND 1968 SC 193] per Shelat J.

31 Uttar Pradesh Electric Supply Co v RK Shukla (1969) 2 LLJ 728 [LNIND 1969 SC 200], 738 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 237 [LNIND 1969 SC 200]: (1969) 2 SCC 400 [LNIND 1969 SC 200], per Shah J.

32 Workmen v Otis Elevators Co (India) Ltd (1972) 1 LLJ 166 [LNIND 1971 SC 543], 168-70 (SC) : (1972) 4 SCC 690 [LNIND 1971 SC 543], per Vaidialingam J.

33 Rai Bahadur Diwan Badri Das v IT (1962) 2 Lt J 366, 371-72 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

34 Gramophone Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 131 [LNIND 1964 SC 114], 137-38 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

35 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 264 [LNIND 1963 SC 2], 266 (SC) : 1963 Supp (2) SCR 736 : (1963) 3 FLR 196, per Das Gupta J.

36 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Workmen CA No 674 of 1968 (25-7-1968) (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

37 Dalmia Cement (Bharat) Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 130 [LNIND 1960 SC 82], 132-33 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 209 [LNIND 1960 SC 82], per Das Gupta J.

38 May and Baker v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], 98 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 678 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], per Wanchoo J.

39 Cinema Theatres v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 128 [LNIND 1964 SC 106], 131 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

40 Alembic Chemical Works Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 328 [LNIND 1960 SC 348] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 647 [LNIND 1960 SC 348]: [1961] 3 SCR 297 [LNIND 1960 SC 348], per Gajendragadkar J.

41 Calcutta Insurance Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1967 SC 36], 10-12 (SC), per Mitter J.

42 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen CA No 2105 of 1966 (11-8-1967) (SC), per Mitter J.

43 Alembic Glass Industries Ltd v Workmen (1976) 2 LLJ 316 [LNIND 1976 SC 241] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 2091 [LNIND 1976 SC 241]: (1976) 3 SCC 522 [LNIND 1976 SC 241], per Shinghal J.

44 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 178], 434 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

45 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]: [1964] 1 SCR 234 [LNIND 1962 SC 451], per Das Gupta J.

46 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v CWK Union (1972) 2 LLJ 40 [LNIND 1972 SC 178], 43 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1552 [LNIND 1972 SC 178]: (1972) 4 SCC 23 [LNIND 1972 SC 178], per Mathew J.

47 Technological Institute of Textiles v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 149 [LNIND 1965 SC 85], 152 (SC), per Ramaswami J.

48 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 117 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]: [1964] 1 SCR 234 [LNIND 1962 SC 451], per Das Gupta J.

49 Alembic Glass Industries Ltd v Workmen (1976) 2 LLJ 316 [LNIND 1976 SC 241] (SC), per Singhal J.

50 Shambhoo Singh v Central IT-cum-LC (1981) 2 LLJ 376, 378 (MP) (DB), per GB Singh CJ.

51 Indian Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], 268 (SC), per SK Das J.

52 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Piara Lal 1976 Lab IC 21, 25 (Delhi), per Rangarajan J.

53 Binny Ltd v Workmen 1973 Lab IC 1119 (SC), per Grover J.

54 Sawantram Ramprasad Mills Co Ltd v Kundanmal Sardarmal Jain (l960) 1 LLJ 63 (Bom) (DB), per Tambe J.

55 Uttar Pradesh Electric Supply Co v RK Shukla (1969) 2 LLJ 728 [LNIND 1969 SC 200], 738 (SC), per Shah J.

56 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen CA No 2105 of 1966 (11-8-1969) (SC), per Mitter J.

57 Pfizer Pvt Ltd, Bombay v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 543 [LNIND 1962 SC 400], 555 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

58 Associated Cement Staff Union v Associated Cement Co (1964) 1 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1963 SC 279], 15 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 914 [LNIND 1963 SC 279], per Das Gupta J.

59 Mohammed & Sons v Workmen CA No 338 of 1966 (27 July 1967), per Wanchoo CJI.

60 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, Para 9.43, at p 105

61 Saxby and Farmer (India) Ltd v Workmen 1975 Lab IC 361 -62 (SC), per Grover J.

62 Pfizer Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 543, 555 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

63 Workmen of NTC of India v NTC of India , CA No 852 of 1966 (18 October 1966) (SC), per Bhargava J.

64 Bhiwani Textile Mills v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1969 SC 97] (SC), 65 Federation of S&ME Industries v Workmen 1972 Lab IC 1275 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2126 : (1973) 3 SCC 374, per Vaidialingam J.

66 Bijli Cotton Mills Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 320 [LNIND 1972 SC 182], 327 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1903 [LNIND 1972 SC 182]: (1972) 1 SCC 840 [LNIND 1972 SC 182], per Dua J.

67 Hindustan Steel Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 250 [LNIND 1973 SC 176] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1397 [LNIND 1973 SC 176]: (1974) 3 SCC 182 [LNIND 1973 SC 176], per Mukherjee J.

68 Saxby and Farmer (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen 1975 Lab IC 361 -62 (SC), per Grover J.

69 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 247.

70 Smith's Labour Law, 1954, 2nd ed, p 723.

71 Mathurdas Kanji v LAT (1958) 2 LLJ 265 [LNIND 1958 SC 46], 269 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

72 Government of India (1969), Report NCL-I, p 247.

73 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 9 [LNIND 1959 SC 92], 14 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1095 [LNIND 1959 SC 372]: 1959 Supp (2) SCR 1012, per Wanchoo J.

74 Smith's Labour Law, 1954, 2nd ed, p 723.

75 Burn & Co v Employees (1960) 2 LLJ 261 [LNIND 1960 SC 99] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 896 [LNIND 1960 SC 99]: [1960] 3 SCR 423 [LNIND 1960 SC 99], per Wanchoo J.

76 National Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 752 [LNIND 1962 SC 271], 756 (SC), per Mudholkar J.

77 Hindustan Steel Ltd v State of Orissa ,CA No 1969 of 1969 (4-4-1975) (SC), per Gupta J.

78 (1972) 1 LLJ 642 [LNIND 1972 SC 140], 652 (SC), per Mitter J.

79 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, Para 7.8, at p. 249.

80 Raza Buland Sugar Co Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 35 [LNIND 1972 SC 173] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2292 [LNIND 1972 SC 173]: (1973) 4 SCC 158 [LNIND 1972 SC 173], per Vaidialingam J.

81 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2332 [LNIND 1972 SC 127]: (1972) 3 SCC 552 [LNIND 1972 SC 127].

82 Mumbai Kamgar Sabha v Abdulbhai Faizullabhai (1976) 2 LLJ 186 [LNIND 1976 SC 84] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

83 Mahalaxmi Cotton Mills v Workmen (1952) 2 LLJ 635 (LAT).

84 Ispahani Ltd v Employees' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 4 [LNIND 1959 SC 100], 7 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

85 Grahams Trading Co (India) Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 393 [LNIND 1959 SC 103], 396 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1151 [LNIND 1959 SC 103]: [1960] 1 SCR 107 [LNIND 1959 SC 103], per Wanchoo J.

86 Isphani Ltd v Isphani Employees' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 4 [LNIND 1959 SC 100] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1147 [LNIND 1959 SC 100]: [1960] 1 SCR 24 [LNIND 1959 SC 100] per Wanchoo J.

87 Bombay Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 109 [LNIND 1964 SC 103], III (SC), per Wanchoo J.

88 Tulsidas Khimji v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 435 [LNIND 1962 SC 160] (SC), per Sinha CJI.

89 Grahams Trading Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 393 [LNIND 1959 SC 103], 396 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1151 [LNIND 1959 SC 103]: [1960] 1 SCR 107 [LNIND 1959 SC 103], per Wanchoo J.

90 BN Elias and Co Ltd Employees' Union v BN Elias and Co Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 219 [LNIND 1960 SC 90], 221 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 886 [LNIND 1960 SC 90]: [1960] 3 SCR 382 [LNIND 1960 SC 90], per Wanchoo J.

91 Jardine Henderson v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 405 [LNIND 1962 SC 103], 408 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 474 [LNIND 1962 SC 103]: 1962 Supp (3) SCR 582, per Wanchoo J.

92 Tulsidas Khirija v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 435 [LNIND 1962 SC 160] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1007 [LNIND 1962 SC 160]: [1963] 1 SCR 675 [LNIND 1962 SC 160], per Sinha CJI.

93 Tocklai Experimental Station v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 694 [LNIND 1961 SC 361] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

94 Workmen of Modern Tile & Clay Works v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 657 (Ker), per Mathew J.

95 (1962) 1 LLJ 435 [LNIND 1962 SC 160], 443 (SC), per Sinha CJI for the majority.

96 Tulsidas Khimji v Workmen (1962) I LLJ 435 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1007 [LNIND 1962 SC 160], per Sinha CJI.

97 Tulsidas Khimji v Workmen (1962) I LLJ 435(SC) : [1963] 1 SCR 675 [LNIND 1962 SC 160], per Ayyangar J (dissenting).

1 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 142-4.

2 Vegetable Products Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 468 [LNIND 1964 SC 308], 471-72 (SC) : AIR 1965 S C 1499 [LNIND 1964 SC 308], per Wanchoo J.

3 Sri Upendra Chandra Chakraborty v United Bank of India (1985) 2 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1985 SC 157], 400 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 1010 [LNIND 1985 SC 157]: 1985 Supp SCC 26, per Khalid J.

4 Kerala Vyapari Vyavasayi Youth Wing Pathanamthitta D Committee v State of Kerala 1989 Lab IC 938, 940 (Ker), per Viswanatha Iyer J.

5 Churakulam Tea Estate Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1968 SC 256] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 998 [LNIND 1968 SC 256]: (1969) 1 SCR 931 [LNIND 1968 SC 256], per Vaidialingam J.

6 Jabalpur BK Punchayat v Jabalpur Electric Supply Co Ltd 1972 Lab IC 3 [LNIND 1971 SC 359], 9 (SC), per Mitter J.

7 Vegetable Products Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 468 [LNIND 1964 SC 308], 471 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

8 Bombay Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 109 [LNIND 1964 SC 103] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

9 Vegetable Products Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 468 [LNIND 1964 SC 308], 471 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

10 (1961) 1 LLJ 521 [LNIND 1960 SC 321] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

11 Ibid 538, per Subba Rao J.

12 Rallis India Ltd v IT 1979 Lab IC (NOC) 98 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

13 Government of India, Report of the National Commission on Labour, pp 111-12.

14 Labour Investigation Committee, 1946, (cited in) Govt of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 110.

15 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 112.

16 Dharangadhara Chemical Works v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 197 [LNIND 1962 SC 19] (SC), per Sarkar J.

17 India Genl Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 372, 375 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

18 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 162.

19 Novex Dry Cleaners v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 271 [LNIND 1962 SC 50], 275 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

20 Air Lines Hotel Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1961) I LLJ 663, 667 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

21 Novex Dry Cleaners v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 271 [LNIND 1962 SC 50], 274-75 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

22 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366], 749-50 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1327 [LNIND 1962 SC 366], per Wanchoo J.

23 Bharatkhand Textile Manufacturing Co Ltd v Textile Labour Assn, Ahmedabad (1960) 2 LLJ 21 [LNIND 1960 SC 81] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

24 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 542 [LNIND 1967 SC 225] (SC), per Shah J.

25 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 765 (SC), per Shah J.

26 Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 830 [LNIND 1959 SC 185], 832 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

27 Namburinadi Tea Co Ltd v Workmen of NTE 1968 Lab IC 1386 (Assam & Naga), per Goswami J.

28 Salem-Erode Electricity Co v Employees' Union (1966) 1 LLJ 443 [LNIND 1965 SC 293] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

29 Bombay Labour Union v International Franchises Pvt Ltd (1966) 1 LLJ 41 [LNIND 1965 SC 217] 7 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

30 Mahalakshmi Sugar Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 623 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

31 Darshak Ltd v IT (1986) 1 LLJ 253, 261-62 (Kant), per Ramajois J.

32 Punjab State Co-operative Supply and Marketing Federation Ltd v State of Punjab 1996 Lab IC 1463, 1464-65 (P&H), per NK Sodhi J.

33 Sukhjit Starch and Chemicals Ltd v State of Punjab (1962) 2 LLJ 269 (Punj), per Gosain J.

34 Air India Cabin Crew Assn v Air India (1981) 2 LLJ 306, 308 (Born) (DB), per Pratap J.

35 Secretary of Tamil Nadu Electricity Board Accounts Subordinate Union v Tamil Nadu EB (1984) 2 LLJ 478 (Mad), per Mohan J.

36 Workmen of Indian Bank v Management of Indian Bank (1985) 1 LLJ 6 (Mad), per Natarajan J.

37 South Arcot Central Co-operative Bank Employees Assn v Management 1995 Lab IC 783, 785 (Mad) (DB), per Somasundaram J.

38 Workmen of Dimakuchi Tea Estate v DTE (1958) 1 LLJ 500 [LNIND 1958 SC 1], 504 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 353 [LNIND 1958 SC 1], per SK Das J.

39 Vijay Kumar Mills v Vijaykumar Mills National Workers Union (1964) 2 LLJ 399 [LNIND 1963 MAD 242]-400 (Mad) (DB), per Ramachandra Ayyar CJ.

40 All India Reserve Bank Employees' Assn v RBI (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 188 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

41 NK Sen v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1953) 1 LLJ 6, 9-10 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

42 United Commercial Bank Ltd v KN Gupta (1952) 1 LLJ 782 (LAT) (FB).

43 Workmen of DTE v Dahingeapara Tea Estate. (1958) 2 LLJ 498 [LNIND 1958 SC 79], 503 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1026 [LNIND 1958 SC 79], per SK Das J.

44 Kays Construction Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124], 665-66 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

45 Standard Vacuum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 233 [LNIND 1960 SC 109], 238 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

46 Bombay Union of Journalists v The Hindu (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 440 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 318 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], per Shah J.

47 All India RBE Assn v Reserve Bank of India (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 188 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 305 [LNIND 1965 SC 146]: [1966] 1 SCR 25 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], per Hidayatullah J.

48 Andhra Bank Employees' Assn v Andhra Bank Ltd 1978 Lab IC 1001 (AP) (DB), per Gangadhara Rao J.

49 Management of Indian Bank Ltd v IT (CG) (1977) 1 LLJ 343 [LNIND 1977 MAD 49] (Mad), per Koshal J.

50 Mgmt of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Delhi Administration 1977 Lab IC 681 (Del), per AB Rohtagi J.

51 Management, Southern Textile Ltd v United TLA (1983) 1 LLJ 435 [LNIND 1982 MAD 239] (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

52 Vallamalai Estate v Workers of Vallamalai Estate (1973) 1 LLJ 273 [LNIND 1972 MAD 165], 277 (Mad) (DB), per Veeraswami CJ.

53 Workmen of Dahingeapara Tea Estate v Dahingeapara Tea Estate (1958) 2 LLJ 498 [LNIND 1958 SC 79] (SC), per SK Das J.

54 Kays Construction Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 660 [LNIND 1958 SC 124] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

55 Standard Vacuum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 233 [LNIND 1960 SC 109] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

56 Bhatkawa Tea Co Ltd v HR Deb AIR 1961 Cal 395 [LNIND 1961 CAL 12], per Sinha J.

57 East Asiatic Co (India) Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1961) 1 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1960 CAL 102] (Cal)(DB), per Lahiri CJ.

58 Travancore Rubber Works Employees Union v IT (1962) 1 LLJ 478 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

59 Vijayakumar Mills Ltd v Vijayakumar National Workers Union (1964) 2 LLJ 399 [LNIND 1963 MAD 242] (Mad) (DB), per Ramachandra Ayyar CJ.

60 Mukand Ltd v Mukand Staff and Officers Association AIR 2004 SC 3905 [LNIND 2004 SC 307], per Dr Lakshmanan J.

61 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip S Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

62 Workmen of Indian Standards Institution v Mgmt of ISI (1976) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1975 SC 389] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 145 [LNIND 1975 SC 389]: (1975) 2 SCC 847 [LNIND 1975 SC 389], per Bhagwari J.

63 Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v PSMM Union (1957) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1956 SC 84], 239 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 95 [LNIND 1956 SC 84]: [1956] 1 SCR 872 [LNIND 1956 SC 84], per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

64 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 554 [LNIND 1967 SC 291]: [1968] 1 SCR 742 [LNIND 1967 SC 291], per Hidayatullah J.

65 Mgmt of Safdarjung Hospital v Kuldip Singh Sethi (1970) 2 LLJ 266 [LNIND 1970 SC 180] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1407 [LNIND 1970 SC 180]: (1970) 1 SCC 735 [LNIND 1970 SC 180], per Hidayatullah CJI.

66 Bangalore WSS Board v A Rajappa (1978) 1 LLJ 349 [LNIND 1978 SC 70] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

67 Mgmt of Hindustan Steel Ltd v Workmen 1973 Lab IC 461 [LNIND 1973 SC 12] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 878 [LNIND 1973 SC 12]: (1973) 3 SCC 564 [LNIND 1973 SC 12], per Dua J.

68 Avon Services (P) Agencies Ltd v IT (1979) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1978 SC 284] (SC), per Desai J.

69 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

70 Ibid.

71 MA Veiyra v CP Fernandez (1956) 1 LLJ 547 [LNIND 1955 BOM 261], 549 (Born) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

72 Workmen of Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co of India Pvt Ltd v Mgmt (1976) 1 LLJ 493 [LNIND 1976 SC 49] (SC), per Untwalia J.

73 Gaya Cotton and Jute Mills Ltd v GCJML Union (1952) 2 LLJ 37 (LAT).

74 Priya Laxmi Mills Ltd v Mazdoor Mahajan Mandal (1977) 1 LLJ 22 [LNIND 1976 SC 355] (SC), per Goswami J.

75 H Chinnapan v Kaleeswara Mills Ltd (1968) 1 LLJ 352, 354 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

76 Central India Spg, Wvg and Mfg Co Ltd v IC (1959) 1 LLJ 468 [LNIND 1958 BOM 96], 473 (Born) (DB), per Mudholkar J.

77 Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 277 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

78 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Pvt Ltd v Firestone Ltd (1976) 1 LLJ 493 [LNIND 1976 SC 49], 497 (SC), per Untwalia J.

79 Kairbetta Estate Kotagiri v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 277 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

80 Brought into force on 21 August 1984.

81 Central India Spg Wvg & Mfg Co Ltd v IC (1959) 1 LLJ 468 [LNIND 1958 BOM 96], 472 (Born) (DB) : AIR 1958 Bom 225 [LNIND 1957 BOM 77]: (1958) 60 Bom LR 440, per Mudholkar J.

82 Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 277-78 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 893 [LNIND 1960 SC 92]: [1960] 3 SCR 371 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], per Gajendragadkar J.

83 Workers of Dewan Tea Estate v Management (1964) 1 LLJ 358 [LNIND 1963 SC 264] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

84 R Narayanaswami v LC (1965) 2 LLJ 677 [LNIND 1965 MAD 23] (Mad), per Ramakrishan J.

85 Hope Textiles Ltd v State of Madhya Pradesh (1993) 1 LLJ 603 -04 (MP) (DB) : (1992) 65 FLR 770 : (1992) 2 MPJR 44, per Kokje J.

86 Management of Gauhati Press Pvt Ltd v LC 1983 Lab IC 824, 827 (Gau), per Saikia J.

87 SAE Mazdoor Union v Labour Commr (2001) 4 LLN 1105. 1109-10, (MP), per Kulshreshta J.

88 RS Rekchand Mohatas Spg and Wvg Mills Pvt Ltd v LC (1968) 1 LLJ 610 [LNIND 1967 BOM 38], 613 (Bom), per Paranjpe J.

89 Ibid, 614.

90 MA Veiyra v CP Fernadez (1956) 1 LLJ 547 [LNIND 1955 BOM 261], 550 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

91 KT Rolling Mills Pvt Ltd v MR Meh (1963) 2 LLJ 667 [LNIND 1962 SC 315] (Bom) (FB).

92 South India Corpn v All Kerala CFW Federation (1960) 2 LLJ 103 (Ker) : AIR 1960 Ker 208 [LNIND 1959 KER 246]: 1960 KLJ 129, per TK Joseph J.

93 Workers of Dewan Tea Estate v Management (1964) 1 LLJ 358 [LNIND 1963 SC 264] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

94 (1976) 1 LLJ 493 [LNIND 1976 SC 49] (SC), per Untwalia J.

95 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Pvt Ltd v Firestone Ltd (1976) 1 LLJ 493 [LNIND 1976 SC 49], 497 (SC), per Untwalia J.

96 Tatanagar Foundry Co v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 382 [LNIND 1962 SC 110], 385 (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1533 [LNIND 1962 SC 110]: 1962 Supp (3) SCR 795, per Gajendragadkar J.

1 MA Veryra v CP Fernandez (1956) 1 LLJ 547 [LNIND 1955 BOM 261] (Born), per Chagla CJ.

2 Anusuyabai Vithal v JH Mehta (1959) 2 LLJ 742, 744 (Born) (DB) : (1959) 61 Bom LR 417, per Chainani CJ.

3 Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 277 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

4 H Chinnapan v Kaleeswara Mills Ltd (1968) 1 LLJ 352, 354 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

5 Sri Ramachandra Spg Mills v State of Madras (1957) 1 LLJ 90, 92-93 (Mad): 1957 ILR 90, per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

6 Brought into force on 21 August 1984.

7 Mohamed Samsuddin v Sasamusa Sugar Works Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 575, 577 (LAT).

8 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workers (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 232 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

9 Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 278 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

10 Taylor, The Vountary Arbitration of Labour Disputes, 1951, 49 Mich, L Rev 787, 789-90.

11 RE Mathews, Labor Relations and the Law, 1953, p 294.

12 Andhra Pradesh EEC v APEEC Staff Union (1987) 1 LLJ 324, 327 (AP), per K Ramaswamy J.

13 Feroz Din v State of West Bengal (1960) 1 LLJ 244 [LNIND 1959 SC 208], 249 (SC), per Sarkar J.

14 Mohamed Samsuddin v Sasamsua Sugar Works Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ; 575, 577 (LAT).

15 Shakti Electro Mechanical Industries Pvt Ltd v FN Lala (1974) 2 LLJ 1, 5-6 (Born) : (1974) 76 Bom LR 42 : 1974 Mhlj 264 [LNIND 1972 BOM 61], per KK Desai J.

16 Feroz Din v State of West Bengal (1960) 1 LLJ 244 [LNIND 1959 SC 208], 248 (SC), per Sarkar J.

17 Mohamed Samsuddin v Sasamusa Sugar Works Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 575 (LAT).

18 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Sarup (1957) 1 LLJ 17 [LNIND 1956 SC 85], 22 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

19 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workers & Staff Employed (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 232 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 569 [LNIND 1962 SC 253]: [1963] 3 SCR 540 [LNIND 1962 SC 253], per Gajendragadkar J.

20 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workers & Staff (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 232 (SC), AIR 1963 SC 569 [LNIND 1962 SC 253] per Gajendragadkar J.

21 General Labour Union (Red Flag), Bombay v BV Chavan 1985 Lab IC 726, 728 (SC), per Desai J.

22 Govrepore Co Ltd v Nuddea Mills Co Ltd (1990) 2 LLJ 245 [LNIND 1989 CAL 262], 247 (Cal), per MK Mukherjee J.

23 Mgmt of RF Engg Ltd v State of Bihar 1970 Lab IC 1119, 1126 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

24 Kamalalaya Stores Karamchari Samity v Kamalalaya Stores Pvt Ltd 1977 Lab IC (NOC) 110 (Cal), per Basak J.

25 Lord Krishna Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1964) 2 LLJ 76 (All), per Dwivedi J.

26 Anamallais Timber Trust Ltd v Chacko (1952) 2 LLJ 604 (LAT).

27 Praboo Pandey v JK Jute Mills Co Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 588 (LAT).

28 Industrial and General Engineering Co v Workmen (1964) 2 LLL 438(Mys) (DB), per Somnath Ayyar J.

29 State of Bihar v Deodar Jha AIR 1958 Pat 51, 58 (DB), per Banerji J.

30 Feroz Din v State of West Bengal (1960) 1 LLJ 244 [LNIND 1959 SC 208] (SC), per Sarkar J.

31 Iron Moulders' Union v Allis-Chambers Co 20 LRA (NS) 315.

32 Abrams v Alien 173 AIR 671.

33 Gobindo Sheet Metal Works and Foundry v Workmen 11 FJR 363 (LAT).

34 Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v Workmen 10 FJR 413 (LAT).

35 Workmen of Sur Iron and Steel Co Pvt Ltd v Mgmt (1971) 1 LLJ 570, 573 (SC), per Bhargava J.

36 Northbrook Jute Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1960 SC 87] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

37 Lord Krishna Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1964) 2 LLJ (79) (All), per Dwivedi J.

38 India Machinery Mazdoor Union v India Machinery Co Ltd (1956) 2 LLJ 408 (LAT).

39 Mgmt of Hindustan Steel Ltd v State of Orissa 1970 Lab IC 1233 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

40 India Marine Service Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 122 [LNIND 1962 SC 260], 126 (SC), per Mudholkar J.

41 Northern Dooars Tea Co Ltd v Workmen of Dem Dima Tea Estate (1964) 1 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 184], 440 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

42 Pradip Lamp Works v Pradip Lamp Works Karamchari Sangh (1956) 1 LLJ 507 (SC), per Dua J.

43 Itakhoolie Tea Estate v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 95 [LNIND 1960 SC 8] (SC), per Subba Rao J.

44 Bhowra Coke Plant v Bhowra Coke Plant Workers' Union (1956) 1 LLJ 195 (LAT).

45 Cement Works Karamchari Sangh v IT 1971 Lab IC 143, 146-47 (Raj), per Tyagi J.

46 Municipal Council, Washim v Manguji Zenduji Dhamane 1978 Lab IC 881, 888 (Bom) (DB), per Dharmadhikari J.

47 Municipal and Panchayat Employees Union v State of Gujarat (1988) 1 LLJ 309 (Guj), per Ahmadi J.

48 Workmen of State Bank of India v State Bank of India 1990 Lab IC 1750 (SC), per Sawant J.

49 Avon Services (Production Agencies) Pvt Ltd v IT (1979) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1978 SC 284], 7 (SC), per Desai J.

50 Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v PSM Mazdoor Union (1957) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1956 SC 84], 239 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 95 [LNIND 1956 SC 84]: [1956] 1 SCR 72 [LNIND 1956 SC 9] per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

51 Santosh Gupta v State Bank of Patiala, (1980) II LLN 170(SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

52 Bharat Coking Coal Ltd v CGIT 1995 Lab IC 971, 974 (Cal), per AK Chakravarty J.

53 Ibid, 241-42.

54 Barsi Light Rly Co Ltd v KN Joglekar (1957) 1 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1956 SC 104], 247 (SC), per SK Das J.

55 Ibid, 248-52.

56 Kamleshkumar R Mehta v PO, CGIT (1980) 1 LLJ 336, 346 (Bom) (DB) : 1979 mh LJ 874 per Lentin J.

57 Anakapalle CAIS Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 621 [LNIND 1962 SC 345], 628-29 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1489 [LNIND 1962 SC 345]: [1963] supp 1 SCR 730 per Gajendragadkar J.

58 Municipal Corpn of Greater Bombay v LAT (1957) 1 LLJ 37, 44 (Bom), per Shah J.

59 Mst Dewli Bakaram v State Industrial Court (1959) 1 LLJ 475 [LNIND 1958 BOM 99] (Bom) (DB), per Mudholkar J.

60 National Garage v J Gonsalves (1962) 1 LLJ 56 [LNIND 1961 BOM 51] (Bom) (FB) : AIR 1962 Bom 152 [LNIND 1961 BOM 53] per Chainani CJ.

61 Goodlass Nerolac Paints Pvt Ltd v Chief Commr, Delhi (1967) 1 LLJ 545 [LNIND 1966 PNH 57] (Punj) : AIR 1962 Bom 152 [LNIND 1961 BOM 53] per Narula J.

62 Haji Ismail Said & Son Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 59 [LNIND 1965 CAL 127], 68 (Cal) (DB) : AIR 1966 Cal 375 [LNIND 1965 CAL 127] per PB Mukharji J.

63 Burrakur Coal Co Ltd v Azimuddin Ashraff (1960) 2 LLJ 434, 437-38 (Pat) (DB) : AIR 1960 Pat 554 per Kanhaiya Singh J.

64 Rajasthan SEB v LC (1966) 1 LLJ 381, 388-89 (Raj) (DB) : AIR 1966 Raj 56 per Kan Singh J.

65 Mettur Industries Ltd v AR Verma (1958) 2 LLJ 326 [LNIND 1958 MAD 52] (Mad) : AIR 1959 Mad 479 [LNIND 1958 MAD 52] per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

66 State Transport Controller v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 376, 385-86 (Ori) (DB).

67 SK Neogi v Union of India AIR 1970 Assam & Nag 131, 137 (DB), per Goswami J.

68 CVA Hydross & Son v Joseph Sanjon (1967) 1 LLJ 509 (Ker) : 1966 KLJ 113 per Mathew J.

69 Digwadih Colliery v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 118 [LNIND 1965 SC 93]-19 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 75 [LNIND 1965 SC 93]: [1965] 3 SCR 448 [LNIND 1965 SC 93] per Hidayatullah J.

70 Mgmt of Wilcox Buckwell (India) Ltd v Jagannath 1974 Lab IC 706 -07 (SC), per Grover J.

71 Delhi Cloth and Gen Mills Co Ltd v Shambhu Nath Mukherjee 1977 Lab IC 1695 [LNIND 1977 SC 280], 1698 (SC), per Goswami J.

72 State of Punjab v Labour Court AIR 1979 SC 1981 [LNIND 1979 SC 410]: 1980 Lab IC 1084 : [1980] 1 SCR 953 [LNIND 1979 SC 410] per Pathak J.

73 A Sambanthan v PO Addl LC (1998) 3 LLN 388, 393 (Mad), per Balasubramanian J.

74 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, p 39, para 6.43.

75 Haji Ismail Said and Son Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 59 [LNIND 1965 CAL 127], 68 (Cal) (DB) : AIR 1966 Cal 375 [LNIND 1965 CAL 127] per PB Mukharji J.

76 Devidayal N Sharma v State IC (1961) 1 LLJ 167 (Bom) (DB) : AIR 1959 Bom 65 [LNIND 1958 BOM 82] per Mudholkar J.

77 Amritsar Rayon & Silk Mills Pvt Ltd v IT (1962) 1 LLJ 176 (Punj), per Gosain J.

78 SK Neogi v Union of India AIR 1970 Assam & Nag 131,137 (DB), per Goswami J.

79 S Kannan v Union of India 1978 Lab IC (NOC) 128 (Mad), per Mohan J.

80 L Krishnan v Divl Personnel Officer, Southern Rly (1972) 2 LLJ 568 (Ker) (DB) 1972 KLJ 1001 per Subramonian Poti J.

81 Divl PO, Southern Rly v GJ Reddy 1976 Lab IC 115, 120 (AP) (DB), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

82 State Bank of India v N Sundaramony (1975) 1 LLJ 453 [LNIND 1975 MAD 66] (Mad) (DB) (1975) ILR 3 Mad 150 per Veeraswamy J.

83 Basant Lal Sah v DME (C&W) NE Rly 1976 Lab IC 609 (Pat) (DB), per BD Singh J.

84 Balkrishna Ganpat v Ruston and Horns (India) Ltd, Bombay (1956) 1 LLJ 599 (LAT).

85 Hindustan Steel Ltd v State of Orissa 1970 Lab IC 345 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

86 State Bank of India v N Sundaramony (1976) 1 LLJ 478 [LNIND 1976 SC 13] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 1111 [LNIND 1976 SC 13]: 1976 Lab IC 769 [LNIND 1976 SC 13] per Krishna Iyer J.

87 Pipraich Sugar Mills (1957) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1956 SC 84] (SC): AIR 1957 SC 95 [LNIND 1956 SC 84] per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

88 Hariprasad Shivshankar Shukla v AD Divekar (1957) 1 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1956 SC 104] (SC), per SK Das J.

89 Hindustan Steel Ltd v State of Orissa (1977) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1976 SC 330], 3-4 (SC), per Gupta J.

90 Basant Lal Sah v DME(CW) NE Rly, (1977) 2 LLJ 154, 161 (Pat) (DB), per BD Singh J.

91 Asst PO, Southern Rly v KT Antony (1978) 2 LLJ 254 (Ker) : ILR 1978 (1) Kev 216

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Post Sundaramony Phase - Judicial Chaos

The High Courts of Delhi,[92] and Bombay,[93] and a single judge of the Madras High Court,[94] held that there was no inconsistency between the ratio of Barsi Light Rly and that of the N Sundaramony and Hindustan Steel. In other words, the ratio of the Barsi Light Rly case, that 'retrenchment' is a discharge of surplus labour by the employer, 'for any reason whatsoever', has remained unshaken by the subsequent decisions, in State Bank of India and Hindustan Steel, and has not been in any way, departed from. On the other hand, the Madras High Court, in Raghavachari, held that the concept of surplusage is no longer sustainable, in view of the definition of retrenchment meaning 'the termination by the employer, of the services of a workman for any reason whatsoever'.[95] But in Santosh Gupta, a two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court again discountenanced the contention that retrenchment means a discharge of a workman on account of surplusage, with the observation:

> If this submission is right, there was no need to define the expression 'retrenchment' and in such wide terms. We cannot assume that the Parliament was undertaking an exercise in futility, to give a long-winded definition, merely to say that the expression means what it always meant.[96]

In this case, the service of the employee was terminated after the completion of 240 days of continuous service, before the date of the termination of service, without complying with the requirements of the provisions of s 25F. The termination of service as 'retrenchment' was disputed by the employee on the ground of non-compliance with the provisions of s 25F, which was contested by the employer on the ground that it was not a case of 'retrenchment', because the service was terminated for the reason that the employee had failed to pass the relevant test required for confirmation in the service. It was contended that since it was not a case of surplusage, there was no 'retrenchment' of the employee. The tribunal accepted the pleas of the employer. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court distinguished Barsi Light Rly on the ground that it was decided before the insertion of the present ss 25FF and 25FFF in the Act. The court also noticed the observations in that case to the effect that a 'termination of service for any reason whatsoever', would mean 'no more and less than the discharge of a labour force which is a surplusage, but glossed that the misunderstanding of these observations resulted in confusion, firstly from not appreciating the real question which was posed and answered in that case and, secondly, the reference to discharge on account of surplusage was 'illustrative, and not exhaustive, by way of contrast with a discharge on account of transfer or closure of business'. Then, the court relied on the observations in Hindustan Steel, to the effect that there was nothing inconsistent in N Sundaramony's case with Barsi Light Rly. In coming to the conclusion that the words 'for any reasons whatsoever', in the definition of 'retrenchment', should be understood to mean 'what they plainly say', the court observed that the expression 'retrenchment' must include 'every termination of the service of a workman, by an act of the employer', unhampered by precedent. In other words, every termination of service of a workman, whether as surplus or otherwise, would be 'retrenchment'. This view was reiterated by a majority of a three judge Bench in Surendra Kumar.[1] In Mohan Lal,[2] again, a two-judge Bench of the court observed that 'niceties and semantics apart, a termination by the employer, of the service of a workman, for any reason whatsoever, would constitute retrenchment, except in such cases excepted in the section itself'. In this case also, the court emphasised that Barsi Light Rly was decided in the context of closure and was not dealing with the definition of retrenchment under s 2(oo) and adopted the reasoning of Santosh Gupta. Likewise, another two judge Bench of the court, in Robert D'Souza,[3] over-ruling the decision of the Full Bench of the Kerala High Courts, reiterated the later view, departing from Barsi Light Rly. In Gammon India, the termination of the service of the workman, on account of recession and reduction in the volume of work of the employer company, was held to be retrenchment in the traditional sense of the term.[4] The court then added a comment that that view does not hold the field, in view of the subsequent decisions ending with Robert D' Souza. Again, in KSRTC, another two-judge Bench of the court contented itself with the observation:

> We are inclined to hold that the stage has come when the view indicated in N Sundaramony's (supra) has been 'absorbed into the consensus' and there is no scope for putting the clock back or for an anticlockwise operation.[5]

But in all these cases, the court has kept its eyes shut as to the impact of this view on the other provisions of the Act. It is submitted that N Sundaramony, Hindustan Steel, Delhi Cloth Mills, Santosh Gupta, Surendra Kumar Verma, Mohan Lal and L Robert D'Souza cases were wrongly decided. These decisions are not in conformity with the ratio decidendi of the five-judge Bench decision in the Barsi Light Rly case, where the court, on the construction of 'retrenchment' as defined in s 2(oo), has unequivocally stated that 'retrenchment means discharge of surplus labour or staff by the employer, for any reason whatsoever...in no case is there any retrenchment unless there is a discharge of surplus labour or staff in a continuing or running industry'. In other words, unless there is discharge of surplus labour or staff, there can be no retrenchment. In Sundaramony's case, the employee used to be intermittently employed for a period of nine days and then discharged from service. It was not a case of discharge of surplus labour, but it was a case of discharge of the workman from service under the contract. Evidently, it was a case of an unfair labour practice. The result of striking down the termination of the service of the workman could, therefore, have been achieved directly by holding it to be a case of an unfair labour practice, instead of adopting the dubious path of holding it to be a case of retrenchment and striking it down for non-compliance of s 25F and thus, stultifying the law. The Hindustan Steel case again, was not a case of discharge of surplus labour. It was a case of discharge of a workman by efflux of time, under the contract. This may not even be a case of termination by the employer, within the meaning of the definition of 'retrenchment', because the termination of service by efflux of time is by the mutual contract of the parties and cannot be said to be a 'termination of service by the employer'.

In Delhi Cloth Mill's case, the name of the employee was struck off the rolls, the act purporting to be under a Standing Order, for having absented himself for more than eight consecutive days. But, in fact, he was not absent for eight consecutive days. This was again a case of a wrongful termination of service, rather than 'retrenchment', because there was no discharge of the workman as surplus. Santosh Gupta's case too was not a case of a discharge of the employee as surplus. The employee was discharged from the service for not having taken the test required for qualifying for confirmation. Though in the Hindustan Steel case, at least a specious observation was made that Sundarammoney had not departed from the ratio of the Barsi Light Rly case, however, in the case of Santosh Gupta, the majority opinion in Surendra Kumar Verma, Mohan Lal, KSRTC, leave no room for doubt that there is a clear departure. The decision of a larger Bench of the court must prevail over the decisions of smaller benches.[6] Now the five judge Bench in Punjab LDRC,[7] has reaffirmed the dicta of the smaller benches, deviating from the holding in Barsi Light Rly. As pointed out by Lord Hailsham of Marylebone, the Lord Chancellor, in Cassel & Co Ltd v Broom :

> ...in the hierarchical system of courts which exist in the country, it is necessary for each lower tier...to accept loyally, the decisions of the higher tiers. Where decisions manifestly conflict, the decision in Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd. ,[8] offers guidance to each tier, in matters affecting its own decisions. It does not entitle it to question considered decision in the upper tier, with the same freedom... [9]

If the court were of the view that Barsi Light Rly, did not lay down the correct law, it is desirable to constitute a larger Bench and restate the law. The later decisions have accentuated the literal meaning of the expression, 'the termination by the employer of the service of a workman for any reason whatsoever', without working out the implications and effect of the other relevant provisions of the Act, on the construction of the definitions of 'retrenchment'. The concept of 'surplusage' is implicit in the scheme of the provisions of the act, relating to 'retrenchment', viz, s 2A, s 25F, s 25G, s 25H, s 25N, s. 25O, item 10 of the Fourth Schedule and rr 76 and 76A, read with Forms P and PA of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. Though in the Punjab Land Development & Reclamation Corpn case, the court did refer to ss 25F, 25G and 25H, instead of working out their implication on the interpretation of the definition, it tangentially slipped into the concept of a harmonious construction, which neither the context nor the text of the definition warrants. While adopting the literal construction, the court has accentuated that the ratio of Barsi Light Rly should be understood in the context of its facts dealing with the, question that the termination of the services of the workmen, on closure of an undertaking, did not fall within the definition of retrenchment, while completely losing sight of the clear and candid interpretation of the definition by the earlier bench in Barsi Light Railway to the effect that retrenchment means discharge of surplus labour and that, in no case can there be retrenchment, if the discharge is not on account of surplasage. In the face of an unequivocal interpretation of the language of the definition, by a Constitution Bench affirmed by two Constitution Benches and one four-judge Bench (Hariprasad, Pipraich and Anakapalle), to say that the ratio of Barsi Light Rly was confined to its own facts, ie, the termination of the services of the workmen on account of closure was not retrenchment is, to say the least, a judicial perversion of highest order. Furthermore, if the ratio decidendi of Barsi Light Rly is to be confined to a termination of service of the workman on closure, ignoring the unequivocal interpretation of the definition, then the ratio of the cases like Bangalore Water Supply,[10] should be confined to the facts of those cases and the views of the court on other points should be treated no more than an obiter. From an analysis of these provisions, it would appear that it could never have been the intention of the legislature, to make retrenchment synonymous with a discharge simpliciter, ie, 'every termination of the service under the contract'.[11] If the observation in Santosh Gupta's case, that 'every termination of the service of a workman by an act of the employer', is 'retrenchment', is correct, then the termination of the service of an individual workman will be virtually impossible and absurd consequences, by applying the provisions of s 25G, s 25H, s 25N and s 25Q, will follow. In Surendra Kumar Verma,[12] in a separate judgment, Pathak J has recorded a candid and unequivocal dissent from the holding in Santosh Gupta's case, in observing: 'I mention this only because I should not be taken to have agreed with the interpretation of s 2(oo), rendered in Santosh Gupta v State Bank of Patiala'. This provides a justification for the court to reconsider and restate the law on the subject, with certainty. Even in English Law, the expression 'redundancy', which is the English counterpart of 'retrenchment', in its statutory definition, refers to three broad categories of redundancy: 'cession of the business or part of a business, moving or changing the place of employment, the employees surplus to the requirements of a business'.[13] While the appeals pending before the Supreme Court were lying dormant under a labyrinth of dust layers, the legislature has provided some relief by inserting sub-cl (bb) to s 2(oo), which excludes 'a contractual termination of service' from the definition of retrenchment'. See notes and comments under s 2(oo)(bb).[14] On the plain language of the definition, 'retrenchment' takes place only where the employer terminates the service of a workman. Despite the use of the words 'for any reason whatsoever', wherever it is claimed that there is retrenchment, it must necessarily be established that there is a termination of service of the workman, by the employer.[15] In other words, if the termination of the service of the workman is not by the employer, but is caused by the workman himself, by resigning or abandoning the job or it takes place due to his death, such termination will not fall within the ambit of the definition of 'retrenchment', because such termination of service is not caused by the employer.[16]

In Shambhu Nath Mukherjee,[17] the employer company struck the name of the workman off its rolls, purporting to act under the relevant Standing Order, for remaining absent for 'more than eight consecutive days'. But, in fact, the workman had not been absent for eight consecutive days. In these circumstances, the court held that striking the name of the workman off the rolls of the company, amounted to retrenchment, because the termination was caused by the employer and it was not under any Standing Order. This case, therefore, is not an authority for the proposition that where a workman is deemed to have himself left the service, it will be a case of retrenchment. Likewise, in Robert D'Souza,[18] the language of the order was as follows: 'your services are deemed to have been terminated'. From the language too, it would appear that the service was terminated by the employer and not by the employee himself. In Madhabananda Jena,[19] no contemporaneous material was placed before the court, to prove that the workman had been treated as an absconder and was dealt with as such. Furthermore, no cogent and plausible reason had been given as to how he could abscond from duty after having put in five years of service. Nor was he informed that if he did not join duty by a specific date, his service would be terminated. Striking off the name of the workman on these facts and in there circumstances, was held to amount to a termination of service by the employer. In HD Singh,[20] the Reserve Bank of India struck the name of the workman off its rolls, for the reason that he had passed the matriculation examination, without even giving him any order in writing or otherwise informing him. In this situation, striking the name of the workman off the bank's rolls, was held to be 'retrenchment'. The Andhra Pradesh Electricity Board, in terms of its Regulation 28(3), passed an order declaring that the workman had ceased to be in service, for absenting himself from duty without leave, for over a year. It was held that such an order amounts to retrenchment.[21] A single judge of the Calcutta High Court, in Naresh Chandra Das held that an automatic termination of the service of a workman, in accordance with the Standing Orders, will amount to retrenchment.[22] In this decision, the single judge has not considered the fundamental law, but has contented himself by juxtaposing the rival contentions and then, in the end, saying that there was no further scope to hold that 'simply because of the action of the employee, his service stood terminated, and the employer was not responsible for such termination, and the same was not retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo) '. Hardly any logical reasoning is discernible from the judgment. This view is incorrect. But if the power under the Standing Order is exercised mala fide, it would be a different matter.

For instance, in Dabur, in view of the conduct of the employer in not sanctioning or refusing extension of the leave of the concerned workman, as required by the Standing Orders, it was not permitted to treat the service of the workman to have automatically been terminated.[23] The Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the termination of the service of a workman in terms of the Standing Order, on the ground of inefficient and unsatisfactory work, would amount to retrenchment.[24] But the Orissa High Court held that where the Standing Orders provide that if the management is satisfied that it is inexpedient or against the interest of security, to continue to employ a workman, he may be discharged, and such discharge under the Standing Orders would not amount to retrenchment.[25] Likewise, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court, in Binny Ltd, has held that the termination of the service of a workman in terms of the standing orders, for absence from duty for a certain number of days, on his being arrested by the Police under s IPC for certain offences, will not constitute retrenchment.[26] Similarly, the Bombay High Court, in PSS Kharkhana, held that a striking off of the name of the workman from the rolls, for remaining absent for about three years, without any justification, would not constitute retrenchment. The court further observed that though striking the name of a workman, off the roll, without anything more, would constitute retrenchment, every striking off of the name from the rolls, would not constitute retrenchment. The intention to abandon the job is normally not to be attributed to an employee. It would ultimately depend on the established facts and circumstances of each case. It is just not possible to lay down a universal proposition that it may generally be observed, that a long and continuous absence for years together, without any reason or justification whatever and without anything more, can give rise to an inference of abandonment.[27] In providing work to a casual workman for a short periods, the consequential breaks in service being unavoidable, they will not necessarily lead to an inference of the termination of employment, as contemplated by the definition of retrenchment. There must be undisputable evidence of the fact that the casual workmen who have put in continuous service of not less than one year, have been unequivocally told that they will never be given work.[28] A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the termination of the service of a workman for a 'loss of confidence', would amount to retrenchment.[29] But in view of the undernoted dicta of the Supreme Court,[30] this holding is no longer good law. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that a termination of the service of a workman, who had attained the age of 60 years, 'when retrenchment becomes necessary' in terms of the relevant certified Standing Orders of the corporation, will be a retrenchment, requiring compliance with s 25F or 25 M, as the case may be.[31]

The decision rendered by a Constitution Bench, presided over by Mukharji CJI, in Punjab LDRC, has been identified for a detailed analysis, not because it had contributed in any commendable way, to the development of the law relating to retrenchment, but because of the host of infirmities manifested in the reasoning, the patent misreading of the ratio of Barsi Light Railway and other cases, the misapplication of law to the facts, and the predominantly obnoxious decision that was finally handed down by the Bench. The reasoning of Saikia J, who delivered the judgment, was inconsistent, ambivalent and is flooded with half tones. It is proposed to discuss a few aspects of this monumental decision below. Referring to Hariprasad Shivshankar Shukla, he observed:

> ...the court was neither called upon to decide, nor did it decide, whether in a continuing business, retrenchment was confined only to a discharge of the surplus staff and the reference to discharge of surplusage was for the purpose of contrasting the situation in that case, ie, workmen were being retrenched because of cessation of business and those observations did not constitute reasons for the decision. What was decided was that if there was not a continuing industry, the provision could not apply. In fact, the question whether retrenchment did or did not include other terminations, was never required to be decided in Hariprasad and could not, therefore, have been, or be taken to have been, decided by this court.[32]

This is a completely tainted reading of Hariprasad. The issue raised in Hariprasad (along with Barsi Light Railway and Pipraich Sugar Mills) was, 'whether retrenchment compensation was payable in the event of termination due to transfer or closure of undertaking.' These cases being the first of their kind to come up to the highest court, the Constitution Bench could not have straightaway determined that issue, without first answering the fundamental questions, namely, (i) what is the connotation of the term 'retrenchment' and (ii) what is its denotation, ie, would it cover a case of termination occasioned by a transfer or closure of the undertaking? The court rightly went into the basic issue of the 'definition', on which the derivative issue of the entitlement to compensation was solely dependant. The learned judges answered the basic question by observing that 'retrenchment' could have no wider meaning than the ordinary connotation of the word, according to which, it meant 'the discharge of surplus labour or staff'. They finally held that there could be no retrenchment, in the event of an en bloc termination due to a transfer or closure of the undertaking, on the principle that retrenchment presupposes the continuance of the business by the same employer, with the residual labour force. For that matter, the focus of the definition is on 'the' employer and not on 'an' employer. The principle of 'last come, first go', publication of seniority lists and the re-employment of retrenched workmen, richly endorse the ratio of Hariprasad, while rejecting Sundaramony and other cases decided by smaller benches. It would be as absurd to deny the nexus between these provisions and the definition, as to affirm their applicability to a case of loss of lien or discharge due to efflux of time. Then comes the following observation, which speaks volumes about the concern of Saikia J (or the lack of it) for judicial discipline-an issue that was indeed raised by the counsel:

> In a fast developing branch of Industrial and Labour Law, it may not always be of particular importance to rigidly adhere to a precedent, and a precedent may need to be departed from if the basis of legislation changes.[33]

A vast body of case law was evolved by the Apex Court on the principles of industrial adjudication and on almost every aspect of the employment relationship, during the 1950s and 1960s itself, thanks to eminent judges of the caliber and vision of Dr Gajendragadkar. Labour Law was not in an embryonic stage, as implied by this averment and at any rate, certainly not in the 1990s. Granted his proposition, still the reasoning hardly lends any support to the conclusion reached, as it calls for an affirmative answer to the further question, 'was there any change in the basis of legislation between Hariprasad-Anakapalle,[34] on the one hand and Sundaramony-Shambhunath Mukherjee on the other?' The answer is an emphatic 'No'. Thus, the departure heralded by the smaller benches, was without merit. The judicial trend began by Iyer J, and fostered by others, received the clearance of the Constitution Bench in Punjab Land Development Corporation, with a cascading effect down the line. Commenting on these disquieting judicial trends, HM Seervai observes:

> ...if judges disregard judgments binding on them, in order to give play to their own attitudes, concepts and ideals, the result can only be judicial chaos... this state of affairs must bring the administration of justice into disrepute by substituting for the certainty of the law, as laid down by the Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court, the uncertainty of the fluctuating opinion of different judges.[35]

This prophetic observation came true very soon in the realm of industrial law. In Kamaleshkumar, (decided on 4 September 1979), the Bombay High Court held that retrenchment under s 2(oo), meant only termination on account of surplusage and if the termination was for any other reason, it was not retrenchment. A few observations made by Lentin J, deserve special mention.

> A plain reading of section 2A ... gives a clear and unfailing indication that the legislature itself, had no intention of confusing or identifying retrenchment with other forms of termination of service and that in order to bring the case of an individual workman within the four corners of retrenchment, recourse can only be had to the definition of that word as contained in section 2(oo) .... Section 25G provides for the procedure for retrenchment, which can be summarised by the phraseology 'last come, first go'. Such a procedure would have been inconceivable if termination of service in a case other than surplusage, viz, say, for loss of confidence, was intended by the legislature to be categorised as retrenchment. This section also brings to the forefront, that the centrifugal force revolving round the terminology 'retrenchment' is excess or surplusage or superfluity... Section 25H makes this even clearer. That section provides for the re-employment of retrenched workmen and states that where any workmen are retrenched and the employer proposes to take into his employ any person, he shall, in the prescribed manner, give an opportunity to the retrenched workmen to offer themselves for re-employment and such retrenched workmen shall have preference over other persons. ... It would be anomalous to the point of absurdity and would result in a horrifying situation if an employer, who terminates the service of his workman for the loss of confidence or inefficiency or insubordination and the like, is to be expected ... to re-employ that very worker in the same industry or business and that too, in preference to other workmen, whose services are not terminated either for loss of confidence, inefficiency, insubordination and the like...The result would be utter chaos, where industry and business would grind to a halt. (pp 324-23). ... Item No 10 of the Fourth Schedule, which provides for conditions of service, for a change of which, notice is to be given, provides for 'rationalisation, standardization or improvement of plant or technique which is likely to lead to retrenchment of workmen.' Rule 81 of the Industrial Disputes (Bombay) Rules 1957, provides for the maintenance of a seniority list of workmen and states that the employer shall prepare a list of all workmen in the particular category, from which retrenchment is contemplated, arranged according to the seniority of their service in that category and cause a copy thereof to be pasted on a notice board in a conspicuous place, in the premises of the industrial establishment, at least seven days before the actual date of retrenchment. Form XXIV-A-I of form of notice, to be given by an employer under clause (c) of sub-section (1) of section 25N of the Industrial Disputes Act, provides that the employer must state that he proposes to retrench the particular workmen and he has to give a reply against each item mentioned in the annexure. Item 18 of that annexure, to which the employer must give his reply, is: 'anticipated savings due to the proposed retrenchment.' Thus, Item No 10, Rule 81 and form XXIV-A-I are yet further indications that it was not, and could never have been, the intention of the legislature, to make retrenchment synonymous with a termination on grounds like loss of confidence, insubordination or inefficiency. The entire scheme of the Act emphasises this abundant measure.[36]

Lentin J, had correctly analysed the definition, in an orderly and systematic way, with reference to the Constitution Bench decision rendered in Hariprasad and other cognate provisions of the Act and the rules made thereunder, and held that retrenchment means a termination on account of surplusage, and it was not the intention of the legislature to confuse or identify it with other forms of termination of service, such as, discharge, dismissal, termination, and so on, appearing in various sections of the IDA. This decision is pre-eminently right, while those rendered by the Supreme Court in Sundaramony, Santosh Gupta, Sambhunath Mukherjee, Hindustan Steel, Surendrakumar Verma, Mohan Lal, Robert D'Souza, including that of another Constitution Bench in Punjab Land Development Corporation, and others, are wholly misconceived and positively repugnant to the objects and scheme of the Act. Then came Guest Keen Williams, (decided in 1992), where the facts were: A workman, having availed an absence due to sickness, granted by ESI Corporation, did not report for duty on the expiry of the period and remained absent without permission. Consequently, the management informed the workman that in terms of the Standing Orders, he must be deemed to have left the services of the company without notice thereby, terminating his contract of service. The High Court held that the termination of service by the operation of Standing Order No 20, ie, remaining absent without leave for a specific period, resulting in the termination of his services, would not fall under s 2(oo) and hence would not be 'retrenchment'. Repelling the contentions raised by the counsel on the basis of the Supreme Court decisions rendered in Sundaramony et al, including that in Punjab LDRC, Mohan CJ, observed:

> ...as we have pointed out above, it was not by the act of the management, but it was by the operation of the Standing Order 20, that the workman himself had terminated his contract of service. We are unable to accept the argument advanced on behalf of the workman that the construction of the Standing Orders will have to yield to section 25J of the IDA, since it has an overriding effect. This argument ignores the language of section 2(oo) of the IDA. Only if it falls under section 2(oo), will section 25J come into play. Having regard to the pronouncement in Venkatayya's case,[37] we are not persuaded to conclude that in case of the workman terminating his service, it would amount to a 'discharge' within the meaning of section 2(oo) of the IDA.[38]

Leaving aside the jugglery of words and phrases, the facts of the case in Guest Keen Williams, were no different from Shambunath Mukherjee and Robert D'Souza. All the three cases refer to the same phenomenon, ie, continuous unauthorised absence or overstay of leave, for more than 8 or 9 consecutive days, which entails a loss of lien for the workman, the said absence having been treated as a voluntary abandonment of employment on his part. Accordingly, once the intimation has been sent, the name of the employee stands struck off from the muster rolls of the establishment. The observation of Mohan CJ, that the facts of Guest Keen Williams were different from Shambhunath Mukherjee and Robert D'Souza, is, therefore, without force. It is not a case of resignation on the part of the workman. It was a case of a deemed termination, occasioned by an unauthorised absence for a given number of days, and the case was identical to that of the other two cases. Even so, the reliance placed by the learned Chief Justice on Buckingham & Carnatic, is refreshing, in the light of the fact that all the later decisions led by Sundaramony, were wholly flawed in so far as they misconstrued the definition in s 2(oo) and expanded its sweep beyond the scheme of the Act and the contemplation of the legislature.

The third case was that of PSS Karkhana, in which the management invoked the relevant provision of the Standing Orders and struck off the name of a workman, who remained absent for more than 8 consecutive days (in this case, he was absent for nearly three years). Puranik J, of the Bombay High Court, distinguished Shambhunath Mukherjee on facts and held that there was no doubt that the workman had abandoned and relinquished his service, and that his removal from the roster was a formality; that nothing survived in the dispute, and he was not entitled to reinstatement, much less continuity of service.[39] The learned judge very rightly followed the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in Venkatayya and National Engg Industries,[40] in preference to the perversions manifested in Sambhunath Mukherjee, Sundaramony and Hindustan Steel. The above decision was affirmed by the Bombay High Court.[41] At the first blush, the above three decisions of the Bombay and Karnataka High Courts appear to be a violation of the ratio of Sundaramony, Robert D'Souza and Punjab LDRC. It may also expose the learned judges to the charge of 'judicial indiscipline', for not honouring a binding precedent handed down by a court of a superior jurisdiction, from Sundaramony onwards. Such a charge, if at all levelled, deserves to be rejected in limine, on the ground that the credit for judicial indiscipline must go to Iyer, Reddy and Desai JJ, who created a Frankenstein's monster by waving the wand of judicial hyper-activism indiscriminately, in all directions. Nevertheless, a detailed examination reveals that the learned judges in Kamlesh Kumar, Guest Keen Williams and PSS Karkhana preferred to toe the line of reasoning adopted in Hariprasad, Barsi Light Railway, Pipraich, Anakapalle, Venkatayya and National Engg Industries, and rejected outright, that of Sundaramony and others. In view of the fact that the smaller benches had departed from a binding decision given by four Constitution Benches, the decisions of the smaller benches should be treated as per incuriam. Thus, from this standpoint too, the Bombay and Karnataka High Courts were right in following Hariprasad, as against Sundaramony and others. The sum-total of this discussion lends support to the view that a judge of a High Court or the Supreme Court, if confronted with the dilemma as to which of the two conflicting ratios to choose, is free to follow either the former, led by Hariprasad, or the latter, led by, Sundaramony, without being guilty of judicial indiscipline.[42] Adverting to the decision rendered by the Constitution Bench in Punjab LDRC, which runs counter to the decision rendered by four Constitution Benches on the same issue, in Barsi Light Railway, Hariprasad, Pipraich and Anakapalle, it is conceded that the Supreme Court is empowered to review its own decision and to lay down the correct law. But the point at issue is "can a bench overrule the ratio evolved or affirmed by four co-ordinate benches? The following observations of Gajendragadkar CJI, in Shri Bhagawan, may throw some light on this aspect:

> If a learned single judge, hearing a matter, is inclined to take the view that the earlier decisions of the High Court, whether a Division Bench or of a single judge, need to be reconsidered, he should not embark upon that inquiry sitting as a single judge, but should refer the matter to a Division Bench or, in a proper case, place the relevant papers before the Chief Justice, to enable him to constitute a larger bench to examine the question. That is the proper and traditional way to deal with such matters and it is founded on healthy principles of judicial decorum and propriety. [43]

It is equally well settled that if a Bench of a lesser number of judges or a co-ordinate bench is of the opinion that the earlier decision had not laid down the correct law, the only course left to it is to place the papers before the Chief Justice, for constituting a larger bench to go into the matter comprehensively and all over. Assuming for the sake of argument, and without conceding, that the Constitution Bench in Punjab LDRC had the power to reverse all the earlier decisions rendered by the four Constitution Benches, in Barsi Light Railway, Hariprasad, Pipraich and Anakapalle, at one stroke, the points for consideration would be: (i) Was there any review worth the name, except meekly endorsing the misconstruction placed by the smaller benches? (ii) Was there any analysis of the import of terms such as discharge, dismissal, etc, with reference to their similarities and dissimilarities? (iii) Was there any application of judicial mind to the contextual aspects, such as the interaction between the definition and the provisions enshrined in Ch V-A? (iv) And, finally, has the Bench pronounced the law in clear and unequivocal terms? The answer to all these questions is, again, an emphatic 'No'. The arguments advanced by Saikia J, lack conviction, apart from unfolding his struggle to persuade himself that there was nothing inconsistent in the demonstrations of Sundaramony, vis-à-vis Hariprasad, whereas, the fact remains that Sundaramony was a clear case of departure from a binding precedent, coupled with gross judicial in discipline and abuse of judicial power on the part of Iyer J. The Constitution Bench finally held:

> Applying the above reasonings, principles and precedents, to the definition in section 2(oo) of the Act, we hold that 'retrenchment' means the termination by the employer of the service of a workman for any reason whatsoever, except those expressly excluded in the section.

A reading of this verdict takes us as far as square one, and no further! Answers to the following basic issues are as elusive after the decision, as they were before: What is the connotation and denotation of the phrase 'termination by the employer?'—a phrase that was given a wild interpretation by Iyer J and other judges? Does it cover a case of loss of lien on appointment or voluntary abandonment of service, as stipulated in the Standing Orders? In both these cases, the employer is, as a matter of procedure and for putting the records straight, required to inform the workman in writing, of the fact that he has lost his lien on his appointment. Having intimated the workman thus, the next logical step would be to strike his name off the rolls, signaling the severance of the employer-employee relationship, which, if not done, would introduce an obnoxious element into the concept of employment. Should such 'intimation' per se, be treated as a 'positive act of termination by the employer', as was held in Robert D'Souza?[44]Should the consequential 'striking off of the name of the workman from the rolls' be regarded as a 'positive act of termination by the employer', as was held in Delhi Cloth Mills? After going through the lengthy rhetoric, running into twenty-five pages, the reader is still left wondering, 'what is it that the court had ultimately decided?' In several ways, the larger Bench decision was a judicial disaster. With great respect, it is submitted that if Sundaramony was just confined to making bad law, Punjab Land Development Corporation went a few steps further and made it even worse. This aspect is discussed below. Out of the cluster of 17 appeals, the facts in respect of respondent no 6[45] are as follows:

> [He was employed on probation, along with the other respondents] by the appellant, a partnership firm, on 12 June 1975...Respondent No 6 stopped attending his duties from 9 August 1975 and he left the service of his own accord. The labour court, by its award dated 16 September 1980, held that the termination amounted to retrenchment and was illegal for non-compliance with the provisions of section 25F of the Act and he was entitled to reinstatement, with full back wages. The management's writ petition challenging the award having been unsuccessful, it has appealed.

The following analysis of facts and law betrays the sub-standard quality of this decision:

(i) Respondent No 6 had put in some 60 days of service, which falls far short of 240 days, the minimum qualifying service under Chapter V-A. Even assuming that the company had ostensibly retrenched him, the respondent would still not have been eligible for either notice wages or compensation, because of the shortfall in the requirement of 'continuous service' [section 25F, read with section 25B]; and

(ii) in the second place, according to the facts admitted and recorded, he stopped attending duties and left the services on his own accord, which exclude any positive act of 'termination by the employer' and hence, does not fall within the definition in terms of the ratio evolved in the case, as cited above.

The Bench strangely decided the case by stating: 'the result is that CA Nos...1898 of 1982...are dismissed with costs...'[46] This virtually means that the final verdict runs spectacularly counter to the principles enunciated by the court and, still worse, in the same case and in the same page. The Bench dismissed the appeal by an innocuous, one-line observation, without realising that its final order was at loggerheads with its own ratio. The second case,[47] in the same batch was, according to the admitted facts, a case of dismissal for an act of misconduct, after holding a disciplinary inquiry, upheld by the labour court, but reversed by the High Court. The Constitution Bench dismissed the appeal by the same order, without discussing the facts, which have nothing whatsoever to do with retrenchment! Was it not the duty of the court to decide the preliminary issue of 'whether a dismissal for an act of misconduct falls at all, within the sweep of the definition of retrenchment', before proceeding further? What justification can the court offer for mixing up a case of dismissal with others relating to retrenchment, when the two are birds of different feathers altogether? The right course for the court would have been to remand the cases involving 'retrenchment', to the respective lower courts, for disposing them of as per the ratio evolved, while de-linking and handling those falling under 'dismissal' separately, than to take upon itself, the task of grouping them together and giving a blanket decision in such a desolate manner.[48]

It is, however, refreshing to note that, even though the Supreme Court has so far, not opted for going into the larger question relating to the connotation of retrenchment, the recent decisions clearly point to a shift in its approach to the definition in s 2(oo). For instance, in Om Prakash, the Supreme Court observed that 'retrenchment', as defined in s 2(oo), contemplates an act on the part of the employer, which puts an end to the service, to fall within its ambit. If the workman ceased to report for duty and, even after he ceases to report for duty, it is not his case that at any point of time, he reported for duty and was refused work, it could not be said that it was a case in which the employer had done anything to put an end to his employment. Hence, such a case would not fall will the meaning of s 2(oo) of the Act, nor would it satisfy the requirements of s 25F.[49] Where the services of a workman were terminated as a consequence of his not attending to his duties for more than six months, and it was found that he had remained absent for more than six years, despite an intimation from the management, it was held that if the contract of employment provides for a termination of service in a particular manner, the non-compliance of the provisions of s 25F would not nullify or vitiate the order.[50] In Indian Airlines, the Kerala High Court examined the definition of 'retrenchment' [s 2(oo)] in the light of the insertion of sub-cl (bb) therein. Jagannatha Raju J, (for himself and Paripoornan, J), observed:

> Section 2(oo), prior to the amendment of 1984, was in a particular manner. Subsequent to the amendment in 1984 and the introduction of clause (bb), the termination of the service of the workman, as a result of the non-renewal of the contract of employment, on its expiry or of such contract being terminated under a stipulation in that behalf, such termination of the employee will not come within the meaning of 'retrenchment'. This amendment, as indicated earlier, was brought in specifically to rectify the situation created by the wide definition given to 'retrenchment' in N Sundaramony's case. ()...In this context, it may be observed that the law, as laid down by the Supreme Court in N Sundaramony's case,[51] is no longer good law, in view of the recent Constitution Bench decision of the Supreme Court, in Punjab Land .... Labour Court.[52] In this decision, the Supreme Court considered elaborately, the effect of the judgment of Krishna Iyer J, in N Sundaramony's case, and as to how that judgment was rendered without referring to the earlier Constitution Bench decisions. The court dealt with these matters in paragraphs 36 to 39 and in paragraph 42, at page 503. It was clearly pointed out that the judgment in N Sundaramony's case is bad law, as it did not follow the earlier binding precedent of the Supreme Court and that the Constitution Bench decisions bind smaller divisions of the court. In paragraph 58, the Supreme Court referred to the subsequent decision of Ranganath Misra J, in Management of Karnataka State Road Transport Corporation...[53]and then dealt with the question of interpretation of section 2(oo) of the Act, from paragraph 61 onwards..." [54] ().

In this regard, it is necessary to point out that there was nothing in Punjab LDRC to suggest that the Constitution Bench held that Sundaramony was bad in law, as averred by Raju J, in Indian Airlines case (supra). The following passages from the decision of Punjab LDRC illustrate the point:

> The question whether the positive content of section 2(oo), restricting the definition of workmen rendered surplus, for any reason, whatsoever, is part of the ratio or not, submits Mr Venugopal, is wholly; an academic question in view of the fact that as many as nine High Courts have restricted the applicability of sections 25F, 25G and 25H to only cases of termination of services of surplus labour for any reason whatsoever and not to other types of termination, whatever may be the reason for such termination. Even if a judgment was to be based on two alternative reasons or conclusions, each one of these alternative reasons or basis, would form the ratio of the judgment. It is also urged that the argument would equally apply to the ratio of Anakapalle's case, rendering the judgment in Sundaramony's case and the later decisions per incuriam, for not having noticed or followed a binding precedent of the Supreme Court itself, as the judgment of the Constitution Bench binds smaller divisions of the court ()...both the earlier decisions of the court, in Hariprasad and Sundaramony, were considered and it was held that there was nothing in Hariprasad which was inconsistent with the decision in Sundaramony's case ()...Speaking for the Court, RN Misra J, significantly said:... 'We are now inclined to hold that the stage has come when the view indicated in Sundaramony case (supra) has been absorbed into the consensus and there is no scope for putting the clock back or for an anti-clockwise operation' ()...More than a month thereafter, in Gammon India ...,[55] a three-judge Bench...said (p 235): 'On a true construction of the notice, it would appear that the respondent had become surplus on account of reduction in volume of work and that constitutes retrenchment, even in the traditional sense of the term, as interpreted in Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v Pipraich Sugar Mills Mazdoor Union ,[56] though that view does not hold the field in view of the recent decisions of this court in State Bank of India v N Sundaramony. ().

From the above, it is clear that it was more a contention raised by the counsel, that Sundaramony should be treated as per incuriam, than a conclusion reached by the Bench. The decision of Raju J, in Indian Airlines was correct, both on facts and law, but his attempt to base his reasoning and conclusion on the ratio of Punjab LDRC was undoubtedly misconceived. Far from holding that Sundaramony was per incuriam, Saikia J affirmed the views of different judges in cases that fell for decision in Sundaramony and thereafter, which aspect has been discussed at some length in the preceding paragraphs.

Excluded Cases

In the light of the phrase "termination ... for any reason whatsoever" appearing in the first part of the definition is susceptible to wide and even 'wild' interpretation, as has been the case with a few extremist judges of the last quarter of 20th century, it is proposed to commence the discussion with a process of elimination, ie, by identifying the kinds of termination, which are excluded from the definition before moving on to the cases which are either expressly or by necessary implication brought within the sweep of the definition.

'Punishment Inflicted by Way of Disciplinary Action'

The definition specifically excludes the termination of service as punishment, inflicted by way of a disciplinary action, from the ambit of 'retrenchment'. The question: whether a particular termination is retrenchment, or is by way of punishment for a disciplinary action, would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[57] In Lachman Das,[58] in view of the allegations of the workmen, that they were victimised because of their union activities and participation in a strike, the Delhi High Court inferred that they were really being punished by the employer by way of a disciplinary action. Therefore, the termination of their service was held to be outside the definition of 'retrenchment'. It was further observed that the termination of service by way of a disciplinary action, is directly in conflict with the termination by way of 'retrenchment', as the former is by way of punishment, while the latter is in the interest of economy, or because the employer did not need the services of the workmen, who had become surplus. In State Bank of India, the Supreme Court held that the termination of a workman under paragraph 52(10)(c) of the Sastri Award, even though described as a punishment not amounting to a 'disciplinary action', not being discharge simpliciter, would not amount to retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo) of the Act.[59] Likewise, in Anand Cinema, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that an innocuous order of termination of service, in fact, founded on misconduct, without the holding of any domestic inquiry, would not amount to a retrenchment.[60]

Likewise, in Jagdish Chandra Vyas, the relevant Standing Order provided for a punitive action in case of absence of workmen for 10 days or more, without the permission of the competent authority, and not for a simple discharge. The termination of the service of a workman under such Standing Order, therefore takes such termination out of the purview of the definition of retrenchment.[61] In Indian Iron and Steel Co, the Supreme Court held that, where the workman raised a dispute after 13 years after the employer's intimating him about the automatic loss of lien, as a consequence of an unauthorised overstay of leave, the denial of relief to the workman by the tribunal was justified. The termination of the service of a workman for overstaying leave, as per the Standing Orders providing for such automatic termination, would be bad if it did not provide an opportunity of hearing to the workman whose services are treated to have come to an end automatically.[62] The principles of natural justice have to be complied with. In the absence of an opportunity to the workman, such termination amounts to retrenchment, without following the provisions of the law.[63] The termination of a workman, who had put in 240 days of service, for a continuous, unauthorised absence of 20 days, without holding any inquiry and without complying with s 25F, is invalid.[64]

Voluntary Retirement

The termination of the service of a workman, on the ground of voluntary retirement, has specifically been excluded from the definition of retrenchment. Just as the employer can determine the contract of employment by retrenchment, discharge or dismissal, the employee has the right to determine the contract, by voluntary retirement. The expression 'voluntary retirement' used in this clause, would mean that unless the termination of the service is the result of a voluntary move on the part of employee or it is an act of his own independent volition, he cannot be said to have 'voluntarily retired'. The mere submission of the employee to the termination of his service by the employer, is not a 'voluntary' act of the former. 'Voluntary retirement' and 'termination of service' are two different concepts. Termination of service can be brought about by either of the parties to the contract, by determining the contract of employment, while voluntary retirement is an act of volition on the part of the employee alone. Neither apathy, nor a submission on the employee's part would alter the essential character of a termination of service of an employee by the employer and convert it into a 'voluntary retirement'. For instance, a concession shown by the employer to the employee, to extend his service by two months, and the acceptance by the employee of the same, would not amount in law, to be a case of a 'voluntary retirement' on the part of the employee, on the expiry of the extended period.[65]

The acceptance by the employee of the benefit of the extension that the employer was willing to give, without any condition attached to the benefit, would not make it a case of a voluntary retirement. Where the employee has no choice between retiring or not retiring, he cannot be said to have 'voluntarily retired'. It would, therefore, be a case of a termination of the service of the employee by the employer. In Bengal Nagpur Cotton,[66] a workman offered to retire from service, provided he was granted certain retirement benefits, such as pension and gratuity. But the employer was not willing to grant a pension. Consequently, the employee communicated his willingness to continue in service. But the employer subsequently informed the workman, that in case he could cease to be in service from a particular date, gratuity at a particular rate would be sanctioned to him. But on that particular date, the concerned workman, in spite of his protest, was asked to hand over the charge, which he did in protest. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court held that it was not a case of a voluntary retirement of the worker, but it was a clear case of a termination of service by the employer, against the protest made by him. A voluntary retirement comprehends a determination of the contract of employment by the employee, by voluntarily resigning or abandoning his job.[67]The expression 'retire' comprehends a resignation. But the resignation must be voluntarily tendered. If it is tendered on account of duress or coercion etc, it ceases to be a voluntary act of the employee, expressing his desire to quit service. Therefore, when an employee voluntarily tenders his resignation, it is an act by which he voluntarily gives up his job, Hence, such a resignation is covered by the expression 'voluntary retirement' used in this cause.[68] Voluntary submission of resignation by the workman on his own will does not amount to retrenchment.[69] In Hindustan Lever Ltd, Savant J, affirming the finding recorded by the tribunal, observed:

> There is, thus, a finding of fact that as a result of the rationalisation and reorganisation, the workers were adversely affected and what was done by way of voluntary retirement, was nothing short of retrenchment.[70]

The above observation of Savant J is as specious and inartistic as that of the finding of the tribunal, and is repugnant to litera legis as well as sententia legis in the face of sub-cl (a) of s 2(oo), which expressly excludes voluntary retirement from the ambit of the definition of retrenchment. Retrenchment is by way of a positive act of termination, brought about by the employer, in which the workman has no say, and it can never be said to be 'voluntary', whereas 'voluntary retirement', as the name itself suggests, stands on a different footing in so far as the whole initiative, whether to opt for the Voluntary Retirement Scheme (VRS) or not, rests with the workman and not with the employer. The very fact that, in the instant case, not all the workmen had opted for VRS, despite the scheme being attractive in financial terms, goes to prove that the discretion to opt for it or to reject it, solely rested with the workmen and, at any rate, not with the employer. That being the position, to hold that the 'voluntary retirement was nothing but retrenchment', is a travesty of fact and law. Secondly, viewed from a very fundamental perspective, why should an employer frame a voluntary retirement scheme at all, offering a hefty amount as compensation, which is several times more than the retrenchment compensation payable under the law, if not for reducing the surplus manpower and effecting economy of operations en route to making his product more competitive in the market? Was it the assumption of the learned judge that industrial employers offer attractive voluntary retirement schemes, with a huge financial outflow, merely as a matter of gratis or charity, or because there are no better avenues for them to spend corporate funds? In striking contrast, Shah J, of the same High Court, in New Haven Steel, categorically held that a voluntary retirement scheme offered with extra monetary benefits (which was opted for by 17 workmen) and the subsequent retrenchment of a few more workmen, were perfectly within the right of the management, and that the tribunal had no power to question the right of the management to reorganise its business as per the market demands.[71] This decision is right and that of Savant J, in Hindustan Lever, is absolutely baseless and perverse.

In Narendra Singh Solanki, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that where an employee abandoned the employment voluntarily and did not report for duty for nearly four years, it could not be said that it amounted to a 'termination by the employer of the services of a workman', within the meaning of s 2(oo).[72] Where the employee submits his resignation voluntarily, the grant of compensation under s 25 does not arise, and an award of compensation by the labour court, is liable to be quashed.[73] Once it is admitted that the workmen had resigned and their accounts were settled, and the said resignations were on the me of the labour court as exhibits, it is not open to them to turn round and say that they had never submitted there resignations.[74] In Tata Iron & Steel, the workman submitted an application on 1 April 1995 for his premature/voluntary retirement with a request to consider his case for payment of ex-gratia amount, in view of his long association with the company. The application for voluntary retirement was accepted on the same day ie 1 April 1995 and he was relieved. Later on he approached the management with an application to rescind his voluntary retirement under pressure from his superiors. He also made a further request to reconsider his case and revoke the voluntary retirement, because his entire settlement was adjusted against the building loan with the result, he was not able to manage his family. The management rejected his request vide letter dated 22 June 1995. The labour court held that the appellant is entitled to relief of reinstatement in service with full back wages and other consequential benefits. A single judge of High Court upheld the order of the labour court, which was reversed by the Division Bench. Dismissing the appeal filed by the workman, Lakshmanan J (for self and Panta J) held:

> We have also perused the Memo of Appeal and other representation made by the appellant. The appellant has made a vague allegation that he was forced to take retirement. Neither he has made it specific nor had given the name of any officer who compelled him to write the letter dt.1st April, 1995 or exercised undue and excessive pressure to sign the letter of premature/voluntary retirement. Though the Labour Court has come to the conclusion that the appellant was compelled to submit the letter of resignation, the same is not supported by any acceptable evidence. It is settled law that suspicion and doubt cannot take the place of evidence. No finding of fact can be given on mere doubt and suspicion or on the basis of baseless allegations. The appellant having written letter of voluntary retirement and after having accepted the retiral benefits without any protest cannot now turn round and say that he was compelled to submit his premature/voluntary retirement. The appeal has absolutely no merits and we, therefore, have no hesitation to dismiss the same and to affirm the order passed by the learned Judges of the Division Bench of the High Court.[75]

Note: For a detailed discussion of the subject, see notes and comments under s 2(k), under the topic - 'Determination of the Contract of Employment by the Employee'; caption - Resignation & Abandonment of job.

Superannuation

Cases of superannuation too have been excluded from the definition of retrenchment. For a case to come under this sub-clause, two things are necessary: (1) There must be a stipulation on the point of retirement in the contract; and (2) the stipulation must be with regard to the age of superannuation. The expression 'contract of employment' means a contract under which an employee was accepted in service of the employer. In Fibre Foam, the workmen were retired on attaining the age of 58 years. The contract of employment did not specify that the concerned workmen had to retire on attaining the age of 58 years. But the workmen received the gratuity from the employer, under the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972, which fixed the age of superannuation at 58 in cases where the age is not fixed under the contract of employment. In these circumstances, it was held that though technically, the age of superannuation prescribed by the Payment of Gratuity Act could not be applied while adjudging a question of retrenchment, since the workmen themselves had accepted the gratuity money from the employer, based on the Payment of Gratuity Act, it was not open to them to plead that it was a case of retrenchment.[76] In Jugantar, in terms of the relevant Standing Order, the working journalist retired from service on attaining the superannuation age of 60 years and drew his gratuity and provident fund dues in acceptance of his retirement, with effect from December 1976. Thereafter, he was re-employed for a period of 12 months only, which expired on 1 December 1977. The Supreme Court discountenanced the contention of the journalist that his service for the further period of 12 months, was a continuation of his previous employment and the termination of his service was retrenchment. On the facts and circumstances of the case, the court held that the re-employment of the journalist was not in continuation of his original service nor could the termination of his service be held to be retrenchment; and that s 25F had no application.[77]

Contractual Termination

Sub-clause (bb) was inserted in cl (oo) of s 2 by the Amending Act 49 of 1984.[78] It purports to exclude the following from the ambit of the definition of retrenchment: (i) the termination of the service of a workman as a result of the non-renewal of the contract of employment between the employer and the workman concerned, on its expiry; or (ii) the termination of the contract of employment in terms of a stipulation contained in the contract of employment, in that behalf. The first part relates to a termination of the service of a workman as a result of a non-renewal of the contract of employment between the employer and the workman concerned, on its expiry. The second part refers to 'such contract' being terminated under a stipulation in that behalf, contained therein. The expression 'such contract', used in the second part, refers to the 'contract of employment between the employer and the workman', mentioned in the first part. Therefore, if there is a stipulation in the 'contract of employment between the employer and the workman', providing the mode, manner and date of the termination of service, such termination of service has now specifically been excluded from the definition of 'retrenchment', by this sub-clause. The cases contemplated under both the parts, therefore, will not be 'retrenchment,[79] Conversely, a case not falling within either of the parts of this sub-clause, will be 'retrenchment', falling within the main part of the definition. In other words, where, in fact, there is no non-renewal of the contract or there is no stipulation in the contract in that behalf, the termination of service will constitute a 'retrenchment'. The Constitutional validity of sub-cl (bb) was challenged in Ram Prasad. The Rajasthan High Court held that the provisions of s 2(oo)(bb) are neither arbitrary, nor violative of Arts. 14, 19, 21, 23 and 39(d) of the Constitution.[80] A Full Bench of the Madras High Court, in Terminated LIC EW Assn, held that the said clause neither offended Pt III of the Constitution nor did its provisions run counter to the provisions of ss 25F, 25G and 25H of the Act.[81]

If the contract of employment between the employer and the employee, does not specify the period of employment for which the employment is made or there is no stipulation in such contract, providing the mode and manner of the termination of the service, the provisions of this sub-clause will have no application. For instance, in Arun Kumar, it was an essential condition for a temporary hand, to pass a written test before he could be absorbed on a permanent basis. But the employee could not pass the test and his service was terminated. The Patna High Court held that the failure of the workman to pass the examination did not automatically bring his services to an end. The termination of his service, therefore, was retrenchment.[82] The provision of retrenchment in the Act does not provide any security of tenure. It only provides for certain benefits to a workman in the case of termination of his service in a manner falling with in the definition of 'retrenchment'. On complying with the requirement of ss 25F or 25N and 25G, it is open to the employer to retrench a workman.[83]

In CM Venugopal, Regulation 14 of the Life Insurance Corporation of India (Staff) Regulations 1962, framed under s 48(2) (cc) of the Life Insurance Corporation of India (Amendment) Act 1981, empowered the corporation to terminate the service of an employee within the period of probation. The employee was put on probation for a period of one year, which was extended by another year. Under the terms of employment, he was required to do a certain minimum quota of business during the period of probation. Since he failed to accomplish that, he was required to achieve the target during the extended period of probation. As he failed to fulfil the prescribed norm to earn the confirmation, he was further advised to improve his performance, before the expiry of the extended period of probation. His service was terminated in terms of Regulation 14 of the corporation, as he could not meet the requirements. A three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that the case was covered by the exception contained in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo). And as the termination of service was under the specific stipulation provided in Regulation 14, as well as in the order of appointment of the employee, it was not retrenchment.[84] In Morinda Co-op Sugar, a sugar factory used to employ certain number of workmen during the crushing season only and at the end of the crushing season, their employment used to cease. The Supreme Court held that despite the fact that the workmen had worked for more than 240 days in a year, the cessation of their employment at the end of the crushing season would not amount to retrenchment, in view of the provisions of sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo).[85] However, the court directed the employer to maintain a register of workmen engaged during the previous season and to publicise it at the onset of the new season and engage the same workers in accordance with their seniority and the exigencies of the work.

The termination of the service of casual workmen on daily wages, will not fall within the exception contained in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) of the Act, because the 'contract of employment' is referable to contracts other than the engagement of casual workers on daily wages. A 'non-renewal of the contract of employment' presupposes an existing contract of employment, which is not renewed. Even in respect of a daily-wager, a contract of employment may exist, such contract being from day to day. The position however, would be different when such a contract is in reality, a camouflage for a more sustaining nature of arrangement, but the mode of a daily-wager is adopted so as to avoid the rigors of the Act. This clause does not contemplate to cover a contract such as of a daily-wager and is rather intended to cover a more general class of contracts, where a regular contract of employment is entered into and the termination of the service is because of a non-renewal of the contract. This interpretation of sub-cl (bb) is in consonance with the substantive provision of cl (oo) of s 2, defining 'retrenchment' as the termination of service of a workman for any reason whatsoever.[86] Likewise, the termination of the service of a 'badli' workman, in terms of the contract of employment, will not be retrenchment in view of this provision.[87]

In SGovindaraju v KSRTC , the Supreme Court did not consider it necessary to decide the point that if the termination of service of a workman by non-renewal of the term of contract of employment or under a stipulation contained in the contract of employment in that behalf, will not amount to 'retrenchment' in view of the provisions of sub-cl 2(bb), it would enable unscrupulous employers to always provide for a fixed term or stipulation in the contract of service, for terminating the employment of employees, to escape the rigor of s 25F or s 25N of the Act. And it would further confer arbitrary powers on the employer, which would be destructive of the protection guaranteed by the Act, to the employees.[88] This ruling is an illustration of judicial hyper-activism on the part of a few judges of the Supreme Court. Instead of addressing the core issue that fell for decision, ie, whether there was a violation of s 25F in the context of s 2(oo)(bb) of the Act, the learned judge dealt with the case in a slovenly manner and infused the doctrine of 'natural justice' in an industrial action to which the said doctrine has no application, whatsoever, in the light of the fact that the said sub-clause expressly excludes termination as a result of non-renewal of the contract of employment or such employment being terminated under a stipulation contained therein in that behalf. It is well-settled that the principles of natural justice only supplement the law and not supplant it, and that they operate only in the unoccupied interstices of law. By the same token, they cannot be pressed into service while dealing with a provision which declares the rights and duties of the parties in unequivocal and crystal clear terms, as can be seen from the language of s 2(oo)(bb). Is it possible that the learned judge, with decades of experience at the bar and the bench, was so ignorant of these fundamental canons of interpretation? As per the admitted facts, it was not a case of dismissal for an act of misconduct, and a termination due to efflux of time, which is manifestly excluded from the definition. In a case where a workman was not considered fit for the post, what was it that the workman could presumably explain and against what? Was the judge contemplating an explanation about the circumstances that led to his failure in the test conducted for the post? It does not require a vast experience at the Bar or the Bench to answer the elementary question as to under what rule of law, can the principles of natural justice come into play in a case like this? Again, what is meant by his observation '...though no elaborate inquiry is needed'? 'Inquiry', in industrial relations parlance, has a definite connotation and means a full-fledged inquiry, that has been held in full compliance with the principles of natural justice. The law does not recognise a 'wishy-washy' inquiry of the kind suggested by Singh J. It is amusing to find such platitudes in a judgment coming from the apex court! What is meant by his observation that a fixed tenure contract would be 'destructive of the protection guaranteed by the Act', when the self-same Act provides for exceptions, of which sub-cl (bb) is an integral part? Singh J had transgressed the limits of judicial review by importing irrelevant issues into the reasoning process, which issues were not raised before the appropriate forums below. This decision is a striking illustration of the manner in which judicial power is abused, even at the highest level, not to speak of lower courts and tribunals. The decision of the single judge of the Karnataka High Court, in the same case, is right and that of Singh J is patently wrong.

It can be seen that various High Courts, using interpretative techniques, have mellowed down the rigor of the bare reading of the statute. In SN Shukla, the Allahabad High Court observed that sub-cl (bb) is in the nature of an exception to s 2(oo) and has to be construed strictly and in favour of the workmen, as the entire object of the Act is to secure a just and fair deal to them, while adjudicating on the termination of the service of a workman for non-renewal of the contract of employment, on expiry of the time stipulated in it. The nature of employment must be judged by the nature of duties performed by the workman and not on the basis of the letter issued by the employer. Section 2(oo)(bb) cannot be extended to cases where the job continues and the employee's work is also satisfactory, but periodical renewals are made to avoid giving a regular status to the workmen, as it would be an 'unfair labour practice'. If contractual employment is resorted to as a mechanism to frustrate the claim of the employee to become regular or permanent against a job which continues, or the nature of duties is such that the colour of a contractual agreement is given to take it out from s 2(oo), then such agreement cannot be regarded as fair or bona fide. In this case, since the workmen had been working for nearly five years continuously and their jobs were not seasonal, casual or of a daily worker and their duties were like that of a regular employee, the termination of their services on the expiry of the stipulated period in the agreement or a non-renewal of their contract of employment, did not come under sub-cl 2(oo)(bb) and amounted to retrenchment.[89] A similar view has been taken by a single judge of a Bombay High Court, in Dilip Shrike, holding that the mere fact that the contract of employment provided for termination by efflux of time, would not by itself, be sufficient to take such terminations out of the scope of the definition of retrenchment. The adjudicator has to address himself to the question as to whether the period of employment was stipulated in the contract of employment as a device to escape the applicability of the definition of retrenchment.[90]

A single judge of the Punjab & Haryana High Court, in Balbir Singh, has pointed out that this clause, being in the nature of an exception, cannot be given a meaning which will nullify or curtail the ambit of the principle clause, because it is not intended to be an outlet for unscrupulous employers to shunt out workmen in the garb of non-renewal of their contracts, even if the work subsists. The clause, therefore, has to be construed strictly in favour of the workman, as far as possible. This provision cannot be resorted to, to frustrate the claim of the employee against an uncalled for retrenchment or for denying other benefits. In other words, it is not to be so interpreted as to enable an employer to resort to the policy of 'hire and fire' and give unguided power to him, to renew or not to renew the contract, irrespective of the circumstances in which it was entered into or the nature and extent of the work for which he was employed. It has to be interpreted to limit it to the case where the work itself has been accomplished and the agreement of hiring for a specific period, was genuine. If the work continues, the non-renewal of the contract has to be dubbed as*mala fide*.[91] The Gujarat High Court, in JJ Shrimali, in view of the stipulation in the contract of employment, that as soon as the scarcity relief work is wound up or comes to an end, the contract of service will also come to an end, it was held that the termination of service did not amount to retrenchment.[92] In Chakradhar Tripathy, the workman was appointed in the post of junior assistant, as a matter of urgency, as an ad hoc employee for 89 days, which period was extended from time to time, with short breaks, at the request of the employee, on the basis of his fresh application. Although the workman had put in more than 240 days, pending the recruitment of a regular candidate for the post, the Orissa High Court held that in these circumstance, the non-renewal of the contract was not mala fide or colourable. Hence, the termination of his employment will not constitute retrenchment.[93] In MPBK Sangh, on a review of the law as laid down by the Supreme Court and by various High Courts, a single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court has stated the following principles of interpretation and application of the provisions of this clause—

(i) that the provisions of section 2(oo)(bb) are to be construed benevolently, in favour of the workmen;

(ii) that if the workman is allowed to continue in service by making periodic appointments, from time to time, then it can be said that the case would not fall under section 2(oo)(bb) ;

(iii) that the provisions of section 2(oo)(bb) are not to be interpreted in a manner which may stifle the main provision;

(iv) that if the workman continues in service, the non-renewal of the contract can be deemed as mala fide and it may amount to be a fraud on the statute;

(v) that there would be a wrong presumption of non-applicability of section 2(oo) (bb), where the work is of a continuous nature and there is nothing on record to show that the work for which a workman had been appointed, has come to an end.[94]

It is well settled that if a provision is merely declaratory, it may be retrospective. But a remedial provision is only prospective, unless it is expressly made retrospective by the legislature or it is held to be so by necessary implication.[95]For modern purposes, a declaratory Act is one which removes existing doubts as to the common law or the meaning or effect of any statute. But a remedial statute, on the contrary, may either be enlarging or restraining.[96] By inserting cl (bb) in the definition of 'retrenchment', in s 2(oo), the legislature wanted to restrict the meaning of the term 'retrenchment' as interpreted by the Supreme Court. The provision, therefore, is remedial and not declaratory. Such a substantive provision, imposing an additional restriction on the meaning of 'retrenchment', cannot be construed to be retrospective by necessary intendment. It is only prospective in nature.[1] Therefore, a termination effected in pursuance of a condition, that services can be terminated by one month's notice or salary in lieu thereof, before the insertion of this clause, would not be governed by its provisions and would, therefore, be retrenchment.[2] Both the parts of sub-cl (bb) postulate a fixed tenure. The first part refers to a non-renewal of the contract, after the expiry of that period, while the second part refers to the termination of the contract of employment upon giving notice of a certain specified period of time. Therefore, if there is no provision for a period of termination of a contract of service, the provisions of the clause will not be attached. Generally, the contract of employment, or in cases of statutory corporations or government undertakings, the statutory rules or regulations governing the service, provide that the service of an employee can be terminated by giving notice of a specified period of time by either side or a payment in lieu thereof. In some cases, even unilateral provisions, that the service of an employee can be terminated 'at any time without assigning any reason', are inserted. In West Bengal SEB, the Supreme Court struck down Regulation 34 of the West Bengal State Electricity Board Regulations, which empowered the board to terminate the service of an employee by giving three months' notice or three months' salary in lieu of the notice, being violative of Art. 14 of the Constitution. Speaking for the three-judge Bench of the court, in a voice charged with anguish and emotion, Chinappa Reddy J said:

> On the face of it, the regulation is totally arbitrary and confers on the Board, a power which is capable of vicious discrimination. It is a naked 'hire and fire' rule, the time for banishing which all together, from the employer-employee relationship, is fast approaching. Its only parallel is to be found in the entry 8 clause so familiar to administrative lawyers.[3]

In Central Inland Water, r 9(i) of the service discipline and appeal rules of the corporation provided that the employment of a permanent employee shall be subject to termination on giving three months' notice on either side, or payment of an amount equivalent to three months' basic pay and dearness allowance in lieu thereof. In case the employee failed to give such notice, the corporation had the right to deduct such amount from his dues. A two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court struck down the rule as being violative of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution and also being void under s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, as opposed to public policy. In view of the grossly unequal position of the employer and the employees, the court discountenanced the argument of the corporation, that the 'mutuality clause' was duly accepted by the employees.[4] Another two-judge Bench of the court, in OP Bhandari, Thakkar J said:

> This rule cannot co-exist with Articles 14 and 16(1) of the Constitution of India. The said rule must therefore, die, so that the fundamental right guaranteed by the aforesaid constitutional provisions remain alive. For, otherwise, the guarantee enshrined in Articles 14 and 16 of the Constitution can be set at naught, simply by framing a rule authorizing the termination of service of an employee by merely giving a notice. In order to uphold the validity of the rule in question, it will have to be held that the tenure of service of a citizen who takes up employment with the state, will depend on the pleasure or whim of the competent authority, unguided by any principle or policy. And that the services of an employee can be terminated, though there is no rational ground for doing so, even arbitrarily or capriciously. To uphold this right is to accord a magna carta to the authorities invested with these, powers, to practice uncontrolled discrimination at their pleasure and caprice, on considerations not necessarily based on the welfare of the organization, but possibly based on personal likes and dislikes, personal preferences and prejudices.[5]

However, in view of the extremely wide coverage of the impugned regulation, the court indicated three categories of employees covered by it, viz, 'blue collar' workmen, the 'white collar' or clerical staff and the 'gold collar' or the managerial cadres. With respect to the 'blue collar' and 'white collar' employees, the court unreservedly applied the rule laid down in Central Inland Water; but with respect to the 'gold collar' employees, the managerial cadres, the court made a distinction between the private sector and public sector employees. It noticed that the managerial cadres of the private sector undertakings were not governed either by the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act or by the Constitutional or statutory provisions. Hence, such employers are free to cut 'the dead wood and can get rid of a managerial cadre employee in case he is considered to be wanting in performance or in integrity'.[6] But with respect to the managerial cadre employees, employed by the public sector undertakings, the court noticed the impediments of Arts. 14 and 16 and suggested law reform. The law stated in the above three cases has been affirmed by a four to one majority of the court in Delhi Transport Corpn, holding that Regulation 9(b) of the corporation, which provided for the termination of employment by giving 'one month's notice or pay in lieu thereof, vested absolute, unbridled and arbitrary powers in the employer to terminate the service and as such, was violative of the Constitutional mandate contained in Art. 14 of the Constitution. The majority held that the corporation had no power to make a rule providing for the sacking of the permanent employees on unspecified grounds, by merely giving a month's notice or pay in lieu thereof.[7]

In the cases discussed above, the Supreme Court was dealing with the legal validity of statutory regulations framed by the statutory corporations, providing for the termination of service of an employee by giving him notice of a specified period of time or paying salary in lieu thereof. The court was not considering the legal validity of s 2(oo) of this Act. The effect of these dicta is that any stipulation in a contract of employment, fixing the term of employment or providing for the termination of service by giving a notice for certain specified period of time or payment of wages in lieu thereof, will be void. In case of public sector undertakings, such stipulation will be void as violative of the guarantees of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution, being arbitrary and discriminatory and also being opposed to the public policy under s 23 of the Contract Act. In case of private sector undertakings, such provisions will be void under s 23 of the Contract Act. These holdings, therefore, castrate sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo). Hence, the provisions made in the contract of employment, rules or Standing Orders, for termination of employment by giving notice for a certain specified period of time or paying wages in lieu thereof or termination of employment by non-renewal of the term of contract, will not have the protection of sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) of the Act. A question of pertinent relevance arises, as to whether a statutory provision in an Act of Parliament or of State Legislature, can be abrogated by a judicial pronouncement, without even discussing the legality or Constitutional validity of such provision.

There has, however, been a significant departure of the judicial view, in respect of termination of the contract due to efflux of time or due to non-renewal of the contract on its expiry. For instance, in Pushpa Srivastava, the facts were: The employee was appointed as a Research Executive on an ad hoc basis, for a period of three years, on contractual basis. Though the appointment came to an end on 21 March 1990, yet, she was continued beyond the prescribed period. On 13 July 1990 she tendered her resignation, which was accepted on 31 July 1990. Notwithstanding the acceptance of the resignation, the employee made a further request that her services might be continued for some more time. On this request, she was given an ad hoc appointment on a contractual basis, as a Training Executive, on a consolidated salary of Rs 2400/- per month. A few days before the appointment was about to come to an end in terms of the contract, she filed a writ petition in the High Court and obtained a direction to regularise her services within three months. Quashing the order of the High Court, Mohan J, (for himself, Sharma and Venkatachala JJ) held:

> To our mind, it is clear that where the appointment is contractual and by efflux of time, the appointment comes to an end, the respondent could have no right to continue in the post. Once this conclusion is arrived at, what requires to be examined is, in view of the services of the respondent being continued from time to time, on ad hoc basis, for more than a year, whether she is entitled to regularisation. The answer should be in the negative...The appointment was purely ad hoc and on a contractual basis, for a limited period of six months, the right to remain in the post comes to an end.[8]

In M Venugopal, the issue before the Supreme Court was, whether the termination of an employee at the end of a two-year probation period, amounts to retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo)(bb) of the IDA. The question had to be determined in the light of s 48(2)(cc) of the Life Insurance Corporation (Amendment) Act 1981, read with Regulation 14 of the LIC of India (Staff) Regulations 1960. Regulation 14 provided for a probationary period of one year, which could be extended to a maximum of one more year, making it a total of 2 years for employees belonging to classes I & II. Singh J held:

> Regulation 14 aforesaid, has to be read as a statutory term of the contract of employment between the corporation and the appellant. The order of appointment had fixed a target in respect of the performance of the appellant, which admittedly, the appellant failed to achieve within the period of probation, which was extended up to two years. As such, the corporation was entitled not to confirm the appellant in terms of the order of appointment and to terminate his service during the period of probation, without any notice...Any such termination, even if the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act were applicable in the case of the appellant, shall not be deemed to be 'retrenchment' within the meaning of section 2(oo), having been covered by exception (bb). Before the introduction of clause (bb) in section 2(oo), there were only three exceptions...(a) voluntary retirement; (b) retirement on reaching age of superannuation; and (c) on ground of continued ill health. This court, from time to time, held that the definition of 'retrenchment' being very wide and comprehensive in nature, shall cover within its ambit termination of service in any manner and for any reason, otherwise than as a punishment inflicted by way of disciplinary action. The result was that even discharge simpliciter, was held to fall within the purview of the definition of 'retrenchment'...Now, with the introduction of one > more exception to section 2(oo), under clause (bb), the legislature has excluded from the purview of 'retrenchment', (i) the termination of the service of the workman as a result of the non-renewal of the contract of employment between the employer and the workman concerned, on its expiry; (ii) such contract being terminated under a stipulation in that behalf, contained in the contract of employment, it need not be impressed that if in the contract of employment, no such stipulation is provided or prescribed, then such contract shall not be covered by clause (bb) of section 2(oo). In the present case, the termination of the service of the appellant, as a result of the contract of employment having been terminated under the stipulations specifically provided under Regulation 14 and the order of the appointment of the appellant.(sic) In this background, the non-compliance with the requirement of section 25F shall not vitiate or nullify the order of termination of the appellant.[9]

In Escorts, the Supreme Court held that the termination of the service of a workman, as a result of a non-renewal of the contract of employment on its expiry, would not constitute retrenchment, in view of sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo). In Allahabad Bank, the workman was employed on a day-to-day basis, by giving employment for one day at a time, with the issuing of successive letters. The Supreme Court quashed the order of the tribunal, holding that the workman shall be deemed to have continued in service and would also be entitled to wages and allowances, and held that the relationship between the parties being contractual, the term of contract was that the services stood terminated at the end of the day, and the status of the workman was, at best, that of a daily-wager, and that being so, the workman could not insist on his being continued to be employed and the Bank was under no legal obligation to employ him.[10] In Uptron India Ltd, the Supreme Court, interpreting cl 17(g) of the Standing Orders of the company, held that the services of a permanent employee cannot be terminated by giving him three months notice or pay in lieu thereof, or even without notice, notwithstanding any stipulation in the certified Standing Orders and that any clause in the Standing Orders providing for an automatic termination of service of a permanent employee, would be bad in law. The court, while interpreting the words 'such contract', appearing in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo), observed that if the contract was for a fixed term, with a stipulation that the services would be liable for termination on or before the expiry of the said period, in such a case, the termination of the service either before the expiry or the period stipulated or on the expiry of the said period, would not amount to retrenchment.[11]

In Birla VXL, where the services of a workman, who was appointed on a temporary basis for a period of two years, were terminated, the Supreme Court held that, having regard to the clear terms of his appointment order, which the workman had accepted by signing at the foot thereof, the employer was entitled to bring the employment to an end at the conclusion of the period of temporary employment.[12] In the absence of a fixed term in the order of appointment, the provisions of s 2(oo)(bb) have no application, and there can be no justification to interfere with the order of the labour court, directing the reinstatement of the workman.[13] Where the rules provided that the service of the workman should be regularised subject to her passing the type test, and her services were terminated after she failed to pass the test, despite several attempts, without complying with s. 25F, it was held that her employment was not contractual in view of the fact that the statutory rule did not prescribe any time limit, and hence, it would not fall within the exception contained in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo), and, accordingly, the High Court confirmed the award of the labour court, directing her reinstatement.[14] In MP Electricity Board, the Supreme Court held that, where the services of an employee were terminated on her failing to qualify in the test, in accordance with the terms and conditions mentioned in the offer of appointment, such termination would fall within the ambit of the exception in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) of the IDA.[15] In Nareshkumar Parmar, the facts disclosed that the respondent-company advertised for a pharmacist on contractual basis in pursuance whereof the appellant workman applied, got selected, signed the contract and joined. After completing 240 days service, he applied for regular selection when called for, but before the selection could be completed, he filed a petition in the High Court claiming regularisation. Rejecting the petition, the Gujarat High Court held that the appellant-workman was engaged as pharmacist on contractual basis and, therefore, the claim advanced by him for regularization on the ground that he should be treated as temporary workman in terms of the Certified Standing Orders was not maintainable.[16]

In Haryana SFCCW Store, the facts were: Certain workmen were engaged in May-June 1993 as watchmen on contract basis, with the condition that the appointment would last till the stocks kept in the open area at the Hasanpur Mandi were disposed of their services and were terminated in April 1994, after the stock lying in the open yard was cleared. The management did not comply with the provisions of s 25F before terminating the workmen. Mohapatra J held that their appointment being for a specific purpose and for a particular period, there was no retrenchment, as their termination fell within the purview of cl (bb), and accordingly, the question of complying with the conditions precedent to retrenchment, as stipulated in s 25F did not arise.[17] In Saudi Arabian Airlines, the facts briefly were: A security guard, who was engaged for a fixed term of two years, filed a complaint alleging unfair labour practice under provisions of MRTU & PULPA 1971, whereupon the industrial court directed the management to make him permanent in terms of Standing Order 4(c) of the Certified Standing Orders of the company, which mandates that 'after continuous employment of 240 days, the incumbent has to be treated as a permanent employee'. Refusing to interfere with the direction issued by the industrial court, Kochar J, of Bombay High Court held:

> There was no end of the work of the security guards and, therefore, appointment letter issued by the petitioner to appoint the respondent workman for a period of two years was a camouflage or pretext to deprive him of the benefits of permanency and permanent employment. The conclusion is inescapable that the work continued and the post of Security Guard was of permanent nature and therefore, there was no application of section 2(oo)(bb) of Industrial Disputes Act.[18] (Italics supplied)

In Karnataka Handloom, the facts disclosed that a person was engaged on contract basis for specific period of 9 months to train the weavers of the society, whereafter his contract was terminated. The labour court ordered reinstatement without back wages, which was upheld by both the tiers of High Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Lakshmanan J observed:

> When a person enters a temporary employment or gets engagement as a contractual or casual worker and the engagement is not based on a proper selection as recognized by the relevant rules or procedure, he is aware of the consequences of the appointment being temporary, casual or contractual in nature. Such a person cannot invoke the theory of legitimate expectation for being confirmed in the post when an appointment to the post could be made only by following a proper procedure for selection and in cases concerned, in consultation with the Public Service Commission. Therefore, the theory of legitimate expectation cannot be successfully advanced by temporary, contractual or casual employees. It cannot also be held that the State has held out any promise while engaging these persons either to continue them where they are or to make them permanent. The State cannot constitutionally make such a promise. It is also obvious that the theory cannot be invoked to seek a positive relief of being made permanent in the post... the respondent was engaged only on contract basis. It is only a seasonal work and, therefore, the respondent cannot be said to have been retrenched in view of what is stated in clause (bb) of section 2(oo) of the Act. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the view taken by the Labour Court and the High Court is not correct and is illegal.[19]

In Darbara Singh, the Supreme Court held that where it was found that the respondent-workman was appointed for a specific period on daily wages and the contract contains stipulation that, on the appointment of a regular employee, his temporary appointment would come to an end, it was wrong for the labour court and High Court to direct reinstatement. In another case involving the same Electricity Board, the same learned judge held that persons appointed by the Board as 'meter readers' on contractual basis with payment being made on 'per-meter-reading' basis at a fixed rate coupled with the further fact that no regular employment was ever offered to them by the Board, their termination fell within the exception contained in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo).[20] In another case involving the same Electricity Board, an identical issue relating to an identical set of facts as Darbara Singh (supra) fell for the decision of Supreme Court. Setting aside the orders of labour court and the High Court, Pasayat J (for self and Chatterjee J) held that the engagement of the workman was for specific period and conditional; that on the appointment of regular meter readers, the engagement of the workman was dispensed with; and that the contracts clearly governed the terms of engagement.[21] A person appointed on ad hoc and temporary basis for 29 days on 13 occasions with technical breaks had no right to be absorbed as regular employee, could the termination of his service amount to retrenchment under s 2(oo) attracting s 25F.[22] In Apparel Export Promotion, the facts were: the service of the respondent-peon was terminated as per cl 2 of the appointment letter which gave the right to employer to terminate by giving 24 hours notice during period of probation. The Labour Court held the termination valid. A single Judge of the High Court remanded the matter back to the Labour Court for fresh decision. The Delhi High Court comprising Dipak Misra CJ and Manmohan J, while allowing the appeal by the employer-Council, observed that the termination was in accordance with the condition in the contract of employment and fell within s 2(oo)(bb).[23] In a more or less similar set of facts, the Gujarat High Court held that where the employment stood terminated on the expiry of the date stipulated in the offer of appointment, it clearly fell within the purview of s 2(oo)(bb), and hence invoking the provisions of s 25F would not arise.[24]

Continued ill-health

A termination of the service of a workman on the ground of continued ill-health, has also been excluded from the definition of retrenchment. 'Ill-health' means disease, physical defect, infirmity or unsoundness. A person who is not free from disease is certainly not possessing sound health, required for active duties and if that sort of thing continues for a long period, he must be said to be suffering from continued ill-health. The term suggests that the condition of ill-health is prolonged for a considerable period. 'Ill-health' that which is intermittent, cannot be termed as continued ill-health. It should be of a sufficiently long duration and continuous.[25]

According to Webster's New International Dictionary, 'health' means the 'state of being hale, sound or whole, in body, mind or soul'. According to the same dictionary, 'hale' means 'free from defect, disease or infirmity, sound, healthy'. New Collins Concise English Dictionary defines 'ill-health' as 'not in good health; sick'. The Concise Oxford Dictionary (third edn) defines ill-health as 'Out of health; sick; with disease; with anxiety (of health), unsound, disordered, morally bad'.

According to the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, 'ill-health' means, 'unsound, disordered; out of health; not well.' Therefore, according to the dictionary meaning, 'health' does not necessarily mean an absence of organic disease; if a person is infirm or not sound in body or mind, he cannot be said to possess health. 'Ill-health' obviously, means disease, physical defect, infirmity or unsoundness. A person who is not free from infirmity or disease or, in other words, is not possessing sound health for active duties, and if this state of health continues for a long period, he may be said to be suffering from 'continued ill-health'. A person can be said to be suffering from 'continued ill-health' when the disease is spread over for some period of time.[26] The use of the word 'continued' before the expression 'ill-health', suggests that it is prolonged for a considerable period. It should be of a sufficiently long duration as well as continuous. Therefore, ill-health which is intermittent, cannot be termed as continued ill-health. The expression 'continued ill-health' has to be construed to be referable to a state of physical condition of the person concerned, incapacitating him for an indefinite period, though the same need not necessarily be correlated to any organic disease in the system.[27]

The question as to whether an employer can validly retire bus drivers on the ground of their defective or sub-normal eye sight, developed during the course of their employment, was examined by the Supreme Court in the landmark case of Anand Bihari, in which the facts disclosed that the workers in question were employed as drivers and had put in a long service, discharging their duties to the satisfaction of the corporation. A medical examination revealed that they had developed a defective eye sight and did not have the required vision for driving heavy motor vehicles. Therefore, the corporation terminated their services. This action of the corporation was challenged by the workmen by a writ petition before the High Court of Rajasthan, on the ground that the termination of their services amounted to 'retrenchment', within the meaning of s 2(oo) of the Act and since the requirements of s 25F were not complied with, the 'retrenchment' was illegal. On the other hand, the corporation contended that the termination of service being on the ground of 'ill-health', was not 'retrenchment'. The High Court upheld the contention of the corporation, that the termination of the service of the workmen in question, was not 'retrenchment'. In appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the High Court in holding that the defective eye sight, disabling the workmen from discharging their normal duty of bus driving, fell within the meaning of the expression 'continued ill-health'. Hence, the termination of the service of the drivers was not 'retrenchment'. Speaking for the court, Sawant J said:

> Even otherwise, it can scarcely be disputed that the expression ill-health', used in sub-clause (c), has to be construed relatively and in its context. It must have a bearing on the normal discharge of duties. It is not any illness, but that which interferes with the usual orderly functioning of the duties of the post, which would be attracted by the subclause. Conversely, even if the illness does not affect the general health or general capacity and is restricted only to a particular limb or organ, but affects the efficient working of the work entrusted, it will be covered by the phrase. For it is not the capacity in general, but that which is necessary to perform the duty for which the workman is engaged, which is relevant and material and should be considered for the purpose...Therefore, any disorder in health, which incapacitates an individual from discharging the duties entrusted to him or affects his work adversely or comes in the way of his normal and effective functioning, can be covered by the said phrase. The phrase has also to be construed from the point of view of the consumers of the concerned products and services. If, on account of a workman's disease or incapacity or debility in functioning, the resultant product or service is likely to be affected in any way, or to become a risk to the health, life or property of the consumer, the disease or incapacity has to be categorised as ill-health for the purpose of the said sub-clause. Otherwise, the purpose of production, for which the services of the workman are engaged, will be frustrated and worst still, in cases such as the present one, they will endanger lives and property of the consumers. Hence, we have to place a realistic and not a technical or pedantic meaning on the said phrase. We are, therefore, more than satisfied that the said phrase would include cases of drivers, such as the present ones, who have developed a defective or subnormal vision or eyesight, which is bound to interfere with their normal working as drivers. Such drivers, therefore, were held to be suffering from 'continued ill-health' and the termination of their services for that reason, therefore, was not 'retrenchment'.[28] (Italics supplied)

However, despite holding that the termination of the service of the drivers in question, did not amount to 'retrenchment', the learned judge held that the said termination was unjustified, inequitable and discriminatory.[29] The learned judge observed that the service conditions of bus drivers must provide for adequate safeguards, because they had developed defective eyesight or sub-normal sight on account of the occupational hazards. The court, therefore, evolved and directed a scheme to be framed, for providing alternative jobs, along with retirement benefits and for payment of an additional compensation, proportionate to the length of the service rendered by them, in case of a non-availability of alternative jobs. The scheme is summarised as follows:

(i) The corporation shall, in addition to giving each of the retired workmen, his retirement benefits, offer him any other alternative job which may be available and which he is eligible to perform.

(ii) In case no such alternative job is available, each of the workmen shall be paid, along with his retirement benefits, an additional compensatory amount as follows:

(a) where the employee has put in more than 5 years' or less than 5 years' service, the amount of compensation shall be equivalent to 7 days' salary per year of the balance of his service;

(b) where the employee has put in more than 5 years' but less than 10 years' service, the amount of compensation shall be equivalent to 15 days' salary per year of the balance of his service;

(c) where the employee has put in more than 10 years' but less than 15 years' service, the amount of compensation shall be equivalent to 21 days' salary per year of the balance of his service;

(d) where the employee has put in more than 15 years' service but less than 20 years' service, the amount of compensation shall be equivalent to one month's salary per year of the balance of his service;

(e) where the employee has put in more than 20 years' service, the amount of compensation shall be equivalent to two months' salary per year of the balance of his service. The salary will mean the total monthly emoluments that the workman was drawing on the date of his retirement.

(iii) If the alternative job is not available immediately, but becomes available at a later date, the corporation may offer it to the workman, provided he refunds the proportionate compensatory amount.

(iv) The option to accept either of the two reliefs, if an alternative job is offered by the corporation, shall be that of the workman.

While evolving the scheme, the court was influenced by three factors; namely (i) the workmen concerned were incapacitated to work only as drivers and were not rendered incapable to taking any other job, either in the corporation or outside; (ii) the workmen were at an advanced stage of their life and it would be difficult for them to get a suitable alternative employment outside; and (iii) the relief available under the scheme should not be such as would induce the workmen to feign disablement, which, in the case of a disability such as the development of a defective eye sight, may be easy to do. In Rameshwar Dass, a three-judge Bench of the court observed:

> If the judgment of this court in Anand Bihari ... (supra), is read in its proper context and spirit, then it has to be held that this court impressed on the State Road Transport Corporation, to first provide for alternative jobs to such drivers, who have become medically unfit for heavy vehicles. A direction for the payment of an additional compensation was given only when it is not possible at all, in the existing circumstances, to provide alternative jobs to such drivers. It need not be pointed out that the authorities of the corporation should not take recourse only to the payment of the additional compensation, without first examining whether such drivers could be put on alternative jobs.[30]

In this case, the Haryana State Road Transport Corporation gave alternative employment to the drivers who had developed defective or sub-normal eye sight due to occupational hazards and had became unfit to drive heavy vehicles. But subsequently, the corporation retired such drivers on the ground of medical unfitness and paid them an additional compensation. In view of the ratio of the Anand Bihari case, taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration, the court directed the corporation to apply its mind properly, to the question of whether the employees who had suffered injuries and had become medically unfit could be given some job by way of rehabilitation and the question of payment of additional compensation arose only if it was not possible to provide alternative jobs to them or to some of them. The court further directed that the question of providing alternative jobs to the employees should be examined within four months from the date of the production of the order of the court. The court also made it clear that the tenure of the alternative job only, will be till the date of superannuation of the employees. The employees to whom alternative jobs are provided, as directed by the court, will reimburse the corporation for the additional compensation received by them.

The contract of employment postulates a certain state of physical fitness in the workman. If he is discharged on the ground of ill-health, it is because he was unfit to discharge the service which he had undertaken under the contract, to render.[31] 'Continued ill-health' includes any physical detect or infirmity, incapacitating a workman for future work, for an indefinite period.[32] Occasionally, the health of an individual may break down and the doctor may fail to diagnose the cause of the physical debilitation. But while continued ill-health is only a state of the physical condition of a person, which need not necessarily be correlated to any organic disease in the system, a mere physical weakness at a particular moment of time would not constitute 'continued ill-health'. If that were to be the law, any passing ailment, which may temporarily render any employee unable to do work, would result in the far-reaching consequence of his discharge from service.[33]

Before discharging a workman from service, the employer, therefore, has to be satisfied that because of 'continued ill-health', the workman is unfit to perform his duties. In other words, the employer should be satisfied that the employee has remained in continued ill-health and because of that continued ill-health, he has become unfit to perform the duties for which he was employed. The unfitness to perform the duties is, thus, related to continued ill-health. If a person has maintained ill-health and because of that, he has become unfit to perform his duties, he can be asked to leave the job. The ill-health must be of such a nature, that the person is not in a position to do the job for which he was employed.[34] But the service of an employee cannot be terminated on the basis of a presumption of continued ill-health. In Lalit Mohan Puri, the employer asked the driver of a heavy vehicle, to appear before an ESI doctor, to prove his ill-health, which the employee refused and the employer terminated his services on the ground of ill-health. The labour court upheld the termination of the service, on the basis of the presumption of ill-health, from the refusal of the employee to appear before the ESI doctor. The Delhi High Court set aside the award of the labour court, on the ground that the service of an employee could not be terminated on the basis of a mere presumption. Speaking for the court, Wadhwa J, observed that the long service of the employee would not be wiped out:

> ... merely on the basis of a presumption raised under section 114 of the Evidence Act 1872. In our view, the respondent should have some direct evidence with it, to show firstly, that the petitioner was suffering from ill-health and secondly, that he continued to be in ill-health till the time of the termination of his service.[35]

The court, therefore, held that an inquiry should have been held to prove that the employee had continued to be of ill-health and the matter should not have been left merely to presumption. Where, therefore, a workman is discharged on the ground of ill-health, it is because he was unfit to discharge the service which he had undertaken to render and therefore, it had really come to an end itself.[36] The reason for the discharge of a workman in such a case is, that he cannot render the services required of him and which, under the contract of service, he is bound to render. Hence, he would not fall in the category of surplusage, ie, one who is 'no longer required'. The industrial adjudicator, therefore, has to see whether the continued ill-health of the workman had made him unfit to perform his duties. However, it is one thing to say that a person is 'unfit' to perform his duties and it is quite a different thing to say that he is unable to perform his duties because of his ill-health. For instance, when an employee falls ill and because of ill-health, he is 'unable' to perform his duties during the period of illness, would not mean that because of the illness, he has also become 'unfit' to perform his duties. Continued ill-health mayor may not render him, in the course of time, unfit to perform the duties. It is quite possible that on his recovery from the illness, the workman may resume his job and may perform his duties as efficiently as he did prior to his illness. It is also possible in a particular case, that the nature of the prolonged illness was such as ultimately would render the workman unfit to perform his duties. So, in each case, where a workman is discharged from service on the ground of his having become unfit to perform his duties, because of his 'continued ill-health', the adjudicator has to record a finding as to whether the 'continued ill-health' had rendered him unfit to perform his duties.[37]

But the question, whether a workman suffered from 'continued ill-health' or not, is a pure question of fact. It may be open to the workman to demolish the truth of the contention that he was suffering from 'continued ill-health'. For instance, a termination of the service of a workman on account of incapacity to work, due to old age, was held not be 'retrenchment'.[38] Likewise, a termination of the service on account of the anaemic condition of the employee, was held not to be a case of 'continued ill-health'.[39] Similarly, cardiac trouble was held not to be a case of 'continued ill-health' and the termination of the service for such reason, was held to be 'retrenchment'.[40] A termination of service with the bald statement that the termination was on account of medical unfitness, without spelling out any particular ailment or the period for which the workman had been suffering from the same, would not be a termination on account of continued ill-health.[41] On the other hand, a person suffering from mental derangement was held to have been suffering from continued ill-health.[42] A person who lost three fingers of his left hand and as a result, lost 30 per cent of his earning capacity, was held to be suffering from continued ill-health.[43]

The order of the labour court, directing the reinstatement of a workman who was discharged on medical grounds, treating the said termination as retrenchment, was not sustainable, as such termination for reasons of continued ill-health is excluded from the definition of retrenchment in s 2(oo).[44] The labour court, having found that the termination of the service of a workman, for continued ill-health, was justified, cannot delve into the adequacy of such action or to award an ex gratia payment.[45] In Barsi Light Rly (supra), the Supreme Court held that sub-cll (a), (b) and (c) of cl 2(oo), defining retrenchment, whether inserted by way of abundant caution or on account of an excessive anxiety for clarity, merely exclude certain categories of termination of service, from the ambit of the definition. They do not necessarily show what is to be included within the definition. In Sohan Lal, the brief facts were: the workman met with a road accident while working as a driver in Haryana Roadways. In the course of the medical examination conducted by a civil surgeon, it was found that he was unfit to discharge the duties as a driver. Thereafter, a notice was issued to him in March 1997 proposing to retire him from service. The workman submitted his explanation on the consideration of which, the management retired him from service with effect from 27 March 1997. The management submitted to the labour court that it made every attempt to find an alternative job with a view to accommodate him, which, however, did not yield any positive result. It was also submitted that the workman was paid all the retiral benefits, in addition to compensation calculated at the rate of 21 days wages for every years of the residual service. The labour court took note of all the facts and declined to grant the relief sought for by the workman, which was upheld by the High Court, with the result the workman approached the Supreme Court. While dismissing the petition, Ranjan Gogoi J (for self and Sathasivam J) took note of the formula evolved by the Court in Anand Bihari (supra), and held:

> Following the judgment of this Court in Anand Bihari ... as already noticed, a 'scheme' engrafting the essential parameters prescribed by this Court had been brought into force in the State of Haryana by Memorandum dated 20.08.1992. The said scheme, as applicable to the State of Haryana, creates an obligation on the employer (Haryana Roadways) to find suitable alternative employment for an employee proposed to be discharged on the ground of medical disability if such disability is attributable to the service rendered. ... The facts of the present case clearly go to show that the appellant was found to be medically unfit to continue to work as a driver. His case for alternative employment in terms of the Memorandum dated 20.08.1992 was duly considered. No such alternative employment was available. Consequently, additional compensation payable to the appellant in terms of the Memorandum dated 20.08.1992 was calculated and paid. The materials on record would also go to show that the superannuation of the appellant, if he had continued in service, was due on 30.09.2004.Taking into account the totality of the facts of the present case, we are of the view that the award of the learned Labour Court dated 27.02.2004 affirmed by the High Court by its order dated 22.08.2005 will not require any interference by us.[46] (Paras 10 & 12).

Tenures of Service v Retrenchment

Contract Labour

Contract labour, engaged by a contractor for a particular period and for a particular job, are not 'workmen' under the IDA. Such employment comes to an end automatically, as soon as the time is over and the job is over. The disengagement of contract labour does not amount to retrenchment and does not attract s 25F. Such contract workers are not entitled to absorption in the service of the company, in respect of whose work, they were engaged by the contractor.[47]

Casual Workers

The Calcutta High Court held that the termination of the service of a casual workman, will fall within the meaning of the definition of 'retrenchment'.[48] However, in DR Aher, where a daily-rated workman, employed on a purely temporary basis in an irrigation project, having been so engaged for a period of six years, did not report for duty on his own, but five years later, raised an industrial dispute alleging an illegal termination, the Bombay High Court quashed the award of reinstatement with full back wages, passed by the labour court, and held that there was no termination of service, that the award passed by the labour court was not only illegal, but had also resulted in the miscarriage of justice.[49] Muster-roll workers, engaged by the forest department, who had worked for more than 240 days in a calendar year and who had not been retrenched as contemplated under s 25F and who had been working continuously for a period ranging from 3 to 10 years, were held entitled to continue in service.[50] Where services were not terminated or retrenched by the management, but the workers remained absent after a particular date, the provisions of s 25F were not held applicable. Once a situation is held to be not a case of termination of service by the management, whether the workmen had worked for 240 days or more, becomes immaterial. In the case of certain daily-rated workers, who had worked on the muster roll for a very short period, the relief of reinstatement with back wages was refused.[51] Where the workmen employed as casual labourers in a cable-laying project of the telecom department were terminated, such termination did not come within the purview of the definition of retrenchment in s 2(oo) and there was no need to comply with s 25F.[52]

Where the casual workers, who had put in 240 of days of service and whose services were terminated, challenged the order of the labour court, directing payment of compensation in lieu of reinstatement, the High Court held that a reinstatement would merely put the workers in the same position as they were earlier, namely, as casual workers, and hence, the relief of compensation granted by the labour court was appropriate.[53] In a case where a daily-wager, who had put in more than 240 days of service, was terminated without complying with s. 25F, on the ground that his original appointment was not made against a sanctioned post and hence, he was not a workman within the meaning of the IDA, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court observed that the distinction between seeking regularisation and insisting on the procedure under s. 25F to be followed, was significant and the two should not be confused, and held that a retrenchment, without following the prescribed procedure under s 25F, was void ab initio.[54] Coolies employed by a municipality, to remove garbage, are daily-rated workers and are neither regular, nor permanent employees, and have no right to claim a regular employment, and hence, the order of the labour court, directing their reinstatement, is bad.[55] The termination of the service of a person, who was employed intermittently on a casual basis and on daily wages on work relating to audit and accounts, does not amount to retrenchment.[56] In SM Nilajkar, Lahoti J (for self and Brijesh Kumar J), had outlined the scheme and purpose of sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) in the following words:

> It is common knowledge that the Government as a welfare State floats several schemes and projects generating employment > opportunities, though they are short lived. The objective is to meet the need of the moment. The benefit of such schemes and projects is that for the duration they exist, they provide employment and livelihood to such persons as would not have been able to secure the same but for such schemes or projects. If the workmen employed for fulfilling the need of such passing-phase-projects or schemes were to become a liability on the employer State by too liberally interpreting the labour laws in favour of the workmen, then the same may well act as a disincentive to the State for floating such schemes and the State may opt to keep away from initiating such schemes and projects even in times of dire need, because it may feel that by opening the gates of welfare it would be letting in onerous obligations entailed upon it by extended application of the labour laws. Sub-clause (bb) in the definition of retrenchment was introduced to take care of such like situations by Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act, 1984 with effect from 18-8-1984.[57] ().

The above observation of Lahoti J is right. The said sub-clause was intended to serve the twin objects of: (i) providing the much needed exit route to the industry to plan and adjust its manpower according to the fluctuating requirements as dictated by the market forces; and (ii) tiding over the problem of unemployment, at least partially, by engaging workers in different peripheral/non-perennial/marginal activities for short spells in different sectors of economy. This view is in striking contrast to the judicial perversions of alarming magnitude that surfaced in S Govindaraju v KSRTC (supra). In Haryana Roadways, the facts briefly were: the workman was appointed in various capacities as a class IV employee between March 1988 and February 1989 with intermittent breaks, whereafter he was not given appointment, which gave rise to the dispute. The tribunal held that the workman worked for about 264 days during the said period and on this view of the matter ordered reinstatement with continuity of service and 50% back wages. Mathur J (for self, Lahoti CJI and Balasubramanian J), took the view that the respondent-workman was not doing any technical job, but was only employed as a class IV worker and that where the length of service was short the award of back wages was wholly inappropriate. On this view of the matter, the learned judge, while upholding the reinstatement part of the award, set aside that part which directed the employer to pay back wages.[58]

In Haryana State EDC, the facts briefly were: the respondent workman was appointed for a period of 89 days as Junior Technician (Electronics) on an ad hoc basis in 1990. In terms of an offer of appointment made to her, the post was purely temporary and her services were liable to be terminated without assigning any reason or notice. It was categorically stated that she would have no claim for regular appointment having worked with the corporation on ad hoc basis. Her services were extended from time to time. In each of the offer of appointment, similar terms and conditions were laid down, and in this manner she was appointed, terminated and reappointed for a period of 89 days, each time, with an intermittent break of 2-3 days between October 1990 and February 1992. Her service was finally terminated in February 1992. The labour court directed reinstatement of the workman with full back wages on the premise that she had completed 240 days service. The writ petition filed by the corporation was dismissed by the High Court. Sinha J (for self and Balasubramanian J), held:

> In this case the services of the respondent had been terminated on a regular basis and she had been re-appointed after a gap of one or two days. Such a course of action was adopted by the Appellant with a view to defeat the object of the Act. Section 2(oo)(bb) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, therefore, is not attracted in the instant case. ... However, indisputably, the respondent was appointed on an ad hoc basis. She, although qualified to hold the post of Junior Technician, when the advertisement had been issued for filling up the said post, did not apply therefor. The services of the respondent was terminated as far back as in the year 1992. ... in the peculiar facts and circumstances of this case, interests of justice would be subserved if in the place of reinstatement with back wages, a lump sum amount is directed to be paid by way of compensation. This order is being passed keeping in view the fact that. ... the respondent has not worked since 1992. The post on which she may have been working must have also been filled up. ... It is wholly unlikely that respondent in the meantime had not been working anywhere else, since the respondent had not placed any material on record to show that she had not been working. ... we modify the impugned order by directing that the respondent shall be compensated by payment of a sum of Rs. 25,000/- instead of the order for reinstatement with back wages.[59] (Paras 11-14 & 20)

In Haryana Tourism, the facts disclosed that the corporation, which was running fast-food centres, had decided to discontinue the activity of running these outlets and to handover them to the transport department, which necessitated retrenchment of daily wagers engaged in the centres in 1991. The labour court directed reinstatement of the workers, but with 25 per cent back wages, which was confirmed by the High Court. Allowing the appeal in part, the Supreme Court held that payment of a compensation of Rs. 60000/- per workman in lieu of reinstatement having regard to the lapse of time.[60] In Municipal Council, Samrala, where it was found that the workman was employed and disengaged thrice in a span of 18 months, and the workman was aware that her service was liable to be terminated at the end of the period(s), the case fell within the purview of s 2(oo)(bb). Termination of her service cannot be challenged on the ground of violation of s 25F.[61]Where the service of a person, who was appointed on contractual basis for different periods, has been terminated, such termination falls within the exception stipulated under sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) and it ceases to be ‘retrenchment’. Once it is covered by sub-cl (bb), Ch V-A cannot have any application and by the same token, s 25G cannot have any application. No legal right is derived to continue in service in terms of provisions of Act under which he was governed. Thus, the question of depriving him of any status or privilege as stipulated in Item 10 of Sch 5 of the Act, which provide for acts amounting to unfair labour practice, would not arise.[62] Where a person was engaged again and again as a Junior Typist for fixed periods on daily wages, his disengagement after the lapse of the last order is covered by the exception contained in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo), and hence it does not amount to retrenchment.[63] A daily wager engaged, not in accordance with the statutory rules, cannot claim reinstatement, much less regularization.[64]

In District Programme Coordinator, the facts were: the Mahila Samakhya was a registered society and was engaged in women empowerment activities in certain areas of Karnataka and funded by the Government of Netherlands. The respondent-driver were engaged on fixed tenure basis in two spells, the second spell being from 1 November 1997 to 31 October 1998. The contract of employment further stipulated that the services were liable to be terminated at any time before the expiry of the tenure by giving one month notice or wages in lieu thereof. During the second spell of his tenure, some omissions and commissions on his part came to the notice of the Samakhya and some oral enquiry was conducted in the said omissions commissions. His service was terminated on 3 July 1998 by invoking the termination clause mentioned above. The labour court held that the termination simpliciter was illegal and ordered reinstatement with full back wages, as no disciplinary enquiry was held by the management. The High Court, while upholding the order, reduced the back wages to 30 per cent. A Bench of Supreme Court comprising Sinha and Chatterjee JJ, held that it was not a fit case for ordering reinstatement and ordered payment of a compensation of Rs. 56,000/- in lieu of reinstatement.[65] In Ghaziabad Development Authority, a fundamental issue that fell for the decision of Supreme Court was "whether the Proviso to s 6N of the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act 1947 is in pari materia with sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) of the Central Act, in order to bring fixed tenure contracts within the pale of the said exception in the latter Act." Section 6N of UPIDA runs thus:

> S. 6N. Conditions precedent to retrenchment of workmen.—No workman employed in any industry who has been in continuous service for not less than one year under an employer shall be retrenched by that employer until-
>
> (a) the workman has been given one month's notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment and the period of notice has expired or the workman has been paid in lieu of such notice wages for the period of the notice:
>
> Provided that no such notice shall be necessary if the retrenchment is under an agreement which specifies a date for the termination of service;
>
> (b) the workman has been paid, at the time of retrenchment, compensation which shall be equivalent to fifteen days' average pay for every completed year of service or any part thereof in excess of six months; and,
>
> (c) notice in the prescribed manner is served on the State Government." (emphasis added).

Highlighting the distinction between the two provisions, Sinha J (for self and Bedi J), observed:

> Section 6N of the Act unlike section 25B of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 does not provide that working for a period of 240 days in the preceding year would subserve the purpose. What is necessary under the said provision is working for a period of 240 days in one year. Once, a workman, has been in continuous service for not less than one year before his retrenchment, one month's notice in writing. indicating the reason thereof or wages in lieu thereof, as also compensation equivalent to fifteen days' average pay for every completed year of service or in part thereof in excess of six months is imperative. Proviso appended to clause (a) of section 6N of the Act provides that no notice would be necessary to be served, if the retrenchment has been in terms of an agreement which specified a date for the termination of service. The said proviso is not in pari materia with section 2(oo)(bb) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.[66] ().

In the light of the facts of the case, which disclosed that: (i) there was no agreement between the employer and the workman as contemplated in the Proviso to s 6N(a) ; (ii) the workman was engaged on daily wages; (iii) sanction of the State Government was necessary for the creation of posts; (iv) no post was sanctioned by the Government after 31 March 1990, which fact was neither denied nor disputed; and (v) any appointment in violation of the Constitutional provisions and statutory rules would be void. Sinha J held that the labour court should not have directed the reinstatement of the workman in service. On this view of the matter, Sinha J ordered payment of Rs. 50,000/- as compensation to the workman in lieu of reinstatement. In*UP Brassware Corporation*, which too came within the pale of s 6N of UPIDA, Sinha J (for self and Balasubramanian J), held that although in the normal course a direction to pay full back wages in the event of an invalid termination was being usually given, with the passage of time, a pragmatic view of the matter was being taken by the court realizing that the industry was not compelled to pay to the workman for the period during which he apparently contributed little or nothing at all to it and/or for a period that was spent unproductively as a result whereof the employer would be compelled to go back to a situation which prevailed many years ago, namely, when the workman was retrenched. The learned judge further held that payment of full back wages was not automatic, and that no precise formula could be laid down as to the circumstances under which the payment of entire back wages should be allowed.[67]

In a case where the services of casual workers, who were engaged continuously for several years, were terminated, it was held that the award of the labour court directing their reinstatement with half back wages would not call for interference, more so, when the facts disclosed that there was no evidence to the effect that they were engaged on contractual basis in order to bring it within the exception under sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo).[68] However, in MP Police Housing Corpn, the MP High Court comprising (Menon and Kaushal JJ), upheld the award of the labour court directing reinstatement of a casual workman who completed 240 days service and whose service was terminated without complying with s 25F. The Bench held that the denial of back wages was justified in view of the fact that he was only a daily wager.[69] A person who was engaged as water boy on a casual basis but for an unbroken period of 11 years from 1983 to 1994 is a workman and his termination without complying with s 25F was illegal, and directed reinstatement, but without back wages.[70] In Bhavnagar Municipal Corporation, the facts disclosed that the service of a workman, who was engaged for fixed periods on a casual basis and on daily wages, was terminated. It was further established that he had worked only for 54 days. The labour court ordered reinstatement which was confirmed by the High Court. Quashing both the orders, Radhakrishnan J (for self and Ghose J), held that the contract of appointment consciously entered into by the employer and the employee would, over and above the specific terms of the written agreement, indicates that the employment was short-lived and the same was liable to termination, on the fixed period mentioned in the contract of appointment, and that in view of the fact that there was no retrenchment under s 2(oo) read with s 2(bb). It was therefore, held that ss 25G & 25H would not apply to the facts of the case.[71]

In Dilip Kumar Mandal, the facts briefly were: the workman worked as a peon but his service was orally terminated without paying retrenchment compensation. The tribunal refused to pass the award of reinstatement on ground of no employer-employee relationship and that the petitioner failed to establish to have worked as daily wager for 240 days or more. Hearing the writ petition, Srivastava J, of Patna High Court held that the petitioner could not succeed in proving his appointment to post of peon but proved to be working as daily wager. There was nothing to show that petitioner was appointed as daily worker for fixed period, and no document was brought by the Respondent/bank to show that petitioner was appointed on basis of contract for certain period and that, after its expiry, the contract was not renewed and hence the said termination did not come under s 2 (oo)(bb). The learned judge held that, in these circumstances, the tribunal ought to have drawn adverse inference against Respondent/bank and given a finding to the effect that the petitioner worked for more than 240 days, and that nearly 19 years rolled by since his termination. On this view of the matter, the learned judge ordered payment of Rs. 2,00,000/- as compensation payable by the Respondent/bank in lieu of compensation for back wages as well as reinstatement.[72] In Microwave Project, the issue related to the termination of service of a 'casual' worker engaged on a specific project. Quashing the orders of the lower courts and remanding the matter to the tribunal, Pasayat J (for self and Kapadia J) observed that the tribunal failed to consider the issues in proper perspective; that the effect of s 2(oo)(bb) was completely lost sight of; that the facts disclosed that there was no dispute that the employment was for a specific project; that there was no discussion of the various materials produced before the tribunal; that the orders of the High Court proceeded on the basis that because there was non-compliance with the requirements of s 25F, the Award was justified; and that the question of applicability of s 25F would be dependent upon the basic question relating to applicability of s 2(oo)(bb) of the Act, which aspect was lost sight of.[73]

Trainees

A termination of the service of a trainee, initially appointed for one year and continued in service for more than two years, amounts to retrenchment and such appointment is not saved by cl (bb) of s 2(oo). The employer has to comply with the provisions of s 25F.[74] In Kalyani Sharp, the labour court and the High Court held that a trainee technician, who was appointed to undergo training for a period of one year, with the stipulation that the facility of training might be withdrawn at any time before completion, without assigning any reason, was entitled to the protection of s 25F in view of the fact that he had completed 240 days. Quashing the orders of the labour court and the High Court, the Supreme Court held that from the order of employment, it was evident that the workman was on probation and his service was terminated during probation and as such, there was no question of issuing a notice to the respondent, before terminating his service.[75] In Surat MNSB, it was found that the management appointed a person as a trainee, for a period of two months and extended the training period up to one year by issuing five separate orders, each for a duration of two months, followed by her appointment as a temporary junior clerk-cum-cashier, for a period of one month. Her services were extended by issuing fresh appointment orders, each for one month, so much so that she was continued as a temporary clerk-cum-cashier for 10 months, making it a grand total of 1 year 10 months from the date of the initial appointment as a trainee, till the date on which she was terminated. The labour court directed reinstatement with full back wages, which was upheld by a single judge of the Gujarat High Court. The learned single judge held that the said termination would not fall within the exception in sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo). The facts of this case disclose mala fides on the part of the employer. The staggering number of 16 appointment orders (6 as a trainee and 10 as a temporary clerk-cum-typist) establish that it was not a case of a mere fixed-tenure appointment as contemplated by s 2(oo)(bb), and that the employer acted in a questionable manner. In a letters patent appeal, the Division Bench of the Gujarat High Court partially allowed the appeal by reducing the back wages to 50 per cent, without, however, disturbing the order directing the reinstatement, and observed that the exception in sub-cl (bb) to s 2(oo), had no application to cases, where, based on evidence, it was found that the action of the employer was by way of victimisation or, in any case, not bona fide.[76] Where the employee was appointed as a trainee for six months, on the condition that on a satisfactory completion of the training and on passing the test, he would be eligible for appointment as an officer, and his service was terminated as he did not clear the written test, the Supreme Court held that the case fell within the exception in s 2(oo)(bb).[77] A single judge of Madras High Court held that the termination of service of a trainee on ground of unsatisfactory performance does not amount to retrenchment nor does it amount to punishment, and the award of the labour court directing reinstatement with back wages was not sustainable.[78]

Temporary Workmen

In Tata Consulting Engineeers, the facts disclosed that a workman was engaged on a temporary basis, for a period of three months, which was extended by subsequent orders, so much so that she continued in employment for more than one year. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that her termination would amount to retrenchment, and it would not be covered under sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo).[79] An employee engaged for meeting the rush or overload of work or a contingency, is an employee to whom the provisions of s 25F of the Act would be attracted and the termination of his service without payment of retrenchment compensation, would be void ab initio.[80] An employee covered by the Kalelkar Award, under which he is entitled to be brought into the 'converted temporary establishment', by virtue of putting in five years of continuous service, if terminated in violation of s 25F, he is entitled to reinstatement with full back-wages.[81] The termination of the service of a 'tracer', appointed on a purely temporary basis, as a consequence of the closure of one division and three sub-divisions, does not attract the provisions of s 25F, unless it is shown that the power was misused or vitiated by its mala fide exercise.[82] In Air India, the Supreme Court, while setting aside the order of the High Court, directing the management to absorb a temporary employee who had worked in the organisation for 53 days only, observed:

> We fail to understand as to how the High Court could have passed an interim order, much less a final order, in matters of service which ultimately would upset the scheme of recruitment itself, restraining the appellant from the termination of the services when the term of employment comes to an end. [83]

In a case, where an employee appointed on a temporary basis, for a period of 89 days, against a permanent post of a lower division clerk, was reappointed for another period of 89 days, after the expiry of the initial appointment, and further re-appointed for another 89 days, before being terminated, it was held that her appointment was for a fixed period, notwithstanding the fact that she had worked for more than 240 days, and hence, the termination of her service did not amount to retrenchment.[84] The termination of work-charged employees, appointed for fixed periods and posted at various locations, does not amount to retrenchment, as such a termination is attracted by s 2(oo)(bb), irrespective of the length of the period that may have been stipulated in the contract.[85] In Estate Officer, the facts were: a workman was employed on a temporary basis, for a period of 89 days. After the expiry of the initial period, he was again appointed for another period of 89 days, after giving a break. Finally, his service was terminated as provided in the contract. The labour court recorded a finding that the action of the employer was mala fide and was aimed at depriving the workman of the benefit of s 25F, and ordered a reinstatement, even though the workman had not worked for 240 days. Sudhalkar J (for himself and Gill J), upheld the order of the labour court and that the termination was illegal. To say the least, the decision of both the labour court and the Division Bench is not in consonance with the plain provisions of law.[86] It is conceded that the court can interfere in a case where the employer terminates the services of a workman, who has completed one year of continuous service as defined in s 25B, without complying with the provisions of s 25F. Even here, if the appointment is found to be contractual, for a fixed term, there is no need to comply with s 25F, as it would be squarely covered by s 2(oo)(bb), as laid down by the Supreme Court in Escorts Ltd,[87] and Birla VXL.[88] Besides, no court can deny the employer, the right to engage employees on a temporary basis, for a fixed term. In this case, the facts disclosed that the workman had put in 232 days of temporary service. The employer had every right to terminate a temporary workman engaged for a fixed term, before he completes 240 days, and on that sole ground, no inference could be drawn that the employer had acted mala fide. It is not as if all the jobs in an organisation are of a permanent nature or of a perennial character, and the right of an employer to engage temporary and casual workmen, to take care of certain exigencies, as long as he is within the four corners of law, cannot be questioned. This decision reflects, not the proper and judicious exercise of judicial power, but its misinterpretation of statutes. The learned judge imagined and imported too many things into the case facts, which is clearly unwarranted. That apart, this decision runs counter to the ratio of Escorts Ltd, Birla VXL, Allahabad Bank,[89] and other decisions which touch upon the termination of the service of temporary workmen, employed for a fixed period.

Another decision which proceeds on the same lines is that of Mukesh Kumar, rendered by the same Bench that handed down the decision in Haryana Urban Development. In this case, despite the fact that the labour court had rejected the claim of the workman on the ground that he had not worked for 240 days, Sudhalkar J brought into the case, the doctrine of 'unfair labour practice', which, in the understanding of the learned judge, meant a 'termination of the services of a workman, before his completing 240 days of service'. He further held that what was in issue before the labour court, was not the mere completion of 240 days of service, but an unfair labour practice. [90] It is shocking that a High Court judge could deal with cases so recklessly and contrary to the plain provisions of law. It would be a real miracle, if the learned judge could cite the appropriate reference from Sch V to the IDA, where it is stipulated that a 'termination of the services of a workman, before his completing 240 days of services, amounted to an unfair labour practice', and, conversely, at least one provision in any labour statute of his choice, which compels the employer to engage workmen for not less than 240 days. To say the least, the manner in which Sudhalkar J proceeded to decide the above cases discloses the grave misconceptions of a fatal nature, entertained by him. Both the above decisions deserve to be rejected without a second look, as being repugnant to all notions of sound reasoning and common sense. In striking contrast, the Orissa High Court held that, in a case where the workman had not put in one year of continuous service, within the meaning of s 25(B), ie, he had not worked for 240 days in a year, he was not entitled to compensation under s 25F.[91] A single judge of the Rajasthan High Court, in Giridhar Gopal,[92] expressed a similar view. In Rattan Singh, where the services of an employee, who had served continuously for the requisite statutory minimum period in a year, were terminated without complying with s 25F, the Supreme Court held that the said termination was illegal. However, considering the fact that 20 years had elapsed since the termination of the service, instead of directing a reinstatement, a sum of Rs 25,000 was directed to be paid in lieu of reinstatement and back wages.[93]

Seasonal Employees

In Morinda Coop Sugar, the issue was "whether the termination of seasonal workers, engaged during the crushing season would amount to retrenchment." Rejecting the contention, Ramaswamy J (for self and Hansaria J), observed:

> It would thus be clear that the respondents were not working throughout the season. They worked during crushing seasons only. The respondents were taken into work for the season and consequent to closure of the season, they ceased to work. ... The question is whether such a cessation would amount to retrenchment. Since it is only a seasonal work, the respondents cannot be said to have been retrenched in view of what is stated in clause (bb) of Section 2(oo) of the Act. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the view taken by the Labour Court and the High Court is illegal. However, the appellant is directed to maintain a register for all workmen engaged during the seasons enumerated hereinbefore and when the new season starts the appellant should make a publication in neighbouring places in which the respondents normally live and if they would report for duty, the appellant would engage them in accordance with seniority and exigency of work.[94]

The Madras High Court held that seasonal employees had no right to regularisation, till they were duly selected and the mere continuance for 480 days in service, would not qualify them for regularisation and, accordingly, a termination of their services on the completion of the procurement season would not be attracted by s 25F.[95] Termination of seasonal workers at the end of the season, does not amount to a 'retrenchment' under s 2(oo), and they do not acquire a right to regularisation.[96] In Krishik Upaj, it was held that workers appointed on seasonal basis and not against any clear vacancy, would not have any right to claim permanency, even if they had completed 240 days in a year.[97] In another case involving the same company, another single judge took a contrary view and upheld the award of the labour court, directing the company to retain a workman on the ground that he had worked for more than 240 days in service, that other workmen junior to him, were retained in service, and that the management could not adduce evidence to prove that the said workman was engaged in work of a seasonal nature.[98] A settlement providing for a regular absorption of seasonal employees, depending on a permanent vacancy, can be invoked by seasonal employees to their advantage, as and when permanent vacancies arise. No claim for regularisation need be considered if there are no permanent vacancies.[1] In Bhogpur Coop Sugar Mills, Sinha J (for self and Katju J), held that the termination of the service of a seasonal workman employed in a sugar factory and who had not completed 240 days of service would not amount to retrenchment.[2]

Probationers

The Gauhati High Court has held that the termination of the service of a probationer, on a bald statement that he was medically unfit, would fall within the definition of 'retrenchment'.[3] In Raghavendra Kulkarni, the Supreme Court held that the termination of a probationer, in terms of the appointment letter, does not amount to a retrenchment.[4] In SN Jhavar, the Supreme Court classified the cases falling within the ambit of a 'deemed confirmation' under three heads, and observed:

> The question of deemed confirmation in service jurisprudence, which is dependent upon the language of the relevant service rules, > has been the subject-matter of consideration before this court, times without number, in various decisions and there are three lines of cases on this point. One line of cases is where the service rules or in the letter of appointment, a period of probation is specified and the power to extend the same is also conferred upon the authority, without prescribing any maximum period of probation and if the officer is continued beyond the prescribed or extended period, he cannot be deemed to be confirmed. In such cases, there is no bar against termination at any point of time after the expiry of the period of probation. The other line of cases is that where, while there is a provision in the rules for an initial probation and extension thereof a maximum period for such extension is also provided, beyond which it is not permissible to extend the probation. The inference in such cases is that the officer concerned is deemed to have been confirmed upon expiry of the maximum period of probation, in case, before its expiry, the order of termination has not been passed. The last line of cases is where, though under the rules, the maximum period of probation is prescribed, the same also require a specific act on the part of the employer, of issuing an order of confirmation and of the probationer's passing a test for the purpose of confirmation. In such cases, even if the maximum period of probation has expired and neither any order of confirmation has been passed, nor the person concerned has passed the requisite test, he cannot be deemed to have been confirmed, merely because the said period has expired.[5]

The services of a probationer cannot be terminated for negligence in allowing vehicles to pass without collecting octroi, unless he has been given an opportunity of being heard and an inquiry is conducted.[6] In SN Vasudevan, the facts of the case were: a few machine operaters were appointed on probation for a period of six months, with a provision for an extension of the probation, if considered necessary. As against this, the Standing Order No 4(2) provided, inter alia, that a probationer shall be closely watched in regard to his conduct, ability and adaptability to the job and if he does not meet the requirements, his services will be terminated without notice, during or at the end of the probationary period. The management extended the probation of the workmen, and later terminated their services. The labour court upheld the said termination on the ground that it fell within the ambit of s 2(oo)(bb), in view of the fact that they were appointed for a fixed period, on probation, which was liable to be extended, and hence, the provisions s 25N were not attracted. Gopala Gowda J, held that the Standing Orders did not provide for an extension of the probation period and hence, the action of the management in extending the probation, admittedly under the contract of employment, was repugnant to the Standing Orders.[7]

This part of the decision deserves to be attacked. Extension of probation is an implied power conferred on the employer, unless there is a clause in the Standing Orders which positively prohibits such extension or which imposes a ceiling on the maximum period of probation, beyond which, the workman if continued, shall be deemed to have been automatically confirmed. Where no such ceiling is prescribed, the probationer shall continue to be a probationer and does not get automatically confirmed after the expiry of the said probation period. That is the settled legal position, as laid down by the apex court in Dharam Singh,[8] BP Bhatnagar,[9] and a host of other cases. In the present case, it was an admitted position that the Standing Orders did not stipulate any ceiling on the maximum period of probation. The expression in Standing Order No 4(2), that 'his services will be terminated without notice, during or at the end of the probationary period' could not obviously be interpreted to mean that the employer should necessarily terminate his services at the end of the probationary period. If the employer, in his discretion, feels that the probationer requires some more time to measure up to the job demands and extends the probationary period, it could be not be said that such an extension works out to the disadvantage of the workman. On the contrary, such an extension of the probationary period is beneficial to the workman, for the reason that it gives one more opportunity to him to prove his suitability. In the face of a crystal clear legal position relating to probation, and in the light of the above discussion, to hold that the employer had no right to the extend the probation, sounds capricious. On this point, the view taken by the labour court is right and that of Gopala Gowda J, is misconceived and wrong. In Muir Mills, Lakshmanan J (for self and Kabir J), held that in terms of the offer of appointment, the appellant mill reserved the right to terminate the service of a probationer without assigning any reason and without any notice. That being so, the termination of probationer under the said clause would not amount to retrenchment in view of the exception carved out under sub-cl (bb) thereof. By the same token, the award of the tribunal granting relief of reinstatement with back wages was not proper and deserved to be set aside.[10]

Part-time Workmen

A part-time workman, whose services were terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F, is a workman and is entitled to a reinstatement.[11]

Workmen appointed illegally and in contravention of Rules

In Eranallor SC Bank, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the appointment of an employee, made without the authority of law, will be void ab initio and the termination of his services will not be retrenchment.[12] On the other hand, in Mithilesh Kumar Singh, a single judge of Patna High Court held that the termination of service of a workman, on the ground that his initial appointment was not legal and valid, would amount to a retrenchment. The court observed that the idea of an illegal and invalid appointment is quite foreign to the Industrial Disputes Act.[13] A similar view was taken by the Madras High Court, in Srirangam CU Bank, in which the facts disclosed that the workman was appointed as a temporary clerk by the bank, in contravention of its rules and regulations. In view of the wide amplitude of the language of the definition of 'retrenchment', the termination of his service was held to be 'retrenchment'. Rejecting the contention of the employer bank that, since the appointment of the workman was void, he could not be continued in the service and, therefore, the termination of his service would not amount to 'retrenchment', the court observed that since the workman had put in over two years of service, he had been in continuous service for more than one year under the employer bank, as required by s 25F, and whether the appointment was made in accordance with the law or not, does not make any difference, and what is relevant is the fact of employment and not the legality or otherwise, of it.[14] The Madhya Pradesh High Court, in Rajesh Kumar, held that a termination of the employment of a probationer or of an invalidly appointed worker, will be retrenchment because an invalid appointment is not one of the exceptions to the provisions of the main definition of retrenchment.[15] The view of the single judge of the Kerala High Court is the correct law, because the holding judgments of the Patna, Madras and Madhya Pradesh High Courts will lead to absurd consequences. It would mean that illegally and invalidly employed employees will be automatically validated and they will be treated at par with the legally and validly employed employees. Thus, though the definition of 'retrenchment' comprehends a termination of service, it is not that every termination of service is retrenchment. In other words, every case of a discharge simpliciter may not be a case of retrenchment,[16] though there is a preponderance of judicial opinion, that every termination of service, not falling under any of the exception of s 2(oo), would amount to retrenchment. The words 'termination by the employer of the service of a workman, for any reason whatsoever' are the keywords.[17]

Adjudication of Retrenchment

All 'retrenchment' is termination of service, but all termination of service may not be 'retrenchment'. In order to be a 'retrenchment', the termination of service has to fall within the ambit of the definition of 'retrenchment', as given in s 2(oo) of the Act.[18] Furthemore, s. 25F prescribes the requirements of notice and compensation, as conditions precedent to a retrenchment of workmen. Section 25G introduces the rule 'last come first go', in effecting 'retrenchment' of workmen. A termination of service, without satisfying these statutory requirements, will be no 'retrenchment' in the eye of law. Hence, a non-compliance with these mandatory provisions, will render the purported retrenchment invalid. Industrial adjudication, therefore, has jurisdiction to see whether, in fact, these preconditions have been complied with or not. A termination of the service of a workman, as a measure of 'retrenchment', without complying with the mandatory requirements of law, will be illegal. But the word 'illegal' has a very wide significance. Considered in isolation, it is vague; for the termination of employment may be illegal for different and even conflicting reasons. Therefore, the meaning of the word 'illegal' has to be understood in the context of the allegations of facts constituting the particular kind of illegality pleaded. It would follow that the word 'illegal' so construed, according to the context, would not include some meaning of illegality which was not pleaded and which was contrary to the pleadings.[19]

In JK Iron, the Supreme Court observed that if in applying the principle 'first come, last go', the employer gives a preferential treatment to juniors, without any acceptable or sound reasons, the industrial adjudication will be well justified in holding that the action of the management is not bona fide and the adjudicator will be within his jurisdiction to go into the question of the bona fides of the retrenchment. However, the question of notice and compensation required by s 25F and the rule of 'last come, first go', as enshrined by s 25G, would arise only if the termination of the service of a workman is 'retrenchment' as contemplated by s 2(oo). These requirements are not attracted in cases of termination of service otherwise than as 'retrenchment'.[20] The desire of an employer to make profit is natural and, therefore, lawful.[21] It is not open to an industrial adjudicator to tell an employer as to how he should conduct his business.[22] So long as the retrenchment is carried out bona fide and is not vitiated by any considerations of victimisation or unfair labour practice, and the employer comes to the conclusion that he can carryon his undertaking with reasonable efficiency, with the number of employees retained by him after retrenchment, the tribunal ought not to ordinarily, interfere with such decision. It is for the management to decide the strength of its labour, required to carry out efficiently, the work of its undertaking. If, therefore, as a result of a re-organisation, the number of the existing employees exceeds the reasonable and legitimate needs of the undertaking, the employer, subject to his obligations under Chs VA and VB of the Act, can effect retrenchment.[23]

It is not the function of the tribunal to go into the question of whether such a scheme is profitable or not, or whether it should have been adopted by the employer. There is no provision in industrial law which confers any power on the tribunal to inquire into such a dispute, so long as it is not actuated by any consideration of victimisation or any unfair labour practice.[24] 'A person must be considered free to so arrange his business, that he avoids a regulatory law and its penal consequences, which he has, without the arrangement, no proper means of obeying. This, of course, he can do only so long as he does not break that or any other law'.[25] A person has a right to re-organise his business in any fashion he likes, for the purpose of economy or convenience. It is within the managerial discretion of an employer, to organise and arrange his business in the manner he considers best. So long as that is done bona fide, it is not competent for the tribunal to question its propriety. Hence, the management has a right to determine the volume of its labour force, consistent with its business or anticipated business, and its organisation. If, for instance, a scheme for re-organisation of the business of the employer, results in surplusage of employees, no employer is expected to carry the burden of such economic dead weight and retrenchment has to be accepted as inevitable, however unfortunate it be.[26] The fact that the action of retrenchment, taken by the employer, is in exercise of his right of re-organisation of his business, is an important aspect which has to be specifically pleaded and proved before the tribunal and then, to be decided by the tribunal.[27]

Subject to the provisions of Chs VA and VB, the management has a right to take a decision to retrench the dead weight of uneconomic surplus. The justification for the retrenchment has, however, to be assessed by the reasonableness of the decision taken by the management in a particular situation of actual or threatened losses. It is not to be assessed as the vindication of that step by future events and by the substituted judgment of any other agency, judicial or otherwise, which has no responsibility or hazard in the industry.[28] For instance, a retrenchment cannot be said to be unjustified merely for the reason that the employer could have transferred the workmen to another unit in another part of the country, and the tribunal, a therefore, cannot infer that the failure of the employer to transfer the retrenched employees to other units, renders the retrenchment unjustified.[29] Likewise, the fact that the implementation of a reorganisation scheme, adopted by an employer, for reasons of economy and convenience, would lead to the discharge of some of the employees, will have no material bearing on the question as to whether the re-organisation has been adopted by the employer bona fide or not.[30] The law, however, requires that in effecting a retrenchment, for any reason whatsoever, the employer must be acting bona fide and not for the purpose of victimising his employees and in order to get rid of their services.[31] For instance, the retrenchment of a workman, who had put in one and a half decades of continuous service, on the ground that his age was a little more than the maximum eligible age for appointment, at the time of the employment, was held to be unjustified and invalid.[32] A mere invocation of the Standing Orders, for a termination of service, will not, ipso facto, take the termination beyond the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal.

In appropriate cases, the tribunal will have jurisdiction to find out as to whether the invocation of the Standing Order was capricious, arbitrary, or mala fide, or was the result of victimisation or an unfair labour practice, and set aside the 'retrenchment' or award compensation if the facts of the case justify.[33] But the tribunal has to confine its adjudication to the terms of reference and the pleadings of the parties. It is 'not open to it to fly off at a tangent, disregarding the pleadings and reach any conclusion that it thinks as just and proper'.[34] For instance, where the only point of a dispute which was referred by the state government, to the tribunal, for adjudication, was, whether the 'retrenchment' of the workman by the general manager of the corporation was legal and valid, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to engage itself in the inquiry as to who had retrenched the workman concerned and whether he was competent to do so or not, because a workman cannot, in the same breath, say that he has not been retrenched and also say that his retrenchment is invalid and inoperative.[35] In Subong Tea Estate, the Supreme Court stated the following propositions for the guidance of industrial adjudicators:

(1) The management can retrench its employees only for proper reasons, which means, that it must not be actuated by any motive of victimisation or any unfair labour practice;

(2) It is for the management to decide the strength of its labour force, and the number of workmen required to carry out efficiently, the work in his industrial undertaking; the decision, therefore, must always be left to be determined by the management in its discretion;

(3) If the number of employees exceeds the reasonable and legitimate needs of the undertaking, it is open to the management to retrench them;

(4) Workmen may become surplus on the ground of rationalization or on the ground of economy, reasonably and bona fide adopted by the management, or on the ground of other industrial or trade reasons; and

(5) The right of an employer to effect retrenchment, cannot normally be challenged, but when there is a dispute in regard to the validity of the retrenchment, it would be necessary for the tribunal to consider whether the impugned retrenchment was justified and it would not be open to the employer, either capriciously or without any reason at all, to say that it proposes to reduce its labour force, for no rhyme or reason.[36]

Burden of Proof

The burden of proof to establish that the termination of service of a workman is retrenchment, is on the person putting forward the claim. In other words, where an employee claims that he has been retrenched, he must prove that he was retrenched from service and it is not for the employer to prove that the discharge or termination of the services of the employees was otherwise than by way of retrenchment.[37]

Clause (p): SETTLEMENT

The repealed Trade Disputes Act, 1929, did not contain the definition of 'settlement'. The definition as originally enacted in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, was as follows: "Settlement means a settlement arrived at in the course of a conciliation proceeding". This definition did not take notice of any private settlement or agreement, arrived at between the parties, in the course of their direct negotiations. A Division Bench of the Bombay High Court observed that, 'it is only that settlement upon which the law has its imprimatur and to which the law has given sanctity and which the law has made binding'.[38] The old definition was substituted by the present one, by the Amending Act of 1956.

Settlement and Agreement

The definition of settlement now envisages two categories of settlements (i) a settlement which is arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, ie, one which is arrived at with the assistance and concurrence of the conciliation officer, who is duty-bound to promote a right settlement and to do everything he can, to induce the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute, and (ii) a written agreement between the employer and workmen, arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings.[39] The legal effects of both the kinds of settlements are not identical, in that whereas the former binds all the present and future workmen as specified in s 18(3), even though such persons are not parties to the dispute and join the establishment subsequent to the settlement, the latter binds only the actual parties to the agreement, under the provisions of s 18(1) of the Act.[40] Rule 58(2) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules, 1957, prescribes the manner of signing the settlement. Section 18(1) makes such a settlement binding on the parties to the agreement, while s 18(3) makes a settlement arrived at 'in the course of conciliation proceedings' binding on the parties enumerated therein. A settlement becomes binding on the parties and comes into operation on the date agreed upon by the parties to the dispute and, if no date is agreed upon, on the date on which the memorandum of the settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute and a copy of it is sent to the concerned officer. A party who wants to take advantage of a settlement, has to establish that the requisites of the 'settlement' had been complied with.[41]

The Preamble to the Act postulates the settlement of 'industrial disputes'. Therefore; in terms of the definition of a settlement, what is settled between the parties is an 'industrial dispute', which, inter alia, is a dispute between the employer and the workmen. If the employees concerned do not fall within the category of workmen, no agreement or arrangement between them, even if it is in compliance with the requirements of s 2(p) and the relevant rules, will be a 'settlement' as postulated by the Act.[42] A settlement between an employer and workmen, if not duly terminated, will operate as an inviolable condition of service of the workmen. Such a settlement is only a step up in labour's progressive ascent to the goal of their ultimate ideal, namely, a living wage with the realisation of other aspirations, including a partnership with the employer.[43] A voluntary settlement is, however, to be distinguished from an adjudication. There may be several factors that may influence the parties to come to a settlement, as a phased endeavour in the course of collective bargaining. It is a process of give and take. By a settlement, the labour may scale down its claims and score in some other aspects and save unnecessary expenses in uncertain litigation. Once cordiality is established between the employer and labour, in arriving at a settlement, which operates well for the period for which it is enforced, there is always a likelihood of further advances in the shape of improved emoluments by voluntary settlement, avoiding friction and unhealthy litigation. This is the quintessence of settlement, which courts and tribunals should endeavour to encourage. 'Any settlement arrived at should be a just and fair one,[44] It is in this spirit that the settlement has to be judged and not by the yardstick adopted for scrutinising an award in an adjudication. A settlement, therefore, cannot be judged on the touchstone of the principles which govern the adjudication of industrial disputes.[45] In the words of Koshal J:

> If the settlement had been arrived at by a vast majority of the concerned workers, with their eyes open, and was also accepted by them in its totality, it must be presumed to be just and fair and not liable to be ignored while deciding the reference, merely because a small number of workers...were not parties to it or refused to accept it, or because the tribunal was of the opinion that the workers deserved marginally higher emoluments than they themselves thought they did. A settlement cannot be weighed in any golden scales and the question whether it is just and fair, has to be answered on the basis of principles different from those which come into play when an industrial dispute is under adjudication.[46]

A settlement is the result of collective bargaining and when a recognised union negotiates with an employer, the workers as individuals, do not come into the picture and it is not necessary that such individual workers should know the implications of the settlement, since a recognised union, which is expected to protect the legitimate interests of the labour, enters into a settlement with the best interests of the labourers in view. There may be exceptional cases where there may be allegations of mala fides, fraud or even corruption or other factors, which cannot altogether be ruled out. The settlements in the course of collective bargaining, ought to be weighed in their proper perspective and to be considered by law courts while implementing the same, as representing the wishes and desires of the workmen of the concerned organisation. A settlement ought not to be interfered with so easily, even though it may operate with a little bit of harshness to a section of employees and there ought to be some amount of give and take for the proper industrial peace and harmony in the country.

Law courts, therefore, have a bounden obligation to maintain such a settlement and to give due consideration to a settlement arrived at between the recognised union and the management. It would, therefore, be improper for industrial adjudication, to ignore the settlement and insert something which is totally different.[47] The Karnataka High Court has gone to the extent to say that even if the settlement is technically not in accordance with the law, it should not be interfered with in judicial review, where it is between the management and the majority of the workmen, who have taken benefit under the settlement and thereafter, resumed normal production and industrial peace, unless it is shown that the terms of the settlement are onerous and against the interests of the majority of the workmen. It is well-settled that the extraordinary jurisdiction of the writ court or judicial review should not be exercised, even if the aggrieved party has made out a case on a question of law, unless a substantial injustice has been caused to it.[48]

The Andhra Pradesh High Court held that where the management is guilty of dishonouring its commitments under a settlement, whether it is called the 'understanding' or 'minutes of discussion', after taking full advantage of the terms thereof, and having trapped the union into an agreement and after taking advantage of that agreement, it could not be said that the settlement was not binding on the management. In this case, the court reprimanded the conduct of the management, in trying to resile from the settlement so entered into.[49] The question of the justness and fairness of a settlement should be examined with reference to the situation, as it stood on the date on which it was arrived at. For instance, if a settlement is arrived at between the parties during the pendency of adjudication proceedings, the possibility of an adverse decision operates as a positive force in favour of a deliberate and careful effort by both the parties, to settle their disputes through direct negotiations. There may also be the probability of the workmen having to refund some amounts to the employer, in the event of the award going in favour of the employer.[50] A settlement, therefore, is not to be seen in bits and pieces, by holding some parts good and acceptable and others bad. Unless it can be demonstrated that the objectionable portion is such that it completely out-weighs all the other advantages gained, the court will be slow to hold a settlement as unfair and unjust. The settlement has to be accepted or rejected as a whole.[51] In construing a settlement, if two views are possible, the view which is more favourable to the workers should be adopted.[52] But a settlement obtained by fraud or vitiated on account of its being involuntary, will be no settlement in the eye of law.[53]

However, unless an agreement arrived at between the parties, either before a conciliation officer, or otherwise, is a settlement in its grammatical or ordinary signification, it will not be a settlement within the meaning of the definition. The term 'settle' is used in more senses than one. For instance, one settles properties, one settles accounts, literally and metaphorically. In relation to disputes, the word in the dictionary sense would mean, to decide by arrangement between the contesting parties'. Obviously, what is decided by a settlement, is the 'industrial dispute'. Every settlement is an arrangement or agreement, though every arrangement or agreement is not a settlement. An agreement or arrangement will not be a settlement merely because the parties to the dispute choose to call it a 'settlement' and such agreement or arrangement is incorporated in a memorandum of settlement, signed by the parties for the purposes of settlement. The agreement or arrangement must decide some part of the dispute or some matter in the dispute or decide the procedure by which the dispute is to be resolved, or affect the dispute in some manner or the other, or provide for some act or forbearance in relation to the dispute, on the part of a party or parties to the dispute. In other words, a settlement only settles the matter or matters in the dispute which it settles. If some of the matters in dispute are not settled, it cannot be said that the settlement settles the entire dispute or settles those matters in dispute, which are not within the scope of the settlement. For instance, an interim settlement which not only leaves the dispute relating to the quantum of bonus at large, but also leaves at large, the time and manner of the payment of the bonus in its entirety and settles only the manner and time of an ad hoc payment to be made on account of the bonus and the procedure for the determination of the dispute to be adopted for the time being, would not fall within the definition of a settlement, as contemplated by the Act.[54]

An agreement to refer an industrial dispute to an arbitrator, under s 10A(l) of the Act, is not a settlement, because the dispute in question subsists after such agreement and does not come to an end.[55] In Hindustan Lever, speaking for the Supreme Court, Desai J observed that the courts, by interpretative process, must strive to reduce the field of conflict and expand the area of agreement and show its preference for upholding agreements sanctified by mutuality and consensus in the larger public interest, namely, to eschew industrial strife, confrontation and consequent wastage.[56] When any trade union enters into some settlement of an industrial dispute, with the employer, the presumption is that it has acted in the best interests of its members. Therefore, when a settlement of an industrial dispute is reached at, between the sponsoring union, particularly when it commands the support of the majority, it should be prima facie, considered to be in the best interests of the employees of the concerned establishment or industry, even of the public body. Such presumption is not assailable in the absence of any oblique motive behind it. But a mere allegation in this regard would not be sufficient, as it is easier to allege than to prove. The allegation of an oblique motive, even at the stage of pleadings, should be based on some concrete materials and not based on a vague allegation.[57] There are two modes of settling industrial disputes between parties, viz:

(1) by a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings; and

(2) by a settlement otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings.

Settlement Arrived at in the Course of Conciliation Proceedings

Law attaches importance and sanctity to a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, since it carries a presumption that it is just and fair and makes it binding on all the parties, as well as other workmen in the establishment, or the part of it to which it relates. There is a distinction between a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' and a settlement arrived at 'by an agreement between the employer and workmen, otherwise than in conciliation proceedings', both as regards the procedure to be followed in the two cases and as regards the persons on whom they are binding.[58] The legislature, when it made a settlement binding not only on the parties, but also on the present and future employers and workmen, it intended that such settlement is arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings.[59] The manner of arriving at a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings has been prescribed by s 12(3), s 13(2) and r 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. Section 12(3) and s 13(2) require the conciliation officer or the board, as the case may be, to send a report of the settlement arrived at, in the course of the conciliation proceedings, to the 'appropriate government', together with a memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute. Rule 58 prescribes the requirement of the memorandum of settlement.

Sub-rule (1) prescribes that the memorandum of settlement shall be in form H, while sub-r (2) prescribes the mode and manner of signing the settlement and sub-r (3) repeats the requirement of s 12(3), that a conciliation officer should send a report of such a settlement to the Central Government. Section 18(3) makes such a settlement binding not only on all the parties to the dispute, but also upon the heirs, successors and assigns of the employer, in respect of the establishment and also, in certain cases, upon all the other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute, before the authority. It also makes such a settlement binding on all the present and future workmen employed in the establishment. Section 12(3) postulates that it should be a settlement between the parties to the dispute, which would include not merely one section, but all the workmen who are before the conciliation officer in connection with the conciliation proceedings, on an identical issue.[60] The report of the board of conciliation under s 13(2), in addition to the requirements of r 58, must also comply with the requirements of s 16. Such report shall have to be published in accordance with the provisions of s 17. The settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings, stands on a higher footing than a settlement arrived at de hors the conciliation proceedings. Therefore, in order to have a binding effect under s 18(3), on the other parties, who are not parties to the settlement, it would be necessary, firstly, that there should be a conciliation proceeding pending and, secondly, that the settlement should have been arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings.[61]

A settlement which does not comply with the requirements of the statute, viz, the section and the relevant rules framed by the appropriate government, will not be a valid settlement.[62] A settlement, after it becomes enforceable under the law, cannot be modified subsequently, by a tribunal, arbitrator or any authority, under the Act.[63] The words 'in the course of conciliation proceedings', though refer to the duration when the conciliation proceedings are pending, do not mean any agreement arrived at between the parties privately, during this period. In Bata Shoe Co, the Supreme Court pointed out that a settlement, 'in the course of conciliation proceedings', does not mean a settlement which is reached at between the parties during the period when a conciliation proceeding is pending before a conciliation officer, but is the one which is assisted and aided by the conciliation officer, by his advice and concurrence, on his being satisfied that the settlement is fair and reasonable, for it is the duty of the conciliation officer to promote a right settlement and to do everything he can do to induce the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute. It is only such a settlement as is arrived at while the conciliation proceedings are pending, that can be binding under s 18(3). The legislature, when it made such a settlement binding, not only on the parties thereto, but also to the present and future employers and workmen, intended that such settlement is arrived at with the assistance of the conciliation officer and is considered by him to be reasonable and, therefore, has his concurrence.[64] The intention of the legislature in making the settlement arrived at during the conciliation proceedings so binding on the parties was that the conciliation officer will not be a mere silent spectator or a mediator alone, but it would be obligatory on him to ensure the presence of the parties and that the interests and obligations of all the concerned parties are taken into account.[65]

However, the conciliation officer is not an adjudicating authority. Therefore, a conciliation officer is not required to decide the dispute on merits. Patently, his task is one of discussion, or advice and persuasion, so that the matters in dispute are clarified to the parties themselves; and thrashing out the various points out of the dispute, in their presence, so that they are enabled to come to a settlement which is fair and amicable. The hearing by the conciliation officer, if any, is for the purpose of ascertaining the points of the dispute between the parties and for the purpose of finding out the matters which affect the rights and merits of the parties.[66] If the conciliation officer is satisfied, after negotiations with the parties, that the terms of the settlement taken as a whole, are beneficial to the workmen, being fair and reasonable, it is not open to the reviewing court to examine whether there was an application of mind by him, to each and every term of the settlement. But the conduct and the action of the conciliation officer, in impressing the settlement with the stamp of a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings, is open to scrutiny by a reviewing court, though the relief granted by the reviewing court would be of a declaratory nature, which may, in appropriate cases, necessitate the granting of a consequential relief.[67]

Where the conciliation officer, after the receipt of a statement of claim, did not initiate any proceedings for conciliation, in that neither the investigation was made, nor any negotiations were held by her, nor did she make any attempt to induce the parties to reach a settlement and also did not apply her mind to the question, whether the settlement was fair or reasonable, it could justifiably be said that it was a settlement de hors the conciliation proceedings.[68]

The Madras High Court, in, Ramakrishna Industries, held that a settlement will not have the effect of the settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings, 'unless it is brought about with the assistance and concurrence of the conciliation officer and he has got a significant role to play in seeing to it that the terms arrived at are fair to both the parties'. Otherwise, it will not be a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings. But even such a settlement may not survive, if it violates the provisions of Ch VA or VB of the Act, particularly when it is unreasonably bristling with unjustness and unfair labour practices.[69] A settlement brought about with the mediation of any person other than the conciliation officer, during the pendency of conciliation proceedings, cannot be treated as a settlement 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings'. For instance, a settlement brought about with the intervention of a minister or a chief minister, will not be a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, for a minister is not a conciliation officer.[70] Nor would a mere statement in an agreement, to the effect that the minister had assured his good offices for the implementation of the demands and on his assurances, the union had called off the agitational programme, constitute a settlement of the dispute. However, the mere participation of a Minister, or Chief Minister in the conciliation proceedings, will not change the character of the conciliation proceedings, if the conciliation has been brought about with the aid and assistance of the conciliation officer. Merely because sometimes, a labour leader or a minister participated, to induce the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute, the proceedings would not cease to be conciliation proceedings. But if it can be shown that during the proceedings or in the meeting, the presence or participation of the minister made the presence of the conciliation officer of no consequence, or he abandoned his function of superintendence and control, then it can be said that there was no conciliation proceeding. Since the binding effect of such settlement under s 18(3), is far-reaching, it is incumbent on the conciliation officer to apply his mind to such a settlement, arrived at 'in the course of the conciliation' before him, to see whether the settlement is fair and reasonable and has not been procured by fraud, coercion or undue influence. On being satisfied as to this aspect of the settlement, he should record the settlement and send a report to the appropriate government. The question as to whether a settlement, in fact, was aided and assisted by the conciliation officer, having satisfied himself after applying his mind to it, is a question of fact and must be specifically pleaded and proved in challenging the settlement.[71]

An industrial dispute need not necessarily be a dispute between an employer and his workmen. It happens, though rarely, that the dispute may be between two sets of workmen in the same establishment. The parties to such a dispute must necessarily be the two factions of the workmen. In such a situation, no settlement can be arrived at between the employer and one faction of the workmen. A settlement arrived at between the employer and one faction of the workmen, even through the mediation of the conciliation officer, will be no settlement in the eye of the law.[72] A settlement arrived at, without the assistance and concurrence of the conciliation officer, will be quashable in judicial review. A writ petition praying for a declaration, that the settlement entered into between the employer and the union is not a settlement within the meaning of s 12(3) of the Act, and that it does not have the effect contemplated under s 18(3) of the Act, is maintainable.[73] The answer to the question, whether a settlement was arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings or not would depend upon what happened during the conciliation proceedings and the part played by the conciliation officer during those proceedings, to bring into being, a fair and amicable settlement for the resolution of the controversy in regard to which the conciliation proceedings were commenced.[74] A settlement which is arrived at without the mediation of an officer, or with one who is not a 'conciliation officer', will not be a 'settlement'. An officer whose appointment has not been made by a notification in the Office Gazette of the appropriate government, as required by s 4(1), will not be a 'conciliation officer', in the eye of law. Likewise, 'an implied agreement by acquiescence or conduct, such as the acceptance of a benefit under an agreement to which the worker acquiescing or accepting the benefit was not a party' will be outside the purview of the 'settlement' and shall not be binding on such a worker either under sub-s (1) or under sub-s (3) of s 18 of the Act.[75]

But in MICO, the workmen had sought a declaration from the High Court to the effect that the settlement in question, be declared to be invalid, as it was not a settlement in the eye of law, having been entered into 'in the course of conciliation proceedings'. Though the court held that the settlement was not a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings, it declined to grant the declaration sought for, as it found that the settlement was a settlement between the management and the majority of workmen and a good majority of the workmen had taken the benefit under the settlement and thereafter, resumed normal production and maintained industrial peace. The court observed that unless it was shown that the terms of the settlement were onerous and against the interests of the majority of the workmen, it would not be proper for the court to grant the declaration in exercise of its writ jurisdiction. The court also found that the capacity of the petitioners and members of the association of workmen itself, was in dispute before a civil court. It could, therefore, not be said that the interests of the workmen as a whole, were in jeopardy by the impugned settlement. The court was further influenced by the fact that there was a possibility of industrial unrest and eruption of violence between the two groups of workmen, in case the settlement was disturbed.[76]

In Hindustan Zinc, the facts were: after the failure of the conciliation proceedings, at the request of the management to explore the possibility of a settlement, the conciliation officer went to the office of the company. His efforts resulted in a settlement, which was recorded in the form of the 'minutes of discussion', which was signed by four representatives of the management and five representatives of the workmen. In the settlement it was agreed that the workmen will file an appeal against the order of dismissal and the management agreed to award punishment other than a dismissal, discharge or removal of the concerned workman, from service. Though the workmen implemented the terms of the settlement, the management disposed of the appeal of the workmen by reducing the punishment to one of discharge, from that of a dismissal, thus resiling from the settlement. The workmen, therefore, filed a writ petition in the High Court of Andhra Pradesh. In the meanwhile, the government referred the dispute relating to the discharge of the workmen, for industrial adjudication under s 10(1) of the Act. Thereupon, the said writ petition was dismissed as being infructuous. Before the industrial tribunal, the management took the objection that the reference was invalid in view of the settlement. Though the tribunal upheld the objection raised by the management, it observed that the order of discharge issued to the workman was illegal, being inconsistent with the settlement. It also suggested that it was open to the chairman-cum-managing director to apply his mind and award punishment other than a removal from service, as per the understanding. When the workman approached the management for implementing the award, the management took the stand that there was no award to be implemented, since the reference itself had been rejected. The workmen again filed a writ petition, seeking a reinstatement in service, with back wages and continuity of service. The High Court strongly deprecated the conduct of the management in dishonouring its commitments under the settlement, whether called as an 'understanding' or as the 'minutes of discussion', after having trapped the union into an agreement and after having taken full advantage of that agreement. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the court held that the agreement reached at, between the parties, was a settlement and the same was binding on the management.[77] If the question that is agitated can be resolved only by reference to complicated questions of fact, then the reviewing court may direct the aggrieved party to resort to alternative remedies that might be available.[78]

In State Bank Staff Union, a settlement arrived at between the employees of the State Bank of India and the State Bank, relating to the conditions of service of the employees, was not implemented. Nor were the copies of the settlement forwarded to the authorities, as required by r 58(4) of the Central Rules framed under the Act on the ground that an approval of the Central Government was required before the implementation of the terms of the settlement. The union issued a notice of strike and forwarded copies of the settlement to various authorities. Consequently, the conciliation officer initiated conciliation proceedings, during the pendency of which, the employees went on a strike. The bank issued a circular that it will deduct the salaries of the workmen for the strike period, on the principle of 'no-work-no-pay'. The circular was challenged in a writ petition by the union of the Madras High Court quashed the circular, holding that there was no breach of the requirements of s 22, because the conciliation did not relate to an industrial dispute, as it was not connected with the employment or non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour of a person, and the non-implementation of the requirements of r 58(4) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 would not be of any consequence, as the settlement in terms of s 20(2)(a) comes into existence when a memorandum of settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute.[79]

Settlement otherwise than in the Course of Conciliation Proceedings

The first part of the definition, viz, a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings, is the denotation of the word 'settlement'. But 'a written agreement between an employer and workmen, arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings' has been brought within the ambit of the definition, in an inclusive manner; This extended meaning is the connotation of the definition. By this connotation of the definition, it is further required that such an agreement of settlement should be signed by the parties thereto, in the prescribed manner and a copy thereof should be sent to the 'appropriate government' and the conciliation officer. Settlement of labour disputes by direct negotiation or settlement through collective bargaining, is always to be preferred for, as is obvious, it is the best guarantee of industrial peace, which is the aim of all legislation for the settlement of labour disputes.[80] In order to bring about such a settlement more easily and to make it more workable and effective, it is no longer necessary under the law, that the settlement should be confined to that arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, but now, it includes 'a written agreement between the employer and the workmen, arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, where such agreement has been signed by the parties thereto, in such manner as may be prescribed and a copy thereof, has been sent to the appropriate government and conciliation officer'.[81] Such a settlement, arrived at by agreement between the employer and the workmen, otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, is binding only on the parties to the agreement, under s 18(1) of the Act and it is not binding on the other workmen, who are not parties to the settlement.[82] Therefore, an agreement by acquiescence and without being in writing, signed by the parties, will not be a settlement as contemplated by the definition and will not have the binding effect.[83] Nor would the record of an agreement in writing, without complying with the requirements of the relevant rule, be called a 'settlement' as defined in the Act.[84] Rule 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, prescribes the memorandum of settlement. Under sub-r (1), the memorandum of settlement in case of a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings and a settlement otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, is the same, viz, in form H.[85] Sub-rule (2) prescribes that the settlement shall be signed by:

> (a) in case of an employer, by the employer himself, or by his authorised agent, or when the employer is an incorporated company or other body corporate, by the agent, manager, or other principal officer of that corporation;
>
> (b) in case of the workmen, by any officer of a trade union of the workmen or by five representatives of the workmen, duly authorised in this behalf, at a meeting of the workmen held for the purpose;
>
> (c) in the case of the workman in an industrial dispute under section 2A, by the workman concerned.

The Explanation to the rule defines an 'officer' of a trade union to mean any of the following office-bearers:

> (i) The President;
>
> (ii) The Vice-President;
>
> (iii) The Secretary (including the General Secretary);
>
> (iv) A Joint Secretary;
>
> (v) Any other officer of the trade union, authorised in this behalf, by the President and the Secretary of the union.

Thus, where the workmen are represented by a recognised union, the settlement may be arrived at between the employer and the union. But if the Constitution of the union provides that any of its office-bearers can enter into a 'settlement' with the employer, on behalf of the union and its members, a 'settlement' may be arrived at between the employer and such office-bearers. The office-bearers, who wish to enter into a settlement with the employer, should have the necessary authorisation by the executive committee of the union or by the workmen.[86] An agreement between an employer and the workmen, arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, would not constitute a 'settlement' unless the requirements prescribed by the relevant rules are complied with. In other words, such a settlement will be non-est in the eye of the law,[87] and parties can resile from such a settlement. By providing that such a 'settlement' should be in the proper form and signed by the parties and copies thereof, signed by both the employer and the workmen, should be forwarded to the concerned authorities for their information, the legislature has made in-built safeguards against its misuse. These requirements are not empty formalities and they are intended to protect the interests of the workmen. That purpose will be frustrated if these requirements are not strictly construed or duly complied with. In other words, the requirements contained in s 2(p) and r 58 are mandatory and non-compliance of them, shall vitiate the settlement.[88] In Delhi Cloth Mills, the Supreme Court said that the settlement has to be in compliance with the statutory provisions, as they are of a mandatory character.[89] In Brooke Bond, a controversy arose as to whether the office bearers of a trade union could sign an agreement, without their being specifically-authorised to do so, either in the Constitution of the union or in the resolution adopted by the union. The Apex Court held:

> ... unless the office bearers who signed the agreement, were authorised by the executive committee of the union, to enter into a settlement or the Constitution of the union contained a provision that one or more of its members would be competent to settle a dispute with the management, no agreement between any office bearers of the union and the management can be called a settlement, as defined in section 2(p). If the 'settlement' is to have a binding effect on all the workmen, the procedure prescribed by Rule 58 must be fully complied with. [90]

But in Hindustan Lever, a particular 'agreement' was not in the form and manner, as required by the relevant rule. And taking advantage of this agreement, the employer had successfully blocked the adjudication of several earlier references at the threshold, by setting up the ground that the said agreement was a 'settlement', which covered the dispute under reference. But in this case, the employer took the converse position, and claimed that the said agreement was not a 'concluded agreement', and therefore, not a settlement. In view of the fact that in the earlier references, the employer had taken an effective and wholesome advantage of the agreement, as a settlement, the court observed that no court of justice can ever permit such a thing to be done, and treated the agreement in question to be a settlement.[91] This holding was, thus, based on the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case. There is no reference in it to the language of s 2(p) and r 58. The case, therefore, as pointed out by Dr BP Saraf J, in Adil Patel (supra), cannot be treated as an authority for a general proposition, that the requirements of r 62 are not mandatory. In Adil's case, a letter written to the company by the union and signed by its general secretary, vice president and a special representative of the employees, was set up by the management as a 'settlement' between the management and the recognised union, as binding on all employees, even if some of them were not its members. On an illuminating review of the relevant case law, and the statutory provisions the learned judge held that since this letter was not in compliance with the statutory requirements of s 2(p) and r 62 of the Bombay Rules, it was not a settlement in the eye of the law.

Likewise, in IAAI, the minutes of a meeting, recorded and duly signed by two representatives of the management and two of the union, were sought to be relied on as a 'settlement'. The Delhi High Court held that since the statutory requirements were not complied with, the record of the minutes was not a 'settlement' in the eye of the law and as such, were not binding on any of the parties.[92] But in Johnson & Johnson, the Bombay High Court held that in view of the fact that the settlement was fair and accepted by all the workmen, a procedural violation in arriving at it would not render it illegal.[93] A settlement arrived at between the parties, without the mediation of a conciliation officer or the conciliation board, will, under s 18(1), bind only the parties to such settlement and not any other person. A settlement arrived at between an association of employees and the representatives of the labour, through negotiations which comply with the requirements of the definition, is binding on all the members of the association.[94] Likewise, a settlement arrived at between an employer and the union of the workmen, is equally binding not only on such union, but also on the workmen whom it represents.

In MICO, the Supreme Court rejected the contention that the settlement arrived at between the employer and the union of the workmen, was not binding on the workmen, because the union was a distinct legal entity from the workmen. The court observed that apart from the tenor of the settlement and the principle of collective bargaining, recognised by industrial law, the contention was contrary to the provisions of the Act itself, under which a settlement arrived at between the employer and a union representing the employees, during the conciliation proceedings, is binding not only on such union but also on the workmen whom it represents.[95] When a recognised union negotiates with an employer, the workers, as individuals, do not come into the picture. It is not necessary that each individual worker should know about the implications of the settlement, since a recognised union, which is expected to protect the legitimate interests of the labour, enters into a settlement in the best interests of labour. This would be the normal rule, though there may be exceptional cases where there may be allegations of mala fides, fraud or even corruption or other inducements, or where on the face of it, the settlement is highly unconscionable and grossly unjust.[96] From the language used in the definition of a 'settlement', it is clear that a settlement can be arrived at between the employer and the employees, at any time, even during the pendency of the adjudicatory proceedings. A settlement is no less a settlement if it is arrived at after an industrial dispute is referred to the tribunal and it does not and cannot cease to be a settlement.[97]

In Hindustan Lever Ltd, Savant J, of the Bombay High Court, held that a settlement, as understood by s 2(p), must necessarily be with the union, since the dispute before the court, was not concerning either a discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination of the service of a workman.[98] This decision calls for some analysis as there is nothing, either in s 2(p) or in s 18(1), to suggest that an individual workman is prohibited from entering into a settlement with the management. That there should necessarily be a trade union in every industrial establishment, for negotiations and settlement of issues, is equally unknown to industrial law and no enactment provides for a compulsory unionisation of industrial establishments. On the contrary, the law permits a group of workmen and even an individual workman, to enter into a settlement with the management, whether or not there is a union and whether or not he or they are members of any union. Section 18(1) clearly stipulates, in terms: 'A settlement arrived at by an agreement between the employer and workman, otherwise than in the course of...' The singular word 'workman', occurring in the above sub-section, clearly points to the fact that an individual workman is not, in any way prevented from entering into a settlement with the management. Sawant J relied, inter alia, on the decisions of the apex court, rendered in Ram Prasad Vishwakarma,[1] and Brooke Bond,[2] in support of his decision. But, regrettably, neither of the said decisions touch upon the question that is directly and substantially at issue in the present case, much less, lend any support to his line of reasoning.

In Ram Prasad Vishwakarma, the issue raised and answered was, 'in an industrial dispute of a collective nature, the individual workman could at no stage, be a party to the proceedings, which question has nothing to do with a situation where the union has not espoused the cause and is nowhere in the picture, as here'. In Brooke Bond, the issue was: what would be the effect if the office bearers signing the settlement, had no authorisation from the executive committee of the union? The apex court held that in the absence of an authorisation from the executive committee, an agreement between any office-bearer and the management, could not be called a settlement, as defined in s 2(p). It is difficult to understand how these decisions could be considered relevant to the issues raised in Hindustan Lever, where the fact was that an individual workmen had signed the settlements. Where the individual workman himself, signs a settlement touching upon his own conditions of service, the law does not require him to furnish any authorisation, which is indispensable if he is represented by a union. In the face of the unambiguous language used in s 18(1), to hold that a 'settlement' means 'a settlement arrived at, with the union' is a gross misreading of the provisions of the Act, and amounts to rewriting the enactment. Both the finding recorded by the tribunal and the conclusion reached by Savant J, are perverse and contrary to the spirit of law. In striking contrast, another single judge of the same High Court, Kochar J, in another case involving the very same company, ie, Hindustan Lever, ruled that, where all but one field-force employees arrived at individual settlements on identical lines, with the management, during the pendency of the dispute raised by the union on their behalf, it was unreasonable on the part of the tribunal to proceed further with the reference, and it should make an award in terms of the settlement between the parties.[3] The learned judge rightly followed the ratio of*DN Ganguly*.[4] Between the two decisions, the view taken by Kochar J is right and that of Savant J is repugnant to the provisions of the IDA, and is clearly wrong. Sub-rule (4) of r 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 requires that the copies of the memorandum of settlement, arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, should be sent 'jointly' by the parties, to the Central Government, the Chief Labour Commissioner (Central), and the Regional Labour Commissioner and the Asst Labour Commissioner concerned. Any settlement which does not comply with these requirements, will be no 'settlement' within the meaning of this provision.[5]A Division Bench of the Orissa High Court, on the construction of r 64(5), requiring that the copy of the settlement shall be 'jointly' sent, took the view that it is a requirement in excess of the provision of s 2(p) of the Act, and therefore, cannot be held to be mandatory.[6] This is the correct view of the law.

Note: For the mode and manner of arriving at a settlement in conciliation proceedings, see notes and comments under s 12(3), infra and for the binding effect of such a settlement, see notes and comments under s 18(3). (Infra)

Clause (q): STRIKE

The definition of a 'strike' in this clause, is the same as it was in s 2(1) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. It has since not undergone any amendment. Chapter V deals with strikes and lockouts. Sections 10(3), 10A(4A), 22 or 23 prohibit the continuance and commencement of strikes in certain circumstances and s 24 renders the strikes commenced or continued in contravention of these prohibitions, illegal; s 25 prohibits financial aid to illegal strikes and lockouts and s 26 provides for a penalty for illegal strikes and lockouts, s 27 prescribes the penalty for instigation of strikes and lockouts and s 28 prescribes the penalty for giving financial aid to illegal strikes and lockouts.

Judicial Definitions

In England, various judicial definitions have been attempted by courts,[7] the most accepted and precise of which is as expounded by Hannen J, in Farrer v Close. [8] He defined 'strikes' as a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of the workmen. In the United States of America, a fairly comprehensive definition has been given in Uden v Schaeffer ,[9] in the following words:

> A strike is the act of quitting work by a body of workmen, for the purpose of coercing their employer to accede to some demands they have made upon him, and which he has refused; but it is not a strike for workmen to quit work, either singly or in a body, when they quitted without intention to return to work, whatever may be the reason that moves them so to do.[10]

Ordinary meaning of Strike

A concerted refusal to work on the part of men, who are accustomed to work in a particular vocational area; more shortly, 'ceasing work or downing tools'[11] seems to be the ordinary meaning of the term 'strike'. The dictionary definitions are not wholly in accord with one another. For instance, the Oxford dictionary defines the noun 'strike' as a 'concerted cessation of work on the part of a body of workers, for the purpose of obtaining some concession from the employer or employers', though in defining the verb 'strike', it omits any reference to the purpose; the Webster's dictionary defines the noun 'strike' as 'the act of quitting work, done by a mutual understanding by a body of workmen, as a means of enforcing compliance with demands made on their employer; a stopping of work by workmen, in order to obtain or resist a change in conditions of employment'. The Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences defines a 'strike' as a 'concerted suspension of work by a body of employees; usually for the purpose of adjusting an existing dispute over the terms of the labour contract'.[12]The Encyclopaedia Britannica defines a strike in the labour sense, as 'a stoppage of work by a common agreement on the part of work-people, for the purpose of obtaining or resisting a change in the conditions of employment'.[13]In England, 'strike' was defined in the repealed Trade Disputes and Trade Union Act 1927, as a 'cessation of work by a body of persons employed in any trade'. According to Ludwig Teller, the word 'strike', in its broad significance, has reference to a dispute between an employer and his workers, in the course of which, there is a concerted suspension of employment. He describes four characteristics of a 'strike', as the term is employed in modern times, which are:

(i) an established relationship between the strikers and the person or persons against whom the strike is called;

(ii) the constituting of that relationship as one of employer and employee;

(iii) the existence of a dispute between the parties and the utilisation by the labour, of the weapon of concerted refusal to continue to work, as the method of persuading or coercing compliance with the workmen's demand; and

(iv) the contention advanced by workers that, although work ceases, the employment relation is deemed to continue, albeit in a state of a belligerent suspension.[14]

In Austrialia, some of the state Parliaments have passed legislations which define the word 'strike'. All such statutory definitions are of the extensive type and save in Queensland, do not exclude the ordinary meaning of the word 'strike'. All these definitions have in common, the notion of quitting, cessation or discontinuance of work in combination, and further, the idea that such a cessation must be for the purpose of wresting concessions from an employer, while in some quarters, there is the insistence that the demands must relate to the conditions of employment, a requirement which would probably exclude many strikes for organisational purposes. But it is clearly agreed on all sides, that the cessation of work must be used as a weapon for the furtherance of some demand.[15]

Ingredients of Strike

The definition of a strike in s 2(q), is exhaustive. The essential ingredients of the definition may be treated under the following heads:

(a) Industry

'Any Industry'—The words 'employed in any industry' postulate that there should be an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j), in which the concerned workmen are employed. In other words, unless the establishment in which the striking persons are employed is an 'industry', even if the other ingredients of the definition are satisfied, it would not be an industrial strike within the meaning of s 2(q).

(b) Cessation of Work or Refusal to Work

(i) 'Cessation of Work Acting in Combination'

The expressions 'acting in combination', 'concerted refusal' or 'refusal under a common understanding', though appear to be distinct, the line of demarcation between them is not quite clear and occasionally, they overlap and may be compendiously described as 'concerted activities'. Likewise, the expressions 'cessation of work', 'refusal to continue to work' or 'to accept employment', though not synonyms, too overlap. The notion of quitting, cessation or discontinuance of work in combination, is an essential requirement of the definition of a strike. Thus, a mere cessation of work will not come within the purview of the definition of a 'strike', unless it can further be shown that such cessation of work was a concerted action, for the purpose of enforcing an industrial demand.[16] A combination means an agreement or a concert. In order to establish such concert, there need be no formal meetings, discussions, or even an interchange or a mutual consent or assent, to a common purpose or a course of conduct. It may be deduced from similar acts and course of conduct. But once it is proved that the cessation of work or refusal to work was the result of a concerted action, on the part of the workers or of the workers acting in combination, under a common understanding, such a stoppage, even for a short period, say for two to four hours, must fall within the definition of a 'strike'. In other words, the fact that the duration of a strike was for a few minutes or even for a few hours, is irrelevant.[17] There is nothing in the scheme of the Act or the provisions thereof, to show that in order to constitute a 'strike', the cessation or stoppage of work must be by virtue of an industrial dispute.[18] Likewise, the purpose behind the cessation of work too, would be irrelevant in determining whether the cessation or stoppage of work would constitute a strike or not.[19] It is implicit in the definition of a strike that the 'cessation of work' or 'concerted refusal to work' must be in defiance of the employer's authority.[20] A cessation of work, even while working on paid overtime, would amount to a 'strike'.[21] But a mere presence of certain workmen in the striking crowd, in the absence of any satisfactory proof of their having 'ceased' to work or 'refused' to work, would not amount to a 'strike'.[22] Similarly, if a workman joins certain demonstrations organised in connection with the 'strike', or if he takes part in the preparation of a strike, his conduct cannot amount to taking part in the 'strike', as such.[23] In cases where workmen go on a 'hunger strike', by refraining from taking food in the off-duty period, it would not be a 'strike' within the meaning of s 2(q). But if the 'hunger strike' is not simply refraining from taking food, but is also accompanied by a cessation of work by a body of persons employed in any industry, it would clearly come within the definition of a strike.[24]

(ii) 'Concerted Refusal or Refusal Under Common Understanding...to Continue to Work or Accept Employment

A concerted refusal under a common understanding of any number of employees, to continue to work or accept employment, would constitute a strike. In Mahanga Ram, the Allahabad High Court held that where the workmen did not, in fact, commence the work for some time after lifting their tokens and punching their cards, they were not guilty of taking part in a strike. The court took the view that the concerned workmen had combined not with an intent to cease work, but with a view to staging a demonstration and thus, delayed the start of work by about 15 or 30 minutes and it could not be considered that their action amounted to a 'strike', as they had technically commenced their duties by lifting their tokens and punching their cards; hence, there was really no cessation of work.[25] But admittedly there was a concerted action on the part of the workmen, in refusing to commence work after lifting their tokens and punching their cards, with a common understanding of staging a demonstration. The words 'refusal to continue to work', in the definition, clearly indicate that work can be struck even after its commencement. An interruption of work, a concerted refusal or refusal under a common understanding to work, or to accept employment, even for a short time, say half an hour or less, would constitute a strike, within the meaning of s. 2(q) of the Act.[26] The decision of the labour appellate tribunal, in Standard Vacuum (supra), that the en bloc absence of the workmen, in the special circumstances of the case, was not a strike, is also not consistent with the wording of the definition. But when the workmen refuse to do additional work, which the employer has no right, in law, to ask them to do, it would not amount to a strike, even if such refusal is concerted or under a common understanding.[27]

Illustrations of actions which amount to Strike

The cessation of work by workmen acting in combination and a refusal to work on the calendar machine of the mills.[28] Staying away from work under a common understanding, as a protest to the introduction of a card system for marking attendance for the workmen.[29] A concerted refusal by coal loaders and trammers, continuously, for four days, on account of quarrels between rival labour unions.[30] A pen-down strike by the workmen of a bank.[31] Stoppage of work by workmen for two to four hours and their refusal to resume work, as a result of the refusal of the employer, to declare the forenoon of a particular day as a holiday due to a solar eclipse.[32] Stoppage of work by the workmen with a view to enforcing their demand of the removal of the weaving master and his favourite workmen in a textile mill.[33] Refusal to work by workmen on a listed holiday, for which the management had offered a compensatory holiday in accordance with a prior agreement between the management and the union.[34] Refusal of workers to resume work on account of the sudden death of a worker, acting in concert.[35] But where two workmen were absent from duty on a particular day and there was no evidence to show that the absence was due to concert between the two workmen and other persons, or that there was a common understanding between them and other persons, or that they would not continue to work or there would be a refusal to work; it was held that the absence did not constitute a strike.[36]

(c) Relationship of Employment

'Persons employed'—The definition of a 'strike' in s 2(q), uses the expression 'persons employed', which means that there should be a relationship or contract of employment between the striking employees and the industry. This also has reference to the contract of employment mentioned in s 22 and s 23. In the contract of employment of every workman, there is an implied term that he will work according to the rules of the concern in question.[37]Unless there is a contract of employment between the striking persons and the industry, there can be no strike within the meaning of s 2(q) of the Act.

Types of Strikes

Strikes may be broadly considered under the following heads:

(i) Primary Strike

A strike in its primary use, is a weapon which is used directly against the employer with whom an industrial dispute exists. This type of strike takes various forms, such as 'sit-down' or 'stay-in', 'strike', 'tool-down' or 'pen-down' strike, 'go-slow', 'boycott', 'picketing' or 'black-ban', etc. 'Stay-in', 'sit-down', 'tool-down' or 'pen-down' strikes are some of the names given to strikes in various circumstances. In such strikes, workmen peacefully enter the premises of the establishment or the office, without indicating their intention to go on strike. But having thus entered the premises, they generally stay at their places of work or sit down there. When clerical workers refuse to do their work, such refusal is generally known as a 'pen-down' strike.[38] Likewise, when factory workers refuse to work with their tools, such action is known as a 'tool-down' strike.[39] On account of the workmen staying inside the premises of the establishment, such strikes are also known as 'sit-down' or 'stay-in' strikes. A 'sit-down' strike is defined as occurring whenever a group of employees or others, interested in obtaining a certain objective in a particular business, forcibly take over the possession of the property of such business, establish themselves within the plant, stop its production and refuse access to the owners or to others desiring to work. The 'sit-down' or 'stay-in' strike can be more accurately defined as a strike in the 'traditional sense', to which is added the element of trespass of the strikers upon the property of the employer.[40] In other words, every 'sit-down' or 'stay-in' strike involves a tort of trespass. Such a strike, therefore, constitutes a civil conspiracy, for the employees have a right to enter and remain on the employer's premises only for the purpose of their work (as invitees at common law), or for other purposes, as the employer may allow, for example, recreation. In such cases, they are usually licensees at common law.

(ii) Secondary Strike

A 'secondary strike' has been defined by Ludwig Teller as a 'coercive measure adopted by workers, against an employer, connected by product or employment, with alleged unfair labour conditions or practices.[41]. In such a strike, the pressure is applied not against the primary employer, with whom the industrial dispute exists, but against a person who has some sort of trade relations with him. The employees of the secondary employer threaten to strike, until the secondary employer refuses to deal with the primary employer. Frequently, the threat of a strike is enough, as the secondary employer himself has no direct dispute with the union and will naturally wish to preserve the industrial peace of his concern.

(iii) Sympathetic Strike

A 'sympathetic strike' is one called for the purpose of indirectly aiding others, the striking employees having no demand or grievances of their own and the strike having no direct relation to the advancement of the interest of the strikers.[42] Such a strike is an unjustifiable invasion of the rights of the employers and is, therefore, unlawful. In USA, a union calling a sympathetic strike is liable in damages, for the injuries thereby inflicted and the strike may be enjoined. It would appear that the extreme view of some authorities on the right to strike, is not dependent upon the motive; a sympathetic strike is not to be condemned as unlawful.[43]

(iv) Go-Slow

'Go-slow' is not like an ordinary strike, which has been recognised as a lawful weapon under certain circumstances and is controlled by the provisions of law. 'Go-slow' has, on the other hand, been made a misconduct under the Model Standing Orders appended to the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946. Workers are under an obligation to their employers, to procure average production, and if they deliberately refuse to give that average, they must be held to be guilty of the misconduct of 'go-slow'.[44]The fact that the workmen are piece-raters does not make a 'go-slow' policy any the less unlawful. A behest by some workmen, to others, to adopt a 'go-slow' policy, would be an act of serious misconduct.[45] The law relating to various aspects of 'go-slow', has been elaborately stated by the Supreme Court in the following two cases. In Bharat Sugar Mills, certain workmen indulged in a 'go-slow'. The employer company, on the basis of a domestic inquiry, decided to dismiss 21 workmen. But the tribunal held that the domestic inquiry was not proper and the employer was guilty of a mala fide conduct and victimisation, and except in the case of one workman, the others were not guilty of a deliberate 'go-slow'. In appeal against the order of the tribunal, the Supreme Court held that the evidence produced before the tribunal clearly established that 13 out of 20 workmen were 'guilty of a deliberate 'go-slow', whose dismissal was justified. Speaking for the Supreme Court, Das Gupta J, stated the law in the following words:

> 'Go-slow', which is a picturesque description of a deliberate delaying of production, by workmen pretending to be engaged in the factory, is one of the most pernicious practices that discontented or disgruntled workmen sometimes resort to. It would not be far wrong to call this dishonest. For, while thus delaying production and thereby reducing the output, the workmen claim to have remained employed and thus to be entitled to full wages. Apart from this also, 'go-slow' is likely to be much more harmful than a total cessation of work by strike. For, while during a strike, much of the machinery can be fully turned off, during the 'go-slow', the machinery is kept going on a reduced speed, which is often extremely damaging to the machinery parts. For all these reasons, 'go-slow' has always been considered a serious type of misconduct. [46]

Then, in SU Motors, the company did not pay the workers, the wages for the entire month of July 1984, because the workers had indulged in a 'go-slow', and consequently, the production for the month had been negligible. As a consequence, the company was compelled declare a lockout with effect from 14 August 1984. On a complaint lodged by the union under the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU & PULP Act 1971), the industrial court held that the company had committed an 'unfair labour practice' by not paying the full monthly wages to the workmen for the month of July and directed the company to pay the same. In appeal against the said order, the Supreme Court, on the admitted facts, accepted the finding recorded by the industrial court that there had been a 'go-slow' resorted to by the workmen and the production had suffered during the period in question. It also accepted the right of the employer to deduct the wages, as admittedly, the workmen had resorted to a 'go-slow'. However, while allowing the appeal, the court directed that the company shall not deduct more than 5 per cent of the wages of the workmen, for the month of July 1984. In this case, the court recognised the right of the employer to treat a 'go-slow' as an act of misconduct, liable to a penal disciplinary action, as also the liablility of the delinquent persons, to face the consequences, including a deduction of wages and dismissal from service. Sawant J held:

> There cannot be two opinions that go-slow is a serious misconduct, being a covert and a more damaging breach of the contract of employment. It is an insidious method of undermining discipline and at the same time, a crude device to defy the norms of work. It has been roundly condemned as an industrial action and has not been recognised as a legitimate weapon of the workmen to redress their grievances. In fact, the Model Standing Orders, as well as the certified Standing Orders of most of the industrial establishments, define it as a misconduct and provide for a disciplinary action for it. Hence, once it is proved, those guilty of it have to face the consequences, which may include a deduction of wages and even a dismissal from service.[47] (Paras 36 & 37).

But, by its very nature, the proof of go-slow, particularly when it is disputed, involves an investigation into its various aspects, such as the nature of the process of production, the stages of production and their relative importance, the role of the workers engaged at each stage of production, the pre-production activities and the facilities for production and the activities of the workmen connected therewith and their effect on production, the factors bearing on the average production, etc. The go-slow further may be indulged in by an individual workman or only some workmen, either in one section or different sections, or in one shift or both shifts, affecting the output in varying degrees and to different extents, depending upon the nature of the product and the productive process. Even where it is admitted, a go-slow may, in some case, present difficulties in determining the actual or approximate loss, for it may have repercussions on the production after the go-slow ceases, which may be difficult to estimate. The deduction of wages for a go-slow may, therefore, present difficulties which may not be easily resoluble. When, therefore, wages are sought to be deducted for a breach of contract, on account of a go-slow, the quantum of deduction may become a bone of contention in most of the cases, inevitably leading to an industrial dispute to be adjudicated by an independent machinery, statutory or otherwise, as the parties may resort to. It is necessary to emphasise this because unlike in the case of a strike, where a simple measure of a pro-rata deduction from the wages may provide a just and fair remedy, the extent of the deduction of wages on account of a go-slow action may, in some case, raise a complex question. The simplistic method of deducting a uniform percentage of wages from the wages of all workmen, calculated on the basis of the percentage fall in production compared to the normal or average production, may not always be equitable. It is, therefore, necessary that in all cases where the factum of a go-slow and/or the extent of the loss of production on account of it, is disputed, there should be a proper inquiry on the charges which furnish particulars of the go-slow and the loss of production on that account. The rules of natural justice require it, and whether they have been followed or not, will depend on the facts of each case.

---

92 Shri Ram Institute For Industrial Research v PO, LC (1978) 37 FLR 1 (DB), per Deshpande J.

93 Kamleshkumar R Mehta v PO, CGIT (1980) 1 LLJ 336 (Bom) (DB) 1979 (39) FLR 329 per Lentin J.

94 S Palani v Indian Bank (1980) 1 LLJ 187 [LNIND 1979 MAD 297] (Mad), per Varadarajan J.

95 Raghavachari v Madras P & L Assn (1980) 1 LLJ 273 [LNIND 1979 MAD 113] (Mad) (DB), per Ramaprasada Rao CJ.

96 Santosh Gupta v State Bank of Patiala (1980) 2 LLJ 72 [LNIND 1980 SC 214] (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 1219 [LNIND 1980 SC 214]: 1980 Lab IC 687 per Chinnappa Reddy J.

1 Surendra Kumar Verma v CGIT (1981) 1 LLJ 386 [LNIND 1980 SC 403], 388 (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 422 [LNIND 1980 SC 403]: 1980 Lab IC 1292 per Chinnappa Reddy J.

2 Mohan Lal v Mgmt of Bharat Electronics Ltd 1981 Lab IC 806 [LNIND 1981 SC 244] (SC), per Desai J.

3 L Robert D' Souza v Executive Engineer, Southern Rly (1982) 1 LLJ 330 [LNIND 1982 SC 47], 333-34 (SC) : AIR 1982 SC 854 [LNIND 1982 SC 47]: 1982 KLJ 164 per Desai J.

4 Gammon India Ltd v Niranjan Dass 1983 Lab IC 1865 [LNIND 1983 SC 361], 1867 (SC), per Desai J.

5 Mgmt of KSRTC v M Boraiah (1984) 1 LLJ 110 [LNIND 1983 SC 326], 115 (SC) : AIR 1983 SC 1320 [LNIND 1983 SC 438]: 1984 (48) FLR 89 per Ranganath Misra J.

6 Mattulal v Radhe Lal AIR 1974 SC 1596 [LNIND 1974 SC 161], 1602 : (1975) 1 SCR 127 [LNIND 1974 SC 161] per Bhagawati J.

7 Punjab LDRC v PO, LC (1990) 2 LLJ 70 [LNIND 1990 SC 310], 90 (SC) : 1991 (61) FLR 73 : (1990) 3 SCC 682 [LNIND 1990 SC 310] per Saikia J.

8 [1944] KB 718.

9 [1972] AC 1136.

10 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

11 Kamleshkumar R Mehta v PO, CGIT (1980) 1 LLJ 336 (Bom) (DB) 1979 Mh LJ 874 per Lentin J.

12 Surendra Kumar Verma v CGIT-cum-LC (1981) 1 LLJ 386 [LNIND 1980 SC 403], 388 (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 422 [LNIND 1980 SC 403]: (1980) 4 SCC per Pathak J.

13 Cyrile Grunfeld, The Law of Redundancy, 1980, 2nd ed, p 172.

14 Ins by Amending Act 49 of 1984, brought into force wef 18 August 1984.

15 English Electric Co of India Ltd v IT (1987) 1 LLJ 141, 155, 158 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1958 SC 130 [LNIND 1957 SC 105] per Chandurkar CJ.

16 Indian Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], 268 (SC), per SK Das J.

17 1977 Lab IC 1695 [LNIND 1977 SC 280] (SC), per Goswami J.

18 (1982) 1 LLJ 330 [LNIND 1982 SC 47], 333-34 (SC), per Desai J.

19 Madhabananda Jena v Orissa SEB (1990) 1 LLJ 463 [LNIND 1989 ORI 27] (Ori) (DB), per DP Mohapatra J.

20 HD Singh v Reserve Bank of India 1985 Lab IC 1733, 1735 (SC), per Khalid J.

21 Syed Bin Ali v Supdtg Engineer, APSEB 1986 Lab IC 848 (AP), per Jeevan Reedy J.

22 Naresh Chandra Das v Seventh IT 1982 Lab IC 579 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

23 Dabur Pvt Ltd v State of West Bengal 1978 Lab IC 1581 (Cal) (DB), per Anil K Sen J.

24 Factory Manager, CIMM Co Ltd v Naresh C Saxena 1985 Lab IC 941, 945 (MP) (DB), per CP Sen J.

25 Gour Hari Patra v PO, ITL 1976 Lab IC 999, 1003 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

26 Binny Ltd v PO, LC (1976) 1 LLJ 237, 243 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

27 Bada Sahab Devgonda Patil v MD, SPSS Kharkhana Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 413 [LNIND 1987 BOM 491] (Bom) (DB) : 1988 (90) Bom LR 131 : 1988 Mh LJ 370.

28 English Electric Co of India Ltd v IT (1987) 1 LLJ 141, 154 (Mad) (DB), per Chandurkar CJ.

29 Ramachandra Vithuji Kothare v IC (1986) 1 LLJ 363, 367 (Bom) : 1985 Mh LJ 709 per Dhabe J.

30 Chandulal v Mgmt of PAW Airways (1985) 2 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1985 SC 138]-82 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 1128 [LNIND 1985 SC 138]: 1985 Lab IC 1225 per Ranganath Misra J.

31 Maharashtra STTC Ltd v Vasudev V Joshi 1990 Lab IC 1004, 1009 (Bom), per Sujata Manohar J.

32 Punjab Land Development and Reclamation Corpn Ltd v LC (1990) 2 LLJ 70 [LNIND 1990 SC 310] (SC), (1990) 3 SCC 682 [LNIND 1990 SC 310] per Saika J.

33 Ibid, 88, 89.

34 Anakapalle CA & IS Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 621 [LNIND 1962 SC 345] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1489 [LNIND 1962 SC 345]: (1962) II LLJ 621SC per Gajendragadkar, J.

35 HM Seervai, Constitutional Law of India, 1996, Vol 3, 3rd ed, p 1983.

36 Kamaleshkumar Mehta v CGIT (1980) 1 LLJ 336 (Bom) : [1980] I LLJ 336 Bom : 1979 Mh LJ 874 per Lentin J.

37 Buckingham and Carnatic Co Ltd v Venkatayya (1963) 2 LLJ 638 [LNIND 1963 SC 177] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 1272 [LNIND 1963 SC 177] per Gajendragadkar J.

38 Mgmt of Guest Keen Williams v PO, Labour Court (1992) 1 LLJ 846, 866 (Kant), per Mohan CJ.

39 MD, PSS Karkhana v Babasaheb Devgonda Patil 1988 Lab IC 288 [LNIND 1987 BOM 213] (Bom), per Puranik J.

40 National Engineering Industries Ltd v Hanuman (1967) 2 LLJ 883 [LNIND 1967 SC 213] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 33 [LNIND 1967 SC 212].

41 Balasaheb D Patil v MD, PSS Karkhana (1988) 2 LLJ 413 [LNIND 1987 BOM 491] (Bom) (DB) : 1988 (90) Bom LR 131 : 1988 Mh LJ 370.

42 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 714-5.

43 Shri Bhagawan v Ram Chand AIR 1965 SC 1767 [LNIND 1965 SC 64]-68: [1965] 3 SCR 218 [LNIND 1965 SC 64].

44 L Robert D'Souza v Exec Enggr, Southern Railway (1982) 1 LLJ 30 (SC), per Desai J.

45 CA No 1898 of 1982, p 73, para 5.

46 Ibid, p 95, para 83.

47 CA No 8456 of 1983.

48 EM Rao, op cit, pp 766-7.

49 State of Haryana v Om Prakash (1998) 8 SCC 733.

50 Om Prakash v PO, IT-cum-LC (1999) 1 LLN 579 (P&H) (DB) : (1998) 2 LLJ 542 P&H, per Gupta J.

51 State Bank of India v N Sundaramony (1976) 1 LLJ 478 [LNIND 1976 SC 13] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 1111 [LNIND 1976 SC 13] per Krishna Iyer J.

52 Punjab Land Development and Reclamation Corpn Ltd v LC (1990) 2 LLJ 70 [LNIND 1990 SC 310] (SC) : (1990) 3 SCC 682 [LNIND 1990 SC 310] per Saika J.

53 Mgmt of Karnataka SRTC v M Boraiah (1984) 2 LLJ 110 (SC), per Misra J.

54 Indian Airlines v Sebastian (1994) 2 LLJ (Suppl) 498(Ker).

55 Gammon India Ltd v Niranjan Das (1984) 1 LLJ 233 [LNIND 1983 SC 361] (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 500 [LNIND 1983 SC 361] per Desai J.

56 Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v Pipraich Sugar Mills Mazdoor Union (1957) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1956 SC 84] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 95 per SK Das J.

57 State Transport Controller v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 376 (Ori) (DB).

58 Lachman Das v Indian Express Newspapers (B) Pvt Ltd 1977 Lab IC 823 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

59 State Bank of India v Workmen of State Bank of India (1990) 2 LLJ 586 [LNIND 1990 SC 458], 594 (SC) : AIR 1990 SC 2034 [LNIND 1990 SC 458] per Sawant J.

60 Employers, Anand Cinema v Mohan Tiwari 1993 Lab IC 651, 661 (MP) (DB), per Dharmadhikari J.

61 Jagdish Chandra Vyas v Rajasthan SRTC (1995) 2 LLJ 204 -05 (Raj) : 1995 (71) FLR 556 per Kokje J.

62 Mgmt of Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Prahlad Singh : AIR 2001 SC 69 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424]: (2001) 1 SCC 424 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424] : (2000) 2 LLJ 1653 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424] per Patil J.

63 Scooters India Ltd v M Mohammad Yaqub (2001) 1 LLN 67 (SC), per Variava J.

64 Muththambaranam v PO, Le (2001) 4 LLN 894 (Mad), per Dinakaran J.

65 PS Desikachari v 'Mail' (1961) 2 LLJ 771, 777 (Mad) (DE), per S Ramachandra Ayyar Offg CJ.

66 Bengal Nagpur Cotton Mills Ltd v J Bastion (1960) 1 LLJ 501 [LNIND 1960 SC 58], 503 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1110 [LNIND 1960 SC 58] per Gajendragadkar J.

67 National Engineering Industries Ltd v Hanuman (1967) 2 LLJ 883 [LNIND 1967 SC 213], 887 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 33 [LNIND 1967 SC 212] per Wanchoo J.

68 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v State of UP 1990 Lab IC 1511, 1517 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

69 Rishi Pal Singh v Labour Court, (2003) 4 LLJ 35 (UP), per Rakesh Tiwari J.

70 Hindustan Level Ltd v Employees Union (1999) 1 LLN 930, 945 (Bom), per Savant J.

71 New Haven Steel Ball Corporation (P) Ltd v RK Yadav (1999) 1 LLN 953, 956 (Bom), per Shah J.

72 Narendra S Solanki v R&F Production (2000) 3 LLN 446 (Raj), per Palshikar, J.

73 Roxy Industrial Corpn v State of Punjab (2001) 3 LLN (P&H), per Sudhalkar J.

74 Balak Ram v PO, Labour Court (2002) 2 LLN 246 (P&H) (DB), per Gill J.

75 Gyanendra Sahay v Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd AIR 2006 SC 2795 [LNIND 2006 SC 509]: (2006) 5 SCC 759 [LNIND 2006 SC 509] per Lakshmanan J.

76 Fibre Foam Pvt Ltd v K Kannan Nair 1979 Lab IC 252 (Ker), per Namboodiripad J.

77 Binoy Kumar Chatterjee v Jugantar Ltd (1983) 2 LLJ 8 [LNIND 1983 SC 103] (SC) : AIR 1983 SC 865 [LNIND 1983 SC 103] per Pathak J.

78 Brought into force wef 18 August 1984.

79 Mukhtyar Singh v Food Corpn of India (1994) 2 LLJ 488 [LNIND 1992 MP 7], 495-96 (MP) (DB) (1994) 11 LLJ 488 MP.

80 Ram Prasad v State of Rajasthan 1992 Lab IC 2139, 2148 (Raj) (DB), per Chopra J.

81 Terminated FTTLICEW Assn v LIC of India (1993) 1 LLJ 1040, 1062 (Mad) (DB), per Srinivasan J.

82 Arun Kumar v Union of India 1986 Lab IC 251 -52 (Pat), per Lalit Mohan Sharma J.

83 Pratap Kumar Patnaik v MD, OSRTC 1991 Lab IC 954, 956 (Ori) (DB), per Gopalaswamy J.

84 CM Venugopal v LIC of India (1994) 1 LLJ 597 [LNIND 1994 SC 135] (SC) : AIR 1994 SC 1343 [LNIND 1994 SC 135] per NP Singh J.

85 Morinda Co-op Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Kishan 1996 Lab IC 221 (SC), per Ramaswamy J.

86 CMD, Orissa RTC Ltd v Ramesh Chandra Gouda (1994) 2 LLJ 1127 [LNIND 1995 SC 106]-29 (Ori) (DB): 78 (1994) CLT 639 per Rath J.

87 Shankariah v KSRTC (1986) 1 LLJ 195 -96 (Kant) : 1985 (2) Kav LJ 94 per Rama Jois J.

88 SGovindaraju v KSRTC (1986) 2 LLJ 351 [LNIND 1986 SC 125] (SC) : AIR 1986 SC 1680 [LNIND 1986 SC 125] per KN Singh J.

89 Nath Shukla v Allahabad University 1987 Lab IC 1607 (All) (DB), per Sahai J.

90 Dilip H Shrike v Zilla Parishad 1990 Lab IC 100, 103 (Bom), per Patel J.

91 Balbir Singh v Kurukshetra CC Bank Ltd (1990) 1 LLJ 443 [LNIND 1989 PNH 65], 445 (P&H); per A Chaudhary J.

92 JJ Shrimali v DDO Mehsana 1989 Lab IC 689, 697 (Guj) (DB), per Ahmadi J.

93 Chakradhar Tripathy v State of Orissa 1992 Lab IC 1813 (Ori) (DB), per Padhi J.

94 Madhya Pradesh BK Sangh v Syndicate Bank 1996 Lab IC 1161 [LNIND 1995 MP 195], 1165-66 (MP), per Doabia J.

95 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v RV Krishnarao 1989 Lab IC 1914, 1918 (Guj) (DB), per Majmudar J.

96 State Bank of India v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 205 [LNIND 1959 SC 113], 220 (Be), per SK Das J.

1 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v RV Krishnarao 1989 Lab IC 1914, 1918 (Guj) (DB), per Majumdar J.

2 Krishi Utpadan Mandi Samiti v IT (II), UP 1997 Lab IC 3112, 3115 (All), per Trivedi J.

3 West Bengal SEB v DB Ghosh (1985) 1 LLJ 315, 373 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

4 Central Inland Water Tpt Corpn Ltd v BN Ganguli (1986) 2 LLJ 171 [LNIND 1986 SC 112] (SC) : AIR SC 1571 per Madan J.

5 OP Bhandari v ITDC Ltd (1986) 2 LLJ 509 [LNIND 1986 SC 353], 511-12 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 1111 per Thakkar J.

6 Ibid, 512.

7 Delhi Transport Corpn v DTC Mazdoor Congress (1991) 1 LLJ 395 [LNIND 1990 SC 489] (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 101 [LNIND 1990 SC 824]: 1991 Lab IC 91 per Ray J.

8 Director, IMD v Pushpa Srivastava (1993) 1 LLJ 190 [LNIND 1992 SC 474] (193-94) (SC) : AIR 1992 SC 2070 [LNIND 1992 SC 474] per Mohan J.

9 M Venugopal v DM, LIC of India (1994) 1 LLJ 597 [LNIND 1994 SC 135] (600-01) (SC) : AIR 1994 SC 1343 [LNIND 1994 SC 135] per Singh J.

10 Allahabad Bank v Prem Singh (1997) 3 LLN 269 (SC).

11 Uptron India Ltd v Shammi Bhan (1998) 2 LLN 959, 965 (SC).

12 Birla VXL Ltd v State of Punjab (1999) 1 LLJ 220 [LNIND 1998 SC 485] (SC) : AIR 1999 SC 561 [LNIND 1998 SC 485].

13 Executive Engineer CPWD v MP Kolharkar (2000) 2 LLJ 1410 (SC).

14 Vice-Chancellor, Kurukshetra University v PO, LC (2001) 4 LLN 1148 (P&H), per Nijjar J.

15 MP Electricity Board v Dinesh Kumar (2001) 2 LLJ 423 [LNIND 2001 SC 787] (SC) : 2001 (90) FLR 873.

16 Nareshkumar Manilal Parmar v ONGC Ltd (2001) 2 LLJ 919 (Guj) (DB) : 2001 (90) FLR 28.

17 Haryana State FCCW Store Ltd v Ram Niwas (2002) 2 LLJ 1153 [LNIND 2002 SC 404] (SC), per Mohapatra J.

18 Saudi Arabian Airlines v Ashok M Panchal (2003) 4 LLJ 107 [LNIND 2002 BOM 845] (Bom), per Kochar J.

19 MD, Karnataka Handloom DC Ltd v M L Raval AIR 2007 SC 631 [LNIND 2006 SC 979]: (2006) 13 SCC 15 [LNIND 2006 SC 979] per Lakshmanan J.

20 Punjab State Electricity Board v Darbara Singh AIR 2006 SC 387 [LNIND 2005 SC 908], per Pasayat J.

21 Punjab State Electricity Board v SK Puri AIR 2007 SC (supp) 647, per Pasayat J.

22 Manik v State of Maharashtra (2010) 3 LLJ 781 (Bom).

23 Mgm., Apparel Export Promotion Council v Surya Prakash (2011) 3 LLJ 335 (Del) (DB) : 178 (2011) DLT 624.

24 Gujarat Water Supply & SSB v Bipinchandra N Ramanuj (2011) 1 LLJ 84 (Guj).

25 Mgmt of Bisra Stone Lime Co Ltd v Workman 1992 Lab IC 451 (Ori) (DB), per Mohanty J.

26 P Muthukrishnan v Mgmt of Central Cinema (1992) 1 LLJ 519, 521 (Mad), per D Raju J.

27 Marmeswar Das v PO, LC 1984 Lab IC 837, 840 (Gau) (DB), per Hansaria J.

28 Anand Bihari v Rajasthan State Transport Corpn 1991 Lab IC 494, 498 (SC), per Sawant J.

29 Ibid.

30 Rameshwar Dass v State of Haryana (1995) 2 LLJ 716, 717 (SC) : (1995) 3 SCC 285 per NP Singh J.

31 Match and Plywood Mazdoor Sabha v Wood Works 1984 Lab IC 1375, 1377 (Ker), per Khader J.

32 Burrakur Coal Co Ltd v Azimuddin Ashraff (1960) 2 LLJ 434, 438 (Pat) (DB) : AIR 1960 Pat 554 per Kanhaiya Singh J.

33 Madurai Mills Co Ltd v Meenakshi Ammal (1963) 1 LLJ 1,4 (Mad), per Jagadisan J.

34 Iqbal Narain Saxena v PO, LC 1982 Lab IC 79 (All) (DB), per TS Misra J.

35 Lalit Mohan Puri v Pure Drinks (ND) Ltd (1992) 2 LLJ 439 [LNIND 1991 DEL 561] (Del) (DB) : 46 (1991) DLT 118 per Wadhwa J.

36 Workmen of Bangalore WC&S Mills Co Ltd v Mgmt (1962) 1 LLJ 213 [LNIND 1962 SC 30], 217 (SC), per Sarkar J.

37 Peirce Leslie & Co Ltd v Rama Moily (1965) 2 LLJ 41, 43 (Mys), per Somnath Ayyar J (obiter).

38 Burrakur Coal Co Ltd v Azimuddin Ashraff (1960) 2 LLJ 434 (Pat) (DB) : AIR 1960 Pat 554 per Kanhaiya Singh J.

39 Madurai Mills Co Ltd v Meenakshi Ammal (1963) 1 LLJ 1, 4 (Mad), per Jagadisan J.

40 Raghavachari v Madras P&L Assn 1980 Lab IC 116, 117 (Mad) (DB), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

41 Marmeswar Das v PO, LC 1984 Lab IC 837, 840 (Gau) (DB), per Hansaria J.

42 Imperial Tobacco Co of India v S Ethiraj (1954) 2 LLJ 637 (LAT).

43 Match and Plywood Mazdoor Sabha v Star Wood Works 1984 Lab IC 1375, 1377 (Ker), per Kader J.

44 Mgmt of DATC Ltd v PO, First Addl LC (2002) 3 LLN 292 (Mad) (DB), per Shanmugam J.

45 N Kumaresan v PO (2002) 1 LLN 1026 (Mad), per Kalifulla J.

46 Sohan Lal v State of Haryana AIR 2013 SC 1767 [LNIND 2013 SC 516], per Ranjan Gogoi J.

47 Nuclear Fuel Complex v KP Reddy (2002) 2 LLN 966 (AP) (DB), per Lakshmanan CJ.

48 Tapan Kumar Jena v General Manager, Calcutta Telephones 1981 Lab IC (NOC) 68 (Cal) (DB).

49 State of Maharashtra v DR Aher (1998) 1 LLJ 716 (Bom), per Marlapalle J.

50 State of West Bengal v NG Jana (1998) 1 LLN 540 (Cal) (DB), per Mishra CJ.

51 Kanda Swami v PO, IT (2000) 3 LLN 960 (Del), per Sikri J.

52 Telecom District Manager v AA Angali (2001) 1 LLN 260 (Kant) (DB), per Bharuka J.

53 L & T Mcneil Ltd v PO, LC (2001) 3 LLN 807 (Mad), per Jayasimha Babu J.

54 Nagappa H Lamani v Mgmt of Sericulture Deptt (2002) 3 LLN 1026 (Kant), per Rangavittalachar J.

55 Rajapalayam Municipality v PO, LC (2001) 2 LLN 1112 (Mad), per Meenakumari J.

56 President, Peroorkada SC Bank Ltd v S Sheena (2002) 3 LLJ 459 (Ker) : 2002 (95) FLR 1137 per Nair J.

57 S M Nilajkar v Telecom District Manager AIR 2003 SC 3553, per Lahoti J.

58 General Manager, Haryana Roadways v Rudhan Singh AIR 2005 SC 3966 [LNIND 2005 SC 528], per Mathur J.

59 Haryana State Electronics Dev Corpn Ltd v Mamni AIR 2006 SC 2427 [LNIND 2006 SC 338], per Sinha J.

60 Haryana Tourism Corporation v Fakir Chand AIR 2003 SC 4465 [LNIND 2003 SC 875], per Balakrishnan J.

61 Municipal Council, Samrala v Sukhwinder Kaur 2006 AIR SCW 4091, per Sinha J.

62 Haryana State Agricultural Mktg Board v Subhash Chand AIR 2006 SC 1263 [LNIND 2006 SC 135], per Sinha J.

63 Kishore Chandra Samal v Div Manager , OSCDC Ltd AIR 2006 SC 3613 [LNIND 2005 SC 909], per Pasayat J.

64 Superintending Engineer PWD v Surender (2009) 2 LLJ 582 (P&H) : 2009 (120) FLR 503 per Ahluwalia J.

65 District Programme Coordinator, Mahila Samakhya v Abdul Kareem AIR 2009 SC 512 [LNIND 2008 SC 1874].

66 Ghaziabad Development Authority v Ashok Kumar AIR 2008 SC (Supp) 1334, per Sinha J.

67 UP Brassware Corporation Ltd v Uday Narayan Pandey AIR 2006 SC 586 [LNIND 2005 SC 954], per Sinha J.

68 Executive Engineer, Jaipur RE Division v PO IT (2010) 1 LLJ 23 (Orr) : 108 (2009) CLT 34.

69 MP Police Housing Corporation v Sher Singh (2012) 4 LLJ 146 (MP) (DB) : 2012 (133) FLR 66.

70 G Udayakumar v General Manager, Telecom (2012) 2 LLJ 691 (Mad) : (2012) 1 MLJ 859 [LNIND 2011 MAD 4197] per Vasanthakumar J.

71 Bhavnagar Municipal Corporation v Salimbhai U Mansuri AIR 2013 SC 2762 [LNIND 2013 SC 655], per Radhakrishnan J.

72 Dilip Kumar Mandal v Union of India (2015) 1 LLJ 728 (Pat), per HK Srivastava J.

73 Microwave Project, Kota v Ramesh Chand AIR 2007 SC (Supp) 683, per Pasayat J.

74 HB Vinoba v MD, Hindustan Photo Films (1998) 1 LLN 744 (Mad), per Sarhasivam J.

75 Kalyani Sharp India Ltd v Labour Court (2001) 2 LLN 853 (SC).

76 Surat MNS Bank Ltd v MB Joshi (2001) 3 LLN 444 (Guj), per Rathod J.

77 Madhya Pradesh Electricity Board v DK Agarwal (2002) 3 LLN 94 (SC).

78 Mgmt of TI Diamond Chain Ltd v PO, 2nd LC (2003) 1 LLJ 198 (Mad) : 2002 (95) FLR 1091 per Rajan J.

79 Tata Consulting Engineeers v Vatsala K Nair (1998) 1 LLN 525, 527 (Bom), per Lodha J.

80 Madhya Pradesh Textbook Corpn v KK Pancholi (1998) 5 LLN (Supp), per Dharmadhikari J.

81 Exec Enginee4, YMP Division v Anant (1999) 1 LLN (Bom), per Rebello J.

82 EE Roads and Buildings v R K Bhatt (2000) 2 LLN 632 (Guj), per Srivastava J.

83 Air India Ltd v Dharmendar Kumar (2001) 1 LLN 62 (SC).

84 Navodaya Vidyalaya v KR Hemavathy (2001) 3 LLN 590 (Kant) (DB).

85 Purushottambhai R Kachhadia v State of Gujarat (2001) 3 LLN 627 (Guj), per Abichandani J.

86 Estate Officer, Haryana UDA v PO, IT (2001) 3 LLN 1139 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

87 Escorts Ltd v PO (1997) 3 LLN 65 (SC).

88 Birla VXL Ltd v State of Punjab (1999) 1 LLJ 220 [LNIND 1998 SC 485] (SC).

89 Allahabad Bank v Prem Singh (1997) 3 LLN 269 (SC).

90 Mukesh Kumar v Presiding Officer (2001) 4 LLN 1159 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

91 Gangadhar Labia v PO, LC (2002) 1 LLN 452 (Orissa) (DB), per Mohanty J.

92 Giridhar Gopal Saini v Industrial Tribunal (2002) 2 LLN 692 (Raj), per Madan J.

93 Rattan Singh v Union of India (1998) 5 LLN (Supp) (SC).

94 Morinda Coop Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Kishan (1995) 5 SCC 653 [LNIND 1995 SC 829] : AIR 1996 SC 332 [LNIND 1995 SC 829]: (1996) 1 LLJ 870, per Ramaswamy J.

95 Tamil Nadu CSCW Union v Mgmt (1998) 1 LLJ 728 [LNIND 1997 MAD 868], 735 (Mad) (DB), per Lakshmanan J.

96 PSMPT Sangam v PS Mills Ltd 2002 (2) LLN 345 (Mad) (DB), per Sathasivam J.

97 Krishik Upaj Mandi Samithi v PO, LC (2001) 2 LLN 1093 (MP), per Jha J.

98 Krishi Upaj Mandi Samithi v PO, LC (2001) 2 LLN 1099 (MP), per Kulshreshta J.

1 Tamil Nadu CSCW Union v Mgmt (1998) 1 LLJ 728 [LNIND 1997 MAD 868], 736 (Mad) (DB), per Lakshmanan J.

2 Bhogpur Coop Sugar Mills Ltd v Harmesh Kumar AIR 2007 SC 288 : (2006) 13 SCC 28 : (2007) 1 LLJ 488 per Sinha J.

3 M armeswar Das v Presiding Officer, Labour Court 1984 Lab IC 837, 842 (Gall) (DB), per TN Singh J.

4 Life Insurance Corpn of India v Raghavendra S Kulkarni (1998) 1 LLN 56 (SC) : AIR 1998 SC 327 : (1997) 8 SCC 461 : (1998) 2 LLJ 1161.

5 High Court of Madhya Pradesh v SN Jhavar (2001) 4 LLN 1248, 1253 (SC).

6 Munshi Ram v PO, LC (2002) 2 LLN 662 (P&H), per Bali J.

7 SN Vasudevan v Bharat Fritz Werner (P) Ltd (2001) 3 LLN 361 (Kant), per Gopala Gowda J.

8 State of Punjab v Dharam Singh AIR 1968 SC 1210 [LNIND 1968 SC 28], 1212.

9 Acctt Genl, MP v BP Bhatnagar CA No 458 of 1962 (23-1-1962) (SC).

10 Muir Mills Unit of NTPC Ltd v Swayam Prakash Srivastava AIR 2007 SC 519 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070]: (2007) 1 SCC 491 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070] : (2007) 1 LLJ 801 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070] per Lakshmanan J.

11 State of Rajasthan v Lal Bahadur Yadav (2002) 3 LLN 1205 (Raj), per Chauhan J.

12 Eranallor Service Cooperative Bank Ltd v LC (1986) 2 LLJ 492, 495 (Ker), per Radhakrishna Menon J.

13 Mithilesh Kumar Singh v State of Bihar (1995) 1 LLJ 973, 975 (Pat), per Aftab Alam J.

14 Srirangam Co-op Urban Bank Ltd v LC (1996) 2 LLJ 216 [LNIND 1996 MAD 316] (Mad) (DB), per KA Swami CJ.

15 Rajesh Kumar v State of Madhya Pradesh (1994) 2 LLJ 320, 322 (MP) (DB), per Dubey J.

16 Barsi Light Rly Co Ltd v KN Joglekar (1957) 1 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1956 SC 104], 247 (SC), per SK Das J.

17 State Bank of India v N Sunderamony (1976) 1 LLJ 478 [LNIND 1976 SC 13] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 1111 [LNIND 1976 SC 13]: (1976) 1 SCC 822 [LNIND 1976 SC 13], per Krishna Iyer J.

18 CVA Hydross & Son v Joseph Sanjon (1967) 1 LLJ 509, 516 (Ker), per Mathew J.

19 Lachman Das v Indian Express Newspapers (B) Ltd 1977 Lab IC 823, 825 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

20 JK Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 64 [LNIND 1960 SC 35], 67 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1288 [LNIND 1960 SC 35], per Subba Rao J.

21 Angus Engineering Works v Hanif Mohd (1955-56) 8 FJR 605 (LAT).

22 Royal Calcutta Golf Club v Third Industrial Tribunal (1960) 1 LLJ 464, 467 (Cal), per Sinha J.

23 Workmen of Subong Tea Estate v Subong Tea Estate (1964) 1 LLJ 333 [LNIND 1963 SC 278], 338-39 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 420 [LNIND 1963 SC 278]: [1964] 5 SCR 602 [LNIND 1963 SC 278], per Gajendragadkar J.

24 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438 (SC), per Shelat J.

25 Ghatge & Patil CE' Union v G & P (Tpt) Pvt Ltd (1968) 1 LLJ 566 [LNIND 1967 SC 239], 570 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

26 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438 (SC), per Shelat J.

27 CCTransport Co Ltd v IT (1978) 2 LLJ 278, 280-81 (Ker) (DB), per Gopalan Nambiyar CJ.

28 Film DE Assn v MGM (I) Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 99 [LNIND 1961 MAD 137], 104 (Mad), per Anantanarayanan J.

29 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Lal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 437-39 (SC), per Shelat J.

30 D Macropollo & Co Pvt Ltd v Employees' Union (1958) 2 LLJ 492 [LNIND 1958 SC 87], 497 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

31 Royal Calcutta Golf Club v Third IT (1960) 1 LLJ 464, 467 (Cal), per Sinha J.

32 Rajeshwar Nath v Union of India 1981 Lab IC 696, 697 (Raj), per Lodha J.

33 Haji Ismail Said & Sons Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 59 [LNIND 1965 CAL 127], 69 (Cal), per Mukharji J.

34 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438 (SC), per Shelat J.

35 Rajasthan SRTC v Judge, IT 1985 Lab IC 480 (Raj).

36 Workmen of Subong Tea Estate v Subong Tea Estate (1964) 1 LLJ 333 [LNIND 1963 SC 278], 338-39 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 420 [LNIND 1963 SC 278]: [1964] 5 SCR 602 [LNIND 1963 SC 278], per Gajendragadkar J.

37 ECP Rathinaswami v Labour Court (1964) 2 LLJ 86 [LNIND 1963 MAD 280] (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

38 Poona Mazdoor Sabha v GK Dhutia (1956) 2 LLJ 319 [LNIND 1956 BOM 105], 321 (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

39 Tata Chemicals Ltd v Workmen 1978 Lab IC 637 [LNIND 1978 SC 113] (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

40 SJoseph v Panyam Cement and Mineral Industries (1967) 1 LLJ 10 [LNIND 1965 AP 91], 13 (AP) (DB), per Kumarayya J.

41 Rattan Singh v State of Punjab 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 39 (P&H), per Tiwatia J.

42 Bipin Bihari Sinha v Union of India 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 74 (Pat) (DB).

43 Shukla Manseta Industries Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1977) 2 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1977 SC 242], 341-42 (SC), per Goswami J.

44 General Manager, Security Paper Mill v RS Sharma 1986 Lab IC 667 [LNIND 1986 SC 39], 670 (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

45 Herbertsons Ltd v Workmen 1977 Lab IC 162 [LNIND 1976 SC 415], 168 (SC), per Goswami J.

46 Tata Engineering & Locomotive Co Ltd v Workmen (1981) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1981 SC 411], 431 (SC), per Koshal J.

47 Shaw Wallace & Co Ltd v First IT 1986 Lab IC 2030, 2036 (Cal), per UC Banerjee J.

48 Mico Employees' Assn v State of Karnataka (1987) 1 LLJ 300, 322 (Kant), per Bopanna J.

49 Mgmt Hindustan Zinc Ltd v HZ Workers Union (1988) 2 LLJ 318 (AP) (DB), per Bhaskaran CJ.

50 New Standard Engineering Co Ltd v ML Abyankan (1978) 1 LLJ 487 [LNIND 1978 SC 34], 491 (SC), per Shinghal J.

51 Herbertsons Ltd v Workmen 1977 Lab IC 162 [LNIND 1976 SC 415], 168 (SC), per Goswarni J.

52 Gen Secy, Cochin Port Wharf Staff Assn v Chairman, Cochin Port Trust (1982) 1 LLJ 173, 177 (Ker), per Bhaskaran J.

53 Adamji M Badri v Labour Court (1981) 1 LLJ 367, 370 (Guj) (DB), per Sheth J.

54 Indian Tobacco Co Ltd v Government of WB (1971) 1 LLJ 89, 94 (Cal) (DB), per SK Mukherjee J.

55 Rasbehary Mohanty v PO, LC (1974) 2 LLJ 222, 226 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

56 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Hindustan Lever Ltd 1984 Lab IC 276 [LNIND 1984 SC 6], 287 (SC), per Desai J.

57 Gandhidham Nagalpalika v RC Israni (1993) 1 LLJ 432, 440 (Guj) (DB), per Divecha J.

58 General Manager, Security Paper Mill v RS Sharma 1986 Lab IC 667 [LNIND 1986 SC 39], 669 (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

59 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Union of India 1984 Lab IC 1323, 1326 (Del) (DB), per Chadha J.

60 Tiruchi STC Pvt Ltd v IT (1962) 1 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 MAD 171], 99 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

61 BC Banik v Indian Overseas Bank 1980 Lab IC (NOC) 79 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

62 Mgmt, Cooperative Store Ltd v Ved Prakash Bhambri 1989 Lab IC 289 (Del), per Bahri J.

63 Vishnu Sugar Mills Ltd v Aziz (1952) 2 LLJ 481 (LAT).

64 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1158 [LNIND 1960 SC 345]: [1961] 3 SCR 308 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], per Wanchoo J.

65 Mafatlal Engg Industries Ltd v Mafatlal Engineering Industries Employees' Union (1992) 2 LLJ 657, 671 (Bom), per Saldanah J.

66 Krishnarajendra Mills Workers Union v ACL 1968 Lab IC 153, 157 (Mys) (DB), per Tukol J.

67 ITC Employees' Assn v State of Karnataka (1981) 1 LLJ 431, 438 (Kant), per Boppanna J.

68 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Union of India 1984 Lab IC 1323, 1327 (Del) (DB), per Chadha J.

69 Ramakrishna Industries Pvt Ltd v Workers Jothi Mills (1992) 2 LLJ 797 [LNIND 1991 MAD 609] (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram CJ.

70 Nagercoil Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v IT (1953) 1 LLJ 208 (TC), per PK Subramanya Iyer J.

71 Praga Tools v Praga Tools Mazdoor Sabha (1975) 1 LLJ 218, 222 CAP), per Obul Reddy J.

72 V Mohanakumaran Nair v Hindustan Latex Ltd 1987 Lab IC 950, 953 (Ker), per KT Thomas J.

73 Britannia Biscuit CE Union v Asst Commr of Labour (1983) 1 LLJ 181, 190 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

74 Mysore Sugar CE Union v Commr of Labour (1968) 1 LLJ 491, 494 (Mys) (DB), per Somnath Ayyar J.

75 Jhagrakhan Collieries Pvt Ltd v CGAT 1975 Lab IC 137 (SC), per Sarkaria J.

76 Mico Employees' Assn v State of Karnataka (1987) 1 LLJ 300, 322 : ILR 1986 Kar 3474 (Kant), per Bopanna J.

77 Mgmt of A LP, Hindustan Zinc Ltd v HZW Union (1988) 2 LLJ 318, 322 (AP) (DB), per Bhaskaran CJ.

78 Britannia Biscuit CE Union v Assistant Commr of Labour (1983) 1 LLJ 182, 194 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

79 State Bank Staff Union v SBI (1991) 1 LLJ 163 [LNIND 1990 MAD 579], 175 (Mad) (DB) : (1992) I MLJ 131, per Nainar Sundram J.

80 New Standard Engineering Co Ltd v ML Abhyankar (1978) 1 LLJ 487 [LNIND 1978 SC 34] (SC), per Singhal J.

81 Burmah Shell Workers' Union v State of Kerala (1960) 1 LLJ 323 [LNIND 1959 KER 297], 328 (Ker), per Joseph J.

82 General Manager, Security Paper Mill v RS Sharma 1986 Lab IC 667 [LNIND 1986 SC 39], 670 (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

83 Cooper Engineering Ltd v DM Aney 1971 Lab IC 603, 609-10 (Bom) (DB), per KK Desai J.

84 Air India Cabin Crew Assn v Air India (1981) 2 LLJ 306, 309 (Bom), per Pratap J.

85 Cement Works Karmchari Sangh v Industrial Tribunal 1971 Lab IC 143, 147-48 (Raj), per Tyagi J.

86 Hindustan Housing Factory Ltd v Hindustan Housing Factory Employees' Union 1969 Lab IC 1450, 1458 (Del), per Tatachari J.

87 Genl Secy, National & Grindlays Bank Employees' Union v I Kannan 1978 Lab IC 648, 653 (Mad).

88 Adil K Patel v Tata Iron and Steel Co Ltd 1994 Lab IC 2394 [LNIND 1994 BOM 96], 2399 (Bom), per Saraf J.

89 Workmen of Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co Ltd v Mgmt 1970 Lab IC 1470, 1472 (SC), per Dua J.

90 Brooke Bond India v Workmen (1981) 2 LLJ 184 [LNIND 1981 SC 298], 188 (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 1660 [LNIND 1981 SC 298]: (1981) 3 SCC 1041, per Gupta J.

91 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 276 [LNIND 1984 SC 6] (SC), per Desai J.

92 IAAI Workers Union v IAAI (1991) Lab LR 481(Del).

93 Johnson & Johnson Ltd v Maharashtra GK Union (1997) 2 LLJ 1157 [LNIND 1996 BOM 101], 1161 (Bom) : (1996) 5 Bom CR 181 [LNIND 1996 BOM 101].

94 Rajalakshmi Mills Ltd v Workmen (1957) 2 LLJ 427 (LAT).

95 Workmen of Motor Industries Co v Motor Industries Co Ltd (1969) 2 LLJ 673 [LNIND 1969 SC 166] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 12 80 [LNIND 1969 SC 166]: (1969) 2 SCC 13 [LNIND 1969 SC 166], per Shelat J.

96 Herbertsons Ltd v Workmen 1977 Lab IC 162 [LNIND 1976 SC 415], 165 (SC), per Goswami J.

97 Garment Cleaning Works v DM Aney (1970) 2 LLJ 195 [LNIND 1969 BOM 21] (Bom) (DB), per Patel J.

98 Hindustan Level Ltd v Employees Union (1999) 1 LLN 930, 943 (Bom), per Savant J.

1 Ram Prasad Vishwakarma, v Chairman, IT AIR 1961 SC 857 [LNIND 1960 SC 333].

2 Brooke Bond India Ltd v Workmen (1981) 2 LLN 286 (SC).

3 Hindustan Lever Ltd v HLMS (2001) 1 LLN 1095 (Bom), per Kochar J.

4 State of Bihar v DN Ganguly (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1018 [LNIND 1958 SC 92]: [1959] 1 SCR 1191 [LNIND 1958 SC 92].

5 Jhagrakhan Collieries (P) Ltd v CGIT 1975 Lab IC 137, 140 (SC), per Sarkaria J.

6 Kalinga Jute Products (P) Ltd v PO, IT, (1980) 1 LLJ 239, 245-46 (Ori) (DB), per SK Ray CJ.

7 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1962, 3rd ed, Vol 38, p 59.

8 [1869] LR 4 QB 602, 612, per Hannen J.

9 110 Wash 391.

10 American Jurisprudence, 1st ed, per Higgins J.

11 Australian Commonwealth Shipping Bd, v Federated Seamen's Union 35 CLR 462, 483, per Higgins J.

12 Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, 1934, Vol 14, p 419.

13 Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1992, Vol 21, p 470.

14 Ludwig Teller, Labor Disputes and Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, pp 236-37, s 78.

15 Skyes, Strike Law in Australia, 1960, p 44.

16 Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 381 (Pat) (DB), per Narasimham CJ.

17 Buckingham & Carnatic Mills v Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1952 SC 77], 183 (SC), per Mahajan J.

18 GD Dalyi v Goodlass Wall Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 468, 469 (LAT).

19 Patiala Cement Co Ltd v Certain Workers (1955) 2 LLJ, 57 (LAT).

20 Standard vacuum Oil Co v MG Gunaseelan (1954) 2 LLJ 656, 651 (LAT).

21 Jessop and Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522, 528 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

22 Sitalpur Sugar Works Ltd v State of Bihar (1958) 2 LLJ 95, 99 (Pat) (DB), per Rajkishore Prasad J.

23 OK Ghosh v EX Joseph (1962) LLJ 615 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

24 Mgmt of Katkona Colliery, Western Coal Fields Ltd v PO, CGIT 1978 Lab IC 1531 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh J.

25 Mehnga Ram v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 603 [LNIND 1956 ALL 79], 614-15 (All) (DB) : AIR 1956 All 644 [LNIND 1956 ALL 79], per Kidwai J.

26 Buckingham & Carnatic Mills v Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1952 SC 77] (SC), per Mahajan J.

27 Northbrook Jute Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1960 SC 87], 584 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

28 Model Mills Ltd v Dharamdas (1958) 1 LLJ 539 [LNIND 1957 SC 110], 543 (SC), per Imam J.

29 Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Rashtriya Indian Hume Pipe Mazdoor Sangh (1957) 2 LLJ 67 (LAT).

30 Sirka Colliery Ltd v South Karanpura Coal Mines Workers' Union (1951) 2 LLJ 52 (LAT).

31 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 666 [LNIND 1959 SC 166], 684 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

32 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1952 SC 77], 183 (SC), per Mahajan J.

33 Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh v Crown Spg and Mfg Co Ltd (1954) LAC 401(LAT).

34 Upper India Couper Paper Mills Co Ltd v Workers (1954) 2 LLJ 347 (LAT).

35 National Textile Workers Union v Sree Meenakshi Mills (1951) 2 LLJ 516 (LAT).

36 Ram Sarup v Rex AIR 1949 All 218 [LNIND 1948 ALL 32], per Chandiramani J.

37 Ram Naresh Kumar v State of West Bengal (1958) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1957 CAL 138], 570 (Cal) (DE), per Guha Ray J.

38 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 666 [LNIND 1959 SC 166], 684 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

39 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Sarup (1957) 1 LLJ 17 [LNIND 1956 SC 85], 22 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

40 Ludwig Teller, Labor Disputes and Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol I, p 311.

41 Ibid at p 298.

42 Dorchy v Kansas 71 L Ed, 248, 261.

43 American Jurisprudence, Ist ed, s 390, pp 718-19.

44 Janab Muhammad Israil v Saxby and Farmer (India) Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 72, 75 (LAT).

45 Ziakh v Firestone Tyre & Rubber Co Ltd (1954) 1 LLJ 281 [LNIND 1953 BOM 121] (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

46 Bharat Sugar Mills Ltd v Jai Singh (1961) 2 LLJ 644 [LNIND 1961 SC 306], 647 (SC) : [1962] 3 SCR 684 [LNIND 1961 SC 306], per Das Gupta J.

47 SU Motors (P) Ltd v Workmen (1990) 2 LLJ 39 [LNIND 1990 SC 308], 51-54 (SC) : (1990) 4 SCC 744 [LNIND 1990 SC 308] : [1990] 3 SCR 214 [LNIND 1990 SC 308], per Sawant J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Strike as a Weapon in the process of Collective Bargaining

On the question of right to strike work, Lord Denning MR observed:

> The nature of the right of strike is such as in my view cannot be abridged or taken away, save in strict conformity with the provisions of the statute providing for such abridgment or taking away.[48]

The right to strike is labour's ultimate weapon and in the course of the century, it has emerged as the inherent right of every worker. It is an element which is of the very essence of the principle of collective bargaining.[49] In the landmark case, the Federated Municipal and Shire Council Employees Union of Australia v Melbourne Corpn , speaking for the High Court of Australia, Isaacs and Rich JJ stated:

> Industrial warfare is no mere figure of speech. It is not the mere phrase of theorists. It is recognised by the law as the correct description of internal conflicts in industrial matters.[50]

The expression 'industrial warfare' was adopted by Lord Loreburn LC, who described strikes and lockouts as weapons allowed by the law.[51] In the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> In the struggle between the capital and labour, the weapon of strike is available to labour and is often used by it, as is the weapon of lockout available to the employer and can be used by him.[52]

Thus a strike is the antithesis of a lockout. It is regarded as a powerful weapon of collective bargaining and is generally fraught with the possibility of industrial dislocation, with all its attendant hardships and evils, the occurrence of which is regarded as one of the powerful levers to bring about agreements. 'Of course, a collective strike is economic pressure by cessation of work and not exchange of pleasantries. It means embarrassing business'.[53] Trade unions with a sufficient membership strength, are able to bargain more effectively with the management than individual workmen. This bargaining strength would be considerably reduced if it is not permitted to demonstrate by adopting agitational methods, such as 'work to rule', 'go-slow', 'absenteeism', 'sit-down strike' and 'strike'. This right has been recognised by almost all democratic countries.[54] The idea has been succinctly expressed by Prof Mathews thus:

> The strike is itself a part of the bargaining process. It tests the economic bargaining power of each side and forces each to face squarely, the need it has for the other's contribution. As the strike progresses, the workers' savings disappear, the union treasury dwindles, and management faces mounting losses. Demands are tempered, offers are extended, and compromises previously unthinkable, become acceptable. The very economic pressure of the strike is a catalyst, which makes agreement possible. Even when no strike occurs, it plays its part in the bargaining process, for the very prospects of the hardship which the strike will bring, > provides a prod to compromise. Collective bargaining is a process of reaching an agreement, and 'strikes' are an integral and frequently necessary part of that process.[55]

Collective bargaining, for securing improvement on matters like wages, basic pay, dearness allowance, bonus, provident fund and gratuity, leave and holidays and other terms of service or conditions of labour, is the primary object of trade unions and when demands like these are put forward, a strike thereafter, may justifiably be resorted to, in an attempt to induce the employer to agree to the demands or at least to open negotiations.[56] Sometimes, the threat of a strike is enough to make the employer concede to the demands of the union. In Umesh Nayak, speaking for the Supreme Court, Sawant J stated the law in the following words:

> The strike, as a weapon, was evolved by the workers as a form of direct action, during their long struggle with the employers. It is essentially a weapon of last resort, being an abnormal aspect of employer-employee relationship and involves a withdrawal of labour, disrupting production, services and the running of the enterprise. It is a use by the labour of their economic power, to bring the employer to see and meet their viewpoint, over the dispute between them...The cessation or stoppage of work, whether by the employees or by the employer, is detrimental to the production and economy and to the well being of the society as a whole. It is for this reason that industrial legislation, while not denying the right of workmen to strike, has tried to regulate it, along with the right of the employer to lockout and has also provided a machinery for peaceful investigation, settlement, arbitration and adjudication of the disputes between them...The strike or lockout is not be resorted to, because the concerned party has a superior bargaining power or the requisite economic muscle to compel the other party to accept its demand. Such indiscriminate use of power is nothing but an assertion of the rule of 'Might is right'. Its consequences are lawlessness, anarchy and chaos in the economic activities which are most vital and fundamental to the survival of the society. Such action, when the legal machinery is available to resolve the dispute, may be hard to justify. This will be particularly so when it is resorted to by the section of the society which can well await the resolution of the dispute by the machinery provided for the same. The strike or lockout, as a weapon, has to be used sparingly, for the redressal of urgent and pressing grievances, when no means are available or when available, means have failed to resolve it. It has to be resorted to, to compel the other party to the dispute, to see the justness of the demand. It is for this reason that industrial legislation, such as the Act, places additional restrictions on strikes and lockouts in public utility services.[57]

No doubt, a strike is a recognised mode of agitation, to press home the demand of the workers, in the process of collective bargaining, but a strike cannot be resorted to, to pressurise the management to accede to the demands which they cannot get lawfully. For instance, the weapon of strike cannot be used to pressurise the management to pay an additional amount of bonus, apart from the bonus permissible under the Payment of Bonus Act.[58]

Illegal Strikes

Though the right to strike is not raised to the high pedestal of a 'fundamental right' under the Constitution, it is recognised as a mode of redress for resolving a grievance of the workers. The workers in a democratic state, have the right to resort to a strike, in order to express their grievances or to make certain demands. Thus, a strike is a necessary safety valve in industrial relations.[59] Brandies J, speaking for the US Supreme Court, observed: A strike may be illegal because of its purpose, however orderly the manner in which it is carried.[60]In America and England, there are certain objects which render the strike illegal. But in India, in the field of industrial law, it is not the objects which makes the strike illegal, but it is the breach of statutory provisions, which renders certain industrial strikes illegal. Sections 10(3) and 10 A(4A) of the ID Act empower the appropriate government to prohibit the continuance of a strike, which may be in existence on the date of the reference of a dispute in connection with such dispute. Section 22(1) prohibits the commencement of a strike in public utility service industries, without complying with the requirements thereof. Section 23 prohibits the commencement of a strike during the pendency of conciliation, adjudication and arbitration proceedings and for some time even after the conclusion of such proceedings. It also proscribes a strike during the period of operation of the a settlement or an award, in respect of matters covered by such settlement or award. Section 24(1) makes the strikes in contravention of these provisions, illegal.[61] Likewise, there are provisions in state statutes also, which make strikes in contravention of the prohibitory provisions thereof, illegal.[62] A strike can be illegal only when it contravenes some provision of law. It would follow that a strike continued or commenced, without a contravention of any statutory provision, would be legal even if it is of a violent type. For instance, in BR Singh, the strike resorted to by the workmen, in frustration and to press their demands, without contravening any of the statutory requirements, was held to be legal. Conversely, a strike, however orderly and peaceful, would be illegal, if it contravenes the statutory provisions.[63] In Churakulam, the Supreme Court observed that a strike contravening the provisions of s 23(a) would be illegal. But since admittedly, there were no conciliation proceedings before the board on the day on which the factory workers went on the strike, the strike could not come within the prohibition of s 23(a).[64] An illegal strike will invite disciplinary proceedings, because it is an act of misconduct.[65]

Justified and Unjustified Strikes

In Chandramalai Estate, Das Gupta J, stated:

> While on the one hand, it has to be remembered that a strike is a legitimate and sometimes, unavoidable weapon in the hands of labour, it is equally important to remember that an indiscriminate and hasty use of this weapon should not be encouraged. It will not be right for labour to think that for any kind of demand, a 'strike' can be commenced with impunity, without exhausting the reasonable avenues available for a peaceful achievement of their objects. There may be cases where the demand is of such an urgent and serious nature, that it would not be reasonable to expect the labour to wait after asking the government to make a reference. In such cases, the strike, even before such a request has been made, may well be justified.[66]

But the justifiability of a strike has to be viewed from the standpoint of the fairness and reasonableness of the demands made by the workmen, and not merely from the standpoint of their exhausting all the other legitimate means open to them, for getting the demands fulfilled.[67] The question of the justifiability or otherwise, of a strike, would also depend upon whether the demands are made bona fide, for the betterment of the conditions of service of the workmen or whether they are made frivolously or for any ulterior purpose.[68] Thus, where, after the failure of conciliation efforts, the workmen could have waited to ask the government to make a reference before starting the strike, the strike was held to be unjustified.[69] Likewise, where the circumstances clearly showed that the demand of the workmen, regarding ex-gratia bonus, could not be considered to be of an urgent and serious nature, the launching of a strike was held to be unjustified.[70] On the other hand, where the strike was not directly connected with the demand for bonus and uncontroverted evidence established that the strike was a protest against the unreasonable attitude of the management, in boycotting the conferences held by the Labour Minister, the strike was held to be not unjustified.[71] Similarly, where the employer failed to pay bonus to the workmen, as ordered by the Supreme Court as well as the High Court, the strike could not be held to be unjustified, particularly so, as the strike was peaceful and the workmen did not resort to acts of violence or intimidation, nor did they violate the civilised norms during the period of strike or earlier and the strike was immediately recalled when the issue of the payment of bonus was finally settled.[72] A strike may be justified if it is bona fide, resorted to for the betterment of the conditions of service of the workmen. At the commencement, a strike may be both legal and justified. It may become illegal if continued after an order under s 10(3) or s 10(4A) has been made by the 'appropriate government'. The strike may also become unjustified as it progresses, if the strikers resort to acts of violence and sabotage. Or else, a strike may become unjustified on account of its being motivated by extraneous considerations, not connected with the genuine grievances of the workmen; it also may become unjustified on account of being unduly and inordinately protracted. Though such strikes may not be illegal, they might certainly be unjustified. The justifiability or non-justifiability of a strike is irrelevant for determining the question of wages for the period of such strikes.

The question, whether a particular strike was justified or not, is a question of fact, which has to be judged in the light of the facts and circumstances of each case. Furthermore, the 'use of force or violence or acts of sabotage, resorted to by the workmen' during a strike, is apt to render a strike unjustified. A strike, however, cannot be said to be unjustified unless the reasons for it are entirely perverse or irrational.[73]Therefore, the question, whether a 'strike' is justified or unjustified, has to be examined by taking into consideration various factors, such as the service conditions of the workmen, the nature of their demands, the cause which led to the strike, the urgency of the cause or demand, the reasons for not resorting to the dispute-resolving machinery provided by the Act or the contract of employment or the service rules and regulations, etc. An inquiry into these issues is essentially an inquiry into the factors which, in some cases, may require taking of oral and documentary evidence. The appropriate forum to conduct such inquiry is industrial adjudicator. But such an inquiry cannot be conducted by' the High Court in its writ jurisdiction, under Art. 226 of the Constitution. In Umesh Nayak, the Supreme Court held that the High Court had erred in recording its finding on the question of the legality and justifiability of a 'strike', by assuming the jurisdiction which was properly vested in the industrial adjudicator.[74] However, if the findings of the industrial adjudicator suffer from an 'error of law apparent on the face of the record' or is based on no evidence or is perverse, it is liable to be interfered with, in Judicial review by the High Court in its jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution,[75] In Amalendu Gupta, the Calcutta High Court held writ court would be competent to decide the question of justifiability of the strike.[76]

Illegal Strike - If can be considered as Justified

In IGN Rly, speaking for the Supreme Court, Sinha CJI stated the law thus:

> The tribunal, having held that the strike was illegal, proceeded to discuss the question, whether it was justified, and came to the conclusion that it was 'perfectly justified'. In the first place, it is a little difficult to understand how a strike in respect of a public > utility service, which is clearly illegal, could at the same time be characterised as 'perfectly justified.' These two conclusions cannot in law, co-exist. The law has made a distinction between a strike which is illegal and one which is not, but it has not made any distinction between an illegal strike which may be said to be justifiable and one which is not justifiable. This distinction is not warranted by the Act, and is wholly misconceived, specially in the case of employees in a public utility service. Every one participating in an illegal strike, is liable to be dealt with departmentally, of course, subject to the action of the department being questioned before an industrial tribunal, but it is not permissible to characterise an illegal strike as justifiable.[77]

Referring to this statement of law, in Gujarat Steel Tubes, Krishna Iyer J, observed:

> This court did observe that if a strike is illegal, it cannot be called 'perfectly justified' and glossed that 'between the perfectly justified and unjustified strike, the neighborhood is distant', and then, he inferred that, 'mere illegality of the strike does not, per se, spell unjustifiability.[78]

From a cursory glance of the passage cited above, it is obvious that the words 'perfectly justified', being put in quotes, refer to the holding of the tribunal. Then there is the comment of the court that it was difficult to understand as to how a strike which was illegal, could at the same time, be characterised as 'perfectly justified' by the tribunal, as these two conclusions are irreconcilable in law. This is followed by the opinion of the court that the law 'has not made any distinction between an illegal strike which may be said to be justifiable and one which is not justifiable. This distinction is not warranted by the Act and is wholly misconceived...It is not permissible to characterise an illegal strike as justifiable'. It is clear that while expressing its opinion, the court has not used the word 'perfectly' to qualify the word 'justifiable', as observed by Iyer J, in Gujarat Steel Tubes. He has, therefore, misread the holding of the court in IGN Rly., and his conclusion is, therefore, unwarranted. For fortifying his conclusion, he further relied on Crompton Greaves, and observed that in that case, 'this court held that even if a strike is illegal, it cannot be castigated as unjustified, unless the reasons for it are entirely perverse and unreasonable - an aspect which has to be decided on the facts and circumstances of each case'. But in Crompton Greaves, there is nothing to support this observation or conclusion. The relevant passage reads:

> It is well-settled that in order to entitle the workmen to wages for the period of strike, the strike should be legal as well as justified. A strike is legal if it does not violate any provision of the statute. Again, a strike cannot be said to be unjustified, unless the reasons for it are entirely perverse or unreasonable. Whether a particular strike was justified or not, is a question of fact, which has to be judged in the light of the facts and circumstances of each case.[79]

That case dealt with the question of payment of wages to the workmen for the period of strike and lays down that for being entitled to wages for the period of the strike, the strike should have been 'legal as well as justified'. Then, it further points out that a strike is legal 'if it does not violate any provision of the statute' and it cannot be said 'to be unjustified, unless the reasons for it are entirely perverse or unreasonable'. The clear legal position, as established by the IGN Rly and Crompton Greaves cases, is that if a strike is illegal, it is not permissible to characterise it as justifiable. In other words, a strike which is illegal (being violative of the statutory provisions), cannot be justified. But even if a strike is legal, it has further to be seen whether it is justified or unjustified. The question of justifiability or unjustifiability would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. Therefore, there is no warrant for the inference from these two decisions, that a 'mere illegality of a strike does not, per se, spell unjustifiability. Even if the strike is legal, it cannot be castigated as unjustified. The question of the legality or illegality of a strike is relevant in the context of disciplinary action, because going on an illegal strike is generally made an act of misconduct under the Standing Orders. As observed in IGN Rly, in this connection, the only question of any practical importance, that may arise in the case of an illegal strike, would be the kind or quantum of punishment which has to be modulated in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. The justifiability or unjustifiability of a legal strike is relevant in the context of the wages payable to the workmen for the period of the strike. In Umesh Nayak,[80] a Constitution Bench of the court referred to and relied on the holding in the IGN Rly and did not refer to the obiter observations of the court in the Gujarat Steel Tubes case.

Effect of Strike on Contract of Employment

The sui-generis nature of striking employees or the employees whose work has ceased in consequence of a lockout, is now well recognised in law, ie, 'although the work ceases, the employment relation is deemed to continue, albeit in a state of a belligerent suspension'.[81] In Iron Moulders, the sui-generis nature was cited with approval:

> Neither strike, nor lockout completely terminates, when this is its purpose, the relationship between the parties. The employees who remain to take part in the strike or whether the lockout do so that they may be ready to go to work again on terms to which > they shall agree - the employer remaining ready to take them back on terms to which he shall agree. Manifestly then, pending a strike or a lockout, and so to those who have not finally and in good faith, abandoned it, a relationship exists between employer and employee, that is neither that of the general nature of employer and employee, nor again that of employer looking among strangers for employees or employees seeking from strangers, employment.[82]

A recognition of the notion of a striking employee is also contained in Keith Theatre, where the court said:

> While out on strike, it is not considered that the strikers have abandoned their employment, but rather have only ceased from their labour.[83]

The position of the law is the same in India also, as stated by the Supreme Court in Michael Mark, holding that if employees absent themselves from work because of a strike, for the enforcement of their demands, there can be no question of an abandonment of their employment, by them. And, if the strike was in fact, illegal, the employer may take a disciplinary, action against the workmen under the Standing Orders or otherwise, and dismiss them.[84] In this connection, in Oriental Textile, the court further said:

> While it is an accepted principle of industrial adjudication, that workmen can resort to strike in order to a press for their demands, without snapping the relationship of employer and employee, it is equally a well-accepted principle, that the work of the factory cannot be paralysed and brought to a stand-still by an illegal strike, in spite of legal steps being taken by the management to resolve the conflict. The management has the right in those circumstances, to carry on the work of the factory, in furtherance of which, it would employ other workmen and justify its action on merits, in any adjudication of the dispute arising therefrom.[85]

Punishment for Participating in Illegal Strikes

Taking part in an illegal strike amounts to a misconduct on the part of an employee, which will expose him to disciplinary action. In other words, the employees who take part in an illegal strike, make themselves liable to be dealt with departmentally, by their employers.[86] But if the strike is not illegal, the disciplinary action of a discharge or dismissal will be uncalled for. In BR Singh (supra), the dismissal of certain workmen for going on a strike, which was not illegal, but was resorted to out of frustration and not for any animosity towards any officer and without indulging in any destructive method, was held to be improper. However, until an employee is formally dismissed from service for such misconduct, the relation of employment subsists and the continuity of service is not affected.[87] In other words, the dismissal of workmen for going on an illegal strike, without holding a domestic inquiry against them, for the charges, in accordance with the rules of natural justice, will not be sustainable in industrial adjudication.[88] Furthermore, before inflicting the punishment on the delinquent workmen, not only do they have to be found guilty of the charges levelled against them, but their role in the strike has also to be determined by the adjudicator, to see whether the punishment is warranted or not. In Model Mills, the employer company dismissed certain workmen under its Standing Orders, for participating in an illegal strike and the dismissal was held to be proper and justified by the Supreme Court.[89] In Bata Shoe Co, the court held that where the Standing Orders authorise dismissal as a punishment for going on an illegal strike, the order of dismissal would be justified, even though there was no violence and the strikers remained peaceful.[90]

In Michael Mark (supra), the court, however, discountenanced the action of the employer in filling the places of the striking workmen, by employing new hands, as the striking workmen had not joined duty despite the notices given to them. The court observed that if the employees absent themselves from work on account of a strike, in furtherance of their demands, there could be no question of abandonment of employment by them and held that if the strike was, in fact, illegal, the employer could take disciplinary action against the employees, in compliance with the Standing Orders, and dismiss them. In IGN Rly (supra), the court laid down the general rule that merely taking part in an illegal strike, without anything further, would not necessarily justify the dismissal of all the workmen taking part in the strike and that it was necessary to hold a regular inquiry, after furnishing the charge-sheet to each of the workmen sought to be dealt with for his participation in the strike. In Oriental Textile, there were no Standing Orders applicable to the establishment, and the court held that the domestic inquiry should have been held in order to entitle the employer to dispense with the services of its workmen on the ground of misconduct. Dealing with the question as to whether, before the services of the workmen who are on strike, are terminated, is an inquiry into their misconduct obligatory and would an omission to comply with this requirement, make the order of termination illegal, the court held:

> It appears to us that merely because workmen go on strike, it does not justify the management's order terminating their services. In any case, if allegations of misconduct have been made against them, those allegations have to be inquired into by charging them with specific acts of misconduct and giving them an opportunity to defend themselves at the inquiry. Even where a strike is illegal, > it does not justify the management in terminating their services merely on that ground, though if it can be shown on an inquiry, that the conduct of the workmen amounted to a misconduct, it can do so...If, however, the management does not hold such an inquiry or the inquiry is due to some omission or deficiency, not valid, it can nonetheless support its order of discharge, termination or dismissal when the matter is referred for industrial adjudication, by producing satisfactory evidence and proving misconduct. Even in such cases, the evidence which is produced to substantiate and justify the action taken against the workman, is not as stringent as that which is required in a court of law. At any rate, the evidence should be such as would satisfy the tribunal that the order of termination is proper.[91]

The position of law, therefore, seems to be that if there are Standing Orders providing for a dismissal, in the establishment, the striking workmen may be punished or dismissed in compliance with the requirements thereof but in cases where there are no such Standing Orders, it would be necessary to serve the individual workmen, who have participated in the strike, with charge-sheets and then to hold a regular domestic inquiry to determine the quality of the misconduct and the quantum of punishment, by finding out whether they were peaceful strikers or violent strikers, so as to deserve the extreme penalty of a dismissal. It is only after complying with these requirements, that a workman, if found guilty of the charges, may be dismissed.[92] It is not as if, simply because the workman participated in an illegal strike, necessarily and in every case, a dismissal must be visited upon the workman. Majmudar J pointed out:

> In case of a mass movement, crusade and mass hysteria, actions taken and statements made by the concerned striking workmen, cannot be judged on the touchstone of cold logic, resorted to in an air-conditioned court room, detached from the atmosphere under which such statements are made and such acts are undertaken. They have to be judged in their own settings, which were aflame and explosive in character.[93]

There may be an actual participation and a passive participation on the part of the workman, in an illegal strike. It may be that those workmen who actually participated, may deserve a more serious punishment than the passive participants. Passive participants cannot be punished to the same extent as the active participants or the militant workmen.[94] The quantum of punishment would vary depending upon the facts and circumstances in each case.[95] The kind or quantum of punishment has to be modulated in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. However, in case of an illegal strike, the striking workmen are liable to be suspended forthwith, pending an inquiry into their conduct.[96] But a mere participation in an illegal strike, which is peaceful and non-violent, would not justify the suspension or dismissal of the participants. Nor would a mere participation in an illegal strike, bar the strikers' claim for reinstatement if they are dismissed,[97] for 'there may be reasons for distinguishing the case of those who have acted as dumb-driven cattle, from those who have taken an active part in fomenting the trouble and instigating workmen to join such a strike or have taken recourse to violence'. Though the employer may be justified in imposing the extreme punishment of dismissal, on the striking workmen who had indulged in violent activities or defied prohibitory orders issued by the authorities, such punishment will be too severe for those workmen who were peaceful strikers or acted like dumb-driven cattle.[1] On the other hand, even if the strike is legal and justified, if the workmen resort to violence, an order of dismissal may be proper.[2]

In Changunabai, the Bombay High Court pointed out that no doubt, those workmen who take part in an illegal strike, make themselves liable to be dealt with by their employers, whether such participation is passive or active. However, a distinction has to be maintained in dealing with both the types of workmen who may have been guilty of a participation in the illegal strike, because both are not liable to the same kind of punishment. A passive participation in a strike, which is illegal, and may also be unjustified, does not, ipso facto, invite a dismissal or a punitive discharge. To justify the ultimate penalty, there must be an active individual excess, ie, masterminding the unjustified aspects of the strike, such as violence, sabotage or some other reprehensible role. In the absence of such gravamen in the accusation and proof thereof, through cogent individualised proof, the extreme economical penalty of a penal termination is wrong, especially in an economic structure where large scale unemployment stares in the face.[3] The requirements of law before a just punishment, for going on an illegal or an unjustified strike, can be inflicted upon a delinquent workman, have been succinctly stated by Krishna Iyer J, in Gujarat Steel Tubes, in the following words:

> The short position is this. Is there a punishment of any workman? If yes, has it been preceded by an inquiry? If not, does the management desire to prove the charge before the tribunal? If yes, what is the evidence, against whom, of what misconduct? If individuated proof be forthcoming and relates to an illegal strike, the further probe is this: was the strike unjustified? If yes, was the accused worker an active participant therein? If yes, what role did he play and of what acts was he the author? Then alone the stage is set for a just punishment. These exercises, as an assembly-line process, are fundamental. Generalisation of a violent strike, of a vicious union leadership, of strikers fanatically or foolishly or out of fear, failing ro report for work, are good background material, beyond that, they must not be identified by a rational process, the workman, their individual delinquency and the sentence according to their sin. Sans that, the dismissal is bad. [4]

It may be pointed out that in view of the decision in IGN Rly, to the effect that an illegal strike cannot be justified, the query in the above passage, viz, 'the further probe is this: was the strike unjustified?', would be unwarranted and uncalled for. It is not in the interest of the industry that there should be a wholesale dismissal of all the workmen who merely participated in a strike. Nor is it in the interest of the workmen themselves. The question of punishment, therefore, has to be considered by industrial adjudication, keeping in view the over-riding consideration of the full and efficient working of the industry as a whole. To determine the question of punishment, therefore, a clear distinction has to be made between those workmen who not only joined in such strike, but also took part in obstructing the loyal workmen from carrying on their work, or took part in violent demonstrations, or acted in defiance of law and order, on the one hand, and those workmen who were more or less silent participants in such a strike. In order to find out which of the workmen, who had participated in an illegal strike, belonged to one or the other of the two categories, the strikers may, for the sake of convenience, be classified as: (i) peaceful strikers, and (ii) violent strikers. Industrial adjudication has to inquire into the part played by each. The punishment of dismissal or termination of service, may be imposed on such workmen as have not only participated in an illegal strike, but have also fomented it and have been guilty of violence or of doing acts detrimental to the maintenance of the law and order in the locality of the establishment.[5] A physical obstruction of loyal workers, by the strikers, during a strike, so as to prevent them from attending the place of work, is a serious misconduct, for which a punishment of dismissal would be justified.[6]

If the order of the punishment lacks bona fides or is a measure of victimisation or an unfair labour practice, even though purporting to be under the Standing Orders, it would be vitiated. For instance, if the employer picks up only a few employees for imposing the penalty of dismissal, without any rational explanation, where a large number of workmen had gone on strike, the action can be held to be mala fide, inasmuch as it is based on an irrational or unreasonable discrimination. Likewise, if the employer makes an unreasonable discrimination in the matter of taking back employees, particularly when no clear distinction can be made between the persons who are taken back into service, although they had participated in the strike, and the persons who are dismissed, there may, in certain circumstances, be ground for industrial adjudication to interfere.[7] But the circumstances of each case have to examined by the adjudicator, before he can interfere with the order of the employer in a properly held managerial inquiry, on the ground of discrimination.[8] In the undernoted case,[9] the action of the employer in selecting six workmen out of a large number of strikers for punishment, was held to be mala fide, inasmuch as it was based on an irrational and unreasonable discrimination, and their dismissal was unjustified. A participation in an illegal strike may not necessarily and in every case, be punished with a dismissal; but where an inquiry has been properly held and the employer has imposed the punishment of dismissal on the employee who has been guilty of the misconduct of joining an illegal strike, the tribunal should not interfere, unless it finds an unfair labour practice or victimisation against the employee.[10]

Wages for the Period of Strike

The question as to whether the workmen who proceed on an strike, whether legal or illegal, are entitled to wages for the period of the strike, has generated a good bit of decisional grist. As early as 1953, in Buckingham & Carnatic, the claim of workmen for wages for the strike period was rejected by the Supreme Court, because the strike was found to be illegal, as the textile mill was a public-utility-service and a notice, as required by the Act, had not been given to the management.[11] In Chandramalai Estate (supra) the Supreme Court deprecated the indiscriminate use of the weapon of strike. In the facts and circumstances of the case, it found that the strike was unjustified. It was, therefore, held that the workmen were not entitled to even 50 per cent of the wages, for the period of the strike.

Similarly, in Fertiliser Corpn, the workmen were denied wages for the period of the strike, because the strike, though not illegal, was unjustified in the facts and circumstances of the case.[12] In IGN Rly (supra), the court observed that an 'illegal' strike cannot be characterised as 'justified', because the law makes a distinction only between a strike which is 'illegal' and one which is not. But it does not make any distinction between an 'illegal' strike which may be said to be justifiable and one which is not justifiable. Such a distinction is wholly misconceived and especially so in the case of employees in a 'public-utility-service'. Therefore, in order to entitle the workmen for wages for the period of the strike, the strike must be both legal and justified. If the strike is legal as well as justified, it would be difficult for the employer to resist the claim of the workmen for wages for the period of the strike; on the other hand, if the strike is unjustified, the workmen may not be entitled to wages for the period of the strike. This principle was conversely applied by another three-judge Bench of the court, to the fact-situation in Churakulam, in which the court held that since the strike was neither 'illegal', nor 'unjustified', the workmen were entitled to wages for the days on which they went on strike. Likewise, in Crompton Greaves, the workmen were held to be entitled to the wages for the period of strike, as the strike was held to be neither illegal, nor unjustified. However, in connection with the 'unjustifiability' of a strike, the court pointed out:

> A strike cannot be said to be unjustified, unless the reasons for it are entirely perverse or unreasonable. Whether a particular strike was 'justified' or not, is a question of fact, which has to be judged in the light of the facts and circumstances of each case. It is also well-settled that the use of force or violence or acts of sabotage resorted to by the workmen, during a strike, disentitle them to wages for the strike period. [13]

It is apparent from the decisions in Churakulam and Crompton Greaves that the view taken in them was that, for an entitlement to wages for the period of strike, the strike has to be both legal and justified. The employees cannot be entitled to wages for such period merely because the strike was legal. In other words, if the strike was illegal but justified, or if the strike was legal but unjustified, the employees would not be entitled to the wages for the strike period.[14] But the question, whether the workmen who had proceeded on the strike, whether legal or illegal, were at all entitled to wages for the period of the strike, was for the first time considered by a two-judge Bench of the court in TS Kelawala, in which the facts were: the All India Bank Employees Assn gave a call for a countrywide strike in support of the demand of the bank employees for a wage revision. Consequently, on 29 December 1977, the bank employees went on a four hours strike, from the beginning of the working hours, despite warnings of wage deductions for the period of the strike, issued by the bank. After the strike period, the employees resumed work on that day and the bank did not prevent them from doing so. But the hours of the strike covered the banking hours for the public. Therefore, the bank issued a circular directing its managers and agents to deduct a full day's salary of those employees, who had participated in the strike. The employees' union challenged that circular of the bank by a writ petition, which was allowed by the High Court of Bombay. In appeal by a special leave, a two-fold question was raised before the Supreme Court, as to whether the bank was entitled to deduct the wages of the workmen, for the period of the strike, and further, whether the bank was entitled to deduct wages for the whole day or pro-rata only for the hours for which the employees had struck work. However, the question as whether the strike was legal or illegal and whether it was justified or unjustified, was not raised in this case. In short, the only question debated before the Supreme Court was whether, even assuming that the strike was legal, the bank was entitled to deduct wages, as it purported to do under the circular in question. Answering this question, the court held that the legality or illegality of the strike had nothing to do with the liability for a deduction of the wages and even if the strike was legal, it did not save the workers from losing the salary for the period of the strike. Therefore, both legal as well as illegal strikes invite a deduction of the wages, on the principle that 'whoever voluntarily refrains from doing work when it is offered to him, is not entitled for a payment for work he has not done'. In other words, the court upheld the doctrine of 'no work, no pay'.[15]

In the Umesh Naik (supra), certain settlements were entered into between the union of the workmen and the management of the bank, under s 2(p), read with s 18(1) of the Act, under which the employees of the bank were entitled to certain advantages with retrospective effect. The bank, however, did not forward the copies of the memorandum of settlements to the authorities, as required by r 58(4) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. The settlements, therefore, were not implemented by the bank, on the plea that the implementation of the settlements, giving the extra benefits to the workmen, required the government's approval, which was in process. The union on the other hand, contended that the settlements were signed without any pre-condition that they were to be cleared by the government. Since the matter was becoming a stalemate, the union issued a strike notice to the bank, demanding an immediate implementation of the settlements and the payment of the arrears of pay and allowances, pursuant to them. Though there was no formal strike notice in terms of s 22 of the Act, on the basis of a copy of the notice given by the union to the bank, the Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner & Conciliation Officer (Central), wrote to both the parties, informing them that he would be holding conciliation proceedings under s 12 of the Act and required them to attend the conciliation proceedings, along with a statement of the case, in terms of r 41 (a) of the Rules. After a few meetings, the conciliation officer found that there was no meeting ground and no settlement could be arrived at. However, he kept the proceedings alive by stating that, in order to explore the possibility of bringing about an understanding in the matter, he would hold further discussions. As the employees felt that the possibility of the implementation of the settlements was not in sight, their union gave a letter to the conciliation officer, requesting him to treat the conciliation proceedings as closed. But the conciliation officer still decided to keep the proceedings open, with a view to explore the possibility of resolving the matter amicably. Subsequently, on 18 October 1989, the bank issued a circular notice, stating, inter alia, that it would deduct salary for the days the employees go on a strike, on the principle of 'no work, no pay'. In spite of the circular, the employees went on a strike, on a 16 October 1989 and filed a writ petition in the High Court for quashing the circular threatening to deduct the salary for the days of the strike. The High Court, quashed the circular dated 18 October 1989, relying on the holding in Churakulam and held that the workmen were entitled to wages for the strike period, as the strike was legal and justified. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court set aside the decision of the High Court, holding that the decision of the High Court, with respect to the legality, as well as the justifiability of the strike, was erroneous, being beyond the writ jurisdiction of the High Court, since the jurisdiction to decide the questions of fact involved in these issues, was properly vested in the industrial adjudicator. The court, therefore, directed the government to refer the dispute with regard to a deductions of wages, for adjudication, to the appropriate authority under the Act.[16] In The Statesman, the workmen had resorted to an illegal strike, following which, the management had declared a lockout and thus, the declaration of the lockout was 'legal'. However, in view of the unreasonable attitude adopted by the management in continuing the lockout, the tribunal held that the blame for the 'strike' and the 'lockout', had to be apportioned between both the sides and accordingly, ordered the payment of half wages for the period of the lockout. Affirming the award of the tribunal, Krishna Iyer J, stated the law in the following words:

> If the strike is illegal, wages during the period will ordinarily be negatived, unless considerate circumstances constrain a different course. Likewise, if the lockout is illegal, full wages for the closure period shall have to be 'forked out', if one may use that expression. But in between, lies a grey area of twilight law. Strictly speaking, the whole field is left to the judicious discretion of the tribunal. Where the strike is illegal and the sequel of a lockout, legal, we have to view the whole course of the developments and not stop with examining the initial legitimacy. If one side or the other behaves unreasonably or the overall interests of good industrial relations warrant the tribunal making such directions regarding strike period wages, as will meet with justice, fair play and pragmatic wisdom, there is no error in doing so. His power is flexible. [17]

The purport of these observations is that the mere fact that a strike or a lockout, at the commencement, was legal, but the subsequent events or conduct of the parties renders the strike or the lockout, illegal or unjustified, will expose the situation to judicial scrutiny and the discretion of the adjudicator. In none of these cases, except in TS Kelawala, the court has adverted to the statutory language of the definitions of 'strike' and 'wages'. Even in this case, though the court did refer to the language of these definitions and observed that:

> ...reading the two definitions together, it is clear that wages are payable only if the contract of employment is fulfilled and not otherwise, and when the workers do not put in the allotted hours of work, or refuse to do it, they would not be entitled to the wages proportionately.

It still went into the irrelevant question of the justifiability or unjustifiability of the strike. 'Strike' has been defined in s 2(q) of the Act, which reads:

> Strike' means a cessation of work by a body of persons employed in any industry, acting in combination, or a concerted refusal, or a refusal under a common understanding of any number of persons, who are or have been so employed, to continue to work or to accept employment.

And the term 'wages' has been defined in s 2(rr) which, omitting the surplus words, reads:

> 'Wages' means all remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of employment, expressed or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to a workman in respect of his employment or of work done in such employment...

In other words, if, for a certain period of time, a workman does not fulfil the expressed or implied terms of his contract of employment, or does no work, no remuneration will be payable to him for that period, in respect of his employment, in terms of the definition of 'wages'. Thus, in this definition, the legislature has unequivocally incorporated the doctrine of 'no work, no pay'. When the workmen go on strike, they cease to work, refuse to continue to work or to accept employment. Therefore, they wantonly fail to fulfil the terms of the contract of employment. From a juxtaposition of these definitions of 'wages' and 'strike', the conclusion that the workmen, who go on a strike, are not entitled to wages for the period of the strike, is inescapable. On the clear and unambiguous language of the statute, the questions of legality or illegality, or justifiability or unjustifiability of the 'strike' are irrelevant. Likewise, in the case of a 'lockout', the question of its legality or illegality or justifiability or unjustifiability are also irrelevant. In view of the plain language of the definition of a 'lockout' in s 2(1), an employer who declares a 'lockout', is liable to pay wages to the workmen for the period of the 'lockout', because he disables them to fulfil the terms of the contract of employment, by closing the place of employment.[18] Therefore, while going into these questions, the court side-stepped the statute and strayed into the prohibited area of judicial legislation. In this connection, the holding of a single judge of the Calcutta High Court, in Algemene Bank, is relevant, where, on the construction and application of the expression 'wages', in the Payment of Wages Act, Sabyasachi Mukherji J, stated that the definition '...in express terms, mentions as remuneration, that which would have been payable, if the terms of the employment were fulfilled and one of the main terms of employment, undoubtedly, in the instant case, is that the employee would work for a specified period of work during the working hours'. Therefore, 'if the employee does not work for a specified period of work, then the remuneration would not be payable'. Even under the general law of contract, an employee who does not perform the work required of him, under the contract, will not be entitled to wages foot such period, because of a failure of the consideration. Referring to the dictum of Lord

Denning to the effect:wages are to be paid for services rendered, not for producing deliberate chaos,[19] Sabyasachi Mukherjee J observed:

> The right of the employees to get remuneration depends upon the performance of his work during the period of employment. If there is any failure of that consideration, then taking a strict view of the matter, the employer is entitled to refuse any payment at all.[20]

In the cases discussed hereinabove, the attention of the Supreme Court does not appear to have been drawn to this holding of the Calcutta High Court. In Swastik Textiles,[21] the facts were: the workmen went on a strike for some days, after which they called off the strike. But when they returned to work, they were not allowed to resume duty by the management, unless they gave a statement in writing, as required by the management. The statement contained an admission of having participated in the illegal strike and also required the workmen to seek pardon of the management and give an undertaking that they would not question the validity of any penalty that the management may decide to impose upon them for participating in the illegal strike. It further contained an assurance that the workmen would not indulge in a similar misconduct in the future. On the refusal of the workmen to give the statement, the management did not permit them to resume their duty for a period of about two months from the date of their having called off the strike. In the adjudication proceedings arising out of the dispute relating to the wages for this period, the tribunal held that the action of the management, refusing to permit the workmen to resume their duty, was not justified. Hence, the workmen were entitled to the wages for the period in question. The Division Bench, in a writ petition filed against the award of the tribunal, upheld the validity of the direction given by the tribunal. Following the decision of the Apex Court in Umesh Naik (supra), a single judge of the Madras High Court held that a strike by workmen during the pendency of conciliation proceedings, is illegal, warranting a deduction of the wages for the days of such illegal strike. In Neyveli Lignite Corpn, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the mere issuing of a strike notice would not confer the right to wages, and that, in order to claim wages, the workmen should show that, the strike was not only legal, but also justified.[22] Apparently, these decisions are based on the ratio evolved by Sawant J, in Umesh Naik and TS Kelawala. These two decisions merit some detailed analysis in the context of a pioneering decision given by a Constitution Bench in IGN Rly. In Umesh Naik, Sawant J observed:

> We may now refer to...Kelawala's case,[23]...Since it was not the case of the employees, that the strike was justified, neither arguments were advanced on that basis, nor were the aforesaid earlier decisions cited before the court. There is, therefore, nothing in the decisions of this court in Churakulam Tea Estate,[24] and Crompton Greaves cases,[25]...or the other earlier decisions cited above, which is contrary to the view taken in TS Kelawala. What is held in the said decisions is that to entitle the workmen to the wages for the strike period, the strike has both to be legal and justified. We, therefore, hold, endorsing the view taken in TS Kelawala, that the workers are not entitled to wages for the strike-period, even if the strike is legal. To be entitled to the wages for the strike period, the strike has to be both legal and justified...[26] (,).

As was rightly pointed out by Sinha CJI, in India General Navigation (IGN) and Rly Co Ltd, the justifiability or unjustifiability of the strike, has no relevance to a strike under the Act, and the concept of 'justifiability of a strike' is wholly foreign and unknown to industrial law. How does it matter whether or not any argument was advanced in Kelawala in support of the justifiability of an illegal strike, which, going by the binding ratio of IGN Railway, cannot, at any rate, be held to be justified, because of a prima facie violation of ss 22 and 23 of the IDA? Sawant J, then went on to observe that there was nothing in Churakulam and Crompton Greaves, that was contrary to the view taken by him in Kelawala. This observation is wrong on facts. Indeed, Sawant J, by his decision in Kelawala, tacitly reversed not only Churakulam and Crompton Greaves, but also Gujarat Steel Tubes,[27] at one stroke, and rightly so. In Kelawala, he clearly held that no wages were payable in the case of a strike, whether it was legal or illegal, which is not the same thing as the ratio of Cromptom Greaves and Gujarat Steel Tubes, which propounded in terms: in order to be entitled to wages, the strike should be both legal and justified.' In the face of a line of reasoning that proceeded so spectacularly in the opposite direction, the further observation of Sawant J, that 'there was nothing contrary in Kelawala' is intriguing. Reverting to his later decision in Umesh Naik, it is significant to note the relevant portion of his observation:

> We, therefore, hold, endorsing the view taken in TS Kelawala that the workers are not entitled to wages for the strike period, even if the strike is legal. To be entitled to the wages for the strike-period, the strike has to be both legal and justified...

The second part of the above statement is inconsistent with the first. In Kelawala, it was clearly held: 'There should not be any confusion between the strike as a legitimate weapon and the liability of deduction of wages incurred on account of it, whether the strike is legal or illegal'. If, as per this ratio, the workmen are not entitled to wages for a strike-legal or illegal-then, by no means can that position be reconciled with the later observation in Umesh Naik: 'to be entitled to the wages for the strike period, the strike has to be both legal and justified'. In other words, having virtually struck down Crompton Greaves and Gujarat Steel Tubes by his peremptory observation in Kelawala, Sawant J, endorsed the perverse ratio of Crompton Greaves and Gujarat Steel Tubes, thereby denouncing his own decision in Kelawala, to the contrary. The decision of a single judge in Neyveli Lignite Corporation, is a standing example of the fallout of uncertain and half-hearted rulings of the kind given in Umesh Naik. It is an undeniable fact that Crompton Greaves and Gujarat Steel Tubes were wrongly decided glaringly violating the binding precedent set in IGN Railway, and, therefore, have to be necessarily treated as per incuriam. In the final analysis, out of all these new-generation decisions, handed down by activist judges, Kelawala alone can rightfully claim to be consistent with IGN Rly and with the scheme of the Act, while other decisions, commencing from Churakulam and ending with Umesh Naik, suffer from the vice of judicial caprice, either in whole or in part.

Civil Liability of the Unions

Workmen and their unions are immune under s. 18(1) of the Trade Unions Act 1926, from any civil liability. The fact that a strike is illegal, is immaterial in this connection. The law with respect to the tort of conspiracy, is well-established. The position of law has as declared by Ramaswamy CJ of Patna High Court, as he then was, affirmed by the Supreme Court in Rohtas Industries:

> Conspiracy, as a tort, must arise from a combination of two or more persons doing an act. It would be actionable if the real purpose of the combination is the inflicting of damage on A, as distinguished from serving the bona fide and legitimate interests of those who so combine and there is a resulting damage to A...In the case of a 'mixed motive' or a 'mixed purpose' for the conspiracy, the test is: what is the dominant motive or the dominant purpose of the conspiracy...It is well-established that if there is more than one purpose actuating the combination, the liability must depend on ascertaining, what the pre-dominant purpose is.[28]

On the general issue of strikes, NCL-II observed:

> We also discussed the question, whether any distinction should be made between 'strike' and 'work stoppage' and came to the conclusion that the existing definition of 'strike', in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, may stand, 'Go slow' and 'work to rule' are forms of action which must be regarded as misconduct. Standing Orders and provisions relating to unfair labour practices already include them and provide for action both in the case of 'go slow' and 'work to rule'...There are some industries or services where the effects of industrial action, create situations which threaten the lives and the normal and the essential needs and activities of the vast majority. One's liberty has to be seen in the light of the equal right that everyone else has, to demand and enjoy liberty. Social intervention thus, becomes justified and necessary to protect the interests of all concerned...We, therefore, recommend that in the case of socially essential services, like water supply, medical services, sanitation, electricity and transport, when there is a dispute between employers and employees in an enterprise, and when the dispute is not settled through mutual negotiations, there may be a strike ballot as in other enterprises, and if the strike ballot shows that 51% of workers are in favour of a strike, it should be taken that the strike has taken place, and the dispute must forthwith be referred to compulsory arbitration (by arbitrators from the panel of the Labour Relations Commission (LRC), or arbitrators, agreed to by both sides)...We are recommending the withdrawal of the Essential Services Maintenance Act.[29]

Clause (qq): Trade Union

The expression 'trade union' was not defined in the Act so far. But now, in view of the amendments introduced by the Amending Act 46 of 1982, the term 'trade union' has been defined to mean a 'trade union, registered under the Trade Unions Act 1926'. Section 2(h) of the Trade Unions Act 1926 (16 of 1926), defines a 'trade union' as:

> 'trade union' means any combination, whether temporary or permanent, formed primarily for the purpose of regulating the relations between workmen and employers or between workmen and workmen, or between employers and employers, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, and includes any federation of two or more trade unions:
>
> Provided that this Act shall not affect:
>
> (i) any agreement between partners as to their own business;
>
> (ii) any agreement between an employer and those employed by him, as to such employment; or

(iii) any agreement in consideration of the sale of the goodwill of a business, or for instruction in any profession, trade or handicraft.

Clause (r): TRIBUNAL

The repealed Trade Disputes Act of 1929, did not provide for adjudication of industrial disputes. Hence, there was no provision for the creation or constitution of tribunals. The industrial tribunals, inter alia, were created for the first time, under the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947, in which a 'tribunal' was defined by the original cl (r) of s 2. The definition was amended by the Amending Act of 1957.

Clause (ra): UNFAIR LABOUR PRACTICE

Prior to the amending Act of 1982, though the expression 'unfair labour practice' was generally used in connection with a wrongful termination of the service of a workman, it was not defined in the Act. Nor, judicially, had any meaning been ascribed to it, even while dealing with cases of a wrongful termination of the service as a measure of victimisation or unfair an labour practice. For instance, in HD Singh,[30] the action of the Reserve Bank of India, in striking the name of the workman off its rolls, without giving him any order in writing, either refusing work or informing him that his name would be struck off the rolls, was held to be an act of 'unfair labour practice'. The term 'unfair labour practice' was defined under the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (Act 1 of 1972), to mean practices listed in Schs II, III and IV thereof. The termination of the service of an employee, without issuing a show cause notice or holding a domestic inquiry, has been held to be an act of indulging in an 'unfair trade practice', within the meaning of sub-items (a), (b) and F of item 1 of Sch IV of that Act.[31] Now, this clause has been inserted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982, which defines an 'unfair labour practice' to mean any of the practices specified in the Fifth Schedule. The Fifth Schedule enumerates the unfair labour practices: (i) on the part of the employers and trade unions of employers and (ii) on the part of workmen and trade unions of workmen. Chapter VC has also been inserted by the same Amending Act. Section 25T of this chapter, prohibits an 'unfair labour practice', while s 25U prescribes the penalty for committing an unfair labour practice. After these amendments, to employ workmen as casuals and continue them as such for years, with the object of depriving them of the status and privilege of permanent workmen, has been held to be an unfair labour practice, falling within the purview of item 10 of para (1) of the Fifth Schedule of the Act.[32]

In P Rajeev, the Karnataka High Court pointed out that the object behind a particular order of appointment, has to be examined to find out whether it is an unfair labour practice. Since mala fide is an essential ingredient of item 10 of the Fifth Schedule, mala fides have to be alleged and proved. In the absence of such an allegation or proof, it is not possible to stigmatise a particular mode of appointment as an unfair labour practice. Such oblique motive on the part of the employer, cannot be inferred, merely because appointments were made for temporary periods and the employees were continued in service temporarily, from time to time.[33] In Assn of SRT Undertakings, the union held violent demonstrations and staged dharnas at the residences of senior officers and also abused and assaulted some senior executives of the employer and threatened them with dire consequences. In this situation, the employer instituted a suit for certain perpetual injunctions. A single judge of the Delhi High Court held that, in view of the provisions of item 2(b) of Pt II of the Fifth Schedule, the workmen had indulged in an 'unfair labour practice', and therefore, the employer was entitled to the grant of the perpetual injunctions.[34] On the issue of terming an action as an unfair labour practice, the Supreme Court in Raja Ram, held:

> ...before an action can be termed as an unfair labour practice it would be necessary for the Labour Court to come to a conclusion that the badlis, casuals and temporary workmen had been continued for years as badlis, casuals or temporary workmen, with the object of depriving them of the status and privileges of permanent workmen. To this has been added the judicial gloss that artificial breaks in the service of such workmen would not allow the employer to avoid a charge of unfair labour practice. However, it is the continuity of service of workmen over a period of years which is frowned upon. Besides, it needs to be emphasized that for the practice to amount to unfair labour practice it must be found that the workmen had been retained on a casual or temporary basis with the object of depriving the workman of the status and privileges of a permanent workman. There is no such finding in this case. Therefore, Item 10 in List I of the Fifth Schedule to the Act cannot be said to apply at all to the respondent's case and the Labour Court erred in coming to the conclusion that the respondent was in the circumstances, likely to acquire the status of a permanent employee.[35] (Italics supplied).

Applying the above principle to a case with a similar set of facts involving the same employer, Ms Ruma Pal J, while setting aside the award of the tribunal as well as the order of the High Court, held that in the light of the fact that no finding to the effect that the practice amounted to unfair labour practice was recorded by the tribunal, the conclusion reached by it that the Bank had committed an unfair labour practice was not tenable.[36] In Hindustan Lever, the facts briefly were: the service of a workman who was engaged as a casual clerk was terminated giving rise to a complaint by the workman alleging unfair labour practice against the management by engaging him on casual basis for four years with an intention to deprive him of the status and privileges of a permanent workman. The tribunal held that the employer had committed an unfair labour practice under s 2(ra) read with Item 10 of Sch V. Quashing the award, Rajesh Kumar J of Allahabad High Court held that the workman did not worked for 240 days in the preceding year, nor could he discharge the burden of proving that the management was guilty of any unfair labour practice.[37]

Clause (rb): VILLAGE INDUSTRIES

Since the Amending Act 46 of 1982, refers to village industries at several places, therefore, it became necessary to define 'village industries'. Accordingly, by this clause, the expression 'village industries' has been given the same meaning as assigned to it in cl (b) of s 2 of the Khadi and Village Industries Commission Act 1956, which reads:

> 'Village Industries' means all or any of the industries specified in the schedule and includes any other industry deemed to be specified in the schedule, by reason of a notification under section 3.

Clause (rr): WAGES

Etymologically, the term 'wages' means an 'amount paid periodically, especially by the date or week or the month or time during which the workman or servant is at the employer's disposal'. Webster's Third New International Dictionary defines 'wages' as a 'pledge of payment of monetary remuneration by an employer, for labour or services, according to the contract or on an hourly, daily or piece-work basis and often including bonuses, commission and amounts paid by the employer for insurance, pensions, hospitalisation and other benefits especially; such remuneration is paid to skilled or unskilled labour'. In the language of law, 'wage' is the consideration for the work done by an employee for his employer, paid periodically. Section 2(s) of the Act postulates that industrial employment, to do any skilled or unskilled, manual, supervisory, technical or clerical work, is for 'hire or reward'. It is this 'hire or reward,' which forms the subject-matter of 'wages' of an industrial employee.

Components of Wages

The definition of 'wages' is in three parts. The first part defines 'wages' as 'all remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money, which would, if the terms of employment, expressed or implied, were fulfilled, be payable to workman in respect of his employment or work done in such employment'. This is the denotation of the term 'wages', or what it denotes. The second part is designed to include something more than what the term primarily denotes. This part gives an extended connotation, by including certain payments, allowances and amenities, in the ambit of the definition. The third part of the definition excludes three types of payments made by the employer, viz, (i) bonuses; (ii) contribution towards pension or provident funds or for any other benefit of a workman, under the law for the time being in force; and (iii) gratuity payable on the termination of the service of a workman. The NCL-II recommended the bifurcation of the terms 'wages' and 'remuneration' and redefining them separately: the term 'wages' to include only basic wages and dearness allowance and no other allowance; and 'remuneration' to include all other payments, including other allowances as well as overtime payment, together with wages.[38]

(i) Remuneration

Remuneration is a more formal version of 'payment'. It means to recompense by paying an equivalent for a service. In other words, remuneration is a return for the services rendered. The definition, however, postulates that the remuneration must be 'capable of being expressed in terms of money', payable to a workman, in respect of his employment or for the work done in such employment.[39] Any amount paid to a workman by way of remuneration, must be in respect of his employment or work done by him. In Bennett Coleman, the car allowance and the benefit of a free telephone and newspaper, given to the workman, were held not to be covered by the word 'remuneration' as used in the first part of the definition, because they were not restricted to the employment or the work of the workman as a special correspondent and were not fixed after taking into consideration, the expenses which he would have ordinarily to incur in connection with his employment, or the work done in such employment.[40] The definition expressly states that the remuneration in respect of the employment or for the work done, would be payable to a workman only when he has fulfilled the express or implied terms of the contract of his employment. Hence, if the express or implied terms of the contract of employment are not fulfilled by the workman, he would not be entitled to remuneration. The contract of employment has many express and implied terms. Non-fulfilment of such terms would disentitle the workmen to claim remuneration. The pivotal term of employment of a workman in an industry, is to do 'any skilled or unskilled, manual, supervisory, technical or clerical work'. If a workman absents from work or having come to work, does not perform the duties assigned to him and thus, fails to do the work for which he was employed, he may be disentitled from claiming 'remuneration'. On the same principle, workmen who go on a strike, pursuant to their demands, would not be entitled to the remuneration for the strike period. Though, going on a legal strike, may be a legitimate right of the workmen, in the process of collective bargaining, yet, they cannot be, simultaneously, on strike and fulfilling the terms of their employment.[41] Such a claim, therefore, will not be comprehended in the definition of 'wages'. Any such claim, therefore, would be de hors the Act itself.

(ii) Basic wage and Allowance

The expression 'basic wage' has not been defined in the Act, though the concept of 'basic wage' is relevant for fixing the wage-structure. The adjectival 'basic' means, what is normally allowable to all-irrespective of special claims. The phrase 'basic wage' is also ordinarily understood to mean that part of the price of labour, which the employer must pay to all workmen, belonging to all categories. The phrase is used ordinarily, in contradistinction to allowance-the quantum of which may very in different contingencies. The 'basic wage', therefore, does not include additional emoluments, which some workmen may earn on the basis of a system of bonuses, related to the production. The quantum of the earnings from such bonuses, varies from individual, to individual according to their efficiency and diligence; it will vary sometimes from season to season, with the variation in the working conditions in the establishment; it will also vary with variations in the rate of supply of raw materials or with the assistance obtainable from machinery. This element of variation excludes the additional emoluments from the connotation of the 'basic wage'.[42]

Allowances Included in the Definition

All allowances, including dearness allowance, to which a workman, at the relevant time, is entitled, have been brought within the definition of wages, by the including part. Such allowances may be discussed under different heads, as appearing in the definition itself.

Sub-clause (i) -General Allowances

As fringe benefits of industrial employment, employers pay various sorts of allowances to their workmen, depending upon the nature of their duties and other incidents of the employment. Such allowances have been taken in the definition of wages, by the inclusive part. Quite a few of these allowances are discussed below illustratively.

(i) Tiffin Allowance:

Commercial or industrial concerns, with a view to ensure efficiency and to economise time, sometimes provide free tiffin facilities to their employees. In certain industries and regions, it has become customary and an implied condition of service. In Mc Leod, the company was supplying free tiffins, ie, two cups of tea and two biscuits to each of the members of their clerical staff and one cup of tea and one biscuit each, to the members of the subordinate staff. On the ground that the tiffin arrangement was not satisfactory, the workmen demanded a cash allowance in lieu of the tiffin arrangements. Most of the comparable concerns in the same region, were also supplying free tiffins to their employees. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of the tribunal, directing the employer to pay the clerical staff and the subordinate staff, at the rate of eight annas and six annas respectively, on all working days, in lieu of the tiffin, holding that the tiffin arrangement was an implied condition of service, in addition to the wages and dearness allowance and it was an amenity to which the employees were entitled, as a matter of right.[43] But in a somewhat different situation, in River Navigation, the court affirmed the award of the tribunal, rejecting the demand of the employees of the company, working at the ghats, that the tiffin as provided to similar workmen in their head office, should be paid to them. The tribunal rejected the demand because:

(i) the expenditure of the workmen on account of tiffin, was theoretically, included in the wage structure;

(ii) the companies which were the constituent members of the Bengal Chambers of Commerce, provided a tiffin allowance to the employees posted only at the head office;

(iii) providing for tiffin was only an act of generosity;

(iv) the company had set up canteens at the branch offices, on a 'no-profit no-loss' basis, where the workmen could obtain food at a rate cheaper than the market rate; and

(v) the supply of free tiffin to all workmen in the ghat area would cost the company a sum of Rs 3,35,000. The court observed that the fact that the company had set up a canteen, wherein workmen obtained food at cheap rates, was in itself, a reasonable amenity in the matter of providing food for the employees. It was observed that the mere fact that the company was providing, in addition, tiffin to the workmen in the head office, could not itself be a ground to hold that the company should do likewise for the employees at the branch offices as well. [44]

In Remington Rand, the industrial tribunal awarded an enhanced rate of lunch allowance, with the direction that such allowance should be paid to all the workmen employed in the Bangalore branch. In making these directions, the tribunal was influenced by the financial capacity of the employer company to pay, the existence of such allowance in some other companies, and the discrimination between the workmen employed in Calcutta and Delhi on the one hand and in the Bangalore office, on the other. But in appeal, the Supreme Court noticed that the finding of the tribunal, that there was a lunch allowance in existence in other similar concerns in Bangalore, was not based on any evidence. Regarding the financial capacity, the court observed that the mere fact that the establishment has the capacity to bear an additional burden of a lunch allowance, would, by itself, be no ground for conceding to the demand, if it is not justified, especially when the wage-structure prevailing in the employer company was undisputably fair and the dearness allowance paid to the workmen, had been linked with the index of cost of living, which took care of the rise in the of cost living from time to time. It was, therefore, held that if the company were to be compelled to pay a lunch allowance to all the workmen, including those who worked at the Bangalore office, it would, in fact, mean a double provision for the constituent of the cost of food, which was already provided for in the wage-scales and the rates of dearness allowance. The holding of the tribunal regarding discrimination, was buttressed by the plea on behalf of the workmen, that the principle of industry-cum region should not be applied to the lunch allowance with the same rigidity as it is applied in the adjudication of wage-scales and dearness allowance; which was also discountenanced by the court, with the observation that it would mean 'cutting holes in a principle which industrial adjudication has, for a number of years, accepted and which has lent a certain amount of uniformity in a field where problems have to be resolved on a pragmatic approach'. Following the rule in River Navigation (supra), the award directing the payment of lunch allowance, was set aside.[45]

In a connected appeal,[46] the tribunal, on a consideration of the minimum expenses incurred by a workman while being on duty, away from his place of residence, did away with the graded scale of batha prevailing in the company and introduced a uniform scale at the rate of Rs 10 per day, to all those drawing up to Rs 500 per month and also drew an elaborate scheme to make a provision against a workman falling ill while on an out-station duty. The Supreme Court set aside this award, holding that the tribunal had gone beyond the usual concept of batha, as the award of Rs 10 per day did not take into account the normal expenses that the workman would incur, if he were at the headquarters. The court itself adopted the rates prevailing at the Madras office of the company. In Statesman, there were two canteens—one for officers and the other for the subordinate staff. The staff of the officers' canteen was getting a dietary allowance of 50 paise, while the staff of the subordinate staff canteen was not getting a similar allowance. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of the tribunal, granting the same allowance to the staff of the subordinate staff canteen as well, with the condition that if they take free food from the canteen, they would become ineligible for the allowance, since they could not have both.[47]

(ii) Running Allowance:

In Calcutta Port Commrs, the workmen of the Calcutta Port Trust Railways, claimed a running allowance, payable to the 'running staff of the state railway, performing comparable duties' and also demanded free passes and PTOS on the lines admissible to the employees of the state railways. The tribunal rejected both the claims. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court observed that these allowances and facilities were not available to the employees of the port trust railways, as their service in all material respects, could not be compared with that of the employees of the state railway, because the work performed by them was not substantially the same or of similar nature, as the work of the state railway employees. After comparing various incidents of both the services, the court held that the tribunal was justified in not acceding to the demand for the running allowance. Likewise, on comparing the incidents of the facilities of PTOS given to the employees of the state railways, the court held that the employees of the port trust railways were not entitled to them.[48]

(iii) Clothing and Uniform Allowance:

In Chandramalai Estate, the tea plantation estate had been paying a clothing allowance to their workmen for a number of years, which had become an implied condition of service. On the employer's stopping the payment of this allowance, the workmen raised an industrial dispute and the tribunal awarded the payment of the clothing allowance. The award was affirmed by the Supreme Court, with the observation that such allowance having become a condition of service, could not be refused on the ground that the workmen did not raise any dispute when the allowance was stopped.[49] In DCM Chemical Works on the consideration of certain facts, the tribunal awarded the supply of uniforms by the employer, to a certain category of workmen and that, in addition to the uniforms, the persons entitled to the uniforms, should also be given protective equipment. In appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the award of the tribunal with respect to the supply of uniforms, but it set aside the award with respect to the protective equipment, because the tribunal had overlooked the difference between the uniforms and protective equipment which was provided under the Delhi Factory Rules, for a certain category of workmen, and not to all to whom uniforms were to be supplied. The protective equipment was to be given for certain purposes specified in the rules and had no connection with the uniforms, which the employer company was ordered to supply to its workmen, for reasons entirely different.[50] In Remington Rand, the union demanded that the employer should provide, for all its subordinate staff and mechanics, four sets of uniforms per year or pay them the cost thereof, on the ground that the nature of the work done by them was such that their dresses got dirty. But the management had, in the course of negotiations, offered aprons to the mechanics, which was not accepted by them on the ground that they would not give them complete protection. The company had been giving two sets of uniforms to the peons and drivers. In the circumstances, the tribunal directed that if the dresses worn by the mechanics got dirty during the course of employment, the management should provide such number of sets of uniforms 'as it deems fit under the circumstances'. This direction was affirmed by the Supreme Court in appeal.[51] In Kirloskar Electric Co, the company had been giving uniforms to its watchmen, drivers, sweepers and canteen workers and such other workmen who were to be provided with protective clothing under the Factories Act and the rules framed thereunder. The workmen demanded that all workers should be provided with a pair of uniforms and a pair of shoes every year. The award of the tribunal, that uniforms should be supplied to certain other categories of workers as well, was affirmed by the Supreme Court in view of the relevant evidence and the additional financial burden involved in supplying the uniforms.[52] In Statesman, the employer used to supply warm coats to gate darwans and inspectors, but did not extend this facility to other darwans and delivery peons. The Supreme Court upheld the award of the industrial tribunal, directing that 'all the members of the subordinate staff should be supplied with warm coats', while rejecting the claim for warm jerseys over and above the warm coats.[53]

(iv) Retaining Allowance for Off-season:

The question as to whether retaining allowance should be paid to seasonal workers during the off-season, has been discussed by many committees, constituted by the Uttar Pradesh Government, for this purpose. The divergent views expressed by these committees made the problem quite complex, by further confounding the confusion. The question was considered by the Supreme Court in Rohtas Sugar Ltd v Mazdoor Seva Sangh. [54] After considering the various aspects of the matter, Das Gupta J, observed that in deciding, whether on principles of social justice, which it is the aim of industrial adjudication to apply, in order to justify the payment of a retaining allowance to unskilled workmen in these sugar industries, it is necessary to take into account:

(a) the opportunity of alternative employment in the off-season, that will be available to such workmen;

(b) the degree in which such workmen can be said to have become attached to the particular factory where they work;

(c) the likely benefit to the industry; if such workmen are induced to return to the factory, by the incentive of retaining allowance to be paid while the season commences; and

(d) the capacity of the industry to bear the burden of a retaining allowance.

Certain benefits paid to the workmen, if withdrawn by the employer, on the provisions of the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948 being made applicable to the establishment, to the admissible extent, would give rise to an industrial dispute, as it would be a dispute connected with the 'terms of employment or with the conditions of labour' of the workmen. Such a dispute would be validly referable under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act.[55] For instance, in Nawabganj Sugar, there was an order by the UP government to pay a retaining allowance to the workmen employed in the sugar factories in Uttar Pradesh, which expired in 1950. Even after the expiry of the said order, the sugar factories continued to pay the retaining allowance at a certain rate, to their clerks, for the off-season. The employer company had also been paying the retaining allowance to its clerks for about five years after the expiry of the order of the government. But for the off-seasons 1954-59, the company paid the retaining allowance only to some of its clerks, while denying the same to the others. The tribunal directed the company to pay to the concerned workmen, the same retaining allowance as was paid to the others. In appeal, the company could not explain to the Supreme Court as to how and why it paid the retaining allowance to half of the seasonal clerks and not to the others. It was therefore, held that, in view of the facts of the case, and the practice followed by the other factories in the neighbourhood, the company could not make any distinction in the payment of the retaining allowance, by paying it to some of its clerks and denying it to others.[56]

(v) Over-time Allowance:

Section 59 of the Factories Act 1948, prescribes that a worker who works over-time in a factory, shall be entitled to twice his ordinary rate of wages in respect of the over-time work. And for the purposes of calculating such over-time, the expression 'ordinary rate of wages' has been defined to mean the basic wage, plus such allowances, including the cash equivalent of the advantage accruing on account of the concessional sale to workers of food grain and other articles, as the worker is, for the time being, entitled to, but does not include a bonus. Section 33 of the Mines Act 1952 is in similar terms. This provision specifically includes the dearness allowances in the definition of 'ordinary rate of wages'. For workers working in factories and mines, the rates of over-time have been fixed by relevant statutes. In Delhi Cloth Mills, the power-plant operators of the mill claimed extra remuneration for having to forego half an hour's rest interval, which, in substance, was a claim for an over-time payment. The industrial tribunal made a rather startling observation, that these operators were working continuously for eight-and-a-half hours in a day. But this could not be possible, as there were three shifts working in the mill. The employer's case was that the wages were fixed in accordance to the fact that in view of the nature of their work, they would be working for eight hours at a stretch, without the half hour's interval admissible to the other workmen. On the basis of the evidence on record, the Supreme Court held that the power plant operators were not entitled to any extra remuneration for having to forego the half-hour rest interval.[57]

In their respective Shops and Establishments Acts, 'some states have prescribed the rates of overtime work and the overtime allowance is paid in accordance with the provisions of these statutes. Some such statutes even extend the provisions of the Factories Act to certain establishments. For instance, s 70 of the Bombay Shops and Establishments Act extends the provisions of the Factories Act beyond its usual scope and further provides that where the Act, as extended, applies, the Shops and Establishment Act would not apply, except to a shop or establishment situated within the premises of a factory; and it further enables the state government to extend the provisions of the Factories Act to any such shop or commercial establishment, situated within the precincts of the factory. The effect of this provision is to supplement the provisions of the Factories Act, by extending them to those persons who are employed in a factory, though they are not 'workers' within the meaning of s 2(1) of the Factories Act 1948.[58] But the Shops & Establishments Acts of certain states do not prescribe the rates of overtime work which the workmen may have to do. The question, therefore, of the fixation of overtime rates in such cases, is left to industrial adjudication. In Karam Chand Thapar, the Supreme Court stated the following principles for fixing the overtime allowance:

(i) Overtime allowance should have relation to the total wage packet, viz, basic wage plus dearness allowance.

(ii) It should be fixed on a consideration of the financial capacity of the company.

(iii) It should also be fixed in consonance with the practice prevalent in other concerns in the neighbourhood. [59]

Accordingly, the court affirmed the award of the tribunal, fixing the overtime allowance at one-fourth times the wages, viz, the basic wage plus the dearness allowance, in respect of the workmen working at the head office of the company, at Calcutta. In another decision pronounced on the same day, ie, Jessop & Co, the court fixed the over-time allowance in case of another company, having its head office at Calcutta, at one-half times the ordinary rate of wages, ie, the basic wage plus the dearness allowance.[60] In Indian Oxygen, the tribunal, after taking into consideration the overtime paid by other industrial concerns in the region, awarded one-fourth times the ordinary wages, for overtime work exceeding 39 hours a week, but not exceeding 48 hours and in cases where the work exceeded 48 hours, (48 hours of work being the maximum, provided by the Bihar Shops and Establishments Act) at the rate of double the ordinary rates of wages, as provided in the Act. The employer company challenged the award of the tribunal before the Supreme Court, on the ground that:

(i) the company's factory at Jamshedpur, having been declared an establishment under the Bihar Shops and Establishments Act, could be made liable to pay for overtime work at the rate provided in that Act, viz, at double the ordinary rate when a workman was asked to work beyond 48 hours per week, as provided therein, but it could not be asked to pay more than its ordinary rate of wages, payable to workmen, if they were asked to work beyond 39 hours, but less than 48 hours; and

(ii) the comparative statement of the overtime rates paid by other concerns in Jamshedpur, before the tribunal, showed that if the company were made to pay one-fourth times its ordinary rate of wages, it would, in the light of the higher scales of wages, be paying more than the other concerns.

The court observed that in view of the fact that the total hours of work per week were 39 hours, under the conditions of service of the company, the workmen asked to work beyond those hours, would obviously be working overtime and the company would be expected to pay them compensation for such overtime work. The Bihar Shops and Establishments Act, therefore, had no relevance to this question, as that Act fixed the maximum number of hours of work allowable thereunder, ie, 48 hours a week, and provided for double the rate of the ordinary wages, for work being done after the 48 hours. It was not, therefore, as if the provisions of the Act governed the overtime payments, payable by the employer, where the maximum hours of work were governed by the conditions of service prevailing in his establishment. If the company were asked to pay at the rate equivalent to the ordinary rate of wages, for the work done beyond 39 hours, but not exceeding 48 hours work a week, it would be paying no extra compensation at all, for the work done beyond the agreed hours of work, and it would mean that the working hours would indirectly be increased, consequently altering the conditions of service. On this view of the matter, the court affirmed the award of the tribunal, as it was made after taking into consideration, the comparatively higher scales of wages prevalent in the company.[61]

In Calcutta Electric Supply Corpn, the tribunal directed that the overtime rate for non-factory personnel should, in no case, be less than the time-rate. And no employee should get an overtime at more than the time-rate, until he had completed 48 hours a week, but as soon as he exceeded 48 hours, the overtime should be one-half times the time-rate. This rate of overtime wage, in favour of non-factory personnel, was directed to be given effect from the date of the reference. The workman challenged this award in appeal before the Supreme Court, in so far as the tribunal had limited the overtime wages to the time-rate, for any period short of 48 hours a week. The court held that it was inclined to admit the appeal and set aside the award of the tribunal and to direct that overtime should be paid at one-half times the hourly rate, for all hours of work beyond the scheduled hours and not merely for hours of work beyond 48 hours in a week and this had to apply from the date of the order of the court. However, in view of the heavy financial burden of the retrospective effect of the proposed increase of overtime wages and in view of the further delay involved in the remand of the case, for ascertaining the financial capacity of the company, the parties agreed to a suggestion of the court, that in respect of the overtime period for hours worked in excess of the scheduled hours, up to 48 hours, should be one-half times the hourly rate, instead of the hourly rate, which the company had already paid in terms of the award.[62]

(vi) Compensatory Allowance:

The adjectival expression—'compensatory'—used in the phrase 'compensatory allowance', is indicative of the fact that such an allowance is a compensation for something. For instance, the allowance paid to the workmen, for the work done on holidays, has been treated as a compensatory allowance. Likewise, an allowance paid in lieu of any benefit, to which the workmen, for the time being, are entitled, would fall within the ambit of such an allowance. Compensatory allowance and other allowances have been included as item two in the Third Schedule to the Industrial Disputes Act. In Shaparia Dock & Steel, the labour appellate tribunal awarded a compensatory allowance to the daily-rated workmen. Timely-rated workmen were given twice their normal rates of wages, for work on weekly rest days and holidays, provided that where a worker was given an alternative day of rest in place of the weekly day of rest, the extra payment for him was fixed only at half the normal wage. As regards the watchmen, on the facts of the case, the tribunal directed that they should also get emoluments, equal to that of the daily-rated workers.[63]

(vii) Acting Allowance:

Acting allowance is the allowance paid to an employee when he is acting in a higher post, on the employee holding the higher post proceeding on leave or otherwise, being away from his duties. The recognised principle with respect to acting allowance is that the acting incumbent will get an acting allowance equivalent to the difference between his salary and the minimum salary of the higher post in which he is acting, subject to a maximum of 25 percent of the incumbent's basic salary. In Burn & Co, the employer was following this rule. But adjudicating on an industrial dispute, regarding a revision of the acting allowance, the tribunal awarded the difference between the actual pay of the incumbent and the actual pay of the person in whose place the incumbent employee acted, subject to a maximum of 25 per cent of his basic salary. The tribunal did not alter the existing rules, but in modifying the rules regarding the acting allowance, it took the view that the acting man does practically the same work as was done by the person for whom he was acting and the company derives benefit from his work. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the order of the tribunal in this respect, as it was inconsistent with the recognised principle in respect of the fixing of the acting allowance.[64]

(viii) Special Allowance:

A special allowance may be granted to the workmen, in view of certain special circumstances peculiar to a situation or where they have to run some special risk. For instance, a special allowance in banks is paid in terms of the Shastri and Desai awards, when an employee discharges duties of a supervisory nature or is accorded the status of a person competent to discharge functions of a supervisory character. In VABhide, dealing with the claims of the employees, for the payment of a special allowance, granted to the supervisors under the Shastri and Desai awards, the Supreme Court held that before a person can claim the supervisory or special allowance, he must establish that he is discharging duties and functions which are similar to or the same as the duties or functions assigned to supervisors, under those awards.[65] In Reserve Bank of India, the bank gave a special allowance to its officers, to accept a transfer to Gauhati in the North Eastern region. This allowance was available only to such officers as were posted in Gauhati on transfer from areas outside the north eastern region, to mitigate the hardships faced by them on such transfer. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court did not countenance the challenge to the payment of such allowance, to the officers transferred from outside the north eastern region, on the ground of discrimination.[66]

Likewise, in Haroon Rashid, also, the Supreme Court upheld the award of the tribunal. In this case, a special pay of Rs 35 was granted to 10 per cent of the junior accountants. This special pay was not granted to them in lieu of promotion, for having been stagnated in the lower post or grade, but it was granted for handling more complex and important work. Such junior accountants were entitled to this special pay till they were appointed to the next promotional post of senior accountant. It was a kind of an intermediate level of post or grade. Therefore, this special pay had to be taken into account, while fixing their pay on promotion.[67] In Gramphone Co, the sepoys who were entrusted with the work of carrying money from the bank and who were doing duplicating and filing work as well, claimed a special allowance. The award of the tribunal, rejecting the demand, in view of the fact that the office of the company was situated in the heart of the city and not at a long distance from the bank and the sepoys carrying money, did not carry any risk and the duty of bringing money from the bank was not strenuous as compared to any other duty usually allotted to the sepoys, and that the duplicating and filing work was not of such a nature as to call for any special allowance, was affirmed by the Supreme Court.[68] In SSDhaliwal, certain bank employees claimed a special allowance under the Shastri and Desai Awards and the bipartite settlements. However, these awards specified only the posts which would carry the special allowance and not the duties which carried the special allowance. The Division Bench of the Delhi High Court held that the claims of the employees would require the determination of the question of whether the special allowance went with posts only, or was also payable for discharging certain duties, which could be done on a reference under s 10(1), and not under s 33C(2) of the Act.[69]

---

48 Morgan v Fry [1968] 3 WOR 506, 516, per Lord Denning MR.

49 Andhra Pradesh SRTCE Union v APSRTC 1970 Lab IC 1225, 1226 CAP), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

50 Federated MSCEU of Australia v Melbourne Corpn [1918-19] 26 CLR 508, 552-53 (HCA).

51 Conway v Wade [1909] AC 506, 511 (HL), per Lord Lorwburn LC.

52 Kairbetta Estate v Rajmanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 278 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

53 Gujrat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

54 BR Singh v Union of India 1990 Lab IC 389, 396 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

55 RE Mathew, Labour Relations and the Law, 1953, p 563.

56 Swadeshi Industries Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1960 SC 7], 81 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

57 Syndicate Bank v K Umesh Nayak (1994) 2 LLJ 836, 849 : AIR 195 SC 319 (SC), per Sawant J.

58 Coimbatore PMDPTM Sangam v State of TN (1986) 1 LLJ 303, 305-06 : (1984) 2 MLJ 102 [LNIND 1983 MAD 337] (Mad) (DB), per Gokulakrishnan J.

59 Gwalior Rayons Silk Mfg (Wvg) Co Ltd v Distt Collector 1982 Lab IC 367, 370 (Ker), per TC Menon J.

60 Dorchy v Kanasas 71 L Ed 248.

61 Andhra Pradesh SRTCE Union v APSRTC 1970 Lab IC 1225, 1226 (AP), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

62 Raja Bahadur Motilal Poona Mills v Tukaram P Musale (1957) 1 LLJ 258 [LNIND 1956 SC 88] (SC), per Govinda Menon J.

63 BR Singh v Union of India 1990 Lab IC 389, 396 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

64 Mgmt of Churakulam Tea Estate v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1968 SC 256] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

65 Bank of India v TS Kelawala (1990) 2 LLJ 39 [LNIND 1990 SC 308], 50 (SC) per Sawant J.

66 Mgmt of Chandramalai Estate v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1960 SC 107], 246 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

67 National Transport General Co Ltd v Workmen 10 FJR 409, 411 (LAT).

68 Western India Match Co Ltd v Wimco Mazdoor Union (1957) LAC 322(LAT.

69 Chandramalai Estate, Emakulam v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1960 SC 107] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

70 Mgmt of Fertilizer Corpn of India v The Workmen (1970) 2 LLJ 25 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

71 Churakulam Tea Estate v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1968 SC 256] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

72 LIC of India v Amalendu Gupta (1988) 2 LLJ 495, 505 (Cal) (DB), per Baboo Lall Jain J.

73 Crompton Greaves Ltd v Workmen (1978) 2 LLJ 80, 82 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

74 Syndicate Bank v K Umesh Nayak (1994) 2 LLJ 836, 849 : AIR 1995 SC 319 : (1994) 5 SCC 572 (SC), per Sawant J.

75 Sadul Textile Mills Ltd v Workmen (1958) 2 LLJ 632, 638 (Raj) (DB), per Wanchoo CJ.

76 Life Insurance Corpn of India v Amalendu Gupta (1988) 2 LLJ 495, 505 (Cal) (DB), per Baboo Lall Jain J.

77 India Gen. Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22 : AIR 1960 SC 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182] (SC), per Sinha CJI.

78 Gujarat Steel Tubes v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

79 Crompton Greaves Ltd v The Workmen (1978) 2 LLJ 80, 82 : AIR 1978 SC 1489 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

80 Syndicate Bank v K Umesh Nayak (1994) 2 LLJ 836 (SC), per Sawant J.

81 Ludwig Teller, Labor Disputes & Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 237, s 78.

82 Iron Moulders Union v Allis Chalmers 20 LRA (NS) 315.

83 Keith Theatre v Vachon 134 ME 392.

84 Express Newspapers (P) Ltd v Michael Mark (1962) 2 LLJ 220 [LNIND 1962 SC 242], 223 : AIR 1963 SC 1141 [LNIND 1962 SC 242] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

85 Oriental Textile Finishing Mills v LCT (1971) 2 LLJ 505 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], 510 : AIR 1972 SC 277 [LNIND 1971 SC 426] (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

86 India General Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22 (SC), per Sinha CJI.

87 Jairam Sonu Shogale v New India Rayon Mills Co Ltd (1958) 1 LLJ 28, 30 (Bom) (DB), per Dixit J.

88 BR Singh v Union of India 1990 Lab IC 389, 397 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

89 Model Mills Ltd v Dharamdas (1958) 1 LLJ 539 [LNIND 1957 SC 110] : AIR 1958 SC 311 [LNIND 1957 SC 110] (SC), per Imam J.

90 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] : AIR 1961 SC 1158 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], per Wanchoo J.

91 Oriental Textile Finishing Mills v LC (1971) 2 LLJ 505 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], 510-11 : AIR 1963 SC 1141 [LNIND 1962 SC 242] (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

92 IMH Press v Additional Industrial Tribunal (1961) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1960 SC 110], 501 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

93 Vasanti M Shah v All India HFMC Society Ltd (1986) 1 LLJ 69, 76 : (1985) 1 GLR 281 (Guj) (DB), per Majmudar J.

94 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v Gujarat Steel Tubes Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], 165 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

95 Bharat Barrel & Drum Mfg Co Pvt Ltd v FH Lala 1978 Lab IC 31 (Bom) (DB), per Tuljapurkar CJ.

96 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Sarup (1957) 1 LLJ 17 [LNIND 1956 SC 85] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

97 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 666 [LNIND 1959 SC 166] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

1 India General Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22 : AIR 1960 Sc 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182] (SC), per Sinha CJI.

2 Swadeshi Industries Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1960 SC 7] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

3 Changunabai C Palkar v KM Mills Ltd (1992) 2 LLJ 640, 643 (Bom) (DB), per PD Desai CJ.

4 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

5 India Gen Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22 : AIR 1960 SC 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182] (SC), per Sinha CJI.

6 Bengal Bhatdee Coal Co v Ram Prabesh Singh (1963) 1 LLJ 291 [LNIND 1963 SC 13], 294 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

7 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 454 (SC) : AIR 1959 Sc 529 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], per Imam J.

8 Bata Shoe Co v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], 310 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

9 Northern Dooars Tea Co Ltd v Workmen of DDTE (1964) 1 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 184], 441 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

10 Bata Shoe Co v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], 310 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

11 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Workers (1953) 1 LLJ 181 [LNIND 1952 SC 77] : AIR 1953 SC 647 (SC), per Mahajan J.

12 Mgmt of Fertiliser Corpn of India v Workmen (1970) 2 LLJ 25, 39 : AIR 1970 SC 867 [LNIND 1968 SC 340] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

13 Crompton Greaves Ltd v Workmen (1978) 2 LLJ 80, 82 : AIR 1978 SC 1489 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

14 Syndicate Bank v K Umesh Nayak (1994) 2 LLJ 836, 840, per Sawant J.

15 Bank of India v TS Kelawala (1990) 2 LLJ 39 [LNIND 1990 SC 308] : (1990) 4 SCC 744 [LNIND 1990 SC 308] : [1990] 3 SCR 214 [LNIND 1990 SC 308] (SC), per Sawant J.

16 Syndicate Bank v K Umesh Naik (1994) 2 LLJ 836 : AIR 1995 SC 319 (SC), per Sawant J.

17 The Statesman Ltd v Workmen (1976) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1976 SC 5], 489 : AIR 1976 SC 758 [LNIND 1976 SC 5] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

18 Cf, Kairbetta Estate v Rajamanickam (1960) 2 LLJ 275 [LNIND 1960 SC 92], 278 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

19 Secy of State v Associated Society of LEF [1972] 2 All ER 949, 967 (CA), per Lord Denning MR.

20 Algemene Bank v CGLC 1978 Lab IC 47, 55 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukherji J.

21 Swastik Textiles Engineers Pvt Ltd v RS Santsingh (1984) 2 LLJ 97 : (1984) 1 GLR 470 (Guj) (DB), per Mankad J.

22 NLCWPU v Neyveli Lignite Corpn Ltd (2001) 1 LLN 948,952 (Mad), per Karpagavinayagam J.

23 Bank of India v TS Kelawala (1990) 2 LLJ 39 [LNIND 1990 SC 308] (SC), per Sawant J.

24 Mgmt of Churakulam Tea Estate (P) Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1968 SC 256] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

25 Crompton Greaves Ltd v Workmen (1978) 2 LLJ 80, 82 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

26 India General Navigation & Railway Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182] : AIR 1960 SC 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182]) (SC), per Sinha CJI.

27 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], 168 (SC), per Iyer J.

28 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Rohtas Industries Staff Union (1976) 1 LLJ 274 [LNIND 1975 SC 523] : AIR 1976 SC 425 [LNIND 1975 SC 523] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

29 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, pp 39-40.

30 HD Singh v Reserve Bank of India 1985 Lab IC 1733, 1738 : AIR 1986 SC 132 [LNIND 1985 SC 278] (SC), per Khalid J.

31 Promer Sales Pvt Ltd v Manohar Sondhur 1993 Lab IC 1762, 1766 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

32 Govt of Tamil Nadu v TNRCGE Union (1993) 1 LLJ 977 (Mad) (DB), per Abdul Hadi J.

33 P Rajeev v Karnataka SCC Ltd (1992) 1 LLJ 217, 222 : 1990 (3) ar LJ 1 (Kant), per Shivashankar Bhat J.

34 Assn. of SRT Undertakings v Employees Union 1986 Lab IC 1543 (Del), per Luthra J.

35 Regional Manager, SBI v Raja Ram (2004) 8 SCC 164.

36 Regional Manager, SBI v Rakesh Kumar Tewari AIR 2006 SC 839 [LNIND 2006 SC 6]: (2006) 1 SCC 530 [LNIND 2006 SC 6], per Ms Ruma Pal J.

37 Hindustan Lever Ltd v IT (2008) 1 LLJ 222 [LNIND 2007 ALL 39] : (2007) 7 AWC 7014 (All .), per Rajesh Kumar J.

38 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 40, para 6.40.

39 Bhagaband Colliery v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 356 [LNIND 1962 SC 244] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

40 Bennett Coleman & Co Pvt Ltd v Punya Priya Das Gupta (1969) 2 LLJ 554 [LNIND 1969 SC 150], 565-66 : AIR 1970 SC 426 [LNIND 1969 SC 150] (SC), per Shelat J.

41 Algemene Bank v CGLC 1978 Lab IC 47 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

42 Muir Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 586 [LNIND 1960 SC 112], 590-91 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

43 Mc Leod & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 386 [LNIND 1963 SC 272], 387-88 : AIR 1964 SC 1449 [LNIND 1963 SC 272] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

44 River Navigation Co Ltd v Employees CA Nos 916 and 692 of 1965 (1967), per Subba Rao CJI.

45 Remington Rand of India Ltd v The Workmen CA No 856 of 1968 (1968) (SC), per Shelat J.

46 Ibid, connected with CA No 2119 of 1969.

47 Statesman Ltd v Workmen (1976) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1976 SC 5], 488 : AIR 1976 SC 758 [LNIND 1976 SC 5] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

48 Workmen of Calcutta Port Commrs v CP Commrs CA No 973 of 1966 (1969) (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

49 Chandramalai Estate v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 243 [LNIND 1960 SC 107] : AIR 1960 SC 902 [LNIND 1960 SC 107] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

50 DCM Chemical Works v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 388 [LNIND 1962 SC 97], 399 : [1962] Supp 3 SCR 516 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

51 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 542 [LNIND 1967 SC 225] : AIR 1968 SC 224 [LNIND 1967 SC 425] (SC), per Mitter J.

52 Mgmt. of Kirloskar Electric Co Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 305 [LNIND 1973 SC 201] : AIR 1973 SC 2119 [LNIND 1973 SC 201] (SC), per Grover J.

53 Statesman Ltd v Workmen (1976) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1976 SC 5], 488 : AIR 1976 SC 758 [LNIND 1976 SC 5] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

54 Rohtas Sugar Ltd v Mazdoor Seva Sangh (1960) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1960 SC 39], 569-71 : AIR 1960 SC 671 [LNIND 1960 SC 39] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

55 Basant Kumar Sarkar v Eagle Rolling Mills Ltd (1964) 2 LLJ 105 [LNIND 1964 SC 52] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

56 Nawabganj Sugar Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 750 [LNIND 1963 SC 309] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

57 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 55, 59 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

58 BP Hira (WM, Central Rly) v CM Pradhan (1959) 2 LLJ 397 [LNIND 1959 SC 107] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

59 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 178], 434-35 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

60 Workmen of Jessop & Co Ltd v Jessop & Co Ltd (1964) 1 LLJ 451 [LNIND 1963 SC 179], 454-55 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

61 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen 1969 Lab IC 467, 472-73 (SC), per Shelat J.

62 Workmen of Calcutta Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v CESC Ltd (1973) 2 LLJ 258 [LNIND 1973 SC 179] : AIR 1973 SC 2143 [LNIND 1973 SC 179] (SC), per Mukherjea J.

63 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Shaparia Dock & Steel Co Ltd (1957) 1 LLJ 324 (LAT).

64 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 459 (SC), per Imam J.

65 State Bank of Hyderabad v VA Bhide (1969) 2 LLJ 713 [LNIND 1969 SC 181] : AIR 1970 SC 196 [LNIND 1969 SC 181]: (1969) 2 SCC 491 [LNIND 1969 SC 181] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

66 Reserve Bank of India v RBI Staff Officers Assn, AIR 1992 SC SC 485 : (1991) 4 SCC 132 [LNIND 1991 SC 361] (SC), per Kania J.

67 Union of India v Mohd Haroon Rashid 1995 Lab IC 1634 (SC).

68 Gramphone Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 131 [LNIND 1964 SC 114], 138 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

69 Union Bank of India v SS Dhaliwal 1980 Lab IC 26 (Del) (DB), per Prakash Narain J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

(ix) Moving Staff Allowance:

In Remington Rand, the workmen employed in the Eranakulam branch of the company, demanded that those workmen who were deputed on tout, on the company's work, should be given a day off if they had to travel two nights consecutively. A further demand was made that the travelling staff should be paid overtime for the work done on holidays while on tour, at double the normal wages for the day. The tribunal, on examining a mechanic who used to go on tours, found that the jurisdiction of the Ernakulam branch was limited to the districts of Trivandrum, Quilon, Alleppey and Kottayam and that even if he was forced to work on holidays, he was given over-time wages. But in spite of these findings, it held that it was only just and reasonable that the touring mechanics should be given a day off, if they travelled on two consecutive days, for reaching a place of work and also an overtime at double the rate, for the work done on holidays. In appeal against the award of the tribunal, by the employer, the Supreme Court observed that, in view of the limitation as to the jurisdiction of the branch noted above, the occasion for a mechanic spending two consecutive nights for reaching a place of work, will arise very seldom and if such an occasion does arise, there was no reason why a workman should not get the overtime wages as awarded by the tribunal.[70] Project allowance paid to the employees falls within the definition of 'wages' in s 2(rr), and any reduction of the said allowance amounts to change in the conditions of service in terms of s 9A of the Act.[71]

(x) Key Allowance:

In Indian Overseas Bank, a key allowance was paid to its cashiers from 15 September 1958, but it was discontinued after the Desai Award, with effect from 1 December 1962. On a dispute being raised with respect to the stoppage of the allowance to the head cashier of the Chandni Chowk, Delhi branch of the bank, the tribunal found that the key allowance was not a part of the benefits under the Shastri Award and it was introduced as a result of a separate agreement between the bank and the head cashier. In view of the fact that the key allowance was a term and condition of employment of the head cashier, it was held that the bank could not discontinue the allowance, except after following the procedure laid down by s 9A of the Industrial Disputes Act and r 34 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. Since that procedure had not been followed, the key allowance was payable from 1 December 1962, till such time when it could be said to be legally discontinued. Affirming the award of the tribunal, the Supreme Court observed that the key allowance was payable even after the Desai Award, as the correct procedure was not followed by the bank while discontinuing the allowance.[72]

(xi) Vacation Allowance:

In Polychem, the industrial tribunal allowed the demand of the workmen of the company, claiming a vacation allowance for the workmen, at the same rate as was granted to the higher staff of the company, both at the head office and at its Chembur plant. This award was challenged by the company before the Supreme Court, on the ground that there was no evidence in support of the conclusions arrived at by the tribunal and that it proceeded on grounds which were irrelevant and contrary to the settled principles relating to the adjudication of industrial disputes. Furthermore, nowhere in the region, was the vacation allowance granted in similar industries and thus, there was no comparable instance. It was further pointed out that the workmen in the establishment, were getting various other amenities, like dearness allowance, according to the revised textile rates, overtime wages, lunch allowance (not allowed to officers), gratuity, uniforms and medical facilities. It was, therefore, urged that the real criterion should have been the overall pay structure of the workmen, in the light of the standard prevailing in similar industries in the same region and the mere capacity of the employer to pay, should not be the sole criterion. In the circumstances of the case, the court took the view that the tribunal committed a serious error in not considering the other allowances and other amenities allowed to the respondent workmen and comparing their total wage-packet, with the total wage-packet, of those employees to whom the allowance in question had been allowed, when determining this question, and the question in issue was virtually decided exclusively, on the basis that the employer had the financial capacity to stand the burden of such allowance being granted to the workmen, at the same higher rate slab, with the same conditions. The court observed:

> The difference between the amenities allowed to the workmen and to the staff to whom the vacation allowance is granted, must, in law and justice, be looked into and the question then decided, whether or not the present workmen's demand is justified. The principle of region-cum-industry has no doubt to be kept in view, but then the comparable industries in the region have to be considered from all the relevant aspects which have been laid down by this court in various decisions...But to what extent that should weigh with the tribunal is for the tribunal to decide in the light of all the relevant circumstances. The total wage packet of the various categories of employees in the appellant's industry itself, including the question of their nature of duties and functions, however, deserves to be given primary importance so that there is no reasonable chance of heart-burning and discontentment amongst the different categories of workmen, on account of the differential treatment which, though seemingly justifiable, may, in real effect, be discriminatory. The importance of appropriate standardisation of wages in the appellant-industry, on a proper consideration of the duties and functions of the different categories of employees, must be kept in view in deciding the present dispute.[73]

In Shaw Wallace, the award of the tribunal, with respect to an yearly travelling allowance, maintaining the rate of train fare as agreed between the parties, but with the modification that a workman who is visiting his home town or village, shall be entitled to an actual class 2 train fare for the outward and return journey for himself, his wife and dependent children, once a year, was upheld by the Calcutta High Court. The court observed that the additional benefit conferred on the workman was, as a matter of fact, a bare necessity, considering the rising prices, the cost of living index and considering the fact that an annual holiday is required for the purpose of a proper and efficient discharge of his duty by a workman.[74]

(xii) Education Allowance for Employees' Children:

In Hindustan Aeronautics, the workmen of the company, employed in their Barrackpore branch, engaged in repairs of aircrafts, claimed an allowance for the education of their children, on the basis that education facilities were available to the workmen at Bangalore. On the other hand, the employer company pleaded that certain educational facilities were given to the employees living in the township of the company at Bangalore, but not to those living in the city of Bangalore and the workmen working at Barrackpore had also been provided with certain educational facilities. The tribunal directed the employer company to pay Rs 12 per month, to each employee, to meet the educational expenses of their children, irrespective of the number of children a particular workman may have, despite the fact that, strictly speaking, the claim for the education allowance, could not form the subject-matter of the industrial dispute in question. The award of the tribunal was set aside by the Supreme Court, holding that in substance and in effect, the direction given by the tribunal in this connection, was by way of a revision of the wage-structure of the employees and it was beyond the scope of the issue referred for adjudication, as no such reference was either asked for, or made.[75]

Sub-clause (i) - Dearness Allowance:

Dearness allowance has been comprehended in the definition of, wages', by the inclusive cl (i). It is the additional payment made by an employer to his employees, to compensate them to a certain extent, for the rise in the cost of living.[76] The process of the rise in prices continues with the passage of time and the improvement in economic conditions. Even a fair wage, fixed for the time being, tends to sag downwards and adjustments in wage levels becomes necessary. To a certain extent, the disparity is made up by the payment of the dearness allowance. In Hindustan Antibiotics, the award of the tribunal merging a portion of DA with the basic wage and linking the balance to the cost of living was challenged on the ground that it amounted to granting Dearness Allowance on Dearness Allowance. Repelling the contention, Subba Rao, CJI rightly observed:

> "The doctrine of dearness allowance was only evolved in India. Instead of increasing wages as it is done in other countries, dearness allowance is paid to neutralise the rise in prices. This process was adopted in expectation that one day or other we would go back to the original price levels. But, when it was found that it was only a vain hope or, at any rate, it could not be expected to fall below a particular mark, a part of the dearness allowance was added to the basic wages, that is to say, the wages to that extent were increased. While the Tribunal increased the wages, in fixing the dearness allowance, it looked into the overall picture, > namely, whether the total wage packet would approximate to the total packet of wages in comparable industries. There is no question, therefore, of paying dearness allowance on dearness allowance, but it was only a payment of dearness allowance in addition to the increased wages. Even on the basis of the increased wages, dearness allowance was necessary to neutralise the rise in prices. That is exactly what the Tribunal has done."[77]

In the words of Desai J:

> Dearness allowance is directly related to the erosion of real wages by the constant upward spiralling of the prices of basic necessities and as a sequel to the inflationary input, the fall in purchasing power of the rupees...Dearness allowance is inextricably intertwined with price rise, it being an attempt to compensate loss in real wages on account of price rise, considered as a passing phenomenon, by compensation. That is why it is called variable dearness allowance...Dearness allowance, by its very form and name, has an intimate relation to the prevailing price structure of basic necessities at the centre in which the workman is employed.[78]

The system of dearness allowance as a separate component of wages, in contradistinction to the 'basic wage', is a special feature, peculiar to India. To a certain extent, it is also prevalent in some Asian countries. But in the industrialised countries, wages themselves are adjusted to neutralise the increase in the prices and the rise in the cost of living. In the United States of America, Belgium, Denmark and Italy, the 'escalator clauses', which are somewhat similar to linking the total wage to the index, are common. In some agreements in the United States, another device, known as the 'wage reopening clause', has been used. In this system, all other clauses remain undisturbed, except the one which relates to wages, which can be reopened even during the pendency of the contract. This system is prevalent in Norway and Sweden as well. In some Asian countries, systems somewhat similar to the 'dearness allowance' in India, are in vogue. For instance, in Ceylon, there are several allowances, such as, 'cost of living allowance', 'rent allowance' and 'special living allowance', which have the same effect as the 'dearness allowance' in India. A somewhat similar system is prevalent in Pakistan also. In Japan, wages include a cost of living allowance and rent allowance. The NCL-I observed:

> ...while some form of relationship between wage levels and cost of living increase is preferred, the form of the relationship varies. While the predominant pattern appears to be the adjustment of the wages as a whole, the practice of keeping the compensation for price increase as a separate element, also exists; both arrangements have their own advantages and disadvantages. The main advantage claimed for the latter is its flexibility...while wage rates cannot be brought down because of a fall in prices, the dearness allowance, if kept as a separate element, can. The system can also be designed to reduce the time-lag between the price increases and the payment of compensation therefor. The opposite view is that the way the system has operated all these years, has resulted in a complete distortion of the wage-structure, with the dearness allowance portion, in certain areas, being several times the size of the basic wage. This may have an adverse repercussion on incentives and productivity. The system of DA, as it has evolved in this country, may, under certain circumstances, add to the inflationary tendencies.[79]

In India, with the rise of prices during the first world war, there started a clamour in different industries and different centres, to secure compensation for the rising prices of commodities. In Ahmedabad, the demand led to the epic fast of Mahatma Gandhi and it succeeded in securing for workers, the principle of protecting their real wage in the event of a substantial rise in the prices. This compensation, presently termed as 'dearness allowance' (DA), was, at some centres, called 'dear-food allowance' (to emphasise its food component) in the early stage of its being recognised as a separate component of the remuneration for work. In the inter-war period, and particularly during recession, these allowances were adjusted, taking into account the lower price level. The practice of paying a 'dearness allowance', as distinct from the 'basic-wage', had these early beginnings.[80] The outbreak of the second world war ruptured the relationship between the wages and the price-line, which, in its train, brought a spate of industrial disputes in perhaps, all the industrial centres in the country. Consequently, a compensation for the increase in the prices was sought to be secured during this period, through the machinery of industrial adjudication, set up for the settlement of such disputes. Dearness allowance was primarily intended to be a temporary expedient and was sought to be made as a protection to those who had no cushion at all, in their wage-packet, in the face of an appreciable rise in prices. Some relief was given to others as well. The price indices have now assumed menacing figures. This is the stark reality of the situation and any problem regarding wages or dearness allowance has to be considered in that background; at the same time, not losing sight of the national economy.[81] In other words, dearness allowance was intended as the protection of persons whose salaries were at the subsistence level, against the adverse effects of a rise in prices.[82] In the language of Ahmadi J:

> The concept of dearness allowance, the second most important element in a worker's wage-plan, next to the basic wage, was introduced during the second world war, to meet the increase in the cost of living caused by inflation. It was either linked to the > cost of living index or was given by way of a flat increases. When linked to the former, it was granted to all the income groups at a flat rate or was graded on a scale admissible to different income groups, diminishing with the rise in the income. Basically, the concept of dearness allowance was designed to combat inflation and protect real wages and therefore, it would appear that there should be cent per cent neutralisation. This is a concept peculiar to India, Ceylon, Pakistan and Bangladesh.[83]

The Commission on Dearness Allowance, in May 1967, stated that historically, dearness allowance was regarded as applicable to those employees whose salaries were at the subsistence level or a little above, in order to enable them to face the increase in the dearness of essential commodities. Industrial adjudication introduced a system of 'dearness allowance', to supplement the wages of workmen, for neutralising the rise in the prices, in the expectation that one day or the other, prices will go back to the original level, based on the assumption that the increase in the living costs was a phenomenon of a temporary character and 'the expectation was that such allowance would be adjusted downwards and would eventually disappear'. But the hope that the prices will decline, never came true and 'dearness allowance' has, therefore, come to stay. On realizing that the price level could not be expected to rail beyond a particular mark, a part of the 'dearness allowance' was added to the 'basic wages', that is to say, the wages, to that extent, were increased.[84] According to one estimate, nearly two thirds of the industrial working force is now being compensated on this basis. Thus, the prevalent system of 'dearness allowance', originating as a protection against a fall in the real wages and temporary in character, has come to stay as a part of the total wage structure.[85] Even on the basis of the increased wages, dearness allowance still became necessary to neturalise the rise in prices with the passage of time. Dearness allowance has thus, continued, for fuller neutralisation of the rise in the cost of living, as a result of the ever rising price-line of commodities. In the last thirty years, besides industrial tribunals and the Supreme Court, it has been discussed and accepted by various bodies. [86] Historically and by the industrial texts as well as by the observations of various commissions and committees, dearness allowance was regarded as applying to those employees whose salaries were at the subsistence level or a little above it...in order to enable them to face the increasing dearness of essential commodities. The Government of India also set up a number of wage boards for determining the terms of employment in several industries and such wage boards have generally sought to keep the 'dearness allowance' as a separate component of the wages, though some of them have recommended the merger of a substantial part of it, with the basic wage. A tripartite meeting over the last 20 years, also felt the same way. On account of the ephemeral nature of the price line, the system of dearness allowance cannot be constant and it varies from time to time, centre to centre, and from industry to industry, within the same centre. In the language of Goswami J:

> Like all changes in life and in a continuous march towards progress of society, the concept of dearness allowance also may change to take in a wider range of commodities and services, to make life worth living as far as practicable, subject to the compelling limitations of general interest... the old definition of dearness allowance may not even serve the climate of the new aspirations of various classes of employees of this vast country. Luxuries of yesterday may be the comforts of today and necessities of tomorrow. The economic solution must reckon the turn-abouts in social urges. Because even the worm turns. Industrial adjudication, which has not the limitations of the ordinary courts, has to respond to the needs of the changing society and it may be possible to widen the scope of dearness allowance, if that serves the cause of general welfare. There may be no inexorable rule, tying down economic existence to a definition of bygone days, if unsuitable or irrelevant in the context of the times.[87]

In some cases, a flat rate of dearness allowance has been made applicable to all the employees, irrespective of their wages, while in other cases, it has varied according to the wage or salary slabs. A graded percentage, linked to the wages or the salaries, has also been linked to the working class consumer price index. This resulted in a variety of systems, with dearness allowance linked to the index emerging dominant. The system of dearness allowance, as it has been evolved in this country, may, under certain circumstances, add to the inflationary tendency. The NCL-I has considered these issues and felt that the changes in money wages should be associated with the corresponding changes in the cost of living and that, without such adjustment, the real wages would be eroded. In view of the fact that the system of dearness allowance has come to stay in this country and, as in most of the cases, it is linked to the index, the commission has discussed the issues arising out of such linkage in some detail, in its report.[88] Since the object of dearness allowance is to neutralise the rise in the cost of living, it would not be proper to adopt an academic or doctrinaire approach to the problem. In considering the problem, industrial adjudication has necessarily, to adopt a pragmatic approach in fixing the dearness allowance and has to take care and see that the legitimate demand of the employees is met without doing any injustice to the employer and without acting unfairly to him.[89] Desai J notes:

> It is, by now, well-settled that dearness allowance to workmen at a particular place should depend upon the place, where the workmen are working, irrespective of the fact that the industrial undertaking in which they are employed, is a unit of an industrial enterprise, having an all India or inter-state operation.[90]

Dearness allowance, therefore, has to be fixed after taking into account, the total emoluments or the total wage-packet of the workers, viz, wages, production or incentive bonus, the existing dearness allowance, if any, and the value of other amenities, like concessional food, quarters, water and light etc.[91] In Wenger & Co (supra), though the Supreme Court did not treat the tips received by the bearers in a restaurant, as a substitute, wholly or partially, for dearness allowance, nor treated them as a payment made by or on behalf of the employers, it took into account a certain minimum of such tips in determining the quantum of the dearness allowance, at a flat rate. In Rambagh Palace Hotel, the court observed that the proper approach for the tribunal is to bear in mind the fact that tips are received, and make some suitable adjustment in that behalf. The court reiterated that the receipt of tips by the staff is not anything like a payment made by the management to its employees, warranting consideration by the tribunal, to depress the award of dearness allowance, though it is a factor which may, perhaps, be borne in mind by the tribunal while finalising the actual figures of dearness allowance.[92] In Bengal Chemicals, the following guidelines were laid down:

1. Full neutralisation is not normally given, except to the very lowest class of employees.
2. The purpose of dearness allowance being to neutralise a portion of the increase in the cost of living, it should ordinarily, be on a sliding scale and provide for an increase on the rise in the cost living and a decrease on a fall in the cost of living.
3. The basis for the fixation of wages and dearness allowance should be industry-cum-region.
4. Employees getting the same wages, should get the same dearness allowance, irrespective of whether they are working as clerks, members of subordinate staff for factory workmen.
5. The additional financial burden which a revision of the wage structure or dearness allowance would impose upon an employer, and his ability to bear such burden, are very material and relevant factors to be taken into account.[93]

(i) Financial Capacity of the Employer:

By and large, the same principles govern the adjudication of wages and of dearness allowance. Hence, where dearness allowance is to be awarded to supplement the basic-wage, which is below the minimum wage or subsistence wage, the capacity of the industry or the employer to pay, is irrelevant.[1] But, in other cases, the financial capacity of the industry, the employer or the establishment, as the case may be, to pay, is a material factor to be taken into consideration in awarding dearness allowance.[2] In Millowners Assn, the Supreme Court emphasised that in trying to recognise and give effect to the demand for a fair wage, including the payment of dearness allowance, to provide for an adequate neutralisation, industrial adjudication must always take into account the problem of the additional burden which such wage structure would impose upon the employer and ask itself, whether the employer can reasonably be called upon to bear such burden.[3] In Filmistan, the court reiterated that the tribunal...must examine the facts and figures relating to the financial position of the establishment concerned, compare the said position with the financial position of comparable concerns, and inquire what would be the total impact of the additional burden of the revised wage structure'. In other words, while considering the claim for dearness allowance, industrial adjudication has to consider, whether an employer is capable of bearing the additional financial burden, which may have to be imposed upon it on account of the increase in the dearness allowance.[4] The financial capacity of the employer is a relevant consideration in this connection.[5] The failure of the tribunal to adopt such a course, would constitute a serious infirmity in its approach. Likewise, it is obligatory on the part of the tribunal, to determine the true financial position of the establishment and also the impact which the increase in the 'dearness allowance' would have on its financial resources. This principle consists of two parts, viz, (1) the capacity of the industry to pay, and (2) the financial burden that would result by any increase in the dearness allowance, which may be granted by the tribunal.[6] The burden of proof, however, is on the employer, to show by pleading and by adducing relevant evidence, that he has no capacity to bear the financial burden that the increase in the dearness allowance would cast on him.[7] If the employer fails to plead and establish by adequate and relevant evidence, that he has no financial capacity to bear the additional burden of the increase in the dearness allowance, before the tribunal, he cannot successfully assail the award on the ground of a want of the requisite financial capacity.[8] The Allahabad High Court held that the payment of dearness allowance, has a priority over income-tax and other reserves. Therefore, in considering the financial soundness of an undertaking, for the purpose of paying dearness allowance, the gross profits should be arrived at, without deducting the provisions for depreciation, taxation and reserves. Considerations for determining the net profits under the Income-Tax Act, for taxation purposes, are different from considerations of social justice, on which the payment of dearness allowance is based. A reserve may be liable to be deducted from the profit and loss account for the purpose of taxation, but it cannot have priority over the requirement of the payment of dearness allowance.[9]

No doubt, the financial capacity of the employer is an important factor in determining the ceiling on dearness allowance, but it cannot be made the sole criteria for the purpose.[10] The mere fact that a particular company is a member of the chamber of commerce, would not justify a claim by the workmen, as of right, or as a matter of course, for the scales of

'dearness allowance' to be at the level recommended by the chamber. In Gujarat Electricity Board, dealing with the demand for 'dearness allowance', the industrial tribunal held that the workmen, having failed to prove that the total wage packet, including the dearness allowance, fell below the minimum wage, the capacity of the electricity board to bear the burden of paying its employees, the enhanced dearness allowance, would be a relevant factor. In this view of law, the tribunal rejected the claim of the workmen for dearness allowance, because the board was already running at a heavy loss and would not have been able to meet the extra burden which would be imposed upon it if the dearness allowance, as claimed by the workmen, was allowed. The award of the tribunal was affirmed by the Supreme Court in appeal.[11]

In Press Employees' Assn, the dearness allowance paid by the company was held to be otherwise fair, the claim for an increase in the dearness. allowance, therefore, was negatived by the labour appellate tribunal.[12] In Kapoor Silk Mills, though the tribunal found that the financial position of the employer was not very re-assuring, it still awarded an increase in the dearness allowance. The award of the tribunal was quashed by the High Court, as there was nothing to show as to how the tribunal had come to the conclusion that the dearness allowance should be increased and in view of the fact that the tribunal had ignored the principles laid down by the Supreme Court in this behalf.[13] In Ghaziabad Engineering, the tribunal, in coming to the conclusion that the financial position of the company was sound, relied upon a news item published by a newspaper, that the company was importing new Russian tractors, even though the agency for selling the tractors of the company was in danger of being terminated on account of the State Trading Corporation taking over such agency. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the news item was one of the circumstances which the tribunal took into consideration, along with the balance-sheet of the company, which showed that the agency was one of the many lines of business of the company and the closure of the agency would not affect the financial structure of the company seriously.[14]

In Silk & Art Silk Mills, the claim of the union for a hundred per cent neutralisation of the consumer price index in Bombay, was resisted by the employers' association, inter alia, on the ground that the demand was beyond the financial capacity of most of its member units, and furthermore, that the position of the industry was steadily deteriorating due to various reasons. But on the basis of the materials produced before it by the parties, the industrial court took the view, that the position of the industry in general, and the financial capacity of the employer units, in particular, was satisfactory, and granted a 99 per cent neutralisation of the rise in the Bombay consumer price index 106(o1d series), on the basis of a minimum basic wage of Rs 30 per month of 26 working days. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court affirmed the award, holding that the industrial court was fully aware of the nature of the demand and the extent of the burden which the employer units will have to bear and taking a broad and overall view of the financial position of the employer units into account, it had tried to reconcile the natural and just claims of the employees for a higher rate of dearness allowance, with the capacity of the employers to pay it and in that process, it had made allowance for the legitimate desire of the employer to make reasonable profits. It was observed, that what was really material in assessing the financial capacity of the employer units, in this context, was the extent of the gross profits made by them.[15] In British India Corpn, the award of the tribunal, enhancing the dearness allowance from 37 paise per point to 75 paise per point, was challenged on the ground that the employer company had been taken over by the Central Government as a sick unit and had suffered losses. It was further contended that even if there was no case to interfere with the award of the tribunal, looking into the financial situation of the employer, the court must grant some indulgence, by evolving some formula by which the employer is absolved of the liability to pay the balance of the arrears of the enhanced dearness allowance. The court declined to grant the indulgence, With the observation:

> It must be remembered that the dearness allowance hardly, if ever, keeps pace with the rise in the index. There is always a gap between the rise in the index and the related dearness allowance formula and also the fact that neutralisation never reaches cent per cent rise in prices and therefore, any tinkering with the dearness allowance formula would cause a dent in the otherwise uneconomic pay packets of these industrial workmen.[16]

(ii) Industry-cum-region Basis:

In the words of Desai J:

> In the matter of dearness allowance especially, the court should lean in favour of an adjudication of the dispute on the principle of industry-cum-region, because dearness allowance is linked to the cost of living index of a particular centre, which has a local flavour...A man is exposed to the vagaries of the market where he resides and works, even though he may be an employee of a national, multinational or trans-national industrial empire. The workman is concerned with the vagaries of price fluctuations in the area in which he resides and works for gain and to which he is exposed. Therefore, the region-cum-industry principle must inform industrial adjudication in the matter of dearness allowance...Realising this situation, courts have leaned in favour of the determination of dearness allowance as linked to cost of living index, if available, for the centre where the workman is employed, and in the matter of neutralisation, on the industry-cum-region principle.[17]

Note: For a detailed discussion of this topic, see notes and comments under the head 'Adjudication of wage fixation'.

In revising the scales of the dearness allowance payable to the workers, the tribunal has to take into account, the total pay packet of similarly placed categories of workmen in another similar company and the same should be made, more or less, similar to each other. In this connection, what is relevant is not the years of service. The dearness allowance has to be fixed at any given point of time, on the basis of the basic wages and the slab and not on the basis of the years of service. If the same has to be fixed in comparison to another concern, for affecting the basic wage structure, the two extreme points in the two concerns have to be fixed. If the span of one is shorter than the other, there has to be some acceleration in between, so as to make the two wage structures, including all the allowances, more or less equal.[18]

(iii) Neutralisation of Increase in Prices:

The labour appellate tribunal took the view, that while awarding 'dearness allowance', cent per cent neutralisation of the price of cost of living should not be allowed, as it will lead to a vicious circle and will add fillip to the inflationary spiral.[19] This view was approved by the Supreme Court in Calcutta Tramways, where it observed that a distinction cannot be made in this respect, among the lowest paid employees, in the very lowest of manual labourers, whose income is just sufficient to keep body and soul together. It is impolitic and unwise to neutralise the entire rise in the cost of living, by a dearness allowance. More so, in the case of middle classes. The main consideration, so far as dearness allowance is concerned, is neutralisation of the cost of living and it matters not if the dearness allowance paid in all the industries in the area, is taken into consideration, for ascertaining what the correct dearness allowance ought to be for a particular concern.[20] The dearness allowance which is paid in all concerns, is after all, a reflection of:

(a) the capacity of the concern to pay; and

(b) the necessity for such payment, having regard to the rise in the cost of living.[21]

Wherever the facts justify, a higher dearness allowance should be granted, for a satisfactory neutralisation of the cost of living, in the interest of long-lasting industrial peace in the industry.[22] Besides, with the possibility of inflation in the future, another reason for not giving a cent per cent neutralisation is that the industrial workers are also expected to make some sacrifice, like other citizens.[23] The whole purpose of dearness allowance being to neutralise the portion of the increase in the cost of living, it should ordinarily be on a sliding scale and provide for an increase, on a rise in the cost of living and for a decrease, on the fall in the cost of living.[24] In considering the claim for a dearness allowance or for a revision of the dearness allowance, amongst other factors, it should be borne in mind that, (i) full neutralisation is not normally given, except to the very lowest class of employees and (ii) the purpose of dearness allowance being to neutralise a portion of the increase in the cost of living, it should ordinarily be on a sliding scale and provide for an increase, on the rise in the cost of living and for a decrease, on fall in the cost of living.[25] However, in so far as the lowest paid employees at or just above the subsistence level are concerned, they are entitled to a 100 per cent, or at any rate, not less than a 95 per cent neutralisation in the cost of living. Thus the ratio of neutralisation cannot be more than 100 per cent, even in the case of the lowest paid employees.[26] According to Sawant J:

> The neutralisation of the rise in the consumers price index, mayor may not mean the same thing as the neutralisation of the rise in the cost of living, depending upon the basket of goods and services which are taken into consideration for compiling the consumer price index and the income group whose cost of living is sought to be protected. The consumer price index which is used in industrial adjudication, for considering the rise or fall in the prices, for fixing the dearness allowance, is the consumer price index of the basket of goods and services consumed by the average worker. This consumer price index is known as the All India Working Class Consumer Price Index. The dearness allowance is paid to workmen of all establishments, on the basis of the rise and fall in this consumer price index. Further, as held by all the expert committees and commissions, the object of granting dearness allowance is to neutralise as nearly as possible, the rise in the consumer price index for the lowest paid workman or the minimum wage earner in any establishment and the percentage of neutralisation should go on declining on a sliding scale, with the higher wage groups. Although, therefore, theoretically, it is possible to contend...that the consumer price index does not necessarily indicate a rise and fall in the cost of living of all the sections of the workmen, for the purposes of industrial disputes, the wage authorities, committees and commissions have not so far favourably considered the idea of compiling different consumers price indices for different wage groups, and have, in fact, treated the concept of cost of living, synonymously with that of the consumer price index of the working class. In fact, they have, in terms, discouraged the idea of neutralising fully, the cost of living of workmen, save those at the minimum wage level.[27]

The NCL-I pointed out:

> ...the only purpose of dearness allowance is to enable the worker, in the event of a rise in the cost of living, to purchase the same amount of goods of basic necessity, as before. This purpose would be served by an equal amount of dearness allowance to all employees, irrespective of the differences in their emoluments.[28]

Hence, the commission recommended that a 95 per cent neutralisation should be granted against the rise in the cost of living, to those drawing minimum wage in non-scheduled industries. Neutralisation, at the best, may be such as to neutralise fully, the increase in the cost of living or, it may be restricted to neutralising only a portion of the increase. Full or cent per cent neutralisation can be achieved if the increase in the cost of living is fully compensated, so that the pay of the worker is not adversely affected. But an award of more than a 100 per cent of the increase in the cost of living, would be more than a neutralisation and would, in fact, give the worker an increased wage. The result would be that the worker would be getting an increased wage-packet, whenever there is a price rise, a result which would not have been envisaged while making the provision for the grant of dearness allowance.[29] The commission, therefore, was reluctant to recommend the same rate for workers in higher wage groups, for fear that it may spark off inflationary trends. In Hindustan Lever, Ahmadi J, who delivered the opinion of the court, observed:

> Normally, such a dearness formula suffers from two drawbacks, (i) it has the pernicious effect of distorting the wage-structure and (ii) it results in a sharp erosion of the real income, particularly of those in the higher wage groups. Generally speaking, the distortion of the wage-structure takes place because employees in different pay scales, are granted dearness allowance, not at a uniform rate, but at a tapering rate, ie, the workers in the lower scales getting a higher neutralisation as compared to those in the higher pay brackets, in whose case the neutralisation percentage diminishes with the rise in the basic wage. That is because it is believed that those in the higher pay brackets have a cushion to absorb the brunt of inflation.[30]

In Silk and Art Silk Mills,(supra), the Industrial Court granted dearness allowance at the rate of 99 per cent neutralisation of the rise in the Bombay CPI on the basis of the minimum basic wage of Rs 30 per month of 26 working days. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the award was correct and the industrial court was justified in relying on these documents for finding the trend or the norms in the region, as regards the extent of neutralisation payable for the lowest paid employees. The court observed:

> The question of the extent of neutralisation to the workmen in the units, does not depend solely upon the fact whether neutralisation to that extent, has been allowed to the employees in comparable concerns in the same industry, in the same region. Much distinction cannot be made in this respect, among the lowest paid employees in the region, merely because some of them are employed in other industries.

In Killick Nixon (supra), the Supreme Court candidly pointed out that the lowest paid employees and those above the subsistence level, were entitled to a 100 per cent, or at any rate, not less than a 90 per cent neutralisation of the rise in the cost of living and declined to put any ceiling on dearness allowance payable to employees within the slab of the first Rs 100, unless it could be shown by the management, that the rate of neutralisation in their case, was more than 100 per cent. With respect to the other employees, it was left to the tribunal to consider the question, having regard to the principles laid down by the court in this connection, as to whether a ceiling should be imposed or not. In SCVKUSM Ltd (supra), a neutralisation of the variable dearness allowance, at 125 per cent was awarded. In Mazgaon Docks (supra), Sawant J held:

> One thing, therefore, is certain, that the trend, beginning from the Third Pay Commission, is in favour of the view that the object of the dearness allowance is to prevent the erosion of real income, and not merely to protect the consumption basket of essential goods and services, against the price rise. The Fourth Pay Commission and the High Power Pay Committee have, as pointed out earlier, felt the need to protect the monthly basic pay up to Rs 3,500 of the government employees, fully. Whatever the view, therefore, with regard to the object of dearness allowance, that one may accept, it can safely be concluded, on the authority of these expert government panels, that the rise in the cost of living up to the basic pay of at least Rs 3,500 per month, needs to be neutralized to the extent of 100 per cent. As observed by the High Power Pay Committee, the consumption basket, which is the basis of the All India Consumer Price Index, is not relevant up to the said basic pay range. It is also to be noted that these expert panels have afforded a substantial protection even to the monthly incomes above Rs 3,500, by recommending 75 per cent and 65 per cent of neutralisation to incomes between Rs 3,500 to Rs 6,000 and above Rs 6,000 respectively.

(iv) Ceiling on Dearness Allowance:

In Killick Nixon, the Supreme Court held that the removal of the ceiling on dearness allowance would not be justified, as the company had made out a case for an imposition of a ceiling. The court indicated the following important factors, which the adjudicator should bear in mind while deciding the question of ceiling on dearness allowance:

(1) Condition of the wage-scales prevalent in the company.

(2) Condition of the wage level prevalent in the industry and the region.

(3) The wage packet as a whole, of each earner in the company, with all amenities and benefits, and its ability and potency to cope with the economic requirements of daily existence, consistent with his status in society, his responsibilities, efficiency at work and with industrial peace.

(4) The position of the company viewed in relation to other comparable concerns in the industry and the region.

(5) Peremptive necessity for a full neutralisation of the cost of living, at the rock-bottom of the wage-scale, if at or just above the subsistence level.

(6) The rate of neutralisation which is being given to the employees in each salary slab.

(7) Huge distortion of wage differentials, taking into reckoning, all persons employed in the concern, should be avoided.

(8) Degree of sacrifice necessary, even on the part of the workers, in general interest.

(9) The compulsive necessity of securing social and distributive justice to the workmen.

(10) Capacity of the company to bear the additional burden.

(11) Interest of national economy.

(12) Repercussions in other industries and the society as a whole.

(13) The state of the consumer price index at the time of the decision.

(14) Forebodings and possibilities in the foreseeable future, as far as can be envisaged.

The court further observed:

> It will always be a delicate task for the tribunal to strike a balance, keeping in view the above principles, weightage to each one of which being variable, according to the conditions obtaining. Whether or not there should be a ceiling on dearness allowance in a given case, must depend on the facts and circumstances of that case. There can be no inexorable rule in that respect.

In Indian Hume Pipe, speaking for the court, Khalid J, pointed out:

> A close study of the Killick Nixon case will bear out, that this court did not lay down that in all cases, the slab system of dearness allowance should be abolished or done away with, to the detriment of the workers. All that this court held in that case was that the employer having made out a case for putting a ceiling on dearness allowance, it was for the tribunal to decide at what particular amount there should be a ceiling on dearness allowance...Thus, the ratio of that case cannot be extended to every case, to interfere with the DA scheme, which is beneficial to the workmen.[31]

In this case, the court set aside the award of the industrial tribunal, that the employer was justified in substituting the slab system of dearness allowance with the revised textile scale of dearness allowance for workmen, affording a 115 per cent neutralisation, with the observation that the theory of a ceiling on the quantum of dearness allowance cannot be accepted, since, under the prevailing conditions, there is no control over the prices of essential commodities and as such, a ceiling would not give a sufficient cushion when prices of essential commodities continuously rise. It is thus evident that the observations in this case too, are not intended to lay down any proposition of law, but are restricted to the facts of the case. It was pertinently pointed out by the court, that if there is material to show that the dearness allowance system adopted by a company, had become 'improper' or unscientific, because the workmen were getting a fantastic amount of dearness allowance, a departure from the existing slab system could be envisaged; the court, therefore, not only approved the ratio of Killick Nixon, but further held that if the employer had made out a case for putting a ceiling on the dearness allowance, it was for the tribunal to decide as to at what particular amount, there should be a ceiling on the dearness allowance.

The Bombay High Court, in negatived the demand of the employer, to change the existing basis for neutralisation of living index, by adopting the neutralisation rate giving lesser benefits to all workmen, uniformly, including the clerical and subordinate staff, without linking it to their basic pay. Speaking for the court, Sawant J observed that in dealing with the question of replacement of the existing system, the first thing the adjudicator is required to consider is, whether the system which is sought to be introduced is more or less beneficial to the workmen, compared to the existing one. If it finds that the new system is less beneficial than or deprives the workmen of the benefits available in the existing system, it has to keep its hands off the new system, unless of course, there are compelling reasons to do so. Any considerations, such as a uniformity with other concerns, is not relevant for downgrading the existing benefits, which would have been in existence for about 40 years. Though the court set aside the award of the tribunal, replacing the existing system of dearness allowance with the new one, it remitted the matter to the tribunal for fresh consideration, in the light of the distortions and disparities in the wage packets of the workmen and their superior officers and the financial capacity of the company to bear the burden of the dearness allowance, because these facts have to be established by applying the relevant tests in this connection.[32] In Hindustan Lever, the facts disclosed that the claim of management for a ceiling on DA was accepted by the tribunal, which passed an order fixing a ceiling on a basic pay exceeding Rs 500 per month. The award of the tribunal was challenged by the union as well as the management in the High Court of Bombay. A single judge upheld the award, which was reversed by the Division Bench. The Division Bench was of the view that the prevailing dearness allowance system did not result in an over-neutralisation of the cost of living index at any level of income group and had maintained a tapering scale, though not a steeply declining one. And the system also did not result in the distortion of the total incomes, either of the workmen inter se, or between the workmen and their superiors, namely, the executive staff. Upholding the decision of Division Bench in a Special Leave Petition, Ahmadi J, observed:

> As is so well-known, wages are among the major factors in the economic and social life of the working classes. Workers and their families depend almost entirely on wages, to provide themselves with the three basic requirements of food, clothing and shelter. The other necessities of life, like children's education, medical expenses, etc, must also come out of the emoluments earned by the bread-winner. Workers are therefore, concerned with the purchasing power of the pay-packet they receive for their toil. If the rise in the pay-packet does not keep pace with the rise in the prices of essentials, the purchasing power of the pay-packet falls, reducing the real wages, leaving the workers and their families worse off. Therefore, if on account of inflation, prices rise while the pay-packet remains frozen, real wages will fall sharply. This is what happens in periods of inflation. In order to prevent such a fall in real wages, different methods are adopted to provide for the rise in the prices. In the cost-of-living sliding scale systems, the basic wages are automatically adjusted to price changes shown by the cost of living index. In this way, the purchasing power of the workers' wages is maintained to the extent possible and necessary. However, leap-frogging must be avoided.[33]

(v) Cost of Living Index and Consumer Price Index:

In India, a standarised type of family-living study was first initiated in Bombay in 1921. Such inquiries were also conducted in some centers in Bihar in 1923, in Sholapur in 1925 and in Ahmedabad in 1926. While reviewing the position of social surveys in India, the Royal Commission on Labour pointed out the great paucity of statistical material in this country, for judging the standard of living of the workers and recommended the conduct of socio-economic inquiries of the type of family living surveys. This report naturally gave an impetus to the conduct of family budget inquiries. In all the surveys that followed, sampling and interviewing techniques were adopted, though, of course, not of a such an advanced nature. A statistical analysis of the data collected was also attempted.[34]During the second world war, the Government of India appointed the Rau Court of Inquiry, constituted under the Trade Disputes Act 1929. The commission, inter alia, recommended that the Central Government should take up the responsibility for maintaining an up-to-date cost of living index number, for important areas and centres. The government accepted this recommendation and set up a special organisation called 'The Directorate of Cost of Living Index Numbers', and family budget inquiries among industrial workers were conducted at 28 centers during 1944-45, in the course of which, 2700 budgets were collected. A significant feature of these inquiries was that for the first time in this country, an attempt was made to conduct such inquiries simultaneously, at a large number of centres, under more or less uniform techniques. During the same period, the Labour Bureau of the Government of India and some of the organisations of the state governments, continued to conduct family budget inquiries from time to time, at specific areas or centres, either for deriving weighing diagrams for consumer price index numbers, or for collection of data required for fixation of minimum wages. In the background of these events, the Second Five Year Plan made the following noteworthy recommendations:

> The existing wage structure in the country comprises, in the main, of a basic wage and a dearness allowance. The latter component in a majority of cases, has relation to cost of living indices at different industrial centres. These indices have not been built up on a uniform basis; some of them are worked out on primary data, collected about 20 to 25 years ago and are, therefore, not a true reflection on the present spending habits of workers. Since one of the questions which the wage commission will have to take into > account is the demand made by the workers' organisations, for merging a part of the dearness allowance with the basic wage, evolving recommendations for such a merger, will not be sufficiently scientific, if the cost of living indices at different centres, do not have a uniform basis. Steps will therefore, have to be taken simultaneously, with the undertaking of a wage census, to institute inquiries for the revision of the present series of cost of living indices at different centres.[35]

Pursuant to the above recommendation in the Second Five Year Plan, the Labour Bureau, Ministry of Labour and Employment, Government of India, conducted a family living survey in 1958-59. The survey was based on the co-operation of several institutions and its technical details were worked out under the guidance of a technical advisory committee on the cost of living index numbers, consisting of the representatives from the Ministry of Labour Employment, Food & Agriculture, Finance, Planning Commission, The National Sample Survey Directorate, The Department of Statistics (CSO), the Indian Statistical Institute and the Reserve Bank of India. The field work was entrusted to the Directorate of National Sample Survey, and the processing and tabulation of the data collected in Sch A (family budget), to the Indian Statistical Institute, Calcutta. The tabulation of the data collected under Sch B, which dealt with the level of living, was done in the labour bureau. It was a multi-purpose survey, and so, the investigation conducted under it, covered both the family budget and the level of living. The ultimate analysis of the data, publication of reports on the results of the surveys and construction and maintenance of new series of consumer price index numbers, were the responsibilities of the labour bureau.

The first thing the organisation did was to define a 'working class family', which was the basic unit of the survey. It was defined in terms of sociological and economic considerations, as consisting of persons: (i) generally related by blood and marriage or adoption; (ii) usually living together and/or served from the same kitchen; and (iii) pooling a major part of their income and/or depending on a common pool of income, for a major part of their expenditure. The geographical area to be covered during the survey, was decided in consultation with the local organisations, both official and non-official. At the Ahmedabad centre, 46 localities were selected for the purpose of the survey; they consisted of 16 chawls, 21 labour colonies (housing societies) and 9 villages. Before setting the ultimate units of the family living survey, viz, the families, two types of sampling methods were adopted: tenement sampling and pay-roll sampling. The sample size for a centre was determined on the basis of the number of industrial workers, the type of sampling followed, the work-load manageable by an investigator and the required precision of weight to be derived from Sch A for consumer price index numbers. The sample size for Ahmedabad was 720 families, to be canvassed for Sch A. The number of samples finally collected & tabulated, was 722, for Sch A. The two samples drawn for Schedules A and B were, however, mutually exclusive, because canvassing for both the schedules from the same sampled families, would have caused fatigue, both to the investigators and to the informants. The whole sample was staggered over a period of twelve months, evenly, so as to eliminate seasonal effects on the consumption pattern. The selection of the sample was done in two stages. In the first stage, the chawls within each of the wards, were grouped to form blocks of about 150 households each and these blocks, along with the labour colonies (housing societies), were grouped to form clusters of about 450 households each, so that each cluster had blocks from different wards. From the list of these clusters and villages, four independent simple systematic samples of 12 clusters or villages each, were selected for the survey. Each of the 12 clusters sampled for an investigation, was assigned to a particular month for inquiry by a random process. That is how the first stage was arranged.

The second stage unit for selection was a working class family. Each month, the investigator listed all the families in the cluster allotted to that month, by a house-to-house visit and classified them as working class families and others. While listing, information was also collected on the family size, the expenditure class to which it belonged and the state of origin of the head of the family. This information was utilised to arrange the working class families in the cluster, first by family size, and within these classes, by expenditure class and within these, by the state of origin. A simple systematic sample of 20 working class families was drawn from this arranged list. Every fourth family in this sample was contacted for filling Sch B (on the level of living) and the remaining three were contacted for Sch A (on family budget). That is the nature of the procedure adopted while selecting the families for the sample survey and for determining the size of the sample. The sample survey was designed to cover a period of twelve months, at each centre. At the Ahmedabad centre, the work was carried on between August 1958 and July 1959. The method of survey was the interview method. The questionnaire which each investigator adopted, covered a wide range of subjects, accurate replies to some of which could not be had without explaining the significance of the question to the persons concerned.

The population of Ahmedabad is about 11.5 lakhs. The working class population in Ahmedabad was reported to be concentrated in thirteen localities. The markets predominantly patronised by the working class population in Ahmedabad, were six and it were these markets that were selected for the collection of retail prices, for the new service series of consumer price index number of the Ahmedabad centre. From the summary of the report, a broad idea as to the manner in which and the method by which the investigation was made, which ultimately led to the construction of the consumer price index number, is available. From the two respective inquiries, viz, the one held in 1926-27 and the other in 1958-59, the comparative contents of the basket, as devised by them, is available. The former inquiry reflects the consumption pattern of the working class as it existed in the year 1926 and the index number then devised was composed of five groups, viz, (i) food, (ii) fuel and lighting, (iii) clothing, (iv) house rent, and (v) miscellaneous. The food group in its turn, consisted of 16 items; the fuel and lighting group of four items; the clothing group of seven items; the house rent group of one item, viz, the house rent, and the miscellaneous, of two groups, viz, bidis and soap. Thus, in all, 30 items were included. These items represented 82.82 per cent of the average monthly expenditure and they were respectively, assigned 58, 710, 12 and 4 weights, which together aggregated 91. At the time of this inquiry, the items included in the investigation totalled 49; out of them, 30 were priced and 19 were unpriced, and in respect of the latter, the method of imputation was adopted. This series was prepared after collecting the budget of 985 families, when the estimated population of the city of Ahmedabad was nearly 3 lakhs. The new series is based on an inquiry into 722 working class families, conducted in 1958-59, when the total population of the city was about 11 lakhs. The total working class families at this time, were estimated to be 51.5 thousand; and so, the percentage of the sample size in relation to the universe of the working class families, would come to about 1.4 not less than 0.5. The weighing diagram for the new series is based on 110 articles, divided into the same main five groups, viz:

(1) food;

(2) fuel and lighting;

(3) clothing;

(4) housing; and,

(5) miscellaneous.

The important groups in this inquiry carried, respectively, the weights of 64.41, 6.22, 5.05, 9.08 and 15.24, which aggregated 100. The total number of items included in the basket was 239. Of these, 89 were priced items and 150 unpriced, and in respect of the latter, the method of imputation was adopted. In the new series, the unpriced items were considerably more than in the earlier one. The total expenditure of all the items in the 1926-27 inquiry, was Rs 36.01, of which Rs 32.35 was the expenditure on priced items and Rs 3.66 was the expenditure on non-priced items. In terms of percentage, the expenditure on priced items, to the total expenditure, was 89.8 per cent and the expenditure on unpriced items, to the total, was 10.2 per cent. In the latter inquiry of 1958-59, the total expenditure on all items was Rs 139.06. Of this, Rs 124.91 was the expenditure on priced items and Rs 14.15 was the expenditure on non-priced items. In terms of percentage, the first expenditure was 89.8 per cent and the second was 9.2 per cent. Thus, the expenditure on unpriced items in the latter inquiry is not larger than that in the former inquiry. The components of the basket at the time of the latter inquiry, had considerably increased, with the growth of the country's economy and the change in the standard of living of all citizens; so have the requirements of the working class increased and the components of the basket, which was devised in 1926-27, have now become completely obsolete. The following observation of the survey is significant:

> ...the consumer price index number measures nothing but changes in prices, as they affect a particular population group; and so, it is really a price index number, as distinct from a cost of living index number. In fact, these indices used to be termed as cost of living index numbers in the past, but in order to make their meaning clear, it was decided by the government to change the name to consumer price index numbers, in accordance with international recommendations and growing practice in other countries. Most of the state governments compiling such index numbers, have also adopted this usage.[36]

In Millowners' Assn, this survey was challenged by the Ahmedabad Millowners' Association, on various grounds. The industrial court did not accept the contention on behalf of the Millowners' Association, that the sample size was inadequate or had vitiated the quality of the survey and held that the method of inquiry adopted by the investigators, who conducted the survey, was by no means, unsatisfactory or unscientific and in its opinion, having regard to the local conditions, it was indeed the most feasible and satisfactory way to adopt. The industrial court, therefore, was of the opinion that the adoption of the interview method did not introduce any infirmity in the survey and held that the compilation of the consumer price index by the Labour Bureau, Simla, in the city of Ahmedabad, was proper and was not unscientific, nor did it suffer from any major infirmity. In appeal, the Supreme Court itself, considered the report and other evidence and the opinions of experts in detail and upheld the view taken by the industrial court. Speaking for the court, Gajendragadkar J, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

> This index number is intended to show over a period of time, the average percentage change in the prices paid by the consumers, belonging to the population group, proposed to be covered by the index, for a fixed list of goods and services consumed by them. The average percentage change, measured by the index, is calculated month after month, with reference to a fixed period. This fixed period is known as the 'base-period' of the index, and since the object of the index is to measure the effect of price-changes only, the price-changes have to be determined with reference to a fixed list of goods and services of consumption, which is known as a fixed 'basket' of goods and services.[37]

The index does not purport to measure the absolute level of prices, but only the average percentage change in the prices of a fixed basket of goods and services, at different periods of time. There are certain preliminary considerations which are relevant in the construction of consumer price index numbers. The first consideration is the purpose which the index is intended to serve, and that necessarily, involves the definition of the group of consumers to which the index is intended to relate. Then, it is necessary to determine the consumption level and pattern of the population group, at a period of time which generally, becomes the base-period of the index numbers. For that purpose, a list of commodities and services has to be made. Usually, this list would contain items of food, fuel and light, clothing and others; items of services, such as barber charges, bus fare, doctor's fee, etc, have also to be selected. It is the combined total of the items of commodities and services, that constitutes the basket. Then follows a description of the quality of each commodity and service, through which price-changes have to be measured. Generally, one quality, which is popularly consumed by the population group, is selected for each commodity and service. The importance of the weight which has to be attached to each commodity or service, is also a material factor. For instance, if rice is considered to be twice as important as wheat in the consumption pattern, the weight of rice will be two in relation to one of wheat. Having determined the consumption level and the pattern of the population group, the next task to attempt is to arrange for the regular collection of price data for the various qualities of commodities and services which enter the basket. With this material, the consumer price index has to be compiled from month to month, subsequent to the base-period. That, shortly stated, is the nature of the preliminary considerations which have to be borne in mind, while constructing the consumer price index numbers.

In Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn, the industrial court accepted the linking factor at 3.17, adopted by the Government of Gujarat, to link the existing series with the new series of 'Consumer Price Index Numbers', for the city of Ahmedabad. The Supreme Court held that the employers had not placed any material before the industrial court, to justify their contention, that for determining a linking factor, the behaviour of prices for two or three years during the relevant period, should be and could be studied and then a factor should be decided on the average rise in the prices during the period in question. However, the court made it clear that its decision on this point should not be taken to be of any general significance and should be confined to the facts of the case under consideration. If the employers and employees thought it necessary or desirable, that this question should be scientifically examined and determined in a general way, it would be appropriate for them to move the government to appoint a special body of experts to deal with it. But in the under noted case,[38] an increase of three rupees per month in the dearness allowance, on the ground that the cost of living had gone up and also on the ground that there were other sources of income for the employer, was held unjustified, as there was no evidence on record, to support such findings of the tribunal. The award of the increase in the dearness allowance, therefore, was quashed in a writ petition.

In Indian Oxygen, dealing with the demands of the workers of the Kanpur unit of the company, that the dearness allowance payable to the workmen at Kanpur, should be linked with the consumer price index for the industrial workers at Kanpur, the court observed that the consumer price number for industrial workers (base 1960-100) were being compiled and published by the Labour Bureau, Simla, every month in respect of 50 industrial centres, scattered all over the country.[39] The material collected is through the family surveys of working class families. There are six main groups for which indices for each centre are being compiled besides the general index. They are:

(i) Food;

(ii) Pan, supari, tobacco and intoxicants;

(iii) Fuel and light;

(iv) Housing;

(v) Clothing, bedding and footwear;

(vi) Miscellaneous.

Consumer price index numbers are intended to measure the relative temporal (overtime) changes in the price of a fixed basket of goods and services, consumed by the index population, in a current period, in relation to the base period. The index numbers are compiled by using the Laspeyres' formula. Broadly stated, this formula takes note of the base and current prices for a particular item and the quantity consumed of those items during the period, in relation to the base period. It would appear that for the compilation of an index, there are three essential requirements, namely: (1) a weighing diagram, which is the relative percentage share of the total consumption expenditure, as revealed by the basic family budget inquiry in respect of different items, (2) the base prices of the different items which go into the index basket, and (3) the current prices in respect of each one of the items featuring in the index basket. The weighing diagram for a centre is derived on the basis of the data collected through family budget inquiries, which were conducted in 1958-59, at each one of the 50 centres. The survey was conducted by taking all the samples of working class families, in each of the 50 centres and the data was collected by interviewing these families. Based on the results of the family budget inquiries, the average expenditure of a family per month, on different items of consumption, was arrived at. An all India average consumer price index number is a weighted average of the 50 centres' indices. This is compiled and published alongwith the index number for each centre.[40]

(vi) Rates and Scales of Dearness Allowance: Uniform rates and Flat rates

In Jardine Henderson, according to the practice prevalent in West Bengal, the employer company was paying dearness allowance at different rates, to its clerical and subordinate staff. In view of the deteriorating financial condition of the company, the Supreme Court affirmed the award of the tribunal, rejecting the demand of the workmen of the subordinate staff, for raising their dearness allowance to the level of the dearness allowance being paid to the clerical staff, viz, at a rate linked with the middle class cost of living index, though it did not allow the reduction in the rates of dearness allowance, as claimed by the employer, on the basis of the deteriorating financial position of the company.[41] In Greaves Cotton, the court upheld the validity of an award of the industrial tribunal, fixing the scales of dearness allowance for the subordinate staff and the factory workmen at the same rates as were applicable to the clerical staff. Speaking for the court Wanchoo J said:

> Time has now come when employees getting same wages should get the same dearness allowance irrespective of whether they are working as clerks, or members of subordinate staff or factory workmen. The pressure of high prices is the same on these various kinds of employees. Further, subordinate staff and factory-workmen these days, are keen to educate their children as clerical staff and in the circumstances there should be no difference in the amount of dearness allowance between employees of different kinds getting same wages. Further an employee whether he is of one kind or another getting the wage hopes for the same amenities of life and there is no reason why he should not get them, simply because he is, for example, a factory-workman though he may be coming from the same class of people as a member of clerical staff.[42]

The principle of Greaves Cotton, however, applies to the workmen of the same establishment. It cannot be stretched to different establishments. In WIMCO, Mudholkar J observed that there was no valid reason for compelling employers to offer uniform terms of employment to their employees working in different establishments because various considerations must enter into the question such as the value of their work to the employer, the employer's ability to pay, the cost of living, the availability of the persons for doing the particular kind of work and so on. Hence, in the circumstances of this case and in view of the history of industrial adjudication in Bengal, and also the precise reasons for adopting different rates of dearness allowance by the company for its employees at the sales office and the factory, the award of the industrial tribunal could not be characterised as contrary to principles of industrial law.[43] In Associated Power, the court held that there should be no disparity between the dearness allowance paid by the company to its employees at its two factories. In this case an electric company had two factories. Under the terms of agreement, the workmen working at one of the factories were given higher rates of dearness allowance and certain other benefits which were not given to the workmen at the other factory though the workmen were found to be transferable from one factory to the other and the same work was carried on by both the factories.[44]

In a case where a company is paying dearness allowance at different rates, the dearness allowance depends upon the place of posting of an employee. There may be some difficulty, however, to apply this principle to the case of an employee having no definite place of posting. In such a case, the principle that dearness allowance should be governed by the place of posting can only mean that the employees should get dearness allowance where their families (ie wife and children) are residing, for that would be the place of posting of such employees for all practical purposes.[45] In the language of Desai J, dearness allowance 'generally, has a local flavour'. Payment of dearness allowance, therefore, would depend upon the place where the workmen are working irrespective of the fact that industrial undertaking in which the workman is employed has a unit of industrial enterprise having all-India or inter-state operation. If the concept of uniformity on an all-India basis is introduced in the matter of dearness allowance, it would work havoc, because the price structure in a market economy at places like Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, Delhi, Ahmedabad has little or no relation to smaller centres like Kanpur. Uniformity and equality have to be amongst the equals measured by common denominator. In the matter of dearness allowance, any attempt at uniformity between the workmen working in metropolitan areas and smaller centres like Kanpur, would be destructive of the concept of dearness allowance. In other words, uniformity amongst the similar persons would be productive.

In respect of Sliding scale of rates though dearness allowance at a flat rate is permissible,[46] the whole purpose of dearness allowance, being to neutralise a portion of the increase in the cost of living, it should ordinarily be on a sliding scale and provide for an increase on rise in the cost of living and decrease on a fall in the cost of living[47] but where incremental scales of wages are fixed and dearness allowance is expressed as percentage of basic wages, then the dearness allowance will vary with the basic wages of the workmen in the same scale in accordance with the length of their service, which would not be fair. Hence, dearness allowance must be fixed on the basis of extra cost of feeding three consumption units on which basic wages are also based and that should apply whether the workman is in the highest or in the lowest rung of the ladder of his grade.[48] In Hindustan Motors, the Supreme Court directed that a sliding scale be attached to the dearness allowance awarded by the industrial tribunal on the lines that it will be liable to be increased or decreased on the basis of one rupee for every five points in case of rise and fall in the cost of living index from point 364 on the same lines as provided for in the third major engineering award.[49] Likewise, on consideration of all the circumstances in Hindustan Times, the Supreme Court directed that a sliding scale be attached to the dearness allowance of twenty-five rupees per month as awarded by the tribunal so as it will be liable to be increased or decreased on the basis of one rupee for every ten points in case of rise and fall in the cost of living from the base of 400, the 1939 index being taken to be 100.[50]

(vii) Revision of Dearness Allowance:

Increase and decrease in dearness allowance: Regarding increase in dearness allowance, the problem of constructing a wage-structure as well as a dearness allowance is to be tackled on the basis that wage structure and dearness allowance should not be changed from time to time; as they are long range plans,[51] but the passage of time brings in its train various improvements in the conditions of living of people due to scientific and technological advancements. This affects the living standards of the working classes as well. Besides, the gulf between the wages and the cost of living goes on widening with the increase in prices of commodities and other amenities. In the course of time, therefore, the dearness allowance which is given to compensate for the rise in the cost of living starts to sag down and then ceases to sufficiently make up the gap between wage and cost of living, and a revision of wages or dearness allowance then becomes necessary.[52] The principle is now settled that if the paying capacity of the employer increases or the cost of living shows an upward trend, the industrial employees would be justified in making a claim for the re-examination of the rates of the dearness allowance. The tribunal will not be normally justified in rejecting it solely on the ground that enough time has not passed after the making of the award. The question regarding revision will have to be examined on the merits of each industrial case by the tribunal concerned.[53] But like fixation of wages or dearness allowance, in the first instance, the revision of wage-structure or dearness allowance is equally a delicate operation. The wage-structure or dearness allowance, therefore, when fixed by the industrial adjudicator as reasonable after a fair consideration of the available material should not be disturbed except on clear proof of error or unfairness.[54] Further, as in the case of basic wage, no change in existing scales of dearness allowance should also be made unless there is a material change in the circumstances or any other strong reasons to revise the scale.[55] The industrial adjudication has evolved certain principles for revising the wage structure or dearness allowance.[56] For instance in Remington Rand, the Supreme Court indicated the circumstances which would justify upward revision of the dearness allowance fixed under a settlement or award, viz,

(i) improvement in the financial position of the employer subsequent to the settlement or award; or

(ii) rise in the cost of living subsequent to such settlement or award.

Speaking for the court, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> It is quite conceivable that if the cost of living shows a tendency to rise very high, the workmen would be entitled to claim that there should be a change in rates of dearness allowance basically fixed in order to allow them more neutralisation, and such a demand cannot be rejected without examining its merits solely on the ground that because a provision is made for adjustment from time to time, the scheme ought to remain in force for all time and cannot be reopened or re-examined.[57]

In this case, the rates of dearness allowance were linked with the cost of living index fixed under the terms of settlement between the parties in 1953. The settlement also provided for increase in the rates of dearness allowance on a percentage basis linked to the increase in the then cost of living index. The demand raised by the workmen for revision of the dearness allowance in 1958 was referred to the tribunal in 1959. Taking into consideration the relevant factors ie, the financial capacity of the employer to bear the additional burden, the rise in the cost of living and the rates of dearness allowance paid to workmen in comparable concerns, the tribunal increased the dearness allowance. The award was affirmed by the Supreme Court. But when the circumstances disclosed improvement in the financial position of the employer and high rise in the cost of living subsequent to a settlement or award have been established, a claim for revision of dearness allowance cannot be rejected without examining it on merits.[58] In other words, the industrial adjudication has to bear in mind the other two principles, namely, the financial capacity of the employer to bear the burden of enhanced clearness allowance and the industry-cum-region rule. As in fixing wage scales or dearness allowance so also in revising the same, two principal factors must weigh with the adjudicator, i.e., how the wages prevailing in the establishment in question compare with those given to workmen of similar grades or scales by similar establishments in the same industry or in their absence in similar establishments in other industries in the region and what wage scales the establishment in question can pay without any undue strain on its financial resources.[59] In Bengal Chemicals, the tribunal took the view that since the employer company by a settlement had agreed to pay increased dearness allowance if there was a substantial change in the cost of living index, the question of the financial capacity of the company did not come in for consideration. But in appeal, the Supreme Court said that the financial burden that will be thrown on the company by reason of dearness allowance is a very material and relevant factor to be taken into account in such circumstances.[60] In Cinema Theatres, the increase in the cost of living index over a course of nine years was held to be a 'change of circumstances', justifying an upward revision of the wages-scales and dearness allowance for the concerned employees fixed in the year 1951.[61]

In another case involving Remington Rand, the workmen employed at the Bangalore office of the company raised an industrial dispute for the revision of dearness allowance. The tribunal found that the cost of living index in Bangalore for 1965 was 641.74 while the corresponding figure for Madras in that month was 617. It further noted that the company had revised the scales of dearness allowance in July 1961, but in spite of this, there was a disparity in the payment of dearness allowance to workmen working at Madras and to those working at Bangalore and, therefore, held that there was no reasonable justification for the disparity. In view of the enormous profits the company was making, the tribunal directed that the dearness allowance should be paid to the employees of the Bangalore branch at the rate at which and in the manner in which it was paying dearness allowance to its employees at Madras regional office. In appeal by a special leave, the court, after noticing that the cost of living index at Bangalore was higher than that of Madras, affirmed the award of the tribunal.[62] In Karam Chand Thapar, the workmen claimed upward revision of dearness allowance in accordance with the Bengal Chamber of Commerce scheme in view of two facts, viz, that there was a steep rise in the price of living index and also that the company was in financial position to afford the claimed dearness allowance. But the employer company resisted the claim on the ground that the demand of the workmen for dearness allowance according to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce scheme had been consistently rejected by the tribunals and also by the Supreme Court. The court held that the steep rise in the cost of living index between the period of the earlier award and the award under appeal, was considered to be sufficient justification for the revision of the rates of dearness allowance.[63]

Note: For a detailed discussion on decrease in dearness allowance, see notes and comments under 'Reduction in wage-structure'.

(viii) Retrospective Award of Dearness Allowance:

In Phaltan Sugar, dearness allowance was revised by an award of the industrial tribunal directing retrospective operation of the award. Such revision was directed to come into effect not from the date of reference but from some date subsequent thereto but earlier than the date of making of the award. It was also found that the financial capacity of the employer at the relevant time was satisfactory. The Supreme Court in appeal, held that the tribunal could have directed retrospective operation of the revised rates of dearness allowance even from the date of reference.[64] However, once dearness allowance is fixed by the award of an industrial tribunal, it becomes a condition of service and any vital change in the financial position of the management can be brought about only after asking for yet another adjudication on the basis of such altered circumstances vitally effecting the capacity of the employer to pay.[65] The question of retrospective operation of awards 'relating to wages' has been discussed in detail under the head 'Wages' caption—'Retrospective award of wages'.

Sub-clause (ii) - Housing Accommodation

The NCL-I cited the following observations made by the Rege Committee (1944-46) on housing:

> Very little, by way of providing more and better housing for industrial labour, has been done either by government or municipalities. Employers have no doubt made some contribution to better housing by erecting lines, tenements or small cottages in certain industrial centres. The houses created by them differ greatly from one another and only a small percentage of workers are, on the whole, accommodated in them. It may, however, be said that employers' tenements are, all things considered together, far superior to the slums that have been allowed to develop in cities...a perusal of our ad hoc survey reports in respect of different industries would show that the housing conditions in general are far from satisfactory.[66]

The problem of housing industrial labour is a very big problem and involves a huge amount. Efforts are being made by the Central Government to invite the co-operation of industrial employers to tackle this problem with progressively increasing financial and other assistance offered by the state governments. The problem has also been engaging the attention of all the three organs of the state, ie, the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. There have been several enactments on the subject. It is obvious that the problem cannot be tackled in isolation by industrial tribunals, in meeting the housing demands made by employees in individual cases. In Patna Electric Supply Co, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> It is necessary to emphasise that, in considering the claims of workmen sympathetically on the ground of social and economic justice, industrial adjudication has to bear in mind the interests of national economy and progress which are relevant and > material...In the present economic condition of our industries, it would be inexpedient to impose this additional burden on the employers. Such an imposition may retard the progress of our industrial development and production and thereby prejudicially affect the national economy. Besides, such an imposition on the employers would ultimately be passed by them to the consumers and that may result in an increase in prices which is not desirable from the national point of view. It is true that the concept of social justice is not static and may expand with the growth and prosperity of our industries and a rise in our production and national income; but so far as the present state of our national economy and general financial condition of our industry are concerned, it would be undesirable to think of introducing such an obligation on the employers today. That is why we think the industrial tribunals have very wisely refused to entertain pleas for housing accommodation made by workmen from time to time against their employers.[67]

In the circumstances of this case, the tribunal had not discussed the question about the financial liability of the employer to meet the additional burden imposed by the award. However, in view of the erroneous view with respect to the effect of the housing scheme sanctioned by the Bihar Government, taken by the tribunal, the award was set aside. Later, in Tocklai Experimental Station, the court held that under the present economic conditions prevailing in the country, the responsibility for providing housing accommodation could not reasonably be placed solely on the shoulders of the employer and expressed the hope that, in due course, the problem may have to be tackled by the industry in co-operation with the state and the state would have to bear a part of that responsibility. In the circumstances of this case, the enhancement of the house rent allowance at a flat rate of Rs 20 instead of Rs 10 was held to be justified. But allowing this enhancement, the court stated a further test that a demand for the provision of housing accommodation could be entertained, if the financial position of the employer could bear the burden.[68] In United Salt Works, Gajendragadkar J explained that the observations in Patna Electric were 'not intended to lay down an invariable or inflexible rule. Exceptions can and should be made where circumstances justify the departure from the said observations'. In the circumstances of this case, it was held that the undertaking given by the employer to make reasonable provision for housing to all its permanent employees, would meet the ends of justice.[69] In Mohammed & Sons, Wanchoo CJI observed:

> We do not think that conditions have changed since that decision was given and we still think that the responsibility for providing housing facilities should not be thrown on the industries in this country under the present conditions. [70]

In Shevaroy Bauxite, in view of the very low terms of remuneration of the workmen and the financial capacity of the employers, the Supreme Court upheld the direction of the tribunal awarding a house-rent allowance to the workers as well as staff members of the company equal to 10 per cent per month of the basic wage or pay of the workmen or staff, subject to a minimum of Rs 5 and maximum of Rs 25.[71] In Corpn of Madras, the workmen of the corporation were entitled to house-rent allowance in terms of the recommendations of the pay commission. The workmen concerned were given quarters by the corporation in view of the nature of their duties. But after occupying the quarters for about a month, the workmen vacated the quarters and claimed house-rent allowance in terms of their entitlement. The corporation declined to pay the house-rent on the plea that when quarters were provided for them, the workmen could not refuse the same and claim house rent. The workmen, therefore, filed applications under s 33C(2) for computation of the benefit of house-rent and the labour court directed the payment of house rent allowance to the workmen. In a writ petition against the order of the labour court, the Madras High Court upheld the direction of the labour court as there was no condition in the rules relating to the service of the workmen that they should occupy the quarters and that in lieu of their occupation of the quarters the house-rent allowance shall not be payable.[72]

On the other hand, in Indian Oxygen, the employer company had built four quarters within the premises of its factory, intended to lodge the workmen employed in its watch and ward department. The relevant Standing Order provided that after the employer provided any quarters to a watch and ward employee, it shall be for his personal use only and he shall not permit outsiders to use them. Though the quarters in question were built with the intention of lodging therein its watch and ward employees, the fact that it had done, so did not mean that it was under an obligation to give them to the workmen. The workmen employed in the watch and ward department, raised a dispute claiming that they were entitled to be provided with the said quarters, that the company had imposed an unreasonable condition that the quarters would only be for their personal use and that even their families would not be permitted to reside with them therein, that therefore, none of them except one could live in those quarters and; consequently, the company was bound to pay, in lieu of those quarters, quarter allowance to each one of them at the rate of Rs 15 per month. The tribunal allowed the claim and directed the company to pay to each of the said workmen, Rs 10 per month as quarter allowance. But in appeal, the Supreme Court observed that the tribunal misconstrued the relevant provision in the Standing Orders in assuming that the company was under an obligation to provide quarters, which assumption was not borne out by the provisions of the Standing Orders in question, and if there was no obligation on the employer to provide the workmen with quarters, their claim for quarter allowance in lieu of quarters was not sustainable and, therefore, held that the tribunal was manifestly in error in holding that in a case where the company did not provide quarters to anyone of these workmen with permission to live with his family, the company should pay quarter allowance. The award, therefore, was set aside.[73]

Sub-clause (ii) - Supply of Light and water:

The value of the supply of light and water also has been brought within the ambit of the definition of wages where these are supplied to the workmen.

Sub-clause (ii) - Medical Attendance:

The medical and surgical benefit plans providing hospitalisation of workers or the group health insurance, sickness and accident compensation schemes were pioneered by enlightened employers as an important part of their developing personnel policies and programmes.[74] Two factors, however, have contributed to direct financing of such plans by employers, viz,

(1) because such payments can be made 'before income tax', and

(2) because direct financing can provide greater benefit to the workmen also, as, if the same amount were paid to the workmen as wages, each employee will be forced to pay taxes on that.

In recent years, the trade unions have sought the expansion of the coverage of these schemes. Consequently, more liberal plans not only by increasing benefit amounts but also by adding to the kinds of medical services provided have been introduced. For the above reasons, the employers have not disagreed about the desirability of the medical benefit plans. On this issue, the employers, therefore, cannot be cast in the role of employees' antagonist. The issue in negotiation has essentially been the degree and cost of particular liberalisation of those benefit plans.[75] The Government of India enacted the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948, designed to provide cash benefits in case of sickness, maternity and employment injury, payment in the form of pension to dependents of workers who died of employment injuries and medical benefit to workers. Workers' families were also brought into the scheme later. It introduced contributory principle to cover these contingencies, provided protection against sickness, replaced lump sum payments by pension in the case of dependent's benefit and placed the liability for claims on a statutory Organisation. The Act applies to all non-seasonal factories run with power and employing twenty or more persons, excluding mines or railway running sheds. It covers all employees, manual, clerical and supervisory, and employees engaged by or through contractors, whose remuneration does not exceed Rs 500 per month. Moreover, the definition of 'employee' has been enlarged to include administrative staff and the persons engaged in connection with purchase of raw materials or sale or distribution of products and related functions by an amendment of the Act in 1966. It can be extended to cover other establishments or classes of establishments, industrial, commercial, agricultural, or otherwise. The scheme has been gradually extended but because of the vastness of the country and the considerable preparatory work involved, such as provision of building, equipment and personnel, the scheme could not be implemented throughout the country simultaneously. A plan for its phased extension to different places was drawn up. Transitory provisions which require payment of special contributions by all employers had to be introduced to meet the objection of the employers in covered areas that Employees State Insurance scheme levy would affect their competitive position adversely. The contribution of employers in implemented areas was fixed on a rate higher than that for employers in non-implemented areas.[76] In this work, a detailed discussion of the Employees State Insurance Act and the scheme is out of place. In Remington Rand, the three awards of industrial tribunals were challenged by the employer company before the Supreme Court, on the grounds that:

(i) the provision for medical facilities is the responsibility not of the employer, but, in a welfare state, of the government;

(ii) assuming that it is an employer's obligation, medical expenses, which a workman would ordinarily have to incur, were looked after and taken into account when fair wages were settled; and

(iii) in any event, medical facilities, including those to the workmen's family and without any ceiling, could not be sustained.

Regarding medical facilities to workmen and their families, the Supreme Court observed:

> The tribunals in these cases, not only did not fix any ceiling, but also did not define who would be the members of the family of a workman. Obviously, in such a scheme, the possibility of its being abused, cannot be altogether ruled out. It was, therefore, necessary that if the tribunal desired to impose such an additional obligation on the company, it should have made a proper scheme, defining the limits of the company's obligation, both as to the ceiling on the benefit and the beneficiaries thereunder. Vague and indefinite directions, instead of fostering harmony, are likely to open up a vista for future bickerings and disputes in their implementation.[77]

However, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the court gave certain directions modifying the awards. In a later case of the same company, the Supreme Court introduced the same scheme for the workmen in the Madras office of the company also.[78] In National Insurance, affirming the award of the tribunal, directing the employer company to appoint a medical practitioner, and to pay to the employees, medical expenses, if certified by the medical practitioner, not exceeding Rs 100 a year, the Supreme Court held that the award was fair and reasonable and the demand for Rs 300 a year was too excessive and the suggestion for the allowance to be carried forward could not be accepted, as it was neither proper nor legitimate.[79] In*National and Grindlays Bank*, the tribunal directed that the employees of the Kanpur Branch of the National and Grindlays Bank, would be entitled to medical aid and expenses, up to a monetary limit of Rs 250 per annum, which would be available to the employees as well as to the members of their families. The tribunal further allowed hospitalisation charges, not only for the employees, but also for members of their families. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court noticed that under the bipartite agreement, the workmen were having the benefit of medical aid extended to the members of their families, which was not applicable to the workmen before. It was observed that even though the employees of the Kanpur Branch had no upper limit, their families were given the benefit of medical aid and there was no justification for the tribunal to extend the hospitalisation facilities to the members of their families, if that was not enjoyed by the workmen in the other branches of the appellant bank and in other banks which were similarly situated. Hence, there was no justification for giving the employees of the Kanpur branch, a favoured treatment, which other employees of the banks and even of the appellant bank, in other branches, could not avail, under the bipartite agreement. In view of the fact that the bank was agreeable to give a higher limit, as indicated in its offer before the conciliation officer, which offer was also reiterated before the court, the Supreme Court allowed the appeal partly and directed a higher limit of Rs 250 to be fixed towards medical aid and expenses of the employees of the Kanpur branch and their families, as defined in the bipartite agreement, and also entitled each of the workmen to hospitalisation, in terms of the said agreement.[80]

Sub-clause (ii) - Other Amenities:

The value of any other amenity, any service or any concessional supply of food grains or other requisites, has also been included within the meaning of wages, by this clause. Such amenities, services or concessions, therefore, will have to be taken into account as a component of the wages.

Sub-Clause (iii) - Travelling Concession:

The expression ‘any travelling concession’, used in the definition of wage under s 2(rr)(iii), connotes a concession specifically provided by the employer, in the form of free travelling or travelling at a reduced rate.[81] In the group of appeals reported as Atul Products, the Industrial Tribunal of Gujarat rejected the claim of the workmen, for a free transport facility, but directed the company to pay an allowance of 15 paise per day to every employee who stayed at a distance of five miles or more, from the village Atul, but such allowance need not be paid on days on which the employee was on earned leave or any other type of leave, authorised or otherwise. These directions were challenged by the company as well as the workmen, before the Supreme Court, in cross-appeals. While the company wanted the allowance awarded by the tribunal to be set aside, the workmen, on the other hand, required the allowance to be enhanced. In this group of appeals, both the companies took the plea that it was not the function or duty of an employer to provide transport facilities or pay an allowance for the same. The common question for consideration of the court, therefore, related to the claim of the workmen for the payment of a transport allowance, to enable them to go from their place of residence to the place of work. Both the companies were public limited companies, engaged in the business of manufacturing dyes and chemicals and other intermediates and were having their factories in the village Atul. The basis of the claim made by the workmen of both these companies was, that the majority of the workmen employed in these companies came from a distance of 5 to 10 miles. Since the factories were not situated in a place where labour force was available easily, majority of the workmen had to come from distant villages or the town of Bulsar, and the workmen, therefore, had to incur a bus fare of 40 paise per trip from Bulsar to Atul and another 40 paise for the return journey. Therefore, each day, a workman had to incur and expense of 80 paise as bus fare, in going to the village Atul from Bulsar and back and this was too much of an expense, which could not be borne by an employee from and out of his wages. In the case of Atul Products, the demand was for a uniform allowance of Rs 15 per month, while in the case of Atic Industries, the demand was slightly different. In the circumstances of the case, the directions of the tribunal were held justified. The court also rejected the appeal of the workmen in Atic Industries, for enhancement of the allowance merely because the financial capacity of the employer was sound and could bear the additional burden.[82] In Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking, one of the demands in dispute related to the claim of the workmen for an increase in the conveyance allowance of the inspectors and superintendents of the Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking. The tribunal rejected the claim, on the ground that the conveyance allowance had already been fixed for motorcycles and motorcars on a rational basis and that any disturbance in the rates, will have repercussions on every category of workmen. But having due regard to the increase in the cost of maintenance, fuel, etc, which the employer had itself taken note of and the extra mileage that had to be covered, the Supreme Court, in appeal, gave an increase of Rs 25 and Rs 12.5 per month, to the superintendents and inspectors, respectively, over the existing rates of allowance given to them.[83]

Sub-Clause (iv) - Commission

This sub-clause has been inserted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982. It includes any commission payable on the promotion of sale or promotion of business, or both. Previously, commission was not considered to be a part of the wages, as its quantum varied with the promotion of sales or business, brought about by the workman. But now, commission payable to a workman on promotion of sale or business or both, has specifically been made a component of 'wages'.

Excluded Items

(a) Bonus

The use of the word 'any' before bonus, indicates that it is not only the bonus payable under the Payment of Bonus Act 1965, but a bonus of any type would not form a part of the 'wages', under the Act. Insofar as a bonus under the Payment of Bonus Act is concerned, there is no difficulty in its exclusion from the wages. In Orissa SRTC, the Orissa High Court held that the minimum statutory bonus payable under the Payment of Bonus Act 1965, is excluded from the definition of wages. Therefore, it would not form a part of the back-wages awarded to the workman. But, since the workman had been reinstated with full back wages, he would have been entitled to the statutory minimum bonus payable to him for the period during which he was out of the job, apart from the wages. Therefore, he was entitled to the bonus, though separately. Even a bonus which, in nature, is akin to such bonus, though not covered by the Act, would be excluded from the meaning of wages. But in the case of any other type of 'bonus', the question that arises is whether such 'bonus' is a 'remuneration' within the meaning of the principal clause, or an allowance, within the meaning of cl (i) of the including clause, or is it a bonus within the meaning of the excluding cl (a)? For instance, in view of its incidents, production bonus, which is sometimes called the incentive wage or incentive bonus, would appositely fall within the meaning of the word 'remuneration', rather than under bonus. It is, therefore, a question of fact, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, as to whether a particular 'bonus' would fall within the meaning of the words, 'remuneration', 'allowance' or 'bonus', as used in the definition.[84]

In State Bank of India, a novel contention was raised before the writ court, that the parties to the settlement-award had understood and intended that, for computing the wages payable to the workmen, bonus, the contribution of the employer towards the provident fund and the gratuity, were also to be included. However, in view of the absence of any pleading or evidence before the tribunal or the High Court, the contention was rejected.[85] In Bala Subrahmanya Rajaram, dealing with the definition of wages under s 2(vi) under the Payment of Wages Act 1936, the relevant portion of which is in pari materia with the definition of 'wages' under this Act, the Supreme Court held that the bonus which is not payable under the contract of employment, but is payable because of the award of the industrial tribunal, is not 'wages' within the meaning of the Payment of Wages Act.[86]

In Vayitri Plantations, the Kerala High Court held that the monthly ex gratia payment made to workmen, which was not a part of the original contract of employment, but was offered by the employer, long after the employee's promotion, on terms that it was in appreciation of his good services and the payment had to be shown separately in the books and records of the employer and was liable to be increased or decreased or totally withdrawn, at the discretion of the employer, was not includible for the purposes of computing the wages.[87]

(b) Contribution to Pension or Provident Fund etc

The contribution made by the employer, to any pension fund or provident fund or for any other benefit of the workmen, under any law, for the time being in force, has also specifically been excluded from the definition of 'wages', by the excluding cl (b). Such contributions made by industrial employers, for retiral or other benefits of their workmen, therefore, cannot be taken into account in computing 'wages' for the purposes of the Act. Hence, any dispute relating to any such items would not be covered under item one of the Third Schedule, though it may fall under item five of that Schedule.

(c) Gratuity

Gratuity has also been excluded from the definition of wages. Any type of gratuity, whether under the Payment of Gratuity Act or otherwise, will, therefore, not be taken into account in computing wages for the purposes of this Act.

Wage Concepts

The Committee on Fair Wages had identified three distinct levels of wages, i.e., (i) the minimum wage; (ii) the fair wage; and (iii) the living wage. Justice Gajendragadkar observed that "in an expanding economy, the contents of these expressions also expand and vary."[88] These levels naturally, do not represent a static, inflexible concept; they would vary and expand according to the economic development and compulsions of social justice'.[89] It is, therefore, very difficult, if not quite impossible, to define, or even describe accurately, the contents of the terms 'living wage', 'fair wage' or 'minimum wage'. These terms, or their variants—the 'comfort or decency level', the 'subsistence level', and the 'poverty or the floor level'—cannot and do not mean the same thing in all countries, nor even in different industries in the same country. What may be a fair wage in a particular industry in one country, may be a living wage in the same industry in another country. Similarly, what may be a fair wage in a given industry today, may cease to be fair and border on the minimum wage, in the future.[90] In other words, the concepts of 'minimum wage', 'fair wage' and 'living wage' are not static and would keep on changing with the circumstances, with the growth, both of industries and of the economy, the living standards and circumstances of the industries and the people.[91] The following passage of Philip Snowden on the wage concepts was cited by Das Gupta J, in Hindustan Times:[92]

> At the bottom of the ladder, there is the minimum basic wage, which the employer of any industrial labour must pay, in order to be allowed to continue an industry. Above this is the fair-wage, which may roughly be said to approximate to the need-based minimum, in the sense of a wage which is 'adequate to cover the normal needs of the average employee, regarded as a human being in a civilised society'. Above the fair wage, is the 'living wage'—a wage which will maintain the workman in the highest state of industrial efficiency, which will enable him to provide his family with all the material things which are needed for their health and physical well being, enough to enable him to qualify to discharge his duties as a citizen.[93]

This statement has been reiterated by the court in Workmen v Management of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd , where Kuldip Singh J said:

> Broadly, the wage-structure can be divided into three categories-the basic 'minimum wage', which provides bare subsistence and is at poverty-line level, a little above is the 'fair-wage' and finally, the 'living wage', which comes at a comfort level.[94]

However, the court further observed that though it is not possible to demarcate these levels of the pay structure with any precision, these are well-accepted norms, which broadly distinguish one category of pay-structure from another.

Minimum Wage

As a matter of fact, the concept of 'minimum wage' has recently undergone a progressive change. It is no longer based upon the subsistence theory, according to which minimum wage equals the cost of commodities necessary to feed and clothe a worker and his family. In Hindustan Times (supra), Das Gupta J said, 'at the bottom of the ladder, there is the minimum basic wage, which the employer of any industrial labour must pay in order to be allowed to continue an industry'. In other words, the minimum wage is the lowest wage in the scale, below which the efficiency of a worker is likely to be impaired. However, the content of the expression 'minimum wage' too, is not fixed and static. It varies and is bound to vary from time to time and from place to place. With the growth and development of national economy, living standards would improve and so would the notions about the respective categories of wages expand and be more progressive.[95] According to the Committee on Fair Wages:

> The minimum wage must provide not merely for the sustenance of life, but for the preservation of the efficiency of the worker. For this purpose, the minimum wage must also accommodate some measure of education, medical requirements and amenities.[96]

The Committee categorically stated that an industry which was incapable of paying this minimum wage, had no right to exist and in cases where the continued existence of such an industry was imperative, in the larger interest of the country, it was the responsibility of the state to take steps to enable that industry to pay at least the minimum wage. The Committee was of the definite view that for fixing the minimum wage, no regard should be paid to the capacity of the industry to pay and it should be based solely on the requirements of the worker and his family. In other words, the Committee recognised that the minimum wage, as described, formed a part of the fair wage, though at its lower level. For claiming such a wage, the employee, in its view, should not be called upon to prove an employer's capacity to pay.[1] These predilections of the Committee on Fair Wages, in favour of the minimum wage, have been reverberated by industrial adjudicators in their awards and particulars by the Supreme Court, in its judicial dicta. In Phaltan Sugar, the labour appellate tribunal said that the minimum wage now includes not only the bare physical necessities, but also a modicum of comforts, otherwise known as conventional necessities.[2] The Tripartite Committee of the Indian Labour Conference, held in New Delhi in 1957, declared the wage policy which was to be followed during the second five-year plan. The Committee accepted the following five norms for the fixation of 'minimum wages':

(i) In calculating the minimum wage, the standard working class family should be taken to consist of 3 consumption units for one earner; the earnings of women, children and adolescents should be disregarded.

(ii) The minimum food requirement should be calculated on the basis of a net intake of calories, as recommended by Dr Aykroyd, for an average Indian adult of moderate activity.

(iii) Clothing requirements should be estimated at a per capita consumption of 18 yards per annum, which would give the average worker's family of four, a total of 72 yards.

(iv) In respect of housing, the rent corresponding to the minimum area provided for under the government's industrial housing scheme, should be taken into consideration in fixing the minimum wage.

(v) Fuel, lighting and other 'miscellaneous' items of expenditure should constitute 20 of the total minimum wage.[3]

(vi) Children's education, medical requirement, minimum recreation, including festivals/ceremonies and provision for old age, marriage, etc, should further constitute 25 percent of the total minimum wage.[4]

The standards of minimum wage, as laid down by the committees, were adopted by the Supreme Court also, in holding that the minimum wage must provide not merely for the bare subsistence of life, but also for the preservation of the efficiency of the worker and for this purpose, the minimum wage must also provide for some measure of education, medical requirements and amenities and that the minimum wage rates must ensure not only the mere physical needs of the worker, which would keep him just above starvation, but must father ensure for him, not only his subsistence and that of his family, but also to preserve his efficiency as a workman.[5] This judicially pronounced concept of the components of the minimum wage has been generally accepted by industrial adjudication. Sometimes, the 'minimum wage' is described as a 'bare-minimum wage', in order to distinguish it from the wage structure, which is 'subsistence plus' or fair wage. But too much emphasis on the adjective 'bare' in relation to the minimum wage, is apt to lead to an erroneous assumption, that 'minimum wage' is a wage which enables the worker to cover his bare physical needs and keep himself just above starvation. That clearly is not intended by the concept of 'minimum wage'. On the other hand, since the capacity of the employer to pay is treated as irrelevant, it is but right that no addition should be made to the components of the minimum wage, which would take minimum wage near the lower level of fair wage, but the components of this concept must ensure for the employee, not only his subsistence and that of his family, but must also preserve his efficiency as a worker.[6] In the words of Hegde J:

> Minimum wage does not mean wage just sufficient for bare sustenance. At present, the concept of a minimum wage is a wage which is somewhat intermediate to a wage which is just sufficient for bare sustenance and a fair wage. That concept includes not only a wage sufficient to meet the bare sustenance of an employee and his family, but it also includes expenses necessary for his other primary needs, such as medical expenses, expenses to meet some education for his children and in some cases, transport charges etc.[7]

This concept of minimum wage is in harmony with the theory that in all civilised countries, minimum wage approximates to the statutory minimum wage which the state should strive to achieve, particularly in this country, having regard to the Directive Principles of the State Policy, enshrined in the Constitution. The recommendations of the Committee on Fair Wages, that in awarding the minimum wage, the capacity of the employer to pay is irrelevant and where an industry cannot afford to pay the minimum wage, it has no right to exist, has also been emphasised by judicial pronouncements. In Bijay Cotton Mills, dealing with a challenge to the constitutional validity of the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act, relating to fixation of minimum wages, on the grounds of repugnancy to Art. 19(1)(g), speaking for the Supreme Court, Mukherjea Jobserved:

> Individual employers might find it difficult to carryon their business on the basis of the minimum wages fixed under the Act, but this must be due entirely to the economic conditions of these particular employers. That cannot be a reason for striking down the law itself, as unreasonable.[8]

In Crown Aluminium Works, Gajendragadkar J vehemently held that the principle, that no industry has the right to exist unless it is able to pay its workmen at least a bare minimum wage, admits no exceptions, and the employment of labour on starvation wages cannot be encouraged or favoured in a modern democratic welfare state. If, therefore, an employer cannot maintain his enterprise without cutting down the wages of his employees below even a bare subsistence or minimum wage, he would have no right to conduct his enterprise on such terms.[9] These dicta have since become classic.[10] In Express Newspapers, speaking for the court, Bhagwati J, observed:

> ...whereas the bare minimum or subsistence wage would have to be fixed irrespective of the capacity of the industry to pay, the minimum wage thus contemplated, postulates the capacity of the industry to pay and no fixation of wages which ignores this essential factor of the capacity of the industry to pay, could ever be supported. [11]

But in U Unichoyi (supra) explaining these observations, Gajendragadkar J said that in the Express Newspapers' case, the court was dealing with the statutory wage structure, where s 9 of the Working Journalists (Conditions of Service and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1955, authorised the imposition of a wage structure very much above the level of the minimum wage and the observations of Bhagwati J in that case, were made in that context, which could not be and should not be divorced from the text of the provisions, with respect to which they were made. In Kamani Metals, speaking for the court, Hidayatullah J, with eloquent candour remarked:

> ...minimum wage which, in any event, must be paid, irrespective of the extent of profits, the financial condition of the establishment or the availability of workmen on lower wages. This minimum wage is independent of the kind of industry and applies to all alike big or small. It sets the lowest limit below which wages cannot be allowed to sink, in all humanity.[12]

The same sentiment has been reverberated by Kuldip Singh J, in Raptakos Brett, in observing that the wage-structure which approximately answers the six components enumerated therein, is nothing more than a 'minimum wage' at subsistence level and added that the employees are entitled to the 'minimum wage' at all times and under all circumstances. An employer who cannot pay the minimum wage has no right to engage labour and no justification to run the industry.[13] In S Krishna Murty, in a writ petition under Art. 32 of the Constitution, filed on behalf of the workmen of the irrigation department of the Andhra Pradesh State Government, the Supreme Court noted that no minimum wage had been fixed for the category of the workmen like the workmen employed in the irrigation department. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the court directed the state government to fix the minimum wage for such workmen within four months from the date of the order.[14] The concept of minimum wage too, is dynamic. It is a wage-structure above the mere subsistence wage. It takes into account, primary amenities, such as medical care and education. As the standard of living increases, there must be a gradual change in the concept of the minimum wage, in any developing economy.[15] In fixing this wage, the industrial adjudicator or any other authority, will have to consider the position from the point of view of the worker. This wage will, therefore, have to be fixed irrespective of the capacity of the industry to pay.[16] In other words, it is the first charge on the 'industry'.[17] It is universally recognised that a minimum wage must be prescribed to prevent the evil of 'sweating' and for the benefit of workmen, who are not in a position to bargain with their employers.[18]The minimum wage policy, as it has emerged in this country, distinguishes between the organised industries and the sweated ones. The Minimum Wages Act 1948 is an instrument which seeks to protect the interests of the workers in the latter. In the organised sector, the wage fixing authorities have generally been guided by the report of the Committee on Fair Wages. The minimum wage defined by it, indicated only the components which should be taken into account in fixing the minimum wage. It was the Indian Labour Conference (15th session) which, for the first time, moved in the direction of formally quantifying its main components.[19] A Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery Convention was held in Geneva, in the year 1928 and the resolutions passed in that Convention were embodied in the International Labour Code. These resolutions required that for the purpose of determining the minimum rates of wages to be fixed:

> ... the wage-fixing body should, in any case, take account of the necessity of enabling the workers concerned, to maintain a suitable standard of living. For this purpose, regard should primarily be had to the rates of wages being paid for similar work in trades where the workers are adequately organised and have concluded effective collective agreements, or, if no such standard of reference is available in the circumstances, to the general level of wages prevailing in the country or in the particular locality.[20]

In the light of these resolutions, the Whitely Commission examined the question of 'minimum wage' and gave a general conclusion that it was likely that there were many trades in which a minimum wage might be desirable, but not immediately practicable and recommended that 'as in other instances cited, the policy of gradualness should not be lost sight of, if the desired end is to be achieved'.[21] The Central Legislative Assembly, in the year 1938, adopted a resolution,[22] urging the payment of 'sufficient wages' and fair treatment to workers employed in industries receiving protection or subsidy from the government. 'Sufficient wage' was defined as 'a wage which would ensure to every worker, the necessities for existence, food, clothing, housing and education, taking into account, at the same time, the practical side of the question and the needs of the industry'. However, the implementation of the resolution was deferred.

The 'minimum wage' was discussed in the fifth session of the Indian Labour Conference, held in September 1943, but in the context of 'social security'. The question of statutory wage control was again discussed by the fourth session of the Standing Labour Committee, held in January 1944. The Committee came to the conclusion that there was a fair body of opinion in favour of some form of minimum wage for regions, but the enforcement of the minimum wage was a matter of very great importance. After a full debate in another session of the Indian Labour Conference, and scrutiny in the special sub-committee appointed by it, the Minimum Wages Bill was introduced in the Central Legislative Assembly in April 1946 and the Minimum Wages Act 1948, was enacted, which came into force on 15 March 1948. The main object of the Act is to prevent 'sweated' labour, as well as to prevent the exploitation of unorganised labour. It proceeds on the basis that it is the duty of the state that, at least minimum wages are paid to the employees, irrespective of the capacity of the industry or the unit, to pay the same. The mandate of Art. 43 of the Constitution is that the state should endeavour to secure, by suitable legislation or economic organisation or in any other way, to all workers, agricultural, industrial or otherwise, work on living wage, under conditions of work which ensure a decent standard of life and full enjoyment of leisure and social and cultural opportunities. This fixing of a minimum wage is just a first step in that direction. In the course of time, the state has to take many more steps to implement that mandate.[23]

The policy of the Act, therefore, is to prevent the employment of such sweated labour, in the interest of general public, and so, in prescribing the minimum wage rates, the capacity of the employer need not be considered, because what is being prescribed is the minimum wage rates, which a welfare state assumes, every employer must pay before he employs the labour.[24] If the labourers are to be secured in the enjoyment of minimum wages and they are to be protected against exploitation by their employers, it is absolutely necessary that restraints should be imposed on their freedom of contract and such restriction cannot, in any sense, be said to be unreasonable. On the other hand, the employers cannot be heard to complain if they are compelled to pay the minimum wages to their labourers, even though, the labourers, on account of their poverty and helplessness, are willing to work on lesser wages.[25] The Act does not define 'minimum wages', presumably because it would not be possible to lay down a uniform wage for all industries throughout the country, on account of different and varying conditions prevailing from industry to industry and from one part of the country to another. In this connection, the following observations of the Supreme Court are noteworthy:

> The concept of minimum wage is likely to undergo a change with the growth of our economy and with the change in the standard of living. It is not a static concept. Its concomitants must necessarily increase with the progress of the society. It is likely to differ from place to place and from industry to industry. That is clear from the provisions of the Act itself and is inherent in the very concept. That being the case, it is absolutely impossible for the legislature to undertake the task of fixing the minimum wages in respect of any industry, much less in respect of an employment. That process must necessarily be left to the government.[26]

Although the Minimum Wages Act was intended mainly as a measure of preventing sweating or exploitation of labour, through the payment of unduly low wages, it took into account, such employments in which labour was unorganised or weakly organised and over the years, a number of new employments have been added by the state governments, to the original schedule, depending on local requirements. But such extension of the coverage of the Act, brought in its wake, difficulties of implementation.[27] The following recommendations of the NCL-I, in connection with the fixing of the minimum wage, are apposite:

> The minimum wage may thus vary from region to region and even within the same region, from time to time, depending on particular situations. Prescribing some rigid criteria in regard to minimum wage fixation is, therefore, neither feasible nor desirable. It will necessarily have to be left flexible. We are further of the opinion that laying down a rigid cash equivalent of the content of a statutory minimum wage, whose coverage is essentially transitional, under conditions of development, would not serve any useful purpose.[28]

In Transport Corpn of India, a single judge of the Bombay High Court pointed out that when the minimum rates of wages are fixed by the 'appropriate government', under the provisions of the Minimum Wage Act, then industrial adjudicators are not supposed to fix the minimum rates of wages, because in such a case, 'fixation' is done only by the government. The adjudicators, therefore, do not 'fix' the minimum rates of wages. They merely ascertain what the minimum rates of wages for the purposes of deciding 'fair-wage' are.[29] In Millowners Assn (supra), the Supreme Court held that a basic minimum wage can be fixed by an industrial tribunal when the statute has not fixed the minimum wage.[30]Section 3(2A) of the Minimum Wage Act 1948, does contemplate fixation of minimum wage by industrial adjudication. In fixing such a minimum wage, the tribunal may take into account all the facts and fix the minimum wage, which may even be higher than the minimum wage contemplated under the Minimum Wages Act.[31]

The basic concept on which the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act are founded, is to prevent the sweating and exploitation of labour, through payment of unduly low wages. It would, therefore, conceptually follow, that just as in the case of scheduled industries, statutorily determined minimum wages have to be paid by the employer to his employees, in order to prevent sweating and exploitation of labour, so must the employer in any establishment not covered by the schedule, also pay to his employees, a minimum wage, because what applies to the establishments included in the schedule to the Minimum Wages Act, must, on principles of social justice, apply with equal force, to industrial establishments not covered in the schedule as well. In such cases, considerations of social justice ought to play a major role in shaping the social, economic and industrial policies of a welfare state. This aspect has to be borne in mind by industrial adjudicators in fixing the level of wages. From the judicial dicta,[32] it is clear that in fixing the bare minimum wages and subsistence wages, industrial adjudicators will have to consider the position from the point of view of the worker, the capacity of the employer to pay such a wage would be irrelevant. The concept of minimum wage is no longer the same as in 1936, and even 1957 is way behind. In the language of Kuldip Singh J:

> A worker's wage is no longer a contract between an employer and an employee. It has the force of collective bargaining under the labour laws. Each category of the wage structure has to be tested at the anvil of social justice, which is the live-fibre of our society today.

The learned judge further observed:

> Purchasing power of today's wage cannot be judged by making calculations which are solely based on 30 or 40 years old wage-structure. The only reasonable way to determine the category of wage structure, is to evaluate each component of the category concerned, in the light of the prevailing prices. There has been a sky-rocketing rise in the prices and the inflation chart is going up so fast, that the only way to do justice to the labour, is to determine the money value of the various components of the minimum wage in the context of today.[33]

In non-scheduled industries, wages are fixed in a variety of ways, of which two are accentuated, viz, collective bargaining and failing that, industrial adjudication. Generally, a wage-settlement proceeds by first fixing the wage for the lowest category of workers in the industry or unit, and then differentials for scales are built up on the basis of this minimum. If wage determination is industry-wise, within an area, the wage fixed, whether it is through collective bargaining or with the help of industrial adjudication, is on the basis of the overall capacity of the industry to pay. However, industrial adjudication has consistently taken the view that the capacity to pay, of an individual unit, is irrelevant for fixing the minimum wage for the industry in a local area, so long as the industry as a whole, can pay. If a unit has no capacity, either it goes out of existence or improves its working to acquire the necessary capacity. Where, however, the wages for individual units in a local area are fixed through collective bargaining or industrial adjudication, arguments are entertained, in the process of such determination, about the capacity of the units to pay.[34]

Though, in fixing a non-statutory minimum wage, the capacity of the industry to pay is irrelevant, industrial adjudication cannot proceed to fix the fair wage, while purporting to fix the minimum wage without taking the financial capacity of the industry to pay, into consideration.[35] The adjudicator has also to bear in mind, the minimum wage paid by other similarly situated industries in the region. For instance, in Orient Paper Mills, the tribunal took into consideration, other industries in the region, in which minimum wages were higher than the minimum wages paid by the company in question, because there were no other comparable concerns in the same line of business in the region. The tribunal took the view that the industry-cum-region rule in French Motor Car,[36] could not apply to the facts of the case and observed that if the minimum wages in the company were to be fixed more on the basis of the minimum wages prevailing in the other industries in the region, then the revision was really necessary. Accordingly, it thought that it would be appropriate to fix the minimum wage in the company, as the minimum wage prevailing in those industries. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed that, having come to the conclusion which the tribunal did, it should have given full effect to the principle laid down in French Motor Car, and therefore, should have proceeded to fix the minimum wage in the company on the basis of the average minimum wage prevailing in the other industries, instead of proceeding on the alternative calculation on some other basis, so as to arrive at a lower figure. In this connection, the court pertinently pointed out that the total wage-packet of the three components, viz, the basic wage, the dearness allowance and the production bonus, had to be taken into consideration in fixing the minimum wage.[37]

In Jaydip Industries, during the pendency of an industrial dispute relating to wages, before the industrial tribunal, the Government of Maharashtra fixed the minimum rates of wages for certain employees including paper and paper board manufacturing industry. Subsequently, the tribunal adjudicated the reference made to it and revised the rates of wages for the workmen. The award of the tribunal was challenged in appeal before the Supreme Court, by the employer, contending that once the appropriate government had fixed the minimum rate of wages in the employment under s 3 of the Act, it was not open to the tribunal to fix higher rates of wages as minimum wages. Repelling the contention, the Supreme Court observed that the fixation of minimum rates of wages by the appropriate government does not operate as a bar to the tribunal to fix the minimum wages at higher or lower rates, if the dispute was pending at the time of the fixation of the minimum wages.[38] In other words, the tribunal was not bound by the rates of wages fixed by the government under the provisions of s 3 and could fix rates of minimum wages in its award. Since the rates fixed by the tribunal were minimum rates of wages.

Fair Wage

Das Gupta J defined 'fair wage' as something above the minimum wage 'which may roughly be said to approximate to the need-based minimum, in the sense of a wage which is adequate to cover the normal needs of the average employee regarded as a human being in a civilised society.'[39] In the words of Hidayatullah J, 'a fair wage, lies between the minimum-wage which must be paid in any event and the living wage, which is the goal'.[40] Bhagwati J described a 'fair wage' as a mean between the living-wage and the minimum-wage.[41] Marshall would consider the rate of wages prevailing in an occupation as 'fair' if it is 'about one level with the average payment for tasks in other trades, which are of equal difficulty and disagreeableness, which require equally rare natural abilities and an equally expensive training'. Prof Pigou would apply two degrees of fairness, in judging a wage-rate, viz, 'fair in the narrower sense', and 'fair in the wider sense'. A wage-rate, in his opinion, is 'fair in the narrower sense', when it is equal to the rate current for similar workmen in the same trade and the neighbourhood, and fair 'in the wider sense', when it is equal to the predominant rate for similar work throughout the country and in the generality of trades'.[42] It may roughly be said to approximate to the need-based minimum, in the sense of wage which is adequate to cover the normal needs of the average employee regarded as a human being in a civilised society.[43] The fair wage must also take note of the economic reality of the situation and the minimum needs of the worker, having a fair sized family, with an eye to the preservation of his efficiency as a worker.[44] A fair wage is thus, related to fair workload and the earning capacity. It is a step lower than the living wage. The concept of fair wage, therefore, involves a rate sufficiently high, to enable the worker to provide a standard family, with food, shelter, clothing, medical care and education of children, appropriate to his status in life, but not at a rate exceeding the wage earning capacity of the class of establishment concerned.[45] But only such of the items which go directly to reduce the expenditure that would otherwise go into the family budget, are relevant in fixing the fair wage.[46] As time passes and prices rise, even a fair wage fixed for the time-being, tends to sag downwards and then a revision becomes necessary.[47] In the language of Hidayatullah J:

> A fair wage is thus related to the earning capacity and workload. It must, however, be realised that a fair wage is not a living wage, by which is meant a wage which is sufficient to provide not only the essentials above-mentioned, but a fair measure of frugal comfort, with an ability to provide for old age and evil days. Fair wage lies between the minimum wage, which must be paid in any event, and the living wage, which is the goal.[48]

Thus, while the lower limit of the fair wage must obviously be the minimum wage, the upper limit is equally set by what may broadly be called the capacity of the industry to pay. This will depend not only on the economic position of the industry, but also on its future prospects. Between these two limits, the actual wage will depend on a consideration of certain factors, viz:

(i) the productivity of labour,

(ii) the prevailing rates of wages,

(iii) the level of national income and its distribution, and

(iv) the place of the industry in the economy of the country. [49]

In the actual calculation of the fair wage, the Committee on Fair Wages observed that it was not possible to assign any definite weights to these factors. The wage fixing machinery should relate a fair load of work and the needs of a standard family, consisting of three consumption units, inclusive of the earner. The capacity of a particular industry in a specified region, should be taken into account to determine 'the capacity to pay', and this in turn, could be ascertained by taking a fair cross-section of the industry in the region concerned. The committee recognised the fact that 'the present level of our national income does not permit of the payment of a 'living wage' on the standards prevalent in more advanced countries'. But according to the committee, this should not preclude the fixation of fair wages on different and lower standards, and 'at almost any level of the national income, there should be a certain level of minimum wages, which the society can afford; what it cannot afford are minimum wages fixed at a level which would reduce employment itself and thereby, diminish the national income.' The Committee on Fair Wages also recognised that the concepts laid down by it could not be viewed in any static sense; they would very from time to time, depending on the economic and social developments in the country. The principle that the luxuries of today, become necessities of tomorrow, was implicit in this recognition. These recommendations have exerted a considerable influence on the wage fixing authorities while formulating the wage structures in various industries and industrial units.

Living Wage

The concept of living wage, which has influenced the fixation of wages, statutorily or otherwise, in all economically advanced countries, is an old and well-established one. There are several current definitions of 'living wage', attempted in the recent past.[50] The quintessence of all these definitions is that a living wage should enable the male earner to provide for himself and his family, not merely the bare essentials of rood, clothing and shelter, but also a measure of frugal comfort, including education for the children, protection against ill-health, requirement of essential social needs, and a measure of insurance against the more important misfortunes, including old-age.[51] In other words, a living wage should not only provide the essentials contemplated by a fair wage, but should also be sufficient to provide for a fair measure of frugal comfort, with an ability to provide for old-age and evil days.[52] The living wage, according to the Committee on Fair Wages, represents the higher level of wage, and naturally, it would include all amenities which a citizen living in a modern civilised society is entitled to, when the economy of the country is sufficiently advanced and the employer is able to meet the expanding aspirations of his workers. As the traditional doctrine interprets it, the living wage is a will-o'-the-wisp, which floats a little further ahead, an arm's length out of reach. Its pursuit belongs to the same category as 'squaring the circle'.[53] In Hindustan Times, Das Gupta J, wistfully observed:

> While industrial adjudication will be happy to fix a wage-structure which would give the workmen, generally, a living wage, economic considerations make that only a dream for the future. That is why, the industrial tribunals in this country generally confine their horizon to the target of fixing a fair wage. [54]

In a later case, viz, RBI Employees Assn, in the same strain, Hidayatullah J remarked:

> ...our political aim is 'living wage', though in actual practice, living wage has been an ideal which has eluded our efforts like an ever-receding horizon and will so remain for some time to come. Our general wage structure has at best, reached the lower levels of fair wage, though some employers are paying much higher wages than the general average.[55]

In Hindustan Antibiotics, Subba Rao CJI, struck an optimistic note, that the prosperity in the country would help to improve the conditions of labour and the standard of life of the labour can be progressively raised from the stage of minimum wage, passing through need-bound fair-wage, to a living wage.[56] More than two decades later, Khalid J, in Indian Hume Pipe Co, still echoing the sentiments of Hidayatullah J, observed:

> ...This court has, often times, emphasised the need for a 'living wage' to workmen, instead of a subsisting wage. It is indeed a matter of concern and mortification that even today, the aspirations of a living wage for workmen remain a mirage and a distant dream.[57]

As nothing short of a living wage can be a fair wage, he exhorted that, 'it should be the combined effort of all concerned, including the courts, to extend the workmen a helping hand, so that they get a living wage, which would keep them to some extent at least, free from want'. In Raptakos Brett, Kuldip Singh J, has observed:

> A living wage has been promised to the workers under the Constitution. A 'socialist' framework, to enable the working people a decent standard of life, has further been promised by the 42nd amendment. The workers are hopefully looking forward to achieve the ideal. The promises are piling-up, but the day of fulfilment is nowhere in sight. Industrial wage, looking as a whole, has not yet risen higher than the level of minimum wage.[58]

The Directive Principles enshrined in the Constitution, make it the duty of the state to strive and secure living wages for the working class. This, however, cannot be achieved at one stroke, for the interests of the industry and its survival are as important as the betterment of the standard of living of the working class. All the same, unless there is a continuous and progressive trend towards securing better living conditions for labour, which would necessarily, in its turn, call for a determination of a progressive, higher minimum wage, it is only likely that the goal may never be reached.[59]

Machinery for Wage Fixation

In United Kingdom

In the United Kingdom, where trade boards, and not general boards, have been set up, the Minister of Labour appoints a board if he is satisfied that no adequate machinery exists in a particular trade or industry, for effectively regulating the wages and that it is necessary to provide such machinery. The trade board is a fairly large body, consisting of an equal number of representatives of employers and workers with a few independent members, including the chairman. Although, appointments are made by the minister, the representatives of employers and workers are appointed on the recommendation of the associations of the concerns. The trade board publishes a notice announcing its tentative proposals for the fixation or revision of a wage-rate and invites objections or comments. After a two months' notice, the board takes a final decision and submits a report to the minister, who must confirm the rate unless, for any special reason, he returns the recommendations of the board for further consideration.[60]

The Wage Council Act 1945 (8 and 9 Geo VI c 17), provides for the establishment of wage councils. The Minister of Labour and National Services, has the power to make a wage council order, after considering objections made with respect to the draft order, on behalf of any person appearing to him to be affected. The wage council makes such investigation as it thinks fit and publishes a notice of the wage regulation proposals and the parties affected are entitled to make written representations with respect to these proposals, whose representations the wage council considers. The wage council can make such further inquiries as it considers necessary and thereafter, submits the proposals to the minister, either without any amendment or with such amendments as it thinks fit, in regard to the same. The minister considers these wage-regulation proposals and makes an order giving effect to the proposals from such date as may be specified in the order. Remuneration fixed by the wage regulation orders is called the 'statutory minimum remuneration'. There are similar provisions under the Agricultural Wage Regulation Act 1924 (14 and 15 Geov c 37), in regard to the regulation of wages by agricultural wage committees and the agricultural wage board.

In The United States of America

In the United States of America, some state laws prescribe that the representatives of employers and workers should be elected, but in the majority of states, the administrative authorities are authorised to make direct appointments. The boards so set up, are empowered to make inquiries, to call for records, to summon witnesses and to make recommendations regarding the minimum wages. Some American laws lay down a time-limit for the submission of the proposals. The administrative authority may accept or reject a report and refer it back for reconsideration or form a new board for considering the matter afresh. Some of the laws provide that if the report is not accepted, the matter must be submitted again to the same wage board.[61] The whole procedure for the determination of wages, in the United States of America, is described in two decisions of the Supreme Court: (a) Inter-State Commerce Co v MR Luis Ville [62] and (b) Opp Cotton Mills v Administrator. [63]The Fair Labour Standards Act 1938, in the United States of America, provides for a convening by the administrator, of industry committees, for each such industry, which, from time to time, recommends the minimum rates of wages to be paid by the employers. The committee recommends to the administrator, the highest minimum wage-rates for the industry, which it determines, having due regard to the economic and competitive conditions, will not substantially curtail employment in the industry. Wage orders can thereupon be issued by the administrator, after due notice to all interested persons and after giving them an opportunity to be heard.

In Australia

In Australia also, there are provisions in various states for the appointment of wage boards, the details of which are not necessary for the present purpose. Reference, as an instance, may be made to the wage board system in Victoria, which was established in 1896, as a means of directly regulating wages and working conditions in industries subject to 'sweating', and was not intended to control industrial relations as such. Under the Factories and Shops Act 1924, wage boards are to be set up for various industries, with a court of industrial appeals, to decide upon appeals from the determinations of a wage board. Industries for which there is no special wage board are regulated by the general wages board, which consists of two employers' representatives, nominated by the Victorian Chamber of Manufactures, two employees' representatives, nominated by the Melbourne Trade Hall Council, and a chairman, agreed upon by these four members or nominated by the Minister of Labour.[64] It may be noted that in the majority of cases, these wage boards are constituted of an equal number of representatives of the employers and the employees and one or more independent persons, one of whom is appointed as the chairman.

In India

The history of wage-fixation in India is of recent vintage. There was practically no effective machinery until the second world war, for the settlement of industrial disputes or the fixation of wages. The first important enactment for the settlement of disputes was the Bombay Industrial Disputes Act 1938, which created an industrial court. The Act had limited application and the court was not charged with the responsibilities of fixing and regulating wages. During the war, state intervention in the settlement of industrial disputes, became necessary and numerous adjudicators were appointed to adjudicate on trade disputes under the Defence of Indian Rules. The Industrial Disputes Act 1947, is the first effective measure with an all-India applicability, for the settlement of industrial disputes. Under this Act, various tribunals have passed awards regulating wages in a number of important industries.

The first enactment, specifically to regulate wages in this country, is the Minimum Wages Act 1948. This Act is limited in its operation to the so-called sweated industries, in which labour is practically unorganised and working conditions are far worse than in organised industries. Under that Act, the appropriate government has either to appoint a committee to hold inquiries and to advise it in regards to the fixation of the minimum rates of wages, or, if it thinks that it has enough material on hand it has to publish its proposals for the fixation of wages, in the Official Gazette and to invite objections. The appropriate government finally fixes the minimum rates of wages, on the receipt of the recommendations of the committee or of the objections from the public. There is no provision for appeal. There is an advisory board in each state, to co-ordinate the work of the various committees. There is also a central advisory board, to co-ordinate the work of the state boards. Complaints of non-payment of the minimum rates of wages fixed by government, may be taken to claim authorities. Breaches of the Act are punishable by criminal courts.[65]

It is worthy of note that these committees, sub-committees, state advisory boards and central advisory boards, are to consist of persons to be nominated by the Central Government, representing employers and employees in the scheduled employments, who shall be equal in number, and independent persons not exceeding one-third of its total number of members; one of such independent persons shall be appointed the chairman, by the appropriate government. Under an amendment to the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946, wage boards can be set up in the state of Bombay, either separately for each industry or for a group of industries. The wage board is to consist of an equal number of representatives of employers and employees and some independent persons, including the chairman, all of whom would be nominated by the government. The board decides disputes relating to reduction in the number of persons employed, rationalisation or other efficiency systems of work, wages and the period and mode of payment, hours of work, and leave with or without pay. When a matter has been referred to a wage board, no proceedings may be commenced or continued before a conciliator, conciliation board, labour court or industrial court. The wage boards are authorised to form committees for local areas, for the purpose of making inquiries. It is obligatory on the government to declare the decisions of the wage boards, binding, but where the government feels that it will be inexpedient, on public grounds, to give effect to the whole or any part of the decision, the matter has to be placed before the state legislature, the decision of which will be binding. There is a provision for filing of appeals from the decisions of the wage boards, to the industrial court. Those wage boards, moreover, are under the superintendence of the industrial court. Recommendation 30, being the recommendation concerning the application of the minimum wage-fixing machinery, made by the International Labour Office in 1949 (extracts from Conventions and Recommendations 1919-49, published by International Labour Office 1949), is noteworthy, which is in the following words:

> (1) The minimum wage-fixing machinery, whatever form it may take (for instance, trade board for individual trades, tribunals), should operate by way of investigation, into the relevant conditions in the trade or part of trade concerned, and consultation with the interests primarily and principally affected, that is to say, the employers and workers in the trade or part of trade, whose views on all matters relating to the fixing of the minimum rate of wages should, in any case, be solicited and be given full and equal consideration.
>
> (2)
>
> (a) To secure greater authority for the rates that may be fixed, it should be the general policy, that the employers and workers concerned, through representatives equal in number or having equal voting strength, should jointly take a direct part in the deliberations and decisions of the wage-fixing body; in any case, where representation is accorded to one side, the other side should be represented on the same footing. The wage-fixing body should also include one or more independent persons, whose votes can ensure effective decisions being reached in the event of the votes of the employers' and workers' representatives being equally divided. Such independent persons should, as far as possible, be selected in agreement with or after consultation with the employers' and workers' representatives, on the wage-fixing body.
>
> (b) In order to ensure that the employers' and workers' representatives shall be persons having the confidence of those whose interests they respectively represent, the employers and workers concerned should be given a voice as far as is practicable in the circumstances, in the selection of their representatives, and if any organisations of the employers and workers exist, these should, in any case, be invited to submit names of persons recommended by them, for appointment on the wage-fixing body.
>
> (c) The independent person or persons mentioned in paragraph (a), should be selected from among men or women recognised as possessing the necessary qualifications for their duties and as being dissociated from any interest in the trade or part of trade concerned, which might be calculated to put their impartiality in question.[66]

The following appraisement of the system of establishing trade boards, by the Committee on Fair Wages, may be noted in this context:

> A trade board has the advantage of expert knowledge in the special problems of the trade for which it has been set up and is, therefore, in a position to evolve a scheme of wages suited to the conditions obtaining in the trade. The system, however, suffers from the limitation that there is no one authority to co-ordinate the activities of the various boards, with the result that wide disparities may arise between the scales sanctioned for similar industries. A general board ensures due co-ordination', but is far less competent than a trade board, to appreciate the special problems of each trade. The Bombay Textile Labour Inquiry Committee have stared in their report, that the trade board system is best suited to Indian conditions, particularly because the very manner of functioning of trade boards is such, that wages are arrived at largely by discussion and conciliation and that it is only in exceptional cases, that the deciding votes of the chairman and of the independent members have to be given.[67]

It is clear therefore, that a wage board, relating to a particular trade or industry, constituted of a equal number of representatives of employers and employees, with an independent member or members, one of whom is appointed the chairman, is best calculated to arrive at the proper fixation of wages in that industry. The NCL-I made the following recommendations:

> There is little scope for making any radical departure from the existing procedures and practices being adopted for wage fixation in organised industry. Building up on the procedures evolved so far and making improvements in the process, would indeed be necessary. There is no doubt that wage boards have done some useful work and they should continue...Some of these and other recommendations of which we would like to make a special mention are:
>
> (i) There need be no independent persons on the wage board. If considered necessary, an economist could be associated with it, but only as an assessor;
>
> (ii) As far as possible, the chairman should be appointed by the common consent of the parties. An agreed panel of names should also be maintained by the proposed National/State Industrial Relations Commissions, for appointment as chairman. They should preferably be drawn from the members of the proposed National or State Industrial Relations Commissions. In case a chairman is appointed by the consent of both the parties, he should arbitrate if no agreement is reached in the wage board. A person should not be appointed as chairman of more than two wage boards at a time. In case the commission is unable to prepare a panel of agreed names, the government shall appoint the chairman;
>
> (iii) The wage boards should normally be required to submit their recommendations within one year of their appointment. The date from which the recommendations would take effect, should be mentioned by the wage board, in the recommendation itself;
>
> (iv) The recommendations of a wage board should remain in force for a period of five years;
>
> (v) Unanimous recommendations of wage boards should be made statutorily binding. In cases where no agreement is reached within the wage board, the chairman should arbitrate, if the chairman, before appointment, was acceptable to both sides;
>
> (vi) A Central Wage Board Division should be set up in the Union Ministry of Labour and Employment on a permanent basis, to service all wage boards. This division should lend the necessary staff support to the wage boards and also supply statistical and other information needed by them, for the expeditious disposal of the work; and
>
> (vii) A manual of procedure for wage boards should be prepared.[68]

Wage Fixation by Industrial Adjudication

Subject Matter of Reference

The Third Schedule to the Act, enumerates the matters which are within the jurisdiction of an industrial tribunal, constituted under s 7 A. Item I of this schedule refers to 'wages, including periods and modes of payment'. From a cursory reading of this item and the definition of 'wages' in s 2(rr), it would appear that on a reference relating to wage fixation, a tribunal, apart from all remuneration payable to workmen as consideration for the work done by them, can also go into all such allowances including, dearness allowance, as the workmen are entitled to at the time of the dispute. Hence, if the workmen are not entitled to any allowance, including dearness allowance, at the time of raising the dispute, the tribunal cannot deal with such items if the reference is made merely with respect to wages. That is why, the second item of the schedule refers to 'compensatory and other allowances'. In other words, if, at the time of raising the dispute for wages, the workmen were not entitled to a compensatory allowance or any other allowances, including dearness allowance, the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to award these allowances on a reference for the adjudication of wages, unless a dispute has been separately raised and referred for adjudication, in connection with such allowances. Any bonus, contributions to any pension or provident fund and gratuity have specifically been excluded from the definition of wages. Hence, in adjudicating a reference in connection with wages, the tribunal cannot award these benefits to the workman. Item 5 deals with 'bonus, profit sharing, provident fund and gratuity'. The disputes relating to these matters, therefore, have to be specifically raised and referred for adjudication.

General Principles

Wage fixation is an important subject in any social welfare programme.[69] With the advent of the doctrine of a welfare state, which is based on notions of a progressive social philosophy, the theory of 'hire and fire', as well as the theory of 'supply and demand', which were allowed free scope under the doctrine of laissez faire, have become obsolete and no longer hold the field in constructing a wage-structure. In a given case, industrial adjudication has to take into account, to some extent, considerations of right and wrong, propriety and impropriety, fairness and unfairness. 'It is in this sense, and no doubt, to a limited extent' as pointed out by Gajendragadkar J, 'that the social philosophy of the age supplies the background for the decision of industrial disputes as to wage structure'. Under the growing strength of the trade union movement, collective bargaining enters the field and wage structure ceases to be a purely arithmetical problem. Considerations of the financial position of the employer and the state of the national economy, have their say, and the requirements of a workman living in a civilised and progressive society, have also come to be recognised.[70] The social and ethical implications of arithmetic and economics of wages cannot be ignored in the present age.[71] Subba Rao CJI, observed that the social and economic uplift of labour is important for securing industrial peace, which is essential to increase the national productivity.[72] Vaidialingam J held:

> The object of industrial law is to improve the service conditions of industrial labour, so as to provide for them, the ordinary amenities of life, with a view to bring about industrial peace, which would, in turn, accelerate the productivity of the country, resulting in its prosperity, the prosperity of the country in its turn, will help to improve the conditions of labour. The worker is interested in his pay packet and given reasonable wages, he can be expected to be a satisfied worker.[73]

In all countries, wage policy is a complex and sensitive area of public policy. This is because the employer, in his pursuit to surpass competition, through expansion facilities, increased production, greater efficiency and higher profits, may ignore the aspirations of the workmen for higher wages, lower hours, fringe benefits and security, which may threaten their present status and becloud future prospects. The relative status of the workers in the society, their commitment to industry and their attitude towards the management, their morale and motivation towards productivity, their living standards and their way of life, are all conditioned by the wages and their conditions of service, including security. In the language of the NCL-I:

> A policy dealing with this crucial problem cannot be simply economic, as it has to reckon with the relative multi-dimensional social phenomena, in which, besides the workers and the management, the consumer and the society at large and in consequence, the State are all vitally interested ... Equally important in this context, are the concrete social facts that must be taken into account in the formulation of a wage structure at any given time.[74]

Hence, the problem of wage structure, with which industrial adjudication is concerned in a modern democratic state, in the ultimate analysis, depends, to some extent, on the ethical and social considerations. Besides, there are numerous complex factors, some of which are economic and some springing from social philosophy, giving rise to conflicting considerations, that have to be borne in mind. In formulating a wage structure in a given case, industrial adjudication does take into account, to some extent, considerations of right and wrong, propriety and impropriety, fairness and unfairness.[75] Wage structure is 'a determinant of the shares of rival claimants of the product of industry and national dividend, but there may often be conflict between its short run and long run objectives, as well as between profit and social interests'.[76] In Hindustan Times, Das Gupta J, observed:

> The fixation of wage-structure is among the most difficult tasks that industrial adjudication has to tackle. On the one hand, not only the demands of social justice, but also the claims of the national economy, require that attempts should be made to secure to workmen, a fair share of the national income which they help to produce. On the other hand, care has to be taken that the attempt at a fair distribution does not tend to dry up the source of the national income itself On the one hand, better living conditions for workmen, that can only be possible by giving them a 'living wage', will tend to increase the nation's wealth and income. On the other hand, unreasonable inroads on the profits of the capitalists might have a tendency to drive capital away from fruitful > employment and even to affect prejudicially, capital formation itself The rise in prices that often results from the rise of the workmen's wages may, in its turn, affect other members of the community and may even affect prejudicially, the living conditions of the workmen themselves. The effect of such a rise in price on the country's international trade, cannot also be always ignored. Thus, numerous complex factors, some of which are economic and some spring from social philosophy, give rise to conflicting considerations that have to be borne in mind. Nor does the process of valuation of the numerous factors remain static. While international movements in the cause of labour have, for many years, influenced thinking and sometimes even judicial thinking in such matters, in this country, the emergence of an independent democratic India has influenced the matter even more profoundly.[77]

In formulating the wage structure, the adjudicator has to reconcile the following conflicting interests, viz:

(a) the natural and just claims of the employees, for a fair and higher wage;

(b) the financial capacity of the employer;

(c) the legitimate desire of the employer to make a reasonable profit;

(d) the rise in price-structure which may result from the fixation of a wage-structure; and

(e) the reasonableness of the additional burden which may be imposed upon the consumer, by the wage-structure[78].

Hence, the fixation of a wage-structure is always a delicate task, because a balance has to be struck between the demands of social justice, which require that the workmen should receive their proper share of the national income which they help to produce, with a view to improving their standard of living, and the depletion, which every increase in wage makes in the profits, as this tends to divert capital from industry into other channels thought to be more profitable.[79] In balancing the conflicting interests of the employer, the employees and the public, the adjudicator has a delicate job of weighing; and it is a three-and not a two-pan scale. His is a tedious task of reconciliating a head-on clash of various very basic policies and interests, namely: freedom of contract, freedom of trade, sanctity of contract, individual liberty, protection of business, right of work, making of training available to the employees, earning of livelihood for oneself and family, utilisation of one's skill and talent, continued productivity, betterment of one's status, avoidance of one's becoming a public charge, encouragement of competition and discouragement of monopoly and international trade, etc. To quote the NCL-I:

> The right of the workers for a fair standard, the claim of the industry for expansion through its own surplus, the charges on the industry for public revenues, the need of the economy for resources and the need of the consumer to get supplies at stable and fair prices, all become relevant factors, which an industrial adjudicator has to bear in mind.[80]

The claim of the employee, for fair and higher wages, is undoubtedly based on the concept of social justice, and it plays inevitably, a major part in the construction of the wage-structure. There can be little doubt that if the employees are paid a better wage, which would enable them to live in fair comfort and discharge their obligation to the members of their families in a reasonable way, they would be encouraged to work wholeheartedly and their work shall appreciably increase in efficiency.[81] Not only social justice, but also claims of national economy, require that attempts should be made to secure to workmen, a fair share of the national income, which they help to produce.[82] Besides, the requirements of a workman living in a civilised and progressive society, have also to be recognised.[83] In the language of Goswami J 'The central figure in the adjudication, however, is the wage-earner, who should have a fair deal in the bargain in a real sense, as far as can be, without at the same time ignoring the vital interests of the industry whose, viability and prosperity are also the mainstay of labour.'[84]

In trying to recognise and give effect to the demand for a fair wage, including the payment of a dearness allowance, to provide for an adequate neutralisation against the increasing rise in the cost of living, industrial adjudication must always take into account the problem of the additional burden, which such wage-structure would impose upon the employer and ask itself, whether the employer can reasonably be called upon to bear such burden.[85] Not only the consideration of the financial capacity of the employer, but the state of the national economy has also to be taken into consideration.[86] Care, therefore, has to be taken, that the attempt at a fair distribution does not tend to dry up the source of the national income itself.[87] But it has to be borne in mind that the first claim is of the workers, for a basic minimum wage, irrespective of any other consideration. Beyond this, however, in the determination of the wage differential, the capacity of the industry to pay and other considerations become relevant.[88] How the various competing claims have to be balanced, in a given case, should mainly be the function of an impartial adjudicator, in an industrial proceeding, unless the legislature chooses to adopt other appropriate means and methods. However, the principles of wage-structure cannot operate in vacuum, divorced of the realities of the situation. It is necessary to take note of so many factors from the real life a worker lives, or is reasonably expected to live or to look forward to, with hope and fervency, in the entire social context. Principles, therefore, have to be evolved from the conditions and circumstances of actual life.[89] The social and economic conditions prevailing in the country at the relevant time too, have to be borne in mind. Considering the question of wages in the background of the directive principles enshrined in our Constitution, a wage structure should serve to promote a fair remuneration to labour, ensuring due social dignity, and strengthen incentives to efficiency, without being unmindful of the legitimate interests and expectations of the consumer, in the matter of prices. Guided by this principle, if the financial capacity of the industry permits, the workers should, broadly speaking, be allowed their due share in the prosperity of the industry, to which they have contributed by their labour, so as to enable them, within reasonable limits, to improve their standard of living.[90] Industrial adjudication, in this connection, has to be pragmatic, though it does not follow that it has to be unscientific and remain simply as a matter of expediency. There are, of course, theoretical generalisations or principles that may provide guidelines for framing a wage policy.[91]

Industrial adjudication has evolved certain broad principles for formulating, the wage structure in industrial undertakings. It is now well settled, that industrial adjudication can alter or modify the contractual terms of employment, between an employer and his employees. In an industrial dispute as to wage-structure, therefore, the immediate objective is to settle the dispute by constructing such a wage-structure as would do justice to the interests of both labour and capital, establish harmony between them and lead to their genuine and whole-hearted co-operation in the task of production.[92] To lay down a hard and fast rule in a case, such as the fixation of wages, would hinder the achievement of maximum justice, as such, a rule might leave no room for compromise, or might compel a compromise where none is necessary. Hence, almost always, neither does the tribunal fix, nor, it can in fact, fix the wage-structure so as to reach the perfection point.[93]

Relevant Factors for Wage Fixation

Broadly speaking an industrial adjudicator, in fixing a wage-structure, has to balance the following factors:

(a) Better living conditions for workmen can only be possible by giving them a living wage, which in turn, will tend to increase the national wealth and income.

(b) Higher wages, nearing a 'living wage', would appreciably increase the efficiency of workmen, by enabling them to live in fair comfort and discharge their obligations to the members of their families.

(c) A wage-structure nearing a 'living wage', would be conducive to harmony and peace in the industry.

(d) Claims of social justice and the national economy, to secure to workmen, a fair share of the national income, which they help to produce.

(e) The requirements of a workman's living wage in a civilised and progressive society.

For counter-balancing the above considerations, the following points have to be borne in mind, in favour of keeping the wage-structure at a reasonable level:

(a) Unreasonable inroads into the profits of the employer may have the tendency to drive capital away from fruitful employment and may prejudicially affect capital formation.

(b) A wage structure which is beyond the financial capacity of the employer, may lead to the closure of the industry itself.

(c) The wage-structure being a long-range plan, a long range view of the financial capacity of the industry should be taken into consideration.

(d) In considering an increase in the wage, the increase should be correlated to minimum wage, in relation to the financial capacity of the industry to bear the burden.

(e) The effect of an increase on other similar industries in the region, should be taken into consideration, ie, a wage-structure should take into consideration the industry-cum-region basis, after giving careful consideration as to the ability of the industry to pay.

(f) The total pay-packet of the workmen, including the dearness allowance, other allowances and other benefits enjoyed by them.

(g) The effect of the rise in prices, resulting from the rise of wages, which may affect other members of the community and even prejudicially affect the living conditions of the workmen themselves.

(h) The effect of the rise in prices on the international trade of the country.

The problem of wage-structure fixation has also to be tackled on the basis that such wage-structure should not be changed from time to time. It is a long range plan; and so, in dealing with this problem, the financial capacity of the employer must be carefully examined.[1] In determining the question as to whether workmen are entitled to an increase in the rate of wages, the dearness allowance and other benefits enjoyed by them, have also to be taken into consideration.[2] Further, the tribunal has to consider the minimum wage and the capacity of the management to bear the burden of the increased wages, and then to correlate the increment in the minimum wage, in relation to the capacity of the industry.[3] Hence, in achieving the immediate objective, industrial adjudication has to take into account several principles of wage structure and decide every dispute so as to do justice to both the sides.[4] For these reasons, the Supreme Court has repeatedly stressed the need for considering the problem on an industry-cum-region basis, giving careful consideration to the ability of the industry to pay.[5] In this connection, the following observations of NCL-I are apposite:

> The determination of wages implies evolving and sustaining a wage structure which (i) permits a fair remuneration to labour, (ii) permits a fair return to capital, and (iii) strengthens incentives to efficiency. Apart from these intra-industry wage-differentials, the inter-industry and inter-regional wage differentials have a relevance. The latter may be due to the limitations of the market or on account of inter-regional disparities in productivity, due to differences in technology, capital per worker or organisation. It is expected that with the industries competing for skill in the country as a whole, these will be soon eliminated. Inter-industry differentials likewise, are also unjustified except on grounds of local differences in technology and capital per worker.[6]

No distinction can be made in fixing the wage-structure, dearness allowance or gratuity, etc, between the workmen employed by public sector undertakings and those employed in private sector undertakings. In Hindustan Antibiotics, after a careful consideration of the constitutional, legislative, judicial and executive trends of opinion with regard to the question, the Supreme Court held that the principles evolved by industrial adjudication in regard to private sector undertakings, will also govern public sector undertakings, having a distinct corporate existence.[7] The International Encyclopaedia states thus:

> Wage structure is a generic term for the set of inter-relations among a collection of wage-rates. It is frequently used in contrast to the concept of wage-level, which refers to an average of collection. Correlative with the concept of wage-structure, is that of wage-differential-some measure of difference between elements of a wage-structure. In short, a wage, structure is the relation among two or more wages related to one another in some systematic way.[8]

Industrial adjudication has laid down two principal factors, which weigh while fixing or revising a wage structure, viz, (i) what wage scales the establishment in question can pay, without any undue strain on its financial resources, and (ii) how the wages prevailing in the establishment in question, compare with those given to workmen of a similar grade and scale, by similar establishments in the same industry, or, in their absence, in other similar establishments in other industries in the region.[9] Thus, the former factor is the financial capacity of the employer and the latter has come to be known as the principle of region-cum-industry. In the absence of the requisite material for the construction of a wage structure, before the Tribunal, its award in that respect would not be sustainable.[10]

Financial Capacity

Though, in fixing the minimum wage, the question of the financial capacity of the employer is irrelevant, the case of fair wage stands on a different footing. In a case where the employer is already paying the minimum wage and the claim is for a fair wage, the question of the financial capacity of the employer is not only relevant, but is pertinent, because fixing the upper limit of the fair wage would depend upon the capacity of the employer to pay. The burden, therefore, above the minimum wage, can only be justifiably imposed if the industry is capable of meeting that extra burden.[11] Hence, the capacity of the employer to bear the financial burden must receive due consideration. The past performance of the company and the future prospects, with a totality of the picture, must be present in the mind of the adjudicator, while deciding the dispute.[12] In the fixation of rate of wages, which includes within its compass, the fixation of the scales of wages also, the capacity of the industry to pay, is one of the essential circumstances to be taken into consideration.[13] The question of the fixation of a wage-structure, like every major consideration, is to be considered on the basis that the conflicting claims of capital and labour must be harmonised on a reasonable basis, and if it appears that the employer cannot really bear the burden of the increase in the wage-bill, industrial adjudication should not hesitate to give him relief, if it is satisfied that if such relief is not given, then he may have to close down his business.[14] The capacity of the industry to pay means one of the following things, viz:

(a) the financial capacity of all the industries in the country, to pay;

(b) the financial capacity of a particular industry as a whole, to pay;

(c) the financial capacity of an employer to pay; or

(d) financial capacity of a particular unit of establishment (marginal, representative or average) to pay.

(a) Financial Capacity of all the Industries in the Country to Pay:

Here, the word 'industry' is used in the most comprehensive sense, which may perhaps be an industry as defined in s 2 (j) of the Act. This concept of industry becomes relevant in the national context, when it is to be decided that below a particular level, any employer in the whole country, in any industry, will not employ any workman. But, in this country, so far, the stage when any such wage has been fixed on this basis, has been not reached.

(b) Financial Capacity of Particular Industry as a Whole, to Pay:

This, refers to particular types of industries in the whole country, such as, the jute industry, cotton and textile industry, coal industry, paper industry, sugar industry and engineering industry, etc. It would obviously not be possible for industrial adjudication to measure the capacity of each of the units of an industry, and the only practicable method is to take a fair cross-section of that industry.[15] In Express Newspapers, Bhagwati J held:

> ... the capacity of an industry to pay should be gauged on an industry-cum-region basis, after taking a fair cross-section of that industry. In a given case, it may be even permissible to divide the industry into appropriate classes and then deal with the capacity of the industry to pay classwise...no doubt, against the ultimate background that the burden of an increased rate should not be such as to drive the employer out of business.

The learned judge further observed:

> Industrial adjudication is familiar with the method which is usually adopted to determine the capacity of the employer to pay the burden sought to be imposed on him. If the industry is divided into different classes, it may not be necessary to consider the capacity of each individual unit, to pay, but it would certainly be necessary to consider the capacity of the respective classes to bear the burden imposed on them. A cross-section of these respective classes may have to be taken for a careful examination and all relevant factors may have to be borne in mind in deciding what burden the class, considered as a whole, can bear. If possible, an attempt can also be made, and is often made, to project the burden of the wage-structure into two or three succeeding years and determine how it affects the financial position of the employer. [16]

In Bajrang Jute Mills, Vaidialingam J held that the uniform wage scales fixed by a wage board, for all the jute mills in the various regions in the country (20 in West Bengal and 9 in other parts of the country) without taking note of the financial position of the individual units and in disregard of the region-cum-industry formula, were improper. The learned judge held:

> ...the requirement of considering the capacity of each individual unit to pay, may not become necessary if the industry is divided into different classes. Even if the industry is divided into different classes, it will still be necessary to consider the capacity of the respective classes, to bear the burden imposed on them. For this purpose, a cross-section of these respective classes may have to be taken, for a careful consideration, for deciding what burden the class considered as a whole, can bear.[17]

In Kirlampudi Sugars, Jaganmohan Reddy J observed:

> The classification into classes, it will be seen, is not an obligatory one, but is required only in cases where otherwise, a fair wage cannot be determined. Any injunction that the industry in a region should in all cases be divided into classes, while determining a fair wage for that industry, would, on the other hand, be likely to introduce a greater disparity. ... There is nothing in the Bajrang Jute Mills' case, which makes it obligatory on a wage board, to divide an industry into regions as well as classes, or to examine the financial capacity of every unit in that industry in the region, irrespective of the conditions prevailing in the different regions of that industry. As long as all relevant factors appertaining to that industry, industry wise and region wise, have been considered and the capacity of a fair cross-section of that industry to pay, in that region, has been ascertained, the recommendations of the wage board cannot be held to be invalid. It is not in every case, that a division into classes in the same region, on a unit wise capacity, should be made before recommendations of the wage structure, dearness allowance or other conditions of service in that industry could be held to be fair and within the financial capacity of the industry in that region.[18]

(c) Financial Capacity of an Employer to Pay:

The particular employer may be having a number of establishments, being managed and controlled by him. If in the circumstances and facts of a particular case, the entire business of an employer is a composite whole, then the financial capacity of the employer with respect to all his establishments, is to be taken into consideration. Large-scale industries are managed very rarely by individual employers. Generally, joint stock companies are floated for running and managing such industries. Such companies, occasionally, set up a number of establishments, in one or more states in the country. If the various establishments have a functional integrity, ie, they are functionally interdependent on one another, the financial capacity of the whole company has to be taken into consideration.

(d) Financial Capacity of a Particular Unit or Establishment to Pay:

An employer may have a number of units or establishments or only one unit or establishment. In the latter case, occasionally, the words 'employer' and 'establishment' have been used interchangeably, in industrial adjudication. If each unit or establishment of an employer is separate from the others with no functional integrity with the others, the financial capacity of that particular unit or establishment alone is relevant for the purposes of wage fixation. The financial capacity of the employer with respect to other units, is irrelevant. In Gujarat Electricity Board, the Supreme Court held that the financial capacity of the board should be judged not only on the basis of its commercial undertakings, but also on the basis of its other activities, which were in the nature of national duties. The running of power house was only one branch of those activities. Hence, the demand for additional wages could not be granted when the board did not have the capacity to pay and was incurring heavy losses.[19] While fixing a wage-structure on the basis of a fair wage, a long range view of the financial position of the employer's undertaking is to be taken.[20] In Ahmedabad Millowners Assn, Gajendragadkar CJI observed:

> ...industrial adjudication must always take into account, the problem of the additional burden which such wage structure would impose upon the employer and ask itself whether the employer can reasonably be called upon to bear such burden...It is a long range plan; and so, in dealing with this problem, the financial position of the employer must be carefully examined.[21]

A close scrutiny of the concern's working has to be made. The profit and loss account, the prospects of the concern improving itself in future and all other relevant matters will have to be taken into account. The expenses properly incurred for working of the industry, such as buying of the raw material, expenses incurred in running the factory office, transport expenses, expenses incurred in marketing, and other such allowable expenses, have to be deducted. The determination of gross profits varies according to the basis of accounting adopted. But the deduction of income-tax, reserves and depreciation are not permissible for the purposes of determining the financial capacity of the concern. However, the amount of bonus paid or is payable, will have to be deducted for the purpose of calculating the financial capacity.[22] Having ascertained the financial position of the undertaking, the adjudicator has to assess the additional burden imposed on the employer, by the wage-structure, for seeing whether he would be able to meet it for a reasonably long period in the future.[23] Not only the present financial ability, but also the financial stability in the future, of the employer, must be proved, to justify the burden of the wage-structure or fixation of an increased fair wage, on an incremental scale. It would not be right to compel an employer to bear the burden of an increased fair wage on an incremental scale, out of the capital, for such a situation is likely to lead to a closure of his business, which would be even more detrimental to the workmen themselves.[24]

A broad and overall view of the financial position of the employer, has to be taken into account. It would not be permissible to lay undue emphasis on a temporary prosperity or temporary adversity of the employer.[25] In other words, an even view of unusual profits made by an undertaking for a particular year, as a result of some adventitious circumstances, or unusual losses incurred by it for similar reasons, has to be taken by the adjudicator. Such considerations should play a major role.[26] Similarly hypothetical considerations, that in the near future, the financial position of the employer would be affected by certain contingencies, should not be taken into account.[27] Likewise, in determining the financial stability of the concern or its ability to bear the burden of the wage-structure, the pious hopes expressed in the directors' reports, as regards the future prospects, cannot be accepted as conclusive.[28] Sometimes, statements of this nature, in the annual reports of the directors, are made to strike a note of hope, to dispel doubts and misgivings in the minds of the shareholders and these cannot be a substitute for the actual audited figures of accounts. The adjudicator, therefore, is to ascertain the financial position of the concern from its audited accounts, in accordance with the principles of accountancy.[29] Broadly, the adjudicator has to bear in mind, the profit earning capacity of the concern, the profits earned in the past, its reserves and the possibility of replenishing the reserves, the claim of capital, risks involved-in short, the financial stability of the concern.[30]

In judging the financial capacity of the employer, industrial adjudication has to look at the burden as well. It is not proper that the employer should pay increased wages to one class of workers and utilise whatever balance remains, for payment to the other class of workers, irrespective of whether they can be paid increased wages or not. This is not what is envisaged by the term 'capacity to pay'. No doubt, the wage increase will have to be met from the revenue, and only thereafter, the profits can be computed. Once, it is found that the burden of the proposed increase of wages is heavy, it cannot be assumed that the burden can be borne by the establishment. As Kailasam J put it:

> It is of utmost importance that the industry must be kept going as long as it can pay the minimum wages. It may, sometimes, be necessary for the workers to make some sacrifice to keep the industry going. It is not wise to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. The capacity of the industry to bear the burden will have to be taken into account, in determining whether a provision can be made for fixing a wage structure...In determining the capacity of the industry to bear the burden, all relevant facts will have to be taken into account and the actual state of affairs determined... [31]

In such cases, assumptions are not enough. The adjudicator is required to ascertain the financial capacity and fix a wage structure according to that capacity.[32] The proper measure for gauging the capacity of an industry to pay, is to take into account the elasticity of the demand for the product, the possibility of tightening up the organisation, so that the industry could pay higher wages without difficulty, and the possibility of an increase in the efficiency of the lowest paid workers, resulting in an increase in the production, considered in conjunction with the elasticity of the demand for the product, no doubt against the ultimate background that the burden of the increased rate, should not be such as to drive the employer out of business.[33] The following are some of the important considerations which are to be carefully weighed in determining the financial capacity of an industry:

(i) the progress of the industry in question;

(ii) the prospect of the industry in future;

(iii) the existence and extent of the profits of the industry;

(iv) the nature of demand which the industry is expected to secure;

(v) the extent of the burden and its gradual increase, which the industry may have to face.

These considerations are merely illustrative, and not exhaustive. In Unichem Laboratories, the tribunal proceeded, on the basis of the gross profits, without any deductions for taxation, depreciation and development rebate, as against the claim of the company to have the calculations made on the basis of net profits. In appeal before the Supreme Court, this method was challenged on behalf of the employer company. The court held that if the Drugs Price (Control) Order materially affects the prosperity of the business of the company, it would be open to it to raise a dispute for the reduction in the wage structure by showing that the financial position had been weakened to such an extent, that it cannot bear the burden of the wage structure fixed by the award and the matter may have to be examined on its merits.[34] In Shri Chalthan VKUSM (supra), the court observed that the decisions in Unichem, etc, were given on their own particular facts and are not to be understood as laying down that under no circumstances, the deduction for depreciation, reserves etc, could be made. Kailasam J observed:

> It may be that for the prudent management of an industry, it would be desirable to take into account, to some extent, the depreciation of the machinery, for otherwise, after a lapse of years, the machinery may get worn out and without a provision for its replacement, the industry itself would come to a stop. Whether provision for such depreciation should be made and if so, to what extent, will depend upon the facts of the case. Depreciation allowance to the extent of making out a loss, need not be accepted, but a reasonable provision should be made...It cannot be taken as a hard and fast rule, that a provision for depreciation, provision for development rebate and tax liabilities, should never be allowed. While the preservation of the industry is paramount, the attempts of the management to show that the company is running at a loss, by boosting the depreciation allowances, etc, should not be permitted. In short, the real capacity of the industry to bear the extra burden will have to be determined. An employer claiming a depreciation allowance, is only entitled to the actual or probable depreciation of the machinery, tools, etc, for the period, due to wear and tear. The depreciation cannot be computed on any natural basis or on the profit and loss account furnished by the company.[35]

In Shivraj Fine Arts, speaking for the court, the same judge suggested further factors which would determine the capacity of the industry to pay, viz, the productivity of the labour, the prevailing rates of wages in the same and similar industries, in the same neighbouring localities, the present economic position of the industry, its prospects in the near future, etc. Fair wage will grow with the growth and development of the national economy and the progress made by the industry, must approximate to the capacity of the industry to pay.[36] As stated by the NCL-I, a policy dealing with the chronic problem, cannot be simply economic, as it is to reckon with relative multidimensional social phenomena, in which the workers and the management, the consumer and the society at large and in consequence, the state, are of vital interest. The claims of the employees for a fair and higher wage, depends not only on the financial capacity of the employer, but also on the interests of the consumer and the state, the employer's desire for a reasonable profit, the rise in the prices which may affect the consumer and the national economy, which, in turn, may have an adverse effect on the labour itself.

Industry-Cum-Region Formula

The Committee on Fair Wages, in its report, recommended that in determining the capacity of an industry to pay, it would be wrong to take the capacity of a particular unit or the capacity of all industries in the country. The relevant criterion should be the capacity of a particular industry in a specified region and, as far as possible, the same wages should be prescribed for all units of that industry in that region. It will 'obviously' not be possible for the wage-fixing board to measure the capacity of each of the units of an industry in a region and the only practicable method is to take a fair cross-section of that industry.[37] This classic recommendation has been adopted by industrial adjudication as a guiding principle, which has come to be known as the 'industry-cum-region basis' for fixing wage structures in industrial establishments. The legal position now, is well-settled, that the wage structure has to be fixed on an industry-cum-region basis, having due regard to the financial capacity of the unit under consideration.[38] The aim of this principle is that the scales of wages or dearness allowance fixed for a particular unit or industry, should not be out of tune with the wages etc, prevalent in the industry or the region, so that unfair competition may not result between one establishment and another and the diversity in the wages in the region may not lead to industrial' unrest.[39] The main object, obviously, is that in similarly circumstances units and in similar activities, as far as possible, the wages should not differ widely. If that were to be so, then there would be migration of labour from one industry to the other and there would also be a possibility of industrial unrest amongst the employees engaged in the same kind of business or industry.[40] In Remington Rand, Shelat J observed:

> The foundation of the principle of industry-cum-region is that, as far as possible, there should be uniformity of conditions of service in comparable concerns in the industry in a region, so that there is no imbalance in the conditions of service between workmen in one establishment and those in the rest. The danger otherwise, would be migration of labour to the one where there are more favourable conditions, from those where conditions are less favourable. Therefore, the mere fact that a particular concern can bear an additional liability would, by itself, be no ground to impose upon it, such extra obligation [41]

Rejecting the contention of the workmen, that the principle of industry-cum-region should not be applied in adjudicating a dispute regarding tiffin allowance, as it is applied in the adjudication of wage-scales and dearness allowance, the court observed that such a proposition would mean 'cutting holes in a principle which industrial adjudication has, for a number of years, accepted and which has lent a certain amount of uniformity in a field where the problems have to be resolved in a pragmatic approach'. This rule, on the one hand, tends to the maintenance of industrial peace in the entire region, and on the other, it puts the different concerns of the industry on a more or less equal footing, in their productive struggle.[42] Wanchoo J observed:

> It is now well-settled that the principle of industry-cum-region has to be applied by an industrial court, when it proceeds to consider questions like wage-structure, dearness allowance, and similar conditions of service. In applying that principle, industrial courts have to compare wage-scales prevailing in similar concerns in the region with which it is dealing, and generally speaking, similar concerns would be those in the same line of business as the concern with respect to which the dispute is under consideration.[43]

The capacity of an industry to pay should be gauged on an industry-cum-region basis, after taking a fair and representative cross-section of that industry and dividing them into appropriate classes and then dealing with the capacity of the industry to pay, classwise.[44] In Jessop & Co, Wanchoo J pointed out that one of the reasons behind the principle of region-cum-industry is that concerns of more or less the same standing, in the same industry, should have as nearly as possible, the same wages, so that they might stand on par with one another in the matter of competition. Otherwise, if disparate rates of wages are fixed in a particular concern, which are much higher than the prevailing rates of wages in concerns of similar standing in the same industry, it will be put to a disadvantage when it comes to compete in the market for the sale of its product. It is for this reason that when scales of pay are being fixed, the tribunals look at what are called comparable concerns, in framing the wage-structure.[45] In Greaves Cotton, the court emphasised that in fixing wages and dearness allowance, the tribunal should take into account, the wage scales and dearness allowance prevailing in comparable concerns carrying on in the same industry, in the same region.[46] In Kamani Metals, Hidayatullah J observed:

> In attempting to compare one unit with another, care must be taken that units differently placed or circumstanced, are not considered as guides, without making an adequate allowance for the differences. The same is true when the regional levels of wages are considered, and compared. In general words, comparable units may be compared but not units which are dissimilar. While disparity in wages in industrial concerns similarly placed, leads to discontent, attempting to level up wages, without making sufficient allowances for differences, leads to hardships.[47]

In French Motor Car, the Supreme Court held that the principle of industry-cum-region has to be applied by an industrial tribunal, when it proceeds to consider questions like wage-structure, dearness allowance and similar conditions of service.[48] In Remington Rand, a further requirement of taking into account the total wage-packet, of basic wage and dearness allowance, in comparing the wage structure of an establishment with others in the region, was added.[49] In other words, it would not be safe to compare a comparatively small concern with a large concern in the same line of business and impose a wage structure prevailing in the larger concern as a rule of thumb, without considering the standing, the extent of labour, the extent of business and the extent of profits made by the two concerns, over a number of years.[50] Thus, where there is a large disparity between two concerns in the same business, in the same region, it would not be safe to fix the same wage-structure for the large flourishing concerns of long standing, as obtaining in a small struggling concern, without any other consideration.[51] In French Motor Car, Wanchoo J further observed that the tribunal has to compare wages scales prevalent in similar concerns in the region which are in the same line of business. Further, even in the same line of business, it would not be proper to compare a small struggling concern with a large flourishing concern. The question, whether there is a large disparity between the two concerns, is always a question of fact and it is not necessary for the purpose of comparison, that the two concerns must be exactly equal in all respects. All that the tribunal is to see is that the disparity is not so much as to make the comparison unreal. The learned judge held:

> ...where a particular concern is already paying the highest wages in its own line of business, the industrial courts would be justified in looking at wages paid in that region in other lines of business, it should take care to see that the concerns from other lines of business taken into account, are such as are as nearly similar as possible, to the line of business carried on by the concern before it. It should also take care to see that such concerns are not so disproportionately large as to afford no proper basis for comparison. [52]

In Novex Dry Cleaners (supra), Gajendragadkar J laid down a few tests for comparing an establishment with others in the same region, which comprise their standing, the extent of the labour force employed by them, the extent of their respective customers; and a comparative study of the profits and the losses incurred by them for some years before the date of award. Then, in Williamson, the same learned judge held that in considering the question about comparable concerns, tribunals should bear in mind all the relevant facts in relation to the problems, viz the extent of the business carried on by the concerns, the capital invested by them, the profits made by them, the nature of the business carried on by them, their standing, the strength of their labour force, the presence or absence and the extent of reserves, the dividends declared by them, and the prospect about the future of their business - these and all other relevant facts have to be borne in mind.[53] These principles were reiterated in other cases, which can be re-stated as follows:

(i) Their standing;

(ii) the strength of the labour force employed by them;

(iii) the extent of their respective customers;

(iv) the position of the profits or losses incurred by them for some years, before the date of the award;

(v) the extent of the business carried on by the concerns;

(vi) the capital invested by them;

(vii) the nature of the business carried on by them;

(viii) the presence and absence and the extent of their reserves;

(ix) the dividends declared by them; and

(x) the prospects of their business in the future.

In Kamani Metals, Hidayatullah J observed:

> The observations, no doubt, lay down the principle guidelines, but they are not intended to operate with the rigidity of a statutory > enactment. The court has indicated what lines of inquiry are likely to lead to the discovery of correct data for the fixation of fair wages...but fruitless inquiries into matters of no particular importance to a case, are hardly to be insisted upon, because rather than prove to be of assistance, they might well frustrate the very object in view. Each case requires to be considered on its own facts.[54]

In Hindustan Antibiotics, it was canvassed that a public sector undertaking could not be compared with companies in the private sector, for the purpose affixation of wages. The Supreme Court repelled the contention of management and held that the principles as have been laid down for employers in the private sector apply with equal force to the employers in the public sector as well.[55] In Unichem (supra), it was contended on behalf of the management that no unit doing business in collaboration with a foreign concern, though doing the same kind of business, could ever be considered for the purpose of comparison, for such concerns have the distinct advantages of international research facilities and reputation in business, which enable them to market their products more easily and thus, enable them to pay higher wages to their employees. Repelling the contention, the court observed that:

> So long and to the extent that concerns having foreign collaboration are doing business in India and in a particular concerned region, we do not see any reason why they should not be taken into account for purposes of being treated as comparable units, provided the tests for such purposes, as laid down by this court, are satisfied. No doubt, some of those concerns may be having advantage in various matters. But merely, because they possess such advantage in the field of business, is not a circumstance for eliminating such concerns for purposes of comparability. The object of industrial adjudication is, as far as possible, to secure uniformity of service conditions amongst the industrial units in the same region. If a concern having a foreign collaboration, properly satisfies the tests of comparability, it would be improper to regard such a unit as uncomparable, merely on the ground that it is a concern with a foreign collaboration or interest and that the unit with which it is sought to be compared is entirely of Indian origin and resources.[56]

In Chandan Metal Products the Gujarat High Court upheld the validity of the recommendations of the wage board for engineering industries. The wage board, in the context of engineering industries, after referring to the various products that the industry was engaged in manufacturing, definitely undertook a relevant exercise of classifying the industry and the classification according to the strength of the unit, provided a rational and intelligible criterion for classification. A regional and size classification, ultimately enabled the wage board to determine the paying capacity region-wise and class-wise. From the extensive examination carried out by the board in formulating its recommendations, it clearly appeared that it took into consideration, all the relevant factors and the established principles of region-cum-industry, evolved by the Supreme Court. In view of the fact that the wage board had correctly examined the paying capacity of the units region-wise or size-wise, no exception could be taken of its findings and it was not open to an independent unit to complain that it had no capacity to implement the recommendations of the wage board. There was no error in the award of the tribunal, refusing to examine the capacity of the industry to meet the likely additional burden, which could be imposed upon a particular unit which was called upon to implement the recommendations of the wage board.[57]

In dealing with the comparable character of industrial undertakings, industrial adjudication should not usually rely on oral evidence alone, because these questions cannot be decided merely on the interested testimony, either of the workmen or of the employer and his witnesses. The question has to be considered in the light of material facts and circumstances, which are generally proved by documentary evidence.[58] In Madura Coats, where the tribunal rejected the demand for an upward revision of wages and allowances, on the ground that the financial position of the company was not sound, Rebello J of the Bombay High Court, while partially allowing the award, held that the tribunal should have considered the wages prevailing in comparable concerns in the region, before deciding to reject the demands on the ground that the financial position of the company was not sound.[59] This observation is absolutely misplaced in the facts and circumstances of the case. It was not the case of the union that the wages being paid in the company were below subsistence level. It is a well-settled law that the lower limit of a fair wage is set by the minimum wage and its upper limit, by the capacity of the industry to pay, which, in turn, depends not only on the present economic position of the industry, but also on its future prospects. Between these two limits, the actual wages will depend on a consideration of the following factors:

(a) the productivity of labour;

(b) the prevailing rates of wages in the same or similar occupations, in the same or neighbouring localities;

(c) the level of national income and its distribution; and

(d) the place of the industry in the economy of the country.[60]

Applying the said principles, governing the determination of a 'fair wage', as laid down by Gajendragadkar CJI in Millowners'Association,[61] what ostensible purpose could be served by a mere consideration of the comparable wage structure, when the employer does not have the financial capacity to pay? It is not as if the industrial tribunal is a branch office of the bureau of statistics, to engage itself in the futile exercise of collecting and comparing data relating to wages and allowances, if such data is incapable of being applied to the case at hand. The mere fact that other concerns in the same or similar line of business in the region, are paying higher wages, is no valid ground to impose additional burden on a company, which is on a downhill course. The ratio of New Egerton Woollen Mills,[62] on which Rebello J apparently relied, could be pressed into service, if only the other condition laid down by Shelat J is satisfied, ie, such additional burden does not cause an undue strain on the financial resources of the company, and not otherwise. When this principle, is applied to the case of Madura Coats, the conclusion that the company was not in a position to bear any additional financial burden, is inescapable. Even so, the trial court granted certain demands like privilege leave, encashment, leave travel, educational allowance, conveyance allowance, food subsidy and gratuity, while disallowing other demands which were accepted by the management, despite the precarious financial position of the company. At any rate, it was a finding of fact recorded by the tribunal, after applying its mind to the oral and documentary evidence produced before it, and the High Court could not, in a writ jurisdiction, go into the questions of fact, or reappreciate the evidence and reach a different conclusion. The reasoning and conclusion of Rebello J run counter to the principles governing wage revision vis-à-vis the financial condition of industrial undertakings, and is wholly misconceived and perverse.

In Hindustan Motors, the Supreme Court observed that it is ordinarily desirable, to have as much uniformity as possible, in the wage scales of different concerns of the same industry, working in the same region. It may, however, not always be possible to attain this object because of the different financial capacities of different concerns. Bur where no such obstacle is present, industrial adjudication always tries to secure the same wage-rates for the different concerns in the same industry, in the same region. The court, therefore, applied the wage scales awarded by the third major engineering tribunal in Bengal.[63] In French Motor Car, (supra), the court held that so far as the clerical staff and the subordinate staff are concerned, it might be possible to take into account even those concerns, which are engaged in different lines of business, for the work of the clerical and subordinate staff is more or less the same in all kinds of concerns. When the inconsistency in the above two decisions was highlighted, in Greaves Cotton, Wanchoo J responded thus:

> ...in applying the industry-cum-region formula for fixing wage scales, the tribunal should lay stress on the industry part of the formula, if there are a large number of concerns in the same region, carrying on the same industry; in such a case, in order that production cost may not be unequal and there may be equal competition, wages should generally be fixed on the basis of the comparable industries, namely, industries of the same kind. But where the number of industries of the same kind in a particular region is small, it is the region part of the industry-cum-region formula which assumes importance, particularly in the case of the clerical and sub-ordinate staff, for as pointed out in the French Motor Car Co's case... there is not much difference in the work of this class of employees, in different industries.[64]

According to the decision in French Motor Car, where greater stress is laid on the region part of the formula, care has to be taken to see that the comparison is made with concerns as nearly similar as possible to the concern in question. But in Greaves Cotton, two reasons appear to have weighed with the Supreme Court:

(a) the four companies were carrying on different businesses and the main company was an investment and financing company and it was not clear from the record, whether there were several comparable concerns in the same region; and

(b) in the documents filed by both the parties, there were certain concerns which were, according to both the parties, comparable concerns. It is on these facts that the court held that the tribunal was not wrong in the case of the clerical. and subordinate staff, in leaning towards the region part of the formula and comparing the companies under consideration, with those concerns which were comparable according to both the parties.[65]

In Orient Paper, the tribunal found that there were no other concerns in the same line of business as the appellant company, in the region, which could be compared with it. There were only two other paper mills in the region. But the appellant company was an old, established business, manufacturing paper on a very large scale, whereas both the other two paper mills were of a recent origin, as compared to the appellant company. The strength of the labour force and the annual production of the other two paper mills was also much lower and their profits much smaller than those of the appellant company. In these circumstances, the tribunal took the view that it would not be proper to compare the wage-structure of these paper mills, with that of the appellant company and compared the wages paid by other industries in the region, namely, three collieries, a cement factory and an aluminium company, which were situated not very far away from the place where the company had its factory, for fixing the minimum wages for the workmen of the appellant company. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the comparison was justified.[66] In Tata Chemicals, the production of the company was considerably higher than the combined production of two other two units in the Saurashtra region. There was no other heavy chemicals concern in the region, which could be favourably compared with the company, insofar as the nature and extent of business, capital outlay, percentage of gross and net profits, strength of labour, reserves, dividends on equity share and prospects of future business were concerned. The company held a unique position in heavy chemicals, in the region. In view of these facts, the company was compared with the industries outside the Saurashtra region of the State of Gujarat, for the purposes of linking the dearness allowance to the textile dearness allowance, paid to the industrial workers at Ahmedabad, which was based on the report of the family living survey among the industrial workers at Ahmedabad in 1958-59, compiled as a result of the joint investigation carried on in a rational and scientific manner, by several institutions. Jaswant Singh J held:

> It cannot also be lost sight of, that with the march of time, the narrow concept of industry-cum-region is fast changing and too much importance cannot be attached to region. The modern trends in industrial law seem to lay greater accent on the similarity of industry rather than on the region. It was observed by this court in Workmen of New Egerton Woollen Mills v New Egerton Woollen Mills ,[67] that where there are no comparable concerns in the same industry, in the region, the tribunal can look to concerns in other industries in the region for comparison, but in that case, such concerns should be as similar as possible and not disproportionately large or absolutely dissimilar. On the parity of reasoning, it is reasonable to conclude that where there are no comparable concerns, engaged in a similar industry, in the region, it is permissible for the industrial tribunal or court to look to such similar industry or industries, as nearly similar as possible, in adjoining or other regions in the state, having similar economic conditions.[68]

In Food Corpn of India, the Supreme Court allowed parity in the matter of scales of pay, allowances and terms and conditions of service for the departmental labour employed by the corporation, throughout the country.[69] In Hindustan Transmission, the workmen and staff working in the head office, claimed that they should be given wage scales, dearness allowance and other benefits, at par with the workmen and staff working in the factory. But the tribunal refused to award accordingly, in view of the fact that the hours and conditions of work in the head office and the factory were quite different. However, for considering the question of wages, etc, the tribunal considered three comparable concerns, out of which it selected one which was comparable to the concern in this case. The Bombay High Court upheld the award of the tribunal, as it did not find any reason for interference with the same, in its writ jurisdiction.[70]

Equal Pay for Equal Work

The doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work' has been enshrined in Art. 39(d) in Pt IV of the Constitution, which is one of the directive principles of the state policy, requiring the state to secure 'equal pay for equal work, for both men and women'. The directive principles, though not enforceable in any court, are nevertheless fundamental in the governance of the country and it is the duty of the state to apply these principles in making the laws. In the language of Chinnappa Reddy J, 'equal pay for equal work' is not a mere demagogic slogan. It is a constitutional goal capable of attainment through constitutional remedies, by the enforcement of constitutional rights'.[71] In G Sreenivasa Rao, Kuldip Singh J stated:

> The doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work' cannot be put in a straight-jacket. Although the doctrine finds its place in the directive principles, but this court, in various judgments, has authoritatively pronounced that the right to 'equal pay for equal work' is an accompaniment of the equality clause enshrined in Articles 14 and 16 of the Constitution of India. Nevertheless, the abstract doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work' cannot be read in Article 14. A reasonable classification, based on intelligible criteria, having nexus with the object sought to be achieved, is permissible.[72]

However, in subsequent cases, the court has gone even to the extent of saying that the principle of 'equal pay for equal work' has assumed the status of a fundamental right in service jurisprudence, having regard to the constitutional mandate of equality in Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution. It has ceased to be a judge-made law, as it is a part of the constitutional philosophy which ensures a welfare socialistic pattern of a state, providing equal opportunity to all and 'equal pay for equal work' for similarly placed employees of the state. The principle not only applies to the state as such, but it also applies to state instrumentalities. This right has been zealously enforced as a fundamental right in effectuating the constitutional goal of equality and social justice, by the Supreme Court.[73] This principle should also apply to industrial employees, with equal vigour. In the year 1976, the Parliament enacted the Equal Remuneration Act 1976 (Act No 25 of 1976):

> To provide for the payment of equal remuneration to men and women workers and for the prevention of discrimination on the ground of sex, against women, in the matter of employment and for matters connected therewith or incidental thereto.

This Act enacts the provision of the Equal Remuneration Ordinance 1975, promulgated to implement the provisions of Art. 39(d) of the Constitution, in the year which was being celebrated as the International Women's Year. Dealing with the provisions of this Act, in Mackinnon Mackenzie, the Supreme Court held that the Act does not permit the management to pay to a section of its employees, doing the same work or work of a similar nature, lesser pay, contrary to s 4(1) of the Act, only because it is not able to pay equal remuneration, to all and further observed that the applicability of the Act does not depend upon the financial ability of the management to pay equal remuneration, as provided by it.[74] In this case, the lady stenographers were paid less remuneration than the male stenographers. Section 4 of the Act requires that in order to get relief, the employee should establish that the remuneration paid by the employer is at rates less favourable than those at which remuneration is paid to the employees of the opposite sex, for performing the same work or work of a similar nature. In deciding whether the work is the same or is broadly the same, the authority should take a broad view and also adopt a broad approach in ascertaining whether any differences are of practical importance, because the very concept of 'similar work' implies a difference in detail. But that should not defeat a claim of equality on trivial grounds. Actual duties performed should be looked at and not those that are theoretically possible. For the purpose of making a comparison, the duties generally performed by men and women should be looked at. In view of the fact that the lady stenographers were getting less remuneration, the court granted the relief under s 4(1) of the Act.

In Randhir Singh, the Supreme Court stated that though the principle of 'equal pay for equal work' is not expressly declared to be a fundamental right, it is a constitutional goal. The requirements of Art. 39(d) of the Constitution, viz, 'equal pay for equal work, for both men and women' means 'equal pay for equal work' for everyone and as between the sexes. Hence, the concept of 'equal pay for equal work' is accentuated and has assumed the status of a fundamental right in service jurisprudence. Directive principles, therefore, have to be read into the fundamental rights as a matter of interpretation. Article 14 of the Constitution enjoins on the state, not to deny any person 'equality before the law' and the 'equal protection of the laws' and Art. 16 declares that there shall be equality of opportunity for all citizens, in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office under the state. Hence, on the construction of Arts. 14 and 16, in the light of Art. 39(d) and the Preamble to the Constitution, the principle of 'equal pay for equal work' partakes the character of a fundamental right and has to be applied to 'cases of unequal scales of pay, based on no classification or on irrational classification, though drawing different scales of pay, doing identical work, under the same employer.' Elaborating the concept of 'equal pay for equal work' and its application, the court observed:

> Where all things are equal, that is, where all relevant considerations are the same, persons holding identical posts may not be treated differentially in the matter of their pay, merely because they belong to different departments. Of course, if officers of the same rank perform dissimilar functions and the powers, duties and responsibilities of the posts held by them vary, such officers may not be heard to complain of dissimilar pay, merely because the posts are of the same rank and the nomenclature is the same...and there are different grades in a service, with varying qualifications for entry into a particular grade, the higher grade often being a promotional avenue for officers of the lower grade. The higher qualifications for the higher grade, which may be either academic 'qualifications or experience based on the length of service, reasonably sustain the classification of the officers into two grades, with different scales of pay. The principle of 'equal pay for equal work' would be an abstract doctrine, not attracting Article 14, if sought to be applied to them. [75]

The mere fact, that the nature of work in two sets of employment is more or less the same, will not entitle the workmen in such employments to the same scale of pay. The scales of pay, in governmental departments, public sector undertakings, and even industrial undertakings, are fixed by expert bodies like the pay commission, which consist of persons having a specialised knowledge of the subject and have to go in depth, of all the relevant factors, including the nature of the work. Apart from the nature of work, educational qualifications, responsibilities of the posts and experience etc, are taken into account for fixing the pay scales. In Delhi Veterinary Assn, the Supreme Court observed that apart from the nature of work, the pay structure should reflect many other values and stated that the employer should follow certain basic principles in fixing pay scales for various posts and cadres. The degree of skill, strain of work, experience involved, training required, responsibility undertaken, mental and physical requirements, disagreeableness of the task, hazard attendant on the work and fatigue involved, are, according to the third pay commission, some of the relevant factors which should be taken into consideration in fixing pay scales. The method of recruitment, the level at which the initial recruitment is made in the hierarchy of service or cadre, minimum educational and technical qualifications prescribed for the post, the nature of dealings with the public, avenues of promotion available and horizontal and vertical relativity with other jobs in the same service or outside, are also relevant factors. [76]

Then, elaborating the same theme, in JP Chaurasia, the court said that apart from the nature of the work or the volume of the work done, the other relevant factors to be taken into account are 'evaluation of duties and responsibilities of the respective posts'. Even if the functions of two posts or jobs appear to be same or similar, there may be differences in the degree of performance. The quantity of work may be the same, but the quality may be different. That cannot be determined by relying on the averments in the affidavits of the interested parties. These factors can best be determined by expert bodies, like a pay commission, who would be best equipped to evaluate the nature of duties and responsibilities of posts. The determination by such bodies should normally be accepted and the court should not try to tinker with such equivalence, unless it is shown that it was made with extraneous considerations.[77]

The above decision was followed by the court in Pramod Bhartiya.[78] In this case, the lecturers working in higher secondary schools had failed to establish that the distinction between their scales of pay and that of the non-technical lecturers working in technical schools, is either irrational and has no basis, or that it was vitiated by mala fides, either in law or in fact. In Shyam Babu Verma,[79] the claim by a group of pharmacists for equal pay, was rejected on the ground that the classification made by the body of experts, after a full study and analysis of the work, should not be disturbed except for strong reasons, which indicate that the classification made was unreasonable. In Hari Narayan Bhowal, the court observed that the principle of 'equal pay for equal work', therefore, can only be enforced if the claiming persons satisfy the court that not only is the nature of the work identical, but in all other respects also, they belong to the same class and there is no apparent reason to treat 'equals as unequals'. In the absence of a very clear case, satisfying the court that the scales provided to a group of persons, on the basis of material produced before it, amounts to discrimination, without any justification, the court should not take upon itself the responsibility of fixing the scales of pay, particularly when different scales of pay have been fixed by the pay commission or pay revision committees, comprising persons who are experts in the field, after examining all the relevant materials. In the process undertaken by the court, an anomaly in different services may be introduced, of which the court may not be conscious, in the absence of relevant materials before it. Therefore, the claimants must produce relevant material before the court to satisfy it that 'they have not been treated as equals within the parameters of Art. 14 '. And in the absence of such material, the court should be reluctant to issue any writ or direction to treat them as equal, particularly when a body of experts has found them not to be equal. In this case, the court rejected the claim of the volunteers enrolled under the West Bengal National Volunteer Force Act 1949, to be treated at par with the constables employed in the West Bengal Police Force, because they formed two different classes in public service, particularly when the scales of pay had been fixed by an expert body, after taking into account all relevant materials. The Supreme Court pointed out that merely because the academic qualifications and physical requirements of both were similar or that the agragamies were also given certain fire fighting training, along with other training, it could not be inferred that they performed similar duties, functions and responsibilities as the firemen.[80]

In Basavalingappa, in the absence of relevant material, the general question as to whether on the basis of educational qualification, different pay scales could or could not be prescribed, was not considered by the court and the case was decided on the facts and circumstances of the case, that an instructor will perform the same duties and will do the same work, in spite of the fact that he may be a certificate holder or a diploma holder. Consequently, different pay scales could not be enforced for the same post, merely on the basis of the holding of a certificate or a diploma.[81] In Supreme Court EW Association, on a review of its earlier dicta, the court observed that although the doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work' does not come within Art. 14 of the Constitution as an abstract doctrine, if, however, any classification is made relating to the pay-scales and such classification is unreasonable or if unequal pay is based on no classification, then Art. 14 will at once be attracted and such classification is liable to be struck down and 'equal pay for equal work' must be directed. In short, where unequal pay has brought about a discrimination within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Constitution, it will be a case of 'equal pay for equal work' as envisaged by Art. 14 of the Constitution. If, therefore, the classification is proper and reasonable and has a nexus to the object sought to be achieved, the doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work' will not have any application, even though the persons doing the same work are not getting the same pay. In the absence of any discrimination within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Constitution, the abstract doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work', as envisaged in Art. 39(d) of the Constitution, has no application and in view of the provisions of Art. 37, it will not be enforceable.[82] In CCE Stenographers, the Supreme Court held that 'equal pay for equal work is a fundamental right', because it is 'a concomitant of Art. 14 of the Constitution '. Therefore, 'equal pay for unequal work' will be a negation of the right. However, the court pointed out that 'equal pay' must depend upon the nature of the work done, and it may not be judged by the mere volume of the work, there may be qualitative difference as regards the reliability and responsibility; while the functions may be the same, the responsibilities would make a difference. Often the difference is a matter of degree and there is an element of value-judgment by those who are charged with the fixing of the scales of pay and other conditions of service. The value-judgment, however, has to be made bona fide, reasonably, on an intelligible criterion, which has a rational nexus with the object of the differentiation, and then, such differentiation will not amount to discrimination. Speaking for the court, Sabyasachi Mukharji J held:

> The same amount of physical work may entail different qualities of work, some more sensitive, some requiring more tact, some less-it varies from nature and culture of employment. The problem about equal pay cannot always be translated into a mathematical formula. If it has a rational nexus with the object to be sought, for, as reiterated before, a certain amount of value-judgment of the administrative authorities who are charged with fixing the pay scale, has to be left with them and it cannot be interfered with by the court, unless it is demonstrated that either it is irrational or based on no basis or arrived at mala fide, either in law or in fact.[83]

In Deb Kumar Mukherjee, the Supreme Court, while setting aside the order of High Court, noted that though the duties performed by the inspectors in Grade I and II may be the same, no fault could be found with the classification done by the Pay Commission, as a classification in the cadre on the ground of selection based on merit, is permissible. With regard to the directions of the High Court, that the inspectors in the housing department should be given the same pay scale as was given to the inspectors of the animal husbandry department, the court observed that there was a patent fallacy in the reasoning, as there was nothing common in the housing department and the animal husbandry department.[84] In Grih Kalyan Kendra, there was no discrimination between the claimant workmen and other equally situated persons. The claim, therefore, was held to be unsustainable.[85] Likewise, in IN Misra, the classification between the principal private secretary and private secretaries to the Chief Justice and yet another grade for the remaining private secretaries, was held to be proper and valid and not suffering from any constitutional infirmity.[86] Similarly, in TTD, a school belonging to Tirumala Tirupati Devasthanam was closed and the teachers were retrenched. They were re-employed in another school and at the time of re-employment, the salary which they were getting at the closed school was protected, which was more than those of the teachers in the new school. The teachers already working in the new school made a grievance that the transferred teachers were junior to them and were being paid a higher salary. The High Court of Andhra Pradesh, in its writ jurisdiction, granted to them the same salary as was paid to the teachers who were transferred from the closed school. In appeal by special leave, against the decision of the High Court, the Supreme Court noted that since the school in which the teachers were serving, was closed, the proper and legal course for the Devasthanam was to transfer them to the other school and protect their higher salary, which they were drawing in the old school. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the application of the principle of 'equal pay for equal work' was unwarranted.[87] In KS Mahalingegowda, the Government of Karnataka adopted and implemented a centrally sponsored scheme of vocationalisation of secondary education, with the object of providing diversified educational opportunities and a supply of skilled manpower, and also to provide an alternative to those students, who did not wish to pursue academic studies beyond the tenth class. The teachers employed under the scheme were employed on a part-time basis and their terms and conditions were altogether different from those of the teachers teaching in the regular courses of education in the state. The teachers employed under the scheme, however, claimed that they should be regularised in service, in the same pay-scales and under the terms and conditions of service as were being given to the non-vocational teaching staff in the state. In view of the fact that there was no parity between the two in imparting training and education or in other terms and conditions of employment, the Supreme Court held that the claim of the vocational teachers was not tenable.[88]

Similarly, in Purna Chandm Nanda, the Supreme Court rejected the claim of the appellant, who was holding the post of a dairy overseer and claimed that he had been promoted to the post of a dairy supervisor and was posted as a farm manager in the district livestock breeding farm, and therefore, was entitled to 'equal pay for equal work' as a farm manager, with the observation that merely because the posts of dairy supervisor and the farm manager were inter-changeable, the dairy supervisor did not automatically become entitled to be the holder of the post of a farm manager and for the same scales of pay. In view of the fact that the scales of pay of the two posts were different, the court pointed out that a direction to grant 'equal pay' to the appellant, would allow him to jump the queue and land on a higher ladder.[89] In Fertilizer Corpn, the Supreme Court held that there was no discrimination in fixing the pay of the two categories of employees, one who had not acquired the officers' grade and the other who had already acquired the officers' grade, keeping in view their designation as well as their pay scales obtaining on the relevant date, because they were in different classes. The court observed that these two categories were unequal and the claimants could not, in law, make any grievance if different principles were adopted in fixing their respective pay scales.[90] In Ramashraya Yadav, the Supreme Court observed that the principle of 'equal pay for equal work' will not apply where the qualifications prescribed, mode of recruitment and the nature of duties are different for regular employees and a temporary employee. Therefore, the claim of the temporary investigator-cum-computer, for payment of salary at par with the regular investigator-cum-computer, could not be sustained.[91] In Prem Singh Soda, the employee was employed on an ad hoc basis, against an unsanctioned post. He was immune from the rigours of disciplinary action and responsibility. It was, therefore, held that he was not entitled for equal pay as was paid to regular employees discharging the same work.[92] On the other hand, in MP Singh, in the facts and circumstances of the case, the classification of officers in the cadre of sub-inspectors, inspectors and deputy superintendents of police, in the central investigation units of the central bureau of investigation, into two groups, namely, deputationists and non-deputationists, for paying different rates of special pay, did not pass the test of classification permissible under Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution, as it did not bear any rational relation to the objects of the classification.[93] In Tannery and Footwear Corpn, the Supreme Court directed the revision of the pay scales of the employees of the Tannery and Footwear Corporation of India, so that they were at par with the pay scales of such employees employed in the Cotton Corporation of India. The court held that though the two corporations were distinct legal entities, at the same time, it could not be ignored that both were instruments of the Government of India, and who were bound by the directions contained in Pt IV of the Constitution. This direction was made in view of the fact that the nature of the work and duties performed by the employees in both the corporations, was the same.[94]

In R Kumar, in view of the specific provision under s 77(l)(a) of the Presidency Town Insolvency Act, as amended by the Tamil Nadu Management (Madras Act 5 of 1943), the Chief Justice of the Madras High Court recommended that the employees in the Official Assignee attached to the High Court, should be treated at par with those equal categories in the Madras High Court Service and Tamil Nadu Secretariat Service, in the matter of fixing their pay, because the duties, responsibilities and qualifications prescribed were similar in both, High Court's Service and the Official Assignee Service. The court observed that it would be in violation of Art. 229 of the Constitution of India, if the recommendations of the Chief Justice of the Madras High Court, in this connection, are not accepted by the government. Therefore, a direction was issued to change the nomenclature of the staff members of the High Court Official Assignee Service, at par with those equal categories in the Madras High Court Service and the Tamil Nadu Secretariat Service and revise the pay scales of the members of, Official Assignee Service, and bring them at par with the equal categories of the Madras High Court Service and the Tamil Nadu Secretariat Service.[95] In G Krishna Rao, there were two grades of district judges, viz, grade 1, and grade 2. If a district judge grade 1, was appointed as chairman of the industrial tribunal, he would get a salary in the scale of Rs 5000-6200, but if in the same post, a grade 2 district judge was appointed, such district judge was entitled only to Rs 3580-5380 scale. The duties performed by the chairman, industrial tribunal, whether he was a grade 1 or grade 2 district judge, were the same and identical. Therefore, denying the scale attached to the post of a chairman, occupied by a grade 2 district judge, was held to be wholly arbitrary and without any basis.[96] In Balo Rai, the subsisting wage structure of the piece-rated coal unloading workers was covered by an agreement subsisting between the parties. The Patna High Court upheld the claim of such piece-rated workers and observed that the right of the workers to claim a proper pay-scale, could not be prevented on the plea that their wage structure was covered by an agreement.[1] In T Krishnan Unni, in the light of the principles stated by the Supreme Court, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that a scale of pay lower than that of the promotees, being given to the direct recruits is unjustified, as it is not based on any rational basis. From the above discussion, it is evident that the court has applied the doctrine of 'equal pay for equal work', depending upon the fact-situations of each case.[2] The undernoted case,[3] along with several others is the further illustration of the application of the doctrine. These decisions arose out of employment under the state, and are governed by the provisions of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution. This doctrine will apply to employees in industrial employment, wherever permissible, with equal force.

'Rates of Wages' and 'Scales of Wages'

'Rates of wages' and 'scales of wages' are two different expressions, with two different connotations.[4] The substance of the statutory, as well as the dictionary meanings of the term 'wages' is that it is an 'amount paid periodically, especially by the days of week or month, for the time during which the workman or the servant is at the employer's disposal'. The use of the word 'rate' in the expression 'rates of wages', has not the effect of limiting its connotation. The expression, therefore, means the manner, mode or standard of the payment of remuneration for work done, whether at the start or in subsequent stages. 'Rate of wages' would thus include 'scales of wages' and there is no antithesis between the two expressions, the former expression being applicable both to the initial, as well as, the subsequent amounts of wages. In other words, the larger connotation of the expression 'rates of wages' is capable of comprising in its scope and ambit, 'the scale of wages'.[5] The fixation of the rates of wages, which includes within its compass, the fixation of the scales of wages, and the fitment of workmen into wage scales, will also depend on the paying capacity of the industry.

Fitment of a Workman

Implicit and intrinsically connected with the questions of revision of the wage-scales, is the question of the fitment of employees into the wage scales and a flat or an ad hoc increase of the salaries of workmen, wherever considered necessary. This is elementary and fundamental to the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal, in revising wage-scales. An industrial tribunal, therefore, when deciding upon the wage-scales of the employees of an establishment, would have full liberty to propose an ad hoc increase of salaries, as part of the revision of the wages, because the fitment into the revised pay scales is itself a part of the revision of pay-scales.[6] Normally, in the question of 'fitting-in', the length of the service of the employee is taken into account and in the absence of any evidence that another uniform rule was followed by the employer, the length of the service is the only criterion available, to be adopted in laying down the rules of 'fitting-in'.[7] These considerations are proper and relevant for industrial tribunals to adopt, while revising the wage-scales of the employees of a concern. But there is no rule, statutory or otherwise, which prescribes that, whenever there is a revision of the pay-scales of the employees of an establishment, either as a result of an award of a tribunal or by agreement, if an employee's basic salary is out of step in the scale prescribed, the same should be raised to bring it on to a step higher in the scale. The considerations which may be appropriate for revising the wage-scales of the employees of a concern, cannot be taken into account by an industrial tribunal in determining whether the basic salary of an employee should be raised to bring it on a step higher in the scale.[8] In the words of Bhargava J:

> It has to be kept in view, that a scale is provided with two objectives. One is that a workman should, while improving in efficiency with experience, receive some compensation in the form of increments, in a scale of pay. The second principle for prescribing a scale of pay is that a workman, when he starts his service, has usually more restricted requirements, which increase with the lapse > of time. It has been envisaged that a workman, when first joining service, may have only himself to feed, or at the most two mouths, so as to include his wife. An average family of a workman under the present conditions, is envisaged to include two or three children at a later stage, and, with this development in the family, the burden on the workman increases. One of the reasons for granting a scale of pay is to make a provision for this increased burden.[9]

Further, even an unskilled mazdoor is in the same position and considering the present social concept, it would be fair even if an unskilled mazdoor is given a scale of pay, stretched over a period of ten years, within which he can be expected to stabilise his family burden.[10] In French Motor Car (supra), Wanchoo J observed:

> ...generally, adjustments are granted when scales of wages are fixed for the first time. But there is nothing in law to prevent the tribunal from granting adjustments even in cases where previously, pay-scales were in existence, but that has to be done sparingly, taking into consideration the facts and circumstances of each case. The usual reason for granting adjustments, even where wage scales were formerly in existence, is that the increments provided in the former wage-scales were particularly low and therefore, justice required that an adjustment should be granted a second time.[11]

It was, therefore, held that there was no justification for making an adjustment in the manner which had been provided by the tribunal, when new scales were fixed and all that should reasonably have been provided in the matter of adjustment was that, when an employee was brought on to the new scale, his pay should have been stepped up to the next stage in the new scale, in case there was no such pay in the old scales. In Hindustan Times (supra), Das Gupta J observed:

> ...what adjustment should be given when fixing the wage-scales, whether for the first time or in place of an old existing scale, has to be decided by industrial adjudication after a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. It may well be true that in the absence of any special circumstances, an adjustment of the nature as allowed in this case, by allowing a special increment in the new scale, on the basis of service already rendered, may not be appropriate. [12]

In Greaves Cotton, referring to the earlier cases, the court observed that the question as to whether an adjustment should be granted or not, would always depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. On a comparison of the scales of pay of the company and those prevalent in other concerns, the court found that the pay-scales were not high, as compared to the pay-scales in comparable concerns, and if, anything, they were on the lower side and in the concerns of the company, the first rate of increments was generally on the lower side and lasted for a longer period than in the case of comparable concerns. In this situation, the holding of the tribunal, awarding increments by way of a adjustment, was upheld, although this resulted in raising the pay-packet of the workmen, which would stand in comparison with some of the best concerns in the region.[13] Similarly, the court affirmed the award of the tribunal in Gramophone Co, ordering that the workers should be fixed in the awarded scale according to their present pay and if it did not coincide with any of the new scales, they should be stepped up to the nearest higher stage and thereafter, the workmen, who had completed three years of service, should be given one increment and those who had completed six years of service, or more, should be given two increments. In view of the fact that some grades were enforced in the company earlier, the court found no reason to interfere with the provision made by the tribunal, in the matter of adjustments.[14] But later, in Calcutta Insurance, where the scales prevalent in the company were unusually low, as compared to those of other comparable concerns, before the date of the award, and unless the length of the services of the workmen was taken into consideration, great hardship was likely to be inflicted on the existing workmen, when compared with the salary and dearness allowance which new workers would get, the pay and dearness allowance of the workmen fixed by the tribunal was held to be fairly comparable to those of the workmen working in other comparable concerns. Thus, by fitting the workers in the new scales of pay, taking into account their length of service, the company would be rehabilitating them to a certain extent, even though they might have suffered in the past, on account of the inadequacy of the scales of pay and dearness allowance. In view of the fact that the wage scales and dearness allowance were low even as compared to other comparable concerns and to the financial capacity of the employer to bear the burden, the award of the tribunal was affirmed and the court declined to modify it with respect to the question of adjustment of the workmen into the new scales.[15]

In National Tobacco, the tribunal directed that when fitting workmen in the new grades, each workman should only be stepped up to the next stage in the new scale, just above the salary which the workman was getting in the existing scale applicable to him. This direction was challenged before the Supreme Court, on behalf of the workmen, on the ground that it would result in a loss of benefit to those workmen who had put in long years of service, because, in some cases, even the new workmen, employed for the first time, may become entitled to the same salary in the new scale, as would be payable to a workman who had put in service for a longer period, with the company. It was, therefore, contended that the tribunal should have directed that each workman would be entitled to one increment in the new scales, for over three years of service, with a maximum of five increments. Since the grades of pay had not been revised for a large number of years and the scales of pay had become outdated, the court partially accepted the contention of the workers, that the adjudication of the fitment in the new scales, should take into account the length of the service put in by the workmen, under the old scales. Speaking for the court, Bhargava J, held that it would be unjust that a workman with a long period of service should be made to draw the same salary in the new scale as a new entrant and thus, be deprived of all the benefits of his earlier long service and, on this view of the matter, directed that all the workmen should be fitted at the amount of salary being drawn already, or, if there be no such stage in the new scale, at the next higher stage or at the stage in the new scale to which he would be entitled, if he were deemed to start in that new scale and was given one increment for every three years of service, with a maximum of five increments, whichever was higher.[16] In Indian Link Chain, while prescribing the consolidated wage scales of daily wages, the tribunal had neither adopted the scales of wages claimed by the union, nor did it fix them on a point-to-point basis. Setting aside the award, Jaganmohan Reddy J observed:

> This principle, in our view, recognises that the payment in a graduated wage-scale should reflect the years of service of an employee in that grade. When the graduated wage-scale is first fixed and a fitment is made therein, a subsequent revision in the wage-scales does not require any further fitment, because the original fitment will continue to give them the advantage of their service. [17]

Classification of Employees for Wage Fixation

While fixing wages, it is necessary for the tribunal, who is entrusted with this task, to see the nature of the work which a workman is required to perform and then place him in a category to which he belongs. Such classification or categorisation is incidental to wage fixation and therefore, will fall within the jurisdiction of the tribunal under s 10(4). However, the tribunal has to apply its mind and then decide as to which classification or category a particular workman belongs. If a classification is based on no material, such classification will not be sustainable.[18] The classification of workmen for the purposes of wages, has to be two-fold, namely,

(a) classification of jobs, and

(b) fitting of existing staff into the various classified jobs. The fitment of the employees into various categories and classes has been dealt with in the foregoing topic.

The classification of jobs, has to be dealt if it is in dispute, between the employer and the workmen, with by the tribunal itself but fixing of individual workmen in particular classified jobs can best be done by the management, in consultation with the union of workmen. The disputed cases may be referred for adjudication, under this category.[19] In Indian Hume Pipe,[20] the management and the workmen agreed before the industrial tribunal, that the categories and classifications of the respective employees shall be as provided under an earlier award between them. But the tribunal reclassified certain categories of workmen so as to be inconsistent with the agreement. The direction of the tribunal in this respect, was set aside by the Supreme Court. The usual pattern of the categories of workmen are: unskilled, semi-skilled and skilled, but in some cases, there are further sub-divisions of these classifications. In Greaves Cotton, the tribunal introduced a 'higher unskilled' category. The Supreme Court, in appeal, observed that it could not be understood:

> ...how the unskilled category can be sub-divided into two, namely, 'lower' and 'higher' unskilled, though we can understand the semi-skilled and skilled categories being sub-divided, depending upon the amount of skill. But there cannot be degrees of a want of skill, among the unskilled class.[21]

Piece-Rate System

Piece-rate is what is paid by results or the output of work, which is often described as a 'task'. There is greater consideration to quantity in fixing piece-rates in some particular types of work, in some industries, with a guaranteed minimum. The same standard may not be appropriate in all types of piece-work. With reference to a particular work, the importance of man rather than the machine employed, may have to be dealt with differently. Even in piece-rates, it will be necessary to look around to find same correlation with time-rates of the same or similar class of workers; for example, the contribution of the worker to the job, the nature of the work, the part played by the machine, the incentive to work and above all, protection against any creation of industrial unrest, because of the existence side by side, of two categories of workers, particularly if there is no possibility of transfer of labour from one type of work to the other, from time to time. Again, there may be some work where a special skill of the worker, with or without machine, may be necessary and that factor will have to be then, considered. It will vary from industry to industry and from one process to another. No hard and fast rule can be laid down, nor is it possible or helpful. In industrial adjudication, the tribunal will have to see that the piece-rates do not drive workers to fatigue or to the limit of exhaustion and hence, will have to keep an eye on the time factor in work. Then again, a guaranteed minimum may also have to be provided, so that for no fault of a diligent worker, he does not stand to lose on any account. There may be a misty penumbra, which has got to be pierced through upon all available materials on record and also what the tribunal, in fairness, can lay its hands on, with notice to the parties, for the purpose of fixing the piece-rates, while balancing all aspects. These are broadly, the bare outlines of approaching a matter so involved and sensitive as wage fixation, particularly when no one at the present time, can shut one's eyes to the rising spiral of prices of essential commodities. The wages of the piece-rated workmen have to be kept in line with the wages of the time-rated workmen, with the object of avoiding discrimination and heart-burn among workers and for the maintenance of industrial peace among them.[22] In British India Corpn,[23] two types of employees, viz, checkers and perchers, were doing the same work on two different stages, in the weaving unit of a textile mill. The checkers were paid on piece rate and daily wages basis, while perchers were paid on a monthly rate basis. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that the award of the industrial tribunal, directing that the checkers should also be paid on a monthly basis, was valid and justifiable. He further observed that it was a case of fixing the wages on a monthly basis and there was no question of revising the wages in the industry.

Inter-State Concerns

In Dunlop Rubber. which an all India concern, the Supreme Court held that it would be advisable to have uniform conditions of service and, if uniform conditions prevail in any such concern, they should not be easily changed. But cases may arise where, if necessary, on the basis of the industry-cum-region basis, changes may have to be made, even where the conditions of an all India concern are uniform. Even though uniformity may be desirable in an all India concern, the tribunal should not abstain from seeing that fair conditions of service prevail in the industry with which it is concerned. If any scheme, which may be uniformly in force throughout India in such a concern appears to be unfair and not in accordance with the prevailing conditions in the region, it would be the duty of the tribunal to make changes in the scheme, to make it fair and bring it in line with the prevailing conditions, particularly in the region in which the tribunal is functioning, irrespective of the fact that the demand is made by only a small minority of the workmen employed in one place, out of the many where the all-India concern carries on its business.[24] Though this case was dealing with the introduction of the scheme of gratuity, the principle equally applies to the formulation of a wage-structure. In Remington Rand (supra), the claim for a lunch allowance, on the basis of a similar allowance being given in some other branches, was rejected by the court.

Standardisation of Wage Scheme

Standardisation means levelling up of those whose, terms and conditions of service which are less favourable than the standardised ones, and levelling down those of such others, whose terms and conditions are more favourable than the standardised ones. It is well known that a standardisation of the conditions of service, in industrial adjudication, generally does not recognise exceptions. If the wage-structure is standardised, it is intended to make wages uniform in the whole industry brought under the working of the standardisation scheme.[25] The whole purpose of introducing a standardisation scheme with respect to wages, is to standardise wages by raising them to the standardised level where they are low and by reducing them where they are high, in order to fit them in the standardised scheme. When a standardisation scheme of wages comes into force, it is an integrated whole and may sometimes result in some categories of workmen getting less than what they were getting before. However, it would not be against the basic principles of standardisation, to protect the wages of individual workmen, who might be getting more than the wages fixed in the standardised scheme at the time when such a scheme is brought into force. The tribunal, however, has discretion to decide whether it will protect these individual workmen or not. If it gives no direction for such protection to individual workmen, they will not be protected and their wages will have to be lowered, in case they are higher than those fixed in the standardisation scheme. But if the tribunal considers that it will be more in consonance with justice, to protect the wages of the individual workmen, it may give a direction to that effect, even though they may be more than the wages fixed in the standardisation scheme. Wanchoo J laid down the following three conditions:

(a) There can be no further raising of the wages of the protected workmen, by the management, after the standardisation scheme comes into force, for any such further raise will be against the principle of standardisation;

(b) If the standardisation scheme fixes incremental scales of wages and if a protected workman is getting a wage which is between the minimum and the maximum and he is not entitled, in accordance with the length of his service, to that wage, but to something less in the grade, the extra amount that he may be getting, will have to be absorbed in future increments, till he is properly 'fitted-in' in the incremental scale, according to the length of his service; and

(c) When any workman's service comes to an end, for any reason whatsoever, no other employee, whether new or old, would be entitled to claim the pay which the outgoing employee was getting, on the ground that a vacancy with the higher pay has arisen.[26]

In DCM, the Bombay scheme of standardised wages (for textile industry) was applied by the textile mills in Delhi, according to which, two looms were the normal assignment of one weaver. The employer equated one Turkish loom in its mills, to two plain looms and enforced the deduction in wages in accordance with para 7 of the Bombay scheme but there was nothing in the Bombay scheme to justify the assumption that one Turkish loom would be equivalent to two ordinary looms. The Supreme Court held that there was no justification for introducing a deeming provision in the scheme, that a person working on one Turkish loom should be deemed to be working on two ordinary looms, so as to enable the employer to enforce a deduction in the wages of the weavers attending to three or more looms. When the wages were fixed on a piece-rate basis, and the workmen were able to effect their production by attending to more looms as a result of an improvement in the machinery, there could be no justification for any deduction in their wages. It is the essence of a piece-rate basis, that more the production by the workmen, the proportionately larger would be their wages, subject to such conditions as might be prescribed in this behalf.[27] In National and Grindlays Bank, the tribunal awarded that the employees of the Kanpur branch of the bank would be entitled to medical aid and expenses, up to a monetary limit of Rs 250 per year, which would be available to the employees as well as to the members of their families, as defined in a bipartite settlement. The award was challenged before the Supreme Court, not only on the ground that it was discriminatory and showed an unwarranted favour to the employees of one of the branches of the bank at Kanpur, but also that it was against the principles of standardisation, which was the basis of the bipartite agreement. The court noticed that the object of the bipartite agreement was to standardise the facility in respect of medical aid and expenses, but when it was found that one of the branches of the bank was not able to fall in line, that point was left for further negotiation, but nonetheless, it was made manifestly clear, that standardisation should be achieved to bring them in line with the workmen of the other branches of the bank, in regard to medical aid expenses. The court held that there was no cogent reason upon which the tribunal could distinguish the claim of the workmen at Kanpur and single them out for a beneficial treatment, which was not applicable to the workmen engaged in other branches. On this view of the matter, the court held that the workmen located at Kanpur should be treated on par with the employees of the other branches, who were similarly situated.[28]

Revision of Wage Structure

In dealing with the question of a revision of the wage scales, the technical considerations of res judicata cannot bar industrial adjudication.[29] For a detailed discussion of the principle of res judicata, see notes and comments under s 10(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act.

(a) Increase in Wage-Structure

The same principles will govern the revision of a wage structure as they govern the formulation of a wage structure in the first instance, by industrial adjudication, because there is no difference between a revision of the pay scale and a fixation of the wage structure. The revision of a wage-structure, like constructing a wage structure in the first instance, is a delicate task and the tribunal has to bear in mind, as against the labour's demand for a higher wage, the problem of the additional burden which a revision of the wage scales would impose. In revising the wage-structure, therefore, industrial adjudication has to take into account, a broad and overall view of the financial position of the employer and then, to make an attempt to reconcile the natural and just claim of the employees for a fair wage, with the capacity of the employer to pay. In determining such capacity, allowance must be made for the legitimate desire of the employer to make a reasonable profit. In National Insurance, from the revised scales awarded by the tribunal, it was manifest that except for one grade, the scales for the rest of the grades offered by the employer company, to the union, in its notice, compared favourably with those granted by the tribunal. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court did not think it proper to interfere with the scales of wages. Shelat J observed:

> ...to harmonise the conflicting claims of labour and capital on a reasonable basis, and so, if it appears that the employer cannot really bear the burden of the increased pay bill, industrial adjudication cannot refuse to examine his case and should not hesitate to give him relief, if it is satisfied that if such relief is not given, the employer may have to close down his business.[30]

In enhancing a wage-structure, as in constructing a wage-structure for the first lime, the nature of the work, the quantum of the work available for the worker, the average wages that he would earn for each item of work during a month, and the paying capacity of the industry, have to be taken into consideration and an enhancement can be awarded only after having due regard to all these factors.[31] In New Egerton Woollen Mills, while professing to treat the establishment in question, with another, as a comparable concern, the tribunal did not fix the revised wage scales so as to equalise them with those prevailing in the other concern. From a comparison of the wage scales in the two concerns, the disparity between them was apparent. The Supreme Court, therefore, held that since the tribunal held the other concern to be the only comparable unit in the region, it would not, for any reason, fix wage scales at levels lower or less favourable than those existing in the other concern. Since there was no question of the company not having the requisite financial capacity, the Supreme Court itself, modified the wage scales awarded by the tribunal, so as, to at least, bring them in line with those in the other concern.[32]

(b) Reduction in Wages

In Millowners Assn, Gajendragadkar CJI held that the decision of this problem must also be based on the major consideration, that the conflicting claims of labour and capital must be harmonised, on a reasonable basis. The learned Chief Justice observed:

> ...If it appears that the employer cannot really bear the burden of the increasing wage bill, industrial adjudication, on principle, cannot refuse to examine the employer's case and should not hesitate to give him relief, if it is satisfied that if such relief is not given, the employer may have to close down his business. It is unlikely that such situations would frequently arise, but on principle, if such a situation does arise, a claim by the employer for the reduction of the wage structure, cannot be rejected summarily.[33]

In Crown Aluminium Works, Gajendragadkar J held:

> We do not think it would be correct to say that in no conceivable circumstances, can the wage structure be revised to the prejudice of workmen ... theoretically, no wage structure can or should be revised to the prejudice of workmen, if the structure in question falls in the category of the bare subsistence or the minimum wage'. ... it would be open to the employer to claim its revision, even to the prejudice of the workmen, provided a case for such revision is made out on merits, to the satisfaction of the tribunal.[34]

In Indian Hume Pipe, the tribunal, having found that the financial position of the company was sound, nevertheless accepted the case of the company for a change in the dearness allowance system. The Supreme Court observed that the entire approach of the tribunal was erroneous. The court held that there was no reason to change the slab system, to the detriment of the workmen, without compelling reasons, which should have existed for a long period of time. Speaking for the court, Khalid J observed:

> Normally, the answer would be in the negative. Tribunals and courts can take judicial notice of one fact; and that is that the wages of workmen, except in exceptionally rare cases, fall within the category of mere 'subsisting-wages'. That being so, it would be inadvisable to tinker with the wage-structure of workmen, except under compelling circumstances. Employers have seldom displayed a co-operative attitude where wage structure of workmen is devised. They have never showed a willingness for the involvement of labour with the capital, so as to engender a participative labour capital relationship. This is a reality that tribunals and courts have to reckon with, that being so, courts and tribunals have necessarily to keep their hands off from upsetting a wage-structure that has satisfactorily worked for a long time. The sweat of the labour is never reflected in any balance sheet, although the latent force behind every successful industry is this sweat. With their present wage structure, the labour just exists. No one should try to deny them even this bare source of existence.[35]

Then again, in Raptakos Brett, the employer sought to restructure its dearness allowance scheme, by abolishing the slab system and substituting the same by a scheme prejudicial to the workmen, on the ground that the slab-system had resulted in over neutralisation, thereby, landing the workmen in the high-wage island. The court held that the dearness allowance scheme which had stood the test of time for almost 30 years and had been approved by various settlements between the parties, could not have been justifiably abolished by the industrial adjudicator and the High Court.[36]

Retrospective Award of Wages

It is now well established that the tribunal has power to give retrospective effect to its award. Hence, the tribunal has discretion to give effect to the wage-structure formulated by it, from a retrospective date, a date anterior to the date of the award. As to the date from which the award should come into force, industrial adjudication has treated the date of demand and the date on which the award comes into force, as two extreme points. It has, however, the discretion to fix any intermediate date, depending upon the circumstances of each case. When the tribunal has fixed the date with effect from which the award of wages should be effective, in a proper exercise of its discretion, the courts will be reluctant, in judicial review, to interfere with the date so fixed.[37] The date from which the award of wages should be made effective, has to be decided by the tribunal on consideration of the circumstance of each case and no general formula can be laid down in this connection.[38] It is, therefore, a matter to be decided by the tribunal, in its discretion, on a careful consideration of the peculiar circumstances of each case, which would obviously include the financial capacity of the employer to bear the burden of a retrospective fixation of the new scales of wages.[39] In Lipton, the Supreme Court did not regard the fact that the labour union had presented its charter of demands to Lipton Ltd, for the first time, towards the end of December 1963, as sufficient in itself, for giving a retrospective effect to the new scales of pay from that point of time.[40]

In United Collieries, a demand for an increased wages was found justified on merits by the tribunal and the benefit of the increased wages was given, in the circumstances of the case, to the concerned workmen, with effect from retrospective dates. The award was confirmed by the Supreme Court in appeal, with certain modifications.[41] In Hydro Engineers, the tribunal directed the employer to give effect to the award retrospectively, approximately from the date of the demand, presumably because by that time, the cost of living index had gone up considerably and not to have done so would have resulted in depriving the workmen of the minimum wages commensurate with that rise. The Supreme Court, in appeal by special leave, did not think this to be a fit case for it to interfere with the retrospective date of the award.[42] In National Insurance and National Tobacco (supra) the Supreme Court declined to interfere with the retrospective operation of the award on the ground that, on facts, the tribunal could not be said to have exercised its discretion improperly or unreasonably. In Filmistan, however, the court noticed a number of infirmities in the award of the tribunal and particularly, that it had not properly considered the financial capacity of the employer and also, that it had not taken into consideration, other relevant factors, in fixing the wage-scales, and remanded the case for fresh hearing. Notwithstanding the demand of the workmen for retrospective operation of the award, the tribunal directed that the award will have effect from 4 November 1965, ie, the date on which the case was remanded by the Supreme Court to it. In appeal, the Supreme Court noticed that such retrospective operation would be casting a heavy burden on the management. The Court, though felt that it should not interfere with the award, yet having regard to the facts and circumstances, ordered that the wages and dearness allowance awarded would be enforceable with effect from 10 November 1966.[43]

70 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 866 [LNIND 1967 SC 226] : AIR 1968 SC 224 [LNIND 1967 SC 425] (SC), per Mitter J.

71 Director, State Farms Corpn of India Ltd v IT & LC (2003) 3 LLJ 81 : 2003 (3) WLC 83 (Raj .) per AD Singh J.

72 Indian Overseas Bank Ltd v Workmen CA No 480 of 1966 (1967) : [1968] 38 Comp Cas 395 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

73 Polychem Ltd v RD Tulpule (1972) 2 LLJ 29 [LNIND 1972 SC 169] : AIR 1972 SC 1967 [LNIND 1971 SC 666] (SC), per Dua J.

74 Shaw Wallace & Co Ltd v First IT 1986 Lab IC 2030, 2036 (Cal), per UC Banerjee J.

75 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 336 [LNIND 1975 SC 249] : AIR 1975 SC 1737 [LNIND 1975 SC 573] (SC), per Untwalia J.

76 Kamani Metal & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

77 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen AIR 1967 SC 948 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] (960) : (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] : [1967] 1 SCR 652 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] (SC), per Subba Rao, CJI.

78 Workmen of Indian Oxygen Ltd v Mgmt CA No 806 of 1982 (2-5-1982) (SC), per Desai J.

79 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 239.

80 Ibid, p 238.

81 Killick Nixon Ltd v KACE Union (1975) 2 LLJ 53 [LNIND 1975 SC 201], 56 : AIR 1975 SC 1778 [LNIND 1975 SC 201] (SC), per Goswami J.

82 Mgmt of Shri CVKUS Mandali Ltd v Industrial Court (1979) 2 LLJ 383 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], 386 : AIR 1980 SC 31 [LNIND 1979 SC 357] (SC), per Kailasam J.

83 Hindustan Lever Ltd v BN Dongre 1995 Lab IC 1136, 1143 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

84 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 127 : AIR 1967 SC 948 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

85 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 239.

86 Ibid.

87 Killick Nixon Ltd v Killick & Allied Companies Employees' Union (1975) 2 LLJ 53 [LNIND 1975 SC 201], 55-56 (SC), per Goswami J

88 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 239.

89 Wenger & Co v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 403 [LNIND 1962 SC 420], 412 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

90 Workmen of Indian Oxygen Ltd v Indian Oxygen Ltd CA No 806 of 1982 (2-5-1985) (SC), per Desai J.

91 Workmen of Orient Paper Mills Ltd v Orient Paper Mills Ltd (1969) 2 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1968 SC 205], 403 (SC), per Bhargava J.

92 Rambagh Palace Hotel v Rajasthan HW Union 1976 Lab IC 1474, 1475 : AIR 1976 SC 2303 [LNIND 1976 SC 2] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

93 Bengal Chem & Pharma Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 751 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], 758 : AIR 1969 SC 360 [LNIND 1968 SC 279] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

1 Union Drug Co Ltd v Fifth Industrial Tribunal (1963) 1 LLJ 172 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

2 Manton & Co Ltd v State of West Bengal (1962) 2 LLJ 444 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

3 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185],28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

4 Filmistan Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1965 SC 299] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

5 Shivraj Fine Arts Litho Works v State IC 1978 Lab IC 828 (SC), per Kailasam J.

6 Gokak Mills Ltd v Industrial Tribunal 1970 Lab IC 337, 341-42 (Mys) (DB), per Gopivallabha Iyengar J.

7 Art Bangles Pvt Ltd v The Workmen CA No 918 of 1966 (3-12-1968) (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

8 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 115 [LNIND 1973 SC 119] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

9 Symonds & Co Pvt Ltd v Symonds & Co Karamchari Sangh 1980 Lab IC (NOC) 77 (All) (DB).

10 Workmen of Jagjiwandas Narotamdas Metal Factory v Mgmt (1951) 2 LLJ 778 (LAT).

11 Workmen of GEB v Gujarat Electricity Board (1969) 2 LLJ 791 [LNIND 1968 SC 388], 796-98 : AIR 1970 SC 87 [LNIND 1968 SC 388] (SC), per Bhargava J.

12 Press Employees' Assn v The Statesman Ltd (1954) 1 LLJ 167 (LAT).

13 Kapoor Silk Mills v Mill Mazdoor Sabha, (1967) 2 LLJ 89 (Bom) (DB), per Patel J.

14 Ghaziabad Engineering Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 777 [LNIND 1969 SC 217] : AIR 1970 SC 390 [LNIND 1969 SC 217] (SC), per Shah J.

15 Silk & Art Silk Mills' Assn Ltd v Mill Mazdoor Sabha (1972) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1972 SC 243] : AIR 1972 SC 2273 [LNIND 1972 SC 243] (SC), per Mathew J.

16 British India Corpn v Industrial Tribunal 1984 Lab IC 14, 15 : AIR 1984 SC 362 [LNIND 1983 SC 215] (SC).

17 Workmen of Indian Oxygen Ltd v Indian Oxygen Ltd CA No 806 of 1982 (1985) (SC) per Desai J.

18 West Coast Paper Mills Ltd v West Coast PME Union 1990 Lab IC 1945, 1953 (Bom) (DB), per Suresh J.

19 Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd v Workers (1951) 2 LLJ 314 (LAT).

20 Clerks of Calcutta Tramways v CTC Ltd (1956) 2 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1956 SC 79], 453 : AIR 1957 SC 78 [LNIND 1956 SC 79] (SC), per Govinda Menon J.

21 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1953) 2 LLJ 845 (LAT).

22 Tata Oil Millis Co Ltd v Workmen (1953) 2 LLJ 492 (LAT).

23 Clerks of Calcutta Tramways v Calcutta Tramways Co Ltd (1956) 2 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1956 SC 79] (SC), per Govinda Menon J.

24 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

25 Bengal Chemical & Pharma. Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 751 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], 757 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

26 Killick Nixon Ltd v KAC Employees Union (1975) 2 LLJ 53 [LNIND 1975 SC 201], 64 (SC), per Goswami J.

27 Mazgaon Dock Ltd v Assn of Engg Workers 1990 Lab IC 1061, 1069 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

28 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 243.

29 Mgmt of SCVKUS Mandali Ltd v IC (1979) 2 LLJ 383 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], 387 : AIR 1980 SC 31 [LNIND 1979 SC 357] (SC), per Kailasam J.

30 Hindustan Lever Ltd v BN Dongre 1995 Lab IC 1136, 1143 : AIR 1995 SC 817 [LNIND 1994 SC 1260]: (1994) 6 SCC 157 [LNIND 1994 SC 1260] (SC), per Ahmadi J.

31 Monthly Rated Workmen at Wadala Factory of Indian Hume Pipe Co. Ltd. v Indian Hume Pipe Co. Ltd. Bombay, (1986) 1 LLJ 520 [LNIND 1986 SC 122], 527-28 (SC, per Khalid J) : AIR 1980 SC 1794 .

32 Mazgaon Dock Ltd, Bombay v Assn of Engineering Workers, Bombay, 1990 Lab IC 1061, 1088-89 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

33 Hindustan Lever Ltd v BN Dongre 1995 Lab IC 1136 : AIR 1995 SC 817 [LNIND 1994 SC 1260]: (1994) 6 SCC 157 [LNIND 1994 SC 1260] (SC), per Ahmadi J.

34 'A Guide to CPI Numbers', Labour Bureau, Ministry of Labour and Employment, pp 172-73.

35 Cited in Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 20 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

36 'A Guide to CPI Numbers', Labour Bureau, Ministry of Labour and Employment, p 5.

37 Ahmedabad Millowners Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

38 Royal Calcutta Golf Club v Third Industrial Tribunal (1960) 1 LLJ 464 (Cal), per Sinha J.

39 Workmen of Indian Oxygen Ltd v IOL CA No 806 of 1982 (SC), per Desai J.

40 Source: "Consumer Price Index: An anatomy" published by Labour Bureau, Simla.

41 Jardine Henderson Ltd v Employees (1961) 1 LLJ 641 [LNIND 1961 SC 15] : AIR 1967 SC 515 [LNIND 1961 SC 15] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

42 Greaves Cotton & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 342 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], 348 : AIR 1964 SC 689 [LNIND 1963 SC 254] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

43 Workmen of WIMCO v Western India Match Co Ltd (1962) 1 LLJ 660, 661 : AIR 1966 SC 976 [LNIND 1962 SC 161] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

44 Associated Power Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 743 [LNIND 1963 SC 253], 745 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

45 India General Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 561 [LNIND 1960 SC 89] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

46 Swastic Cashew Industries Pvt Ltd v IT (1967) 1 LLJ 30, 41 (Mys) (DB), per Gopivallabha Ayyanagar J.

47 Workmen of Hindustan Motors Ltd v Mgmt (1962) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1962 SC 265], 355-56 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

48 Vishuddhananda Saraswathi Marwari Hospital v Workmen (1952) 2 LLJ 327 (LAT).

49 Workmen of HML v Hindustan Motors Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1962 SC 265], 356 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

50 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 115 : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

51 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v TLA (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

52 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 58 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

53 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 115 [LNIND 1973 SC 119] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

54 Phaltan Sugar Works Ltd v Employees (1961) 2 LLJ 136 [LNIND 1960 SC 119], 139 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

55 Indian Vegetable Products Workers' Union v Mgmt (1954) 2 LLJ 441 (LAT).

56 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 58 (sq, per Hidayatullah J.

57 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 287 [LNIND 1962 SC 87], 290 (sq per Gajendragadkar J.

58 Bengal Chem & Pharma Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 751 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], 758 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

59 Workmen of NEW Mills v New Egerton Woollen Mills (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96], 788-89 (SC), per Shelat J.

60 Bengal Chem and Pharma Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 751 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], 759 : AIR 1969 SC 360 [LNIND 1968 SC 279] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

61 Cinema Theatres v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 128 [LNIND 1964 SC 106] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

62 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 542 [LNIND 1967 SC 225] : AIR 1968 SC 224 [LNIND 1967 SC 425]: (1967) 1 LLJ 866 (SC), per Mitter J.

63 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 115 [LNIND 1973 SC 119] : AIR 1973 SC 1266 [LNIND 1973 SC 119] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

64 Phaltan Sugar Works Ltd v Employees (1961) 2 LLJ 136 [LNIND 1960 SC 119] : AIR 1967 SC 330 [LNIND 1960 SC 119] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

65 SSLight Rly Co v IT 1971 Lab IC 308 [LNIND 1970 DEL 63], 311 (Del), per Rangarajan J.

66 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 145.

67 Patna Electric Supply Co Ltd v Workers Union (1959) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1959 SC 75] 372-73 : AIR 1959 SC 1035 [LNIND 1959 SC 75] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

68 Tocklai Experimental Station v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 694 [LNIND 1961 SC 361], 698-99 : AIR 1962 SC 1340 [LNIND 1961 SC 361] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

69 United Salt Works & Industries Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 131 [LNIND 1961 SC 141] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

70 Mohammed & Sons v Workmen CA No 338 of 1966 (27-7-1967) (SC), per Wanchoo CJI.

71 Mgmt of SB Products Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 1243 : AIR 1971 SC 2134 (SC), per Mitter J.

72 Corpn of Madras v Rathan Singh (1969) 2 LLJ 156 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

73 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Ram Adhar Singh CA No 1444 of 1966, (1968) (SC), per Shelat J.

74 International Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences, 1968, Vol 8, p 497.

75 Ibid, s 498.

76 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, pp 166-67.

77 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1969) 19 FLR 46 : AIR 1970 SC 1421 [LNIND 1969 SC 420]: 1970 Lab IC 1182 [LNIND 1969 SC 420] (SC), per Shelat J.

78 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen 1970 Lab IC 1182 [LNIND 1969 SC 420], 1184-85 : AIR 1970 SC 1321 [LNIND 1970 SC 263]: (1969) 19 FLR 46 (SC), per Shelat J.

79 National Insurance Co Ltd v Workmen CA No 693 and 841 of 1966 (13-9-1968) (SC), per Shelat J.

80 Mgmt of National & Grindlays Bank Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 1491 [LNIND 1971 SC 341] : AIR 1971 SC 2454 [LNIND 1971 SC 341]: (1971) 2 SCC 595 [LNIND 1971 SC 341] (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

81 Shalimar Paints Ltd v Third IT 1971 Lab IC 164 [LNIND 1970 CAL 56] (Cal), per TK Basu J.

82 Atul Products Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 20 [LNIND 1972 SC 157] : AIR 1972 SC 1234 [LNIND 1972 SC 157] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

83 Workmen DESU v Mgmt (1972) 2 LLJ 130 [LNIND 1972 SC 227] : AIR 1973 SC 365 [LNIND 1972 SC 227] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

84 Distt Transport Manager, OSRTC v LC 1991 Lab IC 2477-78 (Ori) (DB), per Hansaria CJ.

85 State Bank of India v CGIT (1994) 2 LLJ 329 (All), per DS Sinha J.

86 Bala Subrahmanya Rajaram v BC Patil AIR 1958 SC 518 [LNIND 1958 SC 23], 520 : (1958) 1 LLJ 773 [LNIND 1958 SC 23] : [1958] 1 SCR 1504 [LNIND 1958 SC 23] (SC), per Vivian Bose J.

87 Vayitri Plantations Ltd v Babu Mathew 1994 Lab IC 632, 636 : (1994) 1 LLJ 1131 (KER) (DB) (Ker), per Jagannadha Rao CJ.

88 Crown Aluminium Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

89 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, Chapter 16, p 236.

90 Crown Aluminium Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106], 6 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

91 UK Roller Flour Mills v IC 1979 Lab IC 45, 51 (Bom) (DB), per Tulpule J.

92 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

93 Philip Snowden, The Living Wage, 1912, p 6.

94 Workmen v Mgmt of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 292 : AIR 1992 SC 504 [LNIND 1991 SC 571]: (1992) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] : (1992) 1 SCC 290 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

95 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 364 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

96 Workmen v Mgmt. of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 293 : AIR 1992 SC 504 [LNIND 1991 SC 571]: (1992) 1 LLJ 340 : (1992) 1 SCC 290 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

1 Government of India, Report of the Committee on Fair Wages (CFW), 1947-49, p 115.

2 Phaltan Sugar Mills v Workmen (1954) 2 LLJ 341, 345 (LAT).

3 Standard Vacuum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1961 SC 25] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

4 Workmen v Mgmt of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 293 (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

5 Killick Nixon Ltd v Killick and Allied Co Employees Union (1975) 2 LLJ 53 [LNIND 1975 SC 201], 56-57 (SC), per Goswami J.

6 U Unichoyi v State of Kerala (1961) 1 LLJ 631 [LNIND 1961 SC 175], 637 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

7 Chandra Bhawan Boarding and Lodging v State of Mysore AIR 1970 SC 2042 [LNIND 1969 SC 368], per Hegde J.

8 Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd v State of Ajmer (1955) 1 LLJ 129 [LNIND 1954 SC 129], 131 : AIR 1955 SC 33 [LNIND 1954 SC 129] (SC), per Mukherjee J.

9 Crown Aluminium Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106], 6 : AIR 1958 SC 30 [LNIND 1957 SC 106] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

10 Lipton Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 431 [LNIND 1959 SC 14], 442 (SC), per SK Das J.

11 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 364 : AIR 1958 SC 578 [LNIND 1958 SC 25]: (1964) 1 LLJ 9 [LNIND 1963 SC 303] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

12 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 58 : AIR 1967 SC 1175 [LNIND 1967 SC 18] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

13 Workmen v Mgmt. of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 293 : AIR 1992 SC 504 [LNIND 1991 SC 571]: (1992) 1 SCC 290 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

14 S Krishna Murty v State of AP 1995 Lab IC 1773 (SC), per Sawant J.

15 Malayalam Plantations Ltd v State of Kerala (1976) 1 LLJ 114, 132 (Ker) (FB), per Subramanian Poti J.

16 Hindustan Hosiery Industries v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33], 347 (SC), per Goswami J.

17 Lipton Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 431 [LNIND 1959 SC 14], 442 (SC), per SK Das J.

18 All India RBI Employees' Assn v Reserve Bank of India (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 190 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

19 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 234.

20 ILO Convention and Recommendations 1919-1966, p 133; (cited by NCL-I, pp 230-31).

21 Government of India (1931), Report of the Royal Commission on Labour, p 212.

22 Report on the Working of Minimum Wages Act, Ministry of Labour & Employment, 1966, p 16 (NCL-I, p 231).

23 Chandra Bhawan Boarding & Lodging v State of Mysore AIR 1970 SC 2042 [LNIND 1969 SC 368], per Hegde J.

24 Crown Aluminium Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

25 Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd v State of Ajmer (1955) 1 LLJ 129 [LNIND 1954 SC 129]-31 (SC), per Mukherjee J.

26 Chandra Bhawan Boarding and Lodging v State of Mysore AIR 1970 SC 2042 [LNIND 1969 SC 368], 2048, per Hegde J.

27 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 232.

28 Ibid, p 233.

29 Transport Corpn of India Ltd v State of Maharashtra 1993 Lab IC 507, 514 : (1993) 2 LLJ 365 (Bom), per Cazi J.

30 (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

31 Shivraj Fine Arts Litho Works v State Industrial Court 1978 Lab IC 828, 835 (SC), per Kailasam J.

32 Crown Aluminium Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

33 Workmen v Mgmt. of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 293 : AIR 1992 SC 504 [LNIND 1991 SC 571]: (1992) 1 LLJ 340 : (1992) 1 SCC 290 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

34 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 232.

35 Shivraj Fine Arts Litho Works v State IC 1978 Lab IC 828, 835 (SC), per Kailasam J.

36 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366] : AIR 1963 SC 1327 [LNIND 1962 SC 366] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

37 Workmen of Orient Paper Mills Ltd v Orient Paper Mills (1969) 2 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1968 SC 205] : AIR 1969 SC 976 [LNIND 1968 SC 205] (SC), per Bhargava J.

38 Jaydip Industries v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 244 [LNIND 1971 SC 649] : AIR 1972 SC 605 [LNIND 1971 SC 649] (SC), per Mathew J.

39 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

40 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 58 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

41 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

42 Re Express News Papers, op cit, p 363.

43 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

44 Hindustan Hosiery Industries v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33] (SC), per Goswami J.

45 All India Reserve Bank Employees' Assn v Reserve Bank of India (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 190 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

46 Hindustan Antibiotics v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 129 (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

47 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

48 UK Roller Flour Mill v Industrial Court 1979 Lab IC 45, 51 (Bom) (DB), per Tulpule J.

49 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 364 : AIR 1958 SC 578 [LNIND 1958 SC 25] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

50 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 361-62 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

51 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

53 Prof M Fogarty, The Just Wage, 1969, p 152 cited by the NCL-I, p 237.

54 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

55 All India RBI Employees Assn v Reserve Bank of India (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 190 : AIR 1966 SC 305 [LNIND 1965 SC 146] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

56 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 120 : AIR 1967 SC 948 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

57 Monthly Rated Workmen of Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Mgmt (1986) 1 LLJ 520 [LNIND 1986 SC 122], 530 : AIR 1986 SC 1794 [LNIND 1986 SC 122] (SC), per Khalid J.

58 Workmen v Mgmt. of Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 293-94 : AIR 1992 SC 504 [LNIND 1991 SC 571]: (1992) 1 SCC 290 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] : (1992) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1991 SC 571] (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

59 Malayalam Plantations Ltd v State of Kerala (1976) 1 LLJ 114, 133 (Ker) (FB), per Subramonian Poti J.

60 Report of the Committee on Fair Wages, pp 25-26.

61 Ibid, p 26.

62 [1912] 227 US 88; 57 Law Ed 43l.

63 [1940] 312 US 126; 85 Law Ed 624.

64 Kenneth F Walker, Industrial Relations in Australia, 1956.

65 Report of the Committee on Fair Wages, pp 26-27.

66 Ibid, pp 370-71.

67 Ibid, p 371.

68 Government of India (1969), The Report of NCL-I, pp 273-74.

69 Hindustan Hosiery Industries v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33], 347 (SC), per Goswami J.

70 Standard Vacuum Refg Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1961 SC 25], 232 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

71 Barbara Wootten, The Social Foundations of Wage Policy, 1955.

72 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 120 (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

73 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v The Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127], 594 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

74 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, Chap 15, p 220.

75 Standard Vacuum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1961 SC 25], 232 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

76 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, pp 220.

77 Hindustan Times v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]: [1963 (6) FLR 313, per KC Das Gupta J.

78 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v TLA (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

79 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 57-58 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

80 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 228.

81 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

82 Hindustan Times v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

83 Standard Vaccum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1961 SC 25], 232 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

84 Hindustan Hosiery Industries v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33] (SC), per Goswami J.

85 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185],28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

86 Standard Vacuum Refining Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1961 SC 25], 232 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

87 Hindustan Times v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

88 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 228.

89 Hindustan Hosiery Industry v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33] (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 526 [LNIND 1974 SC 33]: (1974) 4 SCC 316 [LNIND 1974 SC 33], per Goswami J.

90 Polychem Ltd v RD Tulpule (1972) 2 LLJ 29 [LNIND 1972 SC 169], 34 (SC), per Dua J.

91 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 220.

92 Crown Aluminimum Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106], 6 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

93 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 130 (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

1 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

2 National Carbon Co (India) Ltd v Judge, Labour Appellate Tribunal (1958) 1 LLJ 472 [LNIND 1957 CAL 79], 481 (Cal), per Sinha J.

3 KEH Abdul Samad Saheb & Co v IT (1963) 1 LLJ 504, 507 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

4 Crown Aluminimum Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106], 6 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

5 Hindustan Times v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 112-13 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

6 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, p 228.

7 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], 126 (SC), per Subba Rao CJI.

8 International Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences, 1968, vol 16, p 403.

9 Workmen of New Egerton Woollen Mills v New Egerton Woollen Mills (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96], 788-89 (SC), per Shelat J.

10 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI. .

11 Workmen of Gujarat Electricity Board v Gujarat Electricity Board (1969) 2 LLJ 791 [LNIND 1968 SC 388] (SC), per Bhargava J.

12 Sangam Press Ltd v The Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 125 [LNIND 1975 SC 204] (SC), per Goswami J.

13 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 367 (SC), per Bhagawati J.

14 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185]-2 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

15 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v The Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

16 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 366-67, 413-14 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 578 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], per Bhagwati J.

17 Workmen of Shri Bajrang Jute Mills v Employers (1970) 2 LLJ 6, 11 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 878 : 1970 (1) Anwr 141 : 1970 (20) FLR 252], per Vaidialingam J.

18 Mgmt of Kirlampudi Sugar Mills Ltd v IT (1971) 2 LLJ 491 [LNIND 1971 SC 414], 498 (SC) : (1973) 3 SCC 626 [LNIND 1971 SC 414], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

19 Workmen of Gujarat Electricity Board v Gujarat Electricity Board, (1969) 2 LLJ 791 [LNIND 1968 SC 388] (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 87 [LNIND 1968 SC 388]: (1969) 1 SCC 266 [LNIND 1968 SC 388] per Bhargava J.

20 Bharatkhand Textile Mfg Co Ltd v Textile Labour Assn, Ahmedabad (1960) 2 LLJ 21 [LNIND 1960 SC 81], 30 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

21 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v TLA (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

22 Shivraj Fine Arts Litho Works v State Industrial Court 1978 Lab IC 828, 836.

23 Workmen of Gujarat Electricity Board v Gujarat Electricity Board (1969) 2 LLJ 791 [LNIND 1968 SC 388] (SC), per Bhargava J.

24 DCM Chemical Works v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 388 [LNIND 1962 SC 97], 395 (SC) : [1962 (4) FLR 409], per Wanchoo J.

25 Bharatkhand Textile Mfg Co Ltd v Textile Labour Assn (1960) 2 LLJ 21 [LNIND 1960 SC 81], 30 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

26 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v Textile Labour Assn (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185],28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

27 Wenger & Co v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ, 403, 412 (SC), per Gajendagadkar J.

28 Jeewanlal (1929) Ltd v Workmen (1957) 1 LLJ 320 (LAT).

29 Sangam Press Ltd v The Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 125 [LNIND 1975 SC 204], 127 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2035 [LNIND 1975 SC 204]: (1975) 4 SCC 357 [LNIND 1975 SC 204], per Goswarni J.

30 Indian Oxygen & Acetylene Co Ltd Employees Union v IOA Co Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 435 -36 (LAT).

31 Mgmt of Shri Chalthan Vibhag Khan Udyog Sahakari Mandali Ltd v Industrial Court (1979) 2 LLJ 383 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], 391 (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 31 [LNIND 1979 SC 357]: (1979) 4 SCC 622 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], per Kailasam J.

32 Press Trust of India v Union of India 1974 Lab IC 716 (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

33 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 367 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

34 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v The Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2332 [LNIND 1972 SC 127]: (1972) 3 SCC 552 [LNIND 1972 SC 127], per Vaidialingam J.

35 Mgmt of Shri CVKUSM Ltd v GS Barot, v Industrial Court (1979) 2 LLJ 383 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], 391 (SC) AIR 1980 SC 31 [LNIND 1979 SC 357]: (1979) 4 SCC 622 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], per Kailasam J.

36 Shivraj Fine Arts Litho Works v State IC 1978 Lab IC 828, 836 (SC), per Kailasam J.

37 Report of the Committee on Fair Wages, pp 13-15, paras 21 23.

38 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v The Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

39 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 59 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

40 UK Roller Flour Mills v Industrial Court 1979 Lab IC 45, 52 (Bom) (DB), per Tulpule J.

41 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen CA Nos 856, 1475 & 2119 of 1968 (1968) (SC), per Shelat J.

42 Workmen of Hindustan Motors Ltd v Mgmt. (1962) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1962 SC 265], 355 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

43 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

44 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 367-68 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

45 Workmen of Jessop & Co Ltd v Jessop & Co Ltd (1964) 1 LLJ 451 [LNIND 1963 SC 179], 453 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

46 Greaves Cotton & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 342 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], 349 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

47 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], 59 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1175 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], per Hidayatullah J.

48 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366], 747 : AIR 1963 SC 1327 [LNIND 1962 SC 366], per Wanchoo J.

49 Remington Rand of India v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 287 [LNIND 1962 SC 87], 292 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

50 Novex Dry Cleaners v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 271 [LNIND 1962 SC 50],273 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

51 Tata Chemical Ltd v Workmen 1978 Lab IC 637 [LNIND 1978 SC 113], 642 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

52 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366] AIR 1963 SC 1327 [LNIND 1962 SC 366], per Wanchoo J.

53 Williamsom (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 302 [LNIND 1962 SC 94], 305 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

54 Kamani Metals & Alloys Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 55 [LNIND 1967 SC 18] (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1175 [LNIND 1967 SC 18], per Hidayatullah J.

55 Hindustan Antibiotics Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 114 [LNIND 1966 SC 319] (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 948 [LNIND 1966 SC 319], per Subba Rao CJI.

56 Unichem Laboratories Ltd v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 576 [LNIND 1972 SC 127], 593-94 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

57 Chandan Metal Products Pvt Ltd v Engineering Kamdar Union (1977) 2 LLJ 27 (Guj) (DB) : (1976) GLR 849, per DA Desai J.

58 Workmen of Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1964) 1 LLJ 380 [LNIND 1963 SC 248], 385 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

59 Madura Coats Employees Union v GS Baj (2002) 1 LLN 925 (Bom), per Rebello J.

60 Government of India (1969), Report of NCL-I, Annexure X, p 36.

61 Ahmedabad Millowners' Association v TLA (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 28 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

62 Workmen of New Egerton Woollen Mills v Mgmt (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96] (SC), per Shelat J.

63 Workmen of Hindustan Motors v Hindustan Motors (1962) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1962 SC 265], 355 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

64 Workmen of Orient Paper Mills Ltd v Orient Paper Mills Ltd (1964) 1 LLJ 342 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], 346 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 689 [LNIND 1963 SC 254]: [1964] (8) FLR 100, per Wanchoo J.

65 Anil Starch Products Ltd v Industrial Court (1965) 2 LLJ 441, 450 (Guj) (DB), per Shelat CJ.

66 Workmen of OPM Ltd v Orient Paper Mills Ltd (1969) 2 LLJ 398 [LNIND 1968 SC 205] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 976 [LNIND 1968 SC 205]: [1969] 1 SCR 666 [LNIND 1968 SC 205], per Bhargava J.

67 Tata Chemicals Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96] (SC).

68 1978 Lab IC 637 [LNIND 1978 SC 113], 643-44 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

69 Food Corpn of India Workers' Union, v FCI 1990 Lab IC 1919 (SC), per SC Agarwal J.

70 Industrial Workers Union v HT Products Ltd (1991) 1 LLJ 343 [LNIND 1990 BOM 62], 348 (Bom) : [1990 (60) FLR 655], per Mehta J.

71 Randhir Singh v Union of India (1982) 1 LLJ 344 [LNIND 1982 SC 52]-45 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

72 State of AP v G Sreenivasa Rao (1989) 2 LLJ 149 [LNIND 1989 SC 151] (SC) : 1989 (1) SCALE 627 : (1989) 2 SCC 290 [LNIND 1989 SC 857] : [1989] 1 SCR 1000 [LNIND 1989 SC 857], per Kuldip Singh J.

73 Krish Kalyan Kendra Workers Union v Union of India (1991) 1 LLJ 349 [LNIND 1991 SC 10], 352 (SC).

74 Mackinnon Mackenzie & Co Ltd v Audrey D'Costa (1987) 1 LLJ 536 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 1281 : (1987) 2 SCC 469 : [1987] 2 SCR 659, per Venkataramiah J.

75 Randhir Singh v Union of India (1982) 1 LLJ 344 [LNIND 1982 SC 52]-45 (SC) : AIR 1982 SC 879 [LNIND 1982 SC 52]: 1982 (1) SCALE 110 [LNIND 1982 SC 52] : (1982) 1 SCC 618 [LNIND 1982 SC 52], per Chinnappa Reddy J.

76 Delhi Veterinary Assn v Union of India AIR 1984 SC 1221 [LNIND 1984 SC 109], 1223 : 1984 Lab IC 860 : 1984 (1) SCALE 663 [LNIND 1984 SC 109] : (1984) 3 SCC 1 [LNIND 1984 SC 109].

77 State of Uttar Pradesh v JP Chaurasia (1989) 1 LLJ 309 [LNIND 1988 SC 496], 315 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 753 : 1974 Cr LJ 625 : (1974) 4 SCC 471, per Jagannatha Shetty J.

78 State of Madhya Pradesh v Pramod Bhartiya (1993) 1 LLJ 490 [LNIND 1992 SC 681] (SC) : AIR 1993 SC 286 [LNIND 1992 SC 681]: (1993) 1 SCC 539 [LNIND 1992 SC 681], per Jeevan Reddy J.

79 Shyam Babu Verma v Union of India (1994) 1 LLJ 815 -16 (SC) : (1994) 2 SCC 521 [LNIND 1994 SC 178] : [1994] 1 SCR 700 [LNIND 1994 SC 178], per NP Singh J.

80 State of West Bengal v Hari Narayan Bhowal (1995) 2 LLJ 328, 332 (SC) : (1994) 4 SCC 78 : [1994] 3 SCR 24,, per NP Singh J.

81 State of Mysore v B Basavalingappa AIR 1987 SC 411 [LNIND 1986 SC 521]-12 : (1994) III LLJ 771(SC) : 1986 (2) SCALE 1095 : 1986 Supp (1) SCC 661, per Oza J.

82 Supreme Court Employees Welfare Assn v Union of India (1989) 2 LLJ 506 [LNIND 1989 SC 351], 519 (SC) : AIR 1990 SC 334 [LNIND 1989 SC 351]: (1989) 4 SCC 187 [LNIND 1989 SC 351], per MM Dutt J.

83 Federation of AIC&CE Stenographers v Union of India 1989 Lab IC 1157 (SC), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

84 State of West Bengal v Deb Kumar Mukherjee (1995) 2 LLJ 694 [LNIND 1995 SC 419] (SC) : AIR 1995 SC 1889 [LNIND 1995 SC 419]: [1995] 2 SCR 1122 [LNIND 1995 SC 419] : 1995 (3) JT 333 [LNIND 1995 SC 419] : 1995 (2) SCALE 430 [LNIND 1995 SC 419] : 1995 (2) SCJ 112, per Kuldip Singh J.

85 Grih Kalyan Kendra Workers' Union v Union of India (1991) 1 LLJ 349 [LNIND 1991 SC 10], 352 (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 1173 [LNIND 1991 SC 894]: 1991 (1) SCALE 1 : (1991) 1 SCC 619 [LNIND 1991 SC 894].

86 JN Misra v State of Uttar Pradesh (1991) 1 LLJ 223 (All) (DB), per UC Srivasraya J.

87 Tirumala Tirupati Devasthanam v LA Ramaswamy (1994) 2 LLJ 357 [LNIND 1993 SC 441] (SC) :: 1995 (7) SLR 731 : 1994 (27) ATC 75.

88 KS Mahalingegowda v Secy to Govt (1995) 2 LLJ 699, 701-2 (SC) : 1994 (Supp-5) SCR 476 : 1995 (Supp-2) SCC 95, per Kuldip Singh J.

89 Purna Chandm Nanda v State of Orissa (1996) 2 LLJ 638 (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 7 : 1996 (Supp-2) SCR 235 : 1996 (9) SCC 221.

90 Fertilizer Corpn of India Ltd v Sarat Chandra Rath (1996) 2 LLJ 913 [LNIND 1996 SC 1312], 918 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 2744 [LNIND 1996 SC 1312]: 1996 (Supp-5) SCR 90 :: (1996) 10 SCC 331 [LNIND 1996 SC 1312], per Kirpal J.

91 State of UP v Ramashraya Yadav (1996) 2 LLJ 92 [LNIND 1996 SC 382], 94 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 1188 [LNIND 1996 SC 382]: [1996] 2 SCR 707 [LNIND 1996 SC 382] : (1996) 3 SCC 332 [LNIND 1996 SC 382], per GB Pattanaik J.

92 Prem Singh Soda v State of Rajasthan 1996 Lab IC 1469 (Raj), per NK Jain J.

93 MP Singh v Union of India AIR 1987 SC 485 [LNIND 1987 SC 57], 489 : (1987) 1 SCC 592 [LNIND 1987 SC 57] : [1987] 1 SCR 1014 [LNIND 1987 SC 57], per Venkataramiah J.

94 Employees of T&FW Corpn of India v Union of India (1991) 1 LLJ 563 [LNIND 1990 SC 777] (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 1367 [LNIND 1990 SC 777]: 1991 Supp (2) SCC 565, per SC Agarwal J.

95 R Kumar v State of Tamil Nadu (1996) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1996 MAD 61] (Mad) : (1996) I MLJ 393, per Lakshmanan J.

96 GKrishna Rao v State of Andhra Pradesh 1996 Lab IC 1223 (AP), per G Bhikshapathy J.

1 Balo Rai v State of Bihar 1996 Lab IC 2100 (Pat), per Ashok Kumar Ganguly J.

2 T Krishnan Unni v Chairman and Managing Director (1996) 2 LLJ 1072, 1081-82 (Ker), per DJ Jagannadha Raju J.

3 MS Pandiva v State of Cujamt (1997) 2 LLJ 89 (Guj) : (1996) 2 GLH 1043 : (1997) 1 GLR 647, per Parikh J.

4 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Union of India (1961) 1 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1958 SC 25], 364 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

5 Ibid, p 367.

6 Tata Consulting Engineers v Workmen 1981 Lab IC 594 [LNIND 1980 SC 453], 603 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

7 Bijli Mazdoor v Uttar Pradesh Electric Co (1952) LAC 475,482 (LAT).

8 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Workmen CA Nos 1779-80 of 1967 (20-2-1968) (SC), per Hegde J.

9 Workmen of NTC of India Ltd v NTC of India Ltd CA No 852 of 1966 (1968) (SC), per Bhargava J.

10 Ibid.

11 French Motor Car Co Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 744 [LNIND 1962 SC 366] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1327 [LNIND 1962 SC 366]: 1963 (6) FLR 80 per Wanchoo J.

12 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 120 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]: 1963 (6) FLR 313, per Das Gupta J.

13 Greaves Cotton & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 342 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], 350 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 689 [LNIND 1963 SC 254]: 1964 (8) FLR 100 : [1964] 5 SCR 362 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], per Wanchoo J.

14 Gramophone Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 131 [LNIND 1964 SC 114] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

15 Calcutta Insurance Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1967 SC 36], 6-8 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1286 [LNIND 1967 SC 36]: 1967 (14) FLR 345, per Mitter J.

16 Workmen of NTC of India Ltd v NTC of India CA No 852 of 1966 (1968) (SC), per Bhargava J.

17 Indian Link Chain Mfrs. Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 581 [LNIND 1971 SC 479], 589-91 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 343 [LNIND 1971 SC 479]: 1972 Lab IC 200 : (1971) 2 SCC 759 [LNIND 1971 SC 479], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

18 Ganganagar Sugar Mills Ltd v IT 1970 Lab IC 479, 483 (Raj), per Tyagi J.

19 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 83 [LNIND 1962 SC 405] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

20 Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 412 [LNIND 1963 SC 173] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

21 Greaves Cotton & Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 342 [LNIND 1963 SC 254], 347-48 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 689 [LNIND 1963 SC 254]: 1964 (8) FLR 100 per Wanchoo J.

22 Hindustan Hosiery Industries v FH Lala (1974) 1 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1974 SC 33], 347-80 (SC), per Goswami J.

23 British India Corpn Ltd v PO, IT 1989 Lab IC 716, 719-11 (All), per RR Misra J.

24 Dunlop Rubber Co (India) Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 826 [LNIND 1959 SC 186]-28 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 207 [LNIND 1959 SC 186], per Wanchoo J.

25 Alembic Chemical Works Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 328 [LNIND 1960 SC 348], 332 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 647 [LNIND 1960 SC 348],, per Gajendragadkar J.

26 Birla Cotton, Spg & Wvg Mills Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 642 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

27 Delhi Cloth & Gen Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 55 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

28 Mgmt of National & Grindlays Bank Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 1491 [LNIND 1971 SC 341] (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

29 Workmen of Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1964) 1 LLJ 380 [LNIND 1963 SC 248] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

30 National Insurance Co Ltd v Workmen CA No 693 and 841 of 1966 (1968) (SC), per Shelat J.

31 Radha Krishna Umbrella Factory v IT 1971 Lab I C 811, 814 (Ker), per Isaac J.

32 Workmen of NEW Mills Ltd v New Egerton Woollen Mills Ltd (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96], 789-91, per Shelat J.

33 Ahmedabad Millowners' Assn v TLA (1966) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1965 SC 185], 29 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

34 Crown Aluminium Works Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106], 7 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 30 [LNIND 1957 SC 106]: [1958] 1 SCR 651 [LNIND 1957 SC 106] :, per Gajendragadkar J.

35 Workmen of Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Indian Hume Pipe Co. Ltd. (1986) 1 LLJ 520 [LNIND 1986 SC 122], 529 (SC) : AIR 1986 SC 1794 [LNIND 1986 SC 122]: 1986 Lab IC 1644 : 1986 (1) SCALE 1217 :, 1986 Supp (1) SCC 79, per Khalid J.

36 Workmen v Raptakos Brett & Co Ltd 1992 Lab IC 289, 297-98 (SC), per Kuldip Singh J.

37 Workmen of NEW Mills v New Egerton Woollen Mills (1969) 2 LLJ 782 [LNIND 1969 SC 96], 791 (SC), per Shelat J.

38 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431], 120 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]:, per Das Gupta J.

39 Prabhulal Patiram & Co v IT (1966) 2 LLJ 206, 210 (MP) (DB) :: 1965 MPLJ 781 [LNIND 1964 MP 53], per Dixit CJ.

40 Lipton Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 431 [LNIND 1959 SC 14] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 676 [LNIND 1959 SC 14], per SK Das J.

41 United Collieries Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 75 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

42 Hydro (Engineers) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 713 [LNIND 1968 SC 133] (SC) :, AIR 1969 SC 182 [LNIND 1968 SC 133]: 1969 (18) FLR189 per Shelat J.

43 Filmistan Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1972) 24 FLR l (SC), per Vaidialingam J, (1971) 40 FJR 479.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Burden of Proof and Procedure

Burden of Proof

It is open to an employer or establishment, to plead a financial inability to implement the burden of the increased wage-structure. On such a plea being taken, the tribunal would frame a specific issue. But the burden of proof, to show that he has no financial capacity to stand the burden imposed upon him, would be upon the employee.[44] The employer knows his financial position best and the conclusive proof of that may be the balance sheet, which normally is in his possession. In other words, what the financial position of a company is, is within the special knowledge of the company and the burden of proof, consequently, to show that it has no financial capacity to stand the burden imposed upon it, would be upon it.[45] It is, therefore, for the employer to show what his financial position is, and how it is going to place an undue or impossible burden upon him, to implement the demanded wage. Of course, the justification of the plea of a want of financial capacity, will depend upon the evidence of the financial position of the employer or the unit, as the case may be, over a period of years, showing that it cannot bear the burden, or that it is only a temporary or fortuitous situation, with every possibility of a financial improvement in the immediate future. The determination of the wage-structure by the tribunal will be, on the evidence produced before it, according to the financial capacity of the employer or the unit. Once this is finally determined, the employer or the unit cannot continue to assert that it has no financial capacity to implement the award.[46]

Procedure

Even where the wages are to be fixed on the industry-cum-region basis, it is open to the industry to plead that it has not got the financial capacity to bear the increased burden.[47] When such a plea is specifically raised, it is the duty of the tribunal to determine whether the increased burden could be borne by the particular industry. It is incumbent upon the tribunal to give a real and effective opportunity to the employer, to establish his case, where he has pleaded and sought to prove that the increase in the existing rates of wages, is beyond his financial capacity to bear.[48] Before fixing a wage structure, the tribunal must examine the financial position of the employer. In a controversy between the parties, regarding the question of financial capacity, the tribunal is bound to record a finding as to whether the employer is so capable. It is only on being satisfied, that the employer is financially capable of bearing the burden, that the tribunal would be justified in awarding increased wages. An award, imposing an additional burden, in the shape of increased wages, without giving a definite finding as to the financial capacity, would be improper.[49] In Cochin State Power, where the tribunal, despite its conclusion that in view of the higher rate of dearness allowance paid to them, the workmen could not claim higher wage scales than those prevalent in another similar concern, where dearness allowance at a lower rate was paid to the workmen, fixed wage-scales higher in some respects, than those prevailing in the other concerns, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the tribunal in this respect and remanded the case for reconsideration.[50] Similarly, where the tribunal directed an ad hoc increase in the piece rate wages, on the ground that the wages were fixed some 10 years ago, without considering other relevant factors, including the capacity of the employer to bear the burden of the proposed increase, the award was quashed in writ proceedings and the tribunal was directed to consider the issue in its proper perspective.[51] Where the tribunal did not consider the financial capacity of various major concerns of managing agency companies, for fixing the wage scales or dearness allowance, Sinha J of Calcutta High Court quashed the award on the ground that, in the absence of a reference to the financial capacity of the companies to pay, the determination of wage scales was not proper.[52] Where the wage board did not consider the financial capacity of a particular jute mill, but recommended certain scales of wages and dearness allowance on the basis of some large jute mills in another part of the country, it was held that the approach of the wage board determining uniform wage scales and dearness allowance for the entire jute industry suffered from an inherent weakness and a manifest error.[53]

Clause (s): WORKMAN

Evolution of the Concept

Origin and Evolution

section 2(k) of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, contained the definition of 'workman'. In the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, the definition of 'workman', as originally enacted in s 2(s), was as follows:

> 'Workman' means any person employed (including an apprentice) in any industry, to do any skilled manual or clerical work, for hire or reward and includes, for the purpose of any proceedings under this Act, in relation to an industrial dispute, a workman discharged during that dispute, but does not include any person employed in the naval, military or air service of the Crown.

This clause underwent changes in the course of amendments, the latest being the 2010 amendment. The NCL-II recommended the gender-neutral expression 'worker', instead of 'workman', that is currently found in the Industrial Disputes Act and certain other Acts.[54] In Ganeshi Lal, Pasayat J (for self and Sathasivam J) held that a peon, who is engaged on daily wages and attached to the public prosecutor, is not a workman, as the Law Department of the Government can by no stretch of imagination be considered to be an industry within the meaning of the Act.[55]

Ingredients of the Definition of 'Workman'

The ingredients of the definition of a 'workman' may be treated under the following heads:

Any Person Employed... but does not Include any Such person

The definition of a 'workman' in s 2(s), in connection with persons employed in an industry, falls in three parts. The first part of the definition gives the statutory meaning of a workman. This part of the definition determines a workman by reference to a person (including an apprentice) employed in an 'industry', to do any manual unskilled, skilled, technical, operational, clerical or supervisory work, for hire or reward.[56] This part determines what a 'workman' means. This is the signification or denotation of the word or what the word denotes. The second part is designed to include something more in what the term primarily denotes. By this part of the definition, persons who have been dismissed, discharged or retrenched in connection with an industrial dispute, or whose dismissal, discharge or retrenchment has led to an industrial dispute; for the purposes of any proceedings under the Act in relation to such industrial dispute, have been included in the definition of workman. This part gives an extended connotation to the expression workman. The third part specifically excludes the categories of the persons specified in cll (i) to (iv) of this subsection. The third part connotes that even if a person satisfies the requirements of any of the first two parts, but if he falls short in any of the four categories in the third part, he shall be excluded from the definition of workman. The first part brings in the concept of the contract of employment between the employer of an industrial establishment and the employee. Unless there is a contract of employment between the two or, in other words, there is a relationship of employer and employee between them, the definition of a 'workman' will not come into play. But once the relationship of employment is established, its duration would not be material. Even a temporary or casual, employee would fall within the ambit of this part of the definition of workman. [57] In Hutchaih, a single judge of Karnataka High Court held that the definition does not state that a person, in order to be a workman, should have been employed in a substantive capacity or on a temporary basis in the first instance, or after he is found suitable for the job, after a period of probation. In other words, every person employed in an industry, irrespective of his status-be it temporary, permanent or of a probationer-would be a workman.[58] In SK Verma, the Supreme Court held that a 'development officer' of the Life Insurance Corporation of India, was a workman.[59]

However, the court did not indicate as to under what rubric, the duties of a 'development officer' would fall and proceeded on a pragmatic, rather than a pedantic approach of construction, that the entire labour force should be included in the definition, while the managerial-force should be excluded. The Gujarat High Court held that a badli workman will fall within the definition of a workman.[60] The Rajasthan High Court held that a telephone operator, who does not fall in any of the exceptions contained in the definition is a workman.[61]From the words used in the definition, it is clear that not only the persons who are actually employed in an industry, but also those who have been discharged, dismissed or retrenched in connection with or as a consequence of an industrial dispute; and whose dismissal, discharge or retrenchment has led to that dispute, would fall within its ambit. But the inclusive part of the definition in s 2(s), talks of any proceedings under this Act in relation to a 'industrial dispute.' In other words, the second category of persons included in the definition, would fall in the ambit of the definition, only for the purposes of any proceedings under this Act, in relation to an 'industrial dispute' and for no other purpose.[62] For determining the question as to whether an employee is a workman or not, it is the date of reference that is relevant. What is, therefore, to be seen is whether on the date of the reference, there was any dispute in respect of the workman, which could be referred for adjudication to the tribunal. Hence, once a tribunal is vested with the jurisdiction to entertain the dispute which is validly referred to it, does not cease to continue that jurisdiction merely because subsequently, the workman ceases to be a workman.[63] A daily wager is a workman entitled to the protection of s 25F.[64] In Kamyani Vidya Mandir, the facts disclosed that it was an educational institution imparting training to the mentally challenged children. The dominant purpose of hiring employees by the institution was only to train the mentally challenged children and to look after them. The respondent in this case was a 'teacher' engaged on a temporary basis from August 1992 to April 1993. Her service was terminated resulting in an industrial dispute. While holding that she was not a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s), the Bombay High Court observed that the articles were made by children together with the teachers; the mentally challenged persons were not paid money for the products which they were trained to manufacture; and that in these circumstances, there was neither employer-employee relationship nor any systematic activity for the production of goods.[65]

Apprentice

The expression 'apprentice' has not been defined in the Act. In the Shorter Oxford Dictionary, an 'apprentice' has been defined as a 'learner of a craft; one who is bound by a legal agreement to serve an employer for a period of years, with a view to learn some handicraft, trade, etc, in which the employer is reciprocally bound to instruct him.' In the Chambers Dictionary, to serve apprenticeship means 'to undergo training of an apprentice'. Stroud's Judicial Dictionary defines an 'apprentice' as 'a person bound to another for the purpose of learning his trade or calling; the contract being of nature that the master teaches and the other serves a master with the intention of learning'.[66] According to Halsbury's Laws of England,[67] under the contract of apprenticeship, 'the apprentice is bound to serve a master faithfully, in a trade or business, for an agreed period and the master undertakes to give the apprentice instruction in it and either to maintain him or pay his wages'. In other words, by 'the contract of apprenticeship', a person is bound to another for the purpose of learning the trade or calling, the apprentice undertakes to serve the master for the purpose of being taught and the master undertakes to teach him.[68] In the language of Goswami J:

> ... the heart of the matter in apprenticeship is, therefore, the dominant object and intent to impart on the part of the employer and to accept on the part of the other person learning, under certain agreed terms. That certain payment is made during the apprenticeship, by whatever name called, and that the apprentice has to be under certain rules of discipline, do not convert the 'apprentice' to a regular employee under the employer. Such a person remains a learner and is not an employee.[69]

Thus, the contract of apprenticeship accentuates teaching on the part of the master and learning on the part of the apprentice, as the primary object of the 'contract of apprenticeship'. Where, therefore, this object is only ancillary and not primary, the contract is one of service, rather than that of 'apprenticeship'. In s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, an 'apprentice' has specifically been included in the definition of 'workman' but in the subsequent legislation,viz, the Apprentices Act 1961 (Act No 52 of 1961), s 2 (aa) defines the term 'apprentice' to mean 'a person who is undergoing 'apprenticeship' training in a designated trade in pursuance of a contract of apprenticeship' and s 18 of that Act further provides thus:

> S. 18. Apprentices are trainees and not workers.—Save as otherwise provided in this Act—
>
> (a) every 'apprentice' undertaking apprenticeship training in a designated trade in an establishment shall be a trainee and not a worker, and
>
> (b) the provisions of any law with respect to labour shall not apply to or in relation to such apprentice.

Statutory vs Non-Statutory Apprentice - Legal Status and Distinction

A few questions that engaged the attention of courts were:

(i) what is the legal status of statutory apprentices engaged under Apprentice Act 1961?

(ii) do they have the right to absorption in the regular services of the employer?

(iii) what are the legal consequences of engaging statutory apprentices without executing the contract of apprenticeship as required under the Act? and

(iv) what are the effects of continuing a statutory apprentice as such, after the expiry of the period stipulated in the contract?

A survey of the decisions rendered by High Courts and the Supreme Court unfolds a disturbing trend, in that the learned judges across-the-board, have failed to come to grips with the expressions 'apprentice' and 'trainee' as well as in distinguishing a 'statutory apprentice' from a 'non-statutory apprentice/trainee'. In the result, it has to be stated, with great respect, court decisions in this regard have been consistently wrong. These expressions appear in several enactments including the Apprentices Act 1961 and Industrial Disputes Act 1947. Before going into the judgments properly, it is worthwhile to take a look at the origin and evolution of the expressions 'apprentice' and 'trainee' in the Indian context. Leaving the above enactments aside for a moment, it is important to recognise the fact that the words 'apprentice' and 'trainee' have been in use not only in the industrial context, but also in other professions such as law and medicine. The Industrial Disputes Act, which is an earlier law (1947) defines 'workman' in s 2(s),inter alia, as any person including an 'apprentice'. The Model Standing Orders framed by the Central and State Governments under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 (IESOA 1946) recognise 'apprentice/trainee' as one of the classes of workmen alongside casual, temporary, probationer, etc. At the time when IESOA and IDA were enacted, there was no Apprentices Act, which took birth some 14 years later in 1961. It is not in dispute that prior to 1961 there was nothing like a 'statutory apprentice' and no employer was required to engage a given number of apprentices for imparting training under the National Employment and Training Policy. Prior to 1961, industrial employers did engage trainees or apprentices under their own training schemes for imparting training in several trades and occupations before regularising or confirming them as permanent workmen. It is also conceded that such company-specific training programmes continued, and are continuing, even after the enactment of Apprentices Act 1961.

The Apprentices Act 1961 requires industrial employers to engage certificate holders in different trades such as turners, fitters, electricians, welders, etc, through the auspices of the State or Central Apprenticeship Advisers for a specific period ranging from one year to 18 months and impart training. The number of apprentices is determined as a proportion to the number of permanent employees engaged in each trade. The Act requires that the apprentices should be sponsored by the Apprenticeship Adviser and the contracts of apprenticeship should be registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser, who represents the government. This mandatory requirement goes to establish that in the absence of registration of the contract of apprenticeship, the apprentice or trainee ceases to be a 'statutory' apprentice and becomes a non-statutory or voluntary apprentice. The stipend paid by the employer to the apprentices is partly reimbursed by the government in certain classes of establishments subject to certain conditions. Most importantly, the Act does not impose any obligation on the employer either to absorb the apprentices in his organisation after the completion of training or even to give preferential treatment to them while recruiting permanent employees in any of the trades. Section 18 of the Apprentices Act stipulates that the 'apprentices are trainees and not workers', and further states that the 'provisions of any law with respect to labour shall not apply to or in relation to such apprentice'. It is significant to note that the said section used both the expressions 'apprentice' and 'trainee', interchangeably, to mean the same thing, and distinguished both of them from 'worker'. The question then is: what is meant by the expression 'such apprentice' appearing in the last part of cl (b) of s 18 ? Should it be taken to mean 'any apprentice or trainee engaged under any scheme of whatsoever nature' or should it be confined to 'such of those apprentices or trainees, who have been specifically sponsored by, and whose contracts of apprenticeship have been registered with, the Apprenticeship Adviser in accordance with the provisions of the Apprentices Act 1961'? The answer to the question is decided in favour of the latter, and does not present any difficulties. Reverting to the controversy, till the Apprentices Act was enacted there was no confusion with regard to the legal status of an apprentice or trainee because of the inclusion of the term 'apprentice' in the definition of workman in s 2(s) of IDA. Moreover, till 1961 there was no need for differentiating an 'apprentice' from a 'statutory apprentice', in the light of the fact that there was only one class ie, the former to the exclusion of 'statutory apprentice'.

While a 'statutory apprentice' is governed by the provisions of the Apprentices Act, an (non-statutory) apprentice or trainee simpliciter is governed by individual contracts and/or standing orders. Again, the pre-fixes 'statutory' and 'non-statutory' came to be used only after the enactment of the Apprentices Act 1961, and not before, with the ostensible purpose of distinguishing the one class from the other. The service of a 'non-statutory' apprentice/ trainee can be terminated at any time during the period of apprenticeship/training without assigning any reason and without notice or compensation in lieu thereof, whereas the contract of apprenticeship of a 'statutory' apprentice cannot be terminated before the expiry of the period, without the written permission from the Apprenticeship Adviser, as provided in sub-ss (2) and (3) of s 7 of the Act. A 'statutory apprentice' or 'statutory trainee' engaged under the Apprentices Act is manifestly outside the ambit of labour laws in terms of s 18, whereas a non-statutory apprentice or trainee is governed by all the labour laws like any other 'workman' or 'employee' or 'worker', as the case may be.[70]It is relevant to note that the word 'apprentice' as defined in s 2(aa) of the Apprentices Act 1961 shall only be a trainee and not a 'worker' and the provisions of 'any law with respect to labour' shall not apply to or in relation to him. The employees under various labour laws have been defined by different expressions. For instance, in the Factories Act, the expression 'worker' has been used; in the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948, the expression' employee' has been used while in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the expression 'workman' has been used, which means 'any person (including an apprentice) employed in any industry...'.

In TELCO, after considering the scheme of the Apprentices Act 1961, particularly the definition of 'apprentice' in s 2(aa) and the provisions of s 18 of that Act and the definition of 'employee' in s 2(9) of the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948, the Supreme Court held that an 'apprentice' is not an 'employee' as defined in the Employees' State Insurance Act. In order to buttress its decision, the court made a significant observation that if the legislature intended to enlarge the definition of the word 'employee' in s 2(9) of the ESI Act, it could have included the word 'apprentice' in it, as has been done in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act. Such a deliberate omission on the part of the legislature can be attributed only to the well-known concept of 'apprenticeship' which the legislature assumed and took note of for the purpose of the Act. That is not to say that if the legislature intended, it could not have enlarged the definition of the word 'employee' even to include an 'apprentice', but the legislature did not choose to do so.[71] In Hanuman Choudhary, the question whether an 'apprentice' in view of the definition of 'apprentice' in s 2(aa) and the provisions of s 18 of the Apprentices Act 1961, will not be a'workman' as defined in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act despite having specifically been included in the definition, came before a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court. In this case, referring to the observations of the Supreme Court in connection with the inclusive definition of 'workman' contained in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the court pointed out that the Supreme Court had not considered the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act in conjunction with the provisions of s 18 of the Apprentices Act 1961 as in that case it was primarily concerned with the question as to whether an apprentice could be regarded as an employee under s 2(9) of the Employees State Insurance Act 1948. Therefore, that decision 'cannot be read as laying down that in spite of the provisions of s 18 of the Apprentices Act, an 'apprentice' governed by the Apprentices Act is to be treated as a 'workman' under s 2 (s) of the Industrial Dispute Act. The court, therefore, held that an 'apprentice' governed by the Apprentices Act is not a 'workman' for the purpose of the Industrial Disputes Act and the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act would not be applicable to him.[72]

In coming to the above conclusion, it gave a two-fold reason. Firstly, that the Apprentices Act is not an exhaustive Act to cover all types of apprentices as it is applicable only to 'apprentices' undergoing 'apprenticeship training' in pursuance of the contract executed under s 4 of that Act. There may be persons, though engaged as 'apprentices' but not covered by that Act. Hence, such 'apprentices' would fall within the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Act and would be governed by its provisions. Secondly, the Industrial Disputes Act is a general law applicable to all categories of workmen whereas the Apprentices Act is a particular law enacted with special reference to 'apprentices' postulated by that Act. The definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act was enacted in 1956 prior to the enactment of the Apprentices Act in 1961. The provisions of s 18 of the Apprentices Act would, therefore, prevail over the provisions contained in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act relating to 'apprentices' and an 'apprentice' as defined in that Act cannot be regarded as a 'workman' under s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act. This holding of the single Judge of the Rajasthan High Court is not correct law because the first reason given by him truncates while the second reason completely castrates the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act insofar as it relates to 'apprentices'. It is submitted that the doctrine of 'implied repeal' is not applicable as the two enactments,viz, the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 and the Apprentices Act 1961 do not occupy the same field nor does the latter lay down an exhaustive Code in respect of the subject-matter replacing the former law.[73]Furthermore, it is well established law that while construing and applying welfare statutes, the welfare of the weaker party, particularly the working class, should be protected. It is also noteworthy that s 18 of the Apprentices Act uses the word 'worker' while the definition in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act uses the word 'workman' which specifically includes an 'apprentice' and these are two different concepts. Therefore, the word 'apprentice' in the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of this Act cannot be abrogated by the general language of s 18 of the Apprentices Act.

In view of the provisions of s 22 of the Apprentices Act, it is not obligatory on the part of the employer to offer any employment to an apprentice who has completed the period of his 'apprenticeship' training in his establishment nor is it obligatory on the part of the apprentice to accept employment under the employer, where such apprentice is covered by that Act. This provision is however, subject to the non-obstante clause in s 22(2) which leaves no doubt that despite the provisions contained in sub-s (1), the employer is under an obligation to offer suitable employment to the apprentice if the 'contract of apprenticeship' contains a condition that the apprentice shall serve the employer after the successful completion of the training. A priori, when such an offer is made, the apprentice on his part is bound to serve the employer in the capacity in which he was working as an apprentice. In Narinder Kumar, on the construction of the relevant clause in the contract of apprenticeship to the effect that the apprentice 'shall be absorbed in the department if there are vacancies' and the general text of the contract, the Supreme Court held that it created a reciprocal obligation on both the parties as 'it binds the employer to offer the employment to the apprentice (if there is a vacancy) and equally, it binds the 'apprentice' to accept the offer' because the object of this provision is to guarantee to the extent of the existence of vacancies that the apprentices will not be rendered jobless after they complete their training. In order to be a workman under s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, it has to be established that the apprentice is not covered by the provisions of the Apprentices Act. Even if he is such an apprentice, he has further to establish that he is employed in the establishment.[74] In other words, any person, whether he is an apprentice or not, can be regarded as a 'workman' only if he is employed in that establishment to do any work of the nature contemplated in the definition. It is not enough to establish that the person claiming such a status is an 'apprentice'.[75]

In Patel Somnath,[76] the idea of engaging apprentices for one year in this case was to give them practical training for one year. The contract of apprenticeship specifically mentioned the period of one year, specifically stipulating that at the expiry of one year, the services of the apprentices shall be treated as terminated. In view of this contractual situation, a single Judge of the Gujarat High Court held that the apprentice was not entitled to any allowance allowed to regular employees. In Abdul Aziz,[77] the period of apprenticeship was for one year but on completion of the period of training, the apprentice applied to the employer that his apprenticeship should be extended, but no such extension was granted by the employer. However, he continued to work for some years. A single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that his continuation in work did not clothe him with any higher status than that he had at the time of entry in the apprenticeship contract. But in Jagdish Vyas, a Division Bench of the same High Court distinguished this decision where a person appointed as an apprentice for one year was allowed to continue in employment for more than three years without any specific order extending the apprenticeship or otherwise and held that the employee has to be considered as a 'workman' entitled to the vacant post.[78] A statutory apprentice engaged after executing the contract as required under the Apprentices Act 1961, does not become a workman merely because the period of apprenticeship was extended by five months, and there is no violation of ss 25G & H in the event of termination of the apprenticeship contract.[79] No provision of any labour law applies to an apprentice under the Apprentices Act 1961, and an apprentice is not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s), and the labour court has no jurisdiction to order reinstatement of an apprentice holding that his services were terminated in violation of s 25F.[80] But where an apprentice was engaged for more than 240 days after the expiry of one year of contract period, and was terminated at the end of it, it was held that the provisions of s 25F apply and that the order of reinstatement with full back wages passed by the labour court is justified.[81] Where the employer engaged apprentices purported to be under the Apprentices Act 1961 but did not get the apprenticeship contracts registered as required under s 4 of the said Act, and the apprentices claimed that they continued in service beyond the maximum period allowed under the Apprentices Act and were performing regular duties like any other workman, the labour court has jurisdiction to go into the facts and grant appropriate relief.[82]

Where the UPSEB, having terminated the service of an employee designated as an 'apprentice' and contended that no labour law applied to him in terms of the provisions of the Apprentices Act 1961, Vineet Saran J, of the Allahabad High Court rejected the plea of the management on the ground that no contract of apprentice ship was registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser nor was it shown that the employee was appointed as a trainee under a scheme framed in that behalf. The learned judge further pointed out that the said employee was engaged on regular work in all the three shifts and held that, in the light of these facts, he was a 'workman' within the meaning of s 6(z) of UPIDA.[83] In another case involving the same employer, the facts disclosed that the Board had sent the Apprentice contract of an apprentice draftsman to the Apprenticeship Adviser, but the latter kept it pending with him without formally registering. His apprenticeship was terminated by the Board on the completion of the period stipulated in the contract of apprenticeship. The labour court set aside his termination on the ground that he was a 'workman' and that his termination without complying with the provisions of UPIDA was illegal since he had completed 240 days service. Quashing the award of labour court, Chauhan J, of Allahabad High Court held that the Board could not be held responsible for the failure of the Apprenticeship Adviser in registering the contract of apprenticeship, and that person was very much an 'apprentice'.[84] It is submitted that this case was rightly decided. In Trambak Rubber, the facts disclosed that the company terminated the services of some 72 employees on the ground that they were 'trainees' and not 'workmen'. The issue before the industrial court was whether they were merely trainees or 'employees' (workmen) within the meaning of s 3(5) of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU & PULP Act 1971). The industrial court recorded a finding that they were only 'trainees' and upheld their termination, which award was quashed by the High Court. In appeal, the Supreme Court, speaking through Venkatarama Reddi J (for self and Balakrishnan J), held that the High Court was right in setting aside the impugned award passed by the industrial court, and further observed that the management evidently came forward with a false plea dubbing the 'employees/workmen' as 'trainees' so as to resort to summary termination and deny them their legitimate benefits.[85]

In another case involving the same company, the facts were: a few workers filed a complaint alleging non-payment of minimum wages and exploitation in the form of extended hours of work against the management. While the complaint was pending before the industrial court, the management terminated their services. The industrial court accepted the contention of management that the applicants were trainees and not workers, and passed an award accordingly. In a writ petition, the High Court quashed the order of industrial court, and held that there was an error of law apparent on the face of record, and that merely because no appointment letters were issued to the applicants they would not cease to be workmen, and ordered reinstatement in service but without back wages.[86] In Audco India, the facts were: the company terminated the service of an apprentice. The labour court ordered reinstatement on the ground that the management did not comply with s 25F, which award was challenged in the High Court. Quashing the award, the Madras High Court held that even if the finding of the labour court with regard to the status of the apprentice as a 'workman' was acceptable, his case would come within the exception of sub-clause (bb) of s 2(oo), and that the labour court misdirected itself on the question of construing the term of apprenticeship given to the second respondent as well as the effect of s 2(oo)(bb).[87] In State of Haryana, the facts briefly were: a person engaged as an 'apprentice' under the provisions of the Apprentices Act, was subsequently terminated resulting in an industrial dispute, which was referred for adjudication. The labour court held that he was a 'workman' u/s 2(s) of the IDA and ordered reinstatement. Quashing the award, Raina J, of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that reading of definition of "apprentice" in ss 2(aa) and 2(r) read with s 18 of the Apprentices Act leaves nothing to doubt that it was a special Act and could not cover workmen and the it precludes the application of any other labour law - be it UPIDA or IDA (Central Act). That being so labour court or tribunal would not have any jurisdiction to entertain any dispute arising therefrom, and that the award passed by the labour court cannot be sustained as it suffers from incurable jurisdictional infirmity.[88]

UPSEB v SM Singh - A Landmark Decision for all the Wrong Reasons

In UP State Electricity Board v Shiv Mohan Singh , the facts disclosed that the Board did not register some of the contracts with the Apprenticeship Adviser. The point urged before the Supreme Court was that, in view of the said breach in the face of the mandatory requirement to register the contracts, the legal status of the said apprentices stood changed from that of 'apprentices' under the Apprentices Act to that of 'workmen' under the IDA. The only question relevant for reaching a just and fair conclusion was: 'what is the legal effect of non-registration of the contracts of apprenticeship?' Justice Mathur (for self and Hegde J,Sinha J, concurring) held that none of them was entitled to be treated as a 'workman' within the meaning of the IDA. A few observations made by Mathur J have been identified for analysis below. The learned judge observed:

> From the scheme of things it is more than apparent that the Apprentices Act, 1961 is a complete Code in itself and it lays down the conditions of the apprentices, what shall be their tenure, what shall be their terms and conditions and what are their obligations and what are the obligations of the employer. It also lays down that the apprentices are trainees and not workmen and if any dispute arises then the settlement has to be done by the Apprenticeship Adviser as per Section 20 of the Apprentices Act, 1961 and his decision thereof is final. Now, under the scheme of these things, it clearly shows that the nature and character of the apprentice is nothing but that of a trainee and he is supposed to enter into a contract and by virtue of that contract he is to serve for a fixed period on a fixed stipend. This will not change the character of the apprentice to that of a workman under the employer where he is undergoing the apprentice training. Sub-section (4) of Section 4 only lays down that such contract should be registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser. But by non-registration of the contract, the position of the apprentice is not changed to that of a workman. () .... The purpose is to train the people for employing them in the industries, it was never the intention that those trained candidates automatically become the workmen. ... The definition makes it clear that they are apprentices for a purpose undergoing a training and in Section 18 it has been clearly mentioned that they will not be treated as a workmen and they will be treated as a trainee and no labour laws will apply in relation to such apprentices. Viewing the expression "shall" in this context, cannot be construed as a mandatory....It is purely administrative act and not forwarding contract of the apprenticeship to the Apprenticeship Adviser will not change the character of the incumbent and it will not render the contract of apprenticeship invalid or void. If the contract of apprenticeship is to be treated as a mandatory and contract is not sent then the effect will be that the apprentice will not be entitled to any benefit flowing from the Act. In fact, by treating the expression "shall" here as a mandatory it will be more counter productive to the interest of the trainees rather than for their benefit. The employer can take a shelter under the plea that since the contract of the employment has not been registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser, therefore, he is not under any obligation to pay stipend to the apprentice trainees and he is not under an obligation to impart the training to him also… () ... We are, therefore, are of the considered view that non-registration of the contract of apprenticeship would not render the same nugatory.[89] ().

Observation I

> Now, under the scheme of these things, it clearly shows that the nature and character of the apprentice is nothing but that of a trainee and he is supposed to enter into a contract and by virtue of that contract he is to serve for a fixed period on a fixed stipend. This will not change the character of the apprentice to that of a workman under the employer where he is undergoing the apprentice training.

The above observation is wrong both on facts and law. Once it is recognised that there are two classes of apprentices/trainees - one under the provisions of the Apprentices Act and the other under the Industrial Disputes Act with different terms and conditions governing their engagement - the conclusion that they are distinct legal entities is inescapable.Secondly, the two enactments serve totally different objects. The former is merely confined to impart training to the candidates sponsored by the Apprenticeship Adviser for a determinate period of time, and the latter for investigation and settlement of disputes mainly between the employer and his workmen. Thirdly, as already stated in the preceding paragraphs, the need to distinguish the two classes of apprentices was necessitated after the enactment of Apprentices Act 1961, and not before. Fourthly, prior to 1961, the expression 'statutory apprentice' was unknown and beyond legal conception. Fifthly, until the enactment of the Apprentices Act 1961, 'apprentice' and 'trainee' were being used synonymously to mean the same class, as can be seen from the Model Standing Orders as well as Certified Standing Orders of different industrial establishments in force during that period. Sixthly, the expression 'apprentice' was expressly included in the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s), which means that he is entitled to pursue the remedy provided under the ID Act, whereas the 'apprentice' under Apprentices Act was excluded from the operation of any of the labour laws including the ID Act. Seventhly, in respect of an 'apprentice' engaged under the company's training scheme, the employer is under no obligation to send the contract of training to, or get it registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser or any other external authority, whereas in respect of a 'statutory apprentice', the employer is mandated to get the contract registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser. It does not stop there. In terms of r 6 of the Apprenticeship Rules 1992, the Central Government may specify and model the 'contract form' as provided for in Sch V (for trade apprentices), which has to be used by the employer while engaging apprentice, whereas the employer is free to design and draft his own contract of training in respect of the trainees/apprentices engaged under its own training scheme. Eighthly, while an employer has the power to terminate the services of an 'apprentice', ie, a 'workman' answering to s 2(s) of the ID Act as provided for in the individual contract, he is not free to dispense with the services of an 'apprentice' answering to the definition under s 2(aa) read with s 2(e) of the Apprentices Act. In terms of s 7 (2) & (3), any premature termination of the apprenticeship contract could only be effected by an order passed by the Apprenticeship Adviser, and not by the employer. Ninthly, the stipend paid to the statutory apprentices is partially reimbursed and/or shared by the government in respect of industrial establishments employing less than 150 workers, whereas no such reimbursement/sharing is contemplated in the case of 'apprentices'/'trainees' engaged by an establishment under its own training scheme. Tenthly, r 8 of Apprenticeship Rules 1992 stipulates that, in the event of pre-mature termination of the apprenticeship of a statutory apprentice due to the failure on the part of employer, the employer has to pay compensation equivalent to three months last drawn stipend, whereas the training of a trainee/apprentice engaged under the company's training scheme can be terminated without notice or compensation at any time during the period of training. Eleventhly, a trainee or apprentice engaged under the company's training scheme can raise an industrial dispute under s 2A read with s 11A of ID Act and seek remedy through the medium of conciliation, adjudication, etc, whereas a statutory apprentice engaged under the provisions of Apprentices Act cannot seek the remedy provided under the ID Act in view of s 18 of the Apprentices Act which prohibits the application of any labour law to statutory apprentices. He can only appeal to the Apprenticeship Adviser for relief. Twelfthly, in the case of a statutory apprentice, s 5 of the Act provides for 'Novation' of the apprenticeship contract, which concept is wholly foreign to industrial employment with no application, whatsoever, to the trainees engaged under the company's training scheme. And, lastly, in addition to the expression 'apprentice', the Apprentices Act also defines 'worker' [s 2(r)] to mean "any person who is employed for wages in any kind of work and who gets his wages directly from the employer, but shall not include an apprentice referred to in clause (aa)", whereas ID Act defines 'workman' which includes 'apprentice'. In the face of these glaring facts, to hold that it will not change the character of the apprentice to that of a workman under the employer where he is undergoing the apprentice training, not only sounds strange, but also runs counter to the scheme of Apprenticeship under the Apprentices Act, given that the rights and liabilities as well as the remedy and relief contemplated under Apprentices Act are totally different from those prescribed under the ID Act.

Observation II

> Viewing the expression "shall" in this context, cannot be construed as a mandatory. ... It is purely administrative act and not forwarding contract of the apprenticeship to the Apprenticeship Adviser will not change the character of the incumbent and it will not render the contract of apprenticeship invalid or void.

To say that the non-forwarding and the non-registration of the contract with the Apprenticeship Adviser cannot be construed as mandatory is a misconception of law. The word 'shall' appearing in the provision can by no stretch of imagination be construed as merely directory. If the contract is not registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser, then the apprentice ceases to be a statutory apprentice and gets transformed into a trainee engaged by the company voluntarily or under its training scheme, if such a scheme exists. The further implication of non-registration is that none of the provisions of the Apprentices Act, which grant protection and/or certain additional facilities to the apprentice, which are not normally available to voluntary trainees as, for instance: (i) payment of stipend at the rates prescribed from time to time, (ii) casual leave with pay @ 12 days/annum, (iii) medical leave with pay @ 15 days/annum, (iv) extraordinary leave with pay @ 10 days/annum (making it a total 37 days paid leave), (v) protection against non-payment of stipend, (vi) prohibition of engaging the apprentice in night shifts, ie, between 10.00 PM and 6.00 AM, (vii) releasing the apprentice for Related Instruction (RI) Classes with full stipend for the period of absence, (viii) protection against deductions from the stipend, etc. Many of these facilities are not available to a trainee/apprentice engaged under the company's training scheme. To illustrate, a trade union which is not registered under the Trade Unions Act 1926 ('TU Act') may still call itself a 'union' and may even raise an industrial dispute on behalf of its members, but it certainly cannot claim the criminal and civil immunity granted to a registered union under ss 17 & 18 of the TU Act. Similarly, an unregistered union cannot have perpetual succession and common seal nor could it acquire or alienate property, much less sue or be sued in its name. Could it still be said that a non-registered union stands on the same legal footing as a registered union? Applying the same analogy to a non-statutory apprentice whose contract of apprenticeship has not been (or is not required to be) registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser, could it reasonably be argued that he stands on the same footing as a statutory apprentice? Is it possible to brand the registration of apprenticeship contract as a mere administrative act bordering on an empty and useless formality? The learned judge virtually reproduced the entire Apprentices Act in his judgment running into a staggering 126 paragraphs spanning some 39 pages. At the end of all that hard labour, what is it that he had decided? With great respect, this decision is wrong on all counts.

Observation III

> If the contract of apprenticeship is to be treated as a mandatory and contract is not sent then the effect will be that the apprentice will not be entitled to any benefit flowing from the Act. In fact, by treating the expression "shall" here as a mandatory it will be more counter productive to the interest of the trainees rather than for their benefit. The employer can take a shelter under the plea that since the contract of the employment has not been registered with the Apprenticeship Adviser, therefore, he is not under any obligation to pay stipend to the apprentice trainees and he is not under an obligation to impart the training to him also. ... We are, therefore, of the considered view that non-registration of the contract of apprenticeship would not render the same nugatory.

The above observations, as to the consequences of non-registration, are no less frightening! To say that "by treating the expression 'shall' as mandatory would be counter-productive to the interests of the trainee" is like putting the cart before the horse, for the reasons already enumerated in the preceding paragraph. It is only by virtue of registering the contract, the apprentice gets covered by the provisions of the Act and will be entitled to the benefits and facilities contemplated thereunder. If, on the other hand, the contract is not registered, he ceases to be a statutory apprentice and becomes a trainee/apprentice engaged under the company's programme, and acquires the legal status of 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s) of the ID Act. What is meant by the further observation: "the employer can take shelter under the plea that since the contract ... he is not under any obligation to pay stipend ... not under obligation to impart the training"? Is it possible for an employer to engage someone for imparting training or to work for him and still get away without paying stipend or wages, that too, in the present age? Can the learned judge, with decades of experience at the bar and bench, cite at least one instance where an employer has engaged workers for work and denied the wages in their entirety in an industrial context, and got away with it? Assuming that the employer has not paid wages, the worker has the option of quitting the company for good, apart from filing a complaint under s 15 of the Payment of Wages Act or under s 33C of the ID Act for recovering the money due to him.Contrary to what has been concluded by the learned judge (in Para 125), the fact remains that the non-registration of contract of apprenticeship renders it very much nugatory in so far as the apprentice ceases to be an 'apprentice' under the Apprentices Act.

The learned judge approved the view taken by the Rajasthan, Kerala and Allahabad High Courts as against those of Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh. With great respect, the conclusion reached by Mathur J, runs counter to his reasoning in so far as having recognised the fact that the contracts were not registered as required under the Act (at p 5023), the learned judge nevertheless proceeded to hold that they were still apprentices under Apprentices Act and hence could not be treated as workmen within the meaning of s 2 (s) of the IDA. In National Small Industries, a similar issue fell for decision. Briefly stated, the facts were: the respondent was initially appointed as a casual labourer. Three years later, he was called for an interview for the post of, and selected as, Apprenticeship Trainee (Shop Assistant), and was appointed as such on a monthly salary of Rs 750. Thereafter he was asked to perform several duties such as dispatch work, etc, before being terminated after one year. The Labour Court and the High Court rightly ordered reinstatement on the ground that, notwithstanding the nomenclature, the workman was working as a regular employee. In appeal, Altamas Kabir J, committed the same error and quashed the order of the courts below on the ground that he was an apprentice under the Apprentices Act.[90] If the respondent were an apprentice under the Apprentices Act, would it have been possible for the employer terminate his apprenticeship contract abruptly and unilaterally without bringing the Apprenticeship Adviser into picture in view of s 7 of the Act? Did the learned judge ask right questions before coming to the conclusion that the respondent was an apprentice under the Apprentices Act? With great respect, it is submitted that the learned judges of Supreme Court have been consistently committing grave errors of law in so far as they have failed to distinguish a 'statutory' apprentice (non-workman under ID Act) from a 'non-statutory' apprentice/trainee (workman under ID Act). As already stated in the preceding paragraphs, the word 'apprentice' appearing in s 2(s) of the IDA refers exclusively to a 'non-statutory' apprentice and such 'apprentices' and/or 'trainees' are very much 'workmen' under the IDA with all the concomitant rights to claim absorption in the regular services of the undertaking and to raise an industrial dispute and claim relief, if their services are dispensed with wrongfully.[91]

The learned judges have not been able to display any depth in their analysis of these expressions, apart from failing to grasp the fundamental distinction between the two classes of trainees/apprentices - statutory vs non-statutory. As was held in Assam Oil Co, if the validity of termination of the service of a voluntary (non-statutory) apprentice is challenged in industrial adjudication, it would be competent to the Industrial Tribunal to enquire whether the impugned order of discharge was passed in the bona fide exercise of the power conferred by the contract.[92] With great respect for Mathur, Sinha and Kabir JJ, the decisions in Shiv Mohan Singh and National Small Industries were founded on a defective appreciation of facts coupled with misapplication of law thereto, and are patently unfair, inequitable, illegal and wrong. The view taken by Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh High Courts was right, and that of the Supreme Court is clearly wrong. In Mahanadi Coal Fields, Mathur J, held that the employer is under no obligation to offer employment to statutory apprentices engaged under the Apprentices Act 1961 in the absence of any conditions in the contract of apprenticeship to that effect; and that no writ of mandamus can be issued to the company to give appointment to the apprentice.[93]

'Employed in an Industry'

In order to bring a person within the definition of 'workman' it must inter alia be proved that he was employed in an industry. In the absence of existence of this relationship, there can be no question of that person being a workman.[94] Once it is established that the activity in question is an 'industry' as defined in s 20, the question then arises, as to whether the persons concerned are employed in such industry. The expression 'employed in an industry' would take in the employees who are employed in connection with operations incidental to the main industry. For instance, in Basti Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Ujagar ,[95] the workers employed by a contractor to remove press-mud from the sugar factory were held to be 'workmen' employed by the factory because removing press-mud was considered ordinarily to be a part of the sugar factory. In Saraspur Mills, the workers of a canteen run by a co-operative society were held to be the 'workmen' of the factory because the factory was under an obligation to maintain and run the canteen for its employees under theFactories Act and the rules made thereunder.[1] In JK Cotton, the Supreme Court observed that it was not easy to decide as to what is the field of employment included in the principle of 'incidental' relationship? and what would be the limitations of the said principle? and it is not easy to draw a line. In this case, the court held that the malis employed in the residential bungalows allotted to the officers and the directors of the textile mill, as provided in the terms and conditions of the employment of such officers and directors, were 'workman' because their work was 'incidental' to the main work of the industry. In support of this view, the court drew sustenance from the analogy of the bus drivers employed by the company to operate the buses run by it for providing transport amenities to its employees.[2] The analogy is neither elegant nor apposite. Though the court recognised the need to prescribe a limitation in dealing with the question of 'incidental relationship' with the main industrial operations, so as to exclude operations, or activities whose relation with the main industrial activity may be remote, indirect and far-fetched, it did not lay down any such test and contented itself with the ambivalent statement that it is hardly necessary to emphasise that in modern world the industrial operations have become complex and complicated and for the efficient and successful functioning of any industry, 'incidental' operations are called in aid and it is the totality of these operations that ultimately constitutes the industry as a whole.'

In Food Corpn of India, Desai J held that the essential condition of a person being a workman within the terms of the definition is that he should be employed to do the work in that industry and in other words, that there should be, an employment of his by the employer and that there should be relationship between the employer and him as between the employer and employee or master and servant. Unless a person is thus employed, there can be no question of his being a 'workman' within the definition of the term; that where a contractor employs a workman to do the work which he contracted with a third person to accomplish on the definition as it stands, the workman of the contractor would not without something more, become the workman of third person.' In this view of the law, the court held that when the contract system was in vogue in the corporation, the workmen employed by the contractor were not the workmen of the corporation.[3] Employees engaged by a contractor running the canteen of a factory cannot be held to be the employees of management.[4] There is no master and servant relationship between Telco convoy drivers and the management of Telco, as the control over the drivers was vested with the Telco contract transport contractors association, that no memorandum of settlement was ever arrived at between Telco and the convoy drivers, that in earlier series of litigations also, no court had ever declared the relationship of employer and employee between the convoy drivers and Telco, and hence, the dispute raised by the convoy drivers for absorption in the company was without merit.[5]

'For Hire or Reward'

In order to bring a person within the ambit of definition, the work for which he is employed should be for 'hire or reward', whether the terms of employment be express or implied. The work must be for wages or other remuneration. Otherwise, there will be no consideration for the work done, and without consideration there can be no contract of any kind.[6] The legislature has used the words hire or reward' rather than the word 'wages' with a view to enlarging the scope of the definition. 'Hire or reward' may take any form.[7] There is a distinction between the words 'hire' and 'reward'. The word 'hire' necessarily imports an obligation to pay. The further inclusion of the second word 'reward' is not merely for the purpose of giving an alternative word to 'hire' meaning the same thing, but for the purpose of bringing in a subject-matter which does not include 'hire' and includes cases where there is no obligation to pay.[8] Remuneration may be paid on pro rata basis or even on commission basis.

Relationship of Employment

In the words of Bhagwati J:

> The essential condition of a person being a workman within the terms of this definition is that he should be employed to do the work in that industry, that there should be, in other words, an employment of his by the employer and that there should be the relationship between the employer and him as between employer and employee or master and servant. Unless the person is thus employed there can be no question of his being a 'workman' within the definition of the term as contained in the Act.[9]

The relationship of employer and employee is constituted by a contract, express or implied between employer and employees. A contract of service is one in which a person undertakes to serve another and to obey his reasonable orders within the scope of the duty undertaken.[10] The terms of the contract creating such relationship of employment may be express or implied, ie, a contract of employment may be inferred from the conduct which goes to show that such a contract was intended although never expressed,[11] as when there has, in fact, been employment of the kind usually performed by employees.[12] In other words, creation of relation need not be, by written or verbal consent;[13] it may, and very often does rest, on the implication of circumstances.[14] Any such inference, however, is open to rebuttal,[15] as by showing that the relation between the parties concerned was on a charitable footing,[16] or the parties were relations,[17] or partners,[18] or were directors of a limited company which employed no staff.[19] Proof of existence of the relation can be made out as fairly and fully by circumstantial evidence as it can be by evidence which is direct.[20] While the employee, at the time, when his services were engaged, need not have known the identity of his employer, there must have been some act or contract by which the parties recognised one another as master and servant.[21]

In law, the time-honoured expression 'master and servant' indicates the relationship which exists when one person who employs another to do certain work exercises the right of control over the performance of the work to the extent of prescribing the manner in which it is to be executed. The employer is the master and the person who is employed is the servant.[22] The words 'employer and employee' are the out-growth of the old terms'master and servant'; they have been adopted by reason of the shift of the relation in general from a personal to an impersonal one and are the terms now commonly used to describe the relationship.[23]It would seem that the terms 'employer' and 'employee' make a better designation of the relation in this industrial age. In the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, the terms 'employer' and 'workman' have been used whereas in the Payment Bonus Act 1965, the terms 'employer' and 'employee' have been used.

Independent Contractor v Employee

'Few problems in the law have given greater variety than the cases arising on the borderline between what is clearly an employer-employee relation and what is clearly an independent entrepreneurial dealing,[24] for 'it is often easy to recognise a contract of service when you see it, but difficult to say where the difference lies'.[25] Problems of this kind have come before the courts with the advent of social legislation in England during the last ninety years and in India during the last fifty years. Consequently, a considerable body of case-law has developed under the recent social welfare legislation. There has been an extraordinary variety of relationship which has come before courts at one time or another, and it is now clear that it is impossible to define a contract of service in the sense of stating a number of conditions which are both necessary to, and sufficient for, the existence of such a contract. This position has been succinctly stated in the American jurisprudence. 'It is the element of control of the work that distinguishes the relationship of master and servant from the independent contract relationship. The most important test in determining whether one employed to do certain work is an independent contractor or a mere servant is the control over the work which is reserved to the employer'.[26] In other words, the identifying mark of the servant is that he should be under the control or supervision of the employer in respect of the details of the work.[27] In Mersey Docks, Lord Porter held:

> Many factors have a bearing on the result. Who is paymaster, who can dismiss, how long the alternative service lasts, what machinery is employed, have all to be kept in mind. The expressions used in any individual case must always be considered in regard to the subject-matter under discussion but amongst the many tests suggested I think that the most satisfactory, by which to ascertain who is the employer at any particular time is to ask who is entitled to tell the employee the way in which he is to do the work upon which he is engaged.[28]

In other words, the 'direction and control' are the telling factors in determining the relationship of employment. This test, however, as pointed out by Lord Mcmillan, does not exclude other factors as well because the 'question in each case turns on its own circumstances, decisions in other cases are rather illustrative than determinative'.[29] But from the development of the law during the last quarter of the century in this field, it would appear that the emphasis has shifted and no longer rests so strongly upon the question of control. In the words of Roskill J, control is obviously an important factor. In some cases it may still be a decisive factor, but it is wrong to say that in every case it is the decisive factor. It is now, as I venture to think no more than a factor, albeit a very important one.[30] The test of control is, therefore, not as determinative as used to be thought to be the case, though no doubt, it is still of value in that the greater the degree of control exercisable by the employer, the more likely it is that the contract is one of service.[31] To distinguish between an independent contractor and a servant, the test is whether or not the employer retains the power, not only of directing what work is to be done, but also of controlling the manner of doing the work. If a person can be overlooked and directed in regard to manner of doing his work, that person is not a contractor'.[32] The control of the management, which is necessary element of the relationship of master and servant, is not directed towards providing or dictating the nature of the article to be produced or the work to be done, but refers to the other incidents having a bearing on the process of work the person carries out in the execution of the work. The manner of work is to be distinguished from the type of work to be performed.[33] The distinction is also drawn between 'contract for services' and 'contract of service'. The distinction is; in one case that the master can order or require what is to be done, while in the other case that he can not only order or require what is to be done, but how itself it shall be done.[34] In the words of Lord Denning:

> ... under a contract of service, a man is employed as a part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas, under a contract for services, his work, although done for the business, is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it.[35]

But, '... the test of being a servant does not rest nowadays on submissions to orders. It depends on whether the person is part and parcel of the organisation'.[36] Between 'complete control' and 'complete independence', a variety of circumstances may exist, and the law recognises that many types of services involve a wide field of initiative and discretion being left to the servant.[37] Occasionally, there may be hybrid cases which have, so to speak, elements of both within them, that cannot easily be lodged in pigeon-holes labelled as 'master and servant' and 'self-employed'. It may, therefore, be exceedingly difficult to know as to in what pigeon-hole one can properly put the relationship.[38] 'The duties to be performed may depend so much on special skill or knowledge or they may be clearly identified or the necessity of the employee acting on his own responsibility may be so evident, that little room for direction or command in detail may exist'.[39] Under modern industrial conditions, the actual control is more often than not in the hands of a foreman or manager who is himself a servant. A further illustration is of the captain of a vessel who may well be able to assert de facto control over the crew, but he is not legally its master; they are fellow-servants.[40] Lord Parker CJ observed that when one is dealing with a professional man, or a man of some particular skill and experience, there can be no question of an employer telling him how to do the work, therefore, the absence of control and direction in that sense can be of little, if any use as a test. What in fact matters is lawful authority to command so far as there is scope for it.[41] And there must always be some room for it if only in incidental or collateral matters.[42] The question, therefore, is not whether the control is exercised; it is as to where is the right of control? The distinction between the physical control and the right of control is important.[43] Hence various considerations, such as the nature of the undertaking, the freedom of action given, the magnitude of the contract amount, the manner in which it is to be paid for, the power of dismissal or circumstances in which the payment of reward may be withheld, bear on the solution of the question.[44] In other words, the determination of the question would depend upon the terms of the contract entered into between the parties and no general proposition of universal application can be laid down.[45]

The control includes the power of deciding the thing to be done, the way in which it will be done, the means employed in doing it, the time when and the place where it shall be done. All these aspects of control must be considered in deciding whether the right exists in a sufficient degree to make one party the master and the other his servant. The right need not be unrestricted. To find where the right resides one must look first to the express terms of contract and if they deal fully with the matter, one may look no further. If the contract does not expressly provide which party shall have the right, the question must be answered in the ordinary way by implication. The obligation to do work subject to other party's control is a necessity, though not always a sufficient, condition of a contract of service. If the provisions of the contract as a whole are inconsistent with its being a contract of service, it will be some other kind of contract and the person doing the work will not be a servant.[46] These tests are not necessarily concurrent nor is it necessary that each test in itself is controlling. Furthermore, it is now clear that it is impossible to define a contract of service in the sense of stating a number of conditions which are both necessary to and sufficient for, the existence of such a contract. In marginal situations, it is reasonable to keep in mind the general policy considerations underlying the whole doctrine. But it is exceedingly doubtful whether the search for a formula in the nature of a single test for identifying a contract of service serves a useful purpose. It is now too plain that past attempts to formulate principles and tests of universal validity applicable to cases give rise to many difficulties. The position has been stated by Atiyah in his valuable book, Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts, in the following words:

> The most that can profitably be done is to examine all the possible factors which have been referred to in these cases as bearing on the nature of the relationship between the parties concerned. Clearly not all of these factors will be relevant in all cases, or have the same weight in all cases. Equally clearly no magic formula can be propounded for determining which factors should, in any given case, be treated as the determining ones. The plain fact is that in a large number of cases the court can only perform a balancing operation, weighing up the factors which point in one direction and balancing them against those pointing in the opposite direction. In the nature of things it is not to be expected that this operation can be performed with scientific accuracy.[47]

It would thus be clear that no one fact is determinative and that all the relevant facts have to be taken into account. It is axiomatic that every case must turn upon its own facts. The court has to approach a particular case not so much by reference to the facts in other cases, arising sometimes under similar legislation, sometimes under different legislation, but by reference to the facts of the particular case as found and then in the light of those facts as so found, apply the pointers afforded by the well-established principles by the earlier cases for the purpose of determining whether a particular contract of employment is a 'contract of service' or a 'contract for services' and thus decide whether the particular person is a person employed under a contract of service or whether he is a self-employed person. The court, however, has to avoid too much reference to the facts of other cases though it has to bear in mind, the principles laid down by those cases. Since the principles laid down in the judgments cannot perhaps be formulated with scientific accuracy, the court has to hazard the risk of performing a balancing operation.[48]

International trends

It may be of some interest to study the development of this branch of law in different countries, viz, England, United States, Australia, Canada and India.

In England:

In the earlier cases, it seems to have been suggested that the most important test, if not the all-important one, was the extent of control exercised by the employer over the servant. This distinction (viz, between telling a servant what to do and telling him how to do it) was based upon the social conditions of an earlier age; it assumed that the employer of labour was able to direct and instruct the labourer as to the technical methods he should use in performing his work. In a mainly agricultural society and even in the earlier stages of the industrial revolution, the master could be expected to be superior to the servant in the knowledge, skill and experience which had to be brought to bear upon the choice and handling of the tools. The control test was well suited to govern relationships like those between a farmer and an agricultural labourer (prior to agricultural mechanization), a craftsman and journeyman, a householder and a domestic servant, and even a factory owner and an unskilled 'hand'. It reflects a state of society in which the ownership of the means of production coincided with the profession of technical knowledge and skill in which that knowledge and skill was largely acquired by being handed down from one generation to the next by oral tradition and not by being systematically imparted in institutions of learning from universities down to technical schools. The control test postulates a combination of managerial and technical functions in the person of the employer ie, what to modern eyes appears as an imperfect division of labour.[49] However from the development of the law during the last quarter of the century, it would appear that the emphasis has shifted and no longer rests so strongly upon the question of control. In the language of Mocatta J:

> The test of control is, therefore, not as determinative as used to be thought to be the case, though no doubt, it is still of value in that the greater the degree of control exercisable by the employer, the more likely it is that the contract is one of service.[50]

As pointed out by Roskill J:

> Control is obviously an important factor. In some cases it may still be a decisive factor, but it is wrong to say that in every case it is the decisive factor. It is now, as I venture to think no more than a factor, albeit a very important one.[51]

In J & W Henderson, a case decided by the House of Lords under the Workmen's Compensation Act, Lord Thankerton recapitulated with approval, the four indicia of contract of service derived by Lord Clark J from the authorities referred to by him in the judgment under appeal, viz:

(i) the master's power of selection of his servant;

(ii) payment of wages or other remuneration;

(iii) the master's right to control the method of doing the work; and

(iv) the master's right of suspension or dismissal; and further observed that modern industrial conditions have so much affected the freedom of the master in cases in which no one could reasonably suggest that the employee was thereby converted into an independent contractor, that, if and when an appropriate occasion arises, it will be incumbent on this house to reconsider and to restate these indicia.[52]

For example, (i), (ii), and (iv) and probably also (iii) are affected by the statutory provisions and rules which restrict the master's choice to men supplied by the labour bureau, or directed to him under the essential work provisions, and his power of suspension or dismissal is similarly affected. These matters are also affected by the trade union rules which are, at least primarily, made for the protection of the wage earners. It was, then, suggested that the particular requirement of a contract of service is the right of the master in some reasonable sense to control the method of doing the work, and that this factor of superintendence and control has frequently been treated as critical and decisive of the quality of the relationship. However, it has been apparent for long that an analysis of the extent and the degree of such control is not in itself decisive. It is left to the courts of law to decide what the 'contract of employment' or 'service' is in the circumstances of each case. Broadly speaking, there are three tests for discerning the 'contract of employment', viz:

(i) the 'traditional' or 'control' test;

(ii) 'organisation' or 'integration' test; and

(iii) 'mixed' or 'multiple' test.

The 'traditional' or 'control' test refers to the control of an employee by another, not only as to what he must do but also as how and when he must do.[53] This test, has been described by Mc Cardie J in Performing Right Society, as the final test.[54] This test, however, has been found increasingly difficult to apply to modern industrial relationships. An attempt, at first was made to extend the 'control' test by making control of the manner in which work was to be done, to be a decisive test rather than simply the control of what the worker did. In Mersey Docks, Lord Simons observed that the test should turn on 'where the authority lies to direct or to delegate to, the workman, the manner in which the work is to be done.' By this device, the subordination to the employer's managerial power was made the criterion.[55] But inadequacy of this test was pointed out by Somervell LJ in Cassidy, criticising statement of Hillbery J in Collins,[56] when he alluded to the case of a certified master of a ship. The master may be employed by the owner under what is clearly a contract of service and yet the owner has no powers to tell him how to navigate the ship.[57] The decision in this case holding that a hospital was vicariously liable for an injury suffered by a patient following negligent treatment by full time medical staff, was a further landmark in this direction. This holding provoked juristic thinking to suggest, that the 'organisation' test, viz, did the alleged servant form part of the alleged master's organisation, would be a decisive test?[58] In Morren, Lord Parker pointed out that when one is dealing with a professional man or a man of some particular skill and experience, there can be no question of an employer telling him how to work; therefore, the absence of control and direction in that sense can be of little, if any, use as a test.[59] Cases like this illustrate how a contract of service may exist even though the control does not extend to prescribing how the work shall be done. On the other hand, there may be cases when one, who engages the other to do work, may reserve for himself full control of how the work is to be done, but nevertheless the contract is not a contract of service.[60]

Inspired by the bold criticism of the 'control' test by Somervell LJ in Cassidy, Lord Denning in Stevenson, Jordan and Harrison, adumbrated the 'organisation' or 'integration' test, viz, under a contract of service, a man is employed as part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas under a contract for services, his work, although done for the business; is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it.[61] This point was illustrated by giving instances of a ship master, a chauffeur and reporter on the staff of a newspaper who are all employed under a contract; but a ship pilot, a taxi man and a newspaper contributor are employed under the contract for services. Shortly afterwards, in Bank Voor, Lord Denning LJ again observed: that test of being a servant does not rest now-a-days on submission to orders. It depends on whether the person is part and parcel of the organisation.[62] This observation was criticised in Ready Mixed Concrete, where Mackenna J, clearly took the view that those four indicia or at least two of them were in the present day, no longer determinative of the question whether the contract is one of service.[63] In this case, it was stated that the contract of service exists if three conditions are fulfilled, ie:

(i) a servant agrees that in consideration of a wage or other remuneration, he will provide his own work and skill in the performance of some service for his master;

(ii) he agrees, expressly or impliedly, that in the performance of that service he will be subject to other's control in a sufficient degree to make the other, master; and

(iii) the other provisions of the contract are consistent with its being a contract of service.

In Argent, Roskill J suggested that 'the matter can be determined by reference to what in modern parlance is called economic reality'. In other words, all these relevant matters have to be borne in mind. One has to look at the totality of the evidence, at the totality of the facts and then apply them to the language of the statute.[64] One cannot do better than echo the words of Somervell LJ in Cassidy (supra), viz, 'one perhaps cannot get much beyond this, 'was his contract a contract of service within the meaning which an ordinary person would give to the words? Thus, the 'organisation' or 'integration' test also does not provide a clear and candid answer in a myriad of situations in modern industrial employment. This has led the courts in recent times to prefer the more resilient 'multiple mixed test'. At its most casuistic level, this is simply said to be a 'common sense' approach of the 'reasonable man'. Apart from this, various criteria have been suggested, such as the employer's power of selection and dismissal, and form of payment of wages, and in addition, the employer's right to control the method of doing the work. Most recently, it has been suggested that a 'multiple' test should be applied in two stages. First, it must be asked whether there is control. This is a necessary but not a sufficient test. Secondly, it must be asked whether the provisions of the contract are 'consistent with its being a contract of service'. In other words, are there indications that the worker is an entrepreneur rather than an employee? For example, has he invested in tools and taken the chance of profit or the risk of loss? On the other hand, the mere fact that he is paid on an incentive basis or that he is expressly declared to be 'self-employed' is not conclusive. The entrepreneurial element is clearly of importance. But it begs the question to ask whether the contract is 'consistent with a contract of service'. Had it been asked whether the contract was consistent with a contract of services, precisely the opposite result would have been reached. In other words, the form of the question will dictate the answer given.[65]

In the United States of America:

A few cases, while dealing with statutory definitions, have laid down that the terms such as 'employees' need not be confined to conventional limitations or the traditional common law conceptions or some other distilled essence of their local variations, for determining the jural relationship of master and servant. However, the courts in the United States of America too have not completely given a go-by to the common law conceptions, especially the application of the supervision and control test.[66] The law on the subject has been stated in American Jurisprudence in the following words:

> The really essential element of relationship is the right to control and the right of one person, the master, to order and control another, the servant, in the performance of work by the latter, and the right to direct the manner in which the work shall be done. It is, however, essential that the master shall have control and direction not only of the employment to which the contract relates, but also of all its details, and if these elements of control and direction are lacking, no relationship of master and servant exists. The test of employer-employee relation is the right of the employer to exercise control of the details and method of performing the work.[67]

The case of Silk, is the most important of the cases on the topic decided by the Supreme Court of the United States of America. The case disposed of two suits raising the question whether men working for the plaintiff, Silk and Greyvan were 'employees' within the meaning of that word used in the Social Security Act 1935. The judges of the court agreed upon the test to be applied though not in every instance upon its application to the facts. It was not to be what they described as 'the common law test', viz, 'power of control whether exercised or not, over the manner of performing service to the undertaking'. The test was whether the men were employees 'as a matter of economic reality'. The important factors were said to be 'the degrees of control, opportunities of profit or loss, investment in facilities, permanency of relation and skill required in the claimed independent operation'. The facts of the case were that Silk sold coal by retail, using the services of two classes of workers, unloaders and truck drivers. The unloaders moved the coal from railway vans into bins. They came to the yard when they wished and were given a wagon to unload and a place to put the coal. They provided their own tools and were paid a certain amount per ton for the coal they shifted. All the nine judges of the Supreme Court held that these men were employees. The court said thus:

> Giving full consideration to the concurrence of the two lower courts in a contrary result, we cannot agree that the unloaders in the Silk case were independent contractors. They provided only picks and shovels. They had no opportunity to gain or lose except from the work of their hands and these simple tools. That the unloaders did not work regularly is not significant. They did work in the course of the employer's trade or business. This brings them under the coverage of the Act. They are of the group that the Social Security Act was intended to aid. Silk was in a position to exercise all necessary supervision over their simple tasks. Unloaders have often been held to be employees in tort cases. [68]

Silk's drivers owned the trucks in which they delivered coal to Silk's customers. They paid all the expenses of operating their trucks including the wages of any extra help they needed or chose to employ. They came to the yard when they pleased and were free to haul goods for other people. They were paid for their deliveries at a rate per ton. Greyvan carried on a road hauler's business. Their drivers too owned their trucks and were required to pay all the costs of operation. They were not allowed to work for anyone else but Greyvan, and had to drive the trucks themselves, or if they employed a relief driver, to be present when he drove. They had to follow all the rules, regulations and instructions of Greyvan. They were paid a percentage of the tariff which Greyvan charged the customers. A majority of the court held that both sets of drivers were independent contractors. The court held thus:

> ...Where the arrangements leave the driver-owners so much responsibility for investment and management as here, they must be held to be independent contractors. These driver-owners are small businessmen. They own their own trucks. They hire their own helpers. In one instance, they haul for a single business, in the other for any customer. The distinction, though important, is not controlling. It is the total situation, including the risk undertaken, the control exercised, the opportunity for profit from sound management, that marks these driver-owners as independent contractors.[69]

The reasoning of the American Supreme Court apparently required that there should be some power of control vested in the driver if he is to qualify as an independent contractor. That the power need not be very extensive appears from the facts in Greyvan's case. The driver's investment, and the risk undertaken by him, seem to be important issues of consideration. In determining whether one acting for another is a servant or independent contractor, the following among others, are the commonly recognised tests.[70]

(i) as to who has the right to direct what shall be done and when and how it shall be done;

(ii) existence of a contract for the perfomance by a person of a certain piece or kind of work at a fixed price;

(iii) independent nature of his business or his distinct calling;

(iv) his employment of assistants with the right to supervise their activity;

(v) his obligation to furnish necessary tools, supplies and materials;

(vi) work except as to final results;

(vii) the time for which the workman is employed;

(viii) the method of payment to be made, by time or job; and

(ix) whether work is part of the regular business of the employer.

In the Re-statement of the Law, it is stated that with reference to the common law concept of the relationship of master and servant, more than one factor will have to be taken into consideration for determining the existence of a jural relationship of master and servant. These have been enumerated below:

(a) the extent of control which, by agreement, the master may exercise over the details of the work;

(b) whether or not the one employed is engaged in a distinct occupation or business;

(c) the kind of occupation with reference to whether, in the locality the work, is usually done under the directions of the employer or by a specialist without supervision;

(d) the skill required in the particular occupation;

(e) whether the employer or the workman supplies the instrumentalites, tools and the place of work for the person doing the work;

(f) the length of time for which the person is employed;

(g) the method of payment, whether by the time or by the job;

(h) whether or not the work is a part of regular business of the employer; and

(i) whether or not the parties believe they are creating the relationship of master and servant.

The comment on factor (e) above is in these words:

> Ownership of instumentalities: The ownership of the instrumentalities and tools used in the work is of importance. The fact that a worker supplies his own tools is some evidence that he is not a servant. On the other hand, if the worker is using his employer's tools or insturmentalities, especially if they are of substantial value, it is normally understood that he will follow, the directions of the owner in their use, and this indicates that the owner is a master. This fact is, however, only of evidential value.[71]

This implies that in effect the employer's ownership of the instrumentalities is relevant only because of a rebuttable presumption that the parties meant him to control the use of his own property. It also says that the worker's ownership is evidence that he is not a servant, but it does not say why. If the reason is the same in both cases, and the worker's ownership is evidence only because of its bearing on control, it is plainly not the correct position. It would, however, appear that the importance of the provision of instrumentalities and tools lies in the simple fact that, in most circumstances, where a person hires out a piece of work to an independent contractor he expects the contractor to provide all the necessary tools and equipment. Indeed, it may well be that little weight can today be put on the provision of tools of a minor character, as opposed to the provision of plant and equipment on a large scale. In the latter case, the real object of the contract is often the hiring of the plant, and the services of a workman to operate the plant are purely incidental'.[72]

In Australia:

The law obtaining in Australia has been discussed in some detail in Queensland Stations, in which the question was whether a payment made by the company to a driver was 'wages' within the meaning of a Pay-roll Tax Assessment Act, which depended on whether the relation between the company and the driver was that of master and servant. The driver was employed under a written contract to drive 317 cattles to a destination. The contract provided that he should obey and carry out all lawful instructions and use the whole of his time, energy and ability in the careful driving of the stock, that he should provide at his own expense all men, plant, horses and rations required for the operation, and that he should be paid at a rate per head for each of the cattle safely delivered at the destination. He was held to be an independent contractor. Speaking for the court, Dixon J held:

> There is, of course, nothing to prevent a driver and his client forming the relation of employee and employer ... But whether they do so must depend on the facts. In considering the facts it is a mistake to treat as decisive a reservation of control over the manner in which the driving is performed and the cattle are handled. For instance, in the present case, the circumstance that the driver agrees to obey and carry out all lawful instructions cannot outweigh the countervailing considerations which are found in the employment by him of servants of his own, the provision of horses, equipment, plant, rations, and a remuneration at a rate per head delivered. That a reservation of right to direct or superintend the performance of the task cannot transform into a contract of service what in essence is an independent contract..."[73]

In a later case, viz, Humberstone, the same judge dealt with the question; whether the owner-driver of a truck was a servant under a contract of service so as to be covered by Workmen's Compensation Act? For a number of years, the owner had taken his truck at about the same time each day to the factory where he had been given goods to deliver to the customers of the factory owners. He maintained the truck, supplied the fuel at his own expense, and was paid for goods carried at a rate per car-mile. He carried on delivering goods until about the same time each evening, when he was knocked off. From these facts, it was inferred that there was a continuing contract between the factory owner and the truck owner which was not a contract of service. For this conclusion, Dixon J gave the following reasons:

> The question is not whether in practice the work was in fact done subject to a direction and control exercised by an actual supervision or whether an actual supervision was possible but 'whether ultimate authority over the man in the perfomance of his work resided in employer so that he was subject to the latter's order and directions'. In the present case, the contract by the deceased was to provide not merely his own labour but the use of heavy mechanical transport, driven by power, which he maintained and fuelled for the purpose. The most important part of the work to be perfomed by his own labour consisted in the operation of his own motor truck and the essential part of the service for which the respondents contracted was the transportation of their goods by the mechanical means he thus supplied. The essence of a contract of service is the supply of the work and skill of a man. But the emphasis in the case of the present contract is upon mechanical traction. This was to be done by his own property in his own possession and control. 'There is no ground for imputing to the parties, a common intention that in all the management and control of his own vehicle, in all the ways in which he used it for the purpose of carrying their goods, he should be subject to the commands of the respondents'.[74]

It would appear that if the obligation to provide the truck, etc, were relevant only as evidence of intention in the matter of control, it would cease to be relevant where the parties had expressed their intention in that matter, and if as in Queensland the contract expressly provided that the drover should be subject to the other party's control, he would be a servant. But in Queensland, it was decided that the driver's contract was an 'independent contract': his obligation to provide the men, the horses, etc, determined its nature and made it, notwithstanding his submission to control, something other than a contract of service. Hence, the view taken in Queensland is preferable to that of Humberstone.[75] This also finds support from the observation of Dixon CJ in Zuijs, to the effect that what matters is lawful authority to command so far as there is scope for it. And there must always be some room for it, for only in incidental or collateral matters.[76]

In Canada:

The position of this branch of law in Canada has been succinctly summed up by Lord Wright in Montreal Locomotive Works. In this case there were two questions, viz:

(i) whether a corporation was the occupant of an armament factory so as to be liable to pay an occupation tax; and,

(ii) whether it was carrying on a business in the factory so as to be liable to pay business tax.

The answer to both the questions depended on whether the corporation was acting as the government's agent in the manufacture of armaments or as an independent contractor. All the funds necessary for the enterprise were provided by the government which bore all the financial risks. The corporation was subject to the government's control in making the armaments and received a fee for each unit of production. It was held, on these facts, that the corporation was not liable to pay the taxes. Lord Wright expressed his opinion in the following words:

> In earlier cases a single test, such as the presence or absence of control, was often relied on to determine whether the case was one of master and servant, mostly in order to decide issues of tortious liability on the part of the master or superior. In the more complex conditions of modern industry, more complicated tests have to be applied. It has been suggested that a four-fold test would in some cases be more appropriate, a complex involving (1) control; (2) ownership of the tools; (3) chance of profit; (4) risk of loss. Control in itself is not always conclusive. Thus the master of a chartered vessel is generally the employee of the shipowner though the charterer can direct the employment of the vessel. Again the law often limits the employer's right to interfere with the employee's conduct, as also to trade union regulations. In many cases, the question can only be settled by examining the whole of the various elements which constitute the relationship between the parties. In this way it is in some cases possible to decide the issue by raising as the crucial question whose business is it, or in other words by asking whether the party is carrying on the business, in the sense of carrying it on for himself or on his own behalf and not merely for a superior.[77]

This opinion of Lord Wright has been commented upon by Mac Kenna J in Ready Mixed Concrete. The substance of the gloss is: In the opinion of Lord Wright of the shipowner, the charterer and the shipmaster, the control is shown in two ways not to be conclusive. Though, the shipowner had delegated to the charterer his right to give directions to the shipmaster, and in that limited sense no longer had control, he was still the master. Again, though the charterer had the power of giving directions, and in that sense had control, he was not the master. The second illustration shows that a right of control limited by law or by trade union regulations may be sufficient for the relation of master and servant. This does not go far in the direction of a four-fold test. It is easier to relate Lord Wright's (2), (3) and (4) to the case mentioned in the last sentence of the quotation. If a man's activities have the character of a business, and if the question is whether he is carrying on that business for himself or for another, it must be relevant to consider which of the two owns the assets 'the ownership of the tools' and which bears the financial risk ('the chance of profit', 'the risk of loss'). He, who owns the assets and bears the risk is unlikely to be acting as an agent or a servant. If the man performing the service must provide the means of performance at his own expense and accept payment by results, he will own the assets, bear the risk, and be to that extent unlike a servant. There does not appear anything in the Montreal case to support the view that the ownership of the asset is relevant only to the question of control. Lord Wright seems to have treated his three other tests as having a value independent of control in determining the nature of the contract.[78]

In India:

The case of Shivanandan Sharma, can be taken as the convenient point where the tests for determining the question whether a person is an 'employee' or 'independent contractor', was considered by the Supreme Court for the first time and 'supervision and control' was held to be the crucial test for determining the relationship.[79] In Dharangadhara Chemical, the court held that the test of 'supervision and control' may be taken as the prima facie test for determining the relationship of employment.[80] While discussing the English decisions, Bhagwati J, preferred to adopt this test in the absence of restatement of law as pointed out by Lord Thankerton in J & W Henderson, that there is need to reconsider and restate indicia of contract of service. The prima facie test, therefore, for determining the relationship was held to be the existence of the right in the master to 'supervise and control' the work done by the servant not only in matter of directing what work the servant is to do but also the manner in which he is to do his work.[81] But since the nature or extent of control which is requisite to establish the relationship of employer and employee must necessarily vary from business to business and is by its very nature incapable of precise definition,[82] the court suggested that correct method of approach, would be to consider whether having regard to the nature of work there was due control and supervision by the employer. To use the language of Fletcher Moulten LJ:

> ...the greater the amount of direct control exercised over the person rendering the services by the person contracting for them, the stronger the ground for holding it to be a contract of service.[83]

The control and supervision test laid down in Dharangadhara case was reaffirmed by the court, in Chintaman Rao, in which the court was dealing with the definition of worker' in s 2(1) of the Factories Act. Giving restricted meaning to the words 'directly or through an agency' in the definition, it was held that 'worker' was a person employed by the management and that there must be a contract of service and a relationship of master and servant between them.[84] In Shankar Balaji Waje, the Supreme Court clarified:

> Control of the management, which is a necessary element of the relationship of master and servant is not directed towards providing or dictating the nature of the article to be produced or the work to be done, but refers to other incidents having a bearing on the process of work the person carries out in the execution of the work. The manner of work is to be distinguished from the type of work to be performed.[85]

In VP Gopala Rao, the court held that it was a question of fact in each case whether the relationship of master and servant exists between the management and the workmen and there could be no abstract a priori test of the work control required for establishing the contract of service.[86] It is, therefore, not surprising that in recent years, the 'control' test, as traditionally formulated, has not been treated as an exclusive test. However, 'it is exceedingly doubtful today whether the search for a formula in the nature of a single test to tell a 'contract of service' from a 'contract for services' will serve any useful purpose. The most, what profitably can be done, is to examine all the factors that have been referred to in the cases on the topic. Clearly, not all of these factors would be relevant in all these cases or have the same weight in all cases. It is equally clear that no magic formula can be propounded which factors should in any case be treated as determining ones. The plain fact is that in a large number of cases, the court can only perform a balancing operation weighing up the factors which point in one direction and balancing them against those pointing in the opposite direction. In Silver Jubilee Tailoring House, Mathew J pointed out that:

> It is in its application to skilled and particularly professional work that control test in its traditional form has really broken down. It has been said that in interpreting 'control' as meaning the power to direct how the servant should do his work, the court has been applying a concept suited to a past age. [87]

During the last three decades, the emphasis in the field has shifted and no longer rests so strongly upon the question of control. Control is obviously an important factor and in many cases, it may still be the decisive factor but it is wrong to say that in every case, it is decisive. It is now no more than a factor, although an important one. The fact that generally, the workers attend the shop which belongs to the employer and work there, on the machines, also belonging to him, is a relevant factor. When the services are performed generally in the employers' premises, this is some indication that the contract is a contract of service and it is possible that this is another facet of the incidental feature of employment. Likewise, the fact that the workers work on the machines supplied by the proprietor of the shop is an important consideration in determining the nature of the relationship. The further fact that a 'worker can be removed' which means nothing more than that the employer has the liberty not to give further work to an employee, who has not performed his job according to the instructions of the employer or who has been absent from the shop for a long time, would be, speaking of control and supervision, consistent with the character of the business. The supply of equipment also is some indication as if the employer provides the equipment, it may indicate that the contract is a contract of service whereas if the other party provides the equipment it may provide some evidence that he is an independent contractor. This is not based on the theory that if the employer provides the equipment he retains some greater degree of control for the control arises only from the need to protect one's own property, little significance can be attached to the power of control for the purpose of determining the nature of the contract. It seems, therefore, that the importance of the provision of equipment lies in the simple fact that, in most circumstances, where a person hires out a piece of work to an independent contractor to provide all the necessary tools and equipment, whereas if he employs a servant he expects to provide them himself. Hence, no sensible inference can be drawn from this factor in circumstances where it is customary for servants to provide their own equipment. Relying on these principles in Shining Tailors, the court held that the piece-rated workers working for a big tailoring establishment were workmen of the establishment. Speaking for the court, Desai J, observed:

> The right of removal of the workman or not to give work has the element of control and supervision' which was amply satisfied in the fact of this case. In the premises, the tribunal was not right in holding that the piece-rate itself indicates a relationship of independent contractor which was an error apparent on the record disclosing a total lack of knowledge of the method of payment in various occupations in different industries.[88]

From these decisions, it would appear that the law in India too is not static. In the words of Krishna Iyer J: To crystallise criteria conclusively is baffling but broad indications may be available from decisions.[89] By and large, for determining the contractual relationship as to whether a person is employed as an 'independent contractor' or as an 'employee' or whether the contract is 'of service' or 'for services', the same principles as obtaining in England would apply. In Hussainbhai, the Supreme Court stated the law in the following words:

> Where a worker or group of workers labour to produce goods or services and these goods or services are for the business of another, that other is, in fact, the employer. He has economic control over the workers' subsistence, skill, and continued employment. If he, for any reason, chokes off, the worker is, virtually, laid off. The presence of intermediate contractor with whom alone the workers have immediate or direct relationship ex contractu is of no consequence when, on lifting the veil or looking at the conspectus of factors governing employment, we discern the naked truth, though draped in different perfect paper arrangement, that the real employer is the management, not the immediate contractor...If the livelihood of the workmen substantially depends on labour rendered to produce goods and services for the benefit and satisfaction of an enterprise, the absence of direct relationship or the presence of dubious intermediaries or the make-believe trappings of detachment from the management cannot snap the real-life bond. The story may vary but the inference defies ingenuity. The liability cannot be shaken off. Of course, if there is total dissociation in fact between the disowning management and the aggrieved workmen, the employment is, in substance and real-life terms, by another. The management's adventitious connections cannot ripen into real employment.[90]

In Kerala State Coir Corpn, a single judge of the High Court held that security personnel supplied by a registered society to work in the factory of the Kerala State Coir Corporation Limited were employed by the corporation because it controlled them, allotted work to them and decided the nature of the work they had to render while the society's role was only to supply the persons to do the work.[91] In Atma Parkash, a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that where the facts disclosed that the state handloom corporation supplied material to weavers for making carpets and also provided market facilities, and the weavers weave the carpets and supply the same to the corporation on piece-rate basis, and there is no question of rejecting the carpets so weaved and supplied, there was no control whatsoever over the work of the weavers and no master-servant relationship existed between the corporation and the weavers, and such weavers were not workmen within the meaning of s 2(s).[92] In Nestle India, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that an agent appointed to collect milk from farmers for which he was being paid a commission as an agent is not a workman of the company within s 2(s), as the company had no control over the way the agent operated and the agent was free to appoint others to do his job, and that the agreement which was terminated by the company was purely a commercial agreement.[93] In Indian Banks Assn, it was held that in the light of the fact that the 'deposit collectors' engaged by a bank were accountable to the bank and were under the control of the bank, and there was master-servant relationship between the bank and the deposit collectors, they were workmen within the meaning of s 2(s), notwithstanding the fact that they have no fixed time and are free to regulate their own hours of work, which was due to the nature of the job which involves contacting depositors at such times as required by the latter. Even so, the work they were doing was completely different from the work, which the regular employees were doing. There could thus be no question of absorption and there was also no question of the 'deposit collectors' being paid the same pay scales, allowances and other services of the regular employees of the banks.[1] From the decided cases, no criterion of general application is discernible, as the question in each case turns on its own facts and circumstances. The decisions, therefore, are rather illustrative than determinative. Some illustrative cases, therefore, have been collected under the following four headings, viz:

(i) Employed under contract of service;

(ii) Independent contractors;

(iii) Miscellaneous cases;

(iv) Workers employed by the contractors.

Employed under a Contract of Service - Legal Position:

Agarias engaged in a salt manufacturing company working under the supervision and control of the officers of the company but free to engage others to assist them who were paid by the company on the basis of per maund of salt.[2] A bidi manufacturing concern engaged certain persons on contract for getting the work of rolling bidis done, who in turn further engaged a certain number of persons for the work of rolling the bidis. The intermediaries were taking home the bidi leaves for cutting in proper shape and the persons employed by them used to do the work of rolling the bidis in the premises of such, intermediaries with the material supplied to them by the intermediaries.[3] The workers of a match factory who used to carry home raw materials and return finished products in a stipulated time and at fixed rates.[4] A treasurer employed by a bank under contract for running a pay office who was on the evidence on record, found to be in charge of nomination of staff appointment and dismissal, etc.[5] A carpenter employed in a soap factory for making packing.[6] Coolies employed in a mill through a contractor but being treated by the mill as its own employees regarding bonus and leave, etc.[7] Cartmen employed in a salt manufacturing factory by a mistry to load and transport the salt bags from the site of the firm to the railway siding were the workmen qua the factory.[8] An employee recruited by the coal field recruiting organisation to work in a particular colliery was held to be a workman.[9] The weavers in question paid on piecework basis, there being regularity of attendance, and had to work on the specified warps supplied to them by the management though having freedom to weave as many pieces as they liked of two restricted qualities of cloth, and were entitled to the benefit of weekly holidays and the management had the right to frame charges for misconduct and remove the weavers from work.[10] The tailors working in the establishment of a tailoring house. The fact that some of the tailors also did work for other tailoring establishments was not considered as militating against their being employees of the proprietor of the shop where they attended for work.[11]

An employer had adopted two systems for getting beedis made. One was to get beedis maufactured from the licenced persons who took the tobacco and leaves from the employer which they distributed to different other persons who made the beedis according to specifications. The beedis were then supplied by the licencee to the employer on agreed rates. The second method was that the employer supplied tobacco and leaves to different persons which they took to their homes and made beedis and supplied the same to the employer at a fixed rate. These persons were known as pass-book holders because they were supplied with pass-books in which the materials given to them and the supplies of beedis made by them, were regularly entered. The employer also took deposit from such persons. In the circumstances and on the facts of the case, the pass-book holders were held to be 'employees' of the employer while the 'licencees' were held not to be 'employees'.[12] The Punjab National Bank gave a certain allowance to facilitate its area manager to employ a driver. The area manager paid this amount of allowance drawn by him by way of salary to the driver but the jeep which he was to drive belonged to the bank. The expenses of petrol, oil and maintenance were also incurred by the bank. The area manager had no vehicle of his own. In the circumstances, it was held that the driver was the employee of the area manager and not of the bank.[13] The court does not appear to have correctly comprehended the scope of the 'control and direction' test and it is a case of clear misapplication of the principle. The employees working in a canteen within the premises of the mills and the management of which was entrusted to a trust were held to be employees of the mills.[14] The tiny deposit agents employed in the deposit mobilisation activity of the bank have been held to be falling within the definition of 'workmen' and not independent contractor.[15]

Independent Contractors - Whether Workmen:

On the facts found in the case, it held that there was no relationship of master and servant between the owner of a bidi factory and the concerned persons who used to roll the bidis in the factory and were independent contractors.[16] Handloom workers working as casual piece workers and who had no fixed hours of work and were paid by piece rate.[17] A person engaged under a contract as a medical officer for attending to the employees of a company, in its various establishments daily at a prescribed time for which he was paid a fee in the shape of retainer, and who could, at his discretion, engage another medical officer to do the same duties in his absence.[18] Goldsmiths engaged by a gold merchant for manufacturing jewels for him, where such goldsmiths were asked to finish jewels within a given time and when it was open to such goldsmiths to finish jewels within a given time or earlier and engage themselves in other of their own.[19] A goldsmith who undertook the manufacture of ornaments like other goldsmiths which he was asked to manufacture and would receive remuneration which would depend upon the nature of the work done, was held not to be under the order or control of the proprietor of the concern for whom he was doing it.[20] Jewellers employed by a firm of jewellery manufacturers to make their standard products, at fixed or agreed rates and where the firm gave no general directions and had no general directions and had no general control over these persons who could employ their own helpers of their own accord.[21] A salesman previously working on salary basis but later shifting to commission basis plus travelling allowance and not entitled to any provident fund or leave facilities though his tour programme were approved by the employer.[22] A dairy commission agent engaged to sell milk for a dairy, in the facts and circumstances of the case was held not to be a

'workman' because the agreement for selling milk with commission was not a contract of service.[23] There is no relationship of master and servant between a lawyer engaged by a company on retainer basis to look after its interests before labour courts and conciliation authorities.[24] In Puri Urban Coop Bank, a two judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that an appraiser engaged by the bank for the purpose of weighing, testing and appraising the quantity, value and purity of the gold ornaments pledged with the bank for raising loan is not a 'worker' within the meaning of s 2(s), on the basis of the sole test of control and supervision.[25] This holding is not only contrary to the earlier dicta of the court, but is also inconsistent with the modern trends of law as the test of 'control and supervision' which once held the field has receded into the background.[26]

Jewel appraisers appointed by Indian Overseas Bank are not workmen of the Bank in the light of the fact that: (i) they are not required to sign in the attendance register of the bank; (ii) they were not required to make any leave application; (iii) they were paid a minimum amount every month - in the instant case, not by the Bank, but by the loanee, (iv) they are required to weigh the ornaments brought to the Bank for pledge and to appraise quality, purity and value, but they could not be directed as to the manner in which it was to be done; and (v) it was not obligatory for the Bank to allot work to any particular jewel appraiser. On facts, Pasayat J (for self and Arun Kumar J), held that Jewel Appraisers were not the employees of the Bank.[27] In Electronics Corporation, the facts disclosed that the persons were appointed on retainership basis for repair of TV sets manufactured by the Corporation. There were no regular posts like Service Engineers or Licencees or Retainer in the company and such contracts are entered into by the company to attend to additional work as and when required. The company was entering into individual contracts with its retainers and there was no compulsion whatsoever to enter into the contract year after year. Some of the workmen of the Corporation opted for working in terms of those individual contracts as they found the same to be more lucrative and paying rather than being regular employees. No appointment letter was ever given to them by the company. They had not enrolled their names with the employment exchange. The retainers used to visit the company for collecting complaints, collecting components, for receiving payments and for repairing the called back sets. The tribunal held that there was no employer-employee relationship between the Corporation and the said retainers and that they were not the workmen of the corporation, which was set aside by the High Court. Quashing the orders of the High Court and restoring the award of the tribunal, Pasayat J (for self and Panta J), held that in the light of the fact that the retainers were getting Rs 90/- per set, an amount equivalent to 2.24% was being deducted from their bills towards income tax, and that, in the event of a dispute, cl 15 of the agreement provided for arbitration, under the Arbitration Act 1940, the said agreement was a job contract and hence they were not the employees of the corporation.[28]

Employees engaged on Miscellaneous works - Whether Workmen:

A chowkidar working in the bungalow of the governing director of a company outside the premises without evidence about his actual employment by the company or his being paid by the company or his working under the control of the company was held not to be a workman.[29] A person whose employment is prohibited by law such as a child below the age of 15 whose appointment is prohibited by s 69 of the Factories Act will not be a workmen within the meaning of the definition.[30] A teacher employed in a primary school run by a factory was held not to be a workman.[31]A teacher working in an educational institution is not covered by the definition of'workman', though the institution where he is teaching may be an industry, and consequently a reference under s 10(1)(d) of the Act is not maintainable.[32] A canteen worker employed in a textile mill was held not to be performing duties of a clerical nature; hence was found not to be a workman.[33] Domestic servants will not come under the definition of workman, as they are not employed in an industry[34] A person who retires from service and receives bonus will not fall within the definition.[35] In Mineral Exploration Corporation, the facts briefly were: the corporation engaged a few workmen as 'contingency' workers for years together, whereas the standing orders provided only for 'casual' and 'temporary' workmen. The said 'contingency' workers were transferred from project to project and were posted in places far away from civilization and facilities and they did not get amenities with regard to the health and residence although such facilities are available to the permanent workmen doing similar work. The workmen lived away from their families while working on a project and faced all types of hardships. The apex court speaking through Lakshmanan J (for self and Panta J) observed:

> Usual practice of the Corporation has been to keep contingent workmen for long duration of time and offering regular appointment periodically which abruptly has stopped due to unfair attitude of the Management. Reduction in work leading to poor physical and financial performance has been a result of incompetent and poor Management which cannot be allowed to play with the future of thousands of employees and their families. ... We feel its just and proper to issue the following directions to the Tribunal which is directed to consider the following directions and pass appropriate orders after affording opportunities to both the parties.
>
> 1. The Tribunal is directed to again scrutinize all the records already placed by the appellant-Union and also the records placed by the Management and discuss and deliberate with all the parties and ultimately arrive at a conclusion in regard to the genuineness and authenticity of each and every claimant for regularization. This, exercise shall be done within nine months from the date of receipt of this judgment.

2. Subject to the outcome of the fresh enquiry of the award, the respondent-Corporation should absorb them permanently and regularize their services, the persons to be so appointed being limited to the quantum of work which may become available to them on a perennial basis.
3. The respondent-Corporation may absorb on permanent basis only such of those workmen who have not completed the age of superannuation.
4. The respondent-Corporation are not required to absorb on permanent basis such of the workmen who are found medically unfit for such employment.
5. The absorption of the eligible workmen on a regular and permanent basis by the Corporation does not disable the Corporation from utilizing their services for any other manual work for the Corporation upon its needs.
6. In the matter of absorption, the persons who have worked for longer period as contingent workmen/ad hoc/temporary shall be preferred to those who have to be in shorter period of work.
7. The workman should have worked for more than 240 days in a year. The conduct and behaviour of the workman should be good.[36]

Part-time workers - Whether Workmen:

In Silver Jubilee Tailoring (supra), the Supreme Court held that tailors working on a part-time basis in a tailoring shop fall within the definition of 'workman'. Part-time carpenters and polishmen engaged in the factory were workmen.[37] A doctor employed in the industry for rendering medical aid to its employees on a part-time basis was a workman.[38] The definition is sufficiently wide to include 'a part-time employee.[39] A class IV employee working on a part-time basis was a workman.[40] However, the High Courts of AP,[41] and Kerala,[42] held that a part-time employee would not fall within the definition of 'workman' within the meaning of 2(s). A person, who is a permanent employee of some other employer and working under another employer as a temporary employee on a part-time basis, is not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) entitled to raise an industrial dispute as against the second employer, and is not entitled to compensation under s 25F in the event of his termination.[43] However, a single Judge of the Rajasthan High Court took a different view and observed that the word 'part-time' had nothing to do with the nature of employment; it only regulates the duration of working hours of the employee; a part-time employee also falls within the definition; and that, at the most, he might be paid back-wages as he had been paid as part-time employee and that he could not claim back wages on the basis of wages which a full-time employee was entitled to.[44] In Municipal Board, Pratapgarh, Garg J of Rajasthan High Court held that a part-time worker is a 'workman' within the meaning of the Act and that the illegality or irregularity in making the appointment could not be a ground for refusing to comply with s 25F.[45]A workman employed on a part time basis but under the control and supervision of an employer is a workman in term of s 2(s) of the Act, and is entitled to claim the protection of s 25F thereof, should the need so arise.[46] This controversy was set at rest by Supreme Court in Devinder Singh, in which Singhvi J (for self and Ganguly J), observed:

> The source of employment, the method of recruitment, the terms and conditions of employment/contract of service, the quantum of wages/pay and the mode of payment are not at all relevant for deciding whether or not a person is a workman within the meaning of Section 2(s) of the Act. ... It is apposite to observe that the definition of workman also does not make any distinction between full-time and part-time employee or a person appointed on contract basis. There is nothing in the plain language of Section 2(s) from which it can be inferred that only a person employed on regular basis or a person employed for doing whole-time job is a workman and the one employed on temporary, part- time or contract basis on fixed wages or as a casual employee or for doing duty for fixed hours is not a workman. ... Whenever an employer challenges the maintainability of industrial dispute on the ground that the employee is not a workman within the meaning of Section 2(s) of the Act, what the Labour Court/Industrial Tribunal is required to consider is whether the person is employed in an industry for hire or reward for doing manual, unskilled, skilled, operational, technical or clerical work in an industry. Once the test of employment for hire or reward for doing the specified type of work is satisfied, the employee would fall within the definition of 'workman'.[47] (Italics supplied)

Sub-contractor - Whether Workman:

It has been seen that a contractor is not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s). The same principle will govern a sub-contractor. Hence, 'a sub-contractor is not the servant of the contractor employing him'.[48] Likwise, a servant of a sub-contractor is not prima facie the servant of the person who engages the contractor.[49] A few illustrations are: The employer company had agreed to see that the contract labour was paid in the manner indicated in the settlement. But there was no evidence to show that the labourers so employed by the contractor were employees of the employer company. It was, therefore, held that there was no relationship of master and servant between the company and the labourers employed by the contractor.[50] A labourer employed by an independent contractor who looked only to the contractor for his wages and over whom the company for whom the contractor was working had no control or supervision was held not to be a workman of the company.[51] The labourers working in a colliery under a contractor were held not to be workmen of the colliery and the fact that the manager of the colliery had the power to suspend such labour under the Mining Act was held immaterial in determining the employer-employee relationship.[52]

Place of Work - Its relevance in determining whether a person is Workman:

The location of a worker is of no material consequence, because all would contribute directly or indirectly to the ultimate planned result. The preposition in before 'any industry' in the definition of 'workman' has been used by the legislature to signify the inclusion of the persons employed, and not their position or location in the industry as a whole. Applying this principle, it was held that the domestic servants in the quarters of the officers employed by the employer company in connection with the sugar manufacturing business were workmen.[53] Likewise, the malis (gardeners) employed in the bungalows of the officers and directors of a company were held to be 'employed in the industry' to do the work which was incidentally connected with the main industry.[54] In the under-noted cases,[55] the fact that the bidi workers and intermediaries were doing the rolling of the bidis in their own houses was held not to be inconsistent with the existence of the relationship of the master and servant between the employer and the bidi rollers. In UP Sugar and Cane Development Corporation, it was held that a demand for declaring seasonal workers employed in a sugar mill as permanent workmen is not a case of mere fitment as per the nature of duties performed, but one which involves the exercise of managerial function, and that a labour court cannot give such declaration.[56]

Contract Workers employed in canteens - Whether Workmen:

On the question, 'whether the workmen employed in the canteens, provided by the industrial or commercial-establishments, are the employees of such establishments'?, there was a divergence of judicial opinion. In Saraspur Mills (supra), the Supreme Court held that the workers employed in such a canteen, even if run by a co-operative society, were the workmen of the factory, as it was under a mandatory obligation to maintain and run the canteen. In MMR Khan, ealing with the canteens run by various railway establishments, the court classified such canteens into three categories, ie:

(a) statutory canteens, ie, canteens compulsorily required to be provided by statute, ie, section 46 of the Factories Act 1948 or any other provision of law;

(b) non statutory recognised canteens set up as a staff welfare measure, but with prior approval and recognition of the railway board as per the procedure detailed in the railway establishment manual; and

(c) non-statutory, non-recognised canteens, ie, those which were established without prior approval or recognition of the railway board.[57]

In this case, the workmen employed in the statutory canteens were held undoubtedly to be the employees of the railway establishments, and in view of the provisions of railway establishment manual, the workmen employed in the non-statutory recognised canteens were also held to be the employees of the railway establishments. But the employees of the non-statutory, non-recognised canteens were held not to be the employees of the railway establishments. In All India Rly Institute Employees Assn, Sawant J held that the employees in railway institutes/clubs could not be treated as employees of the railways because the provision of such institutes/clubs was not mandatory as they were established only as a part of welfare measure for the railway staff.[58] However, in Parimal Chandra Raha, the learned judge enunciated the following principles:

(i) Where, as under the provisions of the Factories Act, it is statutorily obligatory on the employer to provide and maintain canteen for the use of his employees, the canteen becomes a part of the establishment, and therefore, the workers employed in such canteen are the employees of the management.

(ii) Where, although it is not statutorily obligatory to provide a canteen, it is otherwise an obligation on the employer to provide a canteen, the canteen becomes a part of the establishment and the workers working in the canteen, the employees of the management. The obligation to provide a canteen has to be distinguished from the obligation to provide facilities to run canteen. The canteen run pursuant to the latter obligation, does not become a part of the establishment.

(iii) The obligation to provide canteen may be explicit or implicit. Where the obligation is not explicitly accepted by or cast upon the employer either by an agreement or an award etc, it may be inferred from the circumstances, and the provision of the canteen may be held to have become a part of the service conditions of the employees. Whether the provision for canteen services has become a part of the service conditions or not, is a question of fact to be determined on the facts and circumstances in each case. Where to provide canteen services has become a part of the service conditions of the employees, the canteen becomes a part of the establishment and the workers in such canteen become the employees of the management.

(iv) Whether a particular facility or service has become implicitly a part of the service conditions of the employees or not, will depend, among others, on the nature of the service/facility, the contribution the service in question makes to the efficiency of the employees and the establishment, whether the service is available as a matter of right to all the employees in their capacity as employees and nothing more, the number of employees employed in the establishment and the number of employees who avail of the service, the length of time for which the service has been continuously available, the hours during which it is available, the nature and character of management, the interest taken by the employer in providing, maintaining, supervising and controlling the service, the contribution made by the management in the form of infrastructure and funds for making the service available etc.[59]

In view of this statement of law, the court held that the canteen had become a part of the establishment of the life insurance corporation. The canteen committee, the cooperative society of the employees and the contractors engaged from time to time were in reality, the agencies of the corporation and there was only a veil between the corporation and the canteen workers who, in fact, were the employees of the corporation. The court, therefore, directed the corporation to prescribe different service conditions for different types of employees and pending such prescription of service conditions, the corporation should pay to all the employees the minimum of the salary presently being paid to class 4 employees together with allowances and special facility, if any, and other benefits available to class 4 employees. But in Reserve Bank of India, a larger Bench of the court noticed that admittedly, there was no statutory liability cast on the bank to run a canteen under s 46 of the Factories Act 1948 and also observed that the Industrial Dispute Act does not contain extended definition of 'employer'. Therefore, in the absence of any obligation statutory or otherwise, regarding running of a canteen by the bank, similar to Factories Act or railway establishment manual, and in the absence of any effective or direct control in the bank to supervise and control the work done by various persons, the workers in the canteens run by the implementation committee (canteen committee) could not come within the ratio of MMR Khan (supra). In this case, by way of subsidy, the bank bore to the extent of 90 per cent of the expenses incurred by the canteen for payment of salary, provident fund contribution, gratuity and uniform etc. The bank, also provided premises, fixtures, utensils, furniture, electricity, water etc, free of charge. The canteens were run either by 'implementation committee (canteen committee)' or a 'co-operative society' or 'contractors'. The dispute, in this case, was as to 'whether 166 employees engaged in various canteen establishments of the Reserve Bank of India at Bombay were the workers of the Reserve Bank of India'? In the fact of this case, the court held:

In the absence of any statutory or other legal obligation and in the absence of any right in the bank to supervise and control the work or the details thereof in any manner regarding the canteen workers employed in three types of canteens, it could not be said that the relationship of master and servant existed between the bank and the various persons employed in the three types of canteens. [60]

Therefore, the 166 persons mentioned in the list attached to the reference were not workmen of the Reserve Bank of India. Hence, the demand for their regularisation was unsustainable and they were not entitled to any relief. The court considered it unnecessary to go into the questions as to what extent propositions the no. (iii) and (iv) stated in Parimal Chandra, were required to be clarified or modified. The facts of the Parimal Chandra and Reserve Bank were quite similar and, in both the cases, it was not mandatory for the employers to provide canteens but the application of the principles stated in Parimal Chandra is irreconcilably at variance with Reserve Bank. In Coates of India, the court had to deal with the question, as to 'whether the workmen employed in the canteen run on the premises of the factory were the employees of the company'? The stand of the employer was that they were the employees of the contractor who was running the canteen in the factory premises. The court observed that some requirement under the Factories Act of providing a canteen in the industrial establishment was by itself not decisive of the question or sufficient to determine the status of the persons employed in the canteen. In these circumstances, the court refrained from expressing its opinion on the question in view of the findings of fact recorded by the High Court to the effect that the workmen were employed only by the contractors who were running the canteen and they were not the employees of the company. Thus, the court concluded that these workmen could not be held to be employed by the company. [61]

In Bombay Canteen Employees'Assn, in view of certain admission made by the employees, the Supreme Court took the view that such employees were not 'workmen' within the meaning of the definition of s 2(s) of the Act. Therefore, the industrial adjudication on a reference under s 10(1) of the Act was not permissible. The court, however, suggested that since the canteen was a statutory canteen, the remedy of approaching the administrative tribunal under s 19 of the Administrative Tribunals Act 1985 and the extraordinary remedy by way of writ petition under Art. 226 are available to such employees and it is open for them to resort to such remedies.[62] In State Bank of India, the Supreme Court held that the employees working in the canteens run by the local implementation committees at the branches of State Bank of India as per the welfare scheme of the bank were non-statutory and non-recognised canteens, and that the employees of such canteens would not become the employees of the bank as there was no statutory or contractual obligation or obligation, under the Sastri award, on the bank to run such canteens.[63] Even though postal department discharges sovereign functions, nevertheless the activity of running a departmental non-statutory canteen for the employees is not a sovereign activity, is severable and is an industry and the person employed as a cook in such a canteen is a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s).[64] Following the decision of the apex court rendered in Bombay Telephone CE Assn, the Bombay High Court held that, in terms of the notifications issued by the Government of India, all posts in the canteen and tiffin rooms run departmentally in the Central Government offices or establishments are civil posts, and hence, the employees cannot be called as 'workmen' within the meaning of s 2(s) of the ID Act.[65] In NTPC,[66] and MDNL,[67] Rajendra Babu J, relied upon a passage extracted from the SAIL case, which runs thus:

> We have gone thorough the decisions of this Court in VST Industries' case,[68]GB Pant University's case,[69] and Mohammed Aslam's case.[70] All of them relate to statutory liability to maintain the canteen by the principal employer in the factory/establishment. That is why in those cases, as in the Saraspur Mills' case,[71] the contract labour working in the canteen were treated as workers of the principal employer. These cases stand on a different footing and it is not possible to deduce from them the broad principle of law that on the contract labour system being abolished under sub-section (1) of section 10 of the CRLA Act (sic) the contract labour working in the establishment of the principal employer has to be absorbed as regular employees of the establishment. () ... An analysis of the cases, discussed above, shows that they fall in three classes: (i) where contract labour is engaged in or in connection with the work of an establishment and employment of contract labour is prohibited either because the industrial adjudicator/Court ordered abolition of contract labour or because the appropriate Government issued notification under section 10(1) of the CLRA Act, no automatic absorption of the contract labour working in the establishment was ordered; (ii) where the contract was found to be a sham and nominal, rather a camouflage, in which case the contract labour working in the establishment of the principal employer were held, in fact and in reality, the employees of the principal employer himself. Indeed, such cases do not relate to abolition of contract labour but present instances wherein the Court pierced the veil and declared the correct position as a fact at the stage after employment of contract labour stood prohibited; (iii) where in discharge of a statutory obligation of maintaining a canteen in an establishment the principal employer availed the services of a contractor the Courts have held that the contract labour would indeed be the employees of the principal employer."[72] ()

The reliance placed by Rajendra Babu J on the above observations of the Constitution Bench in SAIL case calls for some analysis. At the time of deciding Saraspur Mills, the Contract Labour Act was not in force, as the matter relating to its Constitutional validity was pending in the apex court. Hence, the facts of the said case or the decision rendered therein can be of no help in deciding the issues raised in MDNL and NTPC. In GB Pant University the facts disclosed that the employees working in the university cafeteria were not engaged through the medium of contractor, but were appointed by the Food Committee which had a specific role in the management and control of the cafeteria. The Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970 (CLRAA) was neither applicable to the case nor were the provisions of the said Act cited by counsel on either side before the Supreme Court. Hence, this decision too cannot throw any illuminating light on the cases at hand. In VST Industries, Rajendra Babu J (for self and Variava J), having quashed the writ of mandamus issued by the Andhra Pradesh High Court on the ground that it was beyond its jurisdiction, surprisingly allowed the said order to stay! The relevant observations of the learned judge are reproduced below:

> We do agree that the respondents have a strong case on merits. Since we have held that the High Court had no jurisdiction to entertain a petition under Article 226 of the Constitution, we would have set aside the order made by the High Court. However, in the special features of the case, although we do not agree with the High Court on the first question raised, we feel, after clarifying the legal position, that we should not disturb the decision given by the High Court. The appeal, therefore, stands dismissed subject to what is stated in regard to writs to be issued by the High Court in respect of persons or authorities exercising public duty or otherwise.[73] (Italics supplied).

Prima facie, this is a perverse decision for the reason that once it is held that the mandamus issued by the High Court was without jurisdiction, status quo ante stands automatically restored, and nothing would be left for the court to decide thereafter. It is true that the respondents had a strong case, but, then, where does the remedy lie - is it in the Constitution of India or in the Industrial Disputes Act? Having held that the High Court had no jurisdiction to entertain a petition under Art. 226, what was the provocation for the learned judge to allow the order of the High Court to stand?What are the so-called special features of the case that enchanted and persuaded the learned judge? Could it still be said that this can be classified as a 'judicial decision' properly so called? Reverting to the cases cited in SAIL and relied upon by Rajendra Babu J, the fourth one is that of Mohammed Aslam, which centred round the short question 'whether the employees in the unit-run canteens of defence services are government employees, and whether Central Administrative Tribunal had jurisdiction to entertain applications by them under the provisions of the Administrative Tribunals Act, 1985'. Again, CLRAA had no application to that case, and neither side had cited the Act nor had raised any issue thereunder. Thus, none of the cases referred to by Rajendra Babu J, barring VST Industries, was relevant to the issues raised in the case at hand, and VST Industries was decided by himself in a desolate manner, as explained above.

The mere fact that an employer is under a statutory obligation to provide for a canteen in his factory does not give rise to the further presumption that he is required to engage regular workers in running the canteen. Factories Act and Contract Labour Act serve different objects and the one has nothing to do with the other. With great respect, it has to be stated that Rajendra Babu J, has decided all the three cases, ie, VST Industries, MDNL and NTPC in a perfunctory manner, with absolutely no application of judicial mind. In striking contrast, the decision rendered by Ashok Bhan J in Haldia Refinery places the law in the proper perspective. The learned judge held that the mere fact that the management exercises effective control over the contractor in the running of the canteen does not mean that the employees working in the canteen become the employees of the management. The learned judge further observed that canteen employees would be employees of management only for limited purpose of Factories Act, and they cannot claim absorption or regularisation in the services of management.[74] It is submitted that Haldia Refinery lays down the correct law. In the event of any doubt as to the engagement of contract workers in statutory canteens, it will do well for any court at any level to follow Haldia Refinery and reject all the other three cases, namely, VST Industries, MDNL and NTPC outright as being perverse and absurd. In Rourkela Shramik Sangh, the litigagtion relating to the absorption of contract workers in the regular services of Rourkela Steel Plant had long history. In order to appreciate the issues raised in this case, it is necessary to take a look at the decision rendered in RK Panda, in which the workers of the Rourkela Steel Plant filed a writ petition before Supreme Court, inter alia, for a direction to the effect that that they were entitled to be paid the same pay as is paid to the regular employees; that they be treated as such on the premise that they had been employed by various contractors and were doing jobs which are perennial in nature and identical to what were being done by regular employees of the Plant. The relevant portion of the direction is reproduced below:

> (i) All labourers, who had been initially engaged through contractors but have been continuously working with the respondent for the last ten years on different jobs assigned to them in spite of the replacement and change of the contractors, shall be absorbed by the respondent, as their regular employees subject to being found medically fit and if they are below 58 years of age, which is the age of superannuation under the respondent.
>
> …
>
> (vi) The respondent shall be at liberty to retrench workmen so absorbed, in accordance with law. This order shall not be pleaded as a bar to such retrenchment.
>
> (vii) If there is any dispute in respect of the identification of the contract labourers to be absorbed as directed above, such dispute shall be decided by the Chief Labour Commissioner (Central), on material produced before him by the parties concerned.
>
> (viii) This direction shall be operative only in respect of 142 jobs out of 246 jobs, in view of the fact that contract labour has already been abolished in 104 jobs.[75]

The appellant workmen had filed interlocutory applications with the following prayers:

> (a) That the respondents be directed to regularize the service of all the workmen working in any of the 246 jobs at the time of filing of this petition and continuously working since then;
>
> (b) Clarify that the standards of medical fitness to be applied in case of these workmen should be the standards used for regular workmen for their retrenchment;
>
> (c) Clarify that this judgment dated 12-5-94 would also apply to those workmen who had been retrenched in 1990 and 1992 and have not yet been taken back in employment;
>
> (d) Direct the respondents to pay wages to those 292 workmen who were kept out of employment for the period 22-5-89 to 30-11-89, contrary to the orders of this Court.

The workmen did not press prayers (a) & (b), whereas in respect of prayers (c) & (d), the Supreme Court clarified that if any of the workmen is not absorbed/regularized despite this court's directions/orders, the workmen concerned would be at liberty to pursue any other remedy or may approach any other authority prescribed under law. Pursuant thereto 5340 applications were received and out of said applicants 2677 applicants were found eligible for absorption, whereas the remaining cases of 2663 workmen were referred to the CLC in terms of the said judgment. The CLC passed his detailed orders on January 4, 1995. Reverting to the present case, the interpretation placed by Delhi High Court on an order passed in RK Panda (supra), was challenged by the union before the Supreme Court. Dismissing the petition, Sinha J (for self, Khare and Lakshmanan JJ) held:

> ... the appellants were fully aware of the fact that they were required to approach the Industrial Tribunal in terms of the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act for ventilating their grievances. ... The order of this Court dated 16th October, 1995, as quoted supra, is absolutely clear and unambiguous.The term 'authority' used in this Court's order dated 16th October, 1995 must be read in the context in which it was used. The appellant in terms thereof could seek a reference which would mean a reference in terms of Section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. It could also approach 'the authority in accordance with law' which would mean authority under a statute. The High Court, by no stretch of imagination, can be an authority under a statute. ... Furthermore, even otherwise, a disputed question of fact normally would not be entertained in a writ proceeding. ... In any event, the orders of the Chief Labour Commissioner dated 4th January, 1995 also shows that other documents which were placed on record by the workmen had also been scrutinized and they had not been found reliable. ... We are, therefore, of the opinion that no case has been made out for interference with the impugned judgment.[76]

Burden of proof:

The burden of proof is on the workman to establish the employer-employee relationship. In other words, where a person asserts the relationship and it is denied by the employer, it is for him and not for the employer to prove the fact.[77] In order, therefore, to bring a dispute within the ambit of the definition of 'industrial dispute', the workmen have to plead and prove the relationship of employment between them and the employer in relation to an establishment, by adducing evidence before the tribunal. In discharging the burden, the workmen may call for the books of accounts or any other records or documents in possession of the employer. If he refuses to produce them an inference may be drawn against him that if the documents had been produced, they would have shown what the opposite party wanted to make out. But in the absence of a specific plea taken by the workmen that the employer-employee relationship exists between them and the employer, no adverse inference against the employer can be drawn from the fact that he did not produce his books of accounts.[78] Once the relationship of employer and employee is established, then it is for the employer to show that the employee concerned fails in one of the excepted categories and as such is not a workman.[79] The question, whether the relationship between the parties is one of employer and employee, is a pure question of fact.[80] But the status of a workman has to be inferred as a matter of law from the facts found and if the question involved is one of drawing a legal inference as to the status of a party from the facts found, that is not a pure question of fact. If the inference drawn by the tribunal in regard to the status of the workman involves the application of certain legal tests, that necessarily becomes a mixed question of fact and law.[81] The question, whether the relationship of employer and employee exists ought to be raised as a preliminary issue because on the determination of this issue will depend the validity of the reference. The mere fact that a preliminary issue is raised with respect to the existence of relationship does not mean that sufficient evidence should not be adduced by the parties in support of their respective contentions. In the absence of relationship of employer and employee, the reference will be invalid and the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute. But where tribunal after considering the evidence comes to the finding that such relationship exists, the writ court will normally not interfere with such a finding of fact.[82] However, the issue being a jurisdictional issue will be amenable to judicial review, if the finding is manifestly or obviously erroneous or perverse.[83]

---

44 Novex Dry Cleaners v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 271 [LNIND 1962 SC 50] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

45 Thomas Duff and Co (India) Ltd v Fourth IT 1983 Lab IC 1243, 1248-49 (Cal) (DB), per MK Mukherjee J.

46 Mgmt of Kirlampudi Sugar Mills Ltd v Industrial Tribunal (1971) 2 LLJ 491 [LNIND 1971 SC 414], 503 (SC) : (1973) 3 SCC 626 [LNIND 1971 SC 414], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

47 Mgmt of Shri CVKUS Mandali Ltd v IC (1979) 2 LLJ 383 [LNIND 1979 SC 357], 392 (SC), per Kailasam J.

48 TM Abdul Rahim & Co v North Arcot DBW Union (1958) 2 LLJ 736 (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

49 Airlines Hotel Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1961 SC 16], 666 (SC) AIR 1962 SC 676 [LNIND 1961 SC 16]: 1961 (3) FLR85:, per Das Gupta J.

50 Cochin State Power, Light Corpn Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 100 [LNIND 1963 SC 143] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

51 KEH Abdul Samad Saheb & Co v IT (1963) 1 LLJ 504, 507 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

52 Bangur Bros Ltd v Govt of West Bengal (1961) 2 LLJ 351, 359-60 (Cal), per Sinha J.

53 Workmen of Shri Bajrang Jute Mills v The Employers (1970) 2 LLJ 6 (SC), per Vaidialimgam J.

54 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, chap 13, p 38, para 6.32.

55 State of Rajasthan v Ganeshi Lal AIR 2008 SC 690 [LNIND 2007 SC 1440]:: [2007] 1 SCR 1197 [LNIND 2007 SC 1440] : 2008 (2) SCC 533 [LNIND 2007 SC 1440] : 2007 (13) JT 423 : 2007 (14) SCALE 61 [LNIND 2007 SC 1440], per Pasayat J.

56 Hutchiah v Karnataka State Road Transport Corpn (1983) 1 LLJ 30, 36 (Kant) (DB), per Rama Jois J.

57 Elumalai v Mgmt of Simplex Concrete Piles (India) Ltd (1970) 2 LLJ 454 (Mad) : 1970-83-LW 317, per Ismail J.

58 Hutchiah v Karnataka State Road Transport Corpn (1983) 1 LLJ 30, 37 (Kant) (DB), per Rama Jois J.

59 SK Verma v Mahesh Chandra 1983 Lab IC 1483 [LNIND 1983 SC 233], 1485 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

60 Sarabhai Chemicals v Subhas N Pandya (1984) 2 LLJ 75, 77 (Guj) (DB), per Poti CJ.

61 Satyendra Singh Rathore v Rajasthan Rajya Pathya Pustak Mandal Jaipur (1989) 2 LLJ 289, 292 (Raj) (DB), per Byas J.

62 R Antony v Renusagar Power Co Ltd (1996) 2 LLJ 329 [LNIND 1995 ALL 886] (All), per VN Mehrotra J.

63 RG Makwana v Gujarat SRTC (1987) 1 LLJ 172 -73 (Guj) (DB), per Kokulakrishnan CJ.

64 Dy Executive Engineer v Prafulbhai V Virda (2008) 2 LLJ 958 (Guj), per Rathod J.

65 Kamyani Vidya Mandir v Sangeeta Eknath Sanghpal (2008) 1 LLJ 712 [LNIND 2007 BOM 1145] (Bom) : 2007 (6) Bom CR50.

66 Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, 1986, 5th ed, Vol 1, p 159.

67 Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol 16, p 377.

68 Cf R v Edingale (Inhabitants) [1930] 1 QB & C 379.

69 Employees' State Insurance Corpn v Tata Engineering & Locomotive Co Ltd (1976) 1 LLJ 81 [LNIND 1975 SC 393] (SC), per PK Goswami J.

70 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 161-3.

71 Employees 'State Insurance Corpn v Tata Engg & Locomotive Co Ltd (1976) 1 LLJ 81 [LNIND 1975 SC 393], 85 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 66 [LNIND 1975 SC 393]: (1975) 2 SCC 835 [LNIND 1975 SC 393], per PK Goswami J.

72 Hanuman Prasad Choudhary v Rajasthan SEB 1986 Lab IC 1014 (Raj) per SC Agrawal J.

73 Cf, Deep Chand v State of Uttar Pradesh AIR 1959 SC 648 [LNIND 1959 SC 31,665 per SR Das CJI.

74 Narinder Kumar v State of Punjab 1985 Lab IC 541 -42, per Chandrachud CJI.

75 Mgmt of Tungabhadra Sugar Works Pvt Ltd v LC 1983 Lab IC 1185, 1187-88 (Kant) (DB), per Malimath J.

76 Patel P Somnath v Gujarat State LDC Ltd 1992 Lab IC 2370, 2380-81 (Guj), per SD Shah J.

77 Abdul Aziz v Rajasthan SRTC [1992] 2 WLC 558 (Raj).

78 Rajasthan SRTC v Jagdish Vyas (1995) 2 LLJ 387 -88 (Raj) (DB): [1995(70)FLR723].

79 Rajasthan SRTC v Mahavir Singh (1999) 2 LLN 609 (Raj), per Chauhan J.

80 Gujarat Electricity Board v Ballkhan D Joya (2000) 3 LLN 747 (Guj), per Bhatt J.

81 Textile traders Cooperative Bank Ltd v JN Patel (2000) 3 LLN 766 (Guj), per Rathor J.

82 Ram D Paswan v LC (1999) 2 LLN 571 (Pat) (DB), per Sharma J.

83 UP State Electricity Board v PO, LC (2003) 3 LLJ 88 (All) : (2002) 5 AWC 3956, per Vineet Saran J.

84 UP State Electricity Board v AK Shukla (2003) 2 LLJ 1013 [LNIND 2003 ALL 504] (All) : (2003) 3 AWC 2266 [LNIND 2003 ALL 504], per Dr Chauhan J.

85 Trambak Rubber Industries Ltd v Nashik Workers' Union (2003) 3 LLJ 226 [LNIND 2003 SC 556] (SC),: AIR 2003 SC 3329 [LNIND 2003 SC 556]: (2003) 6 SCC 416 per Reddi J.

86 Nashik Workers Union v Trimbak Rubber Industries (2002) 1 LLN 861 (Bom), per Chandrachud J.

87 Mgmt of Audco India Ltd v PO, Principal LC (2009) 3 LLJ 700 (Mad)

88 State of Haryana v Satish Kumar (2013) 3 LLJ 281 (P&H), per RN Raina J.

89 UP State Electricity Board v Shiv Mohan Singh, AIR 2004 SC 5009 [LNIND 2004 SC 1025]: 2004 (Supp-4) SCR 953 : 2004 (8) SCC 402 [LNIND 2004 SC 1025], per Mathur J.

90 National Small Industries Ltd v V Lakshminarayanan (2007) I LLJ SC 571(SC), per Kabir J.

91 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, p 164

92 Assam Oil Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) I LLJ 587 (590) (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1264 [LNIND 1960 SC 108]: 1960 (1) FLR 190 : [1960] 3 SCR 457 [LNIND 1960 SC 108], per Gajendragadkar J.

93 CMD, Mahanadi Coal Fields Ltd v Sadashib Behera, (2005) I LLJ 870(SC) : (2005) 2 SCC 396 [LNIND 2005 SC 14] : (2005) SCC (LS) 289 : [2005] 1 SCR 60 [LNIND 2005 SC 14], per Mathur J.

94 Workmen of Swatantra Bharat Mills v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 1235 (Del), per GC Jain J.

95 Basti Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Ujagar (1963) 2 LLJ 447 [LNIND 1963 SC 93] (SC) AIR 1964 SC 355 [LNIND 1963 SC 93]: 1963 (7) FLR253, per Das Gupta J.

1 Saraspur Mills Co Ltd v Ramanlal Chimanlal (1973) 2 LLJ 130 [LNIND 1973 SC 128], 132-33 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 2297 [LNIND 1973 SC 128]: 1973 (26) FLR 294 : (1973) 14 GLR 948 : 1973 Lab IC 1040 [LNIND 1973 SC 128] : (1974) 3 SCC 66 [LNIND 1973 SC 128], per Grover J.

2 JK Cotton Spg and Wvg Mills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 157], 440-441 (SC), per Gajendragadar J.

3 Workmen of Food Corpn of India v Food Corpn of India (1985) 2 LLJ 4 [LNIND 1985 SC 71], 9 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 670 [LNIND 1985 SC 71]: 1985 (1) SCALE 344 [LNIND 1985 SC 71] : (1985) 2 SCC 136 [LNIND 1985 SC 71], per Desai J.

4 Jaya Nand v Hindustan Machine Tools Ltd (2002) 3 LLN 504 (P&H), per Anan d J.

5 Telco Convoy Drivers Mazdoor Sangh v PO, IT (2001) 4 LLN 1084 Ohar), per Eqbal J.

6 Ready Mixed Concrete Ltd v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 2 WLR 775 (QB), per Mackenna J.

7 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1958, Vol 25, 3rd ed, p 448.

8 Bonham v Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Co Ltd [1945] KB 292, 300 (CA), per Uthwatt J.

9 Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd v State of Saurashtra (1957) 1 LLJ 477 [LNIND 1956 SC 99], 480 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

10 Vamplew v Parkgate Iron and Steel Co [1903] 1 KB 851 (CA).

11 Thorn v London Corpn [1875] LR 10 Exch 112,123.

12 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1958, Vol 25, 3rd ed, pp 455-56, para 884.

13 Thacker Coal and Coke Co v Burke 5 LRA (NS) 1091-98, Annotated cases 885.

14 Pugmire v Oregon Short Line R Co 13 LRA (NS) 565; 14 Annotated cases 384.

15 R v Pendleton (Inhabitants) [1812], 15 East 449, 453-54, per Lord Ellenborough CJ.

16 R v Lyth (Inhabitants) [1793] 5 Term Rep 327-29, per Lord Kanyon CJ.

17 Gregory-Stoke Parish v Pitmister [1726] 2 Sess Cas KB 132.

18 Fisk v Pollard [1920] AR 39; Lopes v Marino [1939] AR 188.

19 Roundabout Ltd v Beirne [1959] IR 423.

20 Kassler's Estate 41 Am St rep 74.

21 Davis v Industrial Commission 15 AIR 732.

22 CB Labatt, Master and Servant, 1913, p 9.

23 35 American Jurisprudence, Ist ed, p 445.

24 National Labour Relations Board v Hearst Publications 88 L Ed 1170, 1178, per Rutledge J.

25 Stevenson Jordan & Harrison Ltd v Macdonald and Evans [19 5211 TLR 101, 111 (CA), per Denning LJ.

26 35 Arnrican Jurisprudence, 445-46, s 3.

27 Chintaman Rao v State of Madhya Pradesh (1958) 2 LLJ 252 [LNIND 1958 SC 11], 256 (SC), per Subba Rao J.

28 Mersey Docks & Harbour Brd v Coggins & Griffith Liverpool Ltd [1947] AC 1 (CA), per Lord Porter.

29 Ibid, 14 per Lord Mcmillan.

30 Argent v Minister of Social Security [1968] 1 WLR 1749 (QB), per Roskill J.

31 Whittaker v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1966] 3 All ER 531, 537 (QBD), per Mocatta J.

32 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1958, Vol 25, 3rd ed, p 498.

33 Shankar Balaji Waje v State of Maharashtra (1962) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1961 SC 342], 124 (SC), per Raghubar Dayal J.

34 Collins v Hertfordshire County Council [1947] 1 All ER 633, 638. .

35 Stevenson, Jordan & Harrison Ltd v Macdonald & Evans [1952] 1 TLR 101, 111 (CA), per Lord Denning LJ.

36 Bank Voor Handel Scheepvaart v Slatford [1951] 2 All ER 779, per Denning LJ.

37 Hedley v Pinkney & Sons Steamrhip Co [1892] 1 QB 58, per Lord Esher, MR.

38 Inglefield v Macey [1966-67] 1, Knights (Indus) Rep 146, per Ashworth J.

39 Zuijs v Wirth Bros Proprietary Ltd [1955] 93 CLR 561, 571.

40 Hedley v Pinkney & Sons Steamship Co [1892] 1 QB 58, per Lord Esher MR.

41 Morren v Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 1 WLR 576, 582, per Lord Parker CJ.

42 Zuijs v Wirth Bros Proprietary Ltd [1955] 93 CLR 561, 571.

43 Hedley v Pinkney & Som Steamship Co [1892] 1 QB 58, per Lord Esher MR.

44 Performing Right Society v Mitchell & Booker Ltd [1924] 1 KB 762, 767, per Mccardie J.

45 Birdhichand Sharma v First Civil Judge, Nagpur (1961) 2 LLJ 86 [LNIND 1960 SC 326]-87 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

46 Ready Mixed Concrete Ltd v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance 1 [1968] 2 WLR 775, per Mackenna J.

47 Atiyah, Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts, 1967 ed, pp 37-38.

48 Argent v Minister of Social Social Security [1968) 1 WLR 1749 (QB), per Roskill J.

49 Otto Kahn Freund in [1951] 14 Modern Law Review, 505.

50 Whittaker v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1966] 3 All ER 531, 537 (QBD), per Mocana J.

51 Argent v Minister of Social Security [1968] 1 WLR 1749 (QB), per Roskill J.

52 Short v J & W Henderson Ltd [1946] AC 24, 33-34 (HL), per Lord Thankerton.

53 Halsbury's Laws of England, 1958, Vol 25, 3rd ed, p 498.

54 Perfoming Right Society Ltd v Mitchell & Booker Ltd [1924]1 KB 762, per Mc Cardie J.

55 Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v Coggins & Griffth, Liverpool Ltd [1947] AC 1, 12 (CA).

56 Collins v Hertfordshire County Council [1947] 1 All ER 633 (KBD), per Hillberry J.

57 Cassidy v Ministry of Health [1951] 1 All ER 574, 579 (CA), per Somervell LJ.

58 OKahn Freund(1951) 14 MLR 504, 505-06.

59 Morren v Swinton and Pendlebury Borough Council [1965] 1 WLR 576, 582, per Lord Parker CJ.

60 Market Investigations Ltd v Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 WLR 1 (QB), per Cooke J.

61 Stevenson, J&H Ltd v Macdonald and Evani [1952] 1 TLR 101, 111 (CA), per Lord Denning LJ.

62 Bank Voor Handel Scheepvaart v Slatford [1953] 1 QB 248, 295, per Lord Denning LJ.

63 Ready MC (SE) Ltd v Minister of P&NI [1968] 2 WLR 775 (QB), per Mackenna J.

64 Argent v Minister of Social Security [1968] 1 WLR 1749, 1759 (QB), per Roskill J.

65 Happle BA and O' Higgins, Paul, pp 16-18.

66 National Labour Relations Board v Hearst Publication, 88 L Ed 1170.

67 35 American Jurisprudence, Ist ed, pp 445-46, s 3.

68 United States v Silk 91 L Ed 1757 : 331 US 304, per Reed J.

69 Ibid, 319.

70 Moody v Industrial Accidents Commission 60 ALR 299.

71 Published by the American Law Institute.

72 Atiya, Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts, 1967 ed, 64-65.

73 Queensland SPLTD v Federal Commr of Taxation [1954] 70 CLR 539, 552, per Lord Dixon J.

74 Humberstone v Northern Timber Mills [1949] 79 CLR 389, 404, per Dixon J.

75 Ready Mixed Concrete (SE) Ltd v Minister of P & N Insurance [1968] 2 WLR 775, 798 (QBD), per Mackenna J.

76 Zuijs v Wirth Bros Proprietary Ltd [1955] 93 CLR 561, 571.

77 Montreal Locomotive Works Ltd v Montreal and Att Gen for Canada [1947] 1 DLR 161(PC).

78 Ready Mixed Concrete (SE) Ltd v Minister of P & N Insurance [1968] 2 WLR 775, 798 (QBD), per Mackenna J.

79 Shivanandan Sharma v Punjab National Bank Ltd (1955) 1 LLJ 688 [LNIND 1955 SC 23], 696 (SC) : AIR 1955 SC 404 [LNIND 1955 SC 23]: C, [1955] 1 SCR 1427 [LNIND 1955 SC 23], per Sinha J.

80 Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd v State of Saurashtra (1957) 1 LLJ 477 [LNIND 1956 SC 99], 480-81 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 264 [LNIND 1956 SC 99]: [1957] 1 SCR 152 [LNIND 1956 SC 99], per Bhagwati J.

81 Short v J & W Henderson Ltd [1946] AC 24 ,33-34 (HL), per Lord Thankerton.

82 Cf, Cassidy v Ministry of Health [1951 J 1 All ER 574 per Somervell LJ.

83 Simmom v Health Laundry Co [1910] 1 KB 543, 549-50, per Fletcher-Moulten LJ.

84 Chintaman Rao v State of Madhya Pradesh (1958) 2 LLJ 252 [LNIND 1958 SC 11], 257 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 388 [LNIND 1958 SC 11]: (1958) 28 AWR 638 : 1958 Cr LJ 80, per Subba Rao J.

85 Shankar Balaji Waje v State of Maharashtra (1962) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1961 SC 342], 124 (SC), per Raghubar Dayal J.

86 VP Gopala Rao v Public Prosecutor (1970) 2 LLJ 59 [LNIND 1969 SC 100], 62 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 66 [LNIND 1969 SC 100]: 1970 Cr LJ 22 : (1969) 1 SCC 704 [LNIND 1969 SC 100], per Bachawat J.

87 Silver Jubilee Tailoring House v Chief Inspector of Shops and Establishments (1973) 2 LLJ 495 [LNIND 1973 SC 289], 50l : AIR 1974 SC 37 [LNIND 1973 SC 289]: 1974 (1) An WR 95 : (1974) 1 MLJ 95 [LNIND 1973 SC 289] : (1974) 3 SCC 498 [LNIND 1973 SC 289].

88 Shining Tailors v Industrial Tribunal (1983) 2 LLJ 413 [LNIND 1983 SC 221]-15 (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 23 [LNIND 1983 SC 221]: 1983 Lab IC 1509 [LNIND 1983 SC 221] : 1983 (2) SCALE 397 [LNIND 1983 SC 221] : (1983) 4 SCC 464 [LNIND 1983 SC 221], per Desai J.

89 Employers in Relation to PNB v Ghulam Dastagir (1978) 1 LLJ 312 [LNIND 1978 SC 3], 314 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

90 Hussainbhai v Alath Factory, Tezhilali Union 1978 Lab IC 1264, 1265 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

91 Kerala State Coir Corpn Ltd v Industrial Tribunal (1995) 1 LLJ 951, 952 (Ker) :: ILR 1995 (1) Kerala 706 [LNIND 1994 KER 342]: 1985 (1) KLJ 209, per KT Thomas J.

92 Atam Parkash v State of Haryana (1998) 1 LLN 661 (P&H), per Chalapathi J.

93 Nestle India Ltd v PO, LC (2002) 1 LLN 415 (P&H), per Gill J.

1 Indian Banks Assn v Workmen of Syndicate Bank (2001) 2 LLN 25 (31) (SC), per Variava J.

2 Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd v State of Saurashtra (1975) 1 LLJ 477 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

3 DC Dewan Mohideen Sahib & Sons v United Bidi Warders' Union (1964) 2 LLJ 633 [LNIND 1964 SC 129] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

4 Modern Match Industries v LAT (1958) 1 LLJ 69 (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

5 Shivnandan Sharma v Punjab National Bank Ltd (1955) 1 LLJ 688 [LNIND 1955 SC 23] (SC), per Sinha J.

6 Re AM Chinniah (1957) 1 LLJ 280 [LNIND 1956 MAD 173] (Mad), per Ramaswami J.

7 Kanpur Mill Mazdoor Union v Muir Mills Co Ltd (1955) 2 LLJ 537 (LAT).

8 Badjampura Salt Factory v Workers (1959) 1 LLJ 544 (AP), per Srinivasachari J.

9 Chandrabali v Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd (1965) 2 LLJ 214 (Pat)(DB).

10 Madurai General Workers' Union v Brinda Textiles Handloom Factory (1968) 2 LLJ 101 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

11 Silver Jubilee Tailoring House v Chief Inspector of Shops and Establishments (1973) 2 LLJ 495 [LNIND 1973 SC 289] (SC), per Mathew J.

12 Madan Beedi Depot v IT (1974) 1 LLJ 436 (Ker), per MU Isaac J.

13 Employers in relation to the Punjab National Bank v Ghulam Dastagir (1978) 1 LLJ 312 [LNIND 1978 SC 3] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

14 Workmen of Swatantra Bharat Mills Canteen v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 1235 (Del) per GC Jain J.

15 Mgmt of Indian Bank v PO, IT (1990) 1 LLJ 50 [LNIND 1989 MAD 388], 58 (Mad) (DB), per Srinivasan J.

16 Shankar Balaji Waje v State of Maharashtra (1962) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1961 SC 342] (SC), per Raghubar Dayal J.

17 Re M Ratnaswami Mudaliar (1959) 1 LLJ 631 [LNIND 1958 MAD 109] (Mad) (DB), per Panchapakesa Ayyar J.

18 TN Lakshmipathi (Dr) v Standard Vacuum Oil Co Ltd (1961) 2 LLJ 767 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

19 K Kesava Reddiar v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 645 [LNIND 1957 MAD 12] (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

20 Achutha Achar v Sharda Jewellery Mart (1968) 1 LLJ 500 (Mys) (DB), per Somnath Ayyar J.

21 Hamilton Jewellery Workmen Union v Hamilton & Co Ltd[1956] LAC 462(LAT).

22 Rashtriya Mazdoor Sabha v Modi Oil Mills (1955) 2 LLJ 163 (LAT).

23 Abad Dairy Dudh Vitaran Kendra Sanchalak Mandal v State of Gujarat 1989 Lab IC 1770 (Guj) (DB) per RJ Shah J.

24 Indian Sulphacid Industries Ltd v LC (1993) 1 LLJ 496, 498 (P&H), per HS Bedi J.

25 Mgmt of Puri Urban Coop Bank v Madhusudan Sahu (1992) 2 LLJ 6 [LNIND 1992 SC 365], 7 (SC) : AIR 1992 SC 1452 [LNIND 1992 SC 365]: 74 (1992) CLT 50 : [1992] (65) FLR 805 : 1992 (1) SCALE 1059 : (1992) 3 SCC 323 [LNIND 1992 SC 365], per Punchhi J.

26 Critical note on this judgment by BR Dolia, Editor, LLJ (1992) 2 LLJ 8 .

27 General Manager, Indian Overseas Bank v All India Overseas Bank Employees Union AIR 2006 SC 1699 [LNIND 2006 SC 2017]:: (2006) 3 LLJ 773 [LNIND 2006 SC 631] : 2006 LIC 3502 : (2006) 7 SCC 330 [LNIND 2006 SC 631], per Pasayat J.

28 Electronics Corpn of India Ltd v ECISE Union AIR 2006 SC 2996 [LNIND 2006 SC 631], per Pasayat J.

29 JK Jute Mills Co Ltd v Workmen 10 FJR 228 (LAT).

30 Newspaper Publishers Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 315 (Mys), per Sadasivayya J.

31 Vishnu Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Bihar (1966) 1 LLJ 777 (Pat) (DB).

32 Bokaro Steel Plant v PO, LC (1999) 3 LLN 1143 (Pat), per Raj J.

33 Suti Mill Mazdoor Sabha v BIC Ltd (1957) 1 LLJ 297 (LAT).

34 See, notes under s 2(j).

35 Bilash Chandra Mitra v Balmerlawrie and Co (1953) 1 LLJ 337 [LNIND 1952 CAL 141] (Cal), per Bose J.

36 Mineral Export Corpn EU v Mineral Exploration Corpn AIR 2007 SC (Supp) 1837, per Lakshmanan J.

37 Rajaram Rokade & Bros v Shriram Chintaman Warkar 1977 Lab IC 1594 (Bom) (DB), per Dharmadhikari J.

38 PN Gulati v Presiding Officer, LC, Gorakhpur 1977 Lab IC 1088 (All) (DB) per Seth J.

39 Govindbhai Kanabhai Maru v NK Desai 1988 Lab IC 505 [LNIND 1987 GUJ 8], 507 (Guj), per Qureshi J.

40 Yashwant Singh Yadav v State of Rajasthan 1990 Lab IC 1451 (Raj) (DB), per Byas J.

41 G Rangdmannar Chetty, Proprietor, Sri Satyanarayana Rice Mill v IT AIR 1960 AP 371 [LNIND 1959 AP 124].

42 WHD' Cruz & Sons v ME Thomas (1996) 1 LLJ 706, 712 (Ker) :: [1995 (71) FLR 398]: ILR 1996 (1) Kerala 132, per Kamat J.

43 AK Selvaraj v PO, LC (1998) 4 LLN 351 (Mad), per Jagadeesan J.

44 State of Rajasthan v Lal Bahadur Yadav (2002) 3 LLN 1205 (Raj), per Chauhan J.

45 Municipal Board, Pratapgarh v LC (2003) 4 LLJ 223 (Raj), per SK Garg J.

46 Divisional Mgr, New India Assurance Co Ltd v A Sankaralingam AIR 2009 SC 309 [LNIND 2008 SC 1975]: (2008) 10 SCC 698 [LNIND 2008 SC 1975] : (2009) 1 LLJ 602 [LNIND 2008 SC 1975] : 2009 LIC 151, per Bedi J.

47 Devinder Singh v Municipal Council, Sanaur AIR 2011 SC 2532 [LNIND 2011 SC 406]:: (2011) 6 SCC 584 [LNIND 2011 SC 406] : 2011 (5) JT 333 : 2011 (4) SCALE 631 [LNIND 2011 SC 406] : (2011) 3 LLJ 1 [LNIND 2011 SC 406] : 2011 LIC 2799, per Singhvi J.

48 Rapson v Cubbil [1942] 9 M&W 710; Overton v Freeman [1952] II CB 867, 873, per Maule J.

49 Cf, Halsbury's Laws of England, 1958, Vol 25, 3rd ed, p 448, para 871 'Characteristics of the relationship'.

50 India Gen. Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1966) 1 LLJ 735 [LNIND 1965 SC 284] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

51 Sri Goenka Mills v Shiupur Mill Mazdoor Sangh (1954) 1 LLJ, 149 (LAT).

52 Chotanagpur Coal Fields Workers' Union v Karagati Colliery (1952) 2 LLJ 23 (LAT).

53 Punjab Sugar Mills Co Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1960) 1 LLJ 756 [LNIND 1959 ALL 219] (All) (DB AIR 1960 All 444 [LNIND 1959 ALL 219]), per Dwivedi J.

54 JK Cotton Spg and Weaving Mills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 157] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

55 United Beedi Workers' Union v Janab SA Hussain & Sons (1964) 1 LLJ 285 (Mad) (DB), per Ramchandra Ayyar CJ.

56 UP Sugar &CDC Ltd v Chini Mill Mazdoor Sangh AIR 2009 SC 387 [LNIND 2008 SC 1929]: (2008) 9 SCC 544 [LNIND 2008 SC 1929] : (2009) 1 LLJ 595 [LNIND 2008 SC 1929] : 2009 LIC 905, per Altamas Kabir J.

57 MMR Khan v Union of India (1990) Supp SCC 191 per Sawant J.

58 All India Rly Institute Employees Assn v Union of India (1991) 2 LLJ 265 [LNIND 1990 SC 112] (SC) : AIR 1990 SC 952 [LNIND 1990 SC 112]: 1990 (1) SCALE 295 : (1990) 2 SCC 542 [LNIND 1990 SC 112], per Sawant J.

59 Parimal Chandra Raha v Life Insurance Corpn of India (1995) 2 LLJ 339 [LNIND 1995 SC 456], 350 (SC) : AIR 1995 SC 1666 [LNIND 1995 SC 456]: (1996) 1 Cal LT 22(SC) : 1995 (2) SCALE 518 : 1995 Supp (2) SCC 611, per Sawant J.

60 Mgmt of Reserve Bank of India v Workmen (1996) 2 LLJ 42 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 1241 [LNIND 1996 SC 2794]: 1996 Lab IC 1048 : 1996 (2) SCALE 708 [LNIND 1996 SC 2794] : (1996) 3 SCC 267 [LNIND 1996 SC 2794], per Paripoornan J.

61 Workmen of the Canteen of Coates of India Ltd v Coates of India Ltd AC No 3479 of 1987 (1996) (SC).

62 Bombay Canteen Employees'Assn v Union of India (1997) 6 SCC 723 [LNIND 1997 SC 904] : AIR 1997 SC 2817 [LNIND 1997 SC 904]: JT 1997 (6) SC 57 : (1997) 2 LLJ 647 (SC), per K Rarnaswsamy J.

63 State Bank of India v SBICE Union (2000) 1 LLJ 1441 [LNIND 2000 SC 673] 1453, 55 (SC) : AIR 2000 SC 1518 [LNIND 2000 SC 673]: 2000 (3) SCALE 290 : (2000) 5 SCC 531 [LNIND 2000 SC 673], per Shah J.

64 Union of India v IT (1998) 2 LLN 926 (Mad), per Jayasimha Babu J.

65 Bombay TCE Assn v Union of India (1997) 2 LLN 1038 (SC)

66 National Thermal Power Corpn v Karri Bothuraju AIR 2003 SC 3647 [LNIND 2003 SC 664]: (2003) 7 SCC 384 : 2003 (7) JT 149 : 2003 (6) SCALE 04 : (2003) 3 LLJ 567 [LNIND 2003 SC 664] : 2003 LIC 3120, per Rajendra Babu J.

67 Mishra Dhatu Nigam Ltd v M Venkataiah AIR 2003 SC 3124 [LNIND 2003 SC 663]: (2003) 7 SCC 488 : (2003) 3 LLJ 847 [LNIND 2003 SC 663], per Rajendra Babu J.

68 VST Industries Ltd v VSTI Workers Union (2001) I LLJ 470(474-5) (SC) : (2001) 1 SCC 298 [LNIND 2000 SC 1796], per Rajendra Babu J.

69 GB Pant University of Agriculture and Technology v State of UP AIR 2000 SC 2695 [LNIND 2000 SC 1098]: (2000) 7 SCC 109 [LNIND 2000 SC 1098] : (2000) 2 LLJ 1109 [LNIND 2000 SC 1098] : 2000 LIC 2893, per Banerjee J.

70 Union of India v M Aslam AIR 2001 SC 526 [LNIND 2001 SC 40]: (2001) 1 SCC 720 [LNIND 2001 SC 40], per Pattanaik J.

71 Saraspur Mills Ltd v Ramanlal Chimanlal AIR 1973 SC 2297 [LNIND 1973 SC 128]: 1973 Lab IC 1040 [LNIND 1973 SC 128] : (1973) 2 LLJ 130 [LNIND 1973 SC 128] SC : (1974) 3 SCC 66 [LNIND 1973 SC 128]per Grover J.

72 SAIL v National Union of Waterfront Workers AIR 2001 SC 3527 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870]: (2001) 7 SCC 1 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870] : (2001) 2 LLJ 1087 [LNIND 2001 SC 1870] : 2001 LIC 3656, per Quadri J.

73 VST Industries Ltd v VSTI Workers Union (2001) I LLJ 470 (474-5) (SC) : (2001) 1 SCC 298 [LNIND 2000 SC 1796], per Rajendra Babu J.

74 Haldia Refinery Canteen Employees Union v IOC Ltd AIR 2005 SC 2412 [LNIND 2005 SC 443]: (2005) 5 SCC 51 [LNIND 2005 SC 443], per Ashok Bhan J.

75 RK Panda v Steel Authority of India Ltd 1994 AIR SCW 2460, per NP Singh J.

76 Rourkela Shramik Sangh v Steel Authority of India Ltd, AIR 2003 SC 1060 [LNIND 2003 SC 120]: (2003) 4 SCC 317 [LNIND 2003 SC 120], per Sinha J.

77 Swapan Das Gupta v First LC 1976 Lab IC 202 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

78 NC John v Secretary TTS & CE Workers' Union 1973 Lab IC 398, 402 (Ker), per Isaac J.

79 Rallis India Ltd v State of West Bengal (1983) 2 LLJ 293, 296 (Cal), per Amitabha Dutta J.

80 Dharangadhara Chemical Works Ltd v State of Saurashtra (1957) 1 LLJ 477 [LNIND 1956 SC 99], 482 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

81 Lloyds Bank Ltd v Panna Lal Gupta (1961) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1960 SC 279],21-22 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Reckitt & Coleman of India Ltd v Fifth IT 1980 Lab IC 92,94 (Cal) (DB), per MM Dun J.

83 Lloyds Bank Ltd v Panna Lal Gupta (1961) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1960 SC 279],21-22 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER I Preliminary

S. 2. Definitions.—

Contract Labour (Regulation & Abolition) Act 1970:

The principles enunciated in the earlier dicta have been incorporated in the Contract Labour (Regulation & Abolition) Act 1970. It has been enacted by the Parliament for regulating the employment of contract labour in certain establishments and to provide for its abolition, in certain circumstances, and for matters connected therewith. The Act came into force on and from 5 September 1970 and it applies to:

(a) every establishment in which 20 or more workmen are employed or were employed as contract labour on any day of the preceding 12 months; and

(b) to every contractor who employs or employed on any day of the preceding 12 months 20 or more workmen.

The Act further gives liberty to the 'appropriate government' to apply its provisions to any establishment employing such number of workmen less than 20 as may be specified in the notification. The Preamble declares that the statute has been enacted for two purposes, viz:

(a) to regulate the employment of contract labour; and

(b) to provide for its 'abolition' in certain circumstances and for matters connected therewith.

It is evident that the Act does not contemplate the total abolition of contract labour system. It provides for its abolition only in certain circumstances and to regulate employment of 'contract labour' in certain establishments. In other words, while realising the need for abolishing the contract labour system in certain circumstances, the Parliament also felt the need to continue it in other circumstances by properly regulating the same. It makes specifically clear that the Act will not apply to an establishment in which work, only of intermittent or casual nature, is performed. The Act makes provisions for registration of establishments employing contract labour and licensing of contractors. It also contains provisions ensuring the welfare and health of the contract labour by providing canteens, rest rooms, first aid facilities. It makes the principal employer ultimately responsible for seeing that the provisions of the Act are complied with and the payment of wages made to the contract labour. It also empowers the 'appropriate government' to prohibit the employment of contract labour under certain circumstances. The Central Government has made rules in exercise of the powers under the Act namely Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Rules 1971 which were brought into force wef 10 February 1971.

From the provisions of the Act and scheme of the rules, it is evident that every contractor engaging contract labour for the establishment, is required to obtain a registration certificate and licence respectively from the authorities under the Act. Furthermore, if the contract labour is employed for doing the same type of job as is done by the direct employees of the principal employer, the same wages are to be paid and the same facilities are to be given to the contract labour as are being paid or given to the direct employees. The contravention of the provisions of the Act, the rules and the conditions of the licenses granted to the contractor is made a penal offence. Section 10 empowers the 'appropriate government' to prohibit employment of contract labour in any process, operation or other work in any establishment, after consultation with the central board or the state board, as the case may be, by notification in the Official Gazette. Before issuing the notification prohibiting the employment of contract labour in any establishment, the 'appropriate government' shall have regard to the conditions of work and benefits provided for the contract labour in the establishment and other relevant factors such as:

(a) whether the process, operation or other work is incidental to or necessary for the industry, trade, business, manufacture or occupation that is carried on in the establishment;

(b) whether it is of a perennial nature, ie, it is of sufficient duration having regard to the nature of the industry, trade, business, manufacture or occupation carried on in the establishment;

(c) whether it is done ordinarily through regular workmen in that establishment or an establishment similar thereto; and

(d) whether it is sufficient to employ considerable number of whole-time workers.

The explanation to that section makes the decision of the 'appropriate government' final with regard to the question: whether the process, operation or other work is of perennial nature? The effect of non-registration of an establishment under the Act is that the establishment cannot employ contract labour. So also, the effect of non-licensing of the contractor is that the contractor is precluded from undertaking or executing any work through contract labour. The constitutional validity of the Act has been upheld by the Supreme Court in Gammon India.[84]The effect of this Act on the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunals, to adjudicate upon disputes relating to abolition of contract labourer the absorption of such labour by the principal employer was considered by the Supreme Court in Vegolis.[85] In this case, apart from employing a large number of workmen for its main work, the employer company employed labour through a contractor for loading and unloading and some other work. The regular workmen raised an 'industrial dispute' claiming that the system of work of loading and unloading etc, done through the contractor should be abolished, which was referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication. The tribunal held that the contract system should be abolished and the employer must employ only permanent workers for doing the work which was being done through the contract labour. It buttressed its view with the provisions of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act. In appeal, before the Supreme Court against the award of the tribunal, apart from questioning the decision of the tribunal on merits, the employer company also challenged the jurisdiction of the tribunal to consider the question of abolition of contract labour system in view of the provisions of the Act. On consideration of the scheme of the Act and examination of its provisions, the court held that the tribunal's directions to the company not to engage any labour through the contractor for the work of loading and unloading must be set aside, because the jurisdiction to decide about the abolition of the contract labour, or, to put it differently, to prohibit employment of contract labour, has now to be done in accordance with s 10 of the Act and the question whether the contract labour should be abolished or not, is left to the 'appropriate government', under it. Therefore, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to give directions with respect to abolition of the contract labour after the date of coming into operation of the Act'.

It will thus appear from this decision, firstly, that an industrial dispute can be raised, by the direct workmen of the establishment for abolition of the contract labour system. Secondly, although on the date the dispute was raised, the Act was not in force, hence the dispute with regard to the abolition of the contract labour system had to be decided by the tribunal. But since the Act came into force at the time of the decision, the dispute had to be decided in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Hence on and after the coming into force of the Act, no direction could be given by an industrial tribunal to abolish the contract labour system, since the jurisdiction to give directions with regard to the prohibition of contract labour is vested in the 'appropriate government'. In Food Corpn, the facts disclosed that a contractor was engaged for handling foodgrains at Siliguri depot and the Corporation had nothing to do with the manner of handling done by the contractor. The labour was employed by the contractor and payments were made by him. In this fact-situation, there was no privity of contract of employment between the corporation and the workmen. Referring to the expression 'employed' in the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s), speaking for a three judge Bench of the Supreme Court, Desai J said:

> The expression 'employed' has atleast two known connotations but as used in the definition, the context would indicate that it is used in the sense of relationship brought about by express or implied contract of service in which the employee renders service for which he is engaged by the employer and the latter agrees to pay him in cash or kind as agreed between them or as statutorily prescribed. It discloses a relationship of command and obedience. The essential condition of a person being a workman within the terms of the definition is that he should be employed to do the work in that industry and that there should be, in other words, an employment of his by the employer and that there should be relationship between the employer and him as between employer and employee or master and servant. Unless a person is thus employed, there can be no question of his being a 'workman' within the definition of the term as contained in the Act.[86]

In this view of law, the court held that where a contractor employs workmen to do the work which he contracted with a third person to accomplish, on the definition as it stands, the workmen of the contractor would not without something more become the workmen of that third person. Therefore, when the contract system was in vogue, the workmen employed by the contractor were certainly not the workmen of the corporation. In Mathura Refinery, the Supreme Court refused to direct the Indian Oil Corporation to absorb the contract labour in its employment saying that contract labourers have not been found to have direct connection with the refinery. In other words, there was no relationship of employer and employee between the corporation and the contract labourers concerned.[87] In Dena Nath, the court was dealing with the question 'whether the persons appointed by the principal employer through a contractor would be deemed to be the direct employees of the principal employer or not where the principle employer does not get registration under s 7 and/or the contractor does not get a licence under s 12 of the Act? A two-judge Bench pointed out that the Act has two purposes to serve, viz:

(i) to regulate the conditions of service of the workers employed by the contractor who is engaged by a principal employer; and

(ii) to provide for the abolition of contract labour altogether, in certain notified processes, operation or other works in any establishment by the appropriate government under section 10 of the Act. [88]

In Gujarat Electricity Board, he facts were: the thermal power station of the Board employed a large number of skilled and unskilled manual labourers to carry out loading and unloading work etc. The union of the workmen raised a dispute as to 'whether the workers whose services are engaged by the contractors, but who are working in the thermal power station of Gujarat Electricity Board at Ukai, can legally claim to be the employees of Gujarat Electricity Board?' This dispute was referred for adjudication to an industrial tribunal who, after taking the relevant evidence and the law laid down by various judicial decisions into account, held that the workmen concerned in the reference could not be the workmen of the contractors. Therefore, all the workmen employed by the contractor should be deemed to be the workmen of the board. The tribunal also gave consequential directions to the board for payment of wages etc to the workmen. The award of the tribunal was upheld by the High Court of Gujarat. In an appeal against the order and judgment of the High Court, the main contention advanced before the Supreme Court on behalf of the board was that 'after coming into force of the Act, it is only the 'appropriate government' which can abolish the contract labour system, after consulting the central board or the state board, as the case may be, and no other authority including the industrial tribunal has jurisdiction either to entertain such dispute or to direct abolition of the contract labour system. Furthermore, in any case, neither the 'appropriate government' nor the industrial tribunal has the power to direct that workmen of the erstwhile contractor should be deemed to be the workmen of the principal employer such direction is contrary to the provisions of the Act. The Central Government or the industrial tribunal, as the case may be, can only direct the abolition of the contract labour system as per the provisions of the Act. But the Act does not permit either of them to declare the erstwhile workmen of the contractor to be the employees of the principal employer. Sawant J, laid down the following propositions:

(i) In view of the provisions of section 10 of the Act, it is only the appropriate government which has the authority to abolish genuine labour contract in accordance with the provisions of the said section. No court including the industrial adjudicator has jurisdiction to do so.

(ii) If the contract is sham or not genuine, the workmen of the so called contractor can raise an industrial dispute for declaring that they were always the employees of the principal employer and for claiming the appropriate service conditions. When such dispute is raised, it is not a dispute for abolition of the labour contract and hence the provisions of section 10 of the Act will not bar either the raising or the adjudication of the dispute. When such dispute is raised, the industrial adjudicator has to decide whether the contract is sham or genuine. It is only if the adjudicator comes to the conclusion that the contract is sham, then he will have jurisdiction to adjudicate the dispute. If, however, he comes to the conclusion that the contract is genuine, he may refer the workmen to the appropriate government for abolition of the contract labour under section 10 of the Act and keep the dispute pending. However, he can do so if the dispute is espoused by the direct workmen of the principal employer. If the workmen of the principal employer have not espoused the dispute, the adjudicator, after coming to the conclusion that the contract is genuine, has to reject the reference, the dispute being not an industrial dispute within the meaning of section 2(k) of the ID Act. He will not be competent to give any relief to the workmen of the erstwhile contractor even if the labour contract is abolished by the appropriate government under section 10 of the Act.

(iii) If the labour contract is genuine a composite industrial dispute can still be raised for abolition of the contract labour and their absorption. However, the dispute, will have to be raised invariably by the direct employees of the principal employer. The industrial adjudicator, after receipt of the reference of such dispute will have first to direct the workmen to approach the appropriate government for abolition of the contract labour under section 10 of the Act and keep the reference pending. If pursuant to such reference, the contract labour is abolished by the appropriate government, the industrial adjudicator will have to give opportunity to the parties to place the necessary material before him to decide whether the workmen of the erstwhile contractor should be directed to be absorbed by the principal employer, how many of them and on what terms. If, however, the contract labour is not abolished, the industrial adjudicator has to reject the reference.

(iv) Even after the contract labour system is abolished, the direct employees of the principal employer can raise an industrial dispute for absorption of the ex-contractor's workmen and the adjudicator on the material placed before him can decide as to who and how many of the workmen should be absorbed and on what terms. The court pointedly noticed that, as a matter offact, on abolition of the contract labour system, the workmen are in a worse position as they could neither be employed by the contractor nor an obligation is cast on the principal employer to engage them in his establishment. This is a vital lacuna in the Act which could only be removed by a suitable amendment of the Act, because neither section 10 nor any other provision of the Act or the rules made thereunder provides for determination of the status of the workmen of the erstwhile contractor once the 'appropriate government' abolishes the contract labour system. [89]

The basic question, 'whether on abolition of the contract labour system, the contract labour is entitled to be absorbed by the principal employer'?, came up again before a three judge Bench of the court in Air India. In addition to the aforesaid basic question, on the basis of the respective contentions of the parties, the court formulated further four ancillary questions, viz:

(i) whether the High Court under Article 226 has power to direct their absorption?;

(ii) whether it is necessary to make a reference under section 10 of the ID Act for adjudication of disputes qua absorption of the contract labour?;

(iii) whether the view taken by this court in Dena Nath and Gujarat Electricity Board cases (supra) is correct in law?; and

(iv) whether the workmen have got a right for absorption and, if so, what is the remedy for enforcement?[90]

