The court did not agree with Dena Nath case as according to Ramaswamy J its 'ratio falls foul of constitutional goals of the trinity; they are free launchers to exploit the workmen'. Therefore, this case does not lay down the correct law.[91] And according to Majmudar J, Each of the conclusions reached in that case...flies in the face of the very scope and ambit of the Act and frustrates the very scheme of abolition of contract labour envisaged by the Act'. And such a conclusion cannot be countenanced, 'as it results in a situation where relatives of the patient are told by the operating surgeon that operation is successful but the patient has died.[92]Gujarat Electricity Board was also faulted by Ramaswamy J for the reason that the award-proceedings suggested therein were beset with several incongruities and obstacles in the way of the contract labour, for immediate absorption. Since, the contract labour gets into the service of the principal employer, the union of the existing employees may not espouse their cause for reference under s 10 of the ID Act. The workmen, who on abolition of contract labour system have no right to seek reference under s 10 of ID Act. Moreover, the workmen immediately are kept out of job to endlessly keep waiting for award and thereafter resulting in further litigation and delay in enforcement. The management would always keep them at bay for absorption. It would be difficult for them to work out their right. Moreover, it is a tardy and time-consuming process and years would roll by. Without wages, they cannot keep fighting the litigation endlessly. The right and remedy would be a teasing illusion and would be rendered otiose and practically compelling the workman at the mercy of the principal employer. Since these shortcomings were not brought to the attention of the court in that case, its decision is not correct.[93] Agreeing with this, Majmudar J echoed that the scheme envisaged in Gujarat Electricity Board was not workable and to that extent the said judgment cannot be given effect to.[94]Dena Nath and Gujarat Electricity Board were, therefore, overturned. In the end, the court concluded that 'though there is no express provision in the Act for absorption of the employees whose contract labour system stood abolished by publication of the notification under s 10(1) of the Act, in a proper case, the court as sentinal in the qui vive is required to direct the appropriate authority to act in accordance with law and submit a report to the court and based thereon proper relief should be granted.[95] In this view of law, it was held:

> The moment the contract labour system stands prohibited under section 10(1), the embargo to continue as a contract labour is put an end to and direct relationship has been provided between the workmen and the principal employer. Thereby, the principal employer directly becomes responsible for taking the services of the workmen hitherto regulated through the contractor' (sic).[96] And further that 'the linkage between the contractor and the employee stood snapped and direct relationship stood restored between the principal employer and the contract labour as its employees. Considered from this perspective, all the workmen in the respective services working on contract labour are required to be absorbed in the establishment' of the employer.[97]

Accordingly, the court affirmed the decision of the Bombay High Court that on a writ court can direct the principal employer to absorb contract labour after its abolition, even though some of the contractors have violated s 12 and the principal employer has violated the provisions of s 7 of the Act and upheld the direction to the principal employer to absorb the contract labour after the abolition of the contract labour system and to regularise their services with effect from the respective dates of the judgments of the High Court with all consequential benefits. This decision creates more problems than it cures as it loses sight of the different incidents of employment of the workmen by the contractors and by the principal employers particularly when such employers happen to be highly organised large-scale undertakings. The employment in such undertakings is governed by rules and regulations which include qualifications, cadres, retiral age, grades and scales of pay etc, whereas no such factors are taken into account in the employment by contractors. Contractors keep on shifting their labour force from one establishment to another as required by the exigencies of their own business. On the day of the abolition of the contract labour system in an establishment, the contractor may be having excessive number of people or he may be having superannuated and unqualified people in his employment. They all, by ipse dixit of this holding, will become the employees of such undertaking. There may be workmen who might have worked just for a day or two before the abolition of the contract system. They too will be entitled to be absorbed in the service of the principal employer. Thus, there may be two categories of employees, one direct employees, the other inherited from the contractors. This is apt to mess up the whole organisational system of the undertaking regarding qualifications, retirement age, grades and scales of pay etc. Furthermore, by forcing the workforce of the contractor on the principal employer, it may create chaotic budgetary conditions. From the report of the judgment, the attention of the court does not appear to have been called to such consequences of absorption of the contract labour force by the principal employer. These were perhaps some of the considerations which the Parliament had in mind for not making it incumbent on the principal employer to absorb the labour force employed by the contractor after the abolition of the contract labour system. However, Air India was overruled by a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in SAIL. Quadri J held:

> We have already noticed above the intendment of the CLRA Act that it regulates the conditions of service of the contract labour and authorises in section 10(1) prohibition of contract labour system by the appropriate government on consideration offactors enumerated in sub-section (2) of s 10 of the Act among other relevant factors. But, the presence of some or all those factors, in our view, provide no ground for absorption of contract labour on issuing notification under sub-section (1) of section 10. Admittedly, when the concept of automatic absorption of contract labourer as a consequence of issuing notification under section 10(1) by the appropriate Government, is not alluded to either in s 10 or at any other place in the Act and the consequence of violation of section 7 and 12 of the CLRA Act is explicitly provided in sections 23 and 25 of the CLRA Act, it is not for the High Courts or this Court to read some unspecified remedy in section 10 or substitute for penal consequences specified in sections 23 and 25 a different sequel, be it absorption of contract labour in the establishment of principal employer or a lesser or a harsher punishment. Such an interpretation of the provisions of the statute will be far beyond the task of ironing out the creases and the scope of interpretative legislation and as such dearly impermissible. We have already held above, on consideration of various aspects, that it is difficult to accept that the Parliament intended absorption of contract labour on an issue of abolition notification under section 10(1) of CLRA Act. (para 105, at p 167)...On the issuance of prohibition notification under section 10(1) of the CLRA Act prohibiting employment of contract labourer or otherwise, in an industrial dispute brought before it by any contract labourer in regard to conditions of service, the industrial adjudicator will have to consider the question whether the contractor has been interposed either on the ground of having undertaken to produce any given result for the establishment or for supply of contract labour for work of the establishment under a genuine contract or is a mere ruse/camouflage to evade compliance of various beneficial legislations so as to deprive the workers of the benefit thereunder. If the contract is found to be not genuine but a mere camouflage, the so-called contract labourer will have to be treated as employees of the principal employer who shall be directed to regularise the services of the establishment subject to the conditions as may be specified by it for that purpose...' (para 125(5), at p 172)...If the contract is found to be genuine and the prohibition notification under section 10(1) of the CLRA Act in respect of the concerned establishment has been issued by the appropriate Government, prohibiting employment of contract labourer in any process, operation or other work of any establishment and where in such process, operation or other work of the establishment the principal employer intends to employ regular workmen he shall give preference to the erstwhile contract labourer, ifotherwise found suitable and, if necessary, by relaxing the condition as to maximum age appropriately taking into consideration the age of the workers at the time of their initial employment by the contractor and also relaxing the condition as to academic qualifications other than technical qualifications.[98] [para 125(6), at p 172].

The above decision of the Constitution Bench in SAIL is a significant departure from the disturbing trends of judicial expansionism witnessed during last quarter of 20th century. It is not in dispute that that nowhere does the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act stipulate that 'abolition' of contract labour system means the 'automatic absorption' of the contract workers in the services of principal employer, nor, for that matter, the expression'regulation' appearing in the short title of the Act could mean 'regularisation' of their services under the principal employer. Neither the CLRA Act nor any other law in this branch provides for such implied transfer of the contract of employment from one employer to another. Viewed from the perspective of statutory construction, Quadri J, firmly established the principle that the judicial legislation through the medium of interpretation is 'interstitial' and should be confined to filling 'molecular' gaps. Quadri J, resurrected the proposition that placing a wild interpretation on statutory provisions beyond the contemplation of legislature is not the same thing as 'ironing out creases', to quote the phrase of Lord Denning MR. On this issue, the recommendation of NCL-II is as follows:

> The Commission is conscious of the fact that in the fast changing economic scenario and changes in technology and management, which are entailed in meeting current challenges, there cannot be a fixed number of posts in any organisation for all time to come. Organisations must have the flexibility to adjust the number of this workforce based on economic efficiency. It is essential to focus on core competencies if an enterprise wants to remain competitive. We would, therefore, recommend that contract labour shall not be engaged for core production/services activities. However, for sporadic seasonal demand, the employer may engage temporary labour for core production/ service activity. We are aware that off-loading, perennial, non-core services like canteen, watch & ward, cleaning, etc. to other employing agencies has to take care of three aspects:
>
> (1) there have to be provisions that ensure that perennial core services are not transferred to other agencies or esrablishments;
>
> (2) where such services are being performed by employees on the payrolls of the enterprises, no transfer to other agencies should be done without consulting, bargaining (negotiating) agents; and
>
> (3) where the transfer of such services does not involve any employee who is currently in service of the enterprise, the management will be free to entrust the service to outside agencies. The contract labour will, however, be remunerated at the rate of a regular worker engaged in the same organisation doing work of a comparable nature or if such worker does not exist in the organisation, at the lowest salary of a worker in a comparable grade, ie unskilled, semi-skilled or skilled. The principal employer will also ensure that the prescribed social security and other benefits are extended to the contract worker. There is a reason that compels us to make this recommendation. At many of the centers we visited, we were told during evidence, that there were cases of contractors making deductions from the wages of contract workers as their contribution towards social security, and then absconding without depositing either the contribution realised from the workers or their own contributions into the appropriate social security fund.[1]

As already noted, in Gujarat Electricity Board, the court noticed the vital lacuna of not providing for absorption of workmen of the contractor after abolition of the contract labour system, but it left it at that as the lacuna could only be removed by suitable amendment of the Act. Lacuna is Roman for the word 'gap'. In view of the principle that a matter, which should have been, but has not been provided for in a statute, cannot be supplied by the courts, as to do so will be 'legislation and not construction'.[2] In other words, it is not permissible for a court to fill in the gap in an Act of the legislature. In England, in Seaford Court Estate, Lord Denning LJ suggested a purposive approach as against the traditional literal approach to solve a question of interpretation. He said thus:

> A judge should ask himself the question: If the makers of the Act had themselves, come across this ruck in the texture of it, how would they have straighten it out? He must then do as they would have done. A judge must not alter the material of which it is woven, but he can and should iron out the creases.[3]

This statement was severely criticised by the House of Lords in Magor & St. Mellons,[4] where Lord Simonds described it as a 'naked usurpation of the legislative function under the guise of interpreration.' He pertinently stated that the proposition, that 'the court having discovered the intention of the Parliament...must proceed to fill in the gaps...what the legislature has not written, the court must write' cannot be supported. 'And it is the less justifiable when it is guess work with what material the legislature would, if it had discovered the gap, have filed it in. If a gap is disclosed, the remedy lies in an amending Act'. In the court of appeal, Lord Denning LJ protested and repeated what he said in Seaford Court Estate:

> We do not sit here to pull the language of Parliament and of ministers to pieces and make nonsense of it. That is an easy thing to do and that is a thing to which lawyers are too oftenprone. We sit here to find out the intention of Parliament and of ministers and carry it out, and we do this better by filling in the gaps and making sense of the enactment than by opening it upto destructive analysis.[5]

By this statement of law, all he meant was that the court may fill in the gap for making sense of the enactment where otherwise absurd consequences will follow. That is why he hastened to caution that a judge must not alter the material of which the statute is 'woven but he can and should iron out the creases. He never meant that in the guise of construction of the statute, the court should embark on the journey in the tertitory of 'judicial legislation'. It is evident from the clear and candid language in a subsequent statement:

> Judicial power rests on the combined wisdom of the judges. Their jurisdiction is more restrictive than creative. Their principal function is to restrain the abuse of power by others in the state...So far as creative work is concerned, so far as creative policy is concerned there the judges have no hand. They cannot direct the government to spend money on this or that. They cannot do any thing to help the poor or the unemployed. They cannot provide housing for the homeless. All social reform must be left to others. So must all political reforms. The doctrine of 'presumed intent' is occasionally pressed into service for construction of contracts or family arrangement agreements but it is not permissible to use this doctrine for interpretation of statutes which have to be construed in accordance with recognised principles of interpretation of statutes.

The function of the court is to apply the law, interpret the law and in this country, even to strike-down the law where it is inconsistent with the constitutional mandates. Where the language of the statute is plain and unambiguous, no construction is needed. But where the language is not plain or is ambiguous or literal construction would lead to absurdity, it is open to the court to interpret it to give effect to the intent of the Parliament. In construing welfare statutes, if two constructions are possible it is permissible for the court to adopt such construction as may be more beneficial to the weaker sections of the society but neither by ingenuity of interpretative techniques nor by extending the frontiers of the power of judicial review, it is permissible for the court to stray into the territory of judicial legislation. However, noble and benevolent the personal predilections or ideological inclinations of a judge be, they are no licence for trespassing into the forbidden area of legislation. So also the works and thoughts of political and social thinkers. The three organs of the state, viz, legislature, judiciary and executive are like the head, heart and hands of the human body. According to the basic scheme of the Constitution, neither of these three separate organs of the government can take over the functions assigned to the others.[6] If they do not work in union and harmony and trespass into the others' territories, the result will be chaos. In the language of Khare J, it is not safe 'to bend the arm of law only for adjusting equity'.[7]The object of the Act is to 'regulate the employment of the contract labour' and to provide for its abolition. Neither the scheme nor any provision of the Act purports to provide for the employment of the contract labour on the abolition of the contract labour system. In Air India, the court itself noticed that there is no provision in the Act for absorption of employees, whose contract stood abolished by publication of the notification under s 10(1) of the Act but it justified its excursion in the legislative territory with the observation that 'the power of the court is not fettered by the absence of any statutory prohibition. Accordingly, it directed that after the abolition of the contract labour system, the workmen employed by the erstwhile contractor automatically become entitled to be absorbed by the principal employer. Itis submitted that this holding requires reconsideration. Firstly, it is in conflict with the holding of another three judge Bench in Food Corpn, in which Desai J unequivocally held that the essential condition of a person being a workman within the meaning of definition in s 2(s) is that there should be a relationship of employment between him and the employer and 'unless a person is thus employed, there can be no question of his being a workman'. Such relationship cannot be created either by adding words to the statute or by extending the scope of judicial review. In either case, it will be judicial legislation. Even the wide jurisdiction of Art. 142 would not warrant an excursion into the territory of judicial legislation. Secondly, the direction that the employees of the erstwhile contractor will automatically become the employees of the principal employer on the abolition of the contract labour system is naked usurpation of the legislative function. Thirdly, the court had not adverted to the practical organisational difficulties, as earlier pointed out, which is apt to create chaotic conditions in the establishment of the principal employer.

Nature of Work

For an employee in an industry to be 'workman' under the definition, after its amendment by the amending Act of 1982, it is manifest that he must be employed to do:

(a) Manual work;

(b) Unskilled work;

(c) Skilled work;

(d) Technical work;

(e) Operational work;

(f) Clerical work;

(g) Supervisory work.

The question as to whether an employee is a 'workman' as defined in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, has to be determined with reference to his principal nature of duties and functions. Such question is required to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances of the case and the materials on record. It is not possible to lay down any strait-jacket formula which can be determinative of the real nature of duties and function being perfomed by an employee in all cases. In any case, where an employee is employed to do any type of work enumerated in the definition, there is hardly any difficulty in treating him as a 'workman' under the appropriate classification. But in the complexity of industrial or commercial organisations, quite a large number of employees are often required to do more than one work. In such cases, it becomes necessary to determine under which classification the employee will fall for the purpose of deciding whether he comes within the definition of' 'workman' or goes out of it.[8] In Burmah Shell, a three judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that in order to bring an employee within the ambit of the definition of 'workman' the nature of the work performed by him must fall within one or other of the above seven classifications. The rationale of this holding was that if every employee of an industry was to be a workman, except those in the four exceptions, these seven classifications need not have been mentioned in the definition and a workman could have been defined as a person employed in an industry except in a case where he was covered by one of the exceptions. Hence, the specifications of the seven types of work obviously was intended to lay down that an employee is to become a 'workman' only if he is employed to do work of one of those types while there may be employees who, in doing any such work would not be out of the scope of the work without any resort to exceptions. An apposite example was that of a person employed in canvassing and promoting sales for an industry. Though such a person may be an employee but he would not fall within the definition of 'workman' because his work would not fall within anyone of the classifications enumerated in the definition.[9] In this view of the law, 'sales engineering representatives' and 'district sales representatives' were held not to be workmen as their work did not fall within the specified categories. This holding was followed by various High Courts in the undernoted cases,[10]holding that the sales representatives employed for sales promotion work would not fall within the definition of 'workman' but the subsequent enactment-Sales Promotion Employees (Conditions of Service) Act 1975, brings sales representatives employed for sales promotion, in medical and pharmaceutical concerns within the purview of workman. This enactment also enables the Central Government by notification to apply its provisions to any other establishment engaged in any notified industry. In other words, if an industry is notified under this Act, the provisions of the ID Act would also be attracted to these types of workmen.

In TP Srivastava, the Supreme Court discarded the contention on behalf of the appellant that he was a workman as he was covered by the provisions of the Sales Promotion Employees (Conditions of Service) Act 1976. The court observed that since that Act was enacted subsequent to the termination of the service of the appellant, he was not covered by the provisions of that Act which was not retrospective in effect. Futhermore, there was no notification under the enactment applying the provisions of that Act to the employees of the industry in which he was employed. Therefore, since the duty of the appellant was of imaginative and creative nature, it could not be termed as either manual, skilled, unskilled or clerical in nature. The supervision element involved in his work was merely incidental.[11] But in this case, the attention of the court was not drawn to its earlier holding in SK Verma, where a three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court held that the words qualifying the word 'work' are intended to limit or narrow the amplitude of the definition of 'workman'. On the other hand, they indicate and emphasise the broad sweep of the definition which is designed to cover all manner of persons employed in any industry, irrespective of whether they are engaged in skilled or unskilled work, manual work, supervisory work, technical work or clerical work. The broad definition is to take in the entire labour force and exclude the managerial force.[12] It could not be the intention of the Parliament to keep out of the purview of the legislation small bands of employees who, though not on the management side of the establishment, are yet to be denied the ordinary rights of the force of labour for no apparent reason at all. This holding renders all the expressions qualifying the word 'work' in the definition redundant in taking the view that the broad intention of the legislature is 'to take in the entire 'labour force' and exclude 'managerial force'. If this was the object which the legislature by insertion of the expression 'operational' aims to achieve, that could have been achieved unequivocally by deleting all the adjectival words qualifying the word 'work' in the definition instead of inserting an ambivalent expression like 'operational'. This decision is in conflict with the rationale of May & Baker and Burmah Shell (supra). However, the Bombay High Court in SG Pharmaceuticals, held that the medical representatives employed for canvassing and promoting sales of products of the employer company did not fall within the definition of workman.[13] But, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court in Ram Mohan, followed SK Verma, being the later decision, while holding that an employee working as a sales promotion representative fell within the definition of workman. [14] Likewise, in view of the duties performed by a person designated as sales representative, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that he was a 'workman'.[15] In A Sundrambal, the court held that a teacher employed in an educational institution cannot be called a 'workman' because imparting of education which is the main function of the teachers, cannot be considered as skilled or unskilled, managerial or supervisory work or technical work or clerical work. Speaking for the court, Venkataramiah J said:

> Imparting of education is in the nature of a mission or a noble vocation. A teacher educates the children; he moulds their character, builds up their personality and make them fit to become responsible citizens. Children grow under the care of teachers. Clerical work, if any, they may do, is only incidental to their work of teaching. [16]

The court relied upon the decision in May & Baker. But attention of the court does not appear to have been invited to the conflict between this line of cases and the later decision in SK Verma's case (supra). No effort has been made to reconcile the contradictory viewpoints even in a subsequent decision in SK Maini v Carona Sahu Co Ltd. [17] However, in OM Bhargava v Satyavati Bhargava ,[18] a two-judge Bench of the court, on noticing the conflict, has recommended to the Chief Justice of India for consideration as to whether it would be appropriate to constitute a three-judge or five-judge Bench, to hear the matter. An interesting question arose before a single judge of the Kerala High Court where the archakas or priests in a temple claimed to be workmen. In view of the evaluation of the archaka or priest, the court held that the services of the archaka would not fall in any of the categories as contemplated by the definition. The court observed that the diety he propitiates cannot be looked upon as a profit-producing scheme or setup. Nor can the temple be equated to an industry or a commercial employer. The priest stands away from the general queue, with his distinctive dress, decorum, discipline and devotion and with his distinct duties and subtle services. There is all the difference between a mahout, cook or clerk, active in the precincts of temple or its corridors and office rooms and a priest placed in the sanctum sanctorum and silently saying his prayers.[19] In Carona Sahu, Ray J said:

> ... the designation of an employee is not of much importance and what is important is the nature of duties being perfomed by him. The determinative factor is the main duties of the concerned employee and not some work incidentally done. In other words, what is in substance, the work which employee does or what is in substance he is employed to do. Viewed from this angle, the employee is mainly doing supervisory work but incidentally or for a fraction of time, does also some manual or clerical work, the employee should be held to be doing supervision work. Conversely, if the main work is of manual, clerical or technical nature, the mere fact that some supervisory or other work is also done by the employee incidentally or only a small fraction of working time is devoted to some supervisory work, the employee will come within the purview of the 'workman' as defined in Section 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act.[20]

In this case, on a close scrutiny of the nature of the duties and functions of the shop manager with reference to the admitted terms and conditions of service of the employee, it was held that he was not a workman. Where an employee who was originally employed as a typist-clerk is subsequently designated as an officer-in-charge but his principal job on change of the designation was not shown as that of an officer nor was there any change in the remuneration, the change of the designation would not take him out of the definition of 'workman'.[21] Nor will the difference in salary make any difference.[22] In Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, the Calcutta High Court upheld the finding of fact recorded by the tribunal to the effect that the principal duties of the employee, whose service was terminated, were clerical in nature notwithstanding his promotion as 'staff officer' by the petitioner-bank. On this view of the matter, Chattopadhyay J, held that there was no ground to upset the said finding of tribunal that the employee was 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s).[23]However, if the service 'conditions of certain workmen are changed by an agreement between the workmen and they can be held as members of the management staff and not workmen within the meaning of the Act, such workmen will cease to be workmen because of altered conditions but such an agreement will not take away the right of the workmen under this Act to raise a dispute that, in fact, they still continue to be workmen on account of the real nature of their duties. If, on consideration of the nature of the duties performed by the employees, they are, in fact, found to be workmen as defined in the Act, simply because they had agreed to be included in the catagories of officers, they cannot be precluded from claiming that they are still workmen.[24] It is the nature of duties and not the designation which determines as to whether an employee is a workman.[25] The test is the nature of the main duties of the employee. In other words, what is in substance the work which he does or what he was in substance employed to do. In the language of Desai J:

> Where an employee has multifarious duties and a question is raised whether he is a workman of someone other than a workman, the court must find out what are the primary and basic duties of the person concerned and if he is incidentally asked to do some other work, may not be necessarily in tune with the basic duties, these additional duties cannot change the character and status of the person concerned. In other words, the dominant purpose of employment must be first taken into consideration and the gloss of some additional duties must be rejected while determining the status and character of a person.[26]

For instance, if he is mainly doing supervisory work but incidentally or for a fraction of the time also does some clerical, manual or technical work, it would have to be held that he is employed in a supervisory capacity,[27] which excludes him from the definition of the 'workman'. Likewise, if the manual, clerical or technical work is only a small part of the main duties or is incidental to his main work which is not manual, clerical or technical, then again the workman will not fall in the definition of 'workman'.[28] In Burmah Shell (supra), it was held that if the main work is of manual, clerical or technical nature, the mere fact, that some supervisory or other work is also done by the employee incidentally or as a small fraction of his work, will not take him out of the purview of the definition of a 'workman'. It is not casual or occasional work which a particular employee does which is decisive of what is the nature of his employment nor decisive of the question whether he is employee at all falling within the definition. The principle is now well-settled that an employee must be held to be employed to do that work which is the main work he is required to do even though he may be incidentally doing other type of work. In cases where an employee is employed to do purely one of the seven types of work, enumerated in the definition of 'workman', there would be no difficulty in treating him to be a 'workman' under the appropriate classification. However, in the complexity of the industrial and commercial organisations in practice, quite a large number of employees are frequently required to do more than one kind of work. An employee may be doing manual work as well as supervisory work, or he may be doing clerical work as well as supervisory work or he may be doing technical work as well as clerical work or technical work as well as supervisory work. In such cases, it would be necessary to determine under which classification he would fall for the purpose of finding out whether he falls in or goes out of the definition of 'workman'. The principle is now well settled that for this purpose, a workman must be held to be employed to do the work which is the main work he is required to do, even though he may be incidentally doing other type of work.[29]

Even if the main work of an employee involves some manual, clerical or technical work that by itself would not bring the employee with in the definition of workman' when such work is incidental to the main work, for instance, canvassing orders and promoting sales.[30] A distinction therefore, has necessarily to be made between the principal work of an employee and the ancillary duties involved in doing the principal work. In other words, even though a salesman is required to have some technical knowledge incidental to do some manual, clerical, or technical work in discharging his main duties, for instance promotion of sales of the employer's goods, he would not fall within the definition of 'workman' on account of the nature of his principal duties,[31] but an employee cannot be taken out from the category of a workman merely because he is described as a salesman. The question in each case will have to be decided with reference to the special facts and circumstances thereof. The mere description of a person as a salesman cannot be conclusive. The entire collocation of the duties assigned to him has to be considered.[32] If the main duty is of a manual, clerical or technical nature and selling is merely incidental to the duty, the situation would be different and the employee concerned would fall within the ambit of the definition of 'workman'.[33] The principal or main work in the employment of a person will have to be determined from the letter of appointment, the nature of the duty the employee is to perform in the course of his employment and other attending circumstances.[34]

Manual Work

'Manual work' in this definition is not necessarily confined to work by the application of hands but comprises work involving physical exertion as distinct from mental or intellectual exertion. Even workmen who do not do work with their hands but work with their legs or remain standing on duty would be doing manual work, for instance, members of watch and ward staff employed for security of the properties of a concern do the manual work.[35] However, if the manual work performed by a person is of an ancillary nature to his main duties which are not of a manual nature, he would not fall within the definition sheerly by virtue of such ancillary manual duty.[36] The labour appellate tribunal held that the work of a gate sergeant incharge of the watch and ward staff whose main duty is to look after the property of a factory by supervising his own men was not of a manual nature.[37] But in a later decision,[38] that tribunal held that the work of a jamadar of watch and ward staff, having no administrative control over the other members of the staff working under him was of a manual nature. This is the correct view of law while the correctness of the earlier decision is not free from doubt but the fact that the nature of a person's work was not 'supervisory' would not necessarily mean that his duties were mainly of a manual nature.[39]

Unskilled Work

An instance of unskilled work is provided in the decision of the Gujarat High Court in Bata India, where the workman was a salesman in a shoe shop. It was held that the nature of his work was of 'unskilled labour'. The fact that he tried to impress upon the customers that the shoes manufactured by the company were durable, was not his principal duty. The other instances of unskilled work are the work of loaders and unloaders of materials and goods in an industrial establishment. Likewise, the work of peons, daftries and sweepers is also the work of unskilled nature.[40]

Skilled Work

After the amendment, any type of skilled work performed by the employee will fall within the definition. The work of teachers teaching in schools has been held to be skilled work.[41] Likewise, the work of an artist employed by an advertising expert on work which could be done only by persons with artistic talent and requisite technique has also been held to be skilled work.[42] The work of a bench chemist in a sugar mill which consisted mainly of carrying out chemical analysis and recording results, with typing work, has been held to be skilled work.[43] Another instance of skilled work is the work of the compounder of a doctor.[44] The other instances of skilled work are the work of masons, carpenters and iron smiths etc. The Bombay High Court held that the functions performed by a laboratory assistant engaged by the directorate of health services of the state government were in the nature of a skilled artisan and, therefore, he would be a 'workman'.[45] Jewel appraisers engaged by a bank are workmen under s 2(s).[46]

Technical Work

The 'technical' nature of work was engrafted in the definition by the Amending Act of 1956. The word 'technical' has different meanings depending on the context in which it is used. The etymological meaning of the word 'technical' according to the Oxford Dictionary is 'of or pertaining to the mechanical arts and applied science generally, as in technical education, or technical school'.[47] The technical work depends upon the special mental training or scientific or technical knowledge of a person. The broad test is that if a person is employed because he possesses such faculties and they enable him to produce something as a creation of his own, he would be employed on 'technical work' even though in carrying out that work, he may have to go through a lot of manual labour; but if on the other hand, he is merely employed in supervising work of others, the fact that for the purpose of proper supervision, he is required to have technical knowledge, will not convert his supervisory work into technical work. In Bombay Dyeing, the Bombay High Court, held that a person can be said to be employed in a technical capacity, if he is in the first place a skilled person. Besides, he must have enough dexterity to discharge the work assigned to him with speed and accuracy. He must also have a skill. In the case of a person employed in a technical capacity, the application of a knowledge or art or a particular craft or work is the distinguishing feature. With the assistance of the knowledge he possesses, a person employed in a technical capacity is able to bring about a result which could not be brought about by a person, however skilled, who is to perform routine, repetitive work. A person employed in a technical capacity has to use his judgment and has to find out whether a particular work can be done in one manner or another and then do it in the manner in which he thinks it is better done. The work which results from the labour of such a person necessarily bears, at least in some small measure, the imprints of his personality and the knowledge of the person who does that work. It is not necessary that such a person must be innovative, but it must necessarily be a work, the contours of which are not predetermined before that work is actually performed by him in a technical capacity.[48]

Applying these tests, a camera operator working in the screen making department of textile mills was held not to be performing any technical work. An assistant engineer working in a sugar factory who was only looking after the work of workmen working under him as well as the concerned machines, and who was not responsible either for allocation of work to the workmen or for disciplinary control over the workmen was held to be doing technical work.[49] A chemist-in-charge of performing the work essentially of a technical nature, having power to recommend leave but no power to grant leave or to take disciplinary action is a workman.[50] Likewise, a qualified printing technologist appointed as a foreman in a job department of a printing press whose duty consisted of allocation of jobs, assignment of work, indenting materials, recommending leave, appraising work for promotion and also examining composed materials for getting mistakes corrected has been held to be a workman as his main function was that of a qualified printing technologist and the supervisory work was simply incidental to his main work.[51] The work of giving advice and guidance cannot be held to be an employment to do technical work.[52] Further, the mere possession of technical education is not sufficient. In order to fall within the ambit of the expression 'technical' as used in the definition, the employee must also have been 'employed' in the industry to do 'technical' work.[53] Highly qualified teachers possessing technical qualifications were held not to be workmen because they were not employed to do any 'technical' work. In Bharat Bhawan, the Supreme Court held that the 'artists' engaged by the trust, whose main object was the promotion of art and culture, could not be treated as skilled workmen, as their work was creative art, and no goods were produced in the trust nor was it meant for business purposes, and hence they were not workmen as defined under s 2(s).[54] On the construction of the definition prior to the amendment of 1956, the Supreme Court, in Dimakuchi Tea Estate, had held that persons belonging to the 'medical or technical staff were a different category from workmen.[55] But the Assam High Court has taken the view that besides the technical work of engineers or technicians, etc, the expression 'technicial' would also cover the work of a doctor who possesses the knowledge of human anatomy and pointed out that even in Dimakuchi (supra), the Supreme Court regarded a medical practitioner as a member of technical staff.[56]

By the amending Act 1956, two more categories of work were added to the categories of work, namely, 'supervisory' and 'technical' but a person who is employed in a supervisory capacity and draws wages exceeding Rs 500 per month or exercises functions mainly of the managerial nature, is excluded from the definition. No such restriction has been placed on a person doing 'technical' work. Nevertheless, the effects of the words, 'but does not include any such person', in the end of the first part of the definition read with cll (iii) and (iv), would be that any person employed to do 'technical' work would fall outside the purview of the definition of 'workman', if he: (i) is employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity; or (ii) being employed in supervisory capacity draws wages exceeding Rs 500 per mensem or exercises, either by nature of his duties attached to the office or by reason of the powers vested in him functions mainly of a managerial nature. Unless, therefore, a person employed to do any 'technical' work is excluded by virtue of cll (iii) and (iv), he will fall within the ambit of the definition of 'workman' irrespective of the amount of salary he draws or the nature of duties he performs. After the amendment, persons doing technical work such as draftsmen, engineers, assistant engineers, foremen, glass technologists, medical officers, compounders and doctors, etc, would fall within the definition of workmen. For instance, chemists working in Burmah Shell were held to be performing technical work and not working in a supervisory capacity. On the contrary, sales representatives and transport engineer were held to be falling outside the definition of workman because the nature of their work did not fall in any of the four specified categories, in particular, the technical work, as their duty was to promote sales which could not be held to be technical work.[57]

The work of a personnel manager who was a qualified lawyer in giving advice and guidance to the management with respect to labour laws was held not to be of a technical nature.[58] A film cameraman has been held to be a 'workman' as film photography is technical work.[59] The pilots flying aircrafts of the air companies are treated as workmen irrespective of the fact that they draw heavy remuneration.[60] No doubt, a medical officer of an establishment will fall within the purview of the definition of workman as the nature of his work is 'technical',[61] the doctors, however, rendering only professional services to various establishments where no relationship of employment is created between parties will not be entitled to claim the status of a workman. It could not be the intendment of legislation to cover the professional doctors who have no relationship of employment with the establishment they serve in the definition of workman. A graduate apprentice who was appointed as a senior foreman and on the relevant date was working as a development officer carrying basic salary of Rs 1050 and dearness allowance of Rs 210, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, was held to be a workman doing only technical work and not supervisory, administrative or managerial work.[62] A geologist working in a company is a workman. The mere fact that he was assisted by a driver, who was only to drive his vehicle and a helper, who was only assisting him in transportation of instruments could not make him a person performing supervisory duties.[63] A physiotherapist, who is performing the duties as assigned to him by the department or medical superintendent, exercises no function of managerial nature and is a workman as defined in the Act.[64] A general duty medical officer, who is in charge of a first-aid and male nurse, nursing attendant, sweeper and ambulance driver and all of them working under him in the first-aid post and taking instructions from him, is not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s).[65] A Draftsman working under the supervision of superiors is a workman.[66]

Operational Work

The expression 'operational' qualifying the word 'work' has been introduced by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[67]The word 'operational' or any of its derivatives, has not been defined anywhere in the Act. The insertion of this expression, therefore, at once introduces superfluity and ambiguity. According to Black's Law Dictionary,[68] an 'operative' is 'a workman, a labour man, an artisan, particularly one employed in factories.' The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary says that an operative is a workman 'concerned with manual, or mechanical work' or 'a person engaged in work on production as a workman or artisan.'[69]Webster's Third International Dictionary,[70] defines an 'operative' as a person who is to do physical operations by hand or machines; occupied in productive labour; a skilled or unskilled person employed in an industry; one who operates or works in any branch of industry, trade or profession, a worker; a workman in any industry, art and an artisan or mechanic. From these etymological meanings ascribed to the word 'operative', it is obvious that any type of work in an industrial establishment performed by the workers, is 'operational' work. Every type of'operational work' would also fall in the other categories of work, viz, manual, unskilled, technical, clerical or supervisory, as well. The workers doing operational work may be called operatives. Though the contours of the other expressions used in qualifying the word 'work' have been delineated by judicial dicta, the dimensions of the expression 'operational' are hazy and vague. If the legislature intended to bring all types of work performed by the workmen in an industry within the perimeter of the definition, it was not necessary to use so many expressions to qualify the word 'work'. It would have been advisable to delete all the words after the words 'to do any' and before the word 'work' in the opening part of the definition. Then the relevant portion will read: 'workman' means any person (including an apprentice) employed in any industry to do any work for hire or reward'. This object could have been better achieved with precision and clarity by deleting all the adjectival expressions after the words 'to do any' qualifying the word 'work' in the opening part of the definition instead of adding an ambivalent expression like 'operational'. This would have obviated obscurity.[71]

Clerical Work

In common parlance, a clerk is one employed for doing routine work as a writer, copyist, account-keeper or correspondent in office. His work implies stereotype work, without power of control or dignity or creativeness. Clerical work, as ordinarily understood, is synonymous with routine, stereotype work which does not involve any initiative, control or dignity.[72] A clerk employed to do general office duties may be styled as a general assistant, but this does not necessarily confer upon him the rank of an officer.[73] Both manual and clerical work, in the sense in which these terms have been used in s 2(s), connote more or less routine work, skilled or otherwise, which does not require any material amount of initiative in its performance, the employee entrusted with such work not being required to perform substantial duties of a supervisory, directional or controlling nature. In ascertaining the true status of an employee, regard must be had not to any temporary arrangement that might be made as a measure of convenience but to his substantive position.[74] The duties of a clerk are not inconsistent with a limited amount of supervision and control over other employees, but in each case it will be essential to examine the facts and to determine what is the nature of the work. The question as to whether a particular person is doing clerical work or not, has to be decided by finding out the dominant nature of the work done by an employee.[75] The question is essentially one of fact and no general answer which can cover all cases is possible.[76]

In Madikal Service Co-op Bank,[77] the bank manager of a co-operative bank claimed to be a workman because certain of his duties involved clerical work. A single judge of the Kerala High Court found that the manager was in immediate and near control of the functions of the branch and was responsible for the executive administration even though he was functioning under the secretary and was subject to the control of the board of directors. The nature of his duries and functions were mainly managerial and whatever clerical work he might have been doing was only negligible. Since his employment was mainly of managerial and administrative nature, he would not fall within the definition of a 'workman'. A legal assistant, who is not discharging any functions of a managerial nature nor employed in a supervisory capacity, but tendering only legal advice as and when called upon by the management is a workman as defined in s 2(s).[78] A salesman who discharges the duties of providing service to farmers, maintaining records and expenditure connected with function of service centres, and timely submission of reports, etc, is essentially doing a job of clerical nature, and is a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) [79]but a single judge of the Gujarat High Court took a different view and held that a 'salesman' who collects the material and despatches the same as per the same order booked by him would not answer to the definition of workman, and he cannot invoke the machinery provided under the Industrial Disputes Act.[80] The tour executive of a travel agency, whose job is to look after the tourists arriving at the airways and their lodging, make out and verify their bills, etc, is a workman within the meaning of s 2(s).[81] In Sanjeev Kumar, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that it would be dangerous to adjudge the nature of work from the allowance a man was getting. The nature of work was allotted to him by virtue of his post. A senior accounts assistant, re-designated as accounts executive, doing the work of preparation of vouchers, details of cheques, etc, and having no managerial or administrative powers, would be a workman within the meaning of s 2(s).[82]

(i) Illustrations of Clerical Work:

An employee working as an accountant in the branch office of a company doing mainly clerical work, ie, maintenance of general ledgers, journals, store-ledger and the preparation of drafts and letters in connection with the maintenance of his accounts was directed to take charge of the branch office from the branch manager temporarily and he was doing the additional work of supervising the work of the other clerks, disbursing salaries and replying to the letters received by the office, according to instructions from the head office for some time. In the facts and circumstances of the case it was held that the employee was doing the work of a clerical nature and the addition of some duties temporarily did not alter his status as a clerk.[83] An assistant manager of a bank whose duties were purely of a clerical nature and who put up notes regarding leave and staff matters to the manager who passed orders on them was held to be doing clerical work.[84] A cashier whose duties were not of any directional or supervisory nature was held, to be performing duties of clerical nature.[85] A depot superintendent and an assistant depot superintendent employed by an oil distributing company performing duties substantially of a clerical nature were held to be clerks.[86] The work of a draughtsman employed by a machinery manufacturing company to make copies of drawings was held to be of a skilled clerical nature.[87] A godown keeper whose work was of a purely clerical nature was held to be a clerk.[88] The work of an inspector in a joint audit department of a commercial organisation was held to be mainly of a clerical nature.[89] Proof-readers in offices of newspapers who read and correct proofs which involves no judgment and the nature of whose work is more or less mechanical were held to be mainly doing clerical work.[90] The work of a sub-agent at the main office branch of a bank whose duties were purely of clerical nature, but who had incidentally to do some supervisory work also was held to be clerical.[91] A lady secretary engaged to do stenographical, clerical or secretarial work of a confidential nature was held to be doing work only of clerical nature.[1] The work of a time-keeper whose duty was only to check arrivals and departures was held to be a work of clerical nature.[2] A touring representative employed by a film distributing company to check sales and sale proceeds at various centres who had to submit reports of checking sales to the company was held to be doing work only of a mechanical nature and hence purely of clerical nature.[3] A watch and ward inspector in a sugar factory who had also to purchase materials for stores, spare parts, secure permits and fitness certificates, submit reports, maintain a diary of the work done all under the direction of the management without any independent initiative and who during the working season had to perform some supervisory duties along with maintaining a number of registers involving a lot of clerical work was held to be a workman on account of the preponderance of clerical duties over supervisory duties.[4]

(ii) Illustrations of Non-clerical Work:

The work of an advertising manager, employed inter alia for securing advertisement for a journal and to devise ways and means of increasing the circulation.[5] The work of chemists employed in sugar mills even though they had incidentally to record the results of their chemical analysis coupled with ancillary work of typing.[6] Doctors and compounders employed in the dispensaries of industries.[7] The work of sub-editor of a story-magazine to make additions, alterations or corrections in news items, stories or articles and select strories and perform duties which involve literary talents of a high order which also involve exercise of judgment, initiative, and creation.[8] The work of a person employed as an engineer, later resident engineer incharge of a very important engineering construction which required technical knowledge, initiative and independent judgment and was not merely a routine mechanical type of work.[9] The duties of a gate sergeant incharge of watch and ward staff in a tannery to look after the property of the factory by supervising his own men.[10] The work of welfare officers in a commercial education institution.[11] The work of teachers working in education institutions.[12] Porters and Graders waiting in the marketing yard and engaged by merchants and growers for loading, unloading and grading of agricultural products are not the workmen of the Cooperative Marketing Society - a society which was formed with the object of protecting the growers from exploitation by traders - as they are neither appointed by the society nor does the society exercise any control over them.[13] The view expressed by Chalapathi J of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Darshan Lal,[14] did not seem to have found favour with the Supreme Court. A legal assistant in a sugar mill performing duties such as preparing written statements and notices, recording enquiry proceedings, giving opinions to management, drafting, filing pleadings and representing management in all cases and also conducting departmental enquiries does not perform a stereotype job. His job involves creativity and hence, he cannot be said to be workman.[15] In Muir Mills, the facts disclosed that the respondent-workman was appointed by the appellant-company as a legal assistant. It was found that he was working in a supervisory capacity and was supervising court cases and whenever necessary preparing draft replies to matters that were pending in the court. Drawing a distinction between profession and occupation, Lakshmanan J (for self and Kabir J) observed:

> ... if we draw a distinction between occupation and profession we can see that an occupation is a principal activity (job, work or calling) that earns money (regular wage or salary) for a person and a profession is an occupation that requires extensive training and the study and mastery of specialized knowledge, and usually has a professional association, ethical code and process of certification or licensing. Classically, there were only three professions: ministry, medicine, and law.These three professions each hold to a specific code of ethics, and members are almost universally required to swear some form of oath to uphold those ethics, therefore "professing" to a higher standard of accountability. Each of these professions also provides and requires extensive training in the meaning, value, and importance of its particular oath in the practice of that profession. ... A member of a profession is termed a professional. However, professional is also used for the acceptance of payment for an activity. Also a profession can also refer to any activity from which one earns one's living, so in that sense sport is a profession. ... it is clear that respondent No.1 herein is a professional and never can a professional be termed as a workman under any law.[16] (Paras 36-38)

In yet another case involving a similar set of facts in Glaxo Smithklin Pharmaceuticals, a person, who was appointed as 'Industrial Relations Assistant', was found to have been performing functions, such as tendering legal advise to the management from time to time, preparation of draft enquiry report, conducting domestic enquiries and holding conferences with advocates in relation to the company's acts. It was further found that, as an employee in the category of management staff, his conditions of service were different than those provided for the workers of the company, and that the leave and pension scheme applicable to him were not covered by the settlement reached between the company and its workmen. Pasayat J (for self and Panta J), upheld the decision of the High Court to the effect that, in the light of the nature of functions performed by the appellant which are managerial in nature, he could not be considered to be a workman within the meaning of the Act.[17]

Supervisory Work

Section 2(s), as it originally stood, defined a workman as meaning, inter alia, any person employed (including an apprentice) in any industry to do any skilled or unskilled, manual or clerical work for hire or reward. Under this, employers often claimed that the workmen concerned were officers or members of the supervisory staff and as such did not fall under s 2(s), and workmen used to contend that they were doing merely clerical or mechanical work and did not fall in the class of officers and supervisors. Under the present definition, a person engaged to do supervisory work unless he falls within the exception of cl (iv) shall fall within the definition. It is, however, evident from the definition that the employee in order to fall within the definition of workman must have been 'employed' in a 'supervisory capacity'. Merely performing some supervisory duties will not take the employee out of the definition of workman. The word 'supervision' means to oversee, to look after. Therefore, 'supervision' which is relevant in this connection is the supervision done by an employee in a higher position over the employees in the lower position. Such supervision is the supervision of the work which is in connection with the industry in question.[18] In the words of Hidyatullah J:

> The word 'supervise' and its derivatives are not words of precise import and must often be construed in the light of the context, for unless controlled, they cover an easily simple oversight and direction as manual work coupled with a power of inspection and superintendence of the manual work of others.[19]

The words have to be construed in the context of the definition but what determines the question whether a person is doing supervisory work or not is the nature of the duties and functions assigned to him. Supervision may be in relation to the supervision of an automatic plant. The person who attends on such a machine may do either technical or manual work but he does not do supervisory work merely because he looks after the machine. The word 'supervisor' means a person who oversees the work of others. It means 'overseer'. A person can be said to be a supervisor if there are persons working under him, over whose work he has to keep a watch. In other words, he is that person who examines and keeps a watch over the work of his subordinates and if they err in any way, corrects them. It is his duty to see that the work in any industrial unit is done in accordance with the manual, if there is one, or in accordance with the usual procedure. It is not his function to bring about any innovation. It is not his function to take any managerial decision, but it is his duty to see that the persons over whom he is supposed to supervise, do the work assigned to them according to the rules and regulations. The central concept of supervisor is the fact that there are certain persons working under him. If a person is doing any work which does not require him to look after or inspect or examine the work of persons who are subordinate to him or working under him, that person cannot be said to be a supervisor. Supervision necessarily refers to persons working under the supervisor and it does not extend to supervision of plant and machinery. Checking the plant and the machinery will not make a person supervisor. In other words, supervision means 'supervision over men and not machines'.[20] The essence of 'supervisory' work is the supervision by one person over the work of the others. Supervision contemplates direction and control. A 'supervisor', as understood in s 2(s) really means that the person exercising supervisory work is required to control the men and not the machine.[21] It is not necessary that a supervisor must be supervising his fellow employees. It is enough that the supervisory work must be working in relation to the industry in which the person is employed but the work in relation to the industry may be done by an independent contractor whose work may also require some supervision.[22] His duty is to see how the employees will be engaged in different works of production and maintenance.[23]

The Patna High Court in Bipin Bihari, observed that merely because it has not been shown that the development officers of the Life Insurance Corporation of India have no power of assigning duties and distribution of work among insurance agents working in their area, it cannot be held that their work is not supervisory in character. Likewise, the power of appointment and dismissal or disciplinary power are not necessary incidents of supervisory power, they more properly appertain to managerial power. Even in the absence of such power, a person can supervise the activities of other employees working under the same master.[24] For exercising 'supervisory' power, it may often be necessary that the 'supervisor' himself must have technical expertise, otherwise he may not be in a position to exercise proper supervision of the workmen handling sophisticated plants and machineries. But if a person is required to render his technical knowledge in the matter of production alongwith other workmen as directed by other supervisors, then he cannot be said to be exercising supervisory works or administrative works.[25] Ordinary supervision work is not of a 'supervisory' nature for the purposes of the definition.[26] Having regard to the categories of service indicated by the use of different words like 'supervisory', 'managerial' and 'administrative', it is not necessary to import the notions of one into the interpretation of the other. Such words are advisedly loose expressions with no rigid frontiers and too much subtlety in trying to precisely define where supervision ends, management begins or administration starts should not be encouraged for that would be theoretical and not practical. It should be broadly interpreted from common sense point of view where tests will be simple both in theory and their application. Interpreting so:

(i) a supervisor need not be a manager or an administrator;

(ii) he can be a workman so long as he does not exceed the wage limit of Rs 1600 per month (as it then was); and

(iii) irrespective of his salary, he is not a workman who is to discharge functions mainly of managerial nature by reason of the duties attached to his office or the powers vested in him.[27] A superintendent, quality control, drawing a salary exceeding Rs 1600 per month (as it then was) is not a workman.[28]

Dealing with the disputes with respect to the nature of the work performed by an employee as to whether it was of supervisory nature or otherwise, industrial adjudication generally considers the essence of the matter and does not attatch undue importance to the designation of the employee or the name assigned to the class to which he belongs. It is always a matter of determining what the primary duties of an employee were—Does he do clerical or manual work? If the answer is in affirmative, he is a workman. Or are his duties of supervisory nature? If the answer is in affirmative, he is not a workman. In considering the latter aspect of the problem, industrial adjudication generally has taken the view that the supervisor or an officer should occupy a position of command or decision and should be authorised to act in certain matters within the limits of his authority without the sanction of the manager or other supervisors.[29] To come to a conclusion that a person is working in a supervisory capacity, it is necessary to prove that there were at least some persons working under him whose work he is required to supervise. The mere fact that a person is incharge of a section, would not make him a supervisor if there is nobody else in the section whose work is to be supervised. A person cannot be said to be working in a supervisory capacity merely because he is to supervise the person, who helps him in doing the work, which he himself is to perform. For instance, a clerk who has been given the assistance of a peon, cannot be said to be working in a supervisory capacity. Likewise, training by a chief analytical chemist to an apprentice as a part of work by itself cannot become supervisory work. It is necessary to prove that the person is working in a supervisory capacity or exercising supervisory power.[30] When one talks of a person working as a supervisor, one understands it to mean a person who is watching the work being done by others to see that it is being done properly.[31] Thus, in determining the status of an employee, his designation is not decisive; what determines the status is the consideration of the nature of his duties and the functions assigned to him.[32] Even the fact, that the work performed by a workman is of responsibility and onerous nature, would be immaterial for determining the question as to whether his work is of supervisory character or not.[33]

These principles, though on their face appear to be simple, in their application have often vexed the courts. In May & Baker (supra), on the construction of the definition of 'workman' before its amendment in 1956 in which the word 'supervisory' did not occur, the Supreme Court held that the employee concerned whose main work was that of canvassing and incidental to that work he did some clerical or manual work as well, was not a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s). As the use of the word 'mainly' accentuates its significance, the employee was held not to be a 'workman' because, the manual work was merely incidental to his main duties. Later, in South India Bank, referring to the work of an accountant who occasionally acted in place of the agent, the court observed that the mere fact that he was designated as accountant would not take him out of the category of 'workman'. He was merely a senior clerk, doing mainly clerical duties going by the designation of the accountant and was in reality in place of the agent when the agent was absent, did not form part of his principal and main duties.[34] In Ananda Bazar Patrika, it was held:

> The question, whether a person is employed in a supervisory capacity or on clerical work, in out opinion, depends upon whether the main and principal duties carried out by him are those of a supervisory character, or of a nature carried out by a clerk. If a person is mainly doing supervisory work, but, incidentally or for a fraction of the time, also does some clerical work, it would have to be held that he is employed in supervisory capacity; and, conversely, if the main work done is of clerical nature the mere fact that some supervisory duties are also carried out incidentally or as a small fraction of the work done by him will not convert his employment as a clerk into one in supervisory capacity.[35]

In State Bank of Hyderabad, the Supreme Court had to consider the claim of certain employees for payment of special allowance granted to 'supervisors' under certain bank awards, ie, Shastri and Desai awards. The stand of the bank was that in order to claim supervisory allowance, the employees must establish that the main or essential duties entrusted to them and actually discharged by them were duties and functions of a supervisory nature. The court observed:

> Before a person can claim the supervisory special allowance, he must establish that he has discharged the duties and functions which are similar to or the same as the duties or functions assigned to supervisors coming under category...In deciding the status of an employee claiming the special allowance, the designation of the employee is not decisive and what determines the status is a consideration of the nature of the duties and functions assigned to the employee concerned.[36]

Where the labour court, having held that the employee was holding a supervisory position and hence not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) and hence the reference was liable to be rejected, yet directed the management to pay Rs 75000 as compensation, the High Court quashed that part of the award of the labour court by which compensation was awarded and held that the remedy of the employee could lie in the civil court only.[37] The accountant of a company whose predominant and primary duties were supervisory in nature and his main duty was to supervise the accounting section of the factory of which he was the head, is not a workman, even though some of the work he was doing in the absence of the clerks or in association with clerks in the preparation of accounts, which was only incidental to his main job to oversee the work of his subordinates.[38] Maintenance supervisor, who is treated as part of management personnel having separate pension and gratuity schemes and was delegated the duties of recommending leave, calling for requisition from stores and evaluating the work of employee below him is not a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s).[39] A senior service engineer, whose job was installation, servicing and repair of xerox machines, is a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s), although he was drawing a salary of Rs 3400 per month, more so, when no evidence was led by the employer to show that his job was managerial or supervisory in nature.[40] The question whether an employee performs supervisory duties or not is pre-eminently a question of fact.[41] A person who is doing manual, clerical and technical work will come within the definition of workman if incidentally he does some supervisory work also. In determining as to whether certain categories of employees would fall in the definition of workmen or not or in order to exclude a man from the definition of industry, the employer has specifically to plead and prove the fact that the employee concerned worked mainly and principally in supervisory capacity or in managerial or administrative capacity or supervisory capacity and was drawing wages exceeding Rs 1600/-, now Rs 10,000/-. In the absence of precise and positive evidence to prove the exact nature of work which the employee was performing, it cannot be held that he was doing administrative or supervisory work.[42] A traffic inspector working in a road transport corporation whose duties were predominantly supervisory in character, could not be held to be an artisan and, therefore, not a workman.[43]

(i) Illustrations of Supervisory Work:

The work of an employee as head of a department having power of control, supervision and direction over his department for the purpose of recruitment, promotion, etc.[44] The work of labour officer in a jute mill involving exercise of initiative, tact and independence.[45] The job of an assistant engineer working as shift engineer having control over workmen working under him.[46] The duties of a person employed as district mains engineer employed by an electricity supply company who has to see other employees working under him discharge their duties properly.[47] The work of a gate sergeant incharge of the watch and ward staff of a tannery whose main duty was to look after the property of the factory by supervising his own men.[48] The work of an assistant weaving supervisor in a jute mill.[49] The work of the depot superintendents, and assistant depot superintendents involving a considerable amount of initiative to perform them; the duties performed by transport engineers; blending supervisors and the foreman and depot superintendent the foreman (chemicals) are supervisory in nature in view of the principal duties performed by them. Incidentally, they were also drawing salary in excess of Rs 500 per month in terms of the exception under sub-clause (iv).[50] The work of a personnel manager who was a qualified lawyer in giving advice and guidance to the management with respect to labour laws was held to be of supervisory nature.[51] Development officers of the Life Insurance Corporation of India supervising the work of the agents in promoting the sales of the insurance policies are doing supervisory work.[52] Workmen who were promoted as sub-managers and are governed by separate terms and conditions were not 'workmen' within the meaning of s 2(s).[53]

(ii) Illustrations of Non-supervisory Work:

The work of an auditor performing the duties of checking of accounts which is purely mechanical in nature and does not involve any supervisory function.[54] The work of a teller in a bank which does not show any element of supervisory character.[55] The duties performed by the fuelling superintendent were held not to be mainly or substantially of supervisory nature but were mainly of a manual nature. Hence, they were not excluded from the definition of workman by exception (iv) though they were drawing salary of more than Rs 500 per month.[56] A mechanic doing ordinary supervisory work of supervising automatic machines would not be doing 'supervisory' work.[57] An inspector of an insurance company, whose main duties involve procuring business to the management, organising and developing the business within the allotted area, is not a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s). If in the process of procuring business, he collects cash and gives receipt, it is only an incidental duty being performed by him along with his main duties, which would not make him a workman.[58]

Officers:

An officer is generally invested with the power of supervision and control in contradistinction to the stereotype work done by a clerk.[59] He generally occupies a position of command or decision and is authorised to act in certain matters within the limits of his authority without the sanction of his superiors.[60] In SK Verma (supra), from the terms and conditions of the appointment of a Development Officer of LIC, the Supreme Court noticed that he was a whole-time employee of the corporation. His principal duty was to organise and develop the business of the corporation in the areas allotted to him and for that purpose to recruit active and reliable agents, to train them to canvass new business and to render post-sale services to policy-holders. He was expected to assist and inspire the agents; he was expected to stimulate and excite the agents to work and thus he was to be a friend, philosopher and guide of the agents working within his jurisdiction and no more, but he had no authority whatsoever to bind the corporation in any way. He had no authority to appoint agents or take disciplinary action against them. Nor did he supervise the work of the agents. The agents were not his subordinates. Nor did he have any subordinate staff. In these circumstances, the court held that he was a 'workman'. This case was wrongly decided apart from reflecting gross judicial indiscipline on the part of the learned judge, in so far as the issues raised in the case were squarely covered by May & Baker and Burmah Shell (supra).

It was in HR Adyanthaya that a Constitution Bench finally and flatly rejected the judicial aberrations of grave magnitude surfaced in the decision of Reddy J, in SK Verma, and very rightly so. Justice Sawant (for self, Singh, Mohan, Ray and NP Singh JJ), peremptorily held that SK Verma was decided per incuriam.[61] The question raised in Adyanthaya was: whether a 'medical representative' is a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) ? Justice Sawant referred to the relevant provisions of SPECSA and held in the negative, as the nature of work they perform could not be said to fall under any of the expressions, ie, 'skilled', 'clerical, 'technical' or 'operational'. The learned judge highlighted the fact that in Ved Prakash Gupta too, the Bench did not refer to May & Baker, WIMCO and Burmah-Shell cases. The learned judge did not, however, hold Ved Prakash Gupa as per incuriam. But, the fact remains that Ved Prakash too was indeed per incuriam, in the light of the fact that the said decision was given contrary to, and in total ignorance of, the earlier decisions which were binding on the Bench. In Mukesh Tripathi, the facts briefly were: the appellant was appointed by LIC as apprentice development officer to be imparted training for a period of one year, whereafter he was to be appointed as a development officer, provided his work and conduct were found satisfactory. His apprenticeship was terminated at the end of one year. The tribunal held that since he was terminated after completing one year, he was a workman, which was set aside by the High Court. Upholding the decision of High Court, Sinha J, observed:

> It may be true...that SK Verma (supra) has not been expressly overruled in HR Adyanthaya (supra) but once the said decision has been held to have been rendered per in curiam, it cannot be said to have laid down a good law. This Court is bound by the decision > of the Constitution Bench. ... A 'workman' within the meaning of Section 2(s) ...must not only establish that he is not covered by the provisions of the Apprenticeship Act but must further establish that he is employed in the establishment for the purpose of doing any work contemplated in the definition.[62]

It is submitted that Adyanthaya and Mukesh Tripathi were consistent with the principles laid down in 1960s and 1970s and were right, whereas the decisions in SK Verma and Ved Prakash Gupta were per incuriam, wholly misconceived and completely flawed. The apex court has rightly rejected the faulty reasoning and perverse conclusion in these cases. A purchase officer, in a company manufacturing printed packing material work involving specialized knowledge of machinery and material purchased and of the market, performs mainly managerial functions, and hence is not a workman.[63] In another case involving a similar set of facts, the learned judge held that a person who was appointed as Asst Puchase Officer (Logistics Management) and performs functions such as appraisal of staff, assessing and verifying the work done by subordinates is a 'workman'.[64] In Kirloskar Electric Co, Agarwal J, of Delhi High Court observed that the designation of Accounts Officer or Assistant Manager is only a misnomer as long as the nature of duties performed by the incumbent suggest that he was performing clerical duties, and that the employee was being appointed for a fixed term of three years and renewing the contract every time only with a view to deny the benefits available to him under the Act. On this view of the matter, the learned judge held that there was no merit in the writ petition.[65] In Standard Chartered Bank, the facts were: the respondent workman was appointed as a Personal Financial Consultant and the duties assigned to the incumbent included "achieving allocated business targets, ensuring high quality customer service, ensuring external and internal compliance on all branch transactions, handling difficult customer situations and contributing to the overall achievement of business growth." While setting aside the award passed by labour court directing her reinstatement, Chandrachud J, of Bombay High Court held that the labour court had erred in so far as it did not have regard to the dominant nature of duties assigned to her.[66] It is significant that this decision of the learned single judge was upheld, in appeal, by the Division Bench of Bombay High Court comprising Ms Ranjan Desai and Mr Ranjit More, JJ[67]A surgeon employed in a eye hospital is a professional who is required to use his skill and knowledge in diagnosing and treating patients, and he cannot be said to be a 'workman' within the meaning of ID Act.[68]

Persons Excluded

The definition specifically excludes all such persons who fall in any of the following four cases even though they may be satisfying the requirements of the main section. Once it is shown that the concerned employee is performing any skilled or unskilled, manual, supervisory, technical or clerical work, then he shall be considered to be a 'workman' unless he falls under any of the excluded cases. The exclusion has to be proved by the party which claims that the case falls in any of the excluded categories.

Sub-clause (i): Armed Forces

This clause excludes the following categories of persons from the definition who are subject to:

(1) The Air Force Act 1950 (45 of 1950), or

(2) The Army Act 1950 (46 of 1950), or

(3) The Navy Act 1957 (62 of 1957).

Section 9 of the Army Act 1950 (46 of 1950) does not make any person subject to the Army Act, but it only declares civilians of defence services to be on active service. The employees employed in the engineering stores depot of the defence establishment under the Ministry of Defence, therefore, would not be subject to the Army Act 1950. Accordingly, the employees not being in active defence service cannot be excluded from the definition of workmen.[69]

Sub-clause (ii): Police and Prisons

This clause excludes any person who is in the police service or an officer or other employee of a prison. In Hussan Mhasvadkar, the Supreme Court held that the powers of the Inspector appointed by the Bombay Iron and Steel Labour Board constituted under Maharashtra Mathadi, Hamal and Other Manual Workers (Regulation of Employment) Act 1969, and the duties and obligations cast upon him are identical and akin to law enforcing agency or authority and are also at part with a prosecuting agency in the public law field, and hence he is not a 'workman' under s 2(s).[70]

Sub-clause (iii): Managerial or Administrative Capacity

This clause excludes the persons working in 'managerial or administrative capacity' from the purview of the definition, even though they may be satisfying other ingredients of the definition.[71] The words 'managerial or administrative capacity' have not been defined in the Act, therefore, have to be interpreted in their ordinary sense. In order to be in a position of management, it is not necessary that the employee should be at the top of the heirarchy or that he should have absolute power in any respect. It is not even necessary that the individual should be in the sole control of an organisation or of a department of that organization. The clause speaks of persons 'employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity'; it does not say what they have to be in management. But it is not difficult to say that the management which the section envisages and with which a person may be entrusted may be in respect of matters falling within a department, sector or compartment of the establishment. It would not be right to say that a person is not in a position of management unless he has jurisdiction over any definite territory; managerial position can be attained also inside a department. It is not necessary that the person should have the power of making appointments. If an individual has officers subordinate to him whose work he is required to overlook, if he has to take decisions and also the responsibility for ensuring that the matters entrusted to his charge are efficiently conducted and an ascertainable area or section of work is assigned to him, an inference of a position of management would be justifiable.[72] Managerial or administrative functions require a person to control the work of others. For instance, a branch manager of a bank exercising all managerial powers on account of the nature of the duties attached to the post of a manager could not come under the definition of 'workman'[73] It does not mean that a person, who does some work and gets assistance for doing that work, can be described as a person who is working in a managerial or administrative capacity.[74]

The mere designation by which a person is designated is not conclusive of his status as an officer; industrial adjudication has to look to the nature of the duties assigned to the person concerned.[75] In order to take an employee out of the definition of a 'workman', it is necessary to show that he is employed, in fact and substance, mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity.[76] The fact whether the supervisory functions predominate or the functions are mainly of a managerial nature is very difficult to assess and almost impossible to determine without clear and adequate evidence.[77] The mere designation of a person as a manager or administrator of an industry is not sufficient to conclude that he is not a workman. An adjudicator has to see whether he is or was employed in the industry to do any managerial or administrative work. It is, however for the employee to specifically state and establish before the adjudicator that he was a workman and was not employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity.[78] An employee whose substantial duty was only that of a security inspector at the gate of the factory premises could not be excluded from the definition of 'workman' because he was not performing the duties either of managerial or supervisory nature.[79] The management has to raise a specific plea before the adjudicator that the workman is not a workman for the reason of being employed in a managerial or administrative capacity. In case another plea is taken, for instance, that the employee was not a workman being employed in a supervisory capacity and drawing wages more than Rs 1,600 which is rejected by the tribunal, the management will not be permitted to make a somersault and take the plea that the employee was employed in a managerial or administrative capacity.[80] Mere reference of the dispute pertaining to a manager cannot confer jurisdiction on the labour court or tribunal, having regard to the fact that the employee was not a workman under s 2(s).[81] A person appointed as assistant electrical engineer and promoted to the level of factory administrator and manager (special assignment) is not a 'workman', and hence, not entitled to relief under the Act.[82]

An employee designated as manager (research and development) and entrusted with the job of promoting and projecting company's image, creating new products, continuous investigation and identification of alternative materials for substitution in the existing product range, finding remedies for existing problems in order to improve quality and efficiency, etc, is a workman.[83] The development officer of LIC of India is not a person in administrative or managerial cadre and as such is a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s).[84] Where the management had treated the employee as workman under s 2(s) for the purpose of issuing charge sheet and conduct of enquiry, it is estopped from taking the stand before the labour court that the delinquent was not a workman.[85] The secretary of a cooperative society whose responsibility is the management of affairs and executive administration of the society, as stipulated in its bye-laws, is not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s).[86] In Press Trust of India, a single judge of Madras High Court held that persons performing managerial or supervisory functions and are drawing more than Rs 1600/- pm (now Rs. 10,000/-), on facts are not workmen within the meaning of s 2(f)(i) and (ii) of the Working Journalists and Other Newspaper Employees (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act 1955 [WJONE (CoS) & MPA 1955].[87] A Pastor in a Church is not a workman under s 2(s) of IDA.[88] In a yet another interesting case in Manoranjan Chakraborty, the employer issued a charge-sheet to an employee and conducted domestic enquiry as provided for in the standing orders of the company culminating in his dismissal from the service. The tribunal passed an award holding that the reference of the dispute by the government was not maintainable as he was not a 'workman' within the meaning of the ID Act. Aggrieved by the said award, the employee approached the High Court. While remanding the case to the tribunal, PK Ray J, of Calcutta High Court held that the respondent-employer led the employee to believe that he was a 'workman' and conducted domestic enquiry as per certified standing orders; hence the company was estopped from pleading that the petitioner was not a workman but supervisor. The learned judge observed that the aforesaid point was not considered by the tribunal with the result its decision was vitiated with perversity and illegality.[89] Branch Manager of a co-operative bank is not a 'workman'.[90]

Sub-clause (iv): Supervisory Capacity

A person doing work of a 'supervisory' nature has been added in the definition of 'workman' by the Amending Act of 1956 but this clause excludes such a person who being employed in supervisory capacity:

(1) draws wages exceeding Rs 1,600 per month; or

(2) exercises, either by the nature of the duties attached to the office or by reason of the powers vested in him, functions mainly of a managerial nature.[91]

Thus, any person employed in an industry to do any supervisory, technical or clerical work for hire or reward is a 'workman'. But cl (iv) contemplates that a person employed in a supervisory capacity will also be a workman provided he does not draw wages exceeding Rs 1,600 per mensem.[92]Ordinarily, a supervisor or an officer occupies a position of command or is authorised to take independent decisions and is authorised to act in certain matters within the limits of his authority without the sanction of his supervisors.[93] But in determining the question as to whether a person is employed in a supervisory capacity or otherwise, the mere designation is not decisive of the nature of employment. The question whether a person is employed in a 'supervisory' capacity or on clerical work, depends upon whether the main and principal duties carried out by him are those of a supervisory' character or of a nature carried out by a clerk. If a person is mainly doing 'supervisory' work, but, incidentally or for a fraction of the time, also does some clerical work, he would be deemed to be employed in a 'supervisory' capacity. For instance, a foreman working in the job department of a newspaper press whose duty required him to ensure output by efficiently managing the manpower, machines and materials and who was required to recommend leave, appraise work for promotion and indenting material has been held to be a supervisor.[94] Conversely, if the main work done is of a clerical nature, the mere fact, that some supervisory duties are also carried out incidentally or as a small fraction of the work done by him, will not convert his employment as a clerk into one of supervisory capacity.[95] An employee employed in the main capacity of a supervisor discharging the duties of allocation of jobs, assignment of work, recommendation of leave, carrying out of promotional appraisals, but incidentally discharging other technical work will not fall within the definition of 'workman'.[96] The question whether a person is a 'workman' or not is a mixed question of fact and law, and where it is found that the employee was working as quality assurance in-charge of the company, most of his duties are supervisory and managerial in nature, and he could not be said to be a workman.[97] In Reserve Bank Employees' Assn, an ingenious argument was worked up before the Supreme Court on behalf of the workmen for drawing a distinction between the word 'work' in the main part of s 2(s) and the word 'capacity' in cl (iv). It was suggested that the Amending Act 1956 was enacted recognising the same difficulty as was experienced in the United States of America in enacting the Taft-Hardey Act after the decision in Packard Motor Car,[98] and may be said to have adopted the same tests by making a distinction between 'work' and 'capacity'. It was argued that these tests provided for that twilight area where the operatives (to use a neutral term) seem to enjoy a dual capacity. But after noticing the changes introduced by the Amending Act of 1956, the court repelled the argument. Speaking for the court, Hidayatullah J, said:

> But the unity between the opening part of the definition and clause (iv) was expressly preserved by using the word 'such' twice in the opening part. The words, which bind the two parts, are not—'but does not include any person'. They are—'but does not include any such person' showing clearly that what is being excluded is a person who answers the description 'employed to do supervisory work' and he is to be excluded because being employed in a 'supervisory capacity' he draws wages exceeding Rs 500 per month, or exercises functions of a particular character.

Then after referring to the American statutes and the decision relied upon in the argument, the court went on to say:

> The scheme of our Act is much simpler, than that of the American statutes. No doubt, like the Taft-Hartley Act, the Amending Act of 1956 in our country was passed to equalise bargaining power and also to give the power of bargaining and invoking the Industrial Disputes Act to supervisory workmen.

And then concluded:

> Workman here includes an employee employed as supervisor. There are only two circumstances in which such a person ceases to be a workman. Such a person is not a workman if he draws wages in excess of Rs 500 per month or if he performs managerial functions by reason of a power vested in him or by the nature of duties attached to his office. The person who ceases to be a workman is not a person who does not answer the description 'employed to do supervisory work' but one who does answer that description. He goes out of the category of 'workmen' on proof of the circumstances excluding him from the category.[1]

For instance, assistant engineers employed by the Kerala State Electricity Board drawing salary over Rs 500 per month and performing supervisory duties were held to be falling under the excluded category and as such not to be workmen.[2] Likewise, the development officers of the Life Insurance Corporation of India supervising the development of the business of the corporation in promoting the sales of the insurance policies through the insurance agents working in their areas have been held to be performing supervisory work.[3] But an employee who was admittedly performing the duties of supervisory character was held to be a workman because the management had failed to show that he was drawing wages exceeding Rs 500 per month.[4] It is only the persons employed in 'supervisory capacity' drawing wages exceeding Rs 1,600 per month or performing functions mainly of managerial nature who have been excluded from the definition. Clause (iii) excludes the persons employed in an industry; if they are employed mainly in a 'managerial or administrative capacity'. But before a person who is doing supervisory work and whose wages do not exceed Rs 1,600 per month, can be taken out of the category of workmen, it must be shown that he is employed in fact and in substance mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity.[5] If a person is employed to do any work which is not in a managerial or administrative capacity, he will not be excluded from the definition of 'workman' even if he draws wages more than Rs 1,600 per month.[6] Hence a person employed to do technical work, for instance, an engineer, a pilot of an aircraft, a technologist or a doctor, will continue to be a workman even if his emoluments are far in excess of Rs 1,600, provided that his work is not of a supervisory nature or his functions are not mainly of managerial nature. This appears to be somewhat anomalous.

A person employed as a personal assistant to the managing director who used to sign affidavits and letters as a principal officer of the company and also used to enter into settlements and negotiations with the union on behalf of the company has been held to be discharging the function of a supervisory nature. Since he was drawing remuneration comprising salary of Rs 2,500 and conveyance allowance of Rs 1,000 he was held to be outside the purview of the definition of workman.[7] On the other hand, a private secretary attached to an officer with the duty to arrange his official functions and to maintain confidentiality in respect of matters she came across, has been held to be not working in a supervisory capacity or discharging managerial or administrative function.[8] A residential medical officer, who is responsible for the proper maintenance and financial matters of the hospital, is not a workman.[9] Station masters and traffic inspectors employed by the state road transport corporation, are persons whose work is supervisory in nature and drawing a salary of Rs 1600/- ,(now Rs 10,000/-) per mensem, and hence are not workmen within the meaning of s 2(s).[10] Where the duties of supervisor (process) comprised receiving raw material and dispatching finished product, the mere fact that he was incidentally looking after the work of plant foreman during his absence does not take him out of the purview of s 2(s).[11] Checking of bags and containers of employees at the entrance is not a job of supervisory nature; one or the other part of the job might be of a supervisory nature, but that does not make the same a dominant one.[12]Medical representatives who answer to the definition of 'sales promotion employees' within the meaning of s 2(d) read with s 6(2) of the Sales Promotion Employees (Conditions of Service) Act 1976, fall within the definition of 'workman' under s 2(s) of the ID Act except when they are engaged in supervisory or managerial or administrative capacity.[13]Stressing the need for recasting the definition of workman, NCL-II recommended as follows:

Relatively better off section of employees categorised as workmen like Airlines Pilots, etc. do not merely carry out instructions from superior authority but are also required and empowered to take various kinds of on the spot decisions in various situations and particularly in exigencies. Their functions, therefore, cannot merely be categorized as those of ordinary workmen. We, therefore, recommend that Government may lay down a list of such highly paid jobs who are presently deemed as workmen category as being outside the purview of the laws relating to workmen and included in the proposed law for the protection of non workmen. Another alternative is that the Government fix a cut-off limit of remuneration, which is substantially high enough, in the present context, such as Rs. 25,000/- p.m. beyond which employees will not be treated as ordinary 'workmen'. It would be logical to keep all the supervisory personnel, irrespective of their wage/salary, outside the rank of worker and keep them out of the purview of the labour laws meant for workers. All such supervisory category of employees should be clubbed along with the category of persons who discharge managerial and administrative functions. The Commission would also recommend that such a modifed definition of worker could be adopted in all the labour laws. We expect managements to take care of the interests of supervisory staff as they will now be part of the managerial fraternity.[14]

Retired Employees- Whether Workmen:

In Standard Chartered Bank, the union raised dispute against the denial of pensionary benefits to the employees, who retired before November 1, 2001. Three questions came up for decision before the Calcutta High Court: (i) whether the retired employees of the Bank would answer to the definition of 'workman' under s 2 (s) ; (ii) whether the union of retired employees could raise an industrial dispute; and (iii) whether the union coud seek a direction to the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) to submit a failure report to the Central Government. Rejecting the contentions, the High Court held that a retired employee is not a 'workman' within the meaning of ID Act, nor could he be a party to an industrial dispute. By the same token, no direction would lie to the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) to submit a failure report.[15]

Judicial Review

The question whether an employee is a workman or not cannot be properly adjudicated in writ proceedings under Art. 226 of the Constitution and the appropriate remedy is to raise an industrial dispute and have it referred for adjudication under s 10 of the Act,[16] because it involves several disputed questions of fact which may be proved either by oral evidence or documentary evidence and by evidence of conduct and circumstances and the ultimate decision will depend on careful consideration of the whole of the evidence.[17] The principle is that 'where basic facts are disputed and complicated questions of law and fact depending on evidence are involved, the writ court is not the proper forum for seeking relief. Similarly, the question, whether an employee working in any particular capacity such as technical, managerial and supervisory, is also a mixed question of fact and law, which cannot be satisfactorily decided on the basis of inconclusive evidence adduced for the limited purpose of deciding the preliminary issue. It has to be decided after recording full evidence, as the question would require overall consideration of all the aspects of the matter.[18] Mere letter of appointment of the employee is not sufficient evidence for deciding the question because in the course of his employment, his duty might be altered by the employer so as to change the capacity in which he works. Hence, apart from the letter of appointment, the subsequent events would be relevant evidence for determining the question. The tribunal will be in a position to satisfactorily determine the question only after taking full evidence on the issues, including the preliminary issue.

Protection of Managerial Personnel- Recommendations of NCL-II

The NCL-II observed that there was a need to provide a minimum level of protection to managerial and other (excluded) employees too, against unfair dismissals or removals, which should be done through adjudication by a labour court or the Labour Relations Commission or arbitration.[19]

---

84 Gammon India Ltd v Union of India (1974) 1 LLJ 489 [LNIND 1974 SC 109] (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 960 [LNIND 1974 SC 109]: 1974 Lab IC 707 : (1974) 1 SCC 596 [LNIND 1974 SC 109], per Ray CJI.

85 Vegolis Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1971 SC 461], 574 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1942 [LNIND 1971 SC 461]: (1971) 2 SCC 724 [LNIND 1971 SC 461] : [1972] 1 SCR 673 [LNIND 1971 SC 461], per Vaidialingam J.

86 Workmen of Food Corpn of India v Food Corpn of India (1985) 2 LLJ 4 [LNIND 1985 SC 71], 9 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 670 [LNIND 1985 SC 71]: 1985 (1) SCALE 344 [LNIND 1985 SC 71] : (1985) 2 SCC 136 [LNIND 1985 SC 71], per Desai J.

87 Mathura Refinery Mazdoor Sangh v Indian Oil Corpn Ltd (1991) 2 SCC 176 [LNIND 1991 SC 92] (SC) : 1991 (1) SCALE 297.

88 Dena Nath v National Fertilizers Corpn (1992) 1 LLJ 289 [LNIND 1991 SC 617], 292 (SC) : AIR 1992 SC 457 [LNIND 1991 SC 617]: 1992 GLH (1) 144 : JT 1991 (4) SC 413 : 1992 Lab IC 75 : 1991 (2) SCALE 1081 : (1992) 1 SCC 695 [LNIND 1991 SC 617], per Yogeshwar Dayal J.

89 Gujarat Electricity Board v Hind Mazdoor Sabha (1995) 2 LLJ 790 [LNIND 1995 SC 638], 803, 815 (SC) : AIR 1995 SC 1893 [LNIND 1995 SC 638]: 1995 (3) SCALE 498 : (1995) 5 SCC 27 [LNIND 1995 SC 638], per Sawant J.

90 Air India Statutory Corpn v United Labour Union (1997) 1 LLJ 1113 [LNIND 1996 SC 2076] (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 645 [LNIND 1996 SC 2076]: 1996 (9) SCALE 70 [LNIND 1996 SC 2076] : (1997) 9 SCC 377 [LNIND 1996 SC 2076].

91 Ibid, pp 1146, 1148, per K Ramaswamy J.

92 Ibid, p 1154, per Majmudar J.

93 Ibid, pp 1149-50, per Ramaswamy J.

94 Ibid, p 1154, per Majmudar J.

95 Ibid, p 1149, per K Ramaswamy J and 1155, per Majmudar J.

96 Ibid, p 1146, per K Ramaswamy J.

97 Ibid, p 1149, K Ramaswamy J.

98 SAIL v National Union of Waterfront Workers (2001) 4 LLN 133 (SC) per Quadri J.

1 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, chap 13, pp 47-48, para 6.109.

2 Hansraj Gupta v Dehradun Mussoorie Electric Tramway Co Ltd AIR 1933 PC 63, 65, per Lord Russel of Killowen.

3 Seaford Court Estate Ltd v Asher [1949] 2 KB 481, 489, per Lord Denning LJ.

4 Magor & St Mellons RDC v New Port Corpn [1952] AC 189 191, per Lord Simonds J.

5 Lord Denning, Discipline of Law, 1939, p 13.

6 Cf, Indira-Nehru Gandhi v Raj Narain AIR 1975 SC 2299, 2435, per Beg J.

7 Ahmedabad Municipal Corpn v Virendra Kumar Jayantibhai Patel (1997) 2 LLJ 765 [LNIND 1997 SC 973], 768 (SC), per Khare J.

8 SK Maini v Corona Sahu Co Ltd (1994) 2 LLJ 1153, 1158 (SC), per GN Ray J.

9 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell Management Staff Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC) : AIR 1971 SC 922 [LNIND 1970 SC 452]: (1970) 3 SCC 378 [LNIND 1970 SC 452], per Bhargava J.

10 Shalimar Paints Ltd v Third IT 1974 Lab IC 213, 216 (Cal) (DB), per BC Mitra J.

11 TP Srivastava v National Tobacco Co of India Ltd (1992) 1 LLJ 86 [LNIND 1991 SC 537]-87, per V Ramaswami J.

12 SK Verma v Mahesh Chandra 1983 Lab IC 1483 [LNIND 1983 SC 233], 1485 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

13 SG Pharmaceuticals v VD Padamwar 1990 Lab IC 24, 29 (Bom) (DB), per Deshpande J.

14 A Ram Mohan v Labour Court , Bangalore (1989) 2 LLJ 179 (Kant): 1989 (59) FLR 1, per Rama Jois J.

15 Promer Sales Pvt Ltd v Manohar Sondhur 1993 Lab IC 1762, 1766 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

16 A Sundrambal v Govt of Goa, Daman & Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 65 (SC) : AIR 1988 SC 1700 [LNIND 1988 SC 341]: 1989 Lab IC 1317 : 1988 (2) SCALE 82 : (1988) 4 SCC 42 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], per Venkataramiah J.

17 SK Maini v Carona Sahu Co Ltd (1994) 2 LLJ 1153 (SC), per GN Ray J.

18 S.K. Maini v M/s. Carona Sahu Company Limited (1995) 1 LLJ 415 [LNIND 1994 SC 267] (SC) : AIR 1994 SC 1824 : (1994) 3 SCC 510 : [1994] 2 SCR 333.

19 A Kesava Bhatt v Sree Ram Ambalam Trust (1990) 1 LLJ 192 (Ker), per A Sukumaran J.

20 (1994) 2 LLJ 1153 (SC), per GN Ray J.

21 Enamelnagar Dev Corpn Ltd v Second IT 1986 Lab IC 1741, 1747 (Cal) (DB), per GN Ray J.

22 Arkal Govind Raj Rao v Ciba Geigy of India Ltd Bombay (1985) 2 LLJ 401 [LNIND 1985 SC 177], 405 (SC), per Desai J.

23 Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation v Central Government Industrial Tribunal (2003) 2 LLJ 293 [LNIND 2002 CAL 145] (Cal .), per Chattopadhyay J

24 Guest Keen Williams Ltd v Asst Labour Commr, West Bengal 1986 Lab IC 1668 [LNIND 1986 CAL 232] (Cal) (DB), per GN Ray J.

25 Sunita B Vatsaraj v Karnataka Bank Ltd (1999) 3 LLN 497 (Bom).

26 Arkal Govind Raj Rao v Ciba Geigy of India Ltd, Bombay (1985) 2 LLJ 401 [LNIND 1985 SC 177], 403 (SC), per Desai J.

27 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 670 (SC) per Bhargava J. .

28 May & Baker (India) Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], 97 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

29 Burmah Shell OS&D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell Management Staff Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452], 596 (BC) : AIR 1971 SC 922 [LNIND 1970 SC 452]: [1971] (22) FLR 11 : (1970) 3 SCC 378 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] per Bhargava J.

30 May and Baker (India) Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], 97 (SC) per Wanchoo J.

31 Shalimar Paints Ltd v Third IT 1974 Lab IC 213, 217 (Cal) (DB), per BC Mitra J.

32 Mgmt of Bharat Kala Kendra Pvt Ltd v RK Baweja 1981 Lab IC 893 [LNIND 1980 DEL 273], 897-98 (Del) (DB), per Ranganathan J.

33 Western India Match Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 459 [LNIND 1963 SC 142], 463 (SC), per KC Das Gupta J.

34 Ramendra Narayan Deb v Eighth IT 1975 Lab IC 94, 97-98 (Cal) (DB), per SK Datta J.

35 BLC Ltd v Ram Bahadur Jamadar (1957) 1 LLJ 422 -23 (LAT).

36 Burmah-Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 153 (LAT).

37 Cawnpore Tannery v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 459 (LAT).

38 BIC Ltd v Ram Bahadar Jamadar (1957) 1 LLJ 422 (LAT).

39 May and Baker (India) Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 94 [LNIND 1961 SC 18], 97 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

40 Bata India Ltd v BH Nathani 1978 Lab IC 386, 389 (Guj) (DB), per Obul Reddi CJ.

41 A Sundarambal v Govt of Goa, Daman & Diu (1983) 2 LLJ 491 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 498 (Bom) (DB), per Jahagirdar J.

42 SA Phenany v J Walter Thompson Co (Eastern) Ltd 9 FJR 324 (LAT).

43 Chintaman Martand Salvekar v Phaltan Sugar Works Ltd (1954) 1 LLJ 499 (LAT).

44 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v State of UP (1955) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1955 ALL 82] (All) (DB), per Dayal J.

45 CA Ribeiro v Directorate of Health Services, Govt of Goa (1999) 3 LLN 517 (Bom) (DB), per Batta J.

46 All India OBE Union v IT (2001) 1 LLN 930 (Mad), per Kalifulla J.

47 A Sundarambal v Govt of Goa, Daman & Diu (1983) 2 LLJ 491 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 498 (Bom) (DB) per Jahagirdar J.

48 Bombay Dyeing and Mfg Co Ltd v RA Bidoo (1990) 1 LLJ 98 [LNIND 1989 BOM 210], 101-02 (Bom) (DB) : 1989 (2) Bom CR 367 [LNIND 1989 BOM 210] : 1989 (91) Bom LR 219, per Jahagirdar J.

49 Uttar Pradesh State Sugar Corpn Ltd v Deputy Labour Commy, 1990 Lab IC 645 (All), per BN Misra J.

50 Sudhirkumar v Ferro Alloys Corpn Ltd 1992 Lab IC 657 (Bom), per Quazi J.

51 Shrikant Vishnu Palwankar v PO, First LC 1992 Lab IC 722, 726 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

52 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell MS Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC), per Bhargava J.

53 A Sundarambal v Govt of Goa, Daman & Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 63 (SC), per Venkataramiah J.

54 Bharat Bhawan Trust v BBA Association (2002) 1 LLN 54 (57) (SC), per Rajendra Babu J.

55 Workmen of Dimakuchi Tea Estate v Dimakuchi Tea Estate (1958) 1 LLJ 500 [LNIND 1958 SC 1] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 353 [LNIND 1958 SC 1], per SK Das J.

56 Bengal United Tea Co Ltd v Ram Labhaya (1962) 2 LLJ 37 (Assam) (DB), per Mehrotra J.

57 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell MS Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC), per Bhargava J.

58 Pabbojan Tea Co Ltd v LC 1977 Lab IC 721, 730 (Gau) (DB), per Sarma J.

59 Marshal Braganza v SR Samant (1975) 2 LLJ 189 (Bom), per RL Aggarwal J.

60 Mathur Aviation v Lieutenant Governor; Delhi (1977) 2 LLJ 255, 261-62 (Del), per Dalip Kapur J.

61 MM Wadia Charitable Hospital v Dr Uina Kanat Ramchandra Warerkar (1997) 2 LLJ 549 (Bom .)

62 Ashok Leyumd Ltd v A Vijayakumar (1981) 2 LLJ 9 (Mad), per Mohan J.

63 Mahajan Borewell Co v Rajaram Bhatt (1998) 3 LLN 253 (Kant) (DB), per Sethi CJ.

64 Choithram HR Centre v Capt DK Shukla (1998) 3 LLN 453 (MP), per Tiwari J.

65 Mgmt of HEC Ltd v PO, LC 1998 (3) LLN 902 (SC), per Kirpal J.

66 Maheshwar Singh v Indomag Steel Technology Ltd (2010) 4 LLJ 51 (Del .): 170 (2010) DLT 682 [LNIND 2010 DEL 122] : [2010 (126) FLR 426], per Gambhir J.

67 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

68 Black's Law Dictionary, 1968, revised 4th ed, p 1240.

69 Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, p 1452.

70 Websters 3rd New International Dictionary, p 1581.

71 Toshniwal Bros Pvt Ltd v Delhi Administration (1976) ILR 2 (Del) 548, per HL Anand J.

72 Workmen of Macfarlane & Co Ltd v Fifth IT (1964) 2 LLJ 556, 558 (Cal) per BN Bannerjee J.

73 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 228 (LAT).

74 Mysore Vegetable Oil Products Ltd v LC (1961) 2 LLJ 508, 510 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

75 Sundarambal v Government of Goa, Daman and Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 63 (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

76 Upper Jumna Valley Electricity Supply Co, Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 50 (LAT).

77 Madikal Service Co-op Bank Ltd v Labour Court (1988) 2 LLJ 49, 53 (Ker), per Bhat J.

78 Darshan Lal v Director, State Transport (1998) 1 LLN 665 (P & H), per Chalapathi J.

79 IFFCO Ltd v PO, LC (1998) 4 LLN 442 (P&H), per Sat Pal J.

80 Shaw Wallace and Co Ltd v NR Trivedi (1999) 1 LLN 319 (Guj), per Pandit J.

81 Aloysius Nunes v Thomas Cook India Ltd (2000) 3 LLN 160 (Bom), per Rebello J.

82 Sanjeev Kumar Gupta v PO, LC, (2001) 1 LLN 447 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

83 Mysore Vegetable Oil Products Ltd v LC (1961) 2 LLJ 508, 510 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

84 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Certain Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 368 (LAT).

85 Janardana Mills Ltd v Certain Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 344 (LAT).

86 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v LAT (1954) 2 LLJ 155 (Mad), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

87 East Asiatic Co Staff Union v East Asiatic Co (India) Ltd (1954) 2 LLJ 730 (LAT).

88 Janardana Mills Ltd v Certain Workmen (1953) 1 LLJ 344 (LAT).

89 Kilburn and Co Ltd v Dibendra Chandra Dey [1956) LAC 393.

90 Mitra Prakasan Ltd v Bramha Dutta Vidyarthi 10 FJR 505 (LAT).

91 Madan Gopal v Hindustan Commercial Bank Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 414 (LAT).

1 Burmah-Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Employees (1954) 1 LLJ 21 (LAT).

2 East India Industries (Madras) Ltd v IT (1954) 2 LLJ 418 (Mad), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

3 Manoranjan Pictures Corpn Ltd v Rawait Singh (1957) 2 LLJ 102 (LAT).

4 Mawana Sugar Work Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 462 (LAT).

5 Radio Television v KK Sharma (1962) 2 LLJ 722 (Punj), per Shamsher Bahadur J.

6 Chintaman Martand Salvekar v Phaltan Sugar Works Ltd (1954) 1 LLJ 499 (LAT).

7 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v State of UP (1955) 2 LLJ I (All) (DB), per Dayal J.

8 Mitra Prakashan Ltd v Brahma Dutta Vidyarthi 10 FJR 505 (LAT).

9 S Balakrishna v Merz and Mclellan (India) 2 FJR 397 (LAT).

10 Cawnpore Tannery Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 459 (LAT).

11 Certain Workmen of the BIET (I) Ltd v British Institute of Engg Technology (India) (1953) 1 LLJ 592 (LAT).

12 A Sundarambal v Government of Goa, Daman and Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 65 (SC), per Venkataramiah J.

13 Workmen of Nilgiri Coop Mktg. Society Ltd v State of Tamil Nadu AIR 2004 SC 1639 [LNIND 2004 SC 156]:: (2004) 3 SCC 514 [LNIND 2004 SC 156] : (2004) 2 LLJ 253 [LNIND 2004 SC 156] : 2004 LIC 905, per Sinha J.

14 Darshan Lal v Director, State Transport (1998) 1 LLN 665 (P & H), per Chalapathi J.

15 Mgmt of Sonepat Coop Sugar Mills Ltd v Ajit Singh AIR 2005 SC 1050 [LNIND 2005 SC 142]: (2005) 3 SCC 232 [LNIND 2005 SC 142] per Sinha J.

16 Muir Mills Union of NTC Ltd v Swayam Prakash Srivastava AIR 2007 SC 519 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070]: (2007) 1 SCC 491 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070] : (2007) 1 LLJ 801 [LNIND 2006 SC 1070] : 2007 LIC 978, per Lakshmanan J.

17 C Gupta v Glaxo Smithklin Pharmaceuticals Ltd AIR 2007 SC (Supp.) 1244, per Pasayat J.

18 Arkal Govind Raj Rao v Ciba Geigy of India Ltd, Bombay (1985) 2 LLJ 401 [LNIND 1985 SC 177], 404 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 985 [LNIND 1985 SC 177]: 1985 Lab IC 1008 [LNIND 1985 SC 177] : 1985 (1) SCALE 927 [LNIND 1985 SC 177] : (1985) 3 SCC 371 [LNIND 1985 SC 177], per Desai J.

19 All India Reserve Bank Employees' Assn v RBI (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 188 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

20 Bombay Dyeing & Mfg Co Ltd v RA Biddoo (1990) 1 LLJ 98 [LNIND 1989 BOM 210], 101-02 (Bom) (DB), per Jahagirdar J.

21 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v First IT 1982 Lab IC 307, 316 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

22 Bipin Bihari Sinha v Union of India 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 74 (Pat) (DB).

23 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v 1st IT 1982 Lab IC 307,316 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

24 Bipin Bihari Sinha v Union of India 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 74 (Pat) (DB).

25 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v Ist IT 1982 Lab IC 307, 316 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

26 Blue Star Ltd v NR Sharma (1975) 2 LLJ 300, 304 (Del), per Deshpande J.

27 Mcleod & Co v Sixth IT AIR 1958 Cal 273 [LNIND 1958 CAL 37], 280, per PB Mukharji J.

28 GM Pillai v AP Lakhanikar (1998) 2 LLN 690 (Bom), per Lodha J.

29 Lloyds Bank Ltd v Panna Lal Gupta (1961) 2 LLJ 18, 24 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

30 SB Kulkarni v Indian Red Cross Society (1988) 1 LLJ 411 -12 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

31 Mathur Aviation v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi (1977) 2 LLJ 255, 261-62 (Del), per Dalip Kapur J.

32 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 670 -72 (SC), per Bhargava J.

33 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 162, 164 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

34 South India Bank Ltd v AR Chacko (1964) 1 LLJ 19 [LNIND 1963 SC 277], 23 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 1522 [LNIND 1963 SC 277], per Das Gupta J.

35 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 670 -71 (SC) : (1970) 3 SCC 248 [LNIND 1969 SC 507], per Bhargava J.

36 State Bank of Hyderabad v Vasudev Anant Bhide (1969) 2 LLJ 713 [LNIND 1969 SC 181], 727 (SC), per Vaidialingam J

37 Digvijay Cement Co Ltd v Chandvani Jamnadas S (1999) 2 LLJ 1085 (Guj), per Balia J.

38 Ganesh Prasad Pandey v KW Thakre (1999) 1 LLN 918 (929) (Bom), per Lodha J.

39 Union Carbide (India) Ltd v D Samuel (1999) 2 LLN 165 (Bom), per Rebello J.

40 GM, Kores (India) Ltd v PO, LC (1999) 3 LLN 1121 (Ori) (DB), per Dash J.

41 Hindustan Motors Ltd v Fourth IT 1980 Lab IC 267, 269 (Cal) (DB), per MM Dutt J.

42 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v First IT 1982 Lab IC 307, 316 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

43 Mohd Ismail v Government of Andhra Pradesh 1991 Lab IC 772,777 (AP), per Sarma J.

44 Bata Shoe Co Ltd v Ali Hassan (IT) (1956) 1 LLJ 278 (Pat) (DB), per Ramaswami J.

45 R Jagannadham v State of Andhra Pradesh (1958) 1 LLJ 202 (AP), per Chandra Reddi J.

46 East Asiatic Co Ltd v JE Morris (1955) 1 LLJ 418 (LAT).

47 Upper Jumuna Valley Electricity Supply Co Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 50 (LAT).

48 Cawnpore Tannery Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 459 (LAT).

49 Nellimarla Jute Mills Co Ltd v Staff Union (1955) 1 LLJ 167 (LAT).

50 Burmah Shell OS&D Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1955) 2 LLJ 153, 228 (LAT).

51 Pabbojan Tea Co Ltd v LC 1977 Lab I C 721, 730 (Gau) (DB), per Sarma J.

52 Bipin Bihari Sinha v Union of India 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 74 (Pat) (DB).

53 Mgmt of Madura Coats Pvt Ltd, v Presiding Officer, Labour Court (2011) 3 LLJ 183 (Mad .): [2011(128)FLR1040]: 2011 LLR 486, per Chandru J.

54 Lloyds Bank Ltd v Pannal Lal Gupta (1961) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1960 SC 279] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

55 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 162 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

56 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell MS Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC), per Bhargava J.

57 Blue Star Ltd v NR Sharma (1975) 2 LLJ 300 (Del), per Deshpande J.

58 GL Pahwa v New India Assurance Co Ltd (2000) 3 LLN 963 (Del), per Sikri J.

59 Workmen of Macfarlane and Co v Fifth IT (1964) 2 LLJ 556, 558 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

60 Lloyds Bank Ltd v Panna Lal Gupta (1961) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1960 SC 279], 24 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

61 HR Adyanthaya v Sandoz (India) Ltd, AIR 1994 SC 2608 [LNIND 1994 SC 715]: (1994) 5 SCC 737 [LNIND 1994 SC 715], per Sawant J.

62 Mukesh K Tripathi v LIC of India AIR 2004 SC 4179 (4184, 86) : (2004) 8 SCC 387 : (2004) 3 LLJ 740 : 2004 LIC 3688 per Sinha J.

63 Twenty First Century Printers Ltd v KP Abraham (2009) 2 LLJ 378 [LNIND 2008 BOM 759] (Bom) : [2008 (119) FLR 883], per Bobde J.

64 Vijay D Kale v Pieco Electronics & Electricals Ltd (2009) 3 LLJ 262 [LNIND 2009 BOM 90] (Bom) : 2009 (2) Mh Lj 628, per Bobde J.

65 Kirloskar Electric Co Ltd v Government of NCT, Delhi (2010) 2 LLJ 701 (Del), per Agarwal J.

66 Standard Chartered Bank v Vandana Joshi (2010) 2 LLJ 409 [LNIND 2009 BOM 1122] (Bom) : 2010 (112) Bom LR 69 : [2010 (124) FLR 960], per Chandrachud J.

67 Vandana Joshi v Standard Chartered Bank (2011) 2 LLJ 261 (Bom) (DB : 2010 (112) Bom LR 4514), per More J.

68 Mgmt, Multan SSC Eye Hospital v PO, LC (2012) 3 LLJ 479 (Del) : 187 (2012) DLT 756, per Khanna J.

69 Union of India v Central Government IT 1986 Lab IC 1269, 1274 (Cal), per UC Banerjee J.

70 Hussain M Mhasvadkar v BISLB (2001) 4 LLN 766, 770 (SC), per Doraiswamy Raju J.

71 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell MS Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC), per Bhargava J.

72 Standard Vaccum Oil Co v Commr of Labour (1959) 2 LLJ 771 [LNIND 1959 MAD 98], 777 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

73 Aparna Kumar Dhargupta v United Industrial Bank India Ltd 1979 Lab IC 506, 509 (Cal), per Bannerjea J.

74 Mathur Aviation v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi (1977) 2 LLJ 255, 262 (Del), per Dalip Kapur J.

75 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 670 -72 (SC), per Bhargava J.

76 Syndicate Bank Ltd v Workmen (1966) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1965 SC 321], 199 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

77 Michael Villavarayar v His Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 203 [LNIND 1963 MAD 13], 207 (Mad) (DB), per Anantanarayan J.

78 Gouri Charan Kanungo v PO, IT 1977 Lab IC 1154, 1157 (Ori) (DB), per Acharya J.

79 Ved Prakash Gupta v Delton Cable India Pvt Ltd 1984 Lab IC 658 [LNIND 1984 SC 380], 662 (SC), per Varadarajan J.

80 RG Makwana v Gujarat State Road Transport Corpn (1987) 1 LLJ 172, 174 (Guj), per Gokulakrishnan CJ.

81 Central Bank of India v ACL (2000) 1 LLJ 167 [LNIND 1999 ALL 245] (All), per Seth J.

82 R Devanath v PO, LC (2000) 4 LLN 234 (Mad), per Venkatachalam J.

83 Mgmt of Chem Crown (India) Ltd v PO, Addl LC (2000) 2 LLJ 410 [LNIND 2000 MAD 256] (Mad), per Venkatachalm J.

84 LIC of India v IT, (2002) 1 LLN 305 (Ker), per Hairharan Nair J.

85 Shaw Wallace & Co Ltd v PO, Second Addl IT (2002) 1 LLN 317 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

86 Rajamma VK v LC (2003) 4 LLJ 740 (Ker), per Nair J.

87 Varadachari R v Mgmt of PTI (2003) 2 LLJ 420 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

88 MR Damon (Ms) v MM Raja Dass (2003) 2 LLJ 730 (Mad) : 2003 (2) CTC 161 [LNIND 2003 MAD 426], per Govindarajan J.

89 Manoranjan Chakrabortty v State of West Bengal (2003) 4 LLJ 876 (Cal), per Ray J.

90 Gujarat Industrial Coop Bank Ltd v Jobanputra (2005) 4 LLJ 153 (Guj), per HK Rathod J.

91 Burmah Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Burmah Shell MS Assn (1970) 2 LLJ 590 [LNIND 1970 SC 452] (SC), per Bhargava J.

92 Vinry Kumar Majoo v State of Rajasthan (1968) 2 LLJ 398, 401 (Raj), per Kan Singh J.

93 Toshniwal Bros Pvt Ltd v Delhi Administration (1976) ILR 2 (Del) 548, per HL Anand J.

94 Shrikant Vishnu Palwankar v PO, First LC 1992 Lab IC 722, 725 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

95 Ananda Bazar Patrika v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 670 -71 (SC) : (1970) 3 SCC 248 [LNIND 1969 SC 507], per Bhargava J.

96 Shrikant Vishnu Palwankar v PO, First LC (1992) 2 LLJ 378 [LNIND 1991 BOM 553], 382 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

97 Somnath T Galande v PO, LC (2008) 2 LLJ 767 [LNIND 2008 BOM 124] (Bom) : 2008 (2) ALL MR 628: 2008 (5) Bom CR 865 [LNIND 2008 BOM 124], per Swatantra Kumar J.

98 Packard Motor Car Co v National Labour Relations Board 91 L Ed 1040.

1 All India Reserve Bank Employees' Assn v RBI (1965) 2 LLJ 175 [LNIND 1965 SC 146], 186-87 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 305 [LNIND 1965 SC 146]: [1966] 36 Comp Cas 165 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

2 Kerala State Electricity Workers Federation v Kerala SEB (1983) 2 LLJ 30, 32 (Ker), per Narendran J.

3 Bipill Bihari Sinha v Union of India 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 74 (Pat) (DB).

4 Balbir Singh v State of Haryana 1983 Lab IC 996 -97 (P&H), per Tewatia J.

5 Syndicate Bank Ltd v Workmen (1966) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1965 SC 321], 199 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

6 Re Shree Madhav Mills Ltd (1966) 2 LLJ 827, 831 (Bom), per KK Desai J.

7 Saroj Ramesh Shah v Balakriskna Pen Pvt Ltd (1995) 1 LLJ 176 [LNIND 1994 BOM 338], 179 (Bom), per Kapadia J.

8 Pushpa Gupta v Chmn & MD, Engineers India Ltd (1995) 1 LLJ 1023 [LNIND 1994 DEL 814], 1029 (Del), per KS Bhat J.

9 Ardeshir DM Hospital v State of Bihar (2000) 3 LLN 1060 (Pat), per Eqbal J.

10 Orissa SRTCEAU v Orissa SRTC (2001) 2 LLN 520 (Ori), per Mohapatra J.

11 Manganese Ore (India) Ltd v Union of India (2001) 4 LLN 249 (Bom), per Gundewar J.

12 Assembly of God Hospital & Research Centre v First IT (2002) 4 LLN 721 (Cal), per Seth J.

13 Rajasthan Medical and Sales Representatives Union v IRI (P) Ltd (2001) 1 432 (Raj) (DB).

14 Government of India (2002) Report of the NCL-II, Chap 13 p 37, para 6.19 & 6.20.

15 Standard Chartered Grindlays Bank REA v Union of India, (2007) 2 LLJ 887 [LNIND 2007 CAL 19] (Cal).

16 SL Soni v Rajasthan State Mineral Development Corporation Ltd 1986 Lab IC 468, 472 (Raj), per SC Agrawal J.

17 Dunlop (India) Ltd v Delhi Administration 1973 Lab IC 640 (Del) (DB), per Hardy J.

18 Kesoram Ind & Cotton Mills Ltd v Third IT 1987 Lab IC 769 -71 (Cal) (DB), per Susanta Chatterjee J.

19 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, p 37, para 6.22.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

S. 3. Works Committee.—

(1) In the case of any individual establishment in which one hundred or more workmen are employed or have been employed on any day in the preceding twelve months, the appropriate government may by general or special order require the employer to constitute in the prescribed manner a Works Committee consisting of representatives of employers and workmen engaged in the establishment, so however, that the number of representatives of workmen on the Committee shall not be less than the number of representatives of the employer. The representatives of the workmen shall be chosen in the prescribed manner from among the workmen engaged in the establishment and in consultation with their trade union, if any, registered under the Indian Trade Unions Act 1926 (16 of 1926).

(2) It shall be the duty of Works Committee to promote measures for securing and preserving amity and good relations between the employer and workmen and, to that end, to comment upon matters of their common interest or concern and endeavour to compose any material difference of opinion in respect of such matters.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

The provision for the Constitution of a works committee was, for the first time, made in the original Industrial Disputes Act of 1947. It has not undergone any amendment so far. These committees are analogous to the 'joint production committees' in the United States, Russia, and Britain.[1] The legislatures of certain states, who have enacted their own Acts for the investigation and settlement of industrial disputes, have also made provision for such committees. The Central Provinces and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act 1947, by s 21 provided for the Constitution of a works committee.[2]Likewise, s 36 of the Madhya Pradesh Industrial Relations Act 1960 and s 48 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946 also provide for the Constitution of joint committees.

OBJECTS AND PURPOSES OF THE WORKS COMMITTEE

The Act postulates the investigation and settlement of an 'industrial dispute' through a three-fold process, ie:

(i) voluntary negotiation;

(ii) mediation or conciliation; and

(iii) arbitration or adjudication.

The institution of a works committee is the first step in the process of investigation and settlement of industrial disputes by the direct method of negotiations between the representatives of employers and the representatives of workmen engaged in an industrial establishment. The Royal Commission on Labour had suggested that works committees should be formed for establishing close contacts and cordial relations between managements and employees. Power, therefore, has been given to the appropriate government to require works committees to be constituted in every industrial establishment employing one hundred workmen or more, and their duties are to remove causes of friction between employers and workmen in the day to day working of the establishment and to promote measures for securing amity and good relations between them. Industrial peace will be most enduring where it is founded on voluntary settlement. A works committee, therefore, is created with a view to rendering recourse to the remaining machinery, provided in the Act for the settlement of disputes.[3]A works committee, constituted under s 3 is one of the authorities under the Act. The intention of the legislature in creating a works committee and dubbing it as an authority under the Act is to secure industrial harmony between those who are connected with the working in the establishment concerned and to see that good and amicable relationship is prevalent between the employers and the workmen. Further, the object in the formation of a works committee is the promotion of amity and good relations between the employer and the workmen and to place all the matters before the said authority so that any difference between the employer and the workmen in the matters concerning the industry should be composed and settled. This, being the laudable object with which the works committee has been created by the Act as a statutory functionary, it is essential that the authorities who undertake the formation of such a works committee should see that the committee is really a works committee as contemplated by the Act and not a committee to subserve certain exclusive sectional interests.[4]

It has been provided that the works committee shall consist of at least equal number of representatives of workmen and representatives of the employer on the committee, with a view to ensure a democratic setup. Furthermore, it has been provided that the representatives of workmen shall be chosen in the prescribed manner from among the workmen engaged in the establishment. Part 7 (rr 38 to 57) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, has made elaborate provisions for the Constitution of works committees, election of representatives of workmen, their term of office, dissolution of such committees, etc. In case, there is a registered trade union operating in the industrial establishment, in addition to compliance with the requirements of rr 38 to 57, representatives of the workmen shall have to be chosen in consultation with the trade union. The relevant rules of Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 are rr 38 to 43. Evidently, these rules do not contemplate nomination of representatives of workmen in any situation and circumstance whatsoever. Rule 38 requires an employer, to whom an order made under s 3(1) of the Act relates, to constitute a works committee in the prescribed manner. Rule 39 contemplates that the total members constituting a works committee shall not exceed 20 and further that the number of representatives of the workmen shall not be less than the representatives of the employer. This rule does not require that the number of the representatives of the employer and the representatives of workmen shall be equal. The true legal position appears to be that, their respective number may or may not be equal. But if it is unequal, the rule steps in and says that the number of representatives of the employer shall not be less than the number of representatives of the workmen which may either be equal or more than the representatives of the employer. In any case, the number of representatives of the workmen shall not be less than the number of representatives of the employer. Nomination of the representatives of the employer is no doubt contemplated by r 40. In fact, that is the only mode in which representatives of the employer may be brought on the works committee. Equally clear is the fact that the representatives of the workmen are to be always elected. The manner of this election may vary but there has to be an election. Rule 41 empowers an employee to ask for certain information whether any workmen of an establishment or numbers of a registered trade union and where he has a reason to believe that the information furnished to him by any trade union is false, he may, after informing the union, refer the matter to the assistant labour commissioner whose decision will be final.

The scheme of the rules for Constitution of works committees provides: Where there is a registered trade union having more than fifty per cent membership of the workers of the establishment, the total number of members of the works committee will be elected without distribution of any constituency; and if in an industry, no trade union registered under the Trade Unions Act represents more than fifty per cent of the members, then only, the election will be held in two constituencies; one from the members of the registered trade union or unions and the other from non-members of the trade unions. Only in the latter contingency, discretion is given to the employer to further sub-divide the constituency into department, section or shed. From this, it is evident that there may be a situation in a particular establishment where some sections may have no membership of any trade union at all, whereas in other sections, there may be membership of trade unions. In such a situation, under r 42 of the Central Rules, it has to divide into two constituencies, ie, members of the registered trade union and non-members. There may be further sub-division in order to provide for representation to any section of the workmen who have no representation in any trade union at all. Where there is a registered trade union in an establishment having more than fifty per cent membership, r 43 will not be attracted. If r 42 does not apply, there is no occasion for r 43 or the proviso therein to come into operation because the latter is not an independent substantive provision.[5]Rule 42 contemplates that the representatives of the workmen are to be elected in two groups but if in an establishment the majority of the workers are in one union, then no division in two groups is necessary. In that situation, the representatives of the workmen will be elected in a single group without any kind of division. There is no provision in the rules to the effect that if the union has majority of the workers as its members, then nomination of the representatives of the workmen may be done by the employer in consultation with the trade union. However, such works committees can only be required by the appropriate government to be constituted only in industrial establishments wherein one hundred or more workmen are employed or have been employed on any day during the twelve months preceding the day of the order of the government under s 3 and r 38. In this section, the expression ‘industrial establishment’ has to be understood as having the same meaning as the term ‘industry’ in s 2(j) of the Act. The order of the government be general or special, ie, the order may be addressed to employers in general in a particular area or in a particular industry employing one hundred or more workmen, or the order, may be addressed to a particular employer who employs one hundred or more person. It is not obligatory on the 'appropriate government' to require the Constitution of a works committee.

SUB-SECTION (1): CONSTITUTION OF WORKS COMMITTEE

Sub-section (1) lays down that in the case of any industrial establishment in which one hundred or more workmen are employed or have been employed on any day in the preceding twelve months, the appropriate government may, by general or special order, require the employer to constitute in the prescribed manner a works committee of representatives of employers and workmen engaged in the establishment, so however that the number of representatives of the workmen on the committee shall not be less than the number of representatives of the employer.[6] Once an order, under sub-s (1) of s 3, is made in respect of an industrial establishment, it is obligatory on the employer to comply with the requirements of the order by constituting a works committee. But before a valid order under s 3(1) is made, the following conditions must exist:

(i) The establishment, with respect to which the order is made, must be an 'industrial establishment', ie, the requirement of section 2(j) must be satisfied.

(ii) There should be 100 or more workmen employed in such establishment on the day of the order or on any day during the twelve months preceding the day of the order.

(iii) Such workmen should be the workmen within the meaning of section 2(s) in relation to the employer on whom the order is made under section 3(1).

(iv) The government making the order should be the 'appropriate government'.

Rule 41 of the ID (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes the method of consultation with the trade unions as required by this provision but even if in some state Rules there is no such provision, the requirement of the section of consultation with the trade unions cannot be dispensed with. The Orissa High Court in Prafulla Mohan Das, held that though the Orissa Industrial Disputes Rules 1959 have not prescribed any manner of consultation with the trade union, the consultation as envisaged by s 3 of the Act, cannot be dispensed with. Therefore, the election held for electing works committee members without consultation with the trade union, is liable to be set aside.[7]

SUB-SECTION (2): FUNCTIONS AND DUTIES OF WORKS COMMITTEE

Sub-section (2) mandatorily enjoins on the works committee to promote measures for securing and preserving amity and good relations as between the employer and the workmen and, to that end, to comment upon matters of their common interest or concern and endeavour to compose any material difference of opinion in respect of such matters.[8] The powers of the works committee in regard to the range of subjects it can discuss, are very wide. There is no subject concerning the relations of employers and employees which the Works Committee is precluded from considering.[9] But the scope of the duties is confined to two things only, ie:

(i) to comment upon matters of common interest between employers and workmen, with a view to promote measures for securing and preserving amity and good relations between them; and

(ii) to endeavour to compose any material difference of opinion in respect of such matters of common interest or concern.

The expression 'comment' in its dictionary meaning means 'a note in explanation; criticism or illustration of something written or said; annotation; a remark as an observation or criticism'. The expression 'endeavour' means 'to try; exert effort; make an earnest attempt; strive'. The duty and authority of the works committee, therefore, cannot extend to anything more than making comments upon matters of common interest or concern and to endeavour to compose any material difference of opinion in respect of such matters. Neither 'comment' nor 'endeavour' could be held to extend to decide the question, on which differences have arisen or are likely to arise, one way or the other. Regarding the nature and functions of the works committee, Das Gupta J observed:

> The language used by the legislature makes it clear that the works committees were not intended to supplant or supersede the unions for the purpose of collective bargaining; they are not authorised to consider real or substantial changes in the conditions of service; their task is only to smooth away frictions that might arise between the workmen and the management in day to day work. By no stretch of imagination can it be said that the duties and functions of the works committee included the decision on such an important matter as the alteration in the conditions of service by rationalisation. ... The fact that the workmen's representatives on the committee agreed to a certain decision, would be no way binding on the workmen or their union. The works committee cannot consider important matters like rationalisation scheme,[10]

The works committees are normally concerned with the problems arising in the day to day working of the concern and the functions of the works committees are to ascertain the grievances of employees, and when the occasion arises to arrive at some agreement also. But the function and responsibility of the works committees, as their very nomenclature indicates, cannot go beyond recommendation, hence they are more or less bodies who, in the first instance, endeavour to compose differences and final decision rests with the parties as a whole. The comments of the works committee, though carry great weight, yet are not conclusive or binding in nature,[11] on the subject of 'employment' or 'non-employment' which would include the case of dismissal',[12] or the re-employment of a 'retrenched workman',[13] or questions involving pay scales or dearness allowance, etc.[14]

FUNCTIONING OF WORKS COMMITTEE IN THE INDUSTRY

In certain cases, works committees have functioned quite successfully to the mutual advantage of workmen and their employers in avoiding serious and difficult situations like litigation, strikes and lockouts, etc. Some of the factors that have generally contributed to the success of works committees are:

(a) existence of cooperation and cordial relations between workers and the management and also trade union;

(b) sympathetic attitude by management, especially in encouraging workers to put forward their grievances and suggestions;

(c) foresight of managements in having prior consultation with the works committees before bringing any changes in respect of welfare measures, service conditions, etc;

(d) higher education standards amongst workers; and

(e) framing of model Constitution and bye-laws for the works committees.

On the other hand, there have been formidable difficulties in the smooth functioning of the works committees some of which are:

(a) lack of appreciation on the part of the management and the workmen's representatives of the functions and significance of the committees;

(b) illiteracy and lack of understanding amongst the workers, especially those employed in backward areas;

(c) disinclination of workers' representatives on the works committee to participate in the deliberations of the committee;

(d) too high an expectation by workers from their representatives who, being unable to satisfy the high expectations, become unpopular and are disinclined to serve on the committees; and

(e) lack of cooperation of the trade union leaders and in some cases even their opposition to the Constitution and functioning of the works committees on account of the fear that their own representative character will cease, if works committees function.

There have been instances of trade unions regarding the works committees as their rivals; and of opposing the formation of works committees due to inter-union rivalry.[15] The NCL-II, while recognising that workers participation in management introduced statutorily through the institution of works committees had not been successful, perhaps because of the method of Constitution of works committees and the functions assigned to these committees, recommended that the works committee should be substituted by an industrial relations committee to promote in-house dispute settlement.[16]

DISSOLUTION OF WORKS COMMITTEE

Rule 57 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, empowers an officer or authority to whom power under s 3 has been delegated under s 39, to dissolve a works committee, in the manner prescribed in that Rule, if the officer or authority is satisfied that the committee has not been constituted in accordance with the Rules (rr 38 to 57) or that not less than two-third of the number of representatives of the workmen have, without any reasonable justification, failed to attend three consecutive meetings of the committees, or that the committee has, for any other reason, ceased to function. This power cannot be further delegated. Before the election of successful candidates can be set aside, the rules of natural justice require that a notice on such members or on the union to which they belong, should be served. As no rule requires the employer to maintain a voters' list, the failure of the employer to prepare a voters' list before the election cannot be held to be an irregularity vitiating the election.[17] In Jaspal Singh, the order passed by Central Government under r 57 of Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules dissolving the Works Committee on the ground that the election to the Committee was postponed beyond a date as provided in the r 46 thereof. Rule 46 runs thus:

> 46. Procedure for election
>
> (1) The employer shall fix a date as the closing date for receiving nominations from candidates for election as workmen's representatives on the committee.
>
> (2) For holding the election, the employer shall also fix a date which shall not be earlier than three days and later than fifteen days after the closing date for receiving nominations.
>
> (3) The dates so fixed shall be notified at least seven days in advance to the workmen and the registered trade union or unions concerned. Such notice shall be affixed on the notice board or given adequate publicity amongst the workmen. The notice shall specify the number of seats to be elected by the groups, sections, shops or departments and the number to be elected by the members of the registered trade union or unions and by the non-members.
>
> (4) A copy of such notice shall be sent to the registered trade union or unions concerned. (Italics supplied)

Quashing the order of dissolution, Arun Mishra J of Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the simple fact that the date of election was postponed beyond the date fixed under r 46 was not enough to invalidate the fresh election held after the initial postponement. The learned judge observed that the dissolution order did not deal elaborately with the prejudice caused to the parties by alleged change in the list of voters and by the postponement of election, and directed the matter to be heard and decided afresh.[18] In South Eastern Coalfields, the brief facts were: the Central Government issued an order directing the company to constitute Works Committee. In reply the company made a representation to the Government to grant exemption under s 36B of ID Act in view of the fact that there was in existence in the company an effective Grievance Redressal Mechanism. The Government rejected the representation on the ground that a statutory committee cannot be substituted on by any other committee. (It is to be noted here that at that time s 9C was not yet enforced). Allowing the writ petition, Sujoy Paul J of Madhya Pradesh High Court held that on a conjoint reading of s 3 and s 36B, it was crystal clear that the test for deciding the question of exemption was "whether there exists adequate provision for investigation and settlement of industrial disputes and that the litmus test was whether the provision and committee mentioned by the company were well equipped and suitable to investigate and settle the industrial disputes of workmen." The learned judge observed that the application was rejected by the Government at threshold solely on the ground that the statutory committee could not be substituted by any other committee without going into the nature of activity, the grievance redressal mechanism and the scope of its intervention in industrial disputes, etc.[19]

---

1 Joint Production Committees in Great Britain, ILO Publication Studies and Reports, Series A, No 42, p 1.

2 Subs by Amended Act no 21 of 1955.

3 Statement of Objects and Reasons', Gazette of India, Pt 5, 239-40.

4 MD Ramakrishnan v Tamilnadu Electricity Board (1971) 1 LLJ 433, 435-36 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

5 Union of India v MTSSD Workers Union (1988) 1 LLJ 543 [LNIND 1988 SC 58], 547 (SC), per Oza J.

6 MD Ramakrishnan v Tamilnadu Electricity Board (1971) 1 LLJ 433, 435-36 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

7 Prafulla Mohan Das v Steel Authority of India Ltd (1992) 1 LLJ 621 (Ori) (DB).

8 MD Ramakrishnan (supra).

9 Metal Box Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1952) 1 LLJ 822 (LAT).

10 Northbrook Jute Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1960 SC 87], 583 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 879 [LNIND 1960 SC 87], per Das Gupta J.

11 Kemp & Co Ltd v Workmen (1955) 1 LLJ 48, 53 (LAT).

12 Elgin Mills Co Ltd v Suti Mill Mazdoor Union (1951) 1 LLJ 184 (LAT).

13 JK Jute Mill Co Ltd v Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sabha (1952) 1 LLJ 184 (LAT).

14 Kemp & Co (supra).

15 Ministry of Labour, Government of India, at the 17th session of the Indian Labour Conference, pp 72-74.

16 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 116, para 12.48.

17 Peerjade Husen Sab Mohadin v Commissioner of Labour (1964) 2 LLJ 451 (Mys) (DB) : [1965(10)FLR12].

18 Jaspal Singh v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 886 (MP), per Mishra J.

19 South Eastern Coalfields Ltd v Union of India (2013) 4 LLJ 301 (MP) : ILR [2013] MP 2631, per Sujoy Paul J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

S. 4. Conciliation Officers.—

(1) The appropriate government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint such number of persons as it thinks fit, to be conciliation officers, charged with the duty of mediating in and promoting the settlement of industrial disputes.

(2) A conciliation officer may be appointed for a specified area or for specified industries in a specified area or for one or more specified industries and either permanently or for a limited period.

LEGISLATION

In the repealed Indian Trade Disputes Act of 1929, there was no provision for the appointment of conciliation officers. The conciliation machinery in that Act consisted only of a 'Board of Conciliation' which by experience proved to be inadequate to meet the situation. Consequently, s 18A was added to that Act in 1938 whereby the Central and provincial governments were authorised to appoint 'Conciliation Officers' to act as 'mediators' in 'trade disputes', and this provision has been reincarnated in s 4 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947. It is discretionary on the part of the 'appropriate government' to appoint conciliation officers. If the government decides to make appointment of conciliation officers, the appointment shall be by a notification in the Official Gazette. The government again has the discretion to appoint any number of persons to be conciliation officers as it thinks fit. The duty of conciliation officers is to mediate in and promote the settlement of industrial disputes.

SUB-SECTION (1): APPOINTMENT OF A CONCILIATION OFFICER

Sub-section (1) empowers the 'appropriate government' to appoint any number of persons, as it thinks fit, to be conciliation officers to perform the duties of mediating in industrial disputes and promoting their settlement. Such appointment has to be made by a notification in the Official Gazette of the government. Any person whose appointment as conciliation officer has not been notified in the Official Gazette of the government cannot discharge the duties of a conciliation officer.[20] A notification issued under this provision cannot be retrospectively amended by adding new persons to be conciliation officers. Such amendment will be invalid in the eyes of law. Furthermore, if the earlier notification itself has already been superseded, the question of amendment of a non-existent notification would not arise.[21]

SUB-SECTION (2)

Appointment for Specified Area or Industries

Sub-section (2) further empowers the 'appropriate government' to appoint conciliation officers who have been appointed as such under sub-s (1), to discharge their duties in specified areas or for specified industries in a specified area or for one or more specified industries either permanently or for a limited period. The appointment of conciliation officers in such specified areas or industries as contemplated by this sub-section does not postulate such appointment to be made by a notification in the Official Gazette. The position, therefore, is that a person becomes a conciliation officer as soon as his appointment is made by the appropriate government 'by notification in the Official Gazette'. Further, the appointment of such conciliation officers for a specified area or for specified industries in a specified area or for one or more specified industries is not required to be made by a notification in the Official Gazette. This point arose before the Supreme Court in Jhagrakhand Collieries (supra). However, as the fact of the appointment of the conciliation officer concerned, by a notification in the Official Gazette of the appropriate government, that itself was not clear from the record, hence the court did not decide the point on the basis of the inadequate facts.

Mediation

Mediation is a process wherein a third party attempts to secure settlement of labour disputes by persuading the parties either to continue their negotiations or to consider procedural or substantive recommendations that the mediator may make.[22]Section 2(d) defines 'Conciliation Officer' and s 2(e) defines 'conciliation proceedings'. Section 11 inter alia, lays down the procedure and powers of the conciliation officers. Under s 12, the duties of conciliation officers are prescribed. In case of public utility services, where notice of strike or lockout is given under s 22, it is obligatory on the conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings. In non-public utility services and in public utility services, where notice of strike or lockout is not given, the conciliation officer has, however, the discretion to decide whether or not to hold conciliation proceedings.[23] A conciliation proceeding in a public utility service is deemed to have commenced on the day on which the notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is received by a conciliation officer.[24]In connection with the proceedings in case of non-public utility service and in public utility service where no notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is given, the Act is silent. But in a non-public utility concern, from r 10 of the Central Rules, it appears that the conciliation proceedings will commence on the day mentioned in the formal notice given by the conciliation officer. However, the Act and the Rules are completely silent as to on what date the conciliation proceeding in a public utility concern where no notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is given and there is an 'industrial dispute' existing or apprehended, can be deemed to have commenced. Rule 12 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, enjoins on the conciliation officer to conduct proceedings expeditiously in such manner as he deems fit. By s 11(2) of the Act and r 23 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, the conciliation officer is empowered to enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates, after giving reasonable notice to parties, and inspect the same or any work, machinery, appliance or article therein, or interrogate any person therein in respect of anything situated therein or anything relevant to the subject-matter of the conciliation. Section 11 (4) of the Act empowers the conciliation officer to enforce attendance of any person for the purpose of examination of such person or to call for and inspect any document which he has ground for considering to be relevant to the dispute or necessary for the purpose of verifying the implementation of any award. In this connection, he enjoys the same powers as are vested in a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 36(3) imposes a complete bar against the parties being represented by legal practitioners in any conciliation proceedings. The persons, by whom the parties are entitled to be represented, have been enumerated in s 36.

Nature of the Functions of Conciliation Officer in Conciliation Proceedings

The functions of a conciliation officer are not judicial or quasi-judicial but are administrative in nature but where the duties to be performed by him are judicial or quasi-judicial in nature, then, in connection with everything that they do, the formalities of a judicial trial will have to be observed, eg, they cannot ascertain from one side its views except upon notice to, or in the presence of the other party. It is but patent that no conciliation proceedings could be carried on under such conditions.[25] According to the judicial dicta, the functions of the conciliation officers under s 33 are the same as those of labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals.[26] Since the functions of the labour courts, tribunals and national tribunals are quasi-judicial, a priori the functions of the conciliation officer also should be treated as quasi-judicial. But this is anomalous as neither s 11 nor any other provision of the Act vests a conciliation officer with quasi-judicial powers. The law requires re-statement on this point.

---

20 Jhagrakhand Collieries Pvt Ltd v CGIT 1975 Lab IC 137 (SC), per Sarkaria J.

21 Workmen of Hindustan Construction Co Ltd v Mgmt (1987) 1 LLJ 451 [LNIND 1986 MAD 245], 457 (Mad) (DB), per Chandurkar CJ.

22 Vermo H Jemons, Bibliography on Dispute Settlement by Third Parties, 572 (USA).

23 Tata Collieries Labour Assn v Mgmt of Digwadhi Colliery [1953] LAC 638.

24 Section 20(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, and notes thereunder.

25 Royal Calcutta Golf Club Mazdoor Union v State of West Bengal (1957) 1 LLJ 218 [LNIND 1956 CAL 118] (Cal), per Sinha J.

26 Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 199 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

S. 5. Boards of Conciliation.-

(1) The appropriate government may as occasion arises by notification in the Official Gazette constitute a Board of Conciliation for promoting the settlement of an industrial dispute.

(2) A Board shall consist of a chairman and two or four other members, as the appropriate government thinks fit.

(3) The chairman shall be an independent person and the other members shall be persons appointed in equal numbers to represent the parties to the dispute and any person appointed to represent a party shall be appointed on the recommendation of that party:

Provided that, if any party fails to make a recommendation as aforesaid within the prescribed time, the appropriate government shall appoint such persons as it thinks fit to represent that party.

(4) A Board, having the prescribed quorum, may act notwithstanding the absence of the chairman or any of its members or any vacancy in its number:

Provide d that if the appropriate government notifies the Board that the services of the chairman or of any other member have ceased to be available, the Board shall not act until a new chairman or member, as the case may be, has been appointed.

LEGISLATION

Section 6 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act of 1929, provided for the Constitution of boards while s 7 laid down the duties of the boards. The present section is based on s 6 of the repealed Act of 1929.

CONSTITUTION AND FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD OF CONCILIATION

According to the present section, a board consists of a chairman and two or four other members, as the 'appropriate government' thinks fit, who are appointed in equal numbers to represent the parties to a particular dispute. The chairman of the board must be an independent person within the meaning of s 2(i) of the Act. The members appointed to represent parties are to be appointed on the recommendation of the parties or if a party fails to make a recommendation within the prescribed time, the appropriate government is to appoint such persons as it thinks fit to represent that party.[27] The quorum for conducting proceedings is two where the strength is three and three where the strength is five.[28] Where a dispute is of a complicated nature and the issues involved are important and require special handling, boards are preferred to conciliation officers. However, in recent years no board has been constituted by the Central Government. Disputes are referred to the boards under s 10(1)(a). Section 11 lays down the procedure and powers of the boards, while s 13 deals with the duties of the boards. Section 20 provides for the time limits at which the 'conciliation proceedings' before the board are to be deemed to have commenced and concluded. Section 16 provides for the form of the report of the board which requires publication under s 17. Part 3 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, prescribes the procedure, powers and duties, inter alia of the conciliation boards.[29]

CONCILIATION OFFICER Vs CONCILIATION BOARD

There are certain similarities and dissimilarities in the Constitution and functions of the conciliation officers and the boards.

Similarities

(a) Power to Enter Premises

Both the conciliation officer and members of a board have the power to enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates, after giving reasonable notice for the purpose of inquiry into any existing or apprehended industrial dispute.[30]

(b) Public Servants

The conciliation officers as well as the members of the board are to be deemed to be public servants within the meaning of section 21 of the Indian Penal Code.[31]

(c) Settlement Report

In case of settlement arrived at during the conciliation proceedings before the conciliation officers as well as the board, both have to submit their reports to the appropriate government.[32]

(d) Failure Report

The conciliation officer as well as the board have to submit the failure report to the appropriate government if no settlement is arrived at.[33]

(e) Duty to Promote Settlement

The conciliation officers as well as the boards are charged with the same duties of promoting settlement of industrial disputes.[34]

(f) Powers under Section 33

The powers of the conciliation officers as well as of the board to grant or withhold approval or permission under section 33 to the action of the employer discharging or dismissing a workman during the pendency of conciliation proceedings are similar.

Dissimilarities

(a) Powers regarding Documents and Witnesses

The board has powers:

(1) to enforce the attendance of any person and examining him on oath;

(2) to compel the production of documents and material objects;

(3) to issue commissions for examination of witnesses; and

(4) in respect of other matters that may be prescribed, and every inquiry or investigation by a board is judicial proceeding within the meaning of sections 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code.[35]

A conciliation officer, however, has only the power to enforce attendance of any person for the purpose of examination of such person or to compel the production and inspection of documents.[36]

(b) Procedure

The board has to follow the procedure like the courts and tribunals and subject to any rules that may be made in this behalf; whereas the conciliation officers are not bound by any procedural formalities, and the inquiry by a conciliation officer is of informal nature.[37]

(c) Initiation of Conciliation Proceedings

A conciliation officer can initiate proceedings in case of the public utility service only after a notice under section 22 has been given, and in any other case, he may in his discretion, hold the conciliation proceedings where an 'industrial dispute' is existing or is apprehended.[38]But the conciliation proceedings before a board can commence only after a reference has been made to it under section 10(1) of the Act by the 'appropriate government'.[39]

(d) Statement in Failure Report

The conciliation officer in his 'failure report' has only to state the facts and circumstances of the dispute along with the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, the settlement could not he arrived at,[40] whereas the board in its report has to state:

(1) the steps taken by it for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof;

(2) statement of facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof;

(3) its findings on the facts and circumstances of the dispute;

(4) the reasons on account of which, in its opinion, the settlement could not be arrived at; and

(5) its recommendations for the determination of the dispute.[41]

(e) Publication for Settlement or Failure Report

The settlement recorded or the failure report submitted by the board under section 13(3) is required to be published under section 17 ; whereas no such publication is required for the settlement recorded or the failure report submitted by the conciliation officer under section 12(4) of the Act.

(f) Period for Submission of Report

The period for submission of the conciliation officers' report is 14 days from the date of commencement of the proceedings or any other shorter period that may be fixed by the appropriate government and this period may be extended by agreement of the parties in writing[42] whereas the period for submission of the report of the board is two months from the date of reference of the dispute to it or a shorter period that may be fixed by the appropriate government and this period may be extended by agreement of all the parties in writing; or by the government for father time not exceeding two months in aggregate.[43]

(g) Commencement and Conclusion of Conciliation Proceedings

Before a conciliation officer, the conciliation proceedings commence on the date on which a notice of strike or lockout under section 22 is received by him in case of a public utility concern and in any other cases on the date indicated by him in formal notice under rule 10 of the Central Rules or the corresponding state rule, and conclude on the date of signing of the memorandum of settlement by the parties and in case of 'no settlement', on the date on which the appropriate government receives the report of the conciliation officer except in the case of a reference under section 10(1) of the Act being made during the pendency of the conciliation proceedings in which case the conciliation proceedings conclude on the date on which the reference is made. Before the board, the proceedings commence on the date the dispute is referred to it under section 10(1) (a) and conclude on the date on which the report of the board is published under section 17 of the Act.[44]

(h) Number of Members

A conciliation officer has to act singly for bringing about the settlement of the industrial dispute between the parties while the board consists of a chairman and two or four other members.

(i) Permanency of Tenure

A conciliation officer is a permanent employee on the rolls of the Government, usually belonging to the Labour Department, whereas a conciliation board is temporary in so far as it comes into being on being appointed by the appropriate government and stands dissolved once the purpose is served, i.e., after the settlement has been arrived at between the parties or a failure report has been submitted by the board to the government.

---

27 Section 5 of the ID Act and r 6 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957.

28 Section 5(4) of the ID Act and r 14(1) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957.

29 Rules 9 to 30 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957.

30 Section 11(2).

31 Section 11(6).

32 Sections 12(3) and 13(2).

33 Sections 12(4) and 13(3).

34 Sections 4 and 5.

35 Section 11(3) and r 23 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957.

36 Section 11 (4).

37 Section 11(1).

38 Section 12(1) ; KH Gandhi v Sinha (RNP) (1958) 1 LLJ 82 (Pat) (DB), per Sinha J.

39 Section 13(1).

40 Section 12(4).

41 Section 13(5).

42 Section 12(6).

43 Section 13(5).

44 Section 20.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

S. 6. Courts of Inquiry.—

(1) The appropriate government may as occasion arises by notification in the Official Gazette constitute a court of inquiry for inquiring into any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute.

(2) A court may consist of one independent person or of such number of independent persons as the appropriate government may think fit and where a court consists of two or more members, one of them shall be appointed as the chairman.

(3) A court, having the prescribed quorum, may act notwithstanding the absence of the chairman or any of its members or any vacancy in its number:

Provided that, if the appropriate government notifies the court that the services of the chairman have ceased to be available, the court shall not act until a new chairman has been appointed.

LEGISLATION

This provision was enacted in the original Act of 1947. Rule 5 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 provides that the appointment of a court of inquiry together with the names of persons constituting the court shall be notified in the Official Gazette.

COURT OF INQUIRY

Section 2(f) defines a 'court of inquiry'. Section 6 enables the 'appropriate government' to constitute a court of inquiry and the reference to that court of any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute has to be made under s 10(1)(b).[45]Section 11 prescribes the procedure and powers of the 'court of inquiry'. Section 14 lays down the duties of the court of inquiry. Section 16 provides for the form of the report which requires publication under s 17. During the pendency of proceedings before a court of inquiry, there is no bar against workmen going on strike, (s 22). Likewise, there is no bar against the employer declaring a lockout (s 23). Section 33, does not bar the employer from taking action against a workman during the pendency of proceedings before the court of inquiry.

45 Ushodaya Publications Pvt Ltd v Govt of AP 1983 Lab IC 580, 592 (AP) (DB), per Kuppuswami CJ.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[46][S. 7. Labour Courts.—

(1) The appropriate government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, constitute one or more labour courts for the adjudication of industrial disputes relating to any matter specified in the Second Schedule and for performing such other functions as may be assigned to them under this Act.

(2) A labour court shall consist of one person only to be appointed by the appropriate government.

(3) A person shall not be qualified for appointment as the presiding officer of a labour court, unless—

47[(a) he is, or has been, a judge of a High Court; or

(b) he has, for a period of not less than three years, been a district judge or an additional district judge; or

48[(c) ***];

49[(d)] he has held any judicial office in India for not less than seven years; or

50[(e)] he has been the presiding officer of a labour court constituted under any Provincial Act or State Act for not less than five years.]

51[(f) he is or has been a Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) or Joint Commissioner of the State Labour Department, having a degree in law and at least seven years' experience in the labour department including three years of experience as Conciliation Officer:

Provided that no such Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner or Joint Labour Commissioner shall be appointed unless he resigns from the service of the Central Government or State Government, as the case may be, before being appointed as the presiding officer; or

(g) he is an officer of Indian Legal Service in Grade III with three years' experience in the grade.]

LEGISLATION

The Industrial Disputes Act of 1947, as originally enacted did not contain provisions regarding the creation of labour courts. By the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of 1956, for the old s 7, the present ss 7, 7 A, 7B, and 7C were substituted. Apart from s 7, which defines a 'labour court', the Second Schedule of the Act, was also inserted by the same amending Act of 1956. Section 7 has been amended by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964 (Act 36 of 1964), whereby cll (a) and (b) of the old sub-s (3) have been respectively relettered as cll (d) and (e) in the present sub-s (3) and present cll (a), (b) and (c) of sub-s (3) have been inserted afresh. As a result of this amendment, cll (a), (b) and (c) in sub-s (3) are now the same as cll (a), (aa) and (b) of sub-s (3) of the amended s 7A. By this amendment, the range of persons qualified to be appointed as presiding officers has been enlarged.

SUB-SECTION (1)

(i) Constitution of Labour Courts

The appropriate government has been empowered by sub-s (1) of s 7 to constitute one or more labour courts in a state. Thus, the provision is wide enough to enable the appropriate government to constitute more than one labour court. The Central Government may constitute labour courts in any state for adjudication of the matters in respect of which it is the 'appropriate government' while a State Government may constitute labour courts in its territories for adjudication of the matters in relation to which it is the 'appropriate government'. This section does not provide for any territorial limits to the jurisdiction of the labour courts so constituted. It is permissible for the appropriate government to refer any 'industrial dispute' in whatever territory of the state it may arise, to any of the labour courts, though no doubt for the purposes of convenience, it may decide to refer only disputes arising in a particular region to the labour court in that region.[52] The labour courts are to be appointed by a notification in the Official Gazette of the 'appropriate government'. This clause is self-contained so far as the Constitution of the labour courts is concerned. As soon as a notification under this clause is issued, the labour court is constituted. The government may take time to appoint a person as the presiding officer of the labour court but the appointment of the presiding officer cannot be held to be a part of the Constitution of the labour court. If for any reason a vacancy occurs in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, the 'appropriate government' shall appoint another person to fill the vacancy under s 8 of the Act.[53]This sub-section merely provides for the Constitution of labour courts and lays down that they shall be competent to adjudicate upon any matters specified in the Second Schedule and to perform such other functions as may be assigned to them under the Act. But this provision does not indicate as to how a labour court will take congnizance of a dispute. From s 10, it is clear that the labour court can take cognizance of an industrial dispute only on a reference having been made to it under that section. Hence, a party to a dispute cannot approach a labour court directly for adjudication of an industrial disputes.[54]

(ii) Functions of Labour Courts

The labour courts shall be constituted for:

(a) adjudication of industrial disputes relating to any matters specified in the Second Schedule [section 7(1)] or matters appearing to be connected with or relevant to such disputes [section 10(1)(c)]; and

(b) performing such other functions as may be assigned to them under the Industrial Disputes Act [section 7(1) and s 33C(2)].

(a) Adjudication of Industrial Disputes

The Second Schedule specifically refers to s 7, which provides for the Constitution of labour courts for the adjudication of industrial disputes relating to matters in that schedule and for performing such other functions as may be assigned to them[55] but the first proviso to s 100) lays down that where the disputes relates to a matter specified in the Third Schedule, if it is not likely to effect more than 100 workmen, it can be referred to a labour court. Thus, disputes arising under Second Schedule can alone be adjudicated by a labour court unless the case falls under the first proviso to s 10(l) of the Act in which case the dispute under the Third Schedule can also be adjudicated upon by the labour court.[56] Therefore, if on the facts of a case, it appears that the dispute relating to a matter covered in the Third Schedule is likely to affect more than 100 workmen, the reference to the labour court would be invalid.[57] Item 6 of the Second Schedule is the residuary item under which, except the matters specified in the Third Schedule in respect of which, the industrial tribunal has exclusive jurisdiction, not only the labour court, but even the industrial tribunal will have jurisdiction to adjudicate.[58] The jurisdiction of the labour court to adjudicate upon matters enumerated in the Second Schedule, or matters in the Third Schedule in cases falling under the first proviso to s 10(1), or upon all matters other than those specified in the Third Schedule, springs from the reference made to it by the 'appropriate government' under s 10 of the Act.[59] Once a labour court is constituted to deal with 'industrial disputes', the 'appropriate government' has to refer to it such disputes as fall within its jurisdiction. However, if there are more than one labour courts so authorised in any area, there would obviously be a choice of forum, unless there were certain rules under which such choice is limited.[60] The functions of a labour court are of great public importance and are quasi-judicial in nature. The principles of adjudication of the disputes referred to the labour courts constituted under s 7, industrial tribunals constituted under s 7A and national tribunals constituted under s 7B are the same. The jurisdiction of the labour court stems from the order of reference and is sustained until it makes an award and the same becomes enforceable. Once the labour court is seized of jurisdiction by virtue of the order of reference made to it, it cannot be taken away by subsequent acts on the part of the parties.[61] Nor can the jurisdiction of the labour court be taken away by the government by cancelling, withdrawing or superseding the reference once made to it.[62]A labour court, constituted under s 7, cannot be abolished by the 'appropriate government', till it has made the awards in the references made to it, in the absence of a specific provision in the Act. Section 21 of the General Clauses Act cannot be pressed into service. Hence, a notification cancelling a labour court constituted under s 7 and constituting a fresh labour court will operate from the date of that notification (and will not affect references made earlier) and the references made from the dates of the new notification will only be taken cognizance of by the new labour court.[63] It is not permissible for the labour court to entertain more disputes than are contemplated in the reference nor is it permissible for it to decline to adjudicate matters which clearly arise in the terms of the reference.[64]

(b) Performing such other Functions as may be Assigned under this Act

The word 'assign' means conferment of powers under the Act on one or more labour courts, as the case may be.[65] The other matters assignable to labour courts are:

(1) voluntary reference of industrial disputes by a written agreement between the parties under section 10(2) ;

(2) arbitration reference under section 10A ;

(3) application for 'permission' or 'approval' under section 33 ;

(4) application under section 33C(2) for computation of 'any money benefit' which is capable of being computed in terms of money;[66] and

(5) reference of awards or settlements for interpretation in cases of difficulty or doubt under section 36A.

These matters have been dealt with in their proper places under the relevant sections.

(iii) Presiding Officer

The labour court will consist only of one person and such person is to be appointed by the 'appropriate government'. Sub-sections (1) and (2) deal with different subjects. Sub-section (1) refers to the Constitution of labour court while sub-s (2) refers to the appointment of a person as presiding officer of the labour court. There may be a composite notification by which a labour court is constituted and a person is appointed as the presiding officer of that labour court. However, the source of power under each sub-section is distinct. Once a labour court is constituted under sub-s (1) of s 7, it need not be reconstituted again and again whenever there is a vacancy in the post of presiding officer and another person is appointed to that post. This position is clear from s 8 also, which refers to the appointment of a person in accordance with the provisions of the Act to fill a vacancy occurring in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court.[67]

(iv) Qualifications of the Presiding Officer of a Labour Court

The labour court is one of the authorities enumerated under Ch II. Sections 7, 7A and s 7B prescribe special qualifications for the presiding officers. These adjudicatory bodies are one man bodies and each of these sections prescribes the qualifications of the presiding officers of the authorities constituted thereunder. In*Statesman*, Hidayatullah CJI observed that the intention of legislature is that persons, who can be described as 'independent' and with sufficient judicial experience, must be selected. The mention of High Court judges and district judges in these sections indicates that ordinarily judicial officers from the civil judiciary must be selected at least so long as separation of judiciary from the executive in the public services is not finally achieved. The appointment of a person from the rank of civil judiciary carries with it an assurance which is unique. From a cursory glance of these sections, it would appear that the selection is most restricted in the case of national tribunals, and in varying degree less and less restricted in cases of tribunals and labour courts. A national tribunal, can only be presided over by a person who is or has been a judge of a High Court. These qualifications do not admit of any doubt or exception since the incumbent's qualifications are quite clearly laid down. In the case of tribunals, the range of selection is made wider by including a district judge or an additional district judge, who held the office for a period of not less than three years. The selection is made still wider in the case of labour courts by making competent, in addition, presiding officers of labour courts constituted under any Provincial Act or State Act for not less than five years, and persons holding judicial office for not less than seven years. This sub-section lays down that a person shall not be qualified for appointment as a presiding officer of a labour court unless:

(1) he is, or has been, a judge of a High Court; or

(2) he has for a period of not less than three years been a district judge or an additional district judge; or

(3) he has held any judicial office in India for not less than seven years; or

(4) he has been a presiding officer of a labour court constituted under any Provincial Act or state Act for not less than five years.

(5) he is or has been a Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) or Joint Commissioner of the State Labour Department, having a degree in law and at least seven years' experience in the labour department including three years of experience as Conciliation Officer; or

(6) he is an officer of Indian Legal Service in Grade III with three years' experience in the grade.

Note: Items (5) and (6) above have been inserted in the year 2010, as indicated in the main section.

In the same case, while considering the question whether a person, who had held the office of a magistrate for not less than seven years, would satisfy the requirement of judicial office within the meaning of s 7(3) (d) of the Act, the learned Chief Justice held that the phrase 'judicial office' postulates that there is an office and that office is primarily judicial. 'Office' means a fixed position for the purpose of duties. The distinction between 'judicial function' and 'judicial office' was held to be artificial and unsubstantial in view of the fact that the magistrate was holding a fixed position for 19 years and performing functions primarily of a judicial character. On this view of the matter, the learned Chief Justice refused to interfere by way of a writ of quo warranto with the appointment of the presiding officer of the labour court in view of the provisions of s 9 of the Act.[68] The Punjab and Haryana High Court has taken the view that the office of registrar to the pensions appeals tribunal is administrative in nature and not a judicial office, even if the tribunal be a judicial or quasi-judicial authority.[69] Likewise, the Bombay High Court held that assistant commissioner of labour in the service of the State Government could not validly be appointed as labour court judge.[70] In Labour Law Practitioners Assn, the Supreme Court quashed the notification issued by the Government of Maharashtra appointing assistant commissioners of labour as judges of labour courts, and observed that bearing in mind the principle of separation of powers and independence of the judiciary, judicial service contemplated a service exclusively of judicial posts in which there would be a hierarchy headed by a district judge. Persons presiding over industrial and labour courts would constitute judicial service so defined. Therefore, the recruitment of labour court judges has to be made in accordance with Art. 234 of the Constitution.[71]

(v) Court Subordinate to the High Court

The Patna High Court, had taken the view that the labour court constituted under s 7 of the Industrial Disputes Act, is a 'court subordinate' to the High Court within the meaning of s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was, however, observed that since the case has been placed before a Division Bench, it would make no difference whether the applications were under s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure or under Art. 227 of the Constitution. For all intents and purposes the court said that the scope of application under s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure or under Art. 227 of the Constitution is not very different.[72] The Gujarat High Court held that labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals are courts within the meaning of s 3 of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971 for the purposes of s 10.[73]

---

46 Sections 7, 7A, 7B and 7C subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 4, for s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

47 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 3 (wef 19-12- 1964).

48 Clause (c) omitted by Act 46 of 1982, s 3 (wef 21-8- 1984).

49 Clauses (a) and (b) relettered as (d) and (e) respectively by Act 36 of 1964, s 3 (wef 19-12-1964).

50 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 3 (wef 19-12-1964).

51 Ins by Act 24 of 2010, s 4 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010)).

52 Muthe Steels (India) Ltd v LC, 1979 Lab IC 325 [LNIND 1980 SC 275], 332 (AP) (DB), per Kuppuswamy J.

53 East India Pharmaceutical Works Ltd v GS Verma 1973 Lab IC 1501, 1502 (Pat) (DB), per SNP Singh J.

54 Vishnu Sadav Bhattacharya v Cycle Industries 1973 Lab IC 396, 397 (MP) (DB), per Raina J.

55 South Indian Bank Ltd v AR Chacko (1964) 1 LLJ 19 [LNIND 1963 SC 277], 21 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

56 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 268, 273 (Guj) (DB), per Shelat CJ.

57 Mgmt of Gauhati Transport Assn v LC 1969 Lab IC 1568, 1573-74 (Assam & Nag), per Goswami J.

58 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v IT (1965) 2 LLJ 268, 273 (Guj) (DB), per Shelat CJ.

59 Working Journalists of 'Hindu' v 'Hindu' (1961) 1 LLJ 288 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

60 Chipping & Painting Employees Asm v AT Zambre (1968) 2 LLJ 193, 198 (Bom) (DB), per Nain J.

61 Working Journalists of 'Hindu' v 'Hindu' (1961) 1 LLJ 288 [LNIND 1960 MAD 138] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

62 State of Bihar v DN Ganguli (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

63 East India Pharmaceutical Works Ltd v GS Verma 1973 Lab IC 1501, 1508-09 (Pat) (DB), per SNP Singh J.

64 Mgmt Gauhati Transport Assn v LC 1969 Lab IC 1568, 1573-74 (DB) (Assam & Nag), per Goswami J.

65 Coromandal Fertilisers Ltd v State of AP (1988) 2 LLJ 390, 391 (AP), per K Ramaswami J.

66 South Indian Bank Ltd v AR Chacko (1964) 1 LLJ 19 [LNIND 1963 SC 277], 21 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

67 Mgmt of Bararee Coke Plant v Workmen 1968 Lab IC 512, 514 (Pat) (DB), per Narasimham CJ.

68 Statesman Pvt Ltd v HR Deb AIR 1968 SC 1495 [LNIND 1968 SC 94], 1497-98 : 1969 (18) FLR 100 : 1968 Lab IC 1525 : [1968] 3 SCR 614 [LNIND 1968 SC 94], per Hidayatullah CJI.

69 Haryana Coop Transport Ltd v State of Punjab 1969 Lab IC 301 (P&H) (DB), per Shamsher Bahadur J.

70 State of Maharashtra v LLP Assn 1987 Lab IC 1061 (Bom) (DB), per Bharucha J.

71 State of Maharashtra v LLP Association (1998) 1 LLJ 868 [LNIND 1998 SC 189] (SC), per Sujata V Manohar J.

72 Calcutta Chemical Co Ltd v Barman (DK) 1969 Lab IC 1498, 1504 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

73 Shaikh Mohammed bhikan Hussainbhai v Manager, Chandrabhanu Cinema 1986 Lab IC 1749 (Guj) (FB).

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[74][S. 7A. Tribunals.—

(1) The appropriate government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, constitute one or more industrial tribunals for the adjudication of industrial disputes relating to any matter, whether specified in the Second Schedule or the Third Schedule [75][and for performing such other functions as may be assigned to them under this Act].

(2) A tribunal shall consist of one person only to be appointed by the appropriate government.

(3) A person shall not be qualified for appointment as the presiding officer of a tribunal unless—

(a) he is, or has been, a judge of a High Court; or

[76][(aa) he has, for a period of not less than three years, been a district judge or an additional district judge [77][].

[78][(b) he is or has been a Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) or Joint Commissioner of the State Labour Department, having a degree in law and at least seven years' experience in the labour department including three years of experience as Conciliation Officer:

Provided that no such Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner or Joint Labour Commissioner shall be appointed unless he resigns from the service of the Central Government or State Government, as the case may be, before being appointed as the presiding officer; or

(c) he is an officer of Indian Legal Service in Grade III with three years' experience in the grade.]

(4) The appropriate government may, if it so thinks fit, appoint two persons as assessors to advise the tribunal in the proceeding before it].

LEGISLATION

There was no provision of any adjudicatory machinery in the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. Tribunals were created for the first time by s 7 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, for the purpose of 'adjudicating' upon 'industrial disputes', referred to them by the 'appropriate government', thus introducing 'compulsory adjudication' where voluntary negotiations or mediation through the machinery of conciliation authorities fail. But after the experience of a decade, the employers and workmen have been given the option to refer industrial disputes to voluntary arbitration by mutual agreement in writing under s 10A of the Act. By the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956, original s 7 was replaced by the present ss 7, 7A, 7B and 7C. Section 7A empowers the appropriate government to constitute industrial tribunals. This section has been further amended by s 4 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964, by the insertion of cl (aa). Consequently, now, even a person who has been a 'district judge' or 'additional district judge', for a period not less than three years, can be appointed as presiding officer of an industrial tribunal.

SUB-SECTION (1)

(i) Constitution of Industrial Tribunals

The appropriate government has been empowered by s 7A to constitute one or more industrial tribunals. The Central Government can appoint tribunals in any state for the adjudication of the 'industrial disputes' in relation to which it is the 'appropriate government'. A State Government may constitute one or more industrial tribunals in its territory, for adjudicating the matters in respect to which it is the appropriate government. The appointment of the industrial tribunals has to be made by the appropriate government by means of a notification in its Official Gazette. The moment a notification under this sub-section is issued in the Official Gazette. the establishment of the industrial tribunal is complete and permanent. The appointment of the presiding officer of the tribunal, though essential, is a separate matter. However, the appropriate government can constitute a tribunal and make an appointment of the presiding officer thereof simultaneously by a composite notification or by different notifications.[79]In terms of amendment of 1982, the tribunals have been given jurisdiction not only to adjudicate upon the 'industrial disputes' relating to any matter specified in the second or Third Schedule but also will have jurisdiction to perform 'such other functions as may be assigned to them under the Act'. This amending Act has relegated some functions to the industrial tribunals other than the adjudication of disputes on reference under s 10. Such other matters, therefore, have been covered by the amendment. However, s 10(1)(d) further provides that when a reference is made of an industrial dispute relating to any matter specified in the Second or Third Schedule, any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to that dispute can be further referred to the tribunal for adjudication. It is immaterial whether any such 'matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to' the basic dispute relates to any matter specified in the Second or Third Schedule or not. It is sufficient that the matter is connected with or relevant to the dispute that has been referred for adjudication to the tribunal.

In LIC of India, the Central Government in exercise of powers under s 10(1) (d) of the Act referred an industrial dispute for adjudication to the Central Government Industrial Tribunal, Bombay between the Management of the Life Insurance Corpn of India, Bombay and its workmen represented by the All India Insurance Employees Association. The award of the tribunal arising out of this reference was challenged before the Bombay High Court on the ground that the Central Government Industrial Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the dispute which will affect the functioning of the Life Insurance Corporation all over India. It was submitted that the Central Government Industrial Tribunal, Bombay had only limited territorial jurisdiction confined to Maharashtra and Gujarat and it had no jurisdiction to decide disputes which have effect all over India. Therefore, the national tribunal ought to have been constituted for this purpose under the Act, as the impugned award was without jurisdiction. On appraisal of the relevant language of the statute, the court held that the provisions of s 7B did not expressly or impliedly curtail the territorial jurisdiction of the Central Government Industrial Tribunal. The award therefore, could not be considered beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the Central Government Tribunal.[80]The correctness of this holding is not free from doubt. In the absence of any statutory rules or regulations, the appropriate government can regulate its public services in exercise of its executive powers. In Paulose, the Government entrusted the work of selection of candidates for the appointment of presiding officers of industrial tribunals and labour courts to the advocate-general. This mode of selection of the candidates was challenged by a writ petition in the High Court of Kerala on the ground that the government is bound to make appointment to this post after giving an opportunity to all eligible persons before considering for appointment by proper publicity through advertisement in newspapers. In the absence of such opportunity being given to all the persons having such prescribed qualification to be appointed, the method was unfair and arbitrary and, therefore, violative of Arts. 14 and 16 of the Constitution. A single judge of the Kerala High Court upheld the appointment holding that the action taken by the government was within the powers enjoined by law and it is not the requirement of law that for every recruitment to an office under the state, there must be an advertisement in the public press. Therefore, it is not necessary that the state must in every case of public employment issue an advertisement or notice inviting applications for an office.[81]

(ii) Term of the Tribunal

Under the provisions of s 7A, the appropriate government has ample power of constituting an industrial tribunal for a limited time intending thereby that its life would automatically come to an end on the expiry of that time. Again, the 'appropriate government' has wide discretion to appoint tribunals for any limited time or for a particular case or a number of cases or for a particular area. When a tribunal constituted for a limited period automatically comes to an end after the expiry of the period, the 'appropriate government' can constitute another tribunal and refer to it the disputes which were pending before the first tribunal and remained undisposed. On the life of a tribunal coming to end by efflux of time or by the disposal of the cases for the adjudication of which it was specifically constituted, no question of vacancy in the office really arises and it is not a case falling under s 8, but the situation that arises falls within the ambit of s 7A, ie, a new tribunal has to be constituted under s 7A, rather than filling in the vacancy under s 8.[82] The government can nominate a person to constitute an industrial tribunal for adjudication of 'industrial disputes' as and when they arise and refer them to it under s 10 ; or it may constitute a tribunal for a particular case or cases.[83] The scope of the two steps, viz, Constitution of industrial tribunal under sub-s (1) and appointment of presiding officers under sub-s (2) though may be notified in one notification, is different from each other. The industrial tribunal is constituted for the adjudication of 'industrial disputes', while its presiding officer is appointed to preside over the tribunal. It is obvious that the tribunal may be constituted for a longer or indefinite period, while the presiding officer may be appointed only for a short or limited period. For instance, the tribunal may continue, while its presiding officer may abdicate his office, by retirement on attaining the prescribed age, resignation or death. Thus, the term of the tribunal is not co-extensive with that of its presiding officer. The tribunal constituted under s 7A is a permanent tribunal.[84] Under s 8, when a vacancy occurs in the office of a presiding officer another person may be appointed in his place, and the tribunal will then carry on from the stage at which the case was when the vacancy was filled.[85]

In Minerva Mills, the Supreme Court, construing a notification constituting an industrial tribunal to the effect that, 'under s 10(1)(c) of the Industrial Disputes Act, HH the Maharaja is pleased to direct that the tribunal now constituted under this notification shall hear and dispose of all the references made to the previous tribunal constituted under the notification of 15 June 1951, which have remained undisposed of on 15 June 1952' observed that, 'this notification does not say that this new tribunal cannot hear the dispute de novo. If any prejudice is caused to the employers, it will be open to the newly constituted tribunal to begin the hearing of the disputes from the very first stage'. Thus, if in a case the tribunal ceases to exist, the appropriate government while constituting a new tribunal can, in the same notification, empower the new tribunal to begin hearing of the pending 'industrial disputes' from the stage at which they were left by the previous tribunal in the process of adjudication. If, however, the span of the tribunal itself comes to an end and a new tribunal is constituted in its place under s 7A, it is open to the newly constituted tribunal to begin denovo, if otherwise prejudice is likely to be caused to any party. It is, however, open to either party to point out and convince the new tribunal that prejudice will be caused if a de novo trial is not held. [86]

Once the tribunal has been constituted and its appointment has been duly notified, along with the name of the presiding officer who is appointed to it, disputes may be referred to such tribunal under s 10 by the 'appropriate government', for adjudication. It is, however, pertinent to note that reference is to the tribunal and not to its presiding officer. The two are conceptually distinct. In some states, a practice has developed to mention in the order of reference the name of the presiding officer, who for the time being may be presiding over the tribunal, because in such states the tribunals do not bear any distinctive serial numbers or other mark which may distinguish them from each other, such as first tribunal, second tribunal, etc. The name of the presiding officer of the tribunal, therefore, is intended to merely identify the tribunal concerned out of many that may be operating in a particular region to which the reference is intended to be made. An ingenious point was raised before the Delhi High Court in Blue Star.[87] The presiding officer of the labour court went on temporary leave and the government appointed another person as the presiding officer during his absence. The appointment of the temporary presiding officer was, however quashed by the High Court for the reason that the real presiding officer had not demitted his office and there was no vacancy under s 8 created by his going on leave.[88] In the meantime, a reference was made to the labour court constituted for the union territory of Delhi and presided over by the temporary presiding officer. When the real presiding officer resumed his office upon his return from leave, his jurisdiction to adjudicate on the reference was challenged on the ground that the reference was made to the other presiding officer and he alone could adjudicate on it. It was argued that since the appointment of the temporary presiding officer had been annulled by the High Court, the reference itself was invalid. The objection prevailed with the labour court and it held that it had no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the dispute on the ground that the reference had been made to the labour court presided over by the other presiding officer and that such a reference could be heard only by him and not by any other presiding officer of the labour court. Furthermore, since the appointment of the temporary presiding officer was itself invalid, the reference did not survive. This award of the labour court was quashed by the High Court holding that the reference was to the labour court then presided over by the temporary presiding officer which was otherwise presided over by the real presiding officer and not to the individual presiding officer.

A tribunal once appointed cannot be abolished by an executive act merely because the government chooses to put an end to it when a reference is pending before it, for the state cannot do indirectly what is not permissible to it to do expressly or impliedly under the Act. Hence, a dispute pending before such a tribunal cannot be referred to another tribunal under s 10(1) (d) as that can be done only under s 33B.[89] The fact that a tribunal derives its authority from an order of reference to adjudicate upon a dispute, does not extinguish the authority of the tribunal nor does it render the tribunal functus officio, when the tribunal communicates its decision to the 'appropriate government' which referred the dispute. On disputes being raised, the appropriate government is entitled to refer those disputes to an industrial tribunal, and the tribunal may make its award on the disputes referred to it, and for the purpose of the dispute so referred and decided by an award, the proceedings before the tribunal may be deemed to be concluded. But the tribunal does not become functus officio qua those disputes, nor does it come to an end with the making of an award. The government would, therefore, be entitled to make a reference under s 36A to a tribunal for clarification of a prior award, and a supplementary award of the tribunal on such reference would be valid.[90] In Renjit Kumar, s 7A(3)(a), as amended by the State of Kerala by Act 28 of 1961, was under challenge. More specifically, the issue was about the disparity in pay between the Presiding Officers of Industrial Tribunals and District Judges, by which the former were placed in a lower scale of pay. In a writ petition filed by the respondents, the Kerala High Court directed the Government of Kerala to place the presiding officers in the same scale of pay as the district judges. Aggrieved, the State of Kerala moved the Supreme Court. Dismissing the appeal, Panta J (for self and Thakker J) held:

> The State Government had granted pay scale at par with that of the District Judges before the recommendations of the pay scales of the District Judges by the Shetty Commission by which District Judges were placed in higher scales which benefit has been denied to the Presiding Officers of Industrial Tribunals merely, on the ground that the Presiding Officers of the Industrial Tribunal are not appointed under Article 233 of the Constitution of India nor they are appointed to the Judicial Services of a State under Article 234 of the Constitution. The action of the State Government in treating the officers presiding over the Industrial Tribunal differently from the District Judges in the matter of pay scales on its face is in violation of Article 14 of the Constitution of India (para 9)... Having regard to the well-reasoned judgment of the Division Bench, we are of the view that the impugned judgment warrants no interference inasmuch as no illegality, infirmity or error of jurisdiction could be shown before us by the appellant-State.[91] (para 14).

(iii) Jurisdiction and Powers of the Tribunal

The first proviso to s 10(1), however, lays down that where the dispute relates to a matter specified in the Third Schedule and is not likely to affect more than one hundred workmen, the appropriate government has the discretion to make the reference to a labour court. Thus, whereas, questions arising under the Second Schedule can be adjudicated both by a tribunal as well as a labour court, questions arising from matters in the Third Schedule can be referred for adjudication to a tribunal alone, unless the case falls under the first proviso to s 10 (1)(d). There is a marked distinction between the jurisdiction of the labour court and that of the industrial tribunal. Whilst the labour court, functioning for all purposes enumerated under the Act, has certain duties and responsibilities as prescribed therein, the matters to be dealt with and which are within the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal as prescribed under s 7A are entirely different.[92]The industrial tribunals constituted under this section are required not only to adjudicate industrial disputes but also may be required 'to perform such other functions as may be assigned to them under this Act'. The word 'assign' means conferment of powers under the Act on such tribunals. In other words, apart from the power to refer the matters for adjudication of industrial disputes relating to any matter whether specified in the Second Schedule or the Third. Schedule, such tribunals can be required to perform such other functions as may be assigned to them under the Act. For instance, functions of a labour court under ss 7 and 33C can also be assigned to an industrial tribunal and vice versa when the functions of a labour court under s 7A are assigned to an industrial tribunal constituted under s 7A, it can legally and validly discharge the functions of a labour court. For the sake of brevity, a compendious name such as industrial tribunal-cum-labour court has been coined.[93]

(iv) Tribunal's functions are of Quasi-judicial Nature

Though, industrial tribunals are not courts, in the strict sense of the term, they have to discharge quasi judicial functions. Their powers are derived from the statute that created them and they have to function within the limits imposed by it and to act according to its provisions.[94] Being judicial or quasi-judicial bodies, these tribunals are bound to serve notices upon the parties to a reference. The service of such notices is essential and any award made without serving of such notices will be fundamentally wrong.[95] The nature of the functions of the industrial tribunals was considered by the Supreme Court in Bharat Bank, in which Mukherjea J held that the functions and duties of an industrial tribunal are very much like those of bodies discharging judicial functions, although it is not a court. Its powers in some respects are different and far wider from those of an ordinary civil court. It has jurisdiction and power to give reliefs which a civil court, administering the law of the land, does not possess in the discharge of its duties; for instance, ordering as a judicial body the reinstatement of a discharged or dismissed workman.[96] All the four judges who delivered their opinions touching upon the subject. After consideration of the provisions of the Act, Kania CJI held that it seemed that 'the tribunal is discharging functions very near to those of a court, although it is not a court in the technical sense of the word'.[97] Fazal Ali J precisely pointed out that 'there can be no doubt that the industrial tribunal has, to use a well-known expression, "all the trappings of a court" and performs functions which cannot but be regarded as judicial. This is evident from the rules by which the proceedings before the tribunal are regulated'.[98] Mahajan J elaborated:

> The adjudication of the dispute has to be in accordance with evidence legally adduced and the parties have a right to be heard and being represented by a legal practitioner... the industrial tribunal has all the necessary attributes of a court of justice. It has no other function except that of adjudicating on a dispute. It is no doubt true that by reason of the nature of the dispute that they have to adjudicate, the law gives them wider powers than are possessed by ordinary courts of law, but powers of such a nature do not affect the question that they are exercising judicial power... that circumstance does not make them anything else but tribunals exercising judicial power of the state, though in a degree different from the ordinary courts and to an extent which is also different from that enjoyed by an ordinary court of law.[1]

On the basis of the holding in Bharat Bank's case, a Full Bench of the Gujarat High Court held that the labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals fall within the meaning of the word 'court' in s 10 of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971.[2]

PRESIDING OFFICER

Sub-section (2) lays down that the tribunal shall consist of one person only who is to be appointed by the government and designated as 'presiding officer' of the tribunal.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER

Sub-section (3) prescribes qualifications for the appointment of presiding officers of industrial tribunals and lays down that a person shall not be qualified for appointment as the presiding officer of a tribunal unless:

(a) he is, or has been, a judge of a High Court; or

(aa) he has, for a period of not less than three years, been a district judge or an additional district judge; or.

(b) he is or has been a Deputy Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) or Joint Commissioner of the State Labour Department, having a degree in law and at least seven years' experience in the labour department including three years of experience as Conciliation Officer; or

(c) he is an officer of Indian Legal Service in Grade III with three years' experience in the grade.

Note: Items (b) and (c) have been inserted in the year 2010, as indicated in the main section.

Section 7A(3) indicates that it is a person that can be appointed as a tribunal not an office.[3]Section 7C prescribes further qualifications for such appointment, ie, (i) the person appointed must be an 'independent person', and (ii) he must not have attained the age of 65 years. Thus, if a person appointed as presiding officer of an industrial tribunal does not satisfy the requirements of s 7A(3) and s 7C, his appointment shall be invalid and he shall have no jurisdiction for the purposes of the Act. For cl 2(aa) of the Central Act, the State of Haryana substituted its own cl 2(aa), which reads: "(aa) he is qualified for appointment as, is or has been a district judge or an additional district judge or." Pursuant to this clause, the State Government appointed certain practising lawyers as presiding officers of the industrial tribunals and the labour courts who had completed seven years practice as advocates. However, a district judge can be appointed by the State Government in consultation with the High Court. A practising advocate can only be appointed as a district judge if he has been 'for not less than seven years an advocate or a pleader and is recommended by the High Court for appointment'. Thus, a lawyer, even if he has completed seven years of practice at the bar, is not eligible for appointment as a district judge or additional district judge unless he is 'recommended by the High Court for appointment'. In other words, the requirement of seven years' practice at the bar and the recommendation by the High Court for the appointment are cumulative sine qua non for appointment to the post of a district judge. In this view of law, a Full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Tul-Par Machine, quashed the appointment of the presiding officers of the industrial tribunals and the labour courts because their appointment had not been recommended by the High Court. However, the court accepted the contention of the state that merely because the appointments of the presiding officers of the tribunals and the labour courts had been quashed, this would not ipso facto vitiate the awards rendered by them. The court, therefore, held that the offices of the presiding officers of the tribunals and the labour courts did lawfully exist and even if the appointments of the incumbents thereto had been set aside, the awards delivered by them under the colour of office would not be rendered inoperative on the basis of the de facto doctrine.[4]

ASSESSORS

Sub-section (4) authorises the 'appropriate government', if it so thinks, to appoint two persons as assessors to advise the tribunal in the proceedings before it. The assessors are usually appointed in cases involving technical or scientific details. Rule 25 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes that where assessors are appointed to advise a tribunal or national tribunal under sub-s (4) of s 7A or sub-s (4) of s 7B or under sub-s (5) of s 11, the labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, as the case may be, shall in relation to proceedings before it, obtain the advice of such assessors but such advice shall not be binding on it. In National Iron and Steel Co, the Supreme Court observed that 'for the determination of technical matters, it is always desirable to have the assistance of persons who are familiar with the subject. No doubt, the ultimate decision would rest with the tribunal but since the decision has to be based on proper material, it should not have denied to itself the opportunity of obtaining the appropriate material.[5]

---

74 Sections 7, 7A, 7B and 7C subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 4 for original s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

75 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 4 (wef 21-8-1984).

76 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 4 (wef 19-12- 1964).

77 The word 'or' omitted by Act 46 of 1982, s 4 (wef 21-8-1984).

78 Ins by Act 24 of 2010, s 5 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010). Earlier, cl (b) omitted by Act 46 of 1982, s 4 (wef 21-8-1984).

79 Hotel Kanishka v Delhi Administration 1995 Lab IC 2381, 2386 (Del), per Anil Dev Singh J.

80 LIC of India v All India Insurance Employees Assn 1989 Lab IC 1493 (Bom), per Sujata Manohar J.

81 Paulose v State of Kerala (1993) 2 LLJ 491 (Ker) : ILR 1993 (1) Ker 563 per Mathew J.

82 Cf, Minerva Mills Ltd v Workers (1954) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1953 SC 82], 122 (SC), per Mahajan J.

83 JB Mangharam & Co v KB Kher AIR 1956 MB 183 (DB), per Dixit J.

84 G Claridge & Co Ltd v IT AIR 1951 Bom 100 [LNIND 1951 BOM 11], per Shah J.

85 Maharaja Shri Umaid Mills Ltd v IT AIR 1954 Raj 274 [LNIND 1954 RAJ 114], per Wanchoo CJ.

86 Minerva Mills Ltd v Workers (1954) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1953 SC 82], 123 (SC) : AIR 1953 SC 505 [LNIND 1953 SC 172]: [1954] 1 SCR 465 [LNIND 1953 SC 172], per Mahajan J.

87 Blue Star Engineering Co (Bom) Pvt Ltd v LC 1975 Lab IC 1171 (Del) (DB).

88 Fedders Lloyd Corpn Pvt Ltd v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi 1970 Lab IC 421 [LNIND 1969 DEL 112], 423-24 (Del) (DB).

89 Shellac Industries Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 492, 495 (Cal) (DB), per Dutt J.

90 G Claridge & Co Ltd v IT AIR 1951 Born 100, per Shah J.

91 State of Kerala v B Renjith Kumar AIR 2009 SC (supp) 465, per LS Panta J.

92 PSS Bommanna Chettiar Sons v LC 1973 Lab IC 882, 883 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

93 Coromandal Fertilisers Ltd v State of AP (1988) 2 LLJ 390, 391 (AP), per K Ramaswamy J.

94 JK Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Iron & Steel Mazdoor Union (1956) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1955 SC 119] (SC), per Bose J.

95 Indian Mining Assn v Koyla Mazdoor Panchayat 4 FJR 239 (LAT).

96 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees (1950) I LLJ 921 (SC) : AIR 1950 SC 188 [LNIND 1950 SC 4]: [1950] 1 SCR459, per Mukherjea J.

97 Ibid, per Kania CJI.

98 Ibid, pp 922-23, per Fazal Ali J.

1 Ibid, p 932, per Mahajan J.

2 Shaikh M Hussainbhai v Chandrabhanu Cinema 1986 Lab IC 1749 (Guj) (FB).

3 Mgmt of Punjab National Bank Ltd v LC 1969 Lab IC 1574, 1579 (J&K), per IN Bhat J.

4 Tul-Par Machine & Tool Co v Joginder Pal 1983 Lab IC 1615, 1626 (P&H) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

5 National Iron and Steel Co, Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 752 [LNIND 1962 SC 271], 757 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 325 [LNIND 1962 SC 271]: [1963] 3 SCR 660 [LNIND 1962 SC 271], per Mudholkar J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[6][S. 7B. National Tribunals.—

(1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, constitute one or more national industrial tribunals for the adjudication of industrial disputes which, in the opinion of the Central Government, involve questions of national importance or are of such a nature that industrial establishments situated in more than one State are likely to be interested in, or affected by, such disputes.

(2) A National Tribunal shall consist of one person only to be appointed by the Central Government.

(3) A person shall not be qualified for appointment as the presiding officer of a National Tribunal [7][unless he is, or has been, a Judge of a High Courts'.]

(4) The Central Government may, if it so thinks fit, appoint two persons as assessors to advise the National Tribunal in the proceeding before it.]

CONSTITUTION OF NATIONAL TRIBUNAL

The power to constitute national tribunals is only with the Central Government under s 7B. A national tribunal can he constituted only for the adjudication of the 'industrial disputes' involving questions of national importance or the 'industrial disputes' in which industrial establishments situated in more than one state are likely to be interested or are likely to be affected by. The reference to a national tribunal can be made only by the Central Government whether it is or is not the appropriate government.[8] Sub-section (6) of s 10 provides that when a reference of an industrial dispute under sub-s (lA) of s 10 is made to a national tribunal, it is the national tribunal alone which will have jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute and any industrial tribunal or the labour court before whom the same dispute may be pending for adjudication, shall cease to have jurisdiction to proceed further with the adjudication of the dispute.[9]Sub-section 7 of s 10 further provides that when a reference of an 'industrial dispute' is made to the national tribunal by the Central Government,' whether it is the 'appropriate government', or not, then notwithstanding anything contained in the Act, any reference in ss 10, 17, 19, 33 A, 33B and 36A to the appropriate government, in relation to that dispute, shall be construed as a reference to the Central Government.[10] In Life Insurance Corpn of India (supra) a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that in describing the nature of the dispute which may be referred to a national tribunal, the Act does not provide that if a dispute is likely to affect industries in more than one state, the dispute may be referred to the national tribunal. But this is a matter of discretion which the Central Government has to exercise in deciding whether or not to constitute a national tribunal. The phrase 'the Central Government may constitute' in s 7B and the phrase 'the Central Government may refer' in s 10(1) indicate that the Central Government has a discretionary power to constitute a national tribunal in disputes, which in its opinion, are of the kind referred to in these sections and if it is of the view that such disputes should be decided by a national tribunal. the Central Government, therefore, is not bound to constitute a national tribunal for adjudication of such disputes. This view is debatable.

PRESIDING OFFICER

Sub-section 2 lays down that the national tribunal shall consist of one person only who is to be appointed by the Central Government and designated as its presiding officer.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER

This provision lays down that a person shall not be qualified for appointment as a presiding officer of the national tribunal unless he is, or has been a judge of a High Court. The selection in case of national tribunal is more restricted. A national tribunal can only be presided over by a person who is or has been a judge of a High Court. Section 7C also prescribes further qualifications that the incumbent of the office of the presiding officer of a national tribunal should be an 'independent person' and also should not have attained the age of 65 years.[11]

ASSESSORS

Sub-section (4) authorises the Central Government, if it so thinks fit to appoint two persons as assessors to advise the national tribunal in the proceedings before it. The assessors are usually appointed in cases involving technical or scientific details. Rule 25 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes that where assessors are appointed to advise a National Tribunal under sub-s 4 of s 7B or under sub-s 5 of s 11, the national tribunal shall in relation to proceedings before it, obtain the advice of such assessors but such advice shall not be binding on it.

---

6 Sections 7, 7A, 7B and 7C subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 4, for original s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

7 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 5 (wef 21-8- 1984).

8 See, notes and comments under s 10(1A), post.

9 Ibid, s 10(6) post.

10 Ibid, s 10(7) post.

11 See, notes and comments under s 7C.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[12][S. 7C. Disqualifications for the Presiding Officers of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals.—

No person shall be appointed to, or continue in, the office of the Presiding Officer of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, if-

(a) he is not an independent person; or

(b) he has attained the age of sixty-five years.]

INDEPENDENT PERSON

The opening part of s 7C read with cl (a) prohibits the appointment of a person to, or continuance in, the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal if he is not an 'independent person'. According to cl (i) of s 2, a person shall be deemed to be an 'independent' person for the purposes of appointment as the chairman or other member of a board of conciliation, court of inquiry or tribunal, if he is unconnected with the 'industrial dispute' referred to such board, court, or tribunal or with any industry directly affected by such dispute. However, cl (a) of s 7C does not refer to the appointment as chairman or the other members of a board or court of inquiry. Nor does it refer to an 'industrial dispute' or any 'industry affected' by such dispute. On the other hand, it refers to the appointment of a person to the office of 'a presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal'. From a juxtaposition of these two provisions, the definition of the expression 'independent' in cl (i) of s 2 does not appear to be adequate for the purposes of s 7C. According to cl (i) of s 2, if a particular 'industrial dispute' has been referred to a conciliation board, or the court of inquiry, or a tribunal, a person who is connected with that dispute or with any industry directly affected by that dispute shall not be deemed to be an 'independent person' for the purpose of his appointment as a chairman or other member of such bodies. It is understandable that if a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal is specifically constituted for adjudication of a particular industrial dispute by construing the word 'tribunal' used in cl (i) of s 2 to mean 'a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal', a person connected with such 'industrial dispute' or 'any industry directly affected by such dispute' can be deemed not to be an 'independent person'. Hence, his appointment as the presiding officer of such 'tribunal' can be deemed to be prohibited, furthermore, even if such a dispute is referred for adjudication to a body presided over by such a person, he shall be prohibited from continuing in the office of the presiding officer.

But in practice, the labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals, are rarely constituted for adjudication of only one dispute. A large number of industrial disputes are referred to such bodies. At the time of the appointment of an incumbent, he would not know as to what disputes are pending before the tribunal or what disputes are likely to be referred to. If, after his appointment as presiding officer of a 'tribunal', the incumbent comes to know that he is connected with a particular industrial dispute or with any industry directly affected by such dispute or such dispute is referred to the tribunal after his appointment, he will not be an 'independent' person qua such dispute alone. However, this will not vitiate his appointment as the presiding officer of the tribunal. The government has the power to transfer such a dispute from that tribunal to another tribunal under s 33B. From the language of s 7C it appears that lack of 'independence' in a person not only disqualifies him from being appointed to the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, but it also disqualifies him from continuing in such office. The expression 'independent person' used in s 7C therefore, appears to be much wider in scope than 'independent person' defined in cl (i) of s 2. However, for the purposes of s 7C, an 'independent person' having not been defined in the Act, it is not clear as to when a person can be treated to be not an 'independent' person which will disqualify him from being appointed to the office of the presiding officer of a labour court or industrial tribunal or national tribunal or to continue in such office. The appointment of retired High Courts judges or retired district judges for short terms makes them dependent upon the Government for their extension. This practice debases the freedom of the industrial adjudication hence it requires serious consideration by the Parliament to make such adjudicators really 'independent' persons.

AGE OF THE PRESIDING OFFICER

The second disqualification is with respect to the age of presiding officer. A person cannot be appointed to or continue in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal after he has attained the age of sixty-five years. Some states have, however, extended this age limit as, for example, Punjab which extended the age limit up to 67 years.[13]The insertion of age disqualification in s 7C, only prescribes the age of retirement. Section 7A (3) (a) provides for the appointment of a High Court judge (sitting or retired) as presiding officer of an industrial tribunal. Age is clearly not a qualification under this sub-clause as the age for retirement for a judge of a High Court is 62 years. Likewise, cl (aa) provides for the appointment of a district judge or an additional district judge, sitting or retired, as presiding officer of a tribunal. Accordingly, a retired district judge or additional district judge who is aged over 62 will be eligible for appointment under this sub-clause. Thus, the age of a person does not enter into his qualifications under sub-cll (a), (aa) and (b) of s 7A (3). Further, the insertion of the age qualification in s 7C of the Act, is more consistent with the intention of the legislature to add a new provision prescribing the age of retirement for the presiding officer.[14] Hence, the qualification on the basis of age cannot be imported into s 7A (3) of the Act by drawing an inference from the provisions of s 7C of the Act. Where an additional district judge, belonging to the Haryana Superior Judicial Service was transferred and posted as presiding officer, industrial tribunal-cum-labour court, claimed that he should be allowed to continue as presiding Officer till he completes 67 years as provided under s 7C of the ID Act (as amended by the Government of Punjab), the Supreme Court repelled the contention and held that, in the absence of termination of lien from the cadre of Haryana Superior Judicial Service, he continued to be governed by the r 19 of Punjab Superior Judicial Service Rules (as applicable to the State of Haryana) in terms of which, the age of superannuation was 60 years, and not 67 years under the amended s 7C of the ID Act.[15]

---

12 Sections 7, 7A, 7B and 7C subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 4, for original s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

13 Vide, Punjab Act 8 of 1957, s 3 (wef 3-6-1957).

14 Cf, Atlas Cycle Industries Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 250 [LNIND 1962 SC 61], 256 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

15 BS Sharma v State of Haryana (2001) 1 LLN 858 (SC).

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[16][S. 8. Filling of Vacancies.—

If, for any reason a vacancy (other than a temporary absence) occurs in the office of the presiding officer of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal or in the office of the chairman or any other member of a Board or court, then, in the case of a National Tribunal, the Central Government and in any other case, the appropriate government, shall appoint another person in accordance with the provisions of this Act to fill the vacancy, and the proceeding may be continued before the labour court, tribunal, national tribunal, board or court, as the case may be, from the stage at which the vacancy is filled].

LEGISLATION

Section 10 of the repealed Trade Dispute Act 1929 made a similar provision. Section 8 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 as originally enacted, made provision for 'filling of vacancies', which was subsequently substituted by s 4 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment & Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1951 (Act 40 of 1951). That provision was again substituted by the present section by virtue of s 5 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 (Act 36 of 1956).

FILLING OF VACANCIES

When for any reason, a vacancy occurs in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal or in the office of the chairman or any other member of the board or court; the Central Government in case of the national tribunal and in any other case, the 'appropriate government', shall appoint another person to fill in the vacancy so caused. The vacancy can be filled in by taking into consideration the provisions of this Act. In other words, the incumbent appointed to fill in the vacancy must satisfy the requirements of s 7A or s 7B, as the case may be, and also s 7C in any case. The appointment then shall be governed by the provision of s 9. Normally, a vacancy in the office of the presiding officer of the bodies enumerated in this section would occur when the presiding officer dies, retires, resigns or otherwise becomes disqualified under s 7C. It may also happen that a person appointed as the presiding officer under s 7, s 7A or s 7B may have been appointed under a misapprehension of his qualifications. If, in such a case, it is found that he, in fact, did not possess the requisite qualifications, his appointment would be void ab initio.[17] The office of the presiding officer would, therefore, be treated as vacant ab initio. Further, if a person was disqualified under s 7C, his appointment will also be void ab initio. But if a person becomes disqualified under s 7C, after his valid appointment, his continuance in the office from the time of his becoming so disqualified, becomes void. The words 'for any reason' have been advisedly used by the legislature with a view to take in all sorts of contingencies under which a vacancy may occur in the office of the presiding officers of the adjudicatory bodies mentioned in the section. It is however, only when a vacancy occurs that the government can proceed under s 8. But otherwise, after reference having been made, the appropriate government has no longer power to interfere with its proceedings except to the extent of exercising such powers as have been expressly granted to it.[18]For instance, the government has power to transfer a dispute from one tribunal to another under s 33B and s

8 does not control s 33B of the Act.[19] The power under s 33B of the Act, however, can be exercised only for sufficient reasons.[20]

Before the amendment of s 8 by the amending Act of 1956, it was not clear whether the expression 'vacancy' used therein referred to a permanent vacancy or a temporary one as well. On the construction of the unamended section in United Commercial Bank, speaking for a majority, Kania CJI discussed the question as to when a vacancy could be said to have arisen and when it could not be said to have arisen due to temporary absence of a member of the tribunal. In this case, one of the members of the Industrial Tribunal was appointed as a whole-time member of another tribunal and it was not known how long he would continue to do the duties in the boundary tribunal. In these circumstances, the absence of a member from the industrial tribunal, was held not to be a temporary vacancy. It was, therefore, held that a vacancy within the meaning of s 8 had arisen. This view has been given legislative recognition in amended s 8 by the Amending Act of 1956. A temporary absence of the presiding officer, chairman or any other member of any of the bodies mentioned in the section, does not give rise to a 'vacancy' in his office within the meaning of s 8 of the Act. Hence, there is no question of any appointment being made in his place to fill in the vacancy. After the vacancy has been filled, the new incumbent becomes the presiding officer of the body to which he is appointed and the proceedings may be continued from the stage at which they were left. In other words, it will not be necessary to start the proceedings from the beginning before that person.[21] In Fedders Lloyd, the facts were: the appropriate government made an order purporting to be under s 8 appointing a person as the presiding officer of the labour court, Delhi while the permanent incumbent proceeded on leave for a few weeks. The appointment was quashed by the Delhi High Court holding that the order could not be regarded as under s 8, because the absence of the permanent presiding officer was obviously a temporary absence. The court observed:

> The reason for insertion of the words 'other than a temporary absence' after the word 'vacancy' in section 8 ...was to clarify that a vacancy must be a permanent one and is not caused by the temporary absence of the presiding officer ... For, when a vacancy is filled under section 8 of the Act, proceeding is continued from the stage at which the vacancy is filled. The intention obviously is to make a permanent arrangement necessitated by the occurrence of a permanent vacancy. [22]

The appointment could not even be sustained under s 7 as there could not be two presiding officers of the same labour court. Section 7 contemplates Constitution of the labour court which in the circumstances of the case was not permissible. Though the appointment of the temporary incumbent was annulled, the High Court in a subsequent decision viz, Blue Star Engg, held that a reference made to the labour court while it was presided over by a temporary incumbent was not invalid because the annulment of the appointment of the temporary incumbent as the presiding officer in the temporary absence of the permanent incumbent did not affect the validity of the order of reference.[23] Though, s 8 speaks of the appointment of a person to fill in the vacancy occurred in the office of the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal etc, it does not say that such appointment is to be made by a Gazette Notification. But r 5 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 requires that the names of the persons constituting such bodies shall be notified in the Official Gazette. In view of the fact that r 5 of the Industrial Disputes (Bihar) Rules 1961 refer to the appointment of persons to preside over the 'Board, Court or Tribunal'... and omitted the words 'Labour Court', the Patna High Court held that while filling in the vacancy of the presiding officer of a labour court under s 8, it was not necessary to make the appointment of such presiding

---

16 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 5, for s 8 (wef 10-3-1957).

17 Haryana Co-op Transport Ltd v State of Punjab (1970) 1 LLJ 611 (P&H) (DB), per Shamsher Bahadur J.

18 Harendranath Bose v Second IT (1958) 2 LLJ 198 [LNIND 1957 CAL 193] (Cal), per Sinha J.

19 Sur Enamel & Stamping Works Pvt Ltd v State of WB 1968 Lab IC 257, 258 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

20 Associated Electrical Industries (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 122 [LNIND 1960 SC 59] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

21 United Commercial Bank Ltd v Workmen (1951) 1 LLJ 621 [LNIND 1951 SC 26] (SC) : AIR 1951 SC 230 [LNIND 1951 SC 26]: [1951] 2 SCR 380 [LNIND 1951 SC 26], per Kania CJI.

22 Fedders Lloyd Corpn Pvt Ltd v Lt Governor, Delhi 1970 Lab IC 421 [LNIND 1969 DEL 112],423-24 (Del) (DB).

23 Blue Star Engineering Co (Bom) Pvt Ltd v LC 1975 Lab IC 1171 (Del) (DB).

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER II Authorities under the Act

[24][S. 9. Finality of orders constituting Boards, etc.—

(1) No order of officer by a Gazette Notification.[25] the appropriate government or of the Central Government appointing any person as the chairman or any other member of a board or court or as the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal shall be called in question in any manner; and no act or proceeding before any board or court shall be called in question in any manner on the ground merely of the existence of any vacancy in, or defect in the Constitution of, such board or court.

(2) No settlement arrived at in the course of a conciliation proceeding shall be invalid by reason only of the fact that such settlement was arrived at after the expiry of the period referred to in sub-section (6) of section 12 or sub-section (5) of section 13, as the case may be.

(3) Where the report of any settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceeding before a board is signed by the chairman and all the other members of the board, no such settlement shall be invalid by reason only of the casual or unforeseen absence of any of the members (including the chairman) of the board during any stage of the proceeding.]

LEGISLATION

An analogous provision was contained in s 8 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. The Industrial Disputes Act 1947 (as originally enacted) contained s 9 in a simpler form making provision for the finality of orders constituting the boards. On the construction of the unamended s 9, in United Commercial Bank(supra), Kania CJI held that the award of the All-India Industrial Tribunal (Bank Disputes) was void on the ground of defect in the Constitution of the tribunal. Consequently, an amendment was brought about by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956, by virtue of s 5 of which, the present s 9 was substituted for the old one. It may be noticed that the first part of the section refers to the appointment of any person as the chairman or any other member of board or court or as the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal. The second part deals with a board or court which means a 'board' as defined in s 2(c) and the court of inquiry as defined in s 2(f) of the Act.[26]

SUB-SECTION (1)

(i) Finality of Appointments and Proceedings

The jurisdiction of civil courts is barred by the use of the words 'in any manner' in this sub-section.[27]In other words, the orders of the 'appropriate government' appointing the officers mentioned in this sub-section cannot be questioned before civil courts for obtaining decrees invalidating such appointments, on the grounds of illegality or otherwise of such appointments. Further, any act or proceeding before any board or court has also been saved from being questioned in civil courts on the mere ground of (a) a vacancy, or (b) a defect in the Constitution of a board or court.

(ii) Jurisdiction of High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution

The bar of sub-s (1) of s 9 relates only to the jurisdiction of the civil courts, it is only the civil courts which would be precluded from entertaining the disputes regarding the validity of the appointment and the proceedings of the presiding officers of the labour courts.[28] The power of the High Courts under Art. 226 of the Constitution to issue directions, orders or writs cannot be disputed where the tribunal is not duly constituted or is acting without jurisdiction,[29] and the powers of certiorari and quo warranto under plenary powers of Art. 226 of the Constitution give ample authority to the writ court to grant the necessary relief to an aggrieved party.[30]Neither the Parliament nor the State Legislature can take away the right conferred on the High Courts under Art. 226 of the Constitution. Such right can only be abridged by an amendment of the Constitution. Hence, the Industrial Disputes Act, even though it may be very widely worded, cannot take away the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226 of the Constitution. It is, therefore, open to a High Court in its writ jurisdiction to consider the validity of the appointment of any person as the chairman or any other member of a board or the court or the presiding officer of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal. The provision, therefore, cannot shut out an inquiry for the purposes of a writ of quo warranto, if there is a clear usurpation of the office.[31] Once it is determined that the tribunal has no jurisdiction, it can be prohibited by a writ of prohibition. A writ of quo warranto, can be issued if the qualifications prescribed for the appointment of presiding officers are not satisfied or any of the disqualifications prescribed by s 7C is found or comes into existence, ie, the officer crosses the age limit or no longer remains an 'independent person' within the meaning of s 2(i). The legislature cannot take away the powers of the High Court given to it by Art. 226 of the Constitution.[32]

FINALITY OF SETTLEMENTS

Sub-s (2) makes provision that a settlement arrived at after the period provided in ss 12(6) and 13(5), shall not be invalid. Thus, if conciliation proceedings are continued after the period of 14 days or less as may be fixed by the government before a conciliation officer, or proceedings before a board are continued beyond the period of two months or less as fixed by the government, any settlement arrived at as a result of such proceeding, has been saved by this provision and it shall be valid and binding in spite of the fact that such settlement was arrived at after the prescribed period.

CASUAL ABSENCE OF A MEMBER OF THE BOARD DOES NOT INVALIDATE A SETTLEMENT

Sub-section (3) makes provision that any settlement shall not be invalid only by reason of the casual or unforeseen absence of any member or the chairman of a board during any stage of the proceeding, where the report of any settlement is signed by the chairman and all the other members of the board.

---

24 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 5, for s 9 (wef 10-3-1957).

25 Sri Veena Chandra v Mgmt. of Vishwamitra Press 1977 Lab IC 1490, 1496 (Pat) (DB), per LM Sharma J.

26 Statesman Pvt Ltd v HR Deb 1968 Lab IC 1525 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

27 Mewar Textile Mills Ltd v IT AIR 1951 Raj 161 [LNIND 1951 RAJ 6], per Wanchoo CJ.

28 Haryana Coop Transport Ltd v State of Punjab (1970) 1 LLJ 611 (P&H) (DB), per Shamsher Bahadur J.

29 Mewar Textile Mills Ltd v IT AIR 1951 Raj 161, per Wanchoo CJ.

30 Harayana Coop Transport Ltd v State of Punjab (1970) 1 LLJ 611 (P&H) (DB), per Shamsher Bahadur J.

31 Statesman Pvt Ltd v HR Deb 1968 Lab IC 1525 (SC), per Hidayatullah CJI.

32 Lila Vati Bai v State of Bombay AIR 1957 SC 521 [LNIND 1957 SC 25], per Sinha J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

[1]CHAPTER IIA Notice of Change

S. 9A. Notice of Change.—

No employer, who proposes to effect any change in the conditions of service applicable to any workman in respect of any matter specified in the Fourth Schedule, shall effect such change,—

(a) without giving to the workmen likely to be affected by such change a notice in the prescribed manner of the nature of the change proposed to be effected; or

(b) within twenty-one days of giving such notice:

Provided that no notice shall be required for effecting any such change—

(a) where the change is effected in pursuance of any [2][settlement or award]; or

(b) where the workmen likely to be affected by the change are persons to whom the Fundamental and Supplementary Rules, Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, Civil Services (Temporary Service) Rules, Revised Leave Rules, Civil Services Regulations, Civilians in Defence Services (Classification,. Control and Appeal) Rules or the Indian Railway Establishment Code or any other rules or regulations that may be notified in this behalf by the appropriate government in the Official Gazette, apply.

LEGISLATION

There was no provision in the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929 or in the Industrial Disputes Act of 1947, providing for 'notice of change'. As a result of persistent demand that 'notice of change' should be given, whenever it is proposed to make any change in the conditions of service of workmen, the new chapter, i.e., Chapter 2A consisting of ss 9A and 9B was inserted by s 6 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956, with effect from 10 March 1957. The effect of s 9A is that the employer shall not introduce any change in respect of matters specified in the Fourth Schedule, without giving to the workmen likely to be affected by such change, a notice of the nature of the change. It is further enjoined upon the employer not to effect the proposed change within twenty-one days of giving of the notice.

OBJECT AND SCOPE

The object of this section is to prevent a unilateral action on the part of the employer changing the conditions of service to the prejudice of the workmen.[3] The real purpose of enacting this provision is 'to afford an opportunity to the workmen to consider the effect of the proposed change and, if necessary, to present their point of view on the proposal' and such consultation would further serve to stimulate a feeling of common joint interest of the management and workmen in the industrial progress and increase productivity.[4] In other words, s 9A was enacted with a view to protect the interests of workmen who may be affected by a proposed change by the employer. This section is a mandatory provision.[5] Therefore, any change made in the conditions of service applicable to any workman in respect of any matters specified in the Sch 4, without complying with the requirements of this section shall be a nullity and void ab initio and as such inoperative in law.[6] As soon as the employer proposes a change in the conditions of service applicable to any workman, the provisions of this section are attracted and the employer has to give the notice under this section to the workman.[7] The legislature has contemplated three stages in making provision for the notice of change under s 9A. The first stage is the proposal by the employer to effect a change; the second stage is the time when he gives a notice and the third stage when he effects the change on the expiry of 21 days from the date of the notice. The conditions of service do not stand changed, either when the proposal is made or the notice is given but they are affected only when the change is actually made, i.e., when the new conditions of service are actually introduced.[8] The employer is under no obligation to await a reference which could be made at the instance of the workers before implementing the proposals contained in the notice.[9]This section provides for procedure for alteration of conditions of service with respect to matters specified in the Fourth Schedule when there is no industrial dispute or conciliation proceedings pending. There is no provision in the Act prohibiting the management from altering the conditions of service after following the procedure prescribed thereunder. Once the management complies with the express provisions of the Act, it cannot be said to owe a public duty or statutory duty to await a reference by the workmen to challenge the proposals contained in the notice under s 9A of the Act.

NOTICE

(i) Change in Condition of Service

Section 9A requires an employer who proposes to effect any change in the conditions of service applicable to any workman in respect of any matter specified in the Sch 4, to give to the workmen likely to be affected by such change, a notice in the prescribed manner of the nature of the change proposed to be effected, before effecting such change. Rule 34 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, prescribes the procedure for giving such a notice. The notice is to be given in form 'E'. The provisions of this section are mandatory and they are enacted for protecting the interests of the workmen likely to be affected by the proposed change,[10] and prohibit an employer from giving effect to any change in the conditions of service applicable to any workman in respect of any matter specified in the Fourth Schedule without giving to the workman likely to be affected, by such change, a notice in the prescribed manner of the nature of the change proposed to be effected. Further, the employer is enjoined not to effect the proposed change within 21 days of the notice.[11] For attracting the provisions of this section, firstly, there should be a change in the conditions of service and secondly, such change should be related only to the conditions of service enumerated in the Fourth Schedule.[12] For instance, where the services of some conductors were terminated being surplus as a result of rationalisation and standardisation effected by the corporation, such rationalisation fell under item 10 of the Sch 4 and it could not be given effect to without giving the notice required under s 9A of the Act. Mere withdrawal of a privilege will not amount to a change in service conditions until such privilege having been allowed to be enjoyed by the employees over a long stretch of time, as a matter of custom or usage and has, in effect, become an accepted condition of service.[13]

In Calcutta Electricity Supply, the employer-company had a scheme of giving medical benefits to its employees which was withdrawn after coming into operation of the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948 (ESI Act) on the ground that the medical benefits under the Act were more generous. The employees disputed this decision ofthe management on the ground of contravention of the provision of s 9A of the Act. The industrial tribunal held that the change effected by the management was in contravention of s 9A because it was not entitled to withdraw the medical benefits which were already in existence before the Act came into force. In appeal against the award of the tribunal, the Supreme Court held that the contention of the employer that the benefits available under the ESI Act were more beneficial was factually not correct. Apart from that, the court further held that there was nothing in the ESI Act or the regulations framed thereunder which enables the employer to withdraw the pre-existing benefits merely because the employees came to be covered under that Act.[14] In SBI Staff Union, under the regulation framed by the bank, a member of the award staff (clerical) was given the right to contest elections to the state assemblies and local bodies subject to certain conditions contained in a circular. Subsequently, the bank sought to withdraw this right which was contested by the staff union of the bank. The Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the withdrawal of this concession to contest the elections was not only infringement of provisions of s 9A but also was violative of the rules of natural justice.[15]

In Coal India, the facts were: The company has a number of establishments. In some establishments, they observe a five-days' week and in others, a six-days' week. Some workmen posted at the establishments observing five-days' week requested the management to post them at establishments observing six-days' week. After having been so posted, they claimed that the management had violated s 9A by effecting a change without notice, as required by that section. A single judge of the High Court held that there was no breach of s 9A, firstly because the workmen had not denied the averment of the management that security personnel are required to work six-days in a week for eight hours daily and, secondly, that the workmen had got transferred to those establishments on their own request.[16] This section relates to a change proposed in the conditions of service applicable to any workman in respect of any matter specified in the Fourth Schedule. It is doubtful whether this is attracted when the service itself has changed instead of there being a change proposed or brought about in the conditions of service to which the workman belongs. So long as the workman is in service, there may be no change in the conditions thereof in respect of any matter specified in the Fourth Schedule without the requisite formalities, including notice to the workman being gone into. But where there is a cessation of the service itself and the workmen are absorbed differently, it does not appear that it would-also be a case covered under s 9A. For instance, in Ordnance Parachute Factory, the workmen working as tailors 'C' in the ordnance factory agreed to choose to work as labour 'B' under the apprehension of retrenchment. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that though the workmen continued to be in the employment of the same employer but the employment was not the same. Therefore, the absorption of the workmen as labour 'B' did not require notice as contemplated by s 9A. Furthermore, since the change was brought about with the volition of the workmen, it was not necessary to give the notice.[17] The opening words of this section indicate that the requirement of notice would apply, if an employer proposes to effect changes in conditions of service and not to a case where certain conditions of service become applicable to the employees by operation of law.[18] In other words, the change contemplated by this section is one which the employer has volition to make or not to make. Where an employer is compelled to give effect to any statutory rule or order which brings about change in the terms of employment, such change would not fall within the ambit of this section.[19]

A change which is not related to any of the conditions of service enumerated in the Fourth Schedule will not attract s 9A. For instance, in Robert D'Souza, it has been held that retrenchment is not covered under any item of the Fourth Schedule. Hence, it cannot be said to be a change in the conditions of service of a workman.[20] Likewise, in Sur Iron and Steel, a change of weekly off-days from Sunday to Saturday on account of some restrictions being imposed on the use of electricity by the State Government, was held to be outside the ambit of the Fourth Schedule. The Supreme Court observed that s 9A applies only to matters enumerated in the Fourth Schedule to the Act and there is no specific entry in that Schedule which would cover a condition of service relating to weekly off-days.[21] Though, the decision is not entirely based on this view, there is a clear indication in the judgment that the alteration did not attract the provisions of s 9A.[22] In Tata Iron and Steel, the weekly off-days were temporarily changed from Sunday to Wednesday in one colliery of the employer company and to Thursday in the other, on account of shortage of power supply. In view of the emergency of the situation, a notice as contemplated by s 9A was not possible. Despite this fact, the court held that the items 4, 5 and 8 of the Fourth Schedule, viz, 'hours of work and rest intervals'; 'leave with wages and holidays' and 'withdrawal of customary concession or privilege or change in usage', was wide enough to cover the weekly off-days, and thus s 9A was attracted.[23] The concept of 'weekly days of rest' as contemplated by s 28 of the Mines Act is altogether different from the items envisaged in the Fourth Schedule. Nor can a temporary change as an emergency measure fall within the ambit of the expression 'withdrawal of any customary concession or privilege' on any canons of statutory construction. The effect of this decision is that even for a temporary change in emergency circumstances, a notice under s 9A would be required, despite the fact that there may not be sufficient time for giving such notice in the circumstances of a given case. This will not only result in a great deal of hardship to the employers resulting in loss and exposing them to penal consequences under the Act, but will also encourage indiscipline and disharmony in industry.[24] The reasoning of the court on all the three points is unsound and lacks adequate perceptions of the statutory provisions and the principles of industrial jurisprudence.

In Assam Match Co, the court considered both the above cases. In this case, the question was whether the employer had contravened s 9A of the Act, when on the request of the majority of the workers, the holiday for Diwali was changed from a particular day to the next day. Referring to item No 5 of the Fourth Schedule, which deals with 'leave with wages and holidays', the court said, 'prima facie, if a holiday has been fixed, the management may not have power to totally cancel the same or deprive the workman of such a holiday without confirming to the provisions of s 9A. But on the facts of the case, it held that the change in question could not be considered to be an alteration in the conditions of service. The court observed that if a large body of workmen required change of the day of the holiday on the ground that the festival is not being observed on the day originally fixed and the management changes the date, it could not be stated that there was an alteration in the conditions of service because the workmen were not at all deprived of the holiday for Diwali which, in fact, they got on the next day.[25]Tata Iron and Steel Co's case was explained as confined to its peculiar circumstances and the court avoided to go into the correctness of that decision probably because it was not canvassed. The court noticed the clear conflict in the earlier two dicta and instead of resolving the conflict and laying down what would be the correct approach, it restricted itself to deciding the matter before it on the special facts of that case, but subsequently, in a case relating to a public sector undertaking, ie, ONGC, the court adopted altogether different norms and process of reasoning, in holding that the change (in the working hours of the staff, from 6½ to 8 hours in the administrative office of the Natural Gas Commission at Baroda, did not attract the provisions of s 9A, because it was not a change of the nature contemplated by the Fourth Schedule of the Act.[26] It is not possible to reconcile the rationale of this decision with the ratio of Tata Iron and Steel Co. It is difficult to understand that if even the temporary change-a purely emergency measure as in Tata Iron and Steel Co fell within items 4, 5 and 8 of the Fourth Schedule, why, on the unequivocal language of the statute, the change in the working hours in Oil and Natural Gas Commission should not fall within the ambit of item 4? It is rather surprising that in the latter case, the court altogether omitted to refer to its earlier decision though the judgments in both the cases were delivered by the same judge. In Hindustan Lever, the Supreme Court held that the reorganisation of the business of the employer company from three into two departments will not fall within the perimeter of items 8, 10 and 11 of the Fourth Schedule of the Act, on the facts of the case, because the word 'affected' used in the expression 'workman likely to be affected by such change', in s 9A(a) would mean that the workers should be 'adversely affected' by such change. Hence, unless the workers are adversely affected by the change in question, it will not fall within the mischief of s 9A. Since the workmen, in fact, were not adversely affected by the change brought about by the reorganisation in question, the provision of s 9A were not attracted. While reviewing its earlier decisions, the court contented itself with the following observation:

> A close scrutiny of various decisions would show that whether any particular practice or allowance or concession had become a condition of service would always depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case and no rule applicable to all cases could be culled out from these decisions. [27]

Little effort appears to have been made to reconcile the ratio decidendi of these cases. Particularly, the conflict in the ratio of Tata Iron and Steel on the one hand and the Sur Iron and Steel and ONGC on the other, has neither been clearly comprehended nor resolved. In Tata Iron and Steel, the change being of a temporary nature and an emergency measure had no adverse effect on the workmen while in ONGC, the change was clearly of adverse nature in changing the working hours from 6½ to 8 hours. Though, the court took the view that the change caused by the reorganisation would not attract the provisions of s 9A, it held that the non-payment of wages to the workmen for a particular period on their refusal to do the work according to the reorganised scheme, constituted an 'alteration of the conditions of service of the workers', hence notice of reorganisation under s 9A was required. It is rather strange that in one breath the court said that since the reorganisation did not adversely affect the workers, the notice was not required, while in the next, it said that the failure to give the notice of the scheme of reorganisation resulting in 'alteration of condition of service' invalidated the reorganisation. In taking this view, in this case, the court again appears to have been weighed by the consideration that the workmen will lose wages for the period for which they had refused to work, otherwise no logic, to justify these contradictory stands, is discernible. Even if the facts before the two tribunals were different, on consolidation of the appeals, the entire gamut of the facts was before the court. In the earlier part of the judgment, the court said that the change on account of reorganisation would not fall under items 8, 10 and 11 of the Fourth Schedule but in the later part, it has not indicated as to under what item it would fall. Presumably, it may be referable to item 1. But neither the construction of item 1, nor the ratio of North Brook Jute Co on which reliance seems to have been placed, would warrant this view. The picture of law emerging out of these decisions is completely blurred; therefore the law requires restatement. In Indian Oil Corpn, the employer company had withdrawn a compensatory allowance payable to its workmen on the line of such allowance previously introduced by the Central Government posted throughout Assam as it thought that the rule of the Central Government was not binding on it. This allowance was withdrawn unilaterally, without giving any notice to the workers. It was held that the compensatory allowance was undoubtedly an implied condition of service so as to attract the mandatory provisions of s 9A.[28] In Food Corpn of India, the court held that by cancelling the direct payment system and introducing the contractor, both the wages and mode of payment were altered within the meaning of item 1 of the Fourth Schedule. Hence, notice of change was required for introducing the change.[29] A single Judge of the Bombay High Court, after referring to the decisions of the Supreme Court in Sur Iron & Steel, Tata Iron & Steel and Assam Match cases, opined:

> These decisions do not lay down any consistent principle of law...proper conclusion to be arrived at would depend upon the facts of each case; and, therefore, a change which might bring in its wake the requirements of section 9A in one case, would not necessarily bring the same result in another situation.[30]

In this case, 22 November 1970 was the normal weekly off-day and 24 November 1970 was to be observed as bandh day. Considering the inadvisability of working the factory on the day of the proposed bandh, the employers decided to keep the factory closed on bandh day and, in its place, work on the normal weekly off, i.e., 22 November 1970. Accordingly, a notice was displayed on the notice board, which stated that 24 November would be treated as the weekly off-day in lieu of 22 November which would be treated as a working day. The short question for consideration was, whether the action of the company in displaying the notice on the notice board changing the weekly off-day was violative of the provisions of s 9A. The court held that it would be difficult on the facts of the case to bring the matter within the entry 4 or entry 8 of the Fourth Schedule. Working at the matter from any reasonable angle and considering an isolated change as an exception for one occasion and not a permanent one, the change was not considered to be such a change as would materially and adversely affected the workmen. Hence, the provisions of s 9A were not attracted. The Madras High Court held that the exclusion of a trade union, which has not acquired the status of a recognised union under the code of discipline, from the category of unions which could negotiate with the management, will not amount to a change in the conditions of service. Such exclusion would not come within the mischief of s 9A of the Act. Nor would it constitute withdrawal of any customary concession or privilege or change in usage within the meaning of item 8 of the Fourth Schedule.[31]

In CI Kannan, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the object of this provision is that conditions of service in force at the time when a workman entered service could not be changed to his prejudice without giving notice to him. The prohibition of s 9A is with regard to the change in the conditions of service applicable to any workman and it does not appear to be applicable to regulations relating to the conditions of service which were brought into force for the first time unless it could be shown that since the employees entered the service, the conditions of service have been changed by the regulations which were brought into force for the first time. Referring to item 9 in the Fourth Schedule, the High Court said that the introduction of the new rules of discipline would only mean introduction of certain rules of discipline which were not applicable to the employees on the date of their employment and would not relate to the rules that were framed for the first time.[32] Mere change in the channel of promotion does not tantamount to increase or reduction in the number of persons employed within the meaning of item 11 of the Fourth Schedule. Therefore, the provisions of s 9A are not attracted.[33] In Hindustan Shipyard, the employer granted concession to the workmen due to war time emergency to attend office half an hour late with the reservation of the right to change the office hours at any time. In these circumstances, it was held that the workmen having agreed to the reservation by the employer to alter the working hours, made the right to alter the working hours also a condition of service and, therefore, the action in accordance with the said right was not hit by the provisions of s 9A.[34] In Shalimar Paints, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that shifting the venue of business of the employer from one place to another does not constitute 'transfer' and as such will not constitute a change in the conditions of service within the meaning of s 9A, because the employer has an inherent right to change his place of business.[35] This view is not free from doubt. The change of place of business may not constitute transfer from one place of business to another but change of place of business will obviously constitute a change in the conditions of service of the workmen who were accustomed to work in the place of their original employment and would fall within the ambit of the expression 'change in usage' as used in item 8 of the Fourth Schedule.

In Navbharat Hindi Daily, the Bombay High Court held that the retrenchment of certain workmen as a result of installation of a mono composing machine for rationalising machinery fell within the ambit of item 10 of the Fourth Schedule. Hence, the retrenchment without notice as required by s 9A was vitiated. The Fourth Schedule makes it clear that notice under s 9A is required only in cases of proposed change in the conditions of service in respect of any matter specified in it. Item 10 of this schedule deals with rationalisation, standardisation or improvement of plant 'which is likely to lead to retrenchment of workmen'. The emphasis, in this item, is on its likely effect on employment and not on rationalisation, etc.[36] In KEC International, Rebello J, of the Bombay High Court held that Voluntary Retirement Scheme (VRS) proposed by the company results in reduction of posts and hence attracts item (ii) of Sch IV of the Act and therefore, notice under s 9A was mandatory. He cited Tata Iron and Steel Co,[37] Amrit Banaspati Co,[38] Hindustan Lever,[39] and a host of other decisions in support of his reasoning and conclusion.[40] With great respect, Rebello J, had misapplied the ratio of the said decisions to the facts of the case. VRS is a voluntary scheme offered by the management with workmen being left absolutely free to opt for it or not. That being the position, it is trite to say that VRS by itself amounts to a change in the conditions of service to the prejudice of the workmen. As a matter of fact, the learned judge admitted the said legal position. It is not as if that VRS should necessarily involve an increase in the workload of the residual workforce. For instance, where the operations themselves are scaled down due to product-market imperatives or where changes are brought about in technology, process or structure, there need not be any increase in the workload of the workmen and, further, it may even result in the reduction of workload in certain situations. The learned judge blissfully ignored the fact that VRS had become an accepted norm of reducing surplus manpower in view of the tyrannical provisions enshrined in Ch V-B and that, while offering VRS, the employer would be shelling down many times the compensation that would have been paid, had the workmen been retrenched under the provisions of the Act. Thus, VRS is nothing more than an expensive alternative to retrenchment with a difference.

In the case of retrenchment, the employer exercises his right to terminate the service of surplus staff, whereas in VRS, the workmen exercise their right either to opt for the scheme or not, at their sole discretion according as the scheme is attractive or not. The reasoning of Rebello J, is plagued by his failure to appreciate the essence of VRS in the light of the statutory prohibition imposed by the law. His observation, 'the question is whether on account of the VRS there is likely to be retrenchment on account of rationalisation, standardisation or improvement of plant or technique', 'makes no sense in view of his other observation in the same paragraph to the effect, 'as pointed out earlier, definition of retrenchment excludes voluntary retirement. Then, he proceeds to justify his rhetoric by another statement in the same paragraph. In the notice put up by petitioner...it is mentioned that there is need for the company to continuously upgrade the quality of its products. Prima facie, therefore, item (10) can be attracted.' Could it be said that 'improvement in the quality of products' is the same thing as 'improvement in plant or technique'? Assuming, without conceding, that they mean the same thing, should such a change in product quality—which implies an increase in the market share, greater stability and a competitive edge for the organisation-be branded as a change in the conditions of service to the prejudice of workmen or to their advantage? None of the decisions cited by the learned judge in his copious judgment, running into 61 paragraphs in 20 pages, lends support to his line of reasoning or the conclusion reached. However, while an appeal against the same decision was pending before a Division Bench, the parties arrived at consent terms signed by counsel on both sides. The Division Bench, while passing an order in terms of the agreement reached between the parties, set aside the order of the single judge, not on merits, but on the basis of the said terms of consent. The Bench comprising Srikrishna and Nijjar JJ, observed:

> It is made clear that the contentions raised by the parties in their respective writ petitions are kept open to be urged before the industrial court and/or in any other proceedings. We also make it clear that neither the industrial court nor any single judge of this court is bound by any observations made in the order passed by the learned Single Judge which has been set aside by consent.[41]

The Division Bench obviously did not find it necessary to go into the merits of the order passed by Rebello J. Even so, from the above observations of the Division Bench, it is quite clear that the Bench discountenanced the reasoning and conclusions reached by the single judge. A single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in G Mamthaiah v APSEB ,[42] held that the change in the conditions of service relating to 'classification by grades' as contemplated by item 7 of the Fourth Schedule would include classification into and creation of new categories of classes. For instance, where two or more grades were interposed between two categories of security guards, the court held that a change in the conditions of service particularly when new higher minimum educational qualification was prescribed even for initial appointment would constitute a change in conditions of service relating to 'classification by grades'. In Food Corpn, the Bombay High Court held that reduction in rate of overtime allowance cannot be done without complying with the requirements of a notice under s 9A.[43]In another case involving the same Corporation, the facts were: overtime allowance was payable to the employees of the Food Corporation of India as was payable to the employees of the Central Government. But after the Goa, Daman and Diu Shops and Establishments Act 1973 came into force, the overtime allowance became payable to the employees in terms of that Act which was much more than what was provided under the Central Government Rules. Subsequently, FCI was exempted from the application of the Act and it sought to recover the excess overtime allowance paid to the employees under the Act, This was resisted by the employees on the ground that notwithstanding the exemption, it was incumbent on the FCI, to comply with the requirements of s 9A. The Bombay High Court held that for bringing about the necessary change in the rate of overtime allowance in terms of the exemption, the requirements of s 9A had to be complied with by giving notice of change.[44]

A change in the working hours can only be effected by giving notice under s 9A. This section does not deal with the question whether the management has a right to change the hours of work but merely prescribes the manner of change of hours by giving the requisite notice of change. The provisions of this section would cover also a case where the management has a right to withdraw a concession unilaterally. Whether there was an agreement to alter the hours unilaterally or not has nothing to do with the mode of intimation prescribed by s 9A of the Act.[45] If a change has been affected by imposition, it may be sufficient that the concerned workmen think it prejudicial, whether it be truly so or otherwise. But, where the change has been affected by consent, as between certain workmen and the employer, upon an offer by the employer and acceptance of the terms by the concerned workmen, and the rest of the workmen in the industry are unaffected because the status quo prevails, the union of the workmen cannot step in and presume to dictate, by telling the workmen that the choice was erroneous and that they are ignorant of their true welfare. The requirement of a 'notice' to workmen would arise only if they are likely to be affected prejudicially. A change in the conditions of service contemplated by the section should be understood in that sense. It is not intended to cover a case where the proposal is, for instance, to enhance the pay scales or to better the other terms by a unilateral decision of the employer.[46]

Where the employer had put up a notice changing the weekly off from 23 August 1994 to 24 August 1994 on account of shortage of raw material, it was held that the said change, though in compliance with the requirements of s 52(1)(b) of Factories Act, still amounted to violation of s 9A of ID Act read with the provisions of Ch VB, and the employer was bound to pay compensation for the day. Further held that it was not possible for the employer to change the weekly off solely on the ground that there was no material available for work to be provided on a particular date.[47] The expression 'conditions of service' really implies the actual continuance of the relationship of employer and employee. It would not cover the case of wrongful discharge or termination of service.[48] A single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that since the age of retirement as such is not one of the matters included in the Fourth Schedule nor is it any general condition, it is not necessary to give notice as required by s 9A.[49] In State Bank of India, the bank issued a notification to the effect that any staff member seeking election to a public or local body should give an undertaking that he would not take undue advantage of his position in bank and that in case he gets elected, he should resign from the service of the bank, failing which he would be discharged from service. Treating this letter of request seeking permission to contest the election as letter of resignation, the Supreme Court held that the said notification was not violative of s 9A, and such participation in election could not be considered as a customary privilege connected with the conditions of work.[50] Withdrawal of duty relief granted to the office-bearers of trade union is not attracted by s 9A and the grant of such duty relief is not in the nature of a customary concession.[51]The Industrial Disputes Act does not recognise any right to work relief in the event of a workman being elected as an office-bearer of the union, and the withdrawal of the concession by the management is not attracted by s 9A.[52] Fixing the rates of foodstuffs and beverages supplied in the canteen is not a condition of service and, consequently, the revision of the rates does not amount to a change in the condition of service.[53]

(ii) Prescribed Manner

Where the Central Government is the 'appropriate government', r 34 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, which deals with the notice of change is the relevant rule, for effecting the change in the conditions of service of any workmen, under which the manner has been prescribed. The notice is to be in form E. In cases where the State Government is the 'appropriate government', the rules framed by such State Government would be relevant. The procedure prescribed for the notice of change, however, has to be followed in respect of matters specified in the Fourth Schedule only. In Lokmat Newspapers,[54] the Supreme Court held that any management, which seeks to introduce new working pattern for its existing work force by any future scheme of rationalisation, standardisation or improvement of plant or technique, which has a tendency to lead to future retrenchment of workmen, has to give prior notice of the proposed change. Thus, the notice under s 9A must precede the introduction of rationalisation concerned, and not follow it. In Mukund Ltd, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that calling workers on Sunday amounts to a change in the conditions of service under s 9A read with s 52 of the Factories Act, and failure to give notice under the former section amounted to unfair labour practice, despite the fact that the workers were given compensatory holiday and were also paid extra amount for having worked on a weekly holiday.[55] This is not a proper way of reading the provisions of the Factories Act as well as the ID Act. Section 52(1)(a) of the Factories Act clearly permits the employer to engage a worker on the first day of the week, provided he is given compensatory holiday within three days before or after, etc. The only requirement imposed on the manager was to deliver a notice, one day before the weekly holiday or the substituted day whichever is earlier, at the office of the Inspector of Factories and display a notice in the factory. In the instant case, it is an admitted fact that the workers were being called depending upon exigencies and were being compensated more than what the law requires not only by giving a compensatory holiday but also by paying extra amount. Could it by any stretch of imagination be said that such working on a weekly holiday amounts to a change in conditions of service? Pandya J, misapplied the law to the case facts. The decision of the trial judge that the complaint of the union was without merit in view of the fact that such calling of workers on Sunday was based on exigencies and hence temporary in nature, was right and that of Pandya J, is not in consonance with the letter and spirit of law. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that, even after issuing a notice under s 9A, the management cannot alter the service conditions covered by an earlier settlement, which has expired, until it is altered or modified or replaced by another settlement or otherwise in accordance with law.[56]

The IAAI decision of Madras High Court

The case of International Air Cargo Workers, as decided by the Madras High Court (2002) is a standing illustration of the judicial misconceptions of grave magnitude apart from being a replica misinterpretation of the provisions and misapplication of law. It is, therefore, considered expedient to devote some space to analyse the case in the following paragraphs. The facts of the case, briefly, were: the IAAI, entered into a contract with Mis Airfreight Ltd, for the loading and unloading of cargo at the Madras Airport. On the expiry of the contract with the company, the loading and unloading operators working therein were directly employed by IAAI as casual workers on a day-to-day basis for a period of 9 months, ie, from November 1985 to July 1986. Thereafter, pursuant to a direction from the High Court, the said workers formed an Industrial Cooperative Society and continued to handle the work of IAAI on the basis of a contract. The workers of the society raised a dispute for regularisation of their services in IAAI. Sathasivam J, as he then was, speaking for (self and Jnanaprakasam J) held that, having engaged the workmen directly after the cancellation of the contract with the private company, the IAAI sought to replace the direct payment system and introduce the contractor, which amounted to alteration of the conditions of service, which was illegal without complying with s 9A, and hence the workers had become the workers of IAAI.[57]

In the first place, the observation that the change from casual to contract employment (through the Industrial Cooperative Society) called for a notice under s 9A, reflects the grave misconceptions of law entertained by the learned judge. It is an admitted fact that the second writ petition No 5164 of 1986 filed by the said workers for their absorption as loaders-cum-packers as permanent and regular employees in IAAL was dismissed by the same High Court. The High Court recorded the memorandum filed by counsel for IAAI to the effect that till such time IAAI has made its own regular arrangements, it would consider mitigating the hardship of ex-loaders and packers by accommodating them as far as possible on a contract basis through a cooperative society except by way of regular absorption in the services of IAAI, and accordingly dismissed the writ petition filed by the workmen. In the face of these facts, to say that the management of IAAI failed to comply with notice under s 9A is too far-fetched and militates against settled law. The learned judge failed to grasp the fact that it was not a mere agreement entered into by the management and union suo motu, but an arrangement made by the management to accommodate the workers in pursuance of the direction issued by the High Court. Once the workers formed into a cooperative society and entered into an agreement with the management to undertake packing and loading operations, it acquires the character of a contract for service and not of a contract of service. That being the position, why should a notice of change be given under s 9A ? In the light of the admitted fact that there is no employer-employee relationship between IAAI and the members of the Coop Society, could it still be argued that s 9A has application as between the parties? Even in the erstwhile dispensation, ie, before forming into a cooperative society, the said workmen were only casual workers engaged on a day-today basis and were never on the permanent rolls of IAAI. It is equally amusing to hear a High Court judge holding that the said change falls in entry (1) of Sch IV of the ID Act, ie, 'wages, including the period and mode of payment.' (,).

It should be clearly understood that the above expression 'wages' refers to the amount payable or paid, 'period' refers to the interval between two successive payments, and 'mode' refers to payment in coins or currency notes or kind. In order to understand the implications of the said entry of Sch IV, one has to necessarily refer to s 4,5 and 6 of the Payment of Wages Act 1936. Section 4, which deals with the 'fixation of wage periods, stipulates that no wage period shall exceed one month. Section 5, which deals with the 'time of payment of wages' stipulates that payment should be made on 7th or 10th day after the last day of the wage period, according to the number of persons employed. Section 6 deals with the 'mode of payment', and stipulates that wages should be paid in current coin or currency notes or in both. The learned judge proceeded to interpret the expression in item 1 of Sch IV in a perfunctory manner, without getting a hang of what it connotes and what its significance is. Even assuming for the sake of argument that the interpretation placed by the learned judge on item 1 of Sch IV, is correct, howsoever precarious it might be, still s 9A has no application in the light of the fact that the change, if at all, was made pursuant to the agreement reached between the parties and recorded and directed by the High Court. Viewed from any angle, s 9A had no application whatsoever to the present case, and the decision was apparently based on a misreading of law and wrong assumptions made by the court. It is not necessary to go into the other limb of his argument as to the applicability of Art. 14 of the Constitution. The Constitution of India does not prohibit contract labour or contract work. In this case, the workers themselves formed into a co-operative society and entered into a contract for service with IAAI, and there was nothing in such an arrangement which could be said to be repugnant to Art. 14. The third line of reasoning of the learned judge was based on 'supervision' and 'control'. The mere fact that the workers of immediate employer or the co-operative society have to work under the control of the principal employer does not transform them into the employees of the principal employer. Control test was discarded long ago as the exclusive determinant of master-servant relationship. In*O'Kelly*, the court of appeal laid down the following tests to determine the true nature of employment relationship:

(a) Is there a measure of control indicative of an employer-employee relationship?

(b) Is the person carrying out the work for and on behalf of the employer or in business on his (or her) own account?

(c) Is the person free to accept or refuse work at will?

(d) Is the person supplied with a uniform and equipment?

(e) Is the person subject to disciplinary or grievance procedure?

(f) Must the person take holidays when and as directed?

(g) Is the person paid regularly either weekly or monthly? And are wages or salary paid gross or net of tax?

(h) What has been agreed with the Inland Revenue?[58]

'Control' test was replaced by the 'economic reality' test as a comprehensive yardstick, which takes into its fold several related factors that have a bearing on employment relationship from a wider perspective. In US v Silk , a Bench of nine judges of the US Supreme Court applied the economic reality test, ie, the degree of control, opportunities of profit or loss, investment in facilities, permanency of relations and the degree of skill required, and held that the 'unloaders' engaged by the company were 'employees' for the purpose of the Social Security Act 1935.[59] In Market Investigation Ltd, it was held:

> ... it is fair to say that there was at one time a school of thought according to which the extent and degree of the control which B was entitled to exercise over A in the performance of the work would be a decisive factor. However, it has been apparent for long that an analysis of the extent and degree of such control is not itself decisive.[60]

In Agra Electric Supply, the Supreme Court held that the term 'employee' is quite different from 'self-employed' person. A self-employed person owes no loyalty to the employer other than to complete a specific job of work within the specified time limits in return for an agreed fee. He is his own master.[61] Even where a person is self-employed, it does not imply that he can produce whatever he feels like producing and that the contracting party is obliged to accept it without question. In IAAI case, notwithstanding the fact that the workers were carrying out the work as members of the cooperative society, they were still required to subject themselves to the rules and regulations framed by International Airports Authority of India, in the light of the fact that airports are sensitive places and have of late become targets of terrorist attacks etc, with imminent danger to the plant, installations and personnel including passengers. Viewed from this standpoint, the mere fact that they were under the control and supervision of IAAI does not per se transform them into the employees of IAAI. As a matter of fact, the workers in the instant case were not even eligible to be regarded as the employees of an immediate employer (ie, contractor) in order to support their claim for absorption in the regular services of principal employer, in the light of the fact that they were members, and not the employees, of the cooperative society, which had entered into a contract with IAAI to render certain services in the airport. On this view of the matter, the 'control' and 'supervision' test propounded by the learned judge rests on a tenuous footing apart from being time-barred in its application. Subsequent to the publication of the 6th edition of this book (2004),[62] the IAAI challenged the completely flawed decision of Sathasivam J in Supreme Court by Special Leave under Art. 136. Castigating the tribunal, in the first place, for recording a wholly perverse finding on three points urged before it, and rejecting the gloss added by Sathasivam J while affirming the perverse findings of the tribunal, in the second, Raveendran J (for self and Panta), observed:

> On the contention urged, the following questions arise for our consideration in this case :
>
> (i) Whether the agreement between the contractor society and the IAAI in regard to cargo handling work was sham and nominal and consequently, the workers engaged as contract labour in regard to cargo handling work, were the direct employees of IAAI ?
>
> (ii) Whether the status of loaders-cum-packers engaged in cargo handling work was illegally changed from that of direct casual labour to contract labour in violation of section 9A of the ID Act, 1947?
>
> (iii) In the absence of a notification under section 10 of CLRA Act prohibiting the employment of contract labour in the process/operation of cargo handling work, whether the workmen employed as contract labour are entitled to claim absorption? ()
>
> What is significant is that, the Union did not plead that the contract labour agreement between the society and IAAI was sham and nominal. In fact, it could not do so, as the contract was not with a private contractor operating with a profit motive, but with a society of the very workers. Nor did the first respondent-Union allege that IAAI was exercising direct control and supervision over their work or that IAAI was directly paying their salary or that IAAI was directly taking disciplinary action against them. () ... Therefore, the question of violation of section 9-A of ID Act does not arise. () ... The offer of IAAI to enter into a contract with the society formed by the workers, for supply of contract labour was readily welcomed and accepted by the Workers' Union ... Virtually, the seal of approval by the Court was put on the same by recording the proposal and the acceptance of the workers the same. The writ petition of the workers was dismissed and attained finality. Thus, the contracts with the society were genuine, beneficial voluntary bilateral contracts and there was nothing sham or nominal about it. It should also be noticed that at no point of time, the workers or their Union pleaded that the agreement between IAAI and the society was sham or nominal. () ... Unfortunately, the Tribunal goes to the extent of referring to the memo filed by the IAAI before the High Court ... offering to give the cargo handling contract to the society formed by the workers of Airfreight, as a compromise or settlement which is opposed to public policy, principles of natural justice and an unfair labour practice. It further describes it as a settlement which the workers were constrained to enter. () ... The contracts between IAAI and the society make it crystal clear that a lump sum consideration was to be paid by the IAAI to the society and the society was responsible for payment to its members who were send as contract labour. ... This is a finding based on absolutely no evidence and shockingly perverse and is liable to be rejected accordingly. () ... In view of the above we answer the questions as follows:
>
> (i) The contract labour agreement between IAAI and the society was not sham, nominal or as a camouflage and the contract labour were not the direct employees of IAAI.
>
> (ii) There was no violation of section 9-A of the ID Act.
>
> (iii) In the absence of a notification under section 10 of CLRA Act prohibiting the employment of contract labour in the operation of cargo handling work, the workmen employed as contract labour are not entitled to claim absorption. ... In the light of our findings on the two questions the order of the Division Bench cannot be sustained and is liable to be set aside and the order of the learned Single Judge has to be restored.[63] (Paras 29 & 30).

In Divisional Engineer, TMD, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that a change in the working hours of daily-rated NMR employees from 8 hours per day for 6 days a week to 9 hours per day for 5 days a week, which deprived the workmen extra payment for one hour extra work per day, was bad as the change was made without issuing notice under s 9A, and that the workers would be entitled to extra payment for one hour every day.[64] The conditions of service for the change of which, a notice is to be given under s 9A read with Sch IV do not in terms include the fixation of a period of service or date of retirement. Introduction of maximum period of service would not operate to the detriment of the employee, who was otherwise entitled to serve only for six months and was liable to be terminated by giving one month's notice, and hence no notice under s 9A is required.[65] A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that there is no provision in any law in force, which allowed amendment to the terms of settlement by issuing a notice under s 9A. The terms and conditions agreed to in a settlement continue to survive even after the expiry of the settlement, and in the absence of any amendment to the settlement or unless another settlement on revised terms was signed, no such facility which was already there could be withheld.[66] An order of transfer does not constitute reversion or demotion and hence does not attract the provisions of s 9A.[67] An isolated instance of changing the weekly off from Wednesday to Thursday, which was also a holiday, more so when there was no reduction in the number of paid holidays, does not amount to a change in the conditions of service warranting a notice of change under s 9A and, therefore, there was no unfair labour practice under item 9 of Sch 4 of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU & PULP Act 1971).[68]

In Lakshmi Vilas Bank, the facts disclosed that the bank was paying a special allowance to machine operators and punch operators of its data processing centre at the rate of Rs 152/- and Rs 87/- per month respectively. Consequent upon outsourcing the job, the bank withdrew payment of the said special allowance and transferred the operators to other departments. Adjudicating the dispute raised against the contravention of s 9A, the tribunal, without giving a finding as to whether s 9A was complied with or not, rejected the claim of the workmen and held that 'it was left to the will and pleasure of the bank'. Quashing the award and remanding the matter to the tribunal, Sathasivam J of the Madras High Court, as he then was, held that it was mandatory for the bank to give 21 days' notice to the workmen concerned, which duty it did not fulfill, and hence the discontinuance of special allowance was wrong; and that the award of the tribunal against the workmen, in the absence of a specific finding whether s 9A was complied with or not, was not sustainable.[69] In an undertaking where 'Good Friday' was a holiday for over 25 years, it had become the usage and privilege of workmen. Such a privilege cannot be withdrawn without following the mandatory provisions enshrined in s 9A, and mere posting the decision on the notice board is not a sufficient compliance of s 9A.[70] It is not enough to send the notice of change to the union. Such a communication cannot be treated as sufficient compliance of the provision. Section 9A makes it mandatory to serve the notice in the prescribed form on every workman who is likely to be affected by the proposed change.[71] In Digvijay Cement, the Gujarat High Court dismissed the writ petition filed by the union on the ground that the question whether the management had violated s 9A or not was a question of fact which should be decided in a regular adjudication proceeding in the remedy provided under the ID Act.[72] In Richard Fritchley, the facts disclosed that a few employees, having opted for the voluntary separation under a scheme announced by the management, later turned out and raised an industrial dispute alleging that it was not resignation but retrenchment and that the management had violated s 9A. Rejecting both the pleas, Ghulam Mohammad J of AP High Court held that notice under s 9A was not necessary as the scheme offered was voluntary, and there was no retrenchment in view of the fact that the employees willingly opted out after receiving lumpsum amount.[73]

In Steel Plant Employees Union, the facts were: the Steel Authority of India Ltd, issued a circular in 2001 announcing a scheme for leasing houses/flats to employees, ex-employees, their spouses and legal heirs. The employees union filed an application alleging violation of s 9A on the ground that while many workmen were waiting in the queue the impugned circular threw open the allotment of houses and flats to other including the employees of other public sector undertakings. Rejecting the contention, Sathasivam J of the Madras High Court, as he then was, held that there was no violation of s 9A and that the impugned circular was in order.[74] The discontinuance of mailing section and the consequent termination of the services of workmen does not attract the provisions of s 9A, and it is not in every case of retrenchment a notice under s 9A is required.[75] Rationalisation cannot be done without giving notice under s 9A to the workmen who are likely to be affected, in this case the closing down of packaging division, failing which the consequential termination would be illegal.[76] In Orissa Mining Corporation,[77] the facts were: the management revised pay scales and benefits upward with effect from April 1, 1998 and while doing so restructured the house rent allowance that was payable as a percentage of basic pay for employees located in different stations. The corporation further gave an option to the employees either to opt for the revised scales of pay or continue with the existing, ie, pre-revised pay scales in their entirety. The employees having exercised and enjoyed the benefits filed a complaint alleging violation of s 9A in so far as their house rent allowance was reduced. The management contended that the revision of pay scales was effected as a package deal and that no worker was prejudicially affected. Despite this, the tribunal passed an award holding that the reduction in house rent allowance was not justified as it was in violation of s 9A. Quashing the award passed by the tribunal, the Orissa High Court supportively cited the view expressed by another Division Bench of the Madras High Court in Tamil Nadu Electricity Workers, to the effect: "It appears to us to be very clear that s 9A was never designed to prevent the implementation of any change, which is not change imposed by the employer on the workmen, but which is based upon the consent of the workmen to the offer by the employer, upon the exercise of their judgment that the change was beneficial."[78]

In Rashtriya Chemicals, the company issued a notice proposing change in the service conditions, which was referred for adjudication. The tribunal passed an order directing the employer to adduce evidence in support of the proposed change, which order was challenged by the company in a writ petition. The company contended that the union should be directed to adduce evidence, in the first instance, against the proposed change. Rejecting the contention, Chandrachud J of the Bombay High Court held that that it was the employer who had sought to alter the prevailing conditions of service which were the subject matter of industrial settlements. That was the import of the notice of change under s 9A and it was, therefore, for the employer to establish the legitimacy of the grounds underlying the notice of change. The learned judge further held that the Industrial Tribunal was not in error in rejecting the application filed by the employer that the union be directed to lead evidence first.[79] In Food Corporation, the facts disclosed that the corporation, having paid overtime wages as provided for in the West Bengal Shops and Establishments Act 1963, stopped the said payment to the workers on the ground that they failed to discharge their duty during the normal working hours of the week. Having lost before the tribunal and single judge of the High Court, the Corporation moved the Division Bench of Calcutta High Court. Speaking for the Court, Ashim K Banerjee J held that: (i) if the workers did not discharge their duties during the normal hours, the employer should take departmental action; and (ii) having earlier paid overtime wages at the prescribed rate under the 1963 Act, the employer could not suddenly withdraw the same without following s 9A.[80] Where, in the dispensary of a power generation plant, the facts disclosed that the dispensary never worked beyond six-and-half hours, the change in the hours of work to eight hours without complying with s 9A is illegal.[81] Reduction in the qualifying age of employees' children from 28 to 25 years for medical benefit and restricting the number of children to two to be entitled to such benefit do not attract the provisions of s 9A, as it was not shown by the workmen that grant of medical benefit was part of conditions of service. The petitioner-workmen should workout their remedy under the ID Act and that High Court cannot go into that question while exercising its writ jurisdiction.[82] In Thai Airways, a single judge of Delhi High Court held that s 9A was meant for protecting the service conditions of permanent workmen and not those of daily wagers or casual workers and, hence, the award of the tribunal holding that the termination of service of casual workers was in violation of s 9A was untenable and deserved to be set aside.[83] Customary puja allowance that was being paid to the employees for long has become a condition of service, and its stoppage without following the provisions of s 9A is invalid and void ab initio.[84]

(iii) Proviso to the Section

The proviso to s 9A dispenses with the requirement of notice in the following cases:

(1) where the change is effected pursuant to any 'settlement or award';[85] or

(2) where the workmen likely to be affected by the change are the persons to whom the following statutory rules apply:

(a) Fundamental and Supplementary Rules;

(b) Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules;

(c) Civil Services (Temporary Service) Rules;

(d) Revised Leave Rules;

(e) Civil Service Regulations;

(f) Civilians in Defence Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules;

(g) Indian Railway Establishment Code;

(h) Any other rules or regulations that may be notified in this behalf by the appropriate government in the Official Gazette.

Apart from the rules enumerated in cl (b) of the proviso, the 'appropriate government' has also been given further power to include any other rules or regulations in this category by a notification in its Official Gazette.[86] In other words, notice is dispensed with only in the case of such persons as are governed by the rules which are specified therein and 'any other rules or regulations' that may be notified in this behalf by the appropriate government in the Official Gazette.[87] The proviso cannot be construed to mean that if an employee is governed by the rules other than those mentioned therein, the employer in such a case must give a notice of change before he complies with the statutory rule or order which has not been made or issued by him. It may, however, be a different matter if the employer himself is the statutory authority to make rules or issue orders relating to conditions of service. In such a situation, it may be possible to say that the employer has to comply with s 9A unless the case is brought within the exceptions contained in the proviso.[88] But the language of cl (b) indicates legislative intention to exclude the persons governed by service rules only for the limited purpose of s 9A and not in respect of other matters.[89] The NCL-II recommended that there should be no statutory obligation on the employer to give prior notice, in regard to item 11 of the Fourth Schedule for the purpose of increase in the workforce, as is the position

now.[90]

(iv) Notice of Change and Article 226

The Madras High Court held that, notwithstanding the availability of an alternative remedy under the ID Act for violation of the provisions of s 9A, a writ petition under Art. 226 would be maintainable in a case where the change in holidays resulted in a change in the customary practice.[91] A notice of change under s 9A is really an order which takes effect on completion of 21 days, and the legality or otherwise of a notice under s 9A issued by a government company in respect of a matter falling under item 4 of Sch IV, ie, 'hours of work and rest intervals', can be examined under Art. 226 of the Constitution. By reason of introducing the change, the management cannot enhance the working hours.[92] However, in Singareni Collieries, the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the number of helpers provided to tradesmen would depend upon the exigencies of the situation and may or may not be a condition of service and that the impugned circular issued by the management reducing the number of helpers could not be termed as violative of s 9A on the alleged ground that it was an alteration of conditions of service, and that the workmen could pursue the alternative remedy under the ID Act for redressal of their grievances.[93] In AP Foods, the issue was whether the High Court has jurisdiction to entertain a writ petition under Art. 226 in respect of a dispute relating to bonus and issue directions to the company. The appellant-organisation was run by AP Nutrition Council and was owned and controlled by the Government of Andhra Pradesh with its principal object to provide nutritious foods to school and pre-school children, pregnant women and lactating mothers and such other categories of beneficiaries as the Government from time to time decide within the general framework of the Government social welfare programmes. It was claimed to be a non-profit motive establishment. It did not sell or distribute its product either in public or to outsiders except those selected by the Government of Andhra Pradesh under its programmes. In view of the nature of the activities, the Government issued an order to the effect that the Payment of Bonus Act 1965 would not be applicable to the appellant. However, the appellant was paid one month's salary as ex-gratia from 1985, which was withdrawn in the year 1993. The writ petition filed by 243 employees was allowed by single judge of the High Court, which was affirmed by a Division Bench. Relying on the principles laid down by SC in several cases including Hindustan Steelworks,[94] Pasayat J (for self and Chatterjee J) held that a bare reading of s 22 of the Payment of Bonus Act makes the position clear that, where the dispute arises between an employer and employees with respect to the bonus payable under the Act or with respect to the application of the Act in public sector then such dispute shall be deemed to be an industrial dispute within the meaning of ID Act; that as disputed questions of fact were involved, and an alternative remedy was available under the ID Act, the High Court should not have entertained the writ petition, and should have directed the writ-petitioners to avail the statutory remedy. The learned judge directed the government of Andhra Pradesh to refer the following questions for adjudication.

(1) Whether there was violation of Section 9-A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 as claimed by the employees?

(2) Whether the withdrawal of the construction allowance amounted to the change in the conditions of service.

(3) Whether AP Foods was liable to pay Bonus.[95]

EFFECT OF SECTION 33 ON SECTION 9A

The language of ss 9A and 33 indicates that the legislature has envisaged existence of undisputed right in an employer to alter the conditions of service applicable to the workmen to their prejudice. Before its amendment, the original s 33 imposed a total ban and provided that, 'no employer shall during the pendency of...proceedings before a tribunal...alter to the prejudice of the workmen concerned in the dispute, conditions of service applicable to them'. The present s 33 clearly contemplates that the tribunal may grant express permission to an employer to alter conditions of service applicable to the workmen to their prejudice.[96] In other words, the right of the employer to effect change in the conditions of service of workmen is subject to the provisions contained in s 33 during the pendency of any proceedings before a conciliation officer, board, labour court, industrial tribunal or national tribunal. Section 33(1)(a) refers to permission relating to any matter connected with the dispute. No change can be brought about in the conditions of service of a workman to his prejudice during the pendency of any such dispute but from the language of s 33(2)(a) which permits the employer to alter the conditions of service in regard to 'any matter not connected with the dispute' without even applying for the approval of the tribunal and further from the language of s 9A, which contemplates that the employer has a right to serve a notice for change in conditions of service, it appears that the employer has a right to alter conditions of service applicable to his workmen. It is now well settled that lifting the ban of s 33 does not effectively bring about the alteration in terms of conditions of service of workmen as desired by an employer,[97] because even if the ban is lifted, the right of the workmen to raise an industrial dispute with regard to the alteration of conditions is not taken away. The question whether conditions of service can be altered or not will have to be ultimately decided by the industrial tribunal on reference under s 10. This would be the position even where a valid notice of change under s 9A as regards conditions of service was given by the employer.[98]

Hence, the conditions of service as existing, either settled by an award or settlement would continue to be binding both on the employer and workmen, until they are altered by a contract or settlement or an award made in a reference under s 10. The language of ss 9A and 33(1) which deals with the manner in which the employer who contemplates alteration of conditions may proceed, is plain and clear. These provisions are only procedural and do not create extra or new rights in favour of an employer. In deciding for the purposes of s 33, as to at what point of time, the employer 'alters' any conditions of service, it is necessary to ascertain the time when the change, of which notice under s 9A is given, is actually effected. If at the time, the change is effected, a proceeding is pending before a tribunal, s 33 is attracted and not otherwise. The point of time when the employer proposes to change the conditions of service and the point of time when the notice is given are equally irrelevant.[1]Section 31 (2) makes the contravention of s 9A punishable with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees. The NCL-II expressed the view that the notice of change, issued by an employer as per provisions of s 9A, should not operate as a stay under s 33 though such a decision of the management will be justiciable under s 33A.[2]

---

1 Chapter 2A consisting of ss 9A and 9B, ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 6 (wef 10-3-1957).

2 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 6 (wef 21-8-1984).

3 Tamilnadu Electricity Workers v Madras SEB (1962) 2 LLJ 136 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

4 Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1972 SC 300] (SC), per Dua J.

5 Navbharat Hindi Daily v Navbharat Shramik Sangha (1984) Lab IC 445, 448 (Bom) (DB), per Patel J.

6 Janta Co-operative Sugar Mills Ltd, Bhogpur v LC 1987 Lab IC 1093 (P&H), per Tewatia J.

7 Mgmt of Indian Oil Corpn Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 319 [LNIND 1975 SC 229] (SC), per Murtaza Faisal Ali J.

8 Northbrook Jute Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1960 SC 87] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

9 Gordon Woodroffe Employees Union v State of Tamil Nadu 1990 Lab IC NOC 148 (Mad) (DB).

10 Navbharat Hindi Daily v Navbharat Shramik Sangha 1984 Lab IC 445, 448 (Bom) (DB), per Patel J.

11 CI Kannan v Employees State Insurance Corpn 1968 Lab IC 945, 948 (Mad), per Kailasam J.

12 Sewak Bus & Transport Co Pvt Ltd v Punjab State 1973 Lab I C 218, 221 (P&H), per Tuli J.

13 Gurudas Chatterjee v State Bank of India (1983) 2 LLJ 200, 207 (Cal), per GN Roy J.

14 Calcutta Elec Supply Corpn Ltd v CES Workers' Union (1995) 1 LLJ 874, 876 (SC).

15 State Bank of India Staff Union v SBI 1992 Lab IC 2078, 2081 (AP) (DB), per Sardar Ali Khan J.

16 Coal India Employees Union v Coal India Ltd (1993) 1 LLJ 646 [LNIND 1992 CAL 98] (Cal), per Susanta Chatterjee J.

17 GM, Ordnance Parachute Factory v PO, IT-cum-LC 1987 Lab IC 365, 377 (All), per Agarwal J.

18 All India ITDCE Union Unit v Hotel Ashok, 1984 Lab IC NOC 107 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

19 Hemant K Gupta v Dist Coop Central Bank Ltd 1982 Lab IC 1435, 1439 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

20 L Robert D'Souza v Executive Engineer, Southern Rly (1982) 1 LLJ 330 [LNIND 1982 SC 47], 333-34 (SC), per Desai J.

21 Workmen of Sur Iron and Steel Co Pvt Ltd v Mgmt (1971) 1 LLJ 570, 573 (SC), per Bhargava J.

22 Assam Match Co Ltd v Bijoy Lal Sen (1973) 2 LLJ 149 [LNIND 1973 SC 170], 152 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

23 Tata Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1972) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1972 SC 300] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1917 [LNIND 1972 SC 300]: (1972) 2 SCC 383 [LNIND 1972 SC 300], per Dua J.

24 Samnuggur Jute Factory Co Ltd v Workmen 1982 Lab IC 1334, 1335 (Cal) (DB), per Banerjee J.

25 Assam Match Co Ltd v Bijoy Lal Sen (1973) 2 LLJ 149 [LNIND 1973 SC 170] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 2155 [LNIND 1973 SC 170]: (1974) 3 SCC 163 [LNIND 1973 SC 92] : 1973 Lab IC 1158, per Vaidialingam J.

26 Oil and Natural Gas Commission v Workmen (1973) 1 LLJ 18 [LNIND 1972 SC 470] (SC) : (1973) 3 SCC 535 [LNIND 1972 SC 470] : AIR 1973 SC 968 [LNIND 1972 SC 470], per Dua J.

27 Hindustan Lever Ltd v Ram Mohan Ray (1973) 1 LLJ 427 [LNIND 1973 SC 65] (SC) : (1973) 4 SCC 14 : AIR 1973 SC 1156 [LNIND 1973 SC 65], per Alagiriswami J.

28 Mgmt of Indian Oil Corpn Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 319 [LNIND 1975 SC 229] (SC), per Murtaza Fazal Ali J.

29 Workmen of FCI v Food Corpn of India (1985) 2 LLJ 4 [LNIND 1985 SC 71], 13 (SC), per Desai J.

30 Mistry Lallubhoy and Co v Engg and Metal Workers' Union 1979 Lab IC 196 (Bom), per SK Desai J.

31 Neyveli Lignite Corpn Labour and Staff Union v Mgmt, 1984 Lab IC 1865 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundram J.

32 CI Kannan v Employees State Insurance Corpn 1968 Lab IC 945, 948 (Mad), per Kailasarn J.

33 Life Insurance Corpn of India, v All India IE Assn 1989 Lab IC 1493, 1500 (Bom), per Sujata Manohar J.

34 Workmen of Hindustan Shipyard Pvt Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 526 (AP) : 1961 ALT 873, per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

35 Shalimar Paints v Third IT (1971) 2 LLJ 58 [LNIND 1970 CAL 56] (Cal) : AIR 1971 Cal 90 [LNIND 1970 CAL 56], per TK Basu J.

36 Navbharat Hindi Daily v Navbharat Shramik Sangha 1984 Lab IC 445, 448 (Bom) (DB), per Patel J.

37 Tata Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1972) LLN 581 (588) (SC).

38 Amrit Banaspati Co Ltd, v S Taki Bilgarmi (1971) 2 LLJ 317 [LNIND 1971 SC 376] (SC).

39 Workmen v Hindustan Lever Ltd (1973) 1 LLJ 427 [LNIND 1973 SC 65] (SC).

40 KEC International Ltd v Kamani Employees' Union (1998) 2 LLN 707, 725 (Bom), per Rebello J.

41 KEC International Ltd v Kamani Employees Union (1998) 4 LLN 540 (Bom) (DB).

42 1986 Lab IC 1161, 1164 (AP), per Jeevan Reddy J.

43 Transport and Dock Workers' Union v Food Corpn of India 1986 Lab IC 1393 [LNIND 1985 BOM 281], 1399 (Bom) (DB), per Daud J.

44 Food Corpn of India Employees Assn v FCI (1991) 2 LLJ 562 [LNIND 1990 BOM 47] (Bom) (DB), per Kamat J.

45 Workmen of Hindustan Shipyard Pvt Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 526 (AP), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

46 Tamilnadu Electricity Workers' Federation v Madras SEB (1964) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 MAD 296] (Mad), per Ananranarayanan J.

47 Hartex Tubes (Private) Ltd v Asst Commissioner of Labour (1998) 1 LLN 466 (Bom), per Rebello J.

48 Manu v Aspinwal & Co Ltd (1963) 1 LLJ 212 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

49 Gokak Mills v Workmen of Gokak Mills 1993 Lab IC 1850, 1854 (Kant), per Rajendra Babu J.

50 GM, State Bank of India v SBI Staff Union (1998) 3 LLN 5 (SC), per Sujata V Manohar J.

51 Secretary, TNEBAS Union v TNEB (1998) 3 LLN 838 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

52 Tamil Nadu CSCA Staff Union v TNCSC Ltd (1998) 3 LLN 844 (Mad) (DB), per Liberhan CJ.

53 Voltas SPE Union v Voltas Switchgear Ltd (2001) 1 LLN 1135 (Bom), per Daga J.

54 Lokmat Newspapers (P) Ltd v Shankar Prasad (1999) 3 LLN 538 (553) (SC), per Majmudar J.

55 Mukund Staff and Officers'Association v Mukund Ltd (1999) 3 LLN 952 (Bom), per Pandya J.

56 South ADCCBLE Assn v Dy Commr of Labour (1999) 4 LLN 1102 [LNIND 1998 MAD 822], 1107 (Mad), per Govindarajan J.

57 International ACW Union v IAAI (2001) 4 LLN 909 (Mad) (DB), per Sathasivam J.

58 O'Kelly v Trusthouse Forte Plc (1983) ICR 708 (CA).

59 US v Silk 331 US 704.

60 Market Investigation Ltd v Minister of Social Security [1968] 3 All ER 732.

61 Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd v Alladin (1969) 2 LLJ 540 [LNIND 1969 SC 261], 544 (SC), per Shelat J.

62 EM Rao, OP Malhotra's The Law of Industrial Disputes, 2004, 6th ed.

63 International Airport Authority of India v IACW Union, AIR 2009 SC 3063 [LNIND 2009 SC 824]: (2009) IV LLJ 31SC : (2009) 13 SCC 374 [LNIND 2009 SC 824], per Raveendran J.

64 Div Engr, TMD v Secy, TNHRWD (2001) 1 LLN 1000 (Mad), per Sirpurkar J.

65 Harmohinder Singh v Kharga Canteen (2001) 3 LLN 715 (SC), per Ruma Pal J.

66 Christine Hoden (I) (P) Ltd v State of Goa (2002) 1 LLN 943 (Bom), per Upasani J.

67 N Yadavakrishnan GM, TNSTC Ltd (2002) 1 LLN 1034 (Mad), per Dinakaran J.

68 Bajaj Tempo Ltd v BK Sena (2002) 2 LLN 992 (Bom), per Kochar J.

69 Lakshmi Vilas Bank Employees Union v LVB Ltd (2002) 4 LLN 118 (Mad), per Sathasivam J.

70 Chidambaranar DPT Sangham v Tiruchendur Coop Spg Mills Ltd (2003) 4 LLJ 916, per Sathasivam J.

71 Punjab State CS&M Federation Ltd v PO, IT (2003) 4 LLJ 186 (P&H), per Singhvi J.

72 Digvijay Cement and Asbestos Mazdoor Sabha v State of Gujarat (2003) 1 LLJ 795 [LNIND 2002 GUJ 505] (Guj) : (2003) 2 GLR 992.

73 Richard Fritchley v Mgmt of Gatesway Hotel (2003) 4 LLJ 404 (AP), per Ghulam Mohammad J.

74 Steel Plant Employees Union, Salem v SAIL (2003) 1 LLJ 189 (Mad) : (2002) 2 MLJ 271 [LNIND 2002 MAD 241], per Sathasivam J.

75 Alarsin ME Union v Alarsin Pharmaceuticals Pvt Ltd (2004) 3 LLJ 870 [LNIND 2004 BOM 515] (Bom) : 2004 (3) Mh LJ 650: 2004 106 (3) Bom LR 853, per Ms Mhatre J.

76 Ramaratnam KS v LC (2002) 2 LLJ 1166 (Mad), per Rajan J.

77 Mgmt of Orissa Mining Corpn v Workmen (2004) 1 LLJ 1 (Ors) : 2003 (II) OLR 288, per Patra J.

78 Tamil Nadu EW Federation v Madras State Electricity Board AIR 1965 Mad 111 [LNIND 1963 MAD 296]: (1964) ILR 2 Mad.

79 Rashtriya Chemicals & Fertilisers Ltd v RCFE Union (2008) 2 LLJ 1032 [LNIND 2007 BOM 1307] (Bom) per Chandrachud J.

80 Food Corporation of India v Union of India (2009) 4 LLJ 850 (Cal) : 2009 (7) SLR 702 [LNIND 2009 CAL 398] : 2010 (127) FLR 460, per Banerjee J.

81 Maharashtra State PGC Ltd v Maharashtra VMK Sangh (2009) 2 LLJ 627 [LNIND 2009 BOM 131] (Bom) : 2009 (121) FLR 238 per Bobde J.

82 NLC Workers' Progressive Union v NLC Ltd (2012) 3 LLJ 756 (Mad), per Chitra Venkataraman J.

83 Thai Airways International Ltd v Govt of NCT of Delhi (2012) 4 LLJ 523 (Del) : 191 (2012) DLT 278, per Shali J.

84 Nadia Distt CC Bank Ltd v Employees' Union (2012) 2 LLJ 326 (Cal) : 2012 (133) FLR 1045 per Chakrabarti J.

85 Paresh Chandra Roy v Life Insurance Corpn 1970 Lab IC 530, 533 (Cal), per BC Mitra J.

86 Air India Cabin Crew Assn v Air India (1981) 2 LLJ 306, 308, per Pratap J.

87 PV Mani v Union of India 1985 Lab IC 1591, 1609 (Ker) (FB), per Sivaraman Nair J.

88 Hemant Kumar Gupta v President, Distt CCB Ltd 1982 Lab IC 1435, 1439 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

89 Zilla Parishad, Bhandra v Khushal 1986 Lab IC 117, 121 (Bom) (DB), per Mohta J.

90 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 43, para 6.82.

91 Voltas VE Union v Voltas Ltd (1999) 4 LLN 1107 (Mad) (DB), per Sivasubramaniam J.

92 Kerala E&AECLW Congress v District Labour Officer (2001) 4 LLN 380 (Ker), per Gafoor J.

93 Singareni Collieries Workers Union v Mgmt (2002) 4 LLN 83 (AP) (DB), per Sinha CJ.

94 Hindustan Steelworks Constn Corpn Ltd v Employees Union 2005 (6) SCC 725 [LNIND 2005 SC 608].

95 AP Foods v S Samuel AIR 2006 SC 3622 [LNIND 2006 SC 461]: (2006) 5 SCC 469 [LNIND 2006 SC 461] : (2006) III LLJ 18SC, per Pasayat J.

96 Haribhau Shinde v IT 1970 Lab IC 664 [LNIND 1969 BOM 45] (Bom) (DB), per KK Desai J.

97 See, notes and comments under s 33.

98 Haribhau Shinde v IT 1970 Lab IC 664 [LNIND 1969 BOM 45] (Bom) (DB), per KK Desai J.

1 Northbrook Jute Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1960 SC 87] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

2 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 43, para 6.82.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IIA Notice of Change

[3][S. 9B. Power of Government to Exempt.—

Where the appropriate government is of opinion that the application of the provisions of section 9A to any class of industrial establishments or to any class of workmen employed in any industrial establishment affect the employers in relation thereto so prejudicially that such application may cause serious repercussion on the industry concerned and that public interest so requires, the appropriate government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, direct that the provisions of the said section shall not apply or shall apply, subject to such conditions as may be specified in the notification, to that class of industrial establishments or to that class of workmen employed in any industrial establishment.]

EXEMPTION OF INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS FROM SECTION 9A

This section empowers the 'appropriate government' to exempt certain class of industrial establishments or certain class of workmen employed in any industrial establishments from the application of the provisions of s 9A. However, before the Government makes the direction exempting any class of industrial establishments or class of workmen employed in any 'industrial establishment', the following requirements must be complied with:

(1) The appropriate government should have formed the opinion that:

(i) the application of the provisions of section 9A to any class of industrial establishments or to any class of workmen employed in any industrial establishment affect the employers in relation thereto so prejudicially that such application may cause serious repercussions on the industry concerned, and

(ii) public interest requires that such industrial establishments or a class of workmen employed in any industrial establishment should be exempted from the application of section 9A.

(2) The direction of exemption and any conditions subject to which the direction of exemption is made should be made by a notification in the Official Gazette of the 'appropriate government'.

3 Ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 6 (wef 10-3-1957).

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

[1]CHAPTER IIB Grievance Redressal Machinery

S. 9C. Setting up of Grievance Redressal Machinery.—

(1) Every industrial establishment employing twenty or more workmen shall have one or more Grievance Redressal Committee for the resolution of disputes arising out of individual grievances.

(2) The Grievance Redressal Committee shall consist of equal number of members from the employer and the workmen.

(3) The chairperson of the Grievance Redressal Committee shall be selected from the employer and from among the workmen alternatively on rotation basis every year.

(4) The total number of members of the Grievance Redressal Committee shall not exceed more than six:

Provided that there shall be, as far as practicable, one woman member if the Grievance Redressal Committee has two members and in case the number of members are more than two, the number of women members may be increased proportionately.

(5) Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, the setting up of Grievance Redressal Committee shall not affect the right of the workman to raise industrial dispute on the same matter under the provisions of this Act.

(6) The Grievance Redressal Committee may complete its proceedings within thirty days on receipt of a written application by or on behalf of the aggrieved party.

(7) The workman who is aggrieved of the decision of the Grievance Redressal Committee may prefer an appeal to the employer against the decision of Grievance Redressal Committee and the employer shall, within one month from the date of receipt of such appeal, dispose off the same and send a copy of his decision to the workman concerned.

(8) Nothing contained in this section shall apply to the workmen for whom there is an established Grievance Redressal Mechanism in the establishment concerned.]

---

1 Subs by Act 24 of 2010, s 6 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010). Before substitution, Chap IIB (as inserted by Act 46 of 1982, s 7) stood as under:

"CHAPTER IIB

Reference of Certain individual disputes to grievance settlement authorities

S. 9C. Setting up of Grievance Settlement Authorities and reference of certain individual disputes to such authorities.—

(1) The employer in relation to every industrial establishment in which fifty or more workmen are employed or have been employed on any day in the preceding twelve months, shall provide for, in accordance with the rules made in that behalf under this Act, a Grievance Settlement Authority for the settlement of industrial disputes connected with an individual workman employed in the establishment.

(2) Where an industrial dispute connected with an individual workman arises in an establishment referred to in sub-section (1), a workman or any trade union of workmen of which such workman is a member, refer, in such manner as may be prescribed, such dispute to the Grievance Settlement Authority provided for by the employer under that sub-section for settlement.

(3) The Grievance Settlement Authority referred to in sub-section (1) shall follow such procedure and complete its proceedings within such period as may be prescribed.

(4) No reference shall be made under Chapter III with respect to any dispute referred to in this section unless such dispute has been referred to the Grievance Settlement Authority concerned and the decision of the Grievance Settlement Authority is not acceptable to any of the parties to the dispute."

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER III Reference of Disputes to Boards, Courts or Tribunals

S. 10. Reference of Disputes to Boards, Courts or Tribunals.—

(1) [1][Where the appropriate Government is of opinion that any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, it may at any time,] by order in writing—

(a) refer the dispute to a Board for promoting a settlement thereof; or

(b) refer any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the dispute to a court for inquiry; or

2[(c) refer the dispute or any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute, if it relates to any matter specified in the Second Schedule, to a Labour Court for adjudication; or

(d) refer the dispute or any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute, whether it relates to any matter specified in the Second Schedule or the Third Schedule, to a Tribunal for adjudication:

Provided that where the dispute relates to any matter specified in the Third Schedule and is not likely to affect more than one hundred workmen, the appropriate Government may, if it so thinks fit, make the reference to a Labour Court under clause (c):]

[3][Provided further that] where the dispute relates to a public utility service and a notice under section 22 has been given, the appropriate Government shall, unless it considers that the notice has been frivolously or vexatiously given or that it would be inexpedient so to do, make a reference under this sub-section notwithstanding that any other proceedings under this Act in respect of the dispute may have commenced.

[4][Provided also that where the dispute in relation to which the Central Government is the appropriate Government, it shall be competent for that Government to refer the dispute to a Labour Court or an Industrial Tribunal, as the case may be, constituted by the State Government:]

5[(1A) Where the Central Government is of opinion that any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended and the dispute involves any question of national importance or is of such a nature that industrial establishments situated in more than one State are likely to be interested in, or affected by, such dispute and that the dispute should be adjudicated by a National Tribunal, then, the Central Government may, whether or not it is the appropriate Government in relation to that dispute, at any time, by order in writing, refer the dispute or any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute, whether it relates to any matter specified in the Second Schedule or the Third Schedule, to a National Tribunal for adjudication].

(2) Where the parties to an industrial dispute apply in the prescribed manner, whether jointly or separately, for a reference of the dispute to a Board, Court, [6][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal], the appropriate Government, if satisfied that the person applying represent the majority of each party, shall make the reference accordingly.

7[(2A) An order referring an industrial dispute to a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal under this section shall specify the period within which such Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall submit its award on such dispute to the appropriate Government:

Provided that where such industrial dispute is connected with an individual workman, no such period shall exceed three months:

Provided further that where the parties to an industrial dispute apply in the prescribed manner, whether jointly or separately, to the labour court, tribunal or national tribunal for extension of such period or for any other reason, and the presiding officer of such Labour Court, Tribunal or National tribunal considers it necessary or expedient to extend such period, he may for reasons to be recorded in writing, extend such period by such further period as he may think fit:

Provided also that in computing any period specified in this sub-section, the period, if any, for which the proceedings before the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal had been stayed by any injunction or order of a civil court shall be excluded:

Provided also that no proceedings before a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall lapse merely on the ground that any period specified under this sub-section had expired without such proceedings being completed.]

(3) Where an industrial dispute has been referred to a Board, [8][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] under this section, the appropriate Government may by order prohibit the continuance of any strike or lockout in connection with such dispute which may be in existence on the date of the reference.

9[(4) Where in an order referring an industrial dispute to [10][a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] under this section or in a subsequent order, the appropriate Government has specified the points of dispute for adjudication, [11][the Labour Court or the Tribunal or the National tribunal, as the case may be] shall confine its adjudication to those points and matter incidental thereto.

(5) Where a dispute concerning any establishment or establishments has been, or is to be, referred to a [12][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] under this section and the appropriate Government is of opinion, whether on an application made to it in this behalf or otherwise, that the dispute is of such a nature that any other establishment, group or class of establishments of a similar nature is likely to be interested in, or affected by, such dispute, the appropriate Government may, at the time of making the reference or at any time thereafter but before the submission of the award, include in that reference such establishment, group or class of establishments, whether or not at the time of such inclusion any dispute exists or is apprehended in that establishment, group or class of establishments].

13[(6) Where any reference has been made under sub-section (1A) to a National Tribunal, then notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, no Labour Court or Tribunal shall have jurisdiction to adjudicate upon any matter which is under adjudication before the National Tribunal, and accordingly—

(a) if the matter under adjudication before the National Tribunal is pending in a proceeding before a Labour Court or Tribunal, the proceeding before the Labour Court or the Tribunal, as the case may be, in so far as it relates to such matter, shall be deemed to have been quashed on such reference to the National Tribunal; and

(b) it shall not be lawful for the appropriate Government to refer the matter under adjudication before the National Tribunal to any Labour Court or Tribunal for adjudication during the pendency of the proceeding in relation to such matter before the National Tribunal.]

[14][Explanation—In this sub-section, 'Labour Court' or 'Tribunal' includes any Court or tribunal or other authority constituted under any law relating to investigation and settlement of industrial disputes in force in any State].

(7) Where any industrial dispute, in relation to which the Central Government is not the appropriate Government, is referred to a National Tribunal, then notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, any reference in section 15, section 17, section 19, section 33A, section 33B and section 36A to the appropriate Government in relation to such dispute shall be construed as a reference to the Central Government but, save as aforesaid and as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, any reference in any other provision of this Act to the appropriate Government in relation to that dispute shall mean a reference to the State Government.]

15[(8) No proceedings pending before a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal in relation to an industrial dispute shall lapse merely by reason of the death of any of the parties to the dispute being a workman, and such Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall complete such proceedings and submit its award to the appropriate Government.]

ORDER OF REFERENCE

'Where Appropriate Government is of opinion'

Section 10(1) as originally enacted, opened with the words 'if any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended'. On the construction of those words in s 10, as it originally stood, the Madras High Court took the view that the decision of the Government referring an 'industrial dispute' was amenable to judicial review and that the reviewing court could look into even the questions whether an 'industrial dispute' factually existed or was apprehended.[16] The High Court pointed out that from the words 'if any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended', it was not clear as to who was to decide whether an industrial dispute is 'existing' or is 'apprehended'? and the difficulty was accentuated in the case of an 'apprehended' industrial dispute. The vagueness in penning the unamended s 10(1) was also noted by the Supreme Court in United Commercial Bank,[17] where Chandrasekhara Iyer J posed the question, 'whose apprehension is referred to in the Act; the government's or the parties' or the tribunal's or anyone else's? What is to happen if the apprehension does not crystallise into an actual dispute before the tribunal enters on its duties as regards the reference? Is the tribunal bound even then to take note of the mere apprehension and proceed to decide a dispute notwithstanding the fact that the parties say that there is no dispute between them?' Since, these questions did not fall for decision in the case, the court left them undecided with the laconic remark, 'these are interesting questions of wide import'. Section 10(1) was amended by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Ordinance 1951 and the words 'where the appropriate government is of opinion that the industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, it may at any time by an order in writing refer the dispute...', were substituted for the words: 'if any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended the appropriate government may, by order in writing, refer the dispute...' Thus, the vagueness pointed out in the United Commercial Bank was removed by the legislature. But shortly afterwards, a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court presided over by Patanjali Sastri CJI including all the three judges of the Bench which decided United Commercial Bank, on the construction of unamended s 10(1), in CP Sarathy, stated the following propositions:

(i) the government should satisfy itself, on the facts and circumstances brought to its notice, in its subjective opinion that an 'industrial dispute' exists or is 'apprehended';

(ii) the factual existence of a dispute or its apprehension and the expediency of making reference are matters entirely for the government to decide;

(iii) the order making a reference is an administrative act and it is not a judicial or a quasi-judicial act; and

(iv) the order of reference passed by the government cannot be examined by the High Court in its jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution to see if the government had material before it to support the conclusion that the dispute existed or was apprehended.[18]

Though these propositions were based on the unamended Act, which did not contain the words 'where the appropriate government is of opinion', the court implied the formation of 'subjective opinion' by the appropriate government, in the words 'if any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended'.[19] But in Western India Match Co, referring to the observations of Patanjali Sastri CJI in CP Sarathy case that the function of the appropriate government to make a reference under s 10(1) is an administrative function, speaking for the Supreme Court, Shelat J said:

> It was so held presumably because the government cannot go into the merits of the dispute, its function being only to refer such a dispute for adjudication so that the industrial relations between the employer and his employees may not continue to remain disturbed and the dispute may be resolved through a judicial process as speedily as possible.[20]

In Rohtas Industries. commenting on the observations in CP Sarathy, Hegde J held:

> This interpretation of section 10(1) is based on the language of that provision as well as the purpose for which the power in > question was given and the effect of a reference. That decision cannot be considered as an authority for the proposition that whenever a provision of law confers certain power on an authority on its forming a certain opinion on the basis of certain facts, the courts are precluded from examining whether the relevant facts on the basis of which the opinion is formed had in fact existed. [21]

A subtle distinction was drawn that 'the existence of circumstances but not the opinion' was open to judicial scrutiny. In Shambhu Nath Goyal, referring to the language of s 10(1), the court pointed out that the power conferred on the government by this provision to refer the dispute can be exercised only when there is an existing or apprehended industrial dispute.[22] Implicit in the power of making reference is 'the existence of the satisfaction that what is referred to is an industrial dispute'.[23] In this case, after referring to earlier dicta, the court held that 'in making reference under s 10(1), the "appropriate government" is doing an administrative act and the fact that it has to form an opinion as to the factual existence of an industrial dispute as a preliminary step to the discharge of its function does not make it any less administrative in character'. Thus, there is a considered body of judicial opinion that while exercising power to or of making a reference under s 10(1), the appropriate government performs an administrative act and not judicial or quasi-judicial act.[24] The satisfaction of the existence of an industrial dispute or the satisfaction that an industrial dispute is apprehended is 'a condition precedent to the order of reference'. An order of reference cannot be made mechanically without forming an opinion. For formation of the necessary opinion, the 'appropriate government' must also be satisfied that a person whose dispute is being referred for adjudication is a 'workman'. If the dispute is not between an employer and his workman, it is not an 'industrial dispute' and the Government can justifiably refuse to refer the dispute. From the material placed before it, the Government reaches an administrative decision whether there exists an existing or apprehended industrial dispute. In either event, it can exercise the power under this section.

The adequacy or the sufficiency of the material on which the opinion was formed, is beyond the pale of judicial scrutiny. If the action of the Government in making the reference is impugned by a party, it would be open to such a party to show that what was referred was not an industrial dispute and that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make the award but if the dispute was an industrial dispute, its factual existence and the expediency of making a reference in the circumstances of a particular case are matters entirely for the Government to decide upon, and it will not be competent for the court to hold the reference bad and quash the proceedings for want of jurisdiction merely because there was, in its opinion, no material before the Government on which it could have come to an affirmative conclusion on those matters.[25] The Government is not required to serve a notice on the management before making a reference under s 10 of the dispute raised by the Employees Association relating to the categorisation of employees.[26] The nature of the process of formation of the 'opinion' may be stated in the inimitable words of Lord Denning in Trinidad Cement.

> True it is that the governor has to enquire and, no doubt, he did-in his administrative capacity, but he had not to conduct anything in the nature of judicial or quasi judicial inquiry.[27]

The order making reference under s 10(1) is an 'unspeaking' order which to use Lord Summer's famous phrase 'speaks only with the inscrutable face of a sphinx'.[28]Therefore, the opinion of the government, under s 10(1) in referring the dispute, in this sense, is subjective and is not open to judicial scrutiny. In other words, the court cannot canvass the order of reference closely to see if there was any material before the government for coming to its conclusion as if it was judicial or a quasi-judicial determination but it will be open to a party seeking to impugn the award resulting from the order of reference to show that what was referred by the government was not an 'industrial dispute' at all within the meaning of the Act and the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make the award. No doubt, it is for the government to be satisfied about the existence or apprehension of the dispute. However, it would be open to the party impugning the reference that there was no material before the government, and it would be open to the tribunal to examine the question, but that does not mean that it can sit in appeal over the decision of the government and come to a conclusion that there was no material before the government. Furthermore, the question whether an industrial dispute existed on the date of the reference is a question of fact to be determined by the tribunal on the material placed before it.[29] When the 'appropriate government' makes a reference of an industrial dispute for adjudication, it does not decide any question of fact or law. The only condition which the exercise of that power should satisfy, is that there should be the existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute. When once the government is satisfied about this question, it acquires jurisdiction to refer the dispute for adjudication.[30] However, the condition precedent to the formation of such opinion, that there should be an existing or apprehended 'industrial dispute' is imperative and the recitals of the existence or apprehension of the industrial dispute cannot preclude the judicial review from going behind those recitals and in determining whether, in fact, there was any material before the 'appropriate government' and if there was, whether the government applied its mind in coming to the conclusion that an industrial dispute was in existence or was apprehended, and it was expedient to make the reference. Therefore, an order of reference is open to judicial review, if it is shown that the appropriate government had no material before it or it has not applied its mind to the material before it or has not taken into consideration certain vital facts which it ought to have taken into consideration.[31]

It is now well established that 'the discretion is neither unfettered nor arbitrary, for s 10(1) clearly provides that there must "exist" an "industrial dispute" as defined by the Act or such a dispute must be 'apprehended' before the government decides to refer it for adjudication'.[32] The law takes note of certain well-recognised principles regarding the exercise of discretionary power. There must be a real exercise of discretion ie, the authority must be exercised honestly and not for corrupt or ulterior purposes. In dealing with this problem, therefore, it is necessary to discern that the exercise of the discretionary power depends upon the honest formation of opinion that an industrial dispute is in existence or is apprehended and further that it will be expedient to make the reference after applying the mind to the relevant material before the government. The words 'where the appropriate government is of opinion' indicate that the opinion must be formed by the appropriate government and it is of course implicit that the opinion must be an honest one.[33]Furthermore, the appropriate government must act reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily nor according to whims or fancies. It will be an absurd exercise of discretion if, for example, the government forms the requisite opinion on account of pressure by any political party. Within these narrow limits, the opinion is not conclusive and, can be challenged in a court of law.[34] In English cases also, there are dicta to the effect that, if there were no grounds on which an authority could be satisfied, the court might infer that it had not applied its mind to the relevant facts or did not honestly hold the view expressed to be taken and that the court would interfere if there were no materials before the authority upon which it could be reasonably 'satisfied' that the order should be made.[35] In other words, the order of reference can be challenged by establishing bad faith or mala fide and corrupt motive as bad faith will destroy any action. However, bad faith or corrupt motive will be a matter to be established by the party alleging or propounding bad faith or corrupt motive by affirming and stating the facts. These facts are not only to be alleged but also have to be proved.[36]

The discretion of the government to make an order of reference is dependent on the satisfaction of these requirements and no jurisdiction outside the section which empowers making a reference can be exercised. In Sindhu Resettlement Corpn, in the first instance, the workman demanded reinstatement which the employer declined. Then he claimed retrenchment compensation, which too was declined in the circumstances of the case. The dispute was taken up by the union claiming retrenchment compensation for the workman on the ground that the employer had failed to take him back in its employment. The conciliation proceedings failed, subsequently on the basis of the failure report of the conciliation officer, the state of Gujarat referred the dispute relating to the reinstatement of the workman for adjudication to an industrial tribunal and the tribunal awarded reinstatement with full back wages. This award was challenged on three grounds, one of which was that the reference with respect to the reinstatement was not valid, because the dispute about reinstatement was not raised by the workman or the union with the management. This challenge was sustained by the Supreme Court with the observations thus:

> If no dispute at all was raised by the respondents with the management, any request sent by them to the government would only be a demand by them and not an industrial dispute between them and their employer. An industrial dispute, as defined, must be a dispute between employers and employers, employers and workmen and workmen and workmen. A mere demand to a government, without a dispute being raised by the workmen with their employer cannot become industrial dispute...The government had to come to an opinion that an industrial dispute did exist and that opinion could only be formed on the basis that there was a dispute between appellant and the respondents relating to reinstatement. [37]

This view is not correct on the facts or in law. Though the court noticed that 'it may be that conciliation officer reported to the government that an industrial dispute did exist relating to the reinstatement' of the workman and payment of back wages to him, it pointed out that no such dispute, in fact, was raised either by the workman or the Union with the employer before going to the conciliation. As already stated, the workman at the outset claimed reinstatement and that having been declined, he claimed the retrenchment compensation. From this claim for retrenchment compensation, the court has inferred that the claim regarding reinstatement was given up. But it has not given effect to the word 'difference' in the definition of 'industrial dispute', Even if subsequently, the workman and the union claimed retrenchment compensation, the 'difference' of opinion relating to reinstatement and back-wages continued to exist. Furthermore, the court also does not appear to have appreciated that the conciliation proceedings, are not adjudication proceedings but they are merely negotiations between the parties with the mediation of the conciliation officer for bringing about a settlement of an 'apprehended' or 'existing' industrial dispute. Therefore, it is open, for one party to raise a claim and the other party to reject it in the conciliation proceedings and this would be a 'difference' or 'dispute' qua that claim between the employer and the workmen. Even if such a dispute was not actually existing before going to the conciliation, it could well be 'apprehended' and would come into 'existence' as soon as the claim is rejected before the conciliation officer.[38] This is what exactly happened in this case. Before the conciliation officer, the dispute relating to reinstatement and back-wages did exist on which he made a failure report which was the foundation of the reference. It is not necessary that the dispute should have become an 'existing dispute' before the conciliation officer. The law requires that the 'industrial dispute' must exist or be apprehended on the date of the reference.[39] It could not, therefore, be said that the government based its opinion on material which was not relevant to the formation of opinion. The decision on this point requires reconsideration. From the use of the words 'any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended', it is obvious that the existence or apprehension of an 'industrial dispute' is a condition precedent to the making of the reference.[40]

CP Sarathy (supra) provides an illustration of a reference of an apprehended dispute. In this case, at the relevant time, there was no actual existing dispute between a particular employer owning a cinema theatre and his workmen but the government made a reference of an industrial dispute existing in the cinema industry as a whole in the town of Madras including the cinema of the employer. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the order of reference on the basis of the expression 'apprehended' used in this section. In Pradip Lamp Works. the court held that the reference of an industrial dispute to avert a threatened strike was an 'existing' or at any rate an 'apprehended' industrial dispute.[41] But in ITC, the order of reference was attacked on the ground that it was mechanically made by the government without application of mind inasmuch as the use of the composite phrase, 'exists or apprehended' in the order, demonstrated that there was no application of mind of the authorities concerned making the order of reference. It was pointed out that, on the facts of the case, either an 'industrial dispute' 'existed' or it could be 'apprehended' and it could not be both. The use of the words 'or is apprehended' in the order of reference was a mere surplusage and did not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the reference was made in a cavalier manner without any application of mind.[42]

A dispute comes into 'existence' as soon as it is raised by one party with the other and is rejected by the other and once having come into existence, it continues unless it is settled by means of a settlement, adjudication or arbitration.[43] The question whether an industrial dispute was raised or not is a question of fact. It must, therefore, be raised before the tribunal. It cannot be allowed to be raised for the first time before the High Court in its jurisdiction under Art. 226 or before the Supreme Court in appeal under Art. 133 or Art. 136 of the Constitution. However, no reference can be made by the 'appropriate government' unless at the time when it decides to make the reference, an 'industrial dispute' between the employer and his employees either existed or was apprehended and the reference it makes must be with regard to that and no other industrial dispute.[44] These requirements postulate the absence of a general discretion to go on a fishing expedition to find evidence. No doubt the formation of opinion is subjective, but the existence or apprehension of a dispute, of the nature of an industrial dispute which is a sine qua non for making an order of reference, must be demonstrable. If the order of reference is questioned on the ground that there was no material before the 'appropriate government' leading to the conclusion of the apprehension or existence of an industrial dispute, the order of reference might be amenable to interference in judicial review, despite its being an administrative order. Since the 'existence' or 'apprehension' of an 'industrial dispute', is a condition fundamental to the forming of opinion, it must be proved at least prima facie. In other words, at least it must be shown that the government formed an opinion that an 'industrial dispute' existed or was apprehended between the parties before a valid reference could be made.

Ordinarily, after an order or reference has been made, the writ court does not interfere and the question of the validity of the reference is left to the tribunal to decide. Nevertheless, if the court finds that the government has acted in clear contravention of the provisions of law or has taken its decision on extraneous or irrelevant considerations and no investigation into the disputed facts is involved, it can, in appropriate cases, entertain a writ petition against the order of reference. For instance, in Jaipur Polyspin, there was absolutely no material before the government on the basis of which it could have directly or indirectly made a reference with regard to bonus for the years 1982-83 to 1986-87 while the conciliation report unmistakably related to the claim for bonus for the year 1987-88.[45] In the absence of any dispute or difference between the parties regarding the claim for bonus for the year 1982-83 to 1986-87, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that the appropriate government was not competent to make reference for the years other than 1987-88 but in what types of cases, the writ court will interfere would depend on the facts and circumstances in each case. In Aulia Bidi Factory, Burhanpur v Industrial Tribunal ,[46] the state government was made a respondent party in the writ petition filed against the award of the industrial tribunal but no reply was filed on behalf of the state and, therefore, there was no material whatsoever before the High Court to show as to what material, if any, the government had before it on the basis of which it formed its opinion that an industrial dispute existed between the parties. The High Court, therefore, held that the opinion being based on no material, the consequent reference was invalid in law. The impugned award of the tribunal, adjudicating upon that reference was, therefore, quashed. It is not sufficient to assert that the circumstances exist which give no clue as to what they are because the circumstances must be such as to lead to conclusions of certain definiteness. An order of reference made by a government, without applying its mind to the materials and facts before it, in the light of the law laid down by judicial pronouncements in this behalf, would be manifestly erroneous and without jurisdiction and, as such liable to be quashed.[47]

The power to make an order of reference under s 10(1) arises as soon as the necessary opinion is formed by the appropriate government as to the existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute. The opinion, therefore, is naturally to be formed before the order is made. Hence, if the opinion was formed and an order was made after that, it will be a valid exercise of the power. The mere fact that the formation of opinion was not recited in the order would not take away the power to make the order. The validity of the order, therefore, does not depend upon the recital of the formation of opinion or on giving the details of facts upon which opinion is formed in the notification of reference, but on the factual formation of the opinion on the basis of the relevant material. If, by inadvertence or otherwise, the recital of the formation of opinion is not mentioned in the preamble to the order, the defect can be remedied by showing other evidence to the effect that the order was made after forming such opinion and that there was a valid exercise of the power. If, on the other hand, the order ex facie valid contains a recital that the condition precedent is satisfied, the court would presume that the necessary condition was fulfilled and the burden will be on him, who challenges the accuracy of the recital, to prove that it was incorrect.[48] Nor is it necessary that the government should disclose, either in its notification or in its counter-affidavit, details of facts on which it formed its opinion and came to the conclusion that it is expedient to make the reference.[49] The stage of dispute is not relevant consideration, but the consideration germane for making a reference is the dispute. It would not make any difference as to whether the dispute between the employer and the workmen was at the stage of workmen's suspension or they happened to be dismissed in pursuance of the domestic inquiry that were held in the intervening time.[50] An order of reference made by a notification not authenticated by a secretary, additional secretary, joint secretary, deputy secretary, under secretary or such other officer empowered by the President under Art. 77 or by the Governor under Art. 166 of the Constitution in that behalf, to authenticate the notifications issued under the Act, will not be a valid order.[51] In making the order of reference which is an administrative function, the appropriate government is, under s 10(1)(2), required to form its opinion after applying its mind to the material before it but the government is not required to give a hearing to the parties before making the reference as the tribunal has jurisdiction to decide the controversy even with respect to the validity of the reference after giving hearing to the parties.[52]Unless the order of reference discloses the illegality on its face, it is not reviewable. Unlike s 12(5) of the Act, it is not necessary to state reasons for making the reference in the order of reference.[53] Though, the rules of natural justice would apply even to administrative orders, it is not necessary that administrative orders, like the order of reference under s 10(1) should be speaking orders unless the statute specifically enjoins such a requirement.[54] Joint reference by the government of a dispute relating to termination or retrenchment of several employees working in different branches of the bank is valid.[55] In Indian Tea Assn, the Supreme Court summarised the law relating to the powers of government while making a reference of a dispute as follows:

> (1) The appropriate government would not be justified in making a reference under section 10 of the Act without satisfying itself on the facts and circumstances brought to its notice that an industrial dispute exists or apprehended and if such a reference is made, it is desirable wherever possible, for the government to indicate the nature of dispute in the order of reference.
>
> (2) The order of the appropriate government making a reference under section 10 of the Act is an administrative order and is not a judicial or quasi-judicial one, and the court, therefore, cannot canvass the order of reference closely to see if there was any material before the government to support its conclusion, as if it was a judicial or quasi-judicial order.
>
> (3) An order made by the appropriate government under section 10 of the Act being an administrative order, no lis is involved as such an order is made on the subjective satisfaction of the government.
>
> (4) If it appears from the reasons given that the appropriate government took into account any consideration irrelevant or foreign material, the court may in a given case, consider the case for a writ of mandamus.
>
> (5) It would, however, be open to a party to show that what was referred by the government was not an industrial dispute within the meaning of the Act. [56]

Following the decision rendered in Indian Tea Assn, a single Judge of Gujarat High Court held that the refusal by the Central Government to make a reference of the dispute after forming an opinion, on facts, to the effect that the person raising the industrial dispute was not a 'workman' and that there was no direct employer-employee relationship, the High Court held that such a refusal did not suffer from any infirmity.[57]

Refusal to make a Reference

In Bombay Journalists, Gajendragadkar J, held a prima facie examination of the merits is not foreign to the enquiry which the government is entitled to make in dealing with a dispute under s 10(1). The learned judge identified two circumstances in which it would be incompetent for the government to refuse to make a reference:

> (i) where the dispute raises questions of law; and
>
> (ii) where it involves disputed questions of fact, because both these circumstances fall within the province of the Tribunal.[58]

Where a particular matter is covered under a previous settlement or award which is in force, a subsequent reference of the matter for adjudication is incompetent. If, however, a demand made by the workmen earlier was withdrawn or was not pressed and hence is not covered by the previous settlement or award, the bar of ss 18 and 19 does not operate and the subsequent reference and adjudication as to that demand is competent and valid.[59] A second reference of an almost identical matter already covered by an award unless properly terminated under s 19 of IDA is invalid.[60] The refusal by the government to refer a dispute relating to dismissal of a workman, on the sole ground of absence of mala fides on the part of employer, is bad in law, because the determination as to the presence or absence of mala fides is a judicial function and hence not within the competence of the government.[61] It is mandatory for the government to record and communicate the reasons to the parties concerned, where the dispute has gone through conciliation and a failure report has been submitted. If the government refuses to refer the dispute on extraneous grounds, irrelevant considerations or acts of mala fide, the party would be entitled to move the High Court for a writ of mandamus.[62] The existence of satisfaction, that what was referred was an industrial dispute, was implicit in the power to make a reference.[63] The discretion conferred on the government was neither unfettered nor arbitrary.[64] From the aforesaid discussion, the legal position can be summed up thus: The government has the power to validly refuse to make a reference, if any of the following four conditions are satisfied:

(i) The claim is patently frivolous or vexatious; or

(ii) It is clearly belated or, in other words, has become stale; or

(iii) The dispute, if referred for adjudication, is likely to impact the general relations between the employers and the employees in the region adversely; and

(iv) The matter is covered by a subsisting settlement or award.

In other words, the power to make a reference is administrative and/or discretionary and is absolute in so far as the government is under no obligation to justify its decision. However, this absolute power is not available while refusing to make a reference, in which case the government is under a statutory obligation to communicate the reasons to the parties. In Union Bank of India, the facts were: the government refused to make a reference of the dispute relating to the increase in the rate of interest by the bank for loans to employees. Kochar J held that the refusal was without jurisdiction and directed the government to refer the dispute.[65] Where the government refused to make a reference on the ground that "the workman has not substantiated his arguments with documentary evidence; that he has not worked for more than 120 days in 12 consecutive months", Kulashrestha J of Madhya Pradesh High Court, while quashing the order, observed that the order amounted to adjudication of the dispute and that the government could not have undertaken adjudication of the disputed facts.[66] The reason given by the government, that the employer was not an 'industry', amounted to adjudication of the dispute and the refusal to refer the dispute on that ground is invalid.[67] In Rathinaswamy, the Central Government refused to refer the dispute relating to the conferment of permanence on 'temporary messengers' on the ground that the matter was covered by a settlement entered into under s 18(1) between the State Bank of India and the majority union. Directing the government to make a reference of the dispute, the Madras High Court held that it was not proper for the government to decide such contentious issues, which could only be resolved by adjudication.[68] In Amts Karmachari Sangh, the government refused to make a reference on the ground that there was no employer-employee relationship between the parties. Quashing the impugned order of the Dy. Labour Commissioner (who represented the appropriate government), Upadhyay J of Gujarat High Court observed that the reasoning of the government stands in direct conflict with the provisions of s 2(k) and s 2A of the Industrial Disputes Act in so far as the question whether there existed employer-employee relationship and whether the workman was entitled to relief were matters to be decided by a labour court or industrial tribunal.[69]

In Sarva Shramik Sangh, the facts briefly were: The appellant union filed a writ petition in 1999 in the Bombay HC seeking the following reliefs: (i) a direction to the Central Government to hold an investigation under s 10 of CLRAA on an application made by it earlier (in 1998) and make an order abolishing the contract labour system in respect of workmen working in the canteen of the Marketing division of IOC; and (ii) a direction to IOC to absorb/regularize the services of said workers. The writ petition was dismissed for want of prosecution in November 2003. Thereafter, the union filed another writ petition in HC in 2004 contending that the contract between IOC and the canteen contractor was sham and bogus and seeking a direction to the Central Government to refer the dispute relating to the permanency of canteen workers. The HC issued a direction to the Central Government to consider and dispose of the request for reference with a further direction to maintain status quo in respect of the workmen concerned till the disposal of reference application. In pursuance of it, conciliation proceedings were held and the conciliation officer sent a failure report in September 2004. The Central Government by its order of 21 December 2004 refused to make a reference on the ground that "the workmen were not appointed by IOC, but were engaged by the contractor having a valid and legal contract". The union filed a writ petition against the said order, which was dismissed by the High Court on the following grounds: (a) that the union had earlier filed a writ petition for abolition of contract labour in the canteen of IOC, which was dismissed in 2003 for non-prosecution and attained finality; (b) that the union, once having sought the relief of abolition of contract labour, was estopped from seeking any other relief by contending that the contract was sham and not genuine; and (c) that the order of Central Government refusing to make a reference did not suffer from any infirmity or arbitrariness. One of the issues were canvassed before SC was "whether the decision of the Central Government refusing reference requires interference." Raveendran, J (for self and Panta, J), cited several decisions of SC commencing from CP Sarathy and observed that the facts of present case were squarely covered by the decision in Ram Avtar Sharma (supra). The learned Judge finally held:

> ... it can safely be concluded that a writ of mandamus would be issued to the appropriate Government to reconsider the refusal to make a reference, where (i) the refusal is on irrelevant, irrational or extraneous grounds; (ii) the refusal is a result of the appropriate government examining the merits of the dispute and prejudging/adjudicating/determine the dispute; (iii) the refusal is mala fide or dishonest or actuated by malice; (iv) the refusal ignores the material available in the failure report of the Conciliation Officer and is not supported by any reason. ()...we allow this appeal and direct the Central Government to reconsider the matter in the light of the observations above and take an appropriate decision on the request for reference of the dispute to the Industrial adjudicator. As and when the state (sic) Government makes the reference, it is for the Industrial Tribunal to consider the dispute on merits, on the basis of materials placed before it, uninfluenced by the observations of the High Court or this Court. [70] ()

Withdrawal, Cancellation or Supersession of Reference

There will be withdrawal of a reference when the dispute which has been referred is taken out of the purview of the tribunal and there will be supersession of a previous reference when the second reference comprises matters or disputes totally unconnected with or different from the disputes originally referred.[71] In DN Ganguli, the Supreme Court held that the government has no power, either express or implied, to cancel or withdraw a reference after it has made the order of reference. An order cancelling, withdrawing or superseding a reference would, therefore, be incompetent and invalid and would be liable to be struck down being ultra vires the power of the 'appropriate government' under the Act.[72] The reviewing court cannot direct the 'appropriate government' to withdraw a reference simply because the government has discretion in the matter of making a reference and the parties have no legal right in the matter.[73] This is so because the appropriate government cannot be directed to exercise a power which it does not possess, ie the power to withdraw a reference.[74] The reason is that upon a tribunal ceasing to exist, it cannot proceed further with the pending adjudication. Further, unless a dispute is referred to it under s 10(1), the new tribunal constituted under s 7A, cannot proceed with the adjudication of the industrial dispute even though such a dispute was pending adjudication before the old tribunal.[75]However, the distinction between the tribunal and its presiding officer is to be borne in mind. If the tribunal itself lapses, the question of a fresh reference arises but where the tribunal constituted under s 7A continues and the term of the presiding officer expires, the vacancy so caused may be filled in under s 8. In such cases, it would not be necessary to make a fresh reference. There is no express power in the 'appropriate government' by its executive act, to abolish a tribunal after referring a dispute to it under s 10(1) till it makes an award. Nor does it possess jurisdiction to refer the same dispute to another tribunal by abolishing the tribunal before which such dispute was pending adjudication.[76]

In Lipton, the government, while making reference, omitted to include certain demands of the employees and all the demands of management. Subsequently, realising that the presiding officer had retired, the government made another reference substituting the name of another person in place of the first presiding officer. In this reference, the government incorporated the demands of the employees which had not been included in the first reference. This order of reference was challenged by the management by a writ petition. Meanwhile, the government made yet another reference including some of the demands of the employees and only three demands out of nine demands of the management. The management amended its writ petition by including the third reference as well. A single judge of the Bombay High Court (Nagpur Bench) held that the third order of reference was bad to the extent it dropped the six demands of the management out of the nine included in the first order of reference, but upheld the validity of the remaining reference. In connection with the word 'supersession' used in the second order of reference, the court observed that it was a mere misnomer because the third order of reference made explicit by adding some more demands though it did not use the expression 'supersession'. After the amendment of 1956, the government can withdraw an 'industrial dispute' pending before a tribunal or any other adjudicatory authority and transfer the same to another but from the language of that provision, it is clear that whenever the government decides to withdraw a reference from an adjudicatory authority, it has to transfer the same to another adjudicatory authority. It is not that the government can withdraw the reference from adjudication after once having made the reference.[77] In Indian Rayon, a single judge of Gujarat held that, while it is well settled that the appropriate government can vary and amend the terms of reference, it has no power to cancel the reference once made. The learned judge further observed that the petitioner-company at whose instance, the order of reference was passed was not given opportunity of hearing, and thus the order cancelling the earlier order of reference was illegal and bad in law both for want of express or implied jurisdiction and for being in violation of the principles of natural justice.[78]

Note: For further discussion, see notes and comments under s 33B -captioned 'Power of the Government to withdraw and transfer certain proceedings'.

Amendment or Correction of Reference

The question whether after making the order of reference, the 'appropriate government' could subsequently amend it, was considered by the Madras High Court in South India Labour Relations Organisation, and it was held that it is open to the government to make, under s 10, an independent reference concerning any matter not covered by the previous reference.[79]The consensus of judicial opinion, as can be discerned from the decisions of several High Courts, is that while the appropriate government acting under s 10, has the power to add to or amplify, a matter already referred for adjudication, it will have no power to supersede or cancel the old reference in such a way as to effect a withdrawal of the reference validly referred. There is no bar to the application of the rule of construction embodied in s 21 of the General Clauses Act 1897 insofar as it is consistent with the Act and is not likely to defeat its purpose. The logical conclusion, therefore, is that any amendment, addition or modification which the government can make subsequent to the order of reference cannot go to the length of superseding or withdrawing the original reference.[80] Though, the government has the power to rectify or correct the previous order of reference,[81] under the guise of amending or correcting the previous order of reference, the order of amendment or the corrigendum tantamounting to supersession of the previous order of reference cannot be validly made because such an order would be ultra vires the power of the government.[82] But there is no bar to amend a pending reference by a subsequent notification which is in the nature of addition to or amplification of the issue already referred to adjudication. This is so because amending a reference relating to a pending dispute by way of addition or amplification thereto is not inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Act and adoption of such a course would not defeat the purposes of the Act. The crux of the problem is as to whether the amendment which is sought to be made by a subsequent order of the State Government is merely an amplification of or is supplemental to or makes an addition to the matters already referred to for the decision of the industrial tribunal or the labour court concerned or whether it amounts to the revocation or cancellation or withdrawal or supersession of the reference already made or of any of the issues contained in the earlier reference.[83]

However, clerical errors can always be corrected and such correction does not amount either to withdrawal of, or cancellation of, the order of reference.[84] In other words, the appropriate government can amend a reference by way of addition or modification so long as the amendment does not have the effect of withdrawing or superseding the reference already made. Similarly, the government has the power to issue a second order of reference for correcting an obvious mistake or terminological error which has inadvertently crept in the first order of reference. In Bombay Gumasta Union, the order of reference contained a mistake, in that an officer of the government clubbed 13 respondents describing them as 'Kumar Group of Companies' though the conciliation proceedings related to each and everyone of the 13 respondents. This mistake was noticed by the tribunal and the government by a corrigendum for the words 'Kumar Group of Companies', the names of the 13 respondents were incorporated. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the government had simply corrected the mistake it had committed in the title to the reference. In these circumstances, it could not be said that the government had substituted new parties in the place of the old ones. The corrigendum, therefore, was only a correction and nothing more. The reference, therefore, was not incompetent. The cardinal principle in determining the question, whether the amendment amounts to a correction of clerical error or introduction of fresh material, is whether the relief claimed by the aggrieved party in the original notification can be granted in the proceedings which are to take place in pursuance of the amended notification.[85] If the same relief can be granted, the mistake may be considered as clerical which can be corrected by amendment. But if the same relief cannot be granted, then it means that the original notification has been cancelled or withdrawn and another notification has been issued in its place which the appropriate government is not competent to do.[86] The government has no authority to amend the reference for adjudication to implead the company as party to the dispute between the canteen contractor and its workman, when the Division Bench of the High Court had earlier ruled that impleading of the company was illegal and it stood deleted from the array of parties before the tribunal.[87] Under s 10, the government has the power to amend the existing reference pending before the labour court. It is also not necessary to issue notice to the employer and consider his objections before making reference on the second application.[88] The government has inherent powers to correct apparent errors in its reference, but that does not mean that the government has power to (review) recall its earlier order of reference.[89]

'Appropriate Government at any time may refer'

It is the appropriate government which has the power to make the reference. Hence, the reference of a dispute by a government which is not the appropriate government will not be valid but a reference may be made by any authority duly authorised by the appropriate government. In Bharat Textile Mills, the notification making the reference of an industrial dispute for adjudication was issued in the name of the President of India and was made and signed by the labour commissioner who had been vested with the powers exercisable under ss 10 and 12(5) in relation to the industrial disputes. The Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the notification was neither void nor without jurisdiction and was, therefore, not liable to be quashed and the award made on such reference was not without jurisdiction. The words 'at any time' preceded by the word 'may' in s 10(1), indicate the intention of the legislature that the government has discretion to refer a dispute at any time, if it is of the opinion that an industrial dispute is existing or is apprehended.[90] This gives rise to the following questions:

(i) whether the conciliation proceedings are a condition precedent in the making of the order of reference?

(ii) Whether during the pendency of the proceedings for 'permission' or 'approval' of the action of discharge or dismissal of a workman, before an authority under Section 33, a reference of the dispute relating to such discharge or dismissal can validly be made for adjudication?

(iii) whether once having refused to make a reference the appropriate government can subsequently make a reference of the same matter? and

(iv) whether there is any limitation in making the order of reference?

These questions have given rise to some judicial discussion and are, therefore, dealt in some detail hereunder:

(i) Conciliation Proceedings

In Avon Services (supra), Desai J held that s 12 casts duty upon the conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings in respect of the industrial dispute that exists or is apprehended. It is mandatory on the conciliation officer to hold the conciliation proceedings where the dispute relates to a public utility service and a strike notice has been served under s 22. The conciliation officer must try to promote a settlement between the parties. Either he succeeds in bringing the parties to a settlement or fails in his attempt. In either case, he must submit a report to the appropriate government. But the procedure for promoting settlement cannot come in the way of the appropriate government making reference even after such a report is received. In WIMCO, Shelat J observed:

> Ordinarily, the question of making a reference would arise after conciliation proceedings have been gone through and the conciliation officer has made a failure report. But the government need not wait until such a procedure has been completed. In an urgent case, it can 'at any time' ie even when such proceedings have not begun or are still pending, decide to refer the dispute for adjudication. The expression 'at any time' thus takes in such cases as where the government decides to make a reference without waiting for conciliation proceedings to begin or to be completed.[91]

There is nothing in s 10(1) to indicate that the 'appropriate government' has to wait for the conciliation officer's report under s 12(4). The second proviso to s 10(1) makes it obligatory on the 'appropriate government' to make a reference of an industrial dispute relating to a public utility service where a notice of strike or lock-out under s 22 has been given. The government is enjoined to made a reference irrespective of the fact that any other proceeding including conciliation proceedings under the Act have commenced. It is implicit in this proviso that even before the conciliation proceedings have started, the 'appropriate government' will have the power to make the reference of the dispute. The conciliation officer's report is, therefore, not a condition precedent for the government for exercising its power to make a reference under s 10(1) of the Act.[92]A priori, even if the conciliation proceedings are not held according to the statutory provisions on the basis of which the failure report is sent to the government, it will not affect the validity of the reference.[93] The provisions of s 10(1) are not controlled by the provisions of s 12(4) or 12(5) of the Act,[94]because when the appropriate government considers the question as to whether a reference should be made under s 12(5), it has to act under s 10(1) of the Act, and s 10(1) confers discretion on the 'appropriate government' either to refer the dispute, or not to refer it, for industrial adjudication, accordingly as it is of the opinion that it is expedient to do so or not. In other words, in dealing with an industrial dispute in respect of which, a failure report has been submitted under s 12(4), the appropriate government ultimately exercises its powers under s 10(1), subject to this, that s 12(5), impose an obligation on it to record reasons for not making the reference when the dispute has gone through conciliation and a failure report has been made under s 12(4).[95]It is not necessary that all the steps contemplated in the Act for settlement of an industrial dispute should be taken by the appropriate government one after the other. The different authorities which are constituted under the Act are set up with different ends in view and the appropriate government is invested with the discretion to choose one or the other of the authorities for the purpose of investigation and settlement of industrial disputes, upon its own appraisement of the situation.[1] Rules 10A and 10B of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 apply where reference is made on the report of the conciliation officer or on an application by the employer or the workman, but there is no bar to the government making a reference of the consequential matters arising as a result of the decision of the industrial tribunal or labour court one way or the other.[2] The government making an order of reference under s 10, is not confined to the dispute which was the subject-matter of conciliation proceedings, but is entitled to refer any 'existing' or 'apprehended' industrial dispute.[3]

(ii) Pending Application under Section 33

In ITC, the question before the High Court of Karnataka was whether the government was competent to refer the dispute relating to dismissal for adjudication under s 10, while an application filed under s 33(2)(b) for the approval of the said dismissal was pending before the tribunal. Rama Jois J held that any decision under s 33 is not final and, therefore, cannot yield to a limited and semi-final remedy provided under s 33(2)(b) proceedings. Therefore, notwithstanding that a proceeding under s 33 is pending, a dispute validly can be referred to adjudication under s 10(1).[4] On the construction of the words 'the appropriate government...may at any time, by order in writing... refer the dispute...for adjudication', the final conclusion of the learned judge is quite correct. But the reasoning that the decision of the court under s 33(2)(b) will not be final and bar reference under s 10(1) is not correct. In Navalbhai K Chanhan, the Gujarat High Court held that an order of reference with respect to dismissal of a workman can validly be made for adjudication during the pendency of an application for approval under s 33(2)(b) of the Act. In a s 33(2)(b) case, dismissal or discharge takes place before the application is made. Approval of the order of dismissal or discharge merely ratifies the action while disapproval has the affect of obliterating the order. On the other hand, in ss 33(1) and 33(3) cases, the dismissal or discharge of a workman takes place only after the express permission in writing is given by the appropriate authority. Therefore, there is a contradistinction between the provisions of s 33(2)(b) on the one hand and ss 33(1)(b) and 33(3)(b) on the other. In the former case, the order of reference with respect to the dismissal or discharge of a workman can validly be made in view of the power of the government to make the order of reference at any time, irrespective of the fact that a petition for approval is pending before the appropriate authority because in such a case, the action of discharge or dismissal has already taken place. But in the latter case, the order of reference will be premature because the dismissal does not take place unless the appropriate authority has accorded express permission in writing.[5]

(iii) Previous Refusal

When there is an industrial dispute, the factual existence of which cannot really be in dispute, a determination afresh by the government of the question of expediency of referring such a dispute for adjudication under s 10(1) of the Act after having previously declined to make a reference, does not amount to a review of any question judicially determined previously. The consensus of judicial opinion is that a prior order by the government under s 12(5), refusing to refer for adjudication a particular dispute, cannot affect the jurisdiction of the government to exercise the statutory power conferred upon it by s 10(1) of the Act on any subsequent occasion.[6] This view has been affirmed in Western India Match (supra), in which the Supreme Court considered two questions viz,

(i) do the words 'at any time' in section 4K of the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947 (which is in pari materia with section 10 of the Central Act) have any limitation or can the government refer a dispute for adjudication after the lapse of about six years, as in this case, after the accrual of cause of the dispute? and

(ii) in what circumstances, can 'the Government refer such a dispute for adjudication after it has once refused to do so?

Answering the first point, the court said:

> In fact when the government refuses to make a reference it does not exercise its power; on the other hand it refuses to exercise its power and it is only when it decides to refer that it exercises its power. Consequently, the power to refer cannot be said to have been exhausted when it has declined to make a reference at an earlier stage...the fact that it had earlier refused to exercise its power does not preclude it from exercising it at a later stage. In this view, the mere fact that there has been a lapse of time or that a party to dispute was, by the earlier refusal, led to believe that there would be no reference and acts upon such belief, does not affect the jurisdiction of the government to make the reference.

But the second question, viz, as to in what circumstances can the Government refer a dispute for adjudication after once having declined to refer it, was not separately answered by the court. The answer to this question is to be found in the answer to the first question itself, in the observation:

> In the light of the nature of the function of the government and the object for which the power is conferred on it, it would be difficult to hold that once the government has refused to refer, it cannot change its mind on a re-consideration of the matter either because new facts have come to light or because it had misunderstood the existing facts or for any other relevant consideration.[7]

On the facts of the case, the court found that the earlier decision of the government refusing to make the reference was based on the misapprehension of facts and said:

> If the government subsequently found that its earlier decision was based on such misapprehension and on facts brought to its notice, it reconsiders the matter and decides to make the reference it is difficult to say that it exercised the discretion conferred on it > by section 4K in any inappropriate manner.

With respect to stale claims, the court said:

> There is no reason to think that the government would not consider the matter properly or allow itself to be stampeded into making references in cases of old or stale disputes or reviving such disputes on the pressure of unions.

In Binny, it was pointed out to the court that the government had already refused to refer the dispute on two occasions and there was no material on record to show as to what persuaded the government ultimately to do so but the court observed that the mere fact that previously the government had taken the view that no reference was called for, would not, entitle the court to conclude that there could be no cause for reference of the dispute subsequently, and from the earlier refusal, it did not follow that thereafter the government could not either change its mind or make an order of reference on fresh material before it, as s 10(1) empowers the appropriate government to make a reference 'at any time' whenever it is of opinion that any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended. However, for want of the relevant material before it, the court could not go into the question whether the government had any material before it justifying the reference. It was, therefore, observed that this point could only be canvassed either in a proceeding to which the government was a party or where the court was in possession of all the available material relating to the dispute and in the absence of the government from the array of the parties, it was not possible to come to any finding as to whether there was any such material or not.[8] Since this point was raised in appeal by special leave before the Supreme Court, the view of the court is quite justified.

In Avon Services (supra), the appeal was against the order and judgment of the High Court dismissing the writ petition of the appellant inlimine, in which the appropriate government was impleaded as a party. In this case, the appropriate government had declined to make reference of an industrial dispute relating to the termination of the services of two workmen but about nine months after the refusal, the government referred the dispute for adjudication to the industrial tribunal. This order of reference did not disclose any reasons for making the reference. The tribunal directed the reinstatement of the workmen with full back wages. The award of the tribunal was challenged before the High Court of Punjab and Haryana in a writ petition impleading inter alia the government of Haryana which was dismissed in limine. In appeal, against the order of the High Court, before the Supreme Court, it was contended that subsequent to the earlier refusal to refer the dispute, neither had any facts come to light nor was it discernible from the order of reference that the government had misunderstood the existing facts or there was any other relevant consideration. It was further submitted that the order of reference did not disclose any reasons justifying reconsideration of its earlier decision refusing to refer the dispute. It was also pointed out to the court that the government was before it as a party to the appeal and since it had not filed any affidavit controverting these averments, the order of reference was bad for non-compliance with the requirements as suggested by the court in WIMCO. Following that decision, the court rightly held that it was competent for the appropriate government to refer an industrial dispute for adjudication which it earlier declined to do. Speaking for the court, Desai J stated:

> Merely because the government rejects a request for a reference or declines to make a reference, it cannot be said that the industrial dispute has ceased to exist, nor could it be said to be a review of any judicial or quasi-judicial order or determination. The industrial dispute may nonetheless continue to remain in existence and if at a subsequent stage the appropriate government is satisfied that in the interest of industrial peace and for promoting industrial harmony it is desirable to make a reference, the appropriate government does not lack power to do so under section 10(1), nor is it precluded from making the reference on the only ground that on an earlier occasion it had declined to make the reference. The expression 'at any time' in section 10(1) will clearly negative the contention that once the government declines to make a reference the power to make a reference under section 10(1) in respect of the same dispute gets exhausted. Such a construction would denude a very vital power conferred on the government in the interest of industrial peace and harmony and it need not be whittled down by interpretative process...A refusal of the appropriate government to make a reference is not indicative of an exercise of power under section 10(1), the exercise of the power would be a positive act of making a reference. Therefore, when the government declines to make a reference the source of power is neither dried up nor exhausted. It only indicates that the government for the time being refused to exercise the power but that does not denude the power. The power to make the reference remains intact and can be exercised if the material and relevant considerations for exercise of power are available; they being the continued existence of the dispute and the wisdom of referring it, in the larger interest of industrial peace and harmony. Refusal to make the reference does not tantamount to saying that the dispute, if it at all existed, stands resolved. On the contrary, the refusal to make a reference, not compelling the parties to come to a talking table or before a quasi-judicial tribunal would further accentuate the feelings and a threat to direct action may become imminent and the government may as well reconsider the decision and make the reference. ... It is not absolutely necessary that there ought to be some fresh material before the government for reconsideration of its earlier decision. The government may reconsider its decision on account of some new facts brought to its notice or for any other relevant consideration and such other relevant > consideration may include the threat to industrial peace by the continued existence of the industrial dispute without any attempt at resolving it and that a reference would at least bring the parties to the talking table.[9]

In one breath, the court recognised that the government may reconsider its decision on account of some 'new facts brought to its notice or for any other relevant consideration...such other relevant considerations may include the threat to industrial peace by the continued existence of the industrial dispute without any attempt at resolving it and that a reference would at least bring the parties to the talking table' and at the same time, it said that 'it was not absolutely necessary that there ought to be fresh material before the government for reconsideration of its earlier decision'. These observations are not only self-contradictory but are also irreconcilable with the ratio of WIMCO, which provides unequivocal guidelines for exercise of the government's discretion for reconsideration of the question of referring the dispute which it had earlier declined to refer. To say that, it is not absolutely necessary that there should be fresh material before the government for reconsideration of its earlier decision, would give sanction to arbitrariness on the part of the government resulting in absurd situations. For instance, even after the lapse of fifty years, from its refusal to refer a dispute for adjudication, without any further facts or relevant consideration, the government would be competent and justified to make a valid reference merely because the 'industrial dispute' may 'continue to remain in existence'. By this logic, the 'industrial disputes', which are not referred for adjudication, will continue to exist for centuries, nay eternally. In other words, the power of the government to refuse to refer a dispute will be rendered otiose because the dispute always will continue to exist in cases where the government refused to refer it. That is why in WIMCO, the court had indicated the facts and circumstances in which the government can justifiably reconsider the question of referring the dispute to adjudication which it had declined earlier.

The existence of facts and circumstances, indicated in WIMCO, must be discernible either from the order of reference or from the return filed by the government to the writ petition. It is, therefore, desirable that when the government decides to refer the same dispute for adjudication, subsequent to its refusal to make a reference, it must state reasons showing that new facts had come to light or there was misunderstanding as to the existence of facts or there was any other relevant consideration including the threat to peace in the order of reference. Alternatively, these reasons may be stated in the counter-affidavit in reply to the writ petition challenging the order of reference. In the absence of the statement of reasons actuating the government to reconsider the question of making the reference, the guidelines provided in WIMCO that 'there is no reason to think that the government would not consider the matter properly or allow itself to be stampeded into making a reference in cases of old or stale dispute or reviving such disputes on the pressure of unions', would be rendered to be a merely pious hope, because the order being 'the inscrutable face of a sphinx'[10] will not be open to judicial scrutiny and the government will always be able to 'disarm the court by taking refuge in silence'.[11] There may be various possibilities of the government being pressurised into making the reference subsequent to the previous refusal; for instance, the change of the officer responsible for making the reference, connection of the trade union with the ruling party at the relevant time, change of the government from one political party to another; mala fides and so on. Obviously, such considerations cannot be bona fide or for relevant or germane reasons warranting the departure from the previous decision. This is illustrated in the case of Srikrishna Jute Mills.[12] After having declined to make the reference of a dispute, the 'appropriate government' subsequently referred the same for adjudication on the representation of an MLA. In a writ petition, challenging the subsequent reference, though the Andhra Pradesh High Court correctly stated the ratio of the dicta of the Supreme Court in WIMCO and Binny, in its application to the facts of the case it went haywire. From the facts of the case, it was not discernible that any new facts had come to light or the government had misunderstood the existing fact or there was any other relevant consideration. Obviously, the reference was made because the MLA had brought political pressure on the government, who had made the indorsement on the application of the workman. The consideration, that the application of workman was sent along with a covering letter of the MLA, was clearly extraneous and irrelevant to the facts which the government could take into consideration in determining the expediency of referring the dispute for adjudication. Hence, the reference was liable to be quashed on certiorari.

Again in Shanti Theatres, a single judge of the Madras High Court quashed the reference made in similar circumstances. In this case, the reference relating to the dismissal of three workmen was declined by the appropriate government on three occasions between 1969 and 1978, before the reference was finally made for adjudication. This order of reference was challenged by the employer in a writ petition before the High Court on the grounds that there was no fresh material before the government nor the earlier orders were passed by it under any misapprehension. It was stated in the affidavit that the reference was politically motivated and based on extraneous grounds and as such was vitiated by mala fides. It was also urged that, in the course of ten years, the situation had changed and the employer had been under the impression that a quietus had been given once for all to the dispute. It was, therefore, submitted that the government should have considered the inequity in referring a stale claim for adjudication after the lapse of a decade. The court quashed the award on the ground that the order was bad as it had not given any reasons disclosing any fresh material or that the earlier orders were passed as a result of any misapprehension. The court also observed that there was no reason justifying the reference after the lapse of such a long time.[13]

The decision of Supreme Court in Avon Services is not only bad in law, as it advances abuse of power, but is also likely to bring industrial disharmony by reviving old and dead controversies. The absurdity of reviving a dead case was illustrated in Mahabir Jute Mills, where the Supreme Court itself noted that between the dismissal of 800 workmen which was the subject-matter of the dispute and the hearing of the appeal by special leave, nearly twenty years had elapsed and an embarrassing situation had arisen for the employer, as the workmen employed in place of dismissed workmen had already put in 20 years of service.[14] It is submitted that in view of the decision rendered in WIMCO, as against the perverse reasoning of Desai J in Avon Services, it is not necessary for the appropriate government to give a hearing to the parties before making a reference after previously having refused to do so on one or more occasions. It would be necessary for the government to state reasons in the order of reference in such a situation for the scrutiny of the judicial review to see that it has not been 'stampeded into making a reference in case of old or stale dispute or reviving such dispute on the pressure of unions or external forces'.

In Sultan Singh, the government had refused to make the reference on the ground that there was no existing dispute. The workmen again represented to the government to make the reference and the labour minister made a note on the representation directing the government to make a reference. Despite that, no reference was made and on further representation, the labour commissioner ordered that 'in view of the decisions already taken' it is not necessary to reconsider the earlier decision and, therefore, again declined to make the reference. The writ petition was dismissed by the Punjab & Haryana High Court. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that, from a conjoint reading of s 10(1) and s 12(5), the State Government has to form an opinion whether an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended and then to decide whether to refuse or make the reference. In case the government refuses to make a reference, s 12(5) requires it to record and communicate its reasons to the parties concerned. But in case the government makes a reference, there is no requirement to record or communicate the reasons, as the function of making reference is only administrative and not quasi-judicial. For forming its opinion, the appropriate government is entitled to go into the question whether an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended. It would be a subjective satisfaction on the basis of the material on record. In an administrative order, no lis is involved. Hence, there is no need to issue any notice to the employer to hear him before making or refusing to make a reference. There is no need for giving a hearing even if the government makes a reference after initial refusal and such reference does not cease to be an administrative order; and so is not incumbent upon the government to record the reasons. In the light of this legal position, the court rejected the view of the High Court. However, the apex court did not give any relief to the workmen in view of the decision of the government that no industrial dispute existed.[15] In FCI, a few workmen were dismissed from service immediately after appointment as they had procured the employment by means of fraud and collusion with some employees of the corporation. The government categorically refused to refer the matter to the tribunal on the ground that the dismissal in question was not retrenchment. However, after a lapse of six years, the government made a reference, without applying its mind to the facts of the case and without hearing the management. The Calcutta High Court held that the second reference was not in accordance with the law and was liable to be struck down because it did not indicate any application of mind, particularly in the absence of management being heard before the reference was made. The court observed:

> The trend of judicial pronouncements unmistakably point out that natural justice in the special circumstances as in the present one demands that the employer ought to have been heard before the actual reference is made and that having not been done the impugned reference on the said ground alone is liable to be struck down. That there was no application of mind on the part of the government is evident from the fact that when the earlier reference was refused on a definite ground, no reason is disclosed why after lapse of six years a reference was made. True, the government is not bound to disclose what materials, if at all were considered when the reference is made. But failure to give a chance of hearing or an opportunity to the management to submit their case before the decision to refer the dispute was made only shows lack of application of mind which must vitiate the reference.[16]

In view of the expanding dimensions of administrative law, it is desirable that the legislature engrafts the requirement of stating reasons in case where the appropriate government decides to refer an industrial dispute for adjudication after previously having declined to do so. It is also desirable that a period of limitation is prescribed for making the order of reference instead of leaving it to unlimited vagaries of the government to make the reference 'at any time' after forming its opinion as to the existence or apprehension of the 'industrial dispute'. This will have a salutary effect against the revival of stale and dead controversies. This is the least requirement of fair administration, in the interest of industrial peace and harmony.[17] After having declined to refer the dispute for adjudication, if the appropriate government subsequently chooses to make the reference, it has the power only to refer that dispute which was previously 'existing' or 'apprehended'. In Sindhu Resettlement Corpn (supra), it was categorically held that while purporting to make the reference of the industrial dispute, it cannot refer altogether a different dispute for adjudication.[18] In Central Bank of India, the facts briefly were: the Central Government had, after the initial refusal of the dispute raised by the general secretary of the union as long back as 1971 in respect of a facility which was withdrawn by the bank, the dispute remained unresolved for over 25 years; made a second reference of the same dispute. The tribunal held that the second reference was valid, which order was impugned by the bank. While observing that an earlier rejection to make a reference did not denude the government of its power to make second reference later under s 10(1), Mukul Mudgal J of the Delhi High Court held that such second reference should be with notice to the affected party, the Bank in this case, and that, in the light of the fact that the reference was made without notice to the bank, it was without jurisdiction.[19] This is decision calls for some analysis. Answers to the following questions expose the grave misconceptions of Himalayan proportions that crept into the judicial process:

(i) Why should the government give a hearing to the employer before making a reference, albeit after initial refusal? (ii) What is the nature of the function performed by the government while making a reference? (iii) At what stage could it be said that the rights of parties have been affected—is it at the time of making a reference or after the Tribunal passes an order? In the face of several authorities to the contrary, to hold that the employer needs hearing merely because reference was refused in the first instance, is a judicial misconception. If the issuance of notice or giving a hearing to the employer has no application while making reference of an apprehended dispute suo motu under s 10 (1) or on the receipt of failure report [s 12(4) read with s 10(1)], the said requirements can have no application to a reference made after initial refusal either. For that matter, even the fact that the workmen have a right to move the High Court under Art. 226 is also irrelevant in determining the nature and scope of the power conferred under s 10. The power of government to make a reference is in no way limited by the right conferred on either party to move the High Court for a writ. The above decision of Mukul Mudgal J runs counter to the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court and is wrong with no binding force and deserves to be rejected as being baseless and without any merit. In striking contrast, in a similar set of facts in Lokmat Newspapers, DD Sinha J of Bombay High Court held that the making of a reference is an administrative function; that being so, it can, after refusing to make a reference, refer the same dispute at a subsequent stage on new facts brought to its notice, and that an order making reference being an administrative one, there was no need to issue notice or to hear the employer.[20] This decision was consistent with the spirit of s 10 and with the rulings of the Apex Court and is right, as against the misconceived decision of Mukul Mudgal J in Central Bank (supra).

(iv) Limitation

There is no period of limitation prescribed in the Act for making a reference under s 10(1). It is for the appropriate government to consider whether it is expedient or not to make the reference.[21] The words 'at any time' used in s 10(1) do not admit of any limitation in making an order of reference. The laws of limitation which might bar any civil court from giving a remedy in respect of lawful rights cannot be applied by an industrial tribunal.[22] However, the policy of industrial adjudication is that very stale claims should not be generally encouraged or allowed unless there is a satisfactory explanation for delay, as, apart from the obvious risk to industrial peace from the entertainment of claims after long lapse of time, it is necessary also to take into account the unsettling effect which it is likely to have on the employer's financial arrangement,[23] and to avoid dislocation of industry. In Shalimar Works, the Supreme Court pointed out that though there is no limitation prescribed in making a reference of disputes to industrial tribunal under s 10(1), even so it is only reasonable that disputes should be referred as soon as possible after they have arisen and after conciliation proceedings have failed.[24] In WIMCO (supra), though the court observed that the reference of the dispute made nearly six years after the previous refusal to make the reference, was valid and justified. The court, however, observed, that the government would consider these questions properly and will not allow itself to be stampeded into making reference of old or stale disputes or revive such disputes on the pressure of unions but these observations are nothing more than lip-service of pious hope, because in practice references of inordinately delayed disputes have not been refused. A single judge of Delhi High Court has gone to the extent of holding that a reference made even 18 years after the cause of the dispute arose was justified for the flimsy reason that the employer had not properly decided the case of the workman.[25] On the other hand, another single judge of Bombay High Court in R Ganeshan, held that inordinate and unexplained delay is just and proper ground for refusing to make a reference.[26]

There is no hard and fast rule regarding the time for making the order of reference. As to what is the reasonable time within which the dispute should be referred after the failure of conciliation proceedings or whether a claim has become too stale or not, will depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[27] Likewise, whether the intervening period between the date of earlier refusal of the government to make a reference and its subsequent decision to reopen the dispute is short or long would also necessarily depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[28] Though it is desirable that there should be no unreasonable or inordinate delay in making a reference by the appropriate government, delay or laches cannot be made a ground for striking down the reference. In the matter of making a reference, the 'appropriate government' is the supreme authority and the tribunal would hardly enter that arena and encroach upon its functions. It is a matter concerning the administrative action of the government and the tribunal is not competent to go into the question of delay in making the reference after assuming jurisdiction over the matter. It is duty-bound to decide the question on merits and the ground of delay cannot be made a jurisdictional matter before the tribunal. The tribunal may, if it thinks fit, take such facts into account only in the matter of granting relief to the employee.[29] In Ajaib Singh, where the workman raised a dispute against his termination after a lapse of 7 years, the Supreme Court held that, as no plea of delay was taken by the management before the labour court, the workman could not show the circumstances preventing him from approaching the court at an earlier stage and, had that plea been taken, the workman would have been able to show the circumstances or even to satisfy the court that such plea was not sustainable after the reference was made by the government.[30] In KGID, a single judge of Karnataka High Court held that delay by itself could be no ground to reject the reference. The rejection by the tribunal of the dispute regarding payment of bonus for the year 1980, on the ground that the reference was made after a lapse of 12 years from 1980 and that the dispute, since, had become stale, was not sustainable in law.[31] In Mahavir Singh, the Supreme Court observed that, a reference could be made after a delay of 9 years, and it cannot be denied merely on the ground of delay and that mere delay does not cease the dispute, but taking care at the time of granting relief to the concerned workman.[32] In Nedungadi Bank, the apex court held:

> Law does not prescribe any time-limit for the appropriate government to exercise its powers under section 10 of the Act. It is not that this power can be exercised at any point of time and to revive matters which had since been settled. Power is to be exercised reasonably and in a rational manner. There appears to us to be no rational basis on which the Central Government has exercised powers in this case after a lapse of about several years of the order dismissing the respondent from service. At the time reference was made, no industrial dispute existed or could be even said to have been apprehended. A dispute, which is stale could not be the subject-matter of reference under section 10 of the Act. As to when a dispute can be said to be stale would depend on the facts and circumstances of the each case. When the matter has become final, it appears to us to be rather incongruous that the reference be made under section 10 of the Act in the circumstances like the present one. In fact it could be said that there was no dispute pending at the time when the reference in question was made. The only ground advanced by the respondent was that two other employees who were dismissed from service were reinstated. Under what circumstances, they were dismissed and subsequently reinstated is nowhere mentioned. Demand raised by the respondent for raising industrial dispute was ex facie bad and incompetent.[33]

In Gurmail Singh, where the labour court dismissed the reference on the ground that there was a delay of 8 years in raising the dispute, the Supreme Court condoned the delay and ordered that the workman would not be entitled to any back wages for the 8 year period, but would be entitled to 50 per cent of wages from the date of raising the dispute till the date of reinstatement.[34] However, in Indian Iron & Steel, the Supreme observed that the tribunal was right in not granting any relief to the workman as he preferred the claim almost after a period of 13 years without any reasonable or justifiable ground.[35] In Balbir Singh, where counsel for petitioner strongly relied on Ajaib Singh in favour of condoning the delay and granting relief to the workman, the Supreme Court, rejecting the said contention, observed:

> We have carefully considered the contentions raised by the learned counsel for the petitioner. We have also perused the aforementioned decision. We do not find that any general principle, as contended by the learned counsel for the petitioner, has been laid down in that decision. The decision was rendered in the facts and circumstances of the case, particularly, the fact that the plea of delay was not taken by the management in the proceeding before the tribunal. In the case on hand, the plea of delay was raised and was accepted by the tribunal. Therefore, the decision cited is of little help in the present case. Whether relief to the workman should be denied on the ground of delay or it should be appropriately moulded, is at the discretion of the tribunal depending upon the facts and circumstances of the case. No doubt the discretion is to be exercised judicially. The High Court, on consideration of the matter, held that there was no ground to interfere with the discretion exercised by the tribunal. We are not satisfied that the award of the tribunal declining relief to the petitioner, which was confirmed by the High Court, suffered from any serious illegality which warrants interference by this Court. Accordingly, the special leave petition is dismissed. [36]

A conspectus of the above decisions discloses the fact that the law relating to the delay in raising or reference of disputes is bereft of any principle, which can be easily comprehended by the lawyer and litigant. In some cases, the delay was condoned, while in others, not, even though there was no perceptible difference in the nature or extent of delay as between them. It is also observed that the High Courts have adopted highly divergent approaches in condoning the delay and in granting or refusing relief to workmen, even when the plea of delay was raised by the management before the trial court. It is also observed that there was no uniformity nor consistency in the decisions in respect of the number of years of delay. The fact that Limitation Act does not apply to industrial disputes does not imply that the workmen can raise or the government can refer disputes at their sweet will after inordinate delay and that such delay should be favourably treated by the courts. Such a view militates against the very concept of administration of justice and the principles of natural justice. For example, in Ajaib Singh a delay of 7 years was condoned on the ground that the employer had not taken the plea of delay before the labour court, whereas in Nedungadi Bank, the delay of 7 years in making reference was not. Interestingly, Saghir Ahmad J, was the Presiding Judge of both the benches that decided Ajaib Singh and Nedungadi, which are poles apart in so far as the line of reasoning advanced and the conclusions reached, regardless of the fact that the two cases are identical as to the extent of delay. What message do these two decisions with an identical set of facts - one condoning the delay and other condemning it - convey to the lawyer, litigant and the general public? The case of Sapan Kumar Pandit, is a classic example of 'gross abuse of judicial power' on the part of the Apex Court. The facts of the case were: a workman, whose services were terminated in 1975 along with a few others, raised a dispute in 1990, which was referred for adjudication in 1993 under s 4K of the UPIDA, in all, 18 years after termination. The High Court rightly struck down the reference as being stale. Justice Thomas (for self and Sethi J), observed:

> There are cases in which lapse of time had caused fading or even eclipse of the dispute. If nobody had kept the dispute alive during the long interval, it is reasonably possible to conclude in a particular case that the dispute ceased to exist after some time. But when the dispute remained alive though not galvanized by the workmen or the union on account of other justified reasons it does not cause the dispute to wane into total eclipse...The High Court has obviously gone wrong in axing down the order of reference made by the government for adjudication.[37]

The above decision exposes not only judicial laxity of the worst order touching upon questions of vital importance, but also a total absence of conviction on the part of the learned judge. The mere fact that the Act does not prescribe any limitation does not mean that disputes can be referred after a substantial lapse of time. What is meant by the observation: 'when the dispute remained alive though not galvanized by the workmen or the union on account of other justified reasons', when the facts disclose that the workman slept over for 15 years and failed to explain the inordinate delay? If 10 other workmen raised a dispute through the union immediately after termination (i.e., in the year 1976) and the appellant did not choose to raise a dispute either along with them or thereafter, that fact itself should give rise to the presumption that the appellant was not interested in invoking the machinery provided under the Act. At any rate, the decision given by the labour court in respect of the said ten workmen would not be applicable to him automatically in view of the fact that he was not a party to the dispute raised by them nor did he raise a dispute on his own. It is not for the judge to explain, on behalf of the workman, the unexplained delay running into 15 years and argue his case, as if he was holding a brief for him. The doctrine of 'total eclipse' vs 'partial eclipse' invented and imported by Thomas J, into the reasoning process is absolutely baseless and irrelevant. An analysis of the aforesaid decision raises the question: "on what principle known to law did the learned judge condone the delay of 17 years in making the reference, out of which 15 years was directly attributable to the workman himself, more so, in the face of several rulings of the Supreme Court to the contrary?" The kind of misplaced generosity displayed by Thomas J in Sapan Kumar Pandit is clearly uncalled for, apart from being wholly misplaced and perverse. The decision of the High Court was right, being consistent with several authorities, a few of which are cited in the following paragraph, and that of Thomas J, is clearly wrong.[38] In Shivalinga, the Supreme Court rejected the argument advanced by counsel, which was based on the ratio of Sapan Kumar Pandit, and held 'that the delay of more than 9 years on the part of the workman did not deserve to be condoned and such delay would render the claim stale.[39] Despite this ruling, a single judge of Delhi High Court condoned the unexplained delay of five years and set aside the order of tribunal refusing to grant relief to the workman on that count.[40] In JC Biswas, the Supreme Court upheld the dismissal of a development officer, who remained absent from station without permission for 61 days and who filed a writ petition against the management after an unexplained delay of 5 years.[41] In Digambar Kalaskar, where a dismissed workman slept over for 18 years spending his time in writing letters to the State and Central ministers, without raising a dispute as provided in the Act, it was held that his claim for a reference of the dispute under s 10(1) became stale and there was no justification to condone the delay, even though no limitation was prescribed under the Act.[42]

In Surjit Singh, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that if plea of delay was not taken, the delay might be condoned. But, if a dispute had become stale, it should not be revived after a lapse of long period, if the plea regarding delay was taken.[43] Where the workman, whose services were terminated on account of an FIR filed against him in a criminal case in 1978, did not raise the dispute for 11 months after the said FIR was quashed in 1994, and again did not take any interest to challenge the award of labour court which went against him for 4 years after the passing of award, the writ petition is not maintainable because of the unexplained delay.[44] In a case where the labour court condoned the unexplained delay of 9 years in raising a dispute that was referred under s 10 and ordered reinstatement with 50 per cent back wages, and the employer reinstated him pending proceedings in the High Court, the Karnataka High Court held that no blood could be pumped into either by a labour court or by the High Court for a stale dead reference, and that the single judge committed a serious error in failing to notice the enormous delay in the light of binding judgments of the apex court, but held that, in the particular facts of the case, the workman would not be entitled to any back wages.[45] Where the workman raised a dispute after 12 years, a single judge of Madras High Court held that the relief of reinstatement cannot be denied on grounds of delay, but the labour court had to exercise discretion while granting the appropriate relief.[46] The denial of back wages by the tribunal on the ground that he would have been otherwise employed is not proper, and, in view of the unexplained delay in raising the dispute, the award of back wages from the date of demand notice would meet the ends of justice.[47]Where a daily-wager, having worked for 395 days raised a dispute against his termination after 8 years, the High Court quashed the order of labour court directing reinstatement with 25 per cent back wages and held that in view of the unexplained delay of 8 years, the workman was not entitled to any relief even if there was any violation of the provisions of the ID Act on the part of the employer.[48] dismissed for misappropriation, and ordered reinstatement, the award was quashed and the punishment restored.[49] In a case, where a workman was dismissed, for remaining absent without authorisation coupled with non-reply to the charge-sheet and failure to present himself in the enquiry, the High Court taking notice of the above facts and also of the fact that there was an unexplained delay of 4 years in raising the dispute, modified the order of labour court from reinstatement with 80 per cent back wages to reinstatement without back wages.[50] In KR Singh, Ms Nishita Mhatre J of the Bombay High Court directed the labour court to condone a staggering delay of nearly 20 years on the part of workmen in filing an application under s 33C(2) of theID Act claiming over time wages.[51] In striking contrast, Kochar J of the same High Court, in an exactly identical case involving the same employer and the same issue, quashed the order of labour court granting relief under s 33C(2) on ground of delay of 15-20 years.[52] The decision of Ms Mhatre J calls for some analysis. The facts of the case unfold that the employees slept for a staggering 20 years and filed a petition thereafter claiming some money from the employer. The learned judge failed to apply her judicial mind while passing a perverse order of this kind. The law does not require the employer to maintain the records beyond a certain period, after which they can be consigned to bonfire legitimately. Can the learned judge cite an illustration to the effect that the jurisprudence of any country has degraded itself to such an abysmal level in which, where one party seeks to get a wrongful gain through the judicial process, the judge could afford the luxury of dealing with the claim in a casual and perfunctory manner and allow the mischief to pass muster? Could it be said that the decision reflects a sound judicial disposition? The labour court and Kochar J are right, and Ms Mhatre J, is absolutely wrong. But why blame the judges of High Courts, when the position with the Supreme Court is even worse, with two benches presided over by the same learned judge with identical set of facts reached opposite conclusions in two cases, as disclosed in Ajaib Singh and Nedungadi?

Where the labour court condoned a delay of more than six years in raising the dispute on the part of a conductor, who was

Notwithstanding a few cases such as IISCO,[53] which were decided rightly, the fact remains that misconceived and ultra-generous decisions, not at the cost of the court but at the cost of employers, far outnumber those decided rightly, particularly, in respect of stale claims and delayed references. It is hardly necessary to cite them all here. The fact that the courts are fastening the liability to reinstate - not only reinstate but also pay back wages - to the employers, where the employers were not even guilty of contributory negligence or responsible in any manner in the workmen raising disputes belatedly, revolts against all canons of justice and fairplay. To say the least, most of these decisions are injudicious and, still worse, outrageous! The consequences of the chaotic rulings of the Supreme Court, which are bereft any reason or logic, are far reaching for the industrial community, as can be seen from the fact that the judicial anarchy that took birth in the precincts of the Supreme Court, in respect of stale claims and delayed references, continues unabated with High Courts passing judgments condoning undue delays. For example, in TNPDC, it was held that a delay of 4 years in raising the dispute could be a factor only in deciding the quantum of back wages and not the dismissal itself.[54] Notional increments cannot be denied on the ground of delay on the part of the workman in approaching the court.[55] Yet another decision which displayed an over-generous approach is Aska Coop Society, in which the Orissa High Court travelled to the length of holding that the award of the tribunal could not be held to be invalid merely because there was delay of 15 years in raising the dispute by the workman.[56] In Kishori Lal, Sapre J of the MP High Court condoned a delay of 7 years on the part of the workman in raising the dispute, remanded the matter to the government to examine the reasons for delay before rejecting the reference.[57] In the midst of judicial chaos created by Thomas, Saghir Ahmed JJ, and other learned judges and nurtured by several High Courts, it is refreshing to come across a highly responsible and mature decision by Ms Gyan Sudha Misra J of Rajasthan High Court in Satyanarain Sharma. The facts of this case briefly were: the workman remained absent for 3 years and spent another 4 years before he sought a reference of the dispute relating to the termination of his service by Hindustan Copper Ltd. On a rejection of the reference by Central Government, the workman approached the High Court. Dismissing the petition, the learned judge observed that though the law did not prescribe any time limit for the government to exercise its power to refer the dispute, the said power could not be exercised at any point of time in order to revive stale claims. The learned judge further observed that the delay on the part of petitioner-workman showed that he was neither prompt nor diligent in pursuing his case.[58] It is submitted that the decision given by Ms Gyan Sudha Misra J is right and just, whereas all other decisions rendered, to the contrary, by the Supreme Court and different High Courts are perverse and obnoxious and are unmistakably wrong. Yet another decision, which deserves full compliments from every right-thinking citizen is that of BS Chauhan J of the same High Court in Rajendra Singh Gehlot, in which the learned judge upheld the rejection by the government to make a reference of the dispute raised after a lapse of 20 years,[59] as against the bankrupt decision given by Thomas J in Sapan Kumar Pandit. In SM Nilajkar, the facts briefly were: a number of workmen were engaged by the telecom department for digging, laying cables, erecting poles, etc, during 1985-87 and the services of these workmen were terminated in 1987 on completion of the work. The tribunal directed the telecom department to reinstate all the workmen with continuity of service and 50% back wages. A single judge of the Karnataka High Court, while holding that they were not project employees, took note of the fact that there was a delay of 7 to 9 years in raising the dispute and in view of this and other facts, modified the award to the extent of reinstatement with continuity of service and other consequential benefits, but without any back wages. The Division Bench allowed the appeal preferred by the employer and set aside the award of the tribunal and the order of judge. Quashing the order of Division Bench, Lahoti J (for self and Brijesh Kumar J) held:

> It is true, as held in M/s Shalimar Works Ltd v Their Workmen (supra),[60]that merely because the Industrial Disputes Act does not provide for a limitation for raising the dispute it does not mean that the dispute can be raised at any time and without regard to the delay and reasons therefore ... A delay of 4 years in raising the dispute after even reemployment of the most of the old workmen was held to be fatal in M/s Shalimar Works ... In Nedungadi Bank Ltd v KP Madhavankutty (supra),[61] a delay of 7 years was held to be fatal and disentitled to workmen to any relief. In Ratan Chandra Sammanta v Union of India (supra),[62] it was held that a casual labourer retrenched by the employer deprives himself of remedy available in law by delay itself, lapse of time results in losing the remedy and the right as well ... we do not think that the delay in the case at hand has been so culpable as to disentitle the appellants for any relief. ... Pursuant to the judgment in Daily Rated Casual Employees Under P and T Department v Union of India (supra),[63]the department was formulating a scheme to accommodate casual labourers and the appellants were justified in awaiting the outcome thereof. On 16-1-1990 they were refused to be accommodated in the scheme. On 28-12-1990 they initiated the proceedings under the Industrial Disputes Act followed by conciliation proceedings and then the dispute was referred to the Industrial Tribunal cum-Labour Court. We do not think that the appellants deserve to be non suited on the ground of delay. ... The fact remains that there was delay, though not a fatal one in initiating proceedings calculating the time between the date of termination and initiation of proceedings before the Industrial Tribunal-cum-Labour Court. The employee cannot be blamed for the delay. The learned single Judge has denied the relief of back wages while directing the appellants to be reinstated. That appears to be a just and reasonable order. Moreover, the judgment of the learned single Judge was not put in issue by the appellants by filing an appeal. ... For all the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the decision of the Division Bench deserves to be set aside and that of the learned Single Judge restored, except for the finding that the appellants were not project employees.[64] (Paras 17, 18 & 19).

In Turi RD, a delay of 10 years in raising a dispute by the workman whose service was terminated was condoned by a single judge of Gujarat High Court on the ground that the Limitation Act 1963 does not apply to the proceedings under the Industrial Disputes Act.[65] Where the workman filed a petition under s 10(1B)(c) [of West Bengal Amendment 1989] before a labour court, which did not have territorial jurisdiction resulting in delay and thereafter approaching the proper labour court, the Calcutta High Court held that the delay so caused was not so fatal as to non-suit the workman.[66] In the larger interests of legal certainty, this issue calls for a comprehensive approach on the part of the apex court coupled with laying down well-defined, intelligible guidelines.[67] In Asst Engineer, CAD, the facts disclosed that a quasi-permanent employee raised an industrial dispute after a lapse of 8 years after the termination of her service. The labour court ordered reinstatement together with 30% of back wages. The said award was upheld by both tiers of High Court despite plea of the appellant that the claim was a stale one apart from the fact that the irrigation department itself was closed on completion of the project. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Pasayat J (for self and Thakker J) observed that, the labour court should not have granted relief; and that the learned single judge and the Division Bench did not consider the issues in their proper perspective and arrived at abrupt conclusions without even indicating justifiable reasons.[68] Where the workman failed to file the appeal before the appellate authority notified by the employer and slept over the matter for five long years and raised an industrial dispute thereafter, the tribunal condoned the delay and adjudicated the reference in the course of which, it directed the reinstatement of the workman. Quashing the order of the tribunal, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that, the settled legal position is that delay itself deprives a person of his remedy available in law. In the absence of any fresh cause of action or any legislation, a person who has lost his remedy by lapse of time loses his right as well. The learned judge further observed that, if on account of the delay, the dispute has become stale or ceases to exist, the reference should be rejected.[69]

Delay in the Disposal of Cases and its Implications

In Mgmt of MCD, the facts disclosed a staggering delay of 33 years in disposing the case relating to the termination of service of a workman. On the question of the quantum of back wages, the Supreme Court held that the reason for not granting full back wages to the workman was, firstly, due to the fact that for no fault of the parties, the litigation took more than three decades and it would not be proper to saddle the corporation and its exchequer which was meant for public benefit with such a huge financial burden, and secondly, the workmen could not have remained totally unemployed for 33 years.[70] Where the labour court ordered reinstatement of a workman without back wages on ground of five years delay in raising the industrial dispute, a two judge Bench of Supreme Court comprising Majmudar and Sabharwal, JJ, noticed that the delay was due to the workman initially approaching the central Administrative Tribunal, for which neither he nor the employer could be said to be responsible, and held that the burden of back wages should be borne equally by both sides, and accordingly ordered payment of 50 percent of back wages from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement.[71]Now, if the workman pursued a wrong remedy resulting in delay, it is perfectly legitimate for the court to condone the delay, if covered by the period of limitation, if any, prescribed in the Act. However, if the workman has not taken proper legal advice and runs around different courts and tribunals in a chaotic manner, the employer should not be directed to pay for the delay caused in the process. This decision reminds of the observation of Lord Hewart:

It is necessary to remember that in litigation there are more parties than one, that it is wrong to gratify the plaintiff to the detriment of the defendant and that, while sympathy is a most commendable quality, it never appears in a less attractive guise than when it is practised at the expense of somebody else.[72]

A single judge of the Bombay High Court admittedly following this decision, held in Nanded CCCWRS, that the workman should not be penalised for pursuing remedy before a wrong court, and hence, no fault could be found with the decision of labour court awarding full back wages.[73] The precedent set in the process requires reversal by a larger bench so as to enable it to remain consistent with the principles of equity, fairness and justice.

Form and Contents of the Order of Reference: 'By Order in Writing'

The only requirement of s 10(1) is that the order of reference should be in writing. No form is prescribed under the rules for making such order. It is sufficient if the existence of a dispute and the fact that the dispute is referred to the tribunal are clear from the order.[74] The government is left to its own devices while passing the order. An order of reference has to be signed in accordance with the provision of Arts. 77 and 166 of the Constitution. Similarly, any corrigendum or amendment to such an order is also to be signed according to the same provision.[75] The order of reference need not necessarily be signed by a Governor of the State where the State is the appropriate government or by the President of India, where the Central Government is the appropriate government. It is sufficient that the approval of the Governor or the President for referring the dispute was obtained and the order is actually signed by the authorised officer.[76] However, orders of reference hastily drawn or drawn in a casual manner often give rise to unnecessary dispute and thereby, prolong the life of industrial litigation which must always be avoided.[77] In order to avoid such glaring mistakes in references, it is necessary that before making the reference, the Government must bestow great care so as to obviate references which are baseless and do not represent the actual dispute between the parties.[78] It should, therefore, carefully formulate the points of dispute; they should be so worded as to avoid ambiguity or prejudice or advantage to one or the other party to the dispute.[79] In Eagle Fashions, the Delhi High Court held that the terms of reference should clearly spell out the real dispute between the parties and if that were not so, the order of reference would be liable to be interfered with in exercise of writ jurisdiction. When the factum of employment and termination itself were in dispute, the terms of reference could not have been so framed as to presume the employment and its termination and confining the reference merely to adjudication of illegality or unjustness thereof. Such an order of reference drawn up without application of mind would be vitiated.[80] It would be in the interests of justice if the terms of reference are spelt out with care, exactitude and with such detail as would obviate any controversy as to the scope of the reference. It is also in the interest of justice that all the disputes raised between the parties should be referred for adjudication at one instance and not in a truncated and piecemeal manner so that there can be a composite and single adjudication of all disputes between the parties.[81]

There is no statutory requirement of the Act or the Central Rules that an order of reference under s 10 must be notified in the Official Gazette, though as a matter of practice generally, such orders are made by the government by notification in their Official Gazettes. The want of publication of an order of reference, therefore, does not make the order of reference in any way invalid.[82] The government should make reference in writing indicating the parties to the dispute and the point of controversy. The parties might be indicated individually or collectively with reasonable clearness.[83] It is not necessary to specify in the order of reference, the reliefs to be given by the tribunal in adjudicating upon the industrial dispute.[84]Nor the government need to state its reasons for making a reference to the tribunal while making a reference under s 10(1) of the Act.[85] There is nothing in the Act to indicate that the government cannot make a reference indicating that a party to the dispute is a trade union.[86]Nor is there any bar in the Act to the government referring a dispute piecemeal, having regard to the exigencies of the situation.[87] Thus, where separate but not inconsistent demands are made against the management by two groups of workmen belonging to two different unions, the government can refer each demand separately for adjudication.[88] The order of reference can ask the tribunal to adjudicate upon a particular question first and then to decide the further questions if it should find in favour of the workers on the first question.[89] Where there are specific words that a particular person shall decide the matter in dispute contained in the annexure, it is sufficient to constitute a reference.[90] But a notification appointing a certain person as a tribunal and referring to him in general terms all the industrial disputes which may arise at any time in the future would be illegal. [91]

Similarly, a general notification referring the disputes which are apprehended in a certain industry without specifying the particular firms in which such disputes are apprehended, is incompetent.[1] Likewise, if an order of reference does not specify the names of the concerned workmen or the names of the employers with whom the dispute exists, the reference will be bad for vagueness.[2] The order of reference, however, would not be rendered bad in law, if the requisite satisfaction is not recorded in the order of reference itself Even if there is some such lacuna, the order does not become invalid ab initio and the defect can be made good by filing an affidavit later on to show that the condition precedent was satisfied[3] Nor an order of reference under s 10(1)(c) is incompetent merely because it is made in general terms and the disputes are not particularised in it[4] Furthermore, mere wording of the order of reference is not decisive in the matter of tenability of a reference.[5] In Mangalam Publications, a dispute raised by an individual workman, a retired section officer in this case, claiming arrears on re-classification in terms of Bachawat award was referred for adjudication. Quashing the award, the Kerala High Court held that a claim for arrears would arise only if there was a re-classification as per the Bachawat award and whether the establishment was liable to be reclassified was not an individual grievance but a collective one; that such a dispute has to be at the instance of the union or a number of workmen to be referred for adjudication under s 10(1)(c) Act; and that no individual dispute could be raised.[6] Similarly, disputes between several establishments and their workers can be referred to an industrial tribunal by the government by a single notification.[7] Likewise, the absence of indication that the dispute was under s 2(k) or s 2A in the order of reference, will not go to show that it is not an industrial dispute within the meaning of either of the two provisions. Such absence of indication will not invalidate the order of reference since the law does not require the government to do so. If a question does arise as to whether the dispute is one as defined under s 2(k) or s 2A, it is for the adjudicating authority to ascertain the same from the material on record.[8] Whether the dispute referred to the industrial tribunal is an industrial dispute under s 2(k) or s 2A is of no consequence so far as the tribunal's power to adjudicate is concerned, and that formal defects in citation of reference will not oust the jurisdiction of the tribunal.[9]

Authorities to whom Reference can be Made

Section 10(1) vests the 'appropriate government' with discretion to choose one or the other of the authorities ie, under cl (a) a board, under cl (b) a court of inquiry, under cl (c) a labour court or under cl (d) an industrial tribunal, for the purpose of investigation and settlement of industrial disputes. The government may set up one authority or the other for the achievement of the desired ends depending upon its appraisement of the situation as it obtains in a particular industry or establishment. It is not necessary that all the steps enumerated in s 10(1) should be taken seriatim one after the other by the 'appropriate government'. Whether one or the other of the steps should be taken by the appropriate government, must depend upon the exigencies of the situation, eg, the imminence of industrial strike resulting in cessation of industrial production and breach of industrial peace endangering public tranquility and law and order. What steps would be taken by the 'appropriate government' in the matter of an industrial dispute must, therefore, be determined by the surrounding circumstances. No hard and fast rule can be laid down with respect to making reference to the one or the other of the authorities for the purpose of bringing about the desired end-the settlement of an 'industrial dispute' and promotion of industrial peace.[10]It is manifest that the powers of reference given to the 'appropriate government' under cll (a), (b), (c) and (d) of s 10(1) are in the alternative and not cumulative in character. In other words, the 'appropriate government' cannot, at one and the same time, refer an industrial dispute for adjudication to a labour court under s 10(1)(c) and refer any matter connected with it or relevant to the identical industrial dispute to a court of inquiry under s 10(1)(b) of the Act.[11] The different authorities constituted under the Act are set up with different ends in view and are invested with powers and duties necessary for the achievement of the purposes for which they are set up. The appropriate government is invested with discretion to choose one or the other of the authorities for the purpose of investigation and settlement of industrial disputes, whether the government sets up one authority or the other for the achievement of the desired ends depends on its appraisement of the situation as it obtains in a particular industry or establishment.[12]An authority mentioned in this section, can take cognizance of an industrial dispute only on a reference being made to it. There is no provision in the Act under which a party can directly refer a dispute to any such authority for investigation, settlement or adjudication. Hence, an employer or a workman cannot approach these authorities directly. Their jurisdiction can be invoked only in the manner provided under the Act.[13]

(i) Board

In terms of cl (a), the appropriate government can refer a dispute to a board for promoting a settlement thereof but it is only an industrial dispute that can be referred to a board and any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute cannot be referred to the board under this provision. In Niemla Textile (supra), it was held that a reference to the board of conciliation is but a preliminary step for the settlement of the industrial dispute and the report made by it would furnish materials to the government to make up its mind whether to refer the dispute for adjudication to an industrial tribunal.

(ii) Court of Inquiry

The government may refer any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute to a court of inquiry under cl (b) for the purpose of inquiring into such matter. From the language of this provision, it is obvious that the function of a court of inquiry is neither conciliatory nor adjudicatory, it is only investigatory. A report of the court of inquiry furnishes material to the appropriate government for finally determining whether the 'industrial dispute' should be referred by it for adjudication to an industrial tribunal.[14] It may be that a report of the court of inquiry discloses circumstances under which the 'appropriate government' considers that it is not necessary or expedient to refer the industrial dispute for adjudication to a labour court or industrial tribunal. It is open to the government to refer 'any matter connected with, or relevant to, an industrial dispute' to a court of inquiry even without referring the dispute for adjudication. A reference to a court of inquiry is not a subsidiary proceeding which is dependent upon the existence of a proceeding relating to the dispute before an industrial tribunal.[15] For making a valid reference under this clause to a court of inquiry, the following conditions have to be satisfied:

(a) the appropriate government must be of the opinion that an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended;

(b) the matter referred to must be one appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute; and

(c) the order of reference must be an order in writing.

Once these conditions are satisfied, there is no requirement of law that the government should give particulars in the notification of the industrial dispute which exists or is apprehended. Before the reference of an industrial dispute is made for adjudication to an industrial tribunal, the government may set up a court of inquiry for the purpose of inquiring into any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the dispute. The court of inquiry will inquire into those matters and submit a report of its findings to the appropriate government within six months from the commencement of the inquiry. That report will furnish materials to the appropriate government for finally determining whether the industrial dispute should be referred by it for adjudication to the tribunal. The court of inquiry may disclose the circumstances under which the appropriate government may consider that it is not necessary to refer the dispute for adjudication. In that event, the matter will end and the government may await further developments before referring the dispute for adjudication. If on the other hand, the materials embodied in the report disclose circumstances which make it necessary for the government to refer the dispute for adjudication to the tribunal, the appropriate government will refer the matter for adjudication to the industrial tribunal. But there is nothing in the language of the Act warranting that once an industrial dispute is referred to a tribunal, matters connected with the industrial disputes cannot be referred to a court of inquiry.[16] The government is not precluded from first constituting a court of inquiry and then referring to it matters connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute.

(iii) Labour Court

The government has the discretion to refer an 'industrial dispute' or any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the 'dispute' to a labour court under cl (c), if such dispute or matter relates to any matter specified in the second schedule to the Act.[17] The first proviso to s 10(1)(d) uses only the word 'affected' but s 10 (lA) and s 10(5) use the word 'interested' or 'affected'. There is a difference in the import of the words 'interested' or 'affected'. For instance, a union which sponsors the cause of an individual workman is 'interested' in the dispute, but the workmen who are the members of the union are not necessarily 'affected' by the dispute.[18] But, the expression 'likely to affect' in the first proviso to s 10 (l)(d) should be interpreted to have the same import and should be understood in the same way as the words 'workmen concerned in the dispute' in s 33 of the Act.[19] It is clear from the proviso to s 10(1)(d) that a reference to a labour court with respect to a matter which falls within the third schedule is permissible only when by the application of its mind, the appropriate government comes to the conclusion that the dispute is not likely to affect more than one hundred workmen and that it is, therefore, proper to make a reference to the labour court. The opinion so formed by the government must be displayed by the order of reference although in a proper case, the formation of that opinion could be demonstrated by independent evidence.[20] In Blue Star, the Patna High Court repelled the contention that the reference should have been made under s 10(2) and not under s 10(1)(c), and held that, though there was difference between the two provisions, once the reference was made under s 10(1)(c) or s 10(2), the procedure for adjudication would be the same; the parties would be required to put in their written statement, adduce evidence and so on, and that being the position, the distinction would be academic in nature, particularly so, where no case was made out that the parties were likely to suffer or would have suffered prejudice.[21]

(iv) Industrial Tribunal

The discretion of the appropriate government under s 10(1) is very wide to refer an industrial dispute or any matter appearing to be connected with, or relevant to, the dispute, whether it relates to any matter specified in the second schedule or the third schedule, to a tribunal for adjudication.[22] An order which refers for adjudication any matter specified in the schedule, cannot be held to be vague or uncertain on the ground that it did not specify what was considered as 'dispute' and what were constituted as 'connected matters', when the schedule indicated with sufficient clarity what those matters were.[23] In Kamani Employees' Union, the State of Maharashtra referred certain disputes for adjudication to the industrial tribunal including one relating to production bonus. Subsequently, while the adjudication of that reference was pending, the government made another reference to the same tribunal for adjudication of the question whether the existing incentive scheme of production bonus should be replaced by a new incentive scheme. This order of reference referred to the earlier order of reference, also stating that the company made a representation to the State Government that the terms of reference already made should be supplemented so as to include the above question. It was further stated that the government is of the opinion that the matter on which further reference is asked for by the employer is 'connected with or relevant to the said dispute' regarding the revision of production bonus which was already the subject-matter of the earlier reference. The Supreme Court held that the second order of reference was neither a withdrawal of the previous reference nor was it a case of supersession of that reference. On the other hand, the question regarding the nature of the modification to be effective to the production bonus scheme had to be considered by the tribunal, having due regard to the scheme as it existed as well as to the various suggestions that may be made by the parties. If the employer had relied on a newly evolved scheme, it was competent to the tribunal to consider how far that scheme could be adopted in this particular case and this aspect of the matter could have been considered by the tribunal, because it was 'connected with or relevant to the dispute' relating to production bonus. Hence, there was no interference in any manner with the power of the tribunal in adjudicating upon the demands relating to production bonus as the question referred for adjudication in the subsequent reference was really a matter 'connected with or relevant to the dispute' already pending adjudication.[24] Where the reference of an industrial dispute raised by workmen claiming upwards revision of wage-scales or dearness allowance is made for adjudication, a dispute arising out of the counter-claim made by the employer asking for downwards revision should also be referred as it would be 'connected with and relevant' to the dispute of the workmen for the purpose of proper adjudication.[25]

First Proviso

Normally, the matters specified in third schedule to the Act are referable to an industrial tribunal under s 10(1)(d) but the first proviso to sub-s (1) carves out an exception in cases where the disputes relate to any matter in the third schedule and are not likely to affect more than 100 workmen.[26] In such cases, the 'appropriate government' has been given the discretion to make a reference to a labour court under cl (c) of s 10(1). The requirements of this proviso are two, namely:

(i) that the dispute is not likely to affect more than 100 workmen; and

(ii) the 'appropriate government' thinks it fit to make the reference to a labour court.

The word 'affected' cannot be equated with the word 'interested.' For instance, 'the union which sponsors the cause of an individual workman is 'interested' in the dispute but the workmen who are members of the union are not necessarily 'affected' by the dispute'.[27] Therefore, it is not sufficient that more than 100 workmen are interested in the dispute but the dispute, in fact, should be likely to 'affect' more than 100 workmen. The question, whether the dispute is likely to affect more than 100 workmen or not is a question of fact. In Rangavilas Motors, the question raised was about the implication of the words 'if it so thinks fit'. The Supreme Court observed:

> It is not necessary that the order of reference should expressly state that it is because of the proviso that a reference is being made to the labour court and if the reference can be justified on the facts, there is nothing in the Act, which makes such a reference invalid.[28]

The purport of this view is that, in case the facts justify that the dispute is not likely to affect more than 100 persons, it implies that the government thought it fit to refer the matter to a labour court, even though there is no material on record to indicate that the Government had applied its mind to the applicability of the proviso. In other words, the requirement of 'thinking fit is implicit in the fact of making the reference'. This view is not sound, because it completely ignores the second requirement of thinking the dispute to be fit for reference to the labour court. Thus, even an erroneous reference to a labour court merely because more than 100 persons are likely to be affected would be a valid reference. Thus, the words 'if it so thinks fit' would be rendered redundant.

Second Proviso

This proviso vests the government with an overriding power of making a reference in case the dispute relates to a public utility service and a notice of strike or lock-out under s 22 has been given.[29] In such a case, making of reference is imperative. Further, the appropriate government can make reference even if the conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer or any proceedings under s 33A or 33 C are pending in connection with such a dispute. However, this proviso contains two exceptions. The appropriate government may refuse to make the reference if it considers:

(i) that the notice of strike or lock-out, as the case may be, under section 22 is of frivolous or vexatious nature; or

(ii) that it would be inexpedient to make the reference.[30]

But in case, the government refuses to make the reference in view of these two reasons, it shall have to comply with the requirements of s 12(5) viz, to record its reasons for refusing to make the reference and communicate those reasons to the concerned parties. The reasons of the Government in coming to the conclusion that the notice is of frivolous or of vexatious nature or it is inexpedient to make the reference before refusing to make the reference are amenable to judicial review,[31] but the appropriate government is the sole arbiter of the question whether the notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is frivolous or vexatious, or whether it is inexpedient to make a reference. These are not objective facts which can be determined by a court of law. If, therefore, the government comes to a conclusion and forms an opinion which is not vitiated by mala fide or based on irrelevant or extraneous considerations, then the decision of the government would not be amenable to judicial review.[32] This proviso, however, will not apply if the notice as required by s 22 has not been given or is illegal or does not comply with the requirements of sub-s (4) of s 22 of the Act. Even where the notice under s 22 is given, which comprises of many demands and each one of which constitutes a separate dispute, the government is not bound to make a reference of all the disputes and demands.[33]

Third Proviso

This proviso has been inserted by the amending Act 46 of 1982.[34] It empowers the Central Government to refer the industrial disputes, in relation to which it is the appropriate government, to a labour court or an industrial tribunal, as the case may be, constituted by the State Government. Now; it is not necessary that the Central Government, where it is the appropriate government, must refer the disputes only to the labour courts or industrial tribunals constituted by the Central Government.

Subject Matter of Dispute

Before a dispute can be referred under s 10(1), the first and the foremost requisite is that it should be an 'industrial dispute' as defined in s 2(k). Then, s 10 requires that the 'appropriate government' must form its opinion on the material before it that the 'industrial dispute' is 'existing' or is 'apprehended'. After forming the opinion, the government under s 12(5) has to be satisfied with respect to the expediency of making the reference. Then, only the government will make or refuse to make the reference. Some illustrative cases dealing with matters which are fit and which are not fit for reference are set out below.

(i) Matters Fit for Reference

A dispute regarding modification of the Standing Orders under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, would be an 'industrial dispute', as certified Standing Orders like all other Standing Orders define conditions of service and, therefore, any dispute concerning the propriety, fairness or reasonableness of the Standing Orders could be validly referred for adjudication.[35] Any action taken by an employer under the Standing Order giving rise to a dispute between the employer and the workmen on a matter concerning the 'employment' or 'non-employment' can be referred by the government.[36] Likewise, a dispute relating to an item covered by the certified Standing Orders of an establishment can be validly referred.[37]A dispute between the management and workmen regarding inclusion of the emoluments earned by workmen for festival holidays for the purposes of computing bonus under para 7(2) of the scheme under the Coal Mines Provident Fund and Bonus Scheme Act, would be an 'industrial dispute' which can be referred for adjudication under s 10 of the Act.[38]An industrial dispute between a cooperative society and its workmen can be validly referred for adjudication, notwithstanding the fact that there are provisions in the Cooperative Societies Act itself for settlement of disputes because the Industrial Disputes Act, being a special Act dealing with settlement of industrial disputes, general powers under the Cooperative Societies Act cannot govern them.[39] A dispute relating to the production bonus scheme which is in substance an incentive wage plan, is an industrial dispute and can be referred for adjudication.[40] A difference between management and certain workmen as to whether the latter are bound by a settlement arrived at a conciliation proceeding, is an industrial dispute which can be referred.[41] Similarly, an agreement between a person representing a minority of workers and management cannot put an end to a dispute, and such a dispute, therefore, can be referred for adjudication.[42] The government can refer for adjudication even a dispute as to whether the closure of particular establishment was real or a pretence of closure.[43] A question relating to permission under s 33, to dismiss a workman is different from the question whether the dismissal of that workman is justified or not. Therefore, even during the pendency of an appeal in the Supreme Court against an order under s 33, a dispute relating to the dismissal of a workman can be validly referred.[44] When the subject-matter of reference made to the labour court relates to a term of employment or to the conditions of employment of a person, the labour court has jurisdiction to examine whether the dispute arose out of any unfair labour practice by the employer, giving cause for the dispute.[45]

(ii) Matters not Fit for Reference

There are certain matters which cannot be referred for adjudication on account of certain statutory provisions, even if those matters are 'existing' or 'apprehended' industrial disputes. Disputes regarding matters covered by a settlement arrived at under s 12(3) cannot be referred to adjudication during the continuance of such settlement.[46] Matters covered by previous awards cannot be referred during the currency of such awards.[47] However, matters which are expressly stated to have been not settled by a settlement arrived at between the parties can be referred to the tribunal for adjudication.[48] Non-implementation of an award does not, however, fall within the definition of an industrial dispute; therefore, it cannot be referred for adjudication.[49] A proceeding pending under s 36A is not a proceeding in respect of an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 33(1) or s 33(3). Therefore, a reference made by the appropriate government under s 36A is not a reference in respect of an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 10(1).[50]It is only a reference in regard to the interpretation of an award. Section 10 would not apply to a reference under s 36A. Any dispute relating to a closure which is admitted or found to be real will fall outside the purview of this Act and, therefore, cannot be validly referred by the government, hence disputes relating to a closed industry and those relating to post closure period cannot be referred, but disputes relating to pre-closure period,[51]or arising simultaneously with the closure can be referred.[52] Even the question whether closure was justified or not, cannot constitute reference of an industrial dispute.[53] There can be no valid reference with respect to the reinstatement of a workman who is not alive on the date of reference, as his claim for reinstatements must be deemed to have died with him.[54]

In Indian Oil Corporation, Biswas J of Gauhati High Court held that the reference of a dispute for regularisation of contract workers in the services of the principal employer would only frustrate the object of ameliorating the plight of the workmen. The only course for immediate relief was to issue notification under s 10 of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970.[55] In striking contrast, in a case involving the same employer, ie, Indian Oil Corporation, and the same issue, ie, regularisation of contract labour, the learned single judge, Mukul Mudgal J of Delhi High Court held that a dispute could be raised under s 10(1) of the ID Act, even in the absence of a notification issued under s 10 of the Contract Labour Act. On this view of the matter, the learned judge directed the Central Government to make a reference of the dispute.[56]What do these two diametrically opposite decisions of two High Courts involving the same issue and, still worse, the same employer convey to the general public and industrial community, except callousness, indifference and judicial anarchy? Between the two, the decision given by Biswas J (for Division Bench) is right and that of Mukul Mudgal J is wholly misconceived and wrong. In Electronics Corporation, the facts were: the industrial tribunal, Maharashtra, passed an award rejecting the reference made to it on the ground that the respondent-union failed to establish the existence of employer-employee relationship between the company and some 30 of its members whose services were terminated. The tribunal accepted the contentions of the company to the effect: (i) that there was no contract of employment between the company and the 'retainers' claiming to be employees since they were independent persons with whom the company had entered into a contract for servicing of television sets sold by them to the customers; and (ii) that the industrial dispute referred was not maintainable as there could be no dispute between the company and the 'retainers'. On a consideration of the documents as well as oral evidence, the tribunal came to the conclusion that the 'Retainer's had individually entered into contracts with the company for service of repairing the Television sets sold by the company and that there was no master and servant relationship between the company and the 30 persons who claimed to be employees. The said award of tribunal was quashed by the High Court. Setting aside the order of the High Court and restoring the award of the tribunal, Pasayat J (for self and Panta J), observed:

> "It was fairly accepted and admitted that taking into consideration that retainership was more beneficial than the regular service employees, all the seven employees left the service of the company and accepted the retainership. It was also accepted that there were several retainers who were working in several places like Delhi, Calcutta, Lucknow. ... The retainers used to visit the company for collecting complaints, collecting components, for receiving payments and for repairing the called-back sets. Except for these reasons, they were not required to go to the company. ... The Tribunal also noted that the witness has admitted that the scheme was for retainership and there was no question of his asking for absorption as regular employees. Till 1989-90 they were getting more income than the regular employees and, therefore, had not sought for regularization. But since 1989-90 they found the regular employees were getting more salary than their income, and, therefore, they claimed regularization. ... the Tribunal was right in its view that no employer-employee relationship existed. Observations of the High Court to the contrary are clearly untenable because the findings and the reasons given by the Tribunal have not been discussed ..."[57]

In Bongaigaon Refinery, the Supreme Court held that the reference of the dispute raised by a person, whose joining report was refused by the company on being found that he secured employment by concealing certain material facts, stood vitiated in so far as he had not entered the employment of company. The Division Bench of High Court was not right in directing the government to make a reference, and the reference under s 10 was wholly unwarranted and uncalled for.[58] In Sanat Kumar Dwivedi, the Supreme Court held that where the workman accepted the order of reinstatement without back wages, a subsequent dispute raised by him for back wages is clearly not maintainable.[59] Where reference of a dispute relating to retrenchment was made, the labour court was bound to adjudicate the said dispute. It has no jurisdiction to dismiss the dispute on the ground that the appointment of the workman was not legal.[60] In Oriental Fire, a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court held that the dispute as to the categorisation of workmen in different categories under a scheme framed by the management for rationalising and revising the pay-scales and other terms and conditions of services of its employees, is well within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to resolve the problem and that if a reference of the dispute was made under s 10, the tribunal cannot decline to adjudicate it on the ground that it had no jurisdiction to go into the merits of the case.[61]The employees working in the statutory canteens run departmentally in Central Government offices hold civil posts and hence, the industrial tribunal has no jurisdiction to adjudicate the reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act.[62] Where the management suspended operations on two occasions and issued notice that the employees would not be entitled to wages for the period on the principle of 'no work, no pay' and the government referred the resultant dispute for adjudication, the High Court held that there was an industrial dispute and the government was justified in making the reference.[63]

In International Airports Authority, Raveendran J (for self and Panta J) held that where there is no abolition of contract labour under s 10 of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970 (CLRA Act), but the contract labour contend that the contract between principal employer and contractor is sham and nominal, the remedy is purely under the ID Act. The industrial adjudicator can grant the relief sought if it finds that contract between principal employer and the contractor is sham, nominal and merely a camouflage to deny employment benefits to the employees and that there is in fact a direct employment, by applying tests like: who pays the salary; who has the power to remove/dismiss from service or initiate disciplinary action; who can tell the employees the way in which the work should be done, in short who has direction and control over the employees.[64] A dispute relating to the removal of a 'badli' worker on account of unauthorized absence cannot be the subject-matter of an industrial dispute, and such a dispute cannot be referred for adjudication. Being a 'badli' workman, he is not entitled to any protection under the Act and reference made to the labour court would be incompetent.[65] In GM, ONGC, briefly state, the facts were: The demand raised by the contractual workers union for regularization in the services of ONGC was resisted by ONGC both in conciliation and before the tribunal on the ground that there was no employer-employee relationship between the workers and the Corporation. The award passed by the tribunal directing regularization was challenged in a writ petition before a single judge, who quashed the award passed by the tribunal. The Division Bench reversed the findings of the single judge and restored the award passed by the tribunal, with the result the Corporation moved the Supreme Court. Justice HS Bedi (for self and Tarun Chatterjee J) took note inter alia of the following finding of facts recorded by the tribunal:

(1) That there existed a relationship of master and servant.

(2) That there was no contractor appointed by ONGC.

(3) That the ONGC used to supervise and allot works to individual workers.

(4) That the ONGC took disciplinary action and called for explanations from the workers.

(5) The workers were paid wages though they did not attend their duties due to Cachar Bandh and due to flood.

(6) The wages were paid direct to the workers by the ONGC and the acquaintance roll was prepared by the Management to make payment to the workmen.

While dismissing the appeal, the learned judge held:

> The pleadings in the present matter would show that the core issue before the Tribunal was with regard to the status of the employees as employees of the ONGC or of the contractor and that it was this issue simpliciter on which the parties went to trial. Mr Dave's argument with regard to the decision of the Tribunal being beyond the reference, is to our mind, and in the circumstances, hyper technical. In this background, we feel that the judgments cited by Mr Dave pertaining to regularization of contract labour are not applicable to the facts of the case.[66] ()

Judicial Review of the Order of Reference

Making of an order of reference under s 10(1) is undoubtedly an administrative function of the 'appropriate government' based upon its own opinion with respect to the existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute and its subjective satisfaction as to whether it would be expedient to make a reference or not. Though the earlier thinking was that such an order cannot be interfered with at all by the courts,[67] the recent trend of judicial thinking is that though in a very limited field, the order of reference is amenable to judicial review under certain circumstance[68] but the reference of an industrial dispute is not barred by the existence or availability ofanother remedy because raising an industrial dispute is a well recognised and legitimate mode of redress available to a workman which has achieved statutory recognition under the Industrial Disputes Act and this statute-recognised mode of redress cannot be denied to a workman, the reference cannot be amenable to judicial review on the ground of existence or availability of alternative remedy.[69] From the decided cases, no exhaustive or final criteria emerges as to on what grounds an administrative order is amenable to judicial review. Nor any such exhaustive or final criteria is possible in a growing branch of law like the administrative law. However, some broad heads under which an order of reference may be reviewable are discussed below.

(i) The Referring Government not the 'Appropriate Government'

Section 10(1) opens with the words 'where the appropriate government is of opinion'. Hence, if the government making the reference is not the appropriate government within the meaning of s 2(a) of the Act, the reference will not be a valid reference. But in cases where certain disputed questions of fact are involved, the proper course would be to raise a preliminary objection before the tribunal. The correctness of the order of the tribunal on the preliminary question can then be challenged before the writ court.

(ii) Improper Opinion, no opinion and non-application of mind

The appropriate government has to form an opinion with respect to the 'existence' or 'apprehension' of an industrial dispute. Thus, the power to make an order of reference arises only when necessary opinion is formed by the appropriate government with respect to existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute.[70] With respect to the existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute, the government is the sole arbiter and its opinion is final. Likewise, the determination of the question whether it is expedient to make a reference or not, depends upon the discretion of the appropriate government. But in forming its opinion or in exercising its discretion as to whether a reference should be made or not if the government had no material before it or even if it had the material before it, it had not applied its mind to such material, or had based its opinion on certain irrelevant and extraneous considerations or left out of consideration, certain vital matters which it ought to have taken into consideration, the order of reference would be invalid and would be liable to be quashed. When the validity of order of reference is challenged, a reviewing court can make inquiry as to whether the point in dispute was taken into account or not, to quash the order on certiorari and to direct the government to re-consider the reference. In such a case, the opinion of the government would be based on non-consideration of relevant material and the point for adjudication that has been referred is not the point in dispute between the parties. If the dispute referred by the 'government is altogether different from the dispute between the parties, the reference will be reviewable.[71] However, a tribunal which is the creature of the statute has to take the reference as it is made to it and it cannot question the power or authority of the appropriate government in making the reference. Nor can it enter upon the consideration as to whether the pre-conditions empowering the State Government to make the reference existed or not, when the State Government is not a party to the proceedings before it.[72] The reference, is reviewable only by a High Court in its writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution. The opinion of the government may be assailable for the following reasons:

> In forming the 'opinion' that an industrial dispute existed or was apprehended, if the government had no material before it, the order of reference will be liable to be quashed[73] The formation of opinion cannot import an arbitrary or irrational state of affairs. In other words, the opinion must be grounded on 'materials which are of rational and probative value'.[74] An order of reference under section 10, though justiciable, cannot be held to be bad merely because there was no material before the government on which it could come to an affirmative conclusion.[75] If in making the order of reference, the government did not take into account some vital material which it ought to have considered, and upon taking it into consideration, the government could not have made the reference, the reference will be liable to be quashed.[76] If in forming the opinion, that the reference should be made, the 'appropriate government' took into account any extraneous or irrelevant consideration which had no rational connection with the question of making the reference, in the ultimate analysis, the case would be one of 'no opinion' at all and the order of reference would be beyond the scope of the power of the government under section 10(1) of the Act.[77] In such a case the order of reference will be bad even if the authority has acted bona fide and with the best of intention.[78]

Before forming the opinion, the appropriate government must have applied its mind to the questions whether there is an industrial dispute existing or apprehended and whether it will be expedient to refer the dispute on the basis of material before it. If the government has not at all applied its mind, it cannot be said to have formed its opinion on these questions.[79] If the order of reference is challenged on the ground that the government has not applied its mind to the material before it, the government will have to satisfy the writ court by filling an affidavit to show that it had material before it and that the reference was made after taking into consideration the material regarding the existence or apprehension of the dispute. The absence of such evidence may make the reference vulnerable on the ground of lack of material or non-application of mind, but the opinion must be of the authority itself. In other words, if the authority in forming the opinion has acted under the dictates of another body, the exercise of power to make the order of reference would be bad.[80] In SAIL, explaining the nature and scope of jurisdiction under s 10 of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970 (CLRA Act 1970) and under s 10 of ID Act 1947, Sinha J (for self and Dalveer Singh J) held that for the purpose of exercising jurisdiction under s 10 of the CLRA Act, 1970 the appropriate government is required to apply its mind. Its order may be an administrative one but the same would not be beyond the pale of judicial review. It must, therefore, apply its mind before making a reference on the basis of the materials placed before it by the workmen and/or management, as the case may be while doing so, it may be inappropriate for the same authority on the basis of the materials that a notification under s

10(1)(d) of ID Act of 1947 be issued, although it stands judicially determined that the workmen were employed by the contractor. The State exercises administrative power both in relation to abolition of contract labour in terms of s 10 of the CLRA Act of 1970 as also in relation to making a reference for industrial adjudication to a labour court or a tribunal under s 10(1)(d) of ID Act of 1947. While issuing a notification under the CLRA Act of 1970 the state would have to proceed on the basis that the principal employer had appointed contractors and such appointments are valid in law, but while referring a dispute for industrial adjudication, validity of appointment of the contractor would itself be an issue as the state must prima facie satisfy itself that there exists a dispute as to whether the workmen are in fact not employed by the contractor but by the management.[81]

In another case involving SAIL, the facts were: the union made a representation to Labour Commissioner in 1987 with a request to admit in conciliation the dispute about the regularization of services of its members who were working as contract labours with M/s Bardhan and Co under principal employers ie, the present appellants. The state of West Bengal issued notification on 15 July 1989 prohibiting employment of contract labours in the 4 stockyards. The aforesaid notification was kept in abeyance from time to time and ultimately was extended till March 1994. Some workers belonging to the Union filed a writ petition in the Calcutta High Court seeking absorption in view of the said notification. It was inter alia stated that they were working as contract labours. A single judge ordered that the writ petitioners were entitled to absorption and regularisation in SAIL from 15 July 1989, which was upheld by the Division Bench. Following the Constitution Bench decision in SAIL, the Supreme Court quashed the order of the Division Bench as well as the proceedings initiated on the reference made by the State Government, and further observed that the union was all along focusing on several aspects but never claimed that the contract was sham or bogus and that there could be no automatic absorption on the abolition of contract labour system.[82] In Brijbhushan Yadav, facts were: a few workmen engaged as security guards through contractor to work in BSNL, Ministry of Telecommunications, secured an award through the industrial tribunal, and lost before the High Court approached the Supreme Court. Setting aside the order of High Court and remitting the matter back to it, Sathasivam J (for self and Chatterjee J) observed:

> ... If it is established that after 30.10.1997, there was no valid contract between the security agency and the Department, the stand of the workmen that they were continued as security guards by the Telecom Department is to be accepted. As observed earlier, perusal of the order of the High Court does not show that any specific reference and discussion was made to the order/orders extending their contract with security agency up to 31.05.1999. (para 12) ... before this Court, respondents-Department have filed an application for permission to file additional documents as Annexures R-3 to R-8 in support of their stand that all the workmen were employed by the security agency and not by the Department. (para 13) ... we set aside the impugned order passed by the High Court in all these matters and remit the same to the High Court for fresh disposal after rendering a specific finding as to the subsistence/existence of agreement or contract with the security agency up to 31.05.1999 and pass appropriate orders. Both the Department as well as the workmen are permitted to place all the relevant material before the High Court in support of their respective claim and it is for the High Court to decide the issue on merits ...[83] (para 14).

In Bharat Coking Coal, the facts in brief were: a contractor was engaged in 1977 to construct a coal washery on a turnkey basis. After the completion of the project in 1979, the contractor terminated the service of all, but 39 skilled workers, after paying retrenchment compensation etc. The said 39 workers were retained to look after the maintenance work of washery after it was operationalized, and their services too were terminated after one year in January, 1981, resulting in a dispute raised by them demanding absorption in BCCL. The dispute was referred under s 10 for adjudication to an industrial tribunal, which directed absorption of the workmen in BCCL with continuity of service and consequential benefits. The BCCL did not challenge the award and implemented the terms. Thereafter, some five workers including the appellants in the present case filed a civil suit for declaration which was decreed by the civil court in their favour and upheld by the first and second appellate courts. Quashing the orders of the courts below directing reinstatement of the said workers, the Supreme Court held:

> ... the appropriate Government is empowered to make a reference under Section 10 of the Act only when “Industrial dispute exists” or “is apprehended between the parties”. (para 25). .. the services of the appellants and those at whose instance the reference was made were terminated long back prior to making of the reference. These workers were, therefore, not in the services of either Contractor or/and BCCL on the date of making the reference in question. Therefore, there was no industrial dispute that “existed” or “apprehended” in relation to appellants’ absorption in the services of the BCCL on the date of making the reference. (para 26) ... since the appellants’ services were discontinued or/and retrenched (whether rightly or wrongly) long back, the question of their absorption or regularization in the services of BCCL, as claimed by them, did not arise and nor this issue could have been gone into on its merits for the reason that it was not legally possible to give any direction to absorb/regularize the appellants so long as they were not in the employment. (para 27) ... absorption and regularization in the service can be claimed or/and granted only when the contract of employment subsists and is in force inter se employee and employer. (para 28). .. the only industrial dispute, which existed for being referred to the Industrial Tribunal for adjudication was in relation to termination of appellants’ employment and - > whether it was legal or not? It is an admitted fact that it was not referred to the Tribunal and, therefore, it attained finality against the appellants. (para 29) ... the reference, even if made to examine the issue of absorption of the appellants in the services of BCCL, the same was misconceived. (para 30) ... the reference made to examine the issue of appellants' absorption qua the BCCL was incapable of being referred to on the said question and in any event, it was incapable of being answered in favour of the appellants. (para 33) ... having regard to the peculiar facts of this case and the reasons, which we have set out herein below, we are inclined to hold that the appellants are entitled to claim the retrenchment compensation from the Contractor/BCCL.[84] (para 36)

(iii) Mala fides

In any enactment which creates powers, there is a condition implied that the powers shall be used bona fide for the purpose for which they are conferred.[85] A priori, a reference made to any of the authorities under this section will be mala fide and colourable exercise of power if it is made for achieving an alien purpose, viz, a purpose not mentioned in the statute. Though mala fides of personal ill-will is not to be held established except on clear proof, it is not necessary that it should be established only by direct evidence or that it must be discernible from the impugned order. Bad faith can be deduced as a reasonable and inescapable inference from the proved facts.[86] In the classic words of Warrington LJ:

> No public body can be regarded as having statutory authority to act in bad faith or from corrupt motives, and any action purporting to be that of the body, but proved to be committed in bad faith or from corrupt motives, would certainly be held inoperative.[87]

An action suffers from legal mala fide when its ostensible purpose is different from the real one.[88] However, such bad faith will be a matter to be established by a party propounding bad faith or mala fide. He should affirm the set of acts and it would not be sufficient merely to allege the facts but they will have to be proved.[89] Inference of mala fide cannot be drawn from the mere fact that the government was acting with promptitude and without any delay.[90] In British India Corpn, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the Punjab High Court as inspite of an allegation of mala fides on the part of the government, it had dismissed the petition in limine basing its decision on a mere comparison of the relevant items in the previous order of reference with the impugned order of reference. Bhagwati J observed that when there was an allegation of mala fides on the part of the government, the High Court should have issued notice to the respondent and after according a hearing to the parties, it should have recorded its decision on consideration of all the circumstances of the case which would have been brought to its notice. The learned judge emphasised that the High Court was not justified in dismissing the petition in limine as it was tantamount to preventing the parties from presenting their respective cases.[91] In DN Ganguli, while dealing with a case of cancellation of a notification of reference, the Supreme Court reiterated the same view and held that if validity of cancellation of notification making an order of reference was challenged on the ground of mala fides, it might be relevant and material to inquire into the motive of the government. Thus, if the court finds that the government was actuated by mala fide motives in making an order of reference, the reference would be invalid.[92]

(iv) No Industrial Dispute

The dispute with respect to the existence or apprehension of which the appropriate government is to form its opinion must be an industrial dispute as defined in s 2(k). If it could be shown that what was referred was not an industrial dispute at all, the jurisdiction of the authority to deal with the dispute can be questioned even though the factual existence of the dispute may not be the subject of a party's challenge.[93] However, the determination of the question whether a particular dispute is an industrial dispute or not may depend upon the determination of various facts. Hence, a preliminary objection has to be taken before the authority to whom the reference is made that what is referred is not an industrial dispute at all. The correctness of the decision of the authority on this question will be amenable to judicial review[94] but if what was referred to adjudication was prima facie not an 'industrial dispute' at all, satisfying the fundamental requirements of s 2(k), the order of reference will be invalid and incompetent ab initio.[95] In National Engineering Industries, the Supreme Court held that if there is no industrial dispute in existence or apprehended, the appropriate government lacks power to make any reference.[96] Where the government made a reference of a dispute relating to the termination of a workman on receipt of the failure report of the conciliation officer under s 12(4), it could not be said that the reference made was incompetent on the ground that there was no dispute in existence or apprehended as on the date of reference.[97]

(v) Improper Subject Matter of Dispute

A reference to a board can only be made of a matter of any dispute for promoting a settlement, and reference to a court of inquiry can be made of any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the dispute. But the reference to the adjudicatory authorities, viz, the labour courts and industrial tribunals has to be made for the matters specified in the second or the third schedule or any matters appearing to be connected therewith or relevant thereto. If a reference of a matter covered by the third schedule is made to a labour court, unless it falls within the purview of the first proviso, such reference would be invalid. If the matter that is referred is not connected with or relevant to an 'industrial dispute', the reference of such matter would again be invalid. Where the government made a reference in terms: 'whether the workmen... are entitled to wages for the lockout period from...', and the management in a writ petition contended that the reference was bad in law, as there was no lockout at all, the Supreme Court upheld the order of High Court quashing the reference on the ground that it did not reflect the real dispute between the parties. The Supreme Court held that it is open to the High Court to examine whether the government had taken note of the relevant considerations while making a reference of a dispute, and the finding of the High Court in this regard cannot be disputed. The proper course is to direct the government to take steps to make the reference to the concerned authority after taking all the relevant material on record.[1] Where the management declared a lockout as a consequence of go-slow tactics resorted to by workers, and the government made a reference in terms 'whether the workmen shown in annexure A are entitled to wages with effect from 1 December 2000 onwards...', a single judge of Delhi High Court quashed the reference, and held that the reference should be made of the entire dispute, as the entitlement of workmen to wages was directly dependent on whether lockout was legal or justified.[2] In India Cements, the Madras High Court held that, whereas the dispute related to 'non-absorption', the reference made by the government in terms of 'termination of service', was a mistake not of substance but of form, and hence it would not affect the validity of notification referring the industrial dispute for adjudication.[3]

(vi) The Activity not 'Industry'

The adjective 'industrial' in the definition of 'industrial dispute' relates to the dispute in an industry as defined in s 2(j) of the Act.[4] In other words, besides the requirement of s 2(k), unless the dispute is related to an 'industry' as defined in s 2(j), it will not be an 'industrial dispute'. Therefore, if the reference is made of a dispute which relates to any activity which is not 'industry', it will not be a valid reference.[5] The reference of an industrial dispute which arises after the establishment becomes dead on account of closure, shall therefore, be invalid as the provisions of the Act will apply only to an existing or live industry.[6] A reference is not necessarily bad because at the time when it was made, the industry no longer existed. The power of the state to make a reference is to be determined with reference not to the date on which it is made but with reference to the date on which the right, which is the subject matter of the dispute, arises, and the machinery provided under the Act would be available for working out the right which accrued prior to the dissolution of the business. The dispute should be in a live industry and not in a dead or closed industry as the definition of industrial dispute presupposes continued existence of 'industry, and a closed or dead establishment would not fall within the definition of 'industry'. The provisions of this Act, therefore, will not apply to such an industry, because the entire scheme of the Act assumes that there is in existence an 'industry'. In other words, where, the business has been closed and it is either admitted or found that the closure is real and genuine, any dispute arising with reference thereto would fall outside the purview of the Act and that will be, a priori so, if a dispute arises—if one such could be convinced—after the closure of the business between the quondam employer and employees.[7]

There is thus a clear distinction between the two classes of cases, namely, (i) those in which the cause of action arose at the time when the business had been closed; and (ii) those in which the cause of action arose at the time when the business was being still carried on. There can be no 'industrial dispute' in respect of the first category of cases, because the real subject-matter of the dispute had ceased to exist when the dispute arose. But in regard to the second category, where the dispute actually arises before the closure of the business, it does not cease to be an 'industrial dispute' merely because subsequently the industry is closed. There is no provision of law according to which the closure of industry extinguishes the industrial dispute which had arisen before such closure.[8] In UP Electric Supply, the Supreme Court discountenanced the proposition that, as soon as a particular industry ceases to function, any adjudication in respect of a dispute which had occurred prior thereto becomes abortive and observed that 'if the dispute is one which relates to the past working of the industry and in particular where the claim of the workmen is for benefits which according to their view had accrued to them in the past, it can hardly be said that the adjudication is without any purpose'. If the workmen ask for better service conditions like the revision of wage scales, dearness allowance, medical and other facilities, gratuity etc, it would be useless for the tribunal to complete the adjudication and award how the service conditions etc ought to be bettered or revised, where the industry is non est. Where however the dispute, is over a claim to benefits by way of bonus for work done in the past, it would be the duty of the tribunal to complete the adjudication and make its award. If the tribunal finds that because of the services rendered by the workers in the past, an industry reaped profits a portion whereof should go to the workmen, it should not lie in the mouth of the employers to say that inasmuch as they have ceased to carry on the business their obligation to pay for the service rendered in the past should be wiped out.[9]

(vii) Reference Contrary to Law

The order of reference should be made to the authorities in accordance with the provisions of s 10(1). If the order is contrary to these provisions in the matter of selecting the appropriate authority, the order shall be invalid.[10] Likewise, where an order of reference covering some items of industrial disputes is pending adjudication a further order of reference covering the same subject-matter would be invalid.[11] Besides, where the reference is inconsistent with statutory provisions, it would be invalid.[12] For instance, in Indian Rubber, the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act were suspended in respect of the relief undertaking by a notification under the West Bengal Relief Undertakings (Special Provisions) Act 1972. A reference of an industrial dispute between the undertaking and its workmen to an industrial tribunal by the State of West Bengal was held to be without jurisdiction being contrary to law.[13] In Corpn of the City of Mangalore, the Karnataka High Court held that in a reference under s 10A, the age of superannuation fixed by the rules under the Madras District Municipalities Act cannot be modified by an adjudicator or arbitrator because such a reference would not be valid in law.[14] Likewise, reference of a dispute the subject matter of which is covered by the provisions of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970 will not be valid and proper. Though the recent judicial trend is to permit all industrial disputes to be referred to adjudication, the reviewing court cannot be blind to the real issues involved in the case.[15] Similarly, a dispute with respect to payment of gratuity which is covered by the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972 being a self-contained Code, cannot be validly referred or be adjudicated upon by the adjudicatory authorities under the Act.[16] A reference which is violative of the Constitutional provisions such as Art. 14 will be invalid in law. But the situation will be different where an order of reference is quashed by the High Court as invalid. A second reference of the same dispute after curing the defect will not be barred, as at the time of such reference there was no existing dispute pending before the tribunal in the eye of law.[17] In Tarang Theatre, a reference made under the provisions of the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947 by the State Government, was rejected by the labour court on the ground that the unionwhich had taken up the matter of the workmen, could not espouse the cause of the workman, without going into the merits of the case. Subsequently, the State Government made a reference of the dispute under s 10 of the Central Industrial Disputes Act. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that the subsequent reference was not contrary to law as it was not repugnant to s 12 of the UP Act. The maintainability and validity of the reference have to be viewed with reference to the circumstances existing at the time when the reference was made.[18] A single judge of the Madras High Court held that if the government refers a dispute relating to one establishment and its workmen, whereas it had already rejected precisely the same dispute between another establishment and its workmen, will not be discriminatory.[19] This view is not the correct view of the law. The reference in such a situation will not only be discriminatory but may also be mala fide. If on the date of making the reference there was no jurisdictional defect or any other bar operating to prevent reference being regarded as valid reference, the validity of the reference will not be open to challenge.[20] The order of reference will not be invalid merely because of some inadvertent statement in it. For instance, where the order of reference mentioned that the dispute related to the dismissal of four workmen while only three were dismissed, the entire dispute was not vitiated. The validity of the reference relating to the dismissal of three workmen was upheld.[21]

(viii) Disputes Covered by a Settlement or a Previous Award

Reference of an industrial dispute, the subject-matter of which is covered by a settlement as defined in s 2(p) of the Act, would be invalid during the period of operation of such a settlement.[22] The reason is simple. The jurisdiction to conciliate, arbitrate or adjudicate is there only when there is an industrial dispute. Adjudication under s 10, arbitration under s 10A and conciliation under s 12 are the remedies available under the Act for resolving an industrial dispute. When once a dispute is resolved by a settlement in the course of conciliation or otherwise, no dispute remains to be resolved by arbitration or adjudication.[23]The law is well settled that if there is a binding settlement which has not been terminated in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Act, no industrial dispute can be raised with regard to the items which form the subject-matter of the settlement. Such matters cannot be the subject-matter of conciliation proceedings under s 12 or of reference under s 10 of the Act.[24] But the reference of the points of dispute which are not covered by the settlement or which were not visualised at the time of the settlement cannot be prevented.[25] Likewise, if a settlement is not in accordance with the requirements of the provisions of the Act or the rules, it will not be a settlement in the eye of law and it will not bar reference of the points purported to have been settled under it.[26] In Motor Industries, the Karnataka High Court held that if after the termination of service of the workmen, a settlement was arrived at between the union of the workmen and the management which was accepted by the workmen, there could be no industrial dispute for the government to refer for adjudication. If, in spite of such settlement, the government were to make an order referring the settled dispute for adjudication, once again it would be a clear case of acting without authority of law and such an action could not but be described as capricious and arbitrary exercise of power or abuse of the power on the part of the government.[27] The question whether the settlement is in accordance with the statute and the rules, is a question of law which could be raised even during the course of argument without taking any plea even if it is not raised in the pleadings.[28] A settlement can be arrived at either in the course of conciliation proceedings or outside the conciliation proceedings. A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings shall be binding on all parties to the industrial dispute and all heirs, successors or assignees of the employer and all persons who were employed on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in the establishment under s 18(3) of the Act. But a settlement arrived at otherwise in the course of conciliation proceedings will bind only parties to the settlement. It will not bind the workmen who were not a party to the settlement.

In ICI, the management entered into a settlement with one of the unions. Subsequently, an industrial dispute relating to the same demands was referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication at the instance of the other union. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the reference was validly made despite the settlement. The court observed that a settlement entered into between the management and the union outside the conciliation proceedings will bind only the workmen who were members of that union in terms of s 18(1), and not the other workmen and they would not be bound by such settlement. A reference of an industrial dispute relating to the matters covered by such settlement would not be barred. The tribunal, therefore, can validly adjudicate upon such a reference. The jurisdiction of the tribunal would be of the widest amplitude. The tribunal may, in its adjudication adopt the terms of the settlement and impose the same on the workmen raising the dispute if satisfied that the terms of the settlement are reasonable and the imposition of the terms of the settlement upon the entire body of workmen in the industrial establishment would be a fair and just resolution of the dispute. The fact that a majority of the workmen is a party to the settlement would be a material and relevant factor to be considered by the tribunal in this connection. Which terms of the settlement are fair and need be extended to the entire body of workmen and which need not be, are matters within the discretion of the tribunal. The tribunal may even incorporate in the award the beneficial terms of such settlement without imposing the obligatory or restrictive covenants contained therein. It would further be open to the tribunal notwithstanding the settlement to grant reliefs which might be higher than the reliefs obtainable under the settlement. In such a case, such relief would be available even to the persons covered by the settlement because the award will be binding on all workmen by virtue of s 18(3). The principle of 'all or none' has no relevance in industrial adjudication. Therefore, the contention that the settlement being an integral whole should be applied to all workmen, including those who were not parties to the settlement, either as a whole or not at all, is not sustainable. But only such matters as have been settled by the settlement cannot form the subject-matter of conciliation or reference.[29] In Spencer, the relevant clause in the settlement provided that the dismissal of the workman 'will stand but the company will have no objection to dispute in this respect being referred for adjudication to a tribunal by the government'. The High Court negatived the contention of the employer that since the question as to the dismissal was finally decided by the settlement, the reference was not competent and the tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain the same. The court pointed out that the clear intention of the parties that the employer was not willing to withdraw the order of dismissal, but whether such order was valid or not would finally be decided by the tribunal and, therefore, the settlement did not affect the right of the parties to continue prosecuting the reference of the dispute regarding the dismissal of the workman.[30] But if a settlement is not a settlement as defined in s 2(p), it will not bar reference of the dispute for adjudication. Mere acquiescence in such a settlement or its acceptance by workers would not make them a party to the settlement.[31] However, the question whether the settlement had, in fact, been terminated or was subsisting is a question of fact and will require determination by the adjudicating authority.[32] Likewise, a matter covered by an award of an arbitrator, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal cannot be validly referred for adjudication during the period of operation of such award.[33]

In ANZ Grindlays Bank, the facts were: A long-term settlement was entered into between the Bank and AIGB Employees Association, which was the majority union, admittedly under s 18(1). The minority union, ie, AIGB Employees Federation refused to sign the settlement. Nevertheless, the management offered to extend the benefits of the said bi-partite settlement to employees, who were not members of the Association, subject to the condition that they accept the terms of settlement in writing. The Federation (i.e., the minority union) objected to the said clause. The Government referred the dispute raised by the Federation for adjudication in December 1998 in terms: "Whether the terms of bipartite settlement dated 18-8-1996, between the management of ANZ Grindlays Bank Limited, and All Indian Grindlays Bank Employees Association which bound withholding of benefits of settlement to workmen who are not members of All India Grindlays Bank Employees Association until the individual gives acceptance of the settlement in the given format is legal and justified? If not, what relief are the workmen entitled to?" The writ petition filed by the bank challenging the said reference was dismissed at both the tiers of the High Court. Quashing the orders of the High Court, a Bench comprising Sema and Mathur, JJ, observed that a plain reading of the reference made by the Government did not show that it did not refer any dispute or apprehended dispute between the bank and the federation; and that it did not refer any demand or claim made by the Federation or alleged refusal thereof by the bank; that in such circumstances, it was not possible for the Court to hold that, on account of the settlement dated 18 August 1996 arrived at between the bank and the association, any dispute or apprehended dispute had come into existence between the bank and the federation; the mere action of the bank in asking for written acceptance of the terms of the settlement from the non-members of the association could not be said to have given rise to any kind of dispute between the bank and the federation; and, therefore, the reference made by the government for adjudication was wholly redundant and uncalled for.[34]

It is submitted that this case was rightly decided by the Supreme Court. The dispute raised by the employees federation was, in the first place, frivolous and vexatious, nay, there was indeed no factum of a dispute. While making the reference, the Government had acted in haste without applying its mind to the facts. This is yet another instance [a few others including Sindhu Resettlement Corporation (supra), have been discussed elsewhere in this section], which discloses the casual style in which higher bureaucracy in the government proceed to conduct official business in a callous and desolate manner without applying its mind to the facts and circumstances of the case and, still worse, in gross violation of the very law, which the bureaucrats are expected to enforce. Otherwise, how can one explain the irresponsible and reckless reference of the so-called 'dispute', where no industrial dispute of the kind contemplated in s 2(k) had ever existed! Then comes the turn of the High Court. With great respect, both the learned single judge and the Division Bench handled the case in a cavalier fashion and passed mediocre orders without first recording a finding on the question "was there any dispute at all, as defined in s 2(k) of the Act, which required resolution through adjudication", in the light of the facts that (i) the bank signed a valid settlement with the majority union, (ii) that it was willing to extend the benefit to all the employees of the bank, who were not members of the majority union, subject to their accepting the terms of settlement, in writing; and (iii) that the federation, which is a minority union had itself not raised any demands on the bank, except objecting to the requirement of written acceptance of the terms of settlement. The Supreme Court rightly quashed the reference made by the government was bad, while at the same time setting aside the orders passed by the learned single judge and the Division Bench of the High Court.

(ix) Reference to Arbitration

In Karnal LK Sanghatan, the State Government had referred an industrial dispute which was already pending arbitration before an arbitrator under s 10A. Quashing the reference, the Supreme Court observed that s 10 and s 10A are the alternative remedies to settle an industrial dispute. Therefore, an industrial dispute can either be referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication under s 10 or parties can enter into arbitration agreement and refer it to an arbitrator under s 10 A. But once the parties have chosen their remedy under s 10A, the government cannot validly refer that dispute for adjudication under s 10.[35]

(x) Notice

The function of the government under s 10(1) in making the order of reference is an administrative and not a judicial or quasi-judicial one, for determination of the rights of any parties. Hence the failure of the 'appropriate government' to give notice of the order of reference to the parties does not vitiate the exercise of the statutory power of the government vested in it under s 10(1) of the Act. Since the order of reference is to be made upon subjective satisfaction of the government, there is no question of any hearing being given to the parties. Hence, an order of reference without giving notice to the parties concerned would not be violative of the rules of natural justice.[36] The failure of the government to give notice to either of the parties would not sustain a charge of mala fides on that ground alone.[37]

(xi) Promissory Estoppel

An interesting point arose before the Calcutta High Court in Kesoram Industries, the employer had declared lock-out on account of illegal activities of the workmen. In the course of conciliation proceedings, the labour commissioner made certain suggestions in favour of the workmen, except that the lockout would be treated on 'no work, no pay' basis. Consequently, the State Government represented to the management that if it accepted the labour commissioner's suggestions and lifted the lock-out, the State Government would take no further steps under the Act. Accordingly, the management accepted the suggestions and lifted the lock-out. But the workmen did not accept the labour commissioner's terms and resorted to strike. Consequently, the government referred the dispute under s 10 as to whether the workmen were entitled to wages for the period of lock-out and strike. The management challenged the validity of the reference on the ground that the reference was barred by promissory estoppel. A single judge of the High Court held that the reference was not barred by the assurance of the government.[38]

Parties to Dispute

Although a reference may be in general terms, it must cover all the members of the known class of workers. Where it is worded in such a manner that it cannot be predicated of any particular workman of that class that he is a party to the proceedings, the reference will be defective.[39] Where a notification states that a dispute relating to retrenchment, etc, of workmen (specific cases to be cited by employees) is referred to the tribunal, a person, who claims to be a worker and insists that his case should be decided by the tribunal, cannot take up the contention that the reference is not valid under s 10 because it has not specified the names of workmen. That being so, the tribunal is also entitled to decide that he is not a workman and refuse to pass any order when he approaches it. [40] For instance, where there was a dispute in a factory which had been leased out by a company to a lessee, it was the lessee who was in the management of the factory and not the lessor company. Thus, the lessor company would not be a proper party in the reference of the dispute for adjudication. Even though the notice of reference is served on the lessor company, it could not be made a party to the proceedings before the tribuna1.[41]There is nothing in the Act to indicate that the government cannot make a reference indicating that a party to the dispute is a trade union. The government should make a reference in writing indicating the parties to a dispute and the point of controversy. The parties might be indicated individually or collectively with reasonable clearness.[42] In Hotel Imperial, the Supreme Court observed that where the dispute is of general nature relating to the terms of employment or conditions of labour as a body, it is not necessary to mention in the order of reference the names of the particular workmen who might have been responsible for the dispute. Thus, where the workers of an employer are collectively made parties to an industrial dispute, all those in the service of the employer on the date of reference under s 10(1) are parties to the dispute. But the court specifically stated that where the dispute refers to the dismissal, etc, of particular workmen as represented by the union, then it may be desirable to mention the names of those workmen in the order of reference.[43] The government may even make one common order of reference with respect to a number of employers or establishments, if there is a functional integrality among them or, if necessary, for the sake of uniformity.[44]

Constitutional Validity of Section 10(1)

Having regard to the provisions of the Act, it is clear that s 10 is not discriminatory in its ambit. The discretion given to the 'appropriate government' under s 10(1) is not an unfettered or uncontrolled discretion nor an unguided one, because the criteria for the exercise of such discretion are to be found within the terms of the Act itself. The provisions of s 10 are not unconstitutional, as there is no infringement of the fundamental rights under Arts. 14 and 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution.[45] Likewise, the refusal of the government to refer a dispute for adjudication would not amount to infringement of Art. 14 of the Constitution merely because the government had in an earlier case referred the case of a similar employee for adjudication. If in law, the government is justified in refusing a reference, the applicability of Art. 14 does not arise at all.[46]

Provisions of Co-Operative Societies Acts

The question, whether the relevant provisions of the Co-operative Societies Acts bar a reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, has vexed the courts and given rise to conflict of judicial dicta. The question involves the construction of the words 'touching the business of a society' in corresponding state statutes. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court in Co-operative Milk Societies, on the construction of the words 'touching the business of a co-operative society' in s 86 of the Bengal Co-operative Society Act, held that an industrial dispute between a co-operative society and its workmen does not relate to the actual business of the co-operative society, even if the dispute consequently, remotely or ultimately touches or affects the business of the co-operative society, Thus, such dispute shall not fall within the ambit of the expression 'any dispute touching the business of a co-operative society'. Therefore, a dispute regarding disciplinary action taken by a co-operative society against a paid servant of the society was expressly excluded from the purview of the Registrar's jurisdiction under s 86.[47] But this view was dissented from, by a Division Bench of that High Court in Co-operative Industrial Home, in which it was observed that the consensus of the judicial opinion was against the very wide proposition laid down by the single judge in *Co-operative Milk Societies'*case. The Bench held that the dispute between society and employee regarding the dismissal of an employee was a dispute 'touching the business of the society' and it also related to its affairs. It was further observed that the Bengal Co-operative Societies Act 1940 excluded the application of the Industrial Disputes Act.[48] In Rashtriya Khadan, a Full Bench of MP High Court held that the employees of the co-operative societies engaged in industrial activities are to be governed by the Industrial Disputes Act and not by s 55 of the MP Co-operative Societies Act 1969.[49] The Madras High Court in South Arcot CMT Society, took the view that the definition of industrial dispute'as given in this Act does not include 'any controversy regarding terms concerning an association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in approximate relation of an employer and employee'. The court also expressed doubt whether the Industrial Disputes Act itself applied to such disputes when there was the Madras Co-operative Societies Act 1932, which provided a machinery for the settlement of adjudication of disputes under s 51.[50]

In Kasturbanagar, a single judge of that High Court, however, took the view that the scope of s 51 of the Madras Co-operative Societies Act was limited and it related only to the disputes 'touching the business of a registered society' and arising between the society and its servants. Therefore, a claim for retrenchment compensation under s 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act by a workman retrenched by the society, though a dispute between the society and its servant, was not a dispute 'touching the business of the registered society'. Hence, the industrial disputes such as relating to retrenchment compensation or gratuity etc are not contemplated by the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act and such disputes are covered by the Industrial Disputes Act which provides a special machinery to decide them.[51]The single judge distinguished the decision of the Division Bench which rested on the fact that the employees there were shareholders and were not 'workmen' as defined in the Industrial Disputes Act. Subsequently, another Division Bench of that High Court in Salem CM Society, has affirmed the view of the single judge in Kasturbanagar CHC Society and dissented from the view of the Division Bench in South Arcot CMT Society in view of certain provisions of the Act having not been noticed by the bench in that case.[52] The Bombay High Court in Majoor Sahkari Bank, held that the Industrial Disputes Act applies to the industrial disputes arising between a co-operative society as employer and their workmen as its employees. Therefore, a reference under s 10(1) would not be barred by the provisions of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act.[53]Likewise, the Kerala High Court, on the construction of the words 'touches the business of a co-operative society' in s 60(1) of the Travancore Cochin Co-operative Societies Act 1951 held that this provision did not preclude a reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. It was further held that s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act was designed to deal with controversies which by their very nature were outside the purview of ordinary litigation like the one contemplated under s 60(1) of the Travancore-Cochin Co-operative Societies Act.[54] In Malabar CCB, that High Court observed:

> Cooperative societies are creatures of statute, controlled by their Constitution, and concerned with their contracts. Industrial disputes stem, not from the subtle refinements of contractual obligations but from the rougher jurisprudence of social justice and readjustment. The uplands of industrial tribunals are out of bounds to the Registrar of Co-operative Societies. ... even if the workmen of cooperative societies are its shareholders, that would not preclude a reference of an industrial dispute under the Industrial Disputes Act between a co-operative society and its workmen because a co-operative society is not a mere aggregate of its members but it has a legal personality, separate and distinct from that of its shareholders.[55]

Dealing with the provisions of s 96 of the Gujarat Co-operative Societies Act, the Gujarat High Court in Gujarat State CLM Bank, took the view that this provision related to its ordinary meaning, viz, adjudication of rights and obligations under the ordinary law and not the adjudication of industrial disputes' which have acquired a special meaning and significance under the industrial law. The industrial law seeks to provide an extraordinary process of adjudication which has been designed to deal with controversies, which by their very nature are outside the scope and purview of ordinary litigation. Further, an 'industrial dispute' connotes an entirely different concept from disputes arising under the Cooperative Societies Act between the parties mentioned in s 96 of the Act, and the authority functioning under the Co-operative Societies Act, cannot have the power and jurisdiction to decide differences or claims or demands that arise under the industrial law.[56] A similar view has been taken by the Rajasthan High Court in Kendriya SS Sangh, wherein it was held that the provisions of s 61 of the Rajasthan Co-operative Societies Act would not necessarily exclude the applicability of the Industrial Disputes Act to a dispute between a co-operative society and its workmen.[57] Likewise, the Orissa High Court in Bhanjanagar CU Bank, held that a dispute regarding disciplinary action taken by a Co-operative Bank. not being within the jurisdiction of the registrar of co-operative societies, could be validly adjudicated by an industrial tribunal.[58] In Co-op Central Bank, the Supreme Court subscribed to the general proposition that the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunals under the Industrial Disputes Act will only be barred if the dispute in question can be completely decided by the registrar under s 61 of the Andhra Pradesh Co-operative Societies Act 1964 and in the circumstances of the case held that the 'industrial dispute' in question referred to the tribunal could not possibly be referred for decision to the registrar under s 61 of that Act, as it related to alteration of a number of conditions of service of the workmen which relief could only be granted by an industrial tribunal dealing with an 'industrial dispute' and could not fall within the powers of the registrar dealing with the dispute under s 61 of the Act.[59]

In Allahabad District Cooperative, the court observed that the dispute relating to conditions of service of the workmen employed by the society cannot be held to be a dispute touching the business of the society within the meaning of s 70 of the UP Co-operative Societies Act 1966.[60] The dispute in respect of betterment and upliftment of service conditions of managers employed in village agricultural cooperative credit societies does not come within the purview of the Constitution, management or the business of a co-operative society and, therefore, s 75 of the Rajasthan Co-operative Societies Act, is not a bar for raising an industrial dispute.[61]The reference of a dispute to a labour court under this Act is not barred by the provisions of ss 55(2) and 64 of the Madhya Pradesh Co-operative Societies Act 1961.[62] A Full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Sonepat Co-op. Sugar Mills, struck down the provisions of s 128 of the Haryana Co-operative Societies Act 1984 in so far as they excluded the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunals and labour courts to decide the disputes relating to a member and a co-operative society being invalid, arbitrary and ultra vires Art. 14 of the Constitution.[63] In Bhopal CCB, a single judge of Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the dismissed employees of cooperative societies registered under the Madhya Pradesh Co-operative Societies Act 1960, could take recourse to the remedy provided under s 55 of that Act, and not under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. A reference under s 10 of the ID Act was, therefore, incompetent and the award passed in pursuance thereof was a nullity.[64] In Sagarmal, the Supreme Court took the same view and held that the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act did not apply to the employees of co-operative bank.[65]Section 102 of Haryana Cooperative Societies Act 1984, which provides that a dispute between the employee and the society has to be decided by an arbitrator, does not exclude the jurisdiction of the labour court to adjudicate the dispute on a reference made under s 10(1) of the ID Act.[66] In Bijapur CMPS Union, the issue before Supreme Court was about the date from which the ouster of jurisdiction of labour courts and tribunals in service disputes between a cooperative society and its employees takes place. The Karnataka Cooperative Societies Act 1959 was amended by Act 19 of 1976, by which service disputes between a cooperative society and its employees was to be referred to the Registrar for adjudication, and there was no specific provision therein to the extent of ousting the jurisdiction of labour courts and industrial tribunals, with the result that the Registrar of Cooperative Societies provided an alternative remedy in addition to the machinery provided under the ID Act. However, the said Amendment of 1976 was neither reserved for, nor received, the assent of President. In the meantime, the said Act was further amended by Act 2 of 2000 specifically excluding the jurisdiction of labour courts and industrial tribunals coupled with a 'non obstante' clause. Specifically, two questions fell for the consideration of the court.

(1) Whether the jurisdiction of Labour Court under the ID Act, was barred by section 70 of the KCS Act with reference to co-operative societies and if so, from when;

(2) Even if Labour Court had jurisdiction, whether the appellant was entitled to file an application under Section 10(4A) of ID Act in respect of a cause of action which occurred in 1978.

After an analysis of legislative history, Raveendran J (for self and Mathur J) answered question (1) by summarizing the legal position with precision in the following words:

(a) Even though clause (d) was added in section 70(2) with effect from 20.1.1976, section 70(1) did not exclude or take away the jurisdiction of the Labour Courts and Industrial Tribunals under the Industrial Dispute Act to decide an industrial dispute between a Society and its employees. Consequently, even after insertion of clause (d) in section 70(2) with effect from 20.1.1976, the Labour Courts and Industrial Tribunals under the Industrial Dispute Act, continued to have jurisdiction to decide disputes between societies and their employees.

(b) The jurisdiction of Labour Courts and Industrial Tribunals to decide the disputes between co-operative societies and their employees was taken away only when sub-section (1) and sub-section (2)(d) of section 70 were amended by Act 2 of 2000 and the amendment received the assent of the President on 18.3.2000 and was brought into effect on 20.6.2000;

(c) The jurisdiction to decide any dispute of the nature mentioned in section 70(2)(d) of the KCS Act, if it answered the definition of industrial dispute, vested thus :

(i) exclusively with Labour Courts and Industrial Tribunals till 20.1.1976;

(ii) concurrently with Labour Courts/Industrial Tribunals under ID Act and with Registrar under section 70 of the KCS Act between 20.1.1976 and 20.6.2000; and

(iii) exclusively with the Registrar under section 70 of the KCS Act with effect from 20.6.2000.[67] ()

Having stated the legal position thus, the learned judge proceeded to deal with question (2) above, ie, whether the appellant-workman was entitled to file an application under s 10(4A) in respect of a cause of action that arose in 1978. This part of the decision has been discussed at the appropriate place in this section as it directly falls under the Karnataka amendment. In North East Karnataka RTC, the facts briefly were: a driver of the corporation was dismissed after conducting an enquiry on the ground that while overtaking another bus of the corporation, he hit the hind part of that bus with the result the other bus lost control and hit a tree resulting in the death of 4 passengers and injuries to many others. The labour court ordered reinstatement on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the said driver had not taken reasonable care in driving the bus. The High Court too upheld the award of the labour court. Allowing the appeal and remitting the matter to the labour court, Kapadia J (for self and Pasayat J) observed that the facts show that the offending bus collided with the hind portion of the other bus and the impact of the offending bus was so great that the other bus went and dashed into a tree resulting in injuries to 56 passengers and death of 4 lives. The learned judge directed the labour court to decide, whether in the circumstances of the case, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur would be applicable or not.[68]

Shops and Establishments Act

A Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Safire Theatre, held that s 2A read with s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act does not fully bar the remedy under s 41 of the Tamil Nadu Shops and Establishments Act 1947. If a decision is rendered under s 41 (2) of the Tamil Nadu Act before the Government had made a reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, the decision would be final between the parties. However, before the conclusion of the inquiry under s 41 of the Tamil Nadu Act, if the Government makes a reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, the pending proceedings under s 41 of the Tamil Nadu Act could not be continued. Both the remedies are available to a workman but in the alternative.[69] In Bata India, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the remedy under s 18(2) of the Kerala Shops and Commercial Establishments Act 1960, does not exclude the remedy of a reference under s 10(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947.[70] In Nirchiliya, the Supreme Court observed:

> Once remedy could be worked out in either of the forums when the proceeding before the labour court was not continued, in the absence of any specific bar under either the Madras Shops and Establishments Act 1947 or the Industrial Disputes Act against the alternative forum being moved, the jurisdiction of the authority under the Madras Act would not be barred.[71]

The Madras High Court in TN Chandra, held that a workman entitled to the benefits of chapter VA of the Industrial Disputes Act, can have such right adjudicated upon even in proceedings under s 41 of the Tamil Nadu Shops and Establishments Act 1947. However, the employee has to satisfy the authority with respect to its entitlement to the benefits of that chapter by establishing that he is a 'workman' and the establishment in which he is employed is an 'industry' within the meaning of Industrial Disputes Act. He has also to establish that he has been in continuous service of the employer for not less than one year as required by s 25B of the Act.[72]

Section 34A of the Banking Companies Act 1949 (Act 10 of 1949)[73]

The only result of s 34A of the Banking Companies Act 1949 is that, in regard to two items,viz, secret reserves and provisions, the reasonable quantum which' would be available for taking into account by the adjudicator would be estimated and determined by an expert body which is a governmental authority or practically a department of government, viz, the Reserve Bank of India, which is entrusted by law with the duty of maintaining the credit structure of the country. Hence, s 34A of the Banking Companies Act, does not come in the way of effective adjudication by an industrial tribunal. The disputes between the parties in relation either to wages, bonus or other amenities or perquisites which involve financial obligations on the part of the employer remain even after the enactment of s 34A of the Banking Companies Act, with the adjudicator and he alone can determine the rights of the parties subject to the provisions of the industrial law or other relevant legislation, and the relief which he could award to the employees remains the same. The adjudicator alone determines the capacity of the industry to pay or bear the enhanced cost.[74]

Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (Act 1 of 1972)

In Daji M Surve, the Bombay High Court held that the provisions of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 bars a reference of the industrial dispute with respect to a matter which the adjudicatory authorities under that Act are seized.[75] In Cipla, the Supreme Court held that the industrial court and labour court constituted under MRTU and PULP Act would not have jurisdiction to entertain disputes on behalf of contract workers and the right forum would be the labour court/industrial tribunal constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act, and that such disputes could only be adjudicated upon in a reference made under s 10 of the ID Act.[76] This view was reaffirmed in Vividh Kamgar Sabha.[77]

Civil Suits

Section 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure,1908 provides:

> S. 9.Courts to try all civil suits unless barred.—The courts shall (subject to the provisions herein contained) have jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature excepting suits of which their cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred.
>
> Explanation I.—A suit in which the right to property or to an office is contested is a suit of a civil nature, notwithstanding that such right may depend entirely on the decision of questions as to religious rites or ceremonies.
>
> Explanation II.—For the purposes of this section, it is immaterial whether or not any fees are attached to the office referred to in Explanation I or whether or not such office is attached to a particular place.

The principles relating to the jurisdiction of ordinary civil courts with respect to matters which are entrusted to special tribunals constituted by the legislature have been summed up in Mulla's Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

(i) Where the statute re-enacts a right existing at common law and provides a special form of remedy therefor, the jurisdiction of the civil court to deal with the matter is not excluded unless the statute says so expressly or by necessary implication.

(ii) So also where the statute creates a new right but provides no special remedy therefor, it can be enforced in the ordinary civil courts.

(iii) However, where a statute creates a new right not existing at common law and specifies a particular mode in which it is to be enforced, that bars by implication, the jurisdiction of civil courts.

(iv) Even when the jurisdiction of civil courts is excluded, they would have jurisdiction to examine into cases where the provisions of the statute have not been complied with or where the statutory tribunal has not acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure, or of natural justice.[78]

These principles are based on the celebrated dictum of Willies J in Wolverhampton, wherein the learned judge stated the law thus:

> There are three classes of cases in which a liability may be established and founded upon a statute. One is, where there was liability existing at common law, and that liability is affirmed by a statute which gives a special and peculiar form of remedy different from the remedy which existed at common law; there unless the statute contained words which expressly or by necessary implication exclude the common law remedy, the party suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy. The second class of cases is, where the statute gives the right to sue merely, but provides no particular form of remedy; there the party can only proceed by action at common law. But there is a third class, viz, where a liability not existing at common law is created by a statute which at the same time gives a special and particular remedy for enforcing it...The remedy provided by the statute must be followed, and it is not competent to the party to pursue the course applicable to cases of the second class.[79]

With respect to Indian statutes creating special liability and providing for procedures and remedies, this statement of law was adopted by the Privy Counci1.[80] The question of the exclusion of jurisdiction of the civil courts by special statutes has also been the subject-matter of a number of decisions of the Supreme Court.[81] In Pabbojan Tea, dealing with the question of fixation of minimum-wages, the Supreme Court observed:

> The exclusion of the jurisdiction of the civil courts is not to be readily inferred, but such exclusion must either be explicitly expressed or dearly implied and even if jurisdiction was excluded, the civil courts would still have jurisdiction to examine into cases where the provisions of the Act had not been complied with, or the statutory tribunal had not acted in conformity with the fundamental principles of judicial procedure.[82]

On an analysis of the provisions of the Act, the court held that the civil court has jurisdiction to entertain suits for declaration that the orders of the authority under the Minimum Wages Act were illegal and void and without jurisdiction and for further declaration that the employees (sub-normal workers) were not entitled to fullminimum wages without performing a day's task or without working the prescribed number of hours. Industrial legislation is enacted with the object of ensuring industrial peace and harmony and preventing the exploitation of labour. The object and purpose of the Industrial Disputes Act is settlement and investigation of industrial disputes with a view to minimise industrial strife and to promote industrial peace and harmony and have the industrial disputes decided by special forums, provided in the Act, as expeditiously as possible. The whole idea underlying the Industrial Disputes Act 'has been to provide a speedy, inexpensive and effective forum for resolution of disputes arising between workmen and their employers. The idea has been to ensure that the workmen do not get caught in the labyrinth of civil courts with their layers upon layers of appeals and revisions and the elaborate procedural laws, which the workmen can ill afford. The procedures followed by civil courts, it was thought, would not facilitate a prompt and effective disposal of these disputes. As against this, the courts and tribunals created by the Industrial Disputes Act are not shackled by these procedural laws nor is their award subject to any appeals or revisions. Because of their informality, the workmen and their representatives can themselves prosecute or defend their cases. These forums are empowered to grant such relief as they think just and appropriate. They can even substitute the punishment in many cases. They can make and remake the contracts, settlements, wage structures and what not. Their awards are no doubt amenable to jurisdiction of the High Court under Art. 226 as also to the jurisdiction of this court under Art. 32, but they are extraordinary remedies subject to several self-imposed constraints. It is, therefore, always in the interest of the workmen that disputes concerning them are adjudicated in the forums created by the Act and not in a civil court. That is the entire policy underlying the vast array of enactments concerning workmen. This legislative policy and intendment should necessarily weigh with the courts in interpreting these enactments and the disputes arising under them'.[83]

The Act does not contain any provision expressly barring the jurisdiction of the civil courts to entertain disputes which may fall within the ambit of an 'industrial dispute' or within the provisions of chapters 5A or 5B of the Act. These chapters specifically confer certain special rights on the workmen which are not available to them in common law or under any other statute. Furthermore, it is now well established that an adjudicatory authority under the industrial law is not bound by the contract between an industrial employer and his workmen. It has the discretion to modify or extend an existing agreement or make a new one between the parties.[84]Though there is nothing in the Act vesting such jurisdiction in the adjudicatory authorities, it has been conferred on them by the dicta of the Supreme Court. In exercise of this jurisdiction, the industrial tribunals can award re-instatement of a dismissed employee, reframe wage-structure, award various allowances, fringe benefits, bonus and gratuity etc. In such cases, civil courts will have no jurisdiction to grant a decree for enforcing such rights or to grant injunction to prevent the breach of any such right. However, in cases where the 'industrial dispute' is for the purpose of enforcing any right, obligation or liability under general law or the common law and not a right, obligation or liability created by the industrial adjudication, or under the Act, then the alternative forums are there, giving an election to the suitor to choose his remedy either by moving the machinery under the Act or approach the civil courts. There has been a considerable divergence of opinion in the dicta of various High Courts on the question of the ouster of jurisdiction of civil courts with respect to industrial disputes.[85] In PremierAutomobiles, the Supreme Court found that the disputes in the case involved adjudication of rights/obligations by the Industrial Disputes Act. However, in view of the confusion created by the conflicting dicta of various High Courts, the court considered several decisions of the English and Indian courts on the subject and enunciated the following four principles in para 23 of its opinion:

> (1) If the dispute is not an industrial dispute, nor does it relate to enforcement of any other right under the Act the remedy lies only in the civil court.
>
> (2) If the dispute is an industrial dispute arising out of a right or liability under the general or common taw and not under the Act, the jurisdiction of the civil court is alternative, leaving it to the election of the suitor concerned to choose his remedy for the relief which is competent to be granted in a particular remedy. ... There will hardly be a dispute which will be an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of section 2(k) of the Act and yet will be one arising out of a right or liability under the general or common law only and not under the Act.
>
> (3) If the industrial dispute relates to the enforcement of a right or an obligation created under the Act, then the only remedy available to the suitor is to get an adjudication under the Act.
>
> (4) If the right which is sought to be enforced is a right created under the Act such as chapter 5A then the remedy for its enforcement is either section 33C or the raising of an industrial dispute, as the case may be.[86]

The learned judge pointed out that a contingency might arise in regard to the dismissal of an unsponsored workman which would be an 'industrial dispute' in view of s 2A and as such civil courts would hardly have an occasion to deal with cases falling under this principle. In this connection, the court clearly pointed out that it is plain that the suitor cannot have both the remedies and he is to choose one or the other. In TI Aron, termination of the service of the employee was declared to be a nullity in the eyes of law by a civil court in a suit filed under s 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it was in flagrant violation of the statutory provisions. The suit was held to be maintainable under principle no 2 stated above. Sabhahit J of the Karnataka High Court pointed out that if the suit was for reinstatement, it could be instituted only under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, as such, it would have fallen within principle No 3 and not principle no 2 as in Premier Automobiles. The learned Judge went on to observe:

> Thus, considering in this perspective, it is obvious that the impugned order of termination of the Karnataka State Road Transport Corporation, which was earlier known as 'TheMysore State Road Transport Corporation', which is a statutory Corporation, is susceptible to attack as having been in flagrant violation of the provisions made in the statute and as such, the termination or discharge is a nullity in the eye of law. Such a suit arises out of the general law of the land and is maintainable in a civil court. Such a dispute may also be brought up under the Industrial Disputes Act. (para 19)...Thus, considered as a whole, I am satisfied that the dispute that arises on the facts of the present case is of such a nature as can be taken cognizance of under section 9 of the CPC. There is no implied bar of jurisdiction in view of the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act as the relief claimed is not one that arises exclusively out of the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act but is of a general nature arising out of the general law, the cognizance of which can be taken under section 9 of the CPC.[87] (para 26).

The distinction drawn by Sabhahit J, between general law and special law is artificial, unwarranted and is out of context. The further distinction drawn by the learned judge between a statutory corporation and a non-statutory corporation is equally irrelevant, for the purpose of determining the question relating to the jurisdiction of civil courts, so long as it is admitted that the employee is a 'workman' and what was sought to be adjudicated is an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of ss 2(s) and 2(k), respectively, of the ID Act. In the face of a binding ruling given in Premier Automobiles, which clearly laid down that the jurisdiction of civil courts stands ousted by implication, to hold that the dispute could be taken cognisance of under s 9 of Code of Civil Procedure, is misconceived and wrong. In Bharat Petroleum, the Bombay High Court held that the obligations of workmen or trade union contemplated by s 22 are obligations in realm, enforceable by the society at large. The obligation not to go on strike is prescribed under a special statute, namely, Industrial Disputes Act. The only manner in which the statute contemplates their enforcement is by way of penalties prescribed in s 26, ie, imprisonment and/or fine. A civil suit to restrain the employees from going on a strike, irrespective of whether the proposed strike is legal or illegal under a special statute, cannot be brought in a civil court.[88] However, in IOC, the Delhi High Court granted an interim injunction under O 39, r 3 of the CPC against the employees from staging the proposed strike, in view of the fact that the conciliation officer issued notices to the parties and that the demands were under active consideration, and a strike would cause irreparable loss and injury not only to the employer but also to the public at large.[89]

A cursory glance of the Act would show that the only rights and obligations it creates are under chs VA and VB.[90] The claims of workmen for reinstatement, wage-rise, dearness allowance and other fringe benefits etc though recognised by industrial adjudication, are not created by the Act. Such claims, being de hors, the contract would however, be beyond the jurisdiction of the civil courts. Hence, by necessary implication, the jurisdiction of the civil courts is barred to give such reliefs. It is, therefore, suggested that principle no 3 should be slightly amended to read: 'If the industrial dispute relates to the enforcement of a right or an obligation created under the Act or by industrial adjudication, then the only remedy available to the suitor is to get an adjudication under the Act'. In Jitendra Nath Biswas, the Supreme Court held that the relief of reinstatement and back wages is available under the Industrial Disputes Act and cannot be granted by civil court, and, therefore the jurisdiction of civil court is excluded.[91] A Full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in Sukhi Ram, on the application of principle no 2 held that the civil court has jurisdiction to entertain the question whether the termination of the service of a workman is void, illegal, ultra vires and against the principles of natural justice. [92] From the facts stated in the judgement it is not clear whether the consequential relief sought by the plaintiff was for damages or for reinstatement and back wages. It may be pointed out that the civil court undoubtedly, will have the jurisdiction to give former relief but to award the latter relief would be beyond its jurisdiction as such relief could only be awarded by an industrial tribunal or labour court.

A single judge of the Orissa High Court in the Orissa RTC, held that the dispute about the legality of retrenchment of a workmen being an 'industrial dispute', the remedy for which has been specifically provided in the Act, is not cognisable by the civil court.[93] Likewise, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that a dispute relating to the question, as to whether the transfer of a workman is mala fid e by way of victimisation and unfair labour practice, cannot be of a civil nature because law does not recognise any limitations on the powers of employers to transfer their employees on the ground of mala fide or unfair labour practice. However, there is express provision in s 25T read with item 7 of the fifth schedule to the Industrial Disputes Act regarding the mala fide transfer of a workman from one place to another. The proper forum for challenging the transfer on the ground of mala fide, victimisation and unfair labour practice is, therefore, under the Industrial Disputes Act and not the civil court.[94] This decision was followed by a single judge of the Kerala High Court in Mookan, Major.[95] In VA Damodaran, though in form the prayer in the suit was for declaring the age of the plaintiff and that he was entitled to continue in service till a certain date and for granting a permanent injunction restraining the defendants in any way interfering with the plaintiffs service by way of retirement, in effect, the plaintiff had agitated that the action of the defendant in retiring him from service was invalid as it was in contravention of the Standing Orders which fixed the superannuation age at 58 years. Thus, the relief of declaration that was claimed was not only regarding declaration of the age bur it was regarding contravention of the Standing Orders also. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that the civil court could not legitimately have jurisdiction to entertain and decide the suit because the relief claimed through the suit was in substance regarding the legality of superannuation under the Standing Orders.[1]

A number of mixed questions of law and fact have to be decided before the issue of jurisdiction can be properly disposed of In order to determine the question whether the suit is triable by the civil court or the industrial tribunal, therefore, the following questions have to be determined: (i) whether it is an industrial dispute; (ii) whether it is for the enforcement of a right under the Industrial Disputes Act or a right or obligation under the general or common law. The Calcutta High Court held that a suit to declare suspension of an industrial Worker as void and illegal is not barred by the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act particularly when the matter of suspension has not acquired the character of an industrial dispute.[2]Likewise, a suit by a workman for damages for wrongful dismissal before the insertion of s 2A, could not be ousted by the Industrial Disputes Act.[3]The question whether a dispute is an 'industrial dispute' or not is a jurisdictional issue upon the determination of which will depend the jurisdiction of the tribunals under the Act under principle no 1 as enumerated in Premier Automobiles. Hence, it is open to an aggrieved party to approach the civil court for deciding this question. Alternatively, the aggrieved party may take the preliminary objection before the tribunal that the dispute in question is not an 'industrial dispute'. If the dispute is held not to be an 'industrial dispute', either by the civil court or the tribunal, then the industrial tribunal will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the dispute and it is only the civil court that can decide it. In Rajasthan SRTC, a three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court noticed the controversy arising out of principle no 2 and particularly the qualifying statement in para 24 of the judgment in Premier Automobiles case (supra). According to principle no 2, 'if the dispute is an 'industrial' dispute arising out of a right or liability under the general or common law and not under the Industrial Disputes Act, the jurisdiction of the civil court is alternative and it is left to the person concerned either to approach the civil court or to have recourse to the machinery provided by the Industrial Disputes Act.' After analysing the earlier dicta of the court and the various High Courts, Jeevan Reddy J, reiterated the law on the subject as follows:

(1) Where the dispute arises from general law of contract, ie, where reliefs are claimed on the basis of the general law of contract, a suit filed in civil court cannot be said to be not maintainable, even though such a dispute may also constitute an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of section 2(k) or section 2A of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947.

(2) Where, however, the dispute involves recognition, observance or enforcement of any of the rights or obligations created by the Industrial Disputes Act, the only remedy is to approach the forums created by the said Act.

(3) Similarly, where the dispute involves the recognition, observance or enforcement of rights and obligations created by enactments like Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946—which can be called 'sister enactments' to Industrial DisputesAct—and which do not provide a forum for resolution of such disputes, the only remedy shall be to approach the forums created by the Industrial Disputes Act provided they constitute industrial disputes within the meaning of section 2(k) and section 2A of Industrial Disputes Act or where such enactment says that such dispute shall be either treated as an industrial dispute or says that it shall be adjudicated by any of the forums created by the Industrial Disputes Act. Otherwise, recourse to civil court is open.

(4) It is not correct to say that the remedies provided by the Industrial Disputes Act are not equally effective for the reason that access to the forum depends upon a reference being made by the appropriate government. The power to make a reference conferred upon the government is to be exercised to effectuate the object of the enactment and hence not unguided. The rule is to make a reference unless, of course, the dispute raised is a totally frivolous one ex facie. The power conferred is the power to refer and not the power to decide, though it may be that the government is entitled to examine whether the dispute is ex facie frivolous, not meriting an adjudication.

(5) Consistent with policy of law aforesaid, we commend to the Parliament and the state legislatures to make a provision enabling a workman to approach the labour court/industrial tribunal directly ie, without the requirement of a reference by the government in case of industrial disputes covered by section 2A, Industrial Disputes Act. This would go a long way in removing the misgivings with respect to the effectiveness of the remedies provided by the Industrial Disputes Act.

(6) The certified Standing Orders framed under and in accordance with the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 are statutorily imposed conditions of service and are binding both upon the employers and employees, though they do not amount to 'Statutory Provisions'. Any violation of these Standing Orders entitles an employee to appropriate relief either before the forums created by the Industrial Disputes Act or the civil court where recourse to civil court is open according to the principles indicated herein.

(7) The policy of law emerging from Industrial Disputes Act and its sister enactments is to provide an alternative dispute resolution mechanism to the workmen, a mechanism which is speedy, inexpensive, informal and unencumbered by the plethora of procedural laws and appeals upon appeals and revisions applicable to civil courts. Indeed, the powers of the courts and tribunals under the Industrial Disputes Act are far more extensive in the sense that they can grant such relief as they think appropriate in the circumstances for putting an end to an industrial dispute.[4]

The principles enunciated by Jeevan Reddy J in the Rajasthan SRTC and, in particular, principle (6), suffer from a host of inconsistencies. In the first place, what is meant by the observation: otherwise, recourse to civil court is open' as enunciated in (3) above? Is there a single right or obligation created by the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, in respect of which, civil courts can exercise jurisdiction either concurrently with, or to the exclusion of, labour courts and industrial tribunals created by the ID Act? This way principle (3) breaks open a narrow channel for numerous litigations. A look at entry 1 of Sch II to the ID Act, ie, 'the propriety or legality of an order passed by an employer under the Standing Orders' reveals the fact that every action taken under Model Standing Orders or Certified Standing Orders falls within the jurisdiction of labour courts and industrial tribunals. Again, entry 6 of Sch III and IV refers to 'shift working otherwise than in accordance with Standing Orders', in respect of which an employer is required to give a notice of change under s 9A of the Act, falls within the jurisdiction of industrial tribunals. Secondly, at a very general level, can the Apex Court single out at least one aspect of standing orders, which is incapable of being comprehended by the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s. 2(k) in respect of which, a special remedy has not been provided under IDA? The expressions - employment, non-employment, terms of employment and conditions of labour - appearing in the definition clause are so comprehensive and of such amplitude that they take into their fold every conceivable aspect of employment relationship from cradle to grave. A glance at Schs II, III & IV reveals the fact that whether it is a right or obligation created under IDA or its sister enactments like the IESOA, or even those created under several other pieces of labour legislations such as PBA, FA, EPFA, PGA—has been brought within the jurisdiction of Labour Courts and Industrial Tribunals. That being the legal position, where is the question of seeking alternative remedy in civil courts? And lastly, the further observation made in principle (6) above, ie, 'Any violation of these Standing Orders entitles an employee to appropriate relief either before the fora created by the Industrial Disputes Act or the civil court where recourse to civil court is open according to the principles indicated herein' is even worse, as it is capable of throwing the lawyer and the litigant alike into total confusion, given the fact that taking recourse to a civil court is not the same thing as seeking the special remedy provided under the ID Act. Once the civil court is allowed to entertain a suit, the rigidity of Code of Civil Procedure enters into the litigation process. A collateral consequence of such an interpretation is that the proceeding acquires the character of civil adjudication, with the further implication that the civil court reaches the limit of its power the moment it enforces the contract made by the parties, and cannot travel one inch beyond. On the contrary, the very concept of industrial adjudication rests on the proposition that the adjudicator can extend an existing agreement or make a new one or create new obligations or modify the old ones. Viewed in this perspective, where does the jurisdiction of civil courts stand? RSRTC made the legal position murkier, quite contrary to its ostensible purpose of clarifying and explaining the ratio of Premier Automobiles. This decision is replete with equivocal and inconsistent observations made by the learned judge, which reflect more his confusion than clarity as to the relative turf of ID Act and civil courts, more so, in the face of an authoritative decision in Premier Automobiles. What was the provocation for the learned judge to indulge in a creative exercise of this kind in a vital matter which was so conclusively decided and was in force for two decades!? If a judge of any court at any level is faced with the dilemma of choosing between Premier Automobiles and RSRTC, he should invariably choose the former and reject the latter without a second look as being perverse and misconceived.[5] In Apollo Tyres, a workman filed a civil suit seeking several reliefs including (i) a declaration that he was a workman, (ii) that his transfer to West Bengal was illegal; (iii) restraining the management from compelling him to accept the promotion; (iv) restraining the management from interfering with his legitimate right to perform his duties as a general secretary of the trade union; and (v) granting the cost of suit. The trial court allowed the objection on jurisdiction of the civil court filed by the management and dismissed the suit filed by the workman. The appellate authority reversed the decree of the trial court and ruled that it had jurisdiction to try the suit. In the Civil Miscellaneous Appeal by the company, the High Court confirmed the order of the first appellate authority. Setting aside the orders passed by the High Court and the first appellate authority, a Bench comprising Katju and Dattu JJ held:

> On the facts of the case, we are clearly of the view that the suit filed by the plaintiff was barred by section 14(b) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 which states that a contract of personal service cannot be enforced in a civil suit. In our opinion, if the plaintiff had any grievance and if he is a workman as defined in the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, he should have raised an industrial dispute and sought relief under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 before the Labour Court or Industrial Tribunal. There are many powers which the Labour Court of Industrial Tribunal enjoy which the Civil Court does not enjoy eg the power to enforce contracts of personal service, to create contracts, to change contracts etc. These things can only be done by the Labour Court or Industrial Tribunal but cannot be done by a civil Court. A contract for personal service includes all matters relating to the service of the employee eg confirmation, suspension, transfer, termination etc. (para 12)…In our opinion, the reliefs claimed by the plaintiff were clearly seeking enforcement of a contract of personal service and the civil Court has no jurisdiction to grant such reliefs as held by this Court in the case of Pearlite Lioners (P) Ltd v Manorama Sirsi.[6] The High Court and the first appellate Court were clearly in error in holding that the civil Court had jurisdiction in the matter and the trial Court was right in holding that the civil Court had no jurisdiction and rightly dismissed the suit filed by the plaintiff. (para 13) … Accordingly, this appeal is allowed, the impugned judgment of the High Court and the first appellate Court are set aside and that of the trial Court is restored.[7] (para 14)

It goes to the credit of the learned judges, Markandey Katju and HL Dattu JJ that they placed the legal position relating to a right / duty / obligation created under the industrial law and the remedy provided thereunder in the correct perspective. This decision exposes the half-tones that surfaced in Rajasthan SRTC, which has been analysed at some length in the preceding paragraph. There is practically no right relating to a 'workman' employed in an 'industry', which is not capable of being grasped by the definition of 'industrial dispute' in s 2(k) of the ID Act. The said definition is so exhaustive and inclusive that it indeed is impossible to envisage a right created even by common law in respect of an industrial workman, for the enforcement of which the Industrial Disputes Act is silent thereby driving a workman to seek remedy in a civil court. It is once again submitted that Apollo Tyres was rightly decided in contradistinction to Rajasthan STRC, which was decided in a casual and callous manner.

In Nizam Sugars, the delinquent employee filed a suit for declaration that the domestic inquiry conducted by the employer was void and, for permanent injunctionrestraining the employer from proceeding thereafter. The employer sought time for filing the counter and in the meanwhile terminated the services of the delinquent. In this fact situation, a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the suit was not maintainable in law because the employee sought to enforce his right created under the Industrial Disputes Act and his remedy was only under that Act.[8] The civil court, prima facie, has no jurisdiction to decide the validity or otherwise of the order of termination and while deciding the issue whether the plaintiff has a prima facie case or not, the trial court could also consider whether it lacks or not, the inherent jurisdiction to try the suit. The dismissal of the employee during the pendency of the suit affect the jurisdiction of the civil court to try the suit covered by s 2A of the Act which provides a forum for settlement of individual dispute covered by s 2A particularly when the court should be satisfied that a strong prima facie case has been made out by the plaintiff, including the question of maintainability of the suit. The dismissal of a suit by the civil court on the ground that it had no jurisdiction as the matter was in the realm of industrial adjudication, will not bar adjudication by an adjudicatory authority under the Industrial Disputes Act.[9] Likewise, a dispute relating to transfer of employees on the mala fide ground of victimisation and punishment would constitute an industrial dispute, therefore, a civil suit challenging such transfer is not maintainable.[10] In Road Transport Undertakings, the facts were: a few workers indulged in violent demonstration and the employer filed a suit for the issue of a perpetual injunction which was contested by the workman on the ground that the civil court had no jurisdiction to entertain and decide the suit for grant of an injunction because the alleged acts of the Workers amounted to unfair 'labour practice' within the meaning of s 2(ra) of the Act, and that, therefore, it was only an industrial tribunal which was entitled to take cognizance of such matters. It was further contended that the civil court was debarred from taking cognizance in respect of unfair 'labour practice' ever though it is an offence since s 34 of the Act bars cognizance by the court. A single judge of the Delhi High Court held that s 34 was in respect of taking cognizance by the criminal court and did not debar a civil court from taking cognizance of a matter of civil nature.[11] In Chandrakant Nikam, Pattanaik J, speaking for another three-judge Bench, observed:

> It may be borne in mind that the Industrial Disputes Act was enacted by the Parliament to provide speedy, inexpensive and effective forum for resolution of disputes arising between workmen and the employers, the underlying idea being to ensure that the workmen do not get caught in the labyrinth of civil courts which the workmen can ill-afford, as has been stated by this Court in Rajasthan State Road Transport Corporation case (supra). It cannot be disputed that the procedure followed by civil courts is too lengthy and consequently, is not an efficacious forum for resolving industrial disputes speedily. The power of industrial courts also is wide and such fora are empowered togrant adequate relief as they think just and appropriate. It is in the interest of the workmen that their disputes, including the dispute of illegal termination, are adjudicated upon by an industrial forum...In the aforesaid premises and having regard to the relief sought for in the suits filed in the civil court, we have no manner of hesitation to come to the conclusion that in such cases the jurisdiction of the civil court must be held to have been impliedly barred and the appropriate forum for resolution of such dispute is the forum constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act...[12]

While holding that the jurisdiction of civil courts stood barred by implication, Pattanaik J did not dilate upon the other part of the decision rendered in Rajasthan SRTC to the effect that the jurisdiction of civil courts was not barred in respect of rights and obligations created under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946. There is an urgent need to review and restate the legal position by expressly barring the jurisdiction of civil courts as laid down in Premier Automobiles. In Golden Hills Estates, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that a civil suit for declaration that termination of the services of a workman was null and void and that he continued in service was not maintainable.[13] In a case where the civil court recorded a finding that it has jurisdiction to try a case of dismissal of a workman, on the ground that the right of the workman did not arise solely under the industrial law but also under the general law, a single Judge of Karnataka High Court held that, leaving the correctness of the said finding aside, once the workman had elected to seek remedy by filing a civil suit and lost the case in the civil court, he was bound by the finding that the domestic enquiry held as well as the dismissal were valid, he would not thereafter be permitted to agitate the same issue by raising an industrial dispute under the ID Act. The fact that a competent court, on his election of the remedy, decided the issue operates as res judicata, and the labour court cannot retry the same issue.[14] A dismissed workman of Punjab Roadways, who, having filed a civil suit and lost, raised an industrial dispute, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that he was debarred from agitating the dispute after he had failed in civil court on the principle of res judicata.[15] The NCL-II categorically recommended that the jurisdiction of civil courts should be expressly ousted in respect of all matters for which provision is contained in the relevant labour laws.[16] In BS Bharti, the facts briefly were: The respondent-workman was engaged as a fitter on a daily basis from 1971 to April 1973, whereafter he was treated as a probationer for an initial period of six months at the end of which, his probation was extended by another three months. On his services not being found satisfactory, his probation was terminated on 24 January 1974. The government refused to refer the dispute for adjudication. The appellant thereafter filed a suit in the civil court, which decreed the suit of the appellant. Aggrieved by the decree, the company filed a regular first appeal before the High Court, which following the judgment in RSRTC, allowed the appeal and set aside the judgment passed by the trial court. Upholding the order of High Court, Hegde J (for self, Sinha and Mathur JJ) observed:

> In cases where the application for reference under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act has been rejected by the appropriate authority, the aggrieved party should pursue the same by way of a writ petition and if possible get the dispute referred under the Industrial Disputes Act. If he fails to do so even after such attempt or fails to make such an attempt, the directions issued in para 37 of the above judgment in the case of Rajasthan State Road Transport Corporation (supra) does not apply…. In the said view of the matter, we find no reason to interfere with the judgment of the High Court.[17]

In Kehar Singh, HK Sema J (for self and AR Lakshmanan J) dealt with the question of the jurisdiction of civil courts. The following observations are self-explanatory:

> In view of the order that we propose to pass, it may not be necessary to recite all facts leading to the filing of the present appeal. The respondent herein was working as Conductor in the Haryana Roadways, Sirsa Depot. He was dismissed from service. ... Aggrieved by the order of dismissal, he preferred an appeal before the Additional Transport Commissioner which was dismissed on 29-6-1995. Aggrieved thereby, the respondent filed civil suit ... seeking a decree of declaration ... The trial Court framed as many as 7 issues. One of the important issue framed was issue No. 6, whether the Civil Court has got jurisdiction to try the present suit. We are dismay (sic) to note that no finding has been recorded on this issue by the Trial Court. The Trial Court, however, proceeded to examine the case on merits, without determining the jurisdiction of the court. It is now well established principle of law that a decree without the jurisdiction is a nullity. Unfortunately, all the Courts below including the High Court has failed to notice this important question of law. (para 4) ... We repeatedly made query from the learned counsel for the respondent as to whether the finding has been recorded by the Trial Court regarding the jurisdiction of the Civil Court. We received no answer. (para 5) ... In a recent judgment of this Court in the case of Rajasthan State Road Transport Corpn v Zakir Hussain [18] in which my brother Dr Justice AR Lakshmanan was party, this Court after considering the various Judgments including the judgment referred above, has come to the conclusion that the Civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain such suit. (para 9) ... In the view that this Court has been taking consistently, the Civil Court has no jurisdiction to entertain such suit and any decree passed by the Civil Court without jurisdiction, is a nullity. The High Court has failed to notice the position of law enunciated by this Court in catena of decisions.[19] (refer para 10)

Once the original decree itself has been held to be without jurisdiction and hit by the doctrine of coram non judice, there would be no question of upholding the same merely on the ground that the objection to the jurisdiction was not taken at the initial, first Appellate or second Appellate stage. It must, therefore, be held that the civil court in this case had no jurisdiction to deal with the suit and resultantly the judgments of the Trial Court, First Appellate Court and the Second Appellate Court are liable to be set aside for that reason alone and the appeal is liable to be allowed. In view of this verdict of ours, we have deliberately not chosen to go into the other contentions raised on merits.[20] In a case involving a conductor, the civil court entertained the suit and decreed it, despite the employer raising an objection to the effect that the civil court had no jurisdiction. The appellate court too proceeded blindfold and dismissed the appeal filed by the management. What is worse, the High Court of Rajasthan, in second appeal, treaded the same path as the District Judge and dismissed the appeal. Is it possible that the learned judges at all the three levels of Trial Court, District Court and High Court were operating from a position of abject ignorance of the rudimentary legal principles? Assuming that they are, as reflected in their decisions, should they not apply their mind to the averments of the management in its objection and come to a reasoned conclusion? If this is not a callous, indifferent and reckless manner of handling a case, on the part of the judges at all the three levels, what else could it be? A bus conductor is very much a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) of the ID Act. The Corporation itself is an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j). And finally, the dispute relating to dismissal falls within the subject matter 'non-employment' within the meaning of 'industrial dispute' under s 2(k). Once these three parameters are satisfied, the dispute becomes an industrial dispute, which can only be adjudicated in the remedy and manner provided in the ID Act. Could it be said that the learned judges could not grasp these elementary aspects, which even a student of labour law in a graduate school could very well grasp? Quashing the irresponsible decisions handed down right from the Trial Court up to the High Court, Lodha J (for self and Raveendran J) observed:

> The case of the respondent as set up in the plaint, therefore, is that in the absence of departmental enquiry as contemplated in Standing Orders, the order of dismissal is bad in law. It is true that respondent pleaded that he has been dismissed from service without affording any opportunity of defence and hearing and in breach of principles of natural justice but the said ... plea has to be understood in the backdrop of his pleading that the dismissal order has been passed contrary to Standing Orders without holding any departmental enquiry. The legal position that Standing Orders have no statutory force and are not in the nature of delegated/subordinate legislation is clearly stated by this Court in Krishna Kant.[21] In that case (Krishna Kant), this Court while summarizing the legal principles in paragraph 35(6) stated that the certified Standing Orders framed under and in accordance with the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946 are statutorily imposed conditions of service and are binding both upon the employers and employees, though they do not amount to 'statutory provisions' and any violation of these Standing Orders entitles an employee to appropriate relief either before the forum created by the Industrial Disputes Act or the civil court where recourse to civil court is open according to the principles indicated therein. In Bal Mukund Bairwa (2) (2009 AIR SCW 2566), in para 37 of the report, the position has been explained that if the infringement of the Standing Orders is alleged, the civil court's jurisdiction may be held to be barred but if the suit is based on the violation of principles of common law or constitutional provisions or on other grounds, the civil court's jurisdiction may not be held to be barred. In our opinion, nature of right sought to be enforced is decisive in determining whether the jurisdiction of civil court is excluded or not. In the instant case, the respondent who hardly served for three months, has asserted his right that the departmental enquiry as contemplated under the Standing Orders, ought to have been held before issuing the order of dismissal and in absence thereof such order was liable to be quashed. Such right, if available, could have been enforced by the respondent only by raising an industrial dispute and not in the civil suit. In the circumstances, it has to be held that civil court had no jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit filed by the respondent.[22]

The above case was rightly decided, but the reliance placed by the learned judge on Krishna Kant, with all the horrors that beset the reasoning process therein, is certainly misconceived for the reason that the said decision is a poor representative of sound judicial thought on the question of 'implied ouster' of the jurisdiction of civil courts in the realm of industrial disputes.

SUB-SECTION (1)(A): DISPUTES INVOLVING QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE OR DISPUTES RELATING TO ESTABLISHMENTS SITUATED IN MORE THAN ONE STATE

Sub-section (1A) empowers the Central Government to refer an 'industrial dispute' or any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to that dispute in the second or Third Schedule to a national tribunal for adjudication irrespective of the fact whether or not it is the 'appropriate government' in relation to that dispute. Under this sub-section, the Central Government is to form its opinion merely on the question as to whether an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended. However, before the Central Government can make a reference under this sub-section, it must have formed its opinion that:

(1) there is a dispute which satisfies the requirement of an industrial dispute as defined in section 2(k).

(i) such industrial dispute exists or is at least apprehended at the time of making the reference;

(ii) such dispute

(a) involves any question of national importance; or

(b) is of such a nature that industrial establishments situated in more than one state are likely to be interested in, or affected by such dispute, and that

(2) the dispute should be adjudicated upon by a national tribunal.

The opinion of the Central Government that these conditions exist is a pre-condition to the making of a reference to the national tribunal.[23] If any of these conditions does not exist, the reference to the National Tribunal will not be justified. Subject to these limitations and also the further requirement of acting bona fide, the discretion of the government in making the order of reference is unreviewable. For making reference with respect to inter-state industrial establishments, the discretion of the government has been made very wide. The legislature has used the words 'industrial establishments situated in more than one state are likely to be interested in or affected by, such dispute'. For exercise of power under this sub-section, therefore it is not necessary that the inter-state establishments should be 'affected', but it is sufficient even if they are 'likely to be interested' in the dispute proposed to be referred to the National Tribunal. The words 'interested' or 'affected' cannot be equated. There is a difference in the import of the words 'interested' and 'affected'. For instance, the union which sponsors the cause of an individual workman is 'interested' in the dispute but the workmen who are the members of the union are not necessarily 'affected' by the dispute.[24]Section 10(6) divests a labour court or an industrial tribunal of the jurisdiction to adjudicate upon any matter pending adjudication before it after the Central Government has made a reference of that matter to the National Tribunal under this sub-section. The words 'at any time' used in sub-s (1A) read with sub-s (6) indicate that a reference by the Central Government to National Tribunal can be made even after the matter has been referred to a labour court or an industrial tribunal under s 10(1) by the 'appropriate government'. It is now well-settled that the appropriate government has no power to cancel or supersede a reference made by it under s 10(1) of the Act. However, it is obvious that the reference made by the appropriate government under s 10(1) can be superseded by a reference made by the Central Government in exercise of its power under sub-s (1A) to a national tribunal.

---

1 Subs by Act 18 of 1952, s 3, for "If any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, the appropriate Government may" (wef 4-3-1952).

2 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for cl (c) (wef 10-3-1957).

3 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'Provided that' (wef 10-3-1957).

4 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 8 (wef 21-8-1984).

5 Ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

6 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'or tribunal' (wef 10-3-1957).

7 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 8 (wef 21-8-1984).

8 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'or tribunal' (wef 10-3-1957).

9 Ins by Act 18 of 1952, s 3 (wef 4-3-1952).

10 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'a tribunal' (wef 10-3-1957).

11 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'the tribunal' (wef 10-3- 1957).

12 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 7, for 'tribunal' (wef 10-3-1957).

13 Sub-sections (6) and (7) ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 7 (wef 10-3-1957).

14 Explanation ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 5 (wef 19-12-1964).

15 Ins by Act 46 of 1982, s 8 (wef 21-8-1984).

16 TD Ramayya Pantulu, IT v Kutty & Rao (E) Ltd (1949) 1 LLJ 13 (Mad) (DB), per Horwill J.

17 United Commercial Bank Ltd v UPBE Union (1952) 2 LLJ 577 [LNIND 1952 SC 47] (SC), per Chandrasekhara Iyer J.

18 State of Madras v CP Sarathy (1953) 1 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1952 SC 84] (SC) : AIR 1953 SC 53 [LNIND 1952 SC 84]: [1953] 4 SCR 334 [LNIND 1952 SC 84], per Patanjali Sastri CJI.

19 Newspapers Ltd v IT (1957) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 28], 8 (SC), per Kapur J.

20 Western India Match Co v WIMCO Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], 262 (SC) : (1970) 1 SCC 225 [LNIND 1970 SC 4] : AIR 1970 SC 1205 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], per Shelat J.

21 Rohtas Industries Ltd v SD Agarwal AIR 1969 SC 707 [LNIND 1968 SC 428], 715 : (1969) 1 SCC 325 [LNIND 1968 SC 428] : [1969] 39 Comp Cas 781 (SC), per Hegde J.

22 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] : 1978 Lab IC 961 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

23 A Sundarambal v Government of Goa, Daman and Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 65 (SC), per Venkataramiah J.

24 Ram Avtar Sharma v State of Haryana (1985) 2 LLJ 187 [LNIND 1985 SC 122] (SC), per Desai J.

25 Avon Services (Production Agencies) Pvt Ltd v IT (1979) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1978 SC 284], 4 (SC), per Desai J.

26 General Insurance Emp Assn v PO, IT (2002) 1 LLN 1040 (Mad), per Sathasivam J.

27 Beetham v Trinidad Cement Ltd [1960] 1 All ER 274, 280 PC, per Lord Denning.

28 Rex v Nat Bell Liquors Ltd [1922] 2 AC 128, 159, per Lord Summer.

29 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda, Jullundur (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], 486 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] : 1978 Lab IC 961 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

30 Kirloskar Electric Co Ltd v Workmen (1974) 2 LLJ 537, 541 (Kant), per Venkararamiah J.

31 India Tourism Dev Corpn, v Delhi Administration 1982 Lab IC 1309, 1328 (Del) (FB), per Chadha J.

32 Western India Match Co v Western India Match Co Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4] (SC), per Shelat J.

33 Cf, Barium Chemicals Ltd v Co Law Board AIR 1967 SC 295 [LNIND 1966 SC 132],309, per Mudholkar J.

34 Cf, Rohtas Industries Ltd v SD Agarwal AIR 1969 SC 707 [LNIND 1968 SC 428],720-21 : (1969) 1 SCC 325 [LNIND 1968 SC 428] : [1969] 39 Comp Cas 781 (SC), per Bachawat J.

35 Rass-Clunis v Papadopoullons [1958] 1 WLR 546.

36 Cf, RC Cooper v Union of India AIR 1970 SC 564, 644, per Shah J.

37 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v IT (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268], 839 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 529 [LNIND 1967 SC 267]: [1968] 1 SCR 515 [LNIND 1967 SC 267], per Bhargava J.

38 Shambu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda, Jullundur (1978) 1 LLJ 484 [LNIND 1978 SC 35] (SC), per Desai J.

39 Bombay Union of Journalists v Hindu (1961) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1961 SC 316], 439 (SC), per Shah J.

40 Agfa Gevaert India Ltd v Second IT, West Bengal 1983 Lab IC NOC 108 (Cal), per Barooah J.

41 Pradip Lamp Works v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 507 [LNIND 1969 SC 299] (SC) : 1969 (19) FLR 385 : 1969 (2) UJ 588 [LNIND 1969 SC 299], per Shelat J.

42 Mgmt of Monghyr Factory of ITC Ltd v LC 1978 Lab IC 1256 [LNIND 1978 SC 170], 1259-60 (SC), per Untwalia J.

43 Sunit Kumar Roy v Union of India 1977 Lab IC 794, 798 (Pat) (DB), per Choudhuri J.

44 Western India Match Co v Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], 262 (SC), per Shelat J.

45 Jaipur Polyspin Ltd v State of Rajasthan (1994) 2 LLJ 917, 928 (Raj), per GS Singhvi J.

46 (1966) 1 LLJ 356, 360 (MP) (DB), per Dixit J.

47 Maheshwar Rao v State of Orissa (1974) 2 LLJ 127, 129 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

48 Swadeshi Cotton Mills Co Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 419 [LNIND 1961 SC 121], 424 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1381 [LNIND 1961 SC 121]: [1962] 1 SCR 422 [LNIND 1961 SC 121], per Wanchoo J.

49 JK Cotton Manufacturers v JN Tiwari AIR 1959 All 639, per VJ Oak J.

50 Rohtas Industries Ltd v State of Bihar 1977 Lab IC (NOC) 102 (Pat) (DB).

51 Pride Machinery Works v State of Punjab 1971 Lab IC 940 -41 (P&H), per Tuli J.

52 Dunlop (India) Ltd v Delhi Administration 1973 Lab IC 640, 645 (Del) (DB), per Hardy J.

53 United Provinces Electric Supply Co Ltd v IT 1974 Lab IC 902, 905 (Cal), per AK Mookerjee J.

54 Mahabir Jute Mills Ltd v Shibban Lal Saxena (1975) 2 LLJ 326 [LNIND 1975 SC 239], 330 (SC), per Murtaza Fazal Ali J.

55 Allahabad Bank v CGIT-cum-LC 1998 (3) LLN 105 (All), per Mahajan J.

56 Secretary, Indian Tea Association v AK Barat (2000) 2 LLN 25 [LNIND 2000 SC 1947], 28 (SC).

57 Lakhtaria P Narsinhbhai v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 848 (Guj), per KM Mehta J.

58 Bombay Union of Journalists v State of Bombay AIR 1964 SC 1617 [LNIND 1963 SC 305]: 1964 (8) FLR 236 : (1964) I LLJ 351SC : [1964] 6 SC R22, per Gajendragadkar J.

59 Technological Institute of Textiles v Workmen (1965) II LLJ 149(SC), per Ramaswamy J.

60 Employers of Thungabhadra Ind Ltd v Workmen (1973) II LLJ 283 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 2272 [LNIND 1973 SC 196]: 1973 Lab IC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 196] : (1974) 3 SCC 167 [LNIND 1973 SC 196], per Vaidialingam J.

61 Workmen of Cochin Chamber of Commerce v Kerala (1976) II LLJ 108(Ker), per Subramonian Potty J.

62 Bombay Union of Journalists v State of Bombay (1964) I LLJ 351 (358) (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 1617 [LNIND 1963 SC 305]: [1964] 6 SCR 22 [LNIND 1963 SC 305], per Gajendragadkar J.

63 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda (1978) I LLJ 484 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1088 [LNIND 1978 SC 35]: (1978) 2 SCC 353 [LNIND 1978 SC 35], per Desai J.

64 Western India Match Co v Workmen (1970) II LLJ 256 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1205 [LNIND 1970 SC 4]: (1970) 1 SCC 225 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], per Shelat J.

65 Union Bank of India Employees Union v Union of India, (2003) 1 LLJ 171 [LNIND 2002 BOM 759] (Bom) : 2003 (1) Bom CR 800 [LNIND 2002 BOM 759] : 2003 (96) FLR 806, per Kochar J.

66 Gaya Prasad v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 60 (MP), per Kulsreshtha J.

67 All India and GM Union v Govt of NCT of Delhi (2003) 4 LLJ 685 [LNIND 2003 DEL 648] (Del), per Mukul Mudgal J.

68 Rathinaswamy C v State Bank of India (2007) 3 LLJ 380 (Mad).

69 Amts Karmachari Sangh v DCL (2013) 4 LLJ 157 (Guj) : 2013 Lab IC 4142 : 2014 (141) FLR 452, per Upadhyay J.

70 Sarva Shramik Sangh v Indian Oil Corporation AIR 2009 SC 2355 [LNIND 2009 SC 823]: (2009) III LLJ 237SC : (2009) 11 SCC 609 [LNIND 2009 SC 823], per Raveendran, J.

71 State of Maharashtra v Kamani Employees' Union 1975 Lab IC 387 [LNIND 1973 SC 171], 389 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

72 State of Bihar v DN Ganguli (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1018 [LNIND 1958 SC 92]: [1959] 1 SCR 1191 [LNIND 1958 SC 92], per Gajendragadkar J.

73 Karnal-Kaithal Coop Transport Society v State of Punjab (1959) 1 LLJ 274 (Punj) (DB), per Bhandari CJ.

74 State of Bihar v DN Ganguli (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

75 Minerva Mills Ltd v Workers (1954) 1 LLJ 119 [LNIND 1953 SC 82] (SC), per Mahajan J.

76 Shellac Industries Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 492, 495 (Cal) (DB), per Datta J.

77 1992 Lab IC 1090, 1093 (Bom) (Nagpur Bench) per M Desai J.

78 Indian Rayon Industries Ltd v State of Gujarat (2003) 4 LLJ 1034 (Guj), per Rathod J.

79 South India LR Organisation v State of Madras (1954) 1 LLJ 8 (Mad) (DB), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

80 NN Chakravarty v State of Assam AIR 1960 Assam 11 (DB), per Sinha CJ.

81 Kesoram Cotton Mills v Second LC (1963) 1 LLJ 169 [LNIND 1962 CAL 131] (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

82 Brindra Kumar Chaterjee v Reliance Jute Mills Co Ltd (1958) 2 LLJ 67 (Cal) (DB), per Lahiri J.

83 Manager, RD Press v Rajasthan SPK Sangh 1977 Lab IC 1061, 1064 (Raj), per DP Gupta J.

84 SK Burman, Dabur Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 863 [LNIND 1967 SC 214]-65 (SC), per Bhargava J.

85 Bombay Gumasta Union v MR Bhope 1995 Lab IC 2258 (Bom), per AP Shah J.

86 District Motor Workers' Union v State of Haryana (1970) 1 LLJ 607 (P&H), per Balraj Tuli J.

87 Krishnan K v HMT Ltd (2000) 1 LLJ 498 (Ker), per Venkatachala Moorthy J.

88 Schoot Glass India Pvt Ltd v Asst Commissioner of Labour (2000) 2 LLJ 1498 (Guj), per Rathod J.

89 Modern Foundry & Machine Works Ltd v State of Maharashtra (1999) 1 LLJ 1137 (Bom), per Marlapalle J.

90 Bharat Textile Mills v Punjab State 1980 Lab IC 1316 (P&H) (DB), per GC Mittal J.

91 Western India Match Co Ltd v WIMCO Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4]-58 (SC), : AIR 1970 SC 1205 [LNIND 1970 SC 4]: (1970) 1 SCC 225 [LNIND 1970 SC 4] per Shelat J.

92 Raju's Cafe v IT (1951) 1 LLJ 219 [LNIND 1950 MAD 225] (Mad) (DB), per Rajamannar CJ.

93 Ramakrishna Mills Ltd v Govt. of Tamil Nadu (1984) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1984 MAD 23], 266 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

94 Kanti Cotton Mills Ltd v State of Saurashtra AIR 1953 Sau 46 (DB), per Shah CJ.

95 Bombay Union of Journalists v State of Bombay (1964) 1 LLJ 351 [LNIND 1963 SC 305], 354 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

1 Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd v Second Punjab Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 460 [LNIND 1957 SC 1] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

2 Mgmt of Ambala Cantt Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 854, 859-60 (P&H), per Tuli J.

3 Karamchand Thapar & Bros Ltd v Clerical Employees 4 FJR 365, 369 (LAT).

4 ITC Ltd v Govt of Karnataka (1985) 1 LLJ 227 (Kant) : 1984 (2) Kar LJ 252, per Rama Jois J.

5 Navalbhai K Chanhan v Shri Digvijay Woollen Mills Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 101, 108 (Guj) (DB) : 1987 GLH (2) 197 : (1987) 2 GLR 1091 per Majmudar J.

6 G Muthitkrishnan v New Horizon Sugar Mills Pvt Ltd (1980) 1 LLJ 215 [LNIND 1979 MAD 225] (Mad) (FB), per Ramprasada Rao CJ.

7 Mahabir Jute Mills v Shibban Lal Saxena (1975) 2 LLJ 326 [LNIND 1975 SC 239] (5C), per Murtaza Fazal Ali J.

8 Binny Ltd v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 478 [LNIND 1972 SC 117], 484 (5C) : (1972) 3 SCC 806 [LNIND 1972 SC 117] : AIR 1972 SC 1975 [LNIND 1972 SC 117], per Mitter J.

9 Avon Services (Production Agencies) Pvt Ltd v IT (1979) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1978 SC 284] (5) (SC) : AIR 1979 SC 170 [LNIND 1978 SC 284]: (1979) 1 SCC 1 [LNIND 1978 SC 284], per Desai J.

10 R v Nat Bell Liquors Ltd [1922] 2 AC 128, 159, per Lord Summer.

11 HWR Wade, Administrative Law, 1971, 3rd ed.

12 Srikrishna Jute Mills v Government of AP 1977 Lab IC 988 (AP) (DB), per Divan CJ.

13 Shanti Theatres Pvt Ltd, Madras v State of TN [1979] 55 FJR 389, 412, per Padmanabhan J.

14 Mahabir Jute Mills Ltd v Shibban Lal Saxena (1975) 2 LLJ 326 [LNIND 1975 SC 239] (335-6) (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2057 [LNIND 1975 SC 239]: (1975) 2 SCC 818 [LNIND 1975 SC 239], per Murtaza Fazal Ali J.

15 Sultan Singh v State of Haryana (1996) 1 LLJ 879 [LNIND 1995 SC 1290] (SC).

16 Food Corporation of India v CGIT 1996 Lab IC 2287, 2291 (Cal), per Bhattacharjee J.

17 AK Kraipak v Union of India AIR 1970 SC 150 [LNIND 1969 SC 197]: (1969) 2 SCC 262 [LNIND 1969 SC 197] : [1970] 1 SCR 457 [LNIND 1969 SC 197], per Hegde J.

18 Sindhu Resettlement Corporation Ltd. v. Industrial Tribunal of Gujarat. (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 529 [LNIND 1967 SC 267]: [1968] 1 SCR 515 [LNIND 1967 SC 267], per Bhargava J.

19 Central Bank of India v OP Singla (2003) 4 LLJ 796 [LNIND 2003 DEL 692] (Del .), per Mukul Mudgal J.

20 Lokmat Newspapers Ltd. v Commissioner of Labour (2003) 1 LLJ 767 [LNIND 2002 NGP 146] (Bom) : 2003 (97) FLR 36 : 2003 (1) Mh LJ 103 per DD Sinha J.

21 Vithabhai Nana v Bombay Fine Worsted Manufacturers (1955) 1 LLJ 637 (LAT).

22 Inder Singh & Sons v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 89, 92 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

23 Jhagrakhand Collieries Pvt Ltd v CGIT (1960) 2 LLJ 71 [LNIND 1960 SC 41] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

24 Shalimar Works Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 26 [LNIND 1959 SC 108], 31 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1217 [LNIND 1959 SC 108]: [1960] 1 SCR 150 [LNIND 1959 SC 108], per Wanchoo J.

25 Ithad Motor Transport Pvt Ltd v Bir Singh (1974) 2 LLJ 243, 249-53 (Del), per Prithvi Raj J.

26 R Ganeshan v Union of India 1993 Lab IC 802, 806 (Bom), per Ashok Agarwal J.

27 Inder Singh & Sons v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 89, 92 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

28 Western India Match Co v Workmen (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4], 261-65 (SC), per Shelat J.

29 BR Herman & Mohatta (I) Pvt Ltd v Seventh IT 1977 Lab IC (NOC) 13 (Cal) (DB).

30 Ajaib Singh v SCMPS Society Ltd (1999) 2 LLN 674 (SC).

31 Workmen of KGID, Bangalore v Principal IT 1999 (3) LLN 219 (Kant), per Gopala Gowda J.

32 Mahavir Singh v UPSEB, (1999) 3 LLN 872 (SC).

33 Nedungadi Bank Ltd v KP Madhavan Kutty (2000) 2 LLN 21, 24-5 (SC).

34 Gurmail Singh v Principal, Govt College (2000) 1 LLJ 1080 (SC).

35 Mgmt of Indian Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Prahlad Singh (2000) 2 LLJ 1653 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424] (SC), per Patil J.

36 Balbir Singh v Punjab Roadways (2001) 2 LLN 118, 119 (SC).

37 Sapan Kumar Pandit v UPSEB (2001) 2 LLJ 788 [LNIND 2001 SC 1433], 792 (SC), per Thomas J.

38 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 467-8.

39 Assistant Executive Engineer v Shivalinga (2002) 2 LLN 19 (SC).

40 Mangal Singh v PO, Le (2001) 4 LLN 1075 (Del), per Dr Sharma J.

41 LIC of India v JC Biswas (2000) 2 LLJ 1030 [LNIND 2000 SC 1079] (SC), per Patil J.

42 Digambar R Kalaskar v Bank of Maharashtra (2001) 1 LLN 699 (Bom), per Kochar J.

43 Surjit Singh v PO, IT (2001) 3 LLN 318 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

44 Ram Karan v PO, Le (2001) 4 LLN 638 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

45 North-West KRTC v Abdul Salam (2002) 1 LLN 986 (Kant) (DB), per Gururajan J.

46 EE, Construction Divn, v M Ganapathy (2001) 1 LLN 1006 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

47 Hoshiar Singh v PO, LC (2002) 1 LLN 427 (P&H), per Sudhalkar J.

48 Division Forest Officer v Raghuvar (2002) 1 LLN 1245 (Raj), per Keshote J.

49 Cheran Transport Corpn Ltd v PO, LC (2002) 2 LLN 418 (Mad), per Padrnanabhan J.

50 Gujarat SRTC v SP Bhoi (2002) 3 LLN 612 (Guj), per Nandi J.

51 Union of India (thro' GM, Western RIY), v KR Singh (2002) 1 LLN 949 (Bom), per Mhatre J.

52 Union of India v PS Pansora (2002) 1 LLN 844 (Bom), per Kochar J.

53 Mgmt of IISCO Ltd v Prahlad Singh, AIR 2001 SC 69 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424]: (2001) 1 SCC 424 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424] : (2000) I ILLJ 1653 SC : (2001) 1 MLJ 95 [LNIND 2000 SC 1424] (SC).

54 MD, TNPDC Ltd v G Jeelendran (2002) 3 LLN 1197 (Mad), per Jayasirnha Babu J.

55 P Srinivas v IT (2000) 2 LLN 1196 (AP).

56 Mgmt of Aska Coop Society Ltd v State of Orissa (2003) 2 LLJ 1143.

57 Kishori Lal v Opium and Alcoloid Factory (2003) 4 LLJ 788 (MP), per Sapre J.

58 Satyanarain Sharma v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 7 (Raj), per Ms Gyan Sudha Misra J.

59 Rajendra Singh Gehlot v Union of India (2003) 4 LLJ 977 (Raj), per Dr BS Chauhan J.

60 AIR 1959 SC 1217 [LNIND 1959 SC 108]: (1959) II LLJ 26SC : [1960] 1 SCR 150 [LNIND 1959 SC 108].

61 AIR 2000 SC 839 [LNIND 2000 SC 184] (2000) 2 SCC 455 [LNIND 2000 SC 184] : (2000) I LLJ 561SC.

62 AIR 1993 SC 2276 [LNIND 1993 SC 461]: 1993 Lab IC 1672 : 1993 (2) SCALE 974.

63 AIR 1987 SC 2342 [LNIND 1987 SC 711]: (1988) 1 SCC 122 : (1988) I LLJ 370SC : 1988 Lab IC 37.

64 SM Nilajkar v Telecom District Manager, Karnataka AIR 2003 SC 3553 : (2003) 4 SCC 27 : (2003) I ILLJ 359SC, per Lahoti J.

65 Turi RD v Union of India (2006) 4 LLJ 140 (Guj), per SD Dave J.

66 Ludlow Jute and Specialities Ltd v State of West Bengal, (2012) 1 LLJ 567 (Cal .) : 2011 (130) FLR 719.

67 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 470-1.

68 Asst Engineeer, CAD, Kota v Dhan Kunwar AIR 2006 SC 2670 [LNIND 2006 SC 474]: (2006) III LLJ 12SC : (2006) 5 SCC 481 [LNIND 2006 SC 474], per Pasayat J.

69 Karnataka SRTC v Ramesh Babu, (2015) 1 LLJ 149 (Kant) : 2014 (6) Kar LJ 49 : 2015 (145) FLR 10, per Abdul Nazeer J.

70 Mgmt of MCD v Prem Chand Gupta (2000) 1 LLN 358 (SC).

71 Anil Kumar Puri v PO, LC (2000) 4 LLN 605 (SC).

72 Lord Hewart, Not without Prejudice, 1937, p 228.

73 GM, Nanded CCCWRS Ltd v Shankar (2002) 1 LLN 172 (Bom), per Khandeparkar J.

74 India Paper Pulp Co Ltd v India Pulp Workers' Union (1949) 1 LLJ 258 (FC), per Kania CJI.

75 Birla Cotton Spg & Weaving Mills Ltd v Addl IT 16 FJR 152 (Punj), per Mehar Singh J.

76 Krishna Bus Service Pvt Ltd, Delhi v Delhi Administration 1985 Lab IC 1520, 1522 (Del), per Bhandare J.

77 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workers (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 234 (SC), per Gajendergadkar J.

78 Workmen Mysore Paper Mills Ltd v Mgmt, Mysore Paper Mills Ltd 1970 Lab IC 1113, 1116 (Mys) (DB).

79 Mgmt of Mahadev Textile Mills v Addl IT 1976 Lab IC 1284, 1288 (Kant), per Shetty J.

80 Eagle Fashions v Government of NCT of Delhi, 1998 (1) LLN 269 (Del) (DB).

81 Municipal Employees Union v Govt of NCT, Delhi 2001 (2) LLN 328 (Del), per Sen J.

82 Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 311 (LAT).

83 Hotel Imperial New Delhi v Chief Commr, Delhi (1958) 1 LLJ 92 (Punj) (DB).

84 Punjab National Bank Ltd v AN Sen (1952) 1 LLJ 371 (Simla), per Harnam Singh J.

85 Prabhudayal Himatsingka v State of Punjab AIR 1959 Punj 460 (DB), per Grover J.

86 Hotel Imperial New Delhi v Chief Commr, Delhi (1958) 1 LLJ 92 (Punj) (DB).

87 NN Chakravarty v State of Assam AIR 1960 Assam 11 (DB), per Sinha CJ.

88 Kanti Cotton Mills Ltd v State of Saurashtra AIR 1953 Sau 46 (DB), per Shah CJ.

89 Shree Swadeshi Oil Mills v Workmen (1955) LAC 181(LAT).

90 Bijay Cotton Mills Ltd v Employess (1957) 1 LLJ 311 (LAT).

91 Re RBSSN Lakshmanan Chettiar AIR 1950 Mad 835 [LNIND 1949 MAD 13], per Subba Rao J.

1 TD Ramayya Pantulu, IT v Kutty & Rao (Engineers) Ltd (1949) 1 LLJ 13 (Mad) (DB), per Harwill J.

2 Shalimar Works Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 26 [LNIND 1959 SC 108] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

3 Swadeshi Cotton Mills Co Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 419 [LNIND 1961 SC 121] (SC), per Wanchoo J. .

4 Hotel Imperial v Chief Commr, Delhi (1959) 2 LLJ 553 [LNIND 1959 SC 118] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

5 Sheshrao Bhaduji Hatwar v PO First LC (1992) 1 LLJ 672, 673 (Mad) (DB), per Mohta J.

6 Mangalam Publications (India) P Ltd v V Thampy Iype (2007) 1 LLJ 455 (Ker .).

7 National Iron & Steel Co Ltd v State of West Bengal (1967) 2 LLJ 23 [LNIND 1967 SC 10], 28 (SC), per Miner J.

8 National Asphalt Products Construction Co v NM Kothari 1977 Lab IC 1300, 1303 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

9 Steel Authority of India Ltd v HS Employees Union (1998) 1 LLJ 704 [LNIND 1997 CAL 24] (Cal), per Jain J.

10 Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd v Second Punjab Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 46, 465 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

11 Hindustan General Electrical Corpn Ltd v State of Bihar (1965) 2 LLJ 92, 95 (Pat) (DB).

12 Ushodaya Publications Pvt Ltd v Govt of AP 1983 Lab IC 580, 594 (AP) (DB), per Kuppuswami CJ.

13 Vishnu Sadav Bhattacharya v Manager Cycle Industries 1973 Lab IC 396 -97 (MP) (DB), per Raina J.

14 Ibid.

15 Alien Berry & Co Ltd v A Das Gupta AIR 1952 Cal 850 [LNIND 1951 CAL 259], per Bose J.

16 Ushodaya Publications Pvt Ltd v Govt of AP 1983 Lab IC 580, 594 (AP) (DB), per Kuppuswami CJ.

17 North Bihar Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Bihar 1980 Lab IC 669 (Pat) (DB), per Jha J.

18 Workmen of Sri Ranga Vilas Motors Pvt Ltd v Mgmt (1967) 2 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1967 SC 26], 17 (SC), per Sikri J.

19 V Guruviah Naidu & Sons v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 304 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

20 T Abdul Rahiman Sahib v State of Mysore (1967) 1 LLJ 61 -62 (Mys) (DB), per Somnath Ayyar J.

21 Blue Star Ltd v PO, Le (2001) 2 LLN 534 (Pat) (DB).

22 Bangalore Woollen, Cotton & Silk Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 555 [LNIND 1967 SC 274] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 585 [LNIND 1967 SC 273]: [1968] 1 SCR 581 [LNIND 1967 SC 273] per Vaidialingam J.

23 Bengal Provincial Bank Empolyees Assn v Salim M Merchant AIR 1958 Cal 297 [LNIND 1957 CAL 206], per Sinha J.

24 State of Maharashtra v Kamani Employees' Union, 1975 Lab IC 387 [LNIND 1973 SC 171] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

25 Burmah Shell OS & D Co India Ltd v Govt of TN (1976) 2 LLJ 230, 237 (Mad), per Ramanujam J.

26 Jammu and Kashmir Project Construction Corpn Ltd v LC, 1983 Lab IC 257, 260 (J&K), per Kotwal J.

27 Workmen of Sri Ranga Vilas Motors (supra).

28 Workmen of Sri Ranga Vilas Motors v Mgmt (1967) 2 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1967 SC 26], 17 (SC), per Sikri J.

29 Jaslok Hospital & Research Centre v BV Chavan 1983 Lab IC 1100, 1106 (Bom), per Pendse J.

30 Tirupathi Motor Tpt Workers Union v Venkateswara Bus Union 1968 Lab IC 1534 (AP), per Seshachalapthi J.

31 See, notes and comments under s 12(5) of the Act (infra).

32 Ramchandra Abaji Pawar v State of Bombay AIR 1952 Born 293 -94 (DB), per Chagla CJ.

33 Papanasam Labour Union v State of Madras (1959) 1 LLJ 526 [LNIND 1958 MAD 158] (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

34 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

35 Bangalore Woollen, Cotton & Silk Mills Co v Workmen (968) 1 LLJ 555, 556 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

36 Aruna Metal Industries v LC (1960) 2 LLJ 681 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

37 Bangalore Woollen, Cotton & Silk Mills (supra).

38 Hurriladih Coal Co Ltd v G Palit (1964) 1 LLJ 298 (Pat) (DB).

39 Co-operative Mill Societies Union Ltd v State of West Bengal (1958) 2 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1958 CAL 65] (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

40 Titaghur Paper Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 9 [LNIND 1959 SC 92] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

41 Basawan Singh v Rohtas Industries Ltd AIR 1957 Pat 493 (DB), per Kanhaiya Singh J.

42 Standard Coal Co Ltd v SP Varma AIR 1952 Pat 56 (DB).

43 Iyyappen Mills Pvt Ltd v State of Travancore Cochin (1958) 1 LLJ 50 (Ker) (DB), per MS Menon J.

44 Associated Cement Co Ltd v IT AIR 1958 Punj 330, per Gosain J.

45 Gujarat SRTC v Workmen (1999) 4 LLN 998 (Guj), per Balia J.

46 Amin Chand Pyare Lal v Second Punjab IT (1958) 1 LLJ 604 (Punj), per Bishan Narain J.

47 Punjab Distilling Industries Ltd v IT (1958) 2 LLJ 109 (Punj), per Grover J.

48 Arrah Electric Supply Co Ltd v Workmen AIR 1952 Pat 134 (DB), per Ramaswami J.

49 Grahams Trading Co (India) Ltd v Second IT (1963) 2 LLJ 153 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

50 Sendra Bansjora Colliery Co Pvt Ltd v Shantilal M Bhatt (1963) 2 LLJ 331 (Pat) (DB).

51 Pipraich Sugar Mills Ltd v PSM Mazdoor Union (1957) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1956 SC 84] (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

52 Maharaj Weaving Mills v State of Punjab AIR 1958 Punj 210 : 1961 (3) FLR23, (1958) II LLJ 625P&H, per Bishan Narain J.

53 Hamida Match Mfg Co v State of Bhopal AIR 1954 Bhopal 17, per Sathey CJ.

54 Mgmt of Tocklai Experimental Station v State of Assam AIR 1960 Assam 132, per Deka J.

55 Indian Oil Corporation Ltd v PO, IT (1999) 2 LLJ 904 (Gau) (DB), per Biswas J.

56 Suresh Kumar v Union of India (2004) 1 LLJ 53 [LNIND 2003 DEL 535] (Del) : 106 (2003) DLT 254 : 2003 (71) DRJ 742 [LNIND 2003 DEL 535], per Mukul Mudgal J.

57 Electronics Corpn of India Ltd v ECISE Union, AIR 2006 SC 2996 [LNIND 2006 SC 631]: (2006) III LLJ 773SC : (2006) 7 SCC 330 [LNIND 2006 SC 631], per Pasayat J.

58 Bongaigaon Refinery & Petrochemicals Ltd v S Ahmed (2001) 4 LLN 44 (SC).

59 Sanat Kumar Dwivedi v DJSBV Bank Maryadit (2001) 1 LLN 66 (SC).

60 Nagappa H Lamani v Mgmt of Sericulture Deptt (2002) 3 LLN 1026 (Kant), per Rangavitralchar J.

61 Workmen v Oriental Fire & General Insurance Co Ltd (2001) 2 LLN 615 (SC), per Rajendra Babu J.

62 MTNL v UK Bhandari (2001) 2 LLN 902 (Bom) (DB).

63 Famtex Exports (P) Ltd v Govt of Tamil Nadu (2002) 4 LLN 463 (Mad), per Kanagaraj J.

64 International Airports Authority of India v IACW Union AIR 2009 SC 3063 [LNIND 2009 SC 824]: (2009) IV LLJ 31SC : (2009) 13 SCC 374 [LNIND 2009 SC 824], per Raveendran J.

65 Bangalore Metropolitan Tpt Corpn v T V Anandappa AIR 2009 SC (Supp) 1058, per Pasayat J.

66 GM, ONGC v ONGC Contractual Workers Union AIR 2008 SC (Supp) 1994, per Bedi J.

67 State of Madras v CP Sarathy (1953) 1 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1952 SC 84] (SC), per Patanjali Sastri CJI.

68 Western India Match Co v Western India Match Co Workers' Union (1970) 2 LLJ 256 [LNIND 1970 SC 4] (SC), per Shelat J.

69 Jai Bhagwan v Mgmt of Ambaw CCB Ltd 1983 Lab IC 1694 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

70 Swadeshi Cotton Mills Ltd v IT (1961) 2 LLJ 419 [LNIND 1961 SC 121], 424 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

71 Orient Paper Mills Sramik Congress v State of Orissa (1988) 2 LLJ 75, 81 (Ori) (DB), per GB Patnaik J.

72 UK Roller Flour Mill v Industrial Court 1979 Lab IC 45 (Bom) (DB), per Tupule J.

73 Cf, Barium Chemicals Ltd v Co Law Board AIR 1967 SC 295 [LNIND 1966 SC 132], para 26, per Hidayatulah J.

74 Cf, Liversidge v Anderson [1942) AC 206 (HL), per Lord Mcmillan.

75 Modern Foundry & Machine Works Ltd v State of Maharashtra (1999) 1 LLJ 1137 (Bom), per Marlapalle J.

76 Cf, R v Paddington Ex Parte Peachey Property Corpn Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 836, 842 (CA), per Lord Denning MR.

77 Cf, Bombay Union of Journalists v State of Bombay (1964) 1 LLJ 351 [LNIND 1963 SC 305] (Bom), per Gajendragadkar J.

78 Machinder Shivaji v King AIR 1950 FC 129, per Patanjali Sastri J.

79 Cf, King Emperor v Sibnath Banerji 72 LA 241 (PC), per Lord Thankerton.

80 Cf, Commr of Police v Gordhandas Bhanji [1952] SCR. 135, per Vivian Bose J.

81 Steel Authority of India Ltd v Union of India, AIR 2006 SC 3229 [LNIND 2006 SC 772]: (2006) III LLJ 1037SC : (2006) 12 SCC 233 [LNIND 2006 SC 772], per Sinha J.

82 Steel Authority of India Ltd v State of WB, AIR 2009 SC 120 [LNIND 2008 SC 1919]: (2009) I LLJ 241SC : (2008) 14 SCC 589 [LNIND 2008 SC 1919], per Pasayat J.

83 Brijbhushan Yadav v Union of India AIR 2007 SC (supp) 1014, per Sathasivam J.

84 Oshiar Prasad v Mgmt of SCW, BCCL (2015) 1 LLJ 513 (SC), per AM Sapre J.

85 Pratap Singh v State of Punjab (1966) 1 LLJ 458 [LNIND 1963 SC 211] (SC), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

86 Ushodaya Pubn Pvt Ltd v Govt of AP 1983 Lab IC 580, 588 AP (DB), per Kupuswami CJ.

87 Cf, R v Governors of Darlington School [1844] 6 QB 682, 715, per Warrington LJ.

88 Santosh Dattaram Nadkarni v New India Industries Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1988 BOM 109], 396 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

89 RC Cooper v Union of India AIR 1970 SC 564, 644, per Ray J.

90 Rohtas Industries Mazdoor Sangh v State of Bihar 1974 Lab IC 1266, 1271 (Pat) (DB), per Sarwar Ali J.

91 British India Corpn Ltd v IT AIR 1957 SC 354, per Bhagwati J.

92 State of Bihar v DN Ganguli (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1018 [LNIND 1958 SC 92]: [1959] 1 SCR 1191 [LNIND 1958 SC 92], per Gajendragadkar J.

93 Newspapers Ltd v IT (1957) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 28], 8 (SC), per Kapur J.

94 Gouripore Co Ltd v State of WB (1975) 1 LLJ 247, 250 (Cal), per Amiya Kumar Mookerji J.

95 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn (supra).

96 National Engg Industries v State of Rajasthan (1999) 4 LLN 1185, 1199 (SC).

97 Manganese Ore (India) Ltd v Union of India (2001) 4 LLN 249 (Bom), per Gundewar J.

1 Moolchand KR Hospital K Union v Labour Commr (2001) 1 LLN 920 (SC).

2 Maya Export Corpn v Secretary, Labour (2002) 1 LLN 1169 (Del), per Sen J.

3 Genl Secy, ICE Union v India Cements Ltd (1999) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1998 MAD 862] (Mad) (DB), per Shivappa J.

4 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees' Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

5 Mgmt, Sacred Heart Convent High School, v State of Tamil Nadu (1992) 1 LLJ 745 -46 (Mad), per Kanakra J.

6 Hariprasad Shivshanker Shukla v AD Divelkar AIR 1957 SC 121 [LNIND 1956 SC 104], per SK Das J.

7 Pipraich Sugar Mills (supra).

8 Ravikrishna Weaving Mills Pvt Ltd v State of Kerala (1959) 2 LLJ 760 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

9 UP Electric Supply Co Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 528 [LNIND 1971 SC 429] (SC) : AIR 1971 SC 2521 [LNIND 1971 SC 429]: (1971) 3 SCC 495 [LNIND 1971 SC 429], per Mitter J.

10 State of Bombay v KP Krishnan (1960) 2 LLJ 592 [LNIND 1960 SC 125] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

11 Rohtas Industries Mazdoor Sangh v State of Bihar 1974 Lab IC 1266, 1272 (Pat) (DB), per Sarwar Ali J.

12 Workmen of Hercules Insurance Co Ltd v Mgmt, (1961) 1 LLJ 249 [LNIND 1960 SC 322] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

13 Indian Rubber Mfrs Ltd v State of WB 1983 Lab IC NOC 67 (Cal), per Barooah J.

14 Corpn of the City of Mangalore v NS Giri (1991) 1 LLJ 150, 153 (Kant) (DB), per Mohan CJ.

15 Workmen of Seshasayee Paper and Board Ltd v State of TN (1991) 1 LLJ 274 [LNIND 1990 MAD 370], 278 (Mad), per Kanakaraj J.

16 Rashtriya Hair Cutting Saloon v Maharashtra Kamgar Sabha 1991 Lab IC 1539, 1547 (Bom), per Dhanuka J.

17 Amristar Central CCS Ltd v State of Punjab 1982 Lab IC (NOC) 95 (P&H), per Punchhi J.

18 Tarang Theatre v State of Uttar Pradesh 1992 Lab IC 1085 (All), per ML Bhat J.

19 Mgmt, Southern Textile Ltd v United TLA (1983) 1 LLJ 435 [LNIND 1982 MAD 239] (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

20 Chairman, Bank of Cochin v All Kerala BEF 1978 Lab IC 262, 263 (Ker) (DB), per Nambiyar CJ.

21 Ramakrishna Mills Ltd v Govt of Tamil Nadu (1984) 1 LLJ 259, 267 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundram J.

22 Madras District A&GE Union v State of Madras (1964) 2 LLJ 407 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

23 FACT Employees' Assn v Mgmt of FACT Ltd (1983) 1 LLJ 240, 243 (Ker), per Narendran J.

24 Indian Industrial Works Ltd v Engineering Mazdoor Sabha (1955) 2 LLJ 675 (LAT).

25 Indian Airlines v Airlines Cabin Crew Assn (1994) 2 LLJ 587 (Del), per SC Jain J.

26 Co-operative Store Ltd v Ved Prakash Bhambri (1990) 1 LLJ 119, 121 (Del), per Bahri J.

27 Motor Industries Co Ltd v Govt of Karnataka (1989) 1 LLJ 88, 96 (Kant) (DB), per Rama Jois J.

28 Co-operative Store Ltd v Ved Prakash Bhambri (1990) 1 LLJ 119, 121 (Del), per Bahri J.

29 ICI Ltd v NA Kadam 1993 Lab IC 1498, 1508-09 (Bom), per BN Srikrishna J.

30 Spencer & Co Ltd v Third IT 1978 Lab IC 57, 60 (Cal) (DB), per Pyne J.

31 Bombay Port Trust Employees Union v Union of India (1988) 2 LLJ 39, 41 (Bom), per Bharucha J.

32 J Thomas & Co Pvt Ltd v Government of Kerala 1977 Lab IC 1329, 1330 (Ker) (DB), per Eradi J.

33 Employers of Thungabhadra Industries Ltd v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 283 [LNIND 1973 SC 196] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

34 ANZ Grindlays Bank v Union of India, AIR 2006 SC 296 [LNIND 2005 SC 877]: (2005) 12 SCC 738 [LNIND 2005 SC 877] : 2006 (1) ALT 21 (SC), per Mathur J.

35 Karnal LK Sanghatan v Liberty Footwear Co 1990 Lab IC 301 [LNIND 1989 SC 425], 308 (SC), per Jagannatha Shetty J.

36 Goodyear (India) Ltd v IT (1968) 2 LLJ 682, 692-93 (Raj) (DB), per Mehta J.

37 BN Elias & Co Pvt Ltd v GP Mukherjee AIR 1959 Cal 339 [LNIND 1958 CAL 290], per Bachawat J.

38 Kesoram Industries and Cotton Mills Ltd v DCL 1985 Lab IC 5 (NOC) (Cal), per Padma Khastgir J.

39 Mahnga Ram v LAT (1957) 1 LLJ 603 [LNIND 1956 ALL 79] (All) (DB), per Kidwai J.

40 Sundar Lal Saxena v Hindustan Commercial Bank Ltd AIR 1953 All 260 [LNIND 1952 ALL 250] (DB), per Bhargava J.

41 SKG Sugar Ltd v IT (1959) 1 LLJ 420 [LNIND 1958 SC 135] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

42 Hotel Imperial v Chief Commr, Delhi (1958) 1 LLJ 92 (Punj) (DB).

43 Hotel Imperial v Hotel Workers Union (1959) 2 LLJ 553 [LNIND 1959 SC 118], 555 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1214 [LNIND 1959 SC 118]: [1960] 1 SCR 279 [LNIND 1959 SC 118], per Wanchoo J.

44 National Iron and Steel Co Ltd v State of West Bengal (1967) 2 LLJ 23 [LNIND 1967 SC 10], 28 (SC) : [1967] 2 SCR 391 [LNIND 1967 SC 10] : 1967 (14) FLR 356, per Mitter J.

45 Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd v Second Punjab Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 460 [LNIND 1957 SC 1] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

46 A Sundarambal v Government of Goa, Daman and Diu (1989) 1 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1988 SC 341], 65 (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

47 Co-operative Milk Societies Union Ltd v State of WB (1958) 2 LLJ 61 [LNIND 1958 CAL 65] (Cal) : AIR 1958 Cal 373 [LNIND 1958 CAL 65]: (1958) 1 CALLT 56 (HC), per PB Mukharji J.

48 Workmen's Coop Industrial Home Ltd v First IT (1968) 2 LLJ 772, 778 (Cal) (DB) : 72 CWN 669, per Sinha CJ.

49 Rashtriya Khadan MSS Ltd v PO, CGIT 1975 Lab IC 1409, 1422, 1424-26 (MP) (FB).

50 South Arcot CMTS Ltd v Syed Batcha (1964) 1 LLJ 280 [LNIND 1963 MAD 188], 284 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1964 Mad 103 [LNIND 1963 MAD 188], per Venkatadri J.

51 Kasturbanagar CHC Society v Soundra Rajan (1967) 2 LLJ 126 (Mad) : AIR 1968 Mad 67 [LNIND 1966 MAD 121], per Kailasam J.

52 Workmen of Salem CMS for ESM Ltd v Govt of TN (1974) 2 LLJ 385 [LNIND 1973 MAD 284] (Mad) (DB) : (1974) ILR 3 Mad 176, per Veeraswami CJ.

53 Majoor Sahkari Bank Ltd v MN Majumdar (1955) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1955 BOM 78] (Bom) (DB) : AIR 1957 Bom 36 [LNIND 1955 BOM 78]: ILR 1956 Bom 73 [LNIND 1955 BOM 78].

54 Kerala State HWC Society Ltd v State of Kerala (1964) 1 LLJ 559 (Ker) (DB), per MS Menon CJ.

55 Malabar CC Bank Ltd v State of Kerala (1964) 1 LLJ 557, 558 (Ker) (DB), per MS Menon CJ.

56 Gujarat State CLM Bank Ltd v LC (1968) 1 LLJ 670 (Guj) (DB) : (1968) GLR 815, per Bakshi J.

57 Kendriya Sarvodaya Sahkari Sangh Ltd v IT (1967) 1 LLJ 270 [LNIND 1966 RAJ 47] (Raj) (DB) : AIR 1968 Raj 33 [LNIND 1966 RAJ 47], per Ran Singh J.

58 Bhanjanagar CU Bank Ltd v SJ Rao 1974 Lab IC 291, 292 (Ori) (DB), per GK Misra CJ.

59 Co-operative Central Bank Ltd v Addl IT (1969) 2 LLJ 698 [LNIND 1969 SC 152] (SC), AIR 1970 SC 245 [LNIND 1969 SC 152]: (1969) 2 SCC 43 [LNIND 1969 SC 152] per Bhargava J.

60 Allahabad District Cooperative Ltd v Hanuman Dutt Tiwari AIR 1982 SC 120 : (1981) 4 SCC 431.

61 Rajasthan Rajya SSV Union v Judge, IT 1985 Lab IC 1023, 1027 (Raj) (DB), per Kasliwal J.

62 Sahakari Vipnan (Marketing) Sanstha Maryadit v LC 1987 Lab IC 344 (MP) (DB), per Sohani J.

63 Sonepat Co-operative Sugar Mills Ltd v PO, LC 1986 Lab IC 1916 (P&H) (FB), per Prem Chand Jain CJ.

64 Bhopal Co-operative Central Bank v KS Tomar (1998) 3 LLN 829 (MP), per Prasad J.

65 Sagarmal v District SK Bank Ltd (1998) 5 LLN (supp) (SC).

66 Bhuna Coop Sugar Mill Ltd v Mohinder Singh (2000) 4 LLN 413 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhaikar J.

67 Dharappa v Bijapur CMPS Union, AIR 2008 SC 1848, per Raveendran J.

68 MD, NEKSRTC v Devidas M Sadananda, AIR 2006 SC 3273 : (2006) 8 SCC 52 : (2006) 3 LLJ 788 SC, per Kapadia J.

69 Safire Theatre v CWC (1977) 2 LLJ 312 [LNIND 1976 MAD 319] (Mad) (FB), per Kailasam CJ.

70 Bata India Ltd v State of Kerala 1985 Lab IC 687 (Ker), per MP Menon J.

71 Nirchiliya v Mgmt of Safire Theatre, Madras (1991) 1 LLJ 111, 112 (SC).

72 TN Chandra v South India Corpn (Agencies) Ltd, (1992) 1 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1991 MAD 64], 734 (Mad) (DB), per D Raju J.

73 Renamed as the Banking Regulation Act 1949 (Act 10 of 1949).

74 All India Bank Employees' Assn v National IT (1961) 2 LLJ 385 [LNIND 1961 SC 283] (SC), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

75 Daji M Surve v ITC Ltd, Bombay 1991 Lab IC 1157 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

76 Cipla Ltd v MGK Union (2001) 2 LLN 19 (SC).

77 Vividh Kamgar Sabha v Kalyani Steels Ltd (2001) 1 LLN 782 (SC).

78 Mulla's Code of Civil Procedure, 1965, Vol 1, 13th ed, p 41.

79 Wolverhampton NWW Co v Hawkesford [1859] 6 CB (NS) 336, 356. per Willies J.

80 Secretary of State v Mask &-Co 67 LA 222 (PC), per Lord Thankerton.

81 Illuri Subbayya Chetty & Sons v State of Andhra Pradesh AIR 1964 SC 322 [LNIND 1963 SC 336], per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Pabbojan Tea Co v Deputy Commissioner (1967) 2 LLJ 872 [LNIND 1967 SC 237], 878 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 271 [LNIND 1967 SC 236]: [1968] 1 SCR 260 [LNIND 1967 SC 236], per Mitter J.

83 Rajasthan SRTC v Krishna Kant 1995 Lab IC 2241, 2250 (SC), per Jeevan Reddy J.

84 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245, 256 (FC), per Mahajan J.

85 Krishnan v EID and SF Ltd (1964) 1 LLJ 217 [LNIND 1963 MAD 143] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

86 Premier Automobiles Ltd v KS Wadke (1975) 2 LLJ 445 [LNIND 1975 SC 299], 459 (SC), per Untwalia J.

87 K.S.R.T.C. v T.I. Aron (1983) 2 LLJ 300, 303 (Kant), per Sabhahit J, 1983 (1) Karlj 555.

88 Bharat Petroleum Corpn v PE Union (2001) 2 LLN 253 (Bom) (DB), per Srikrishna J.

89 Indian Oil Corporation v Oil Sector Officers' Assn (2001) 2 LLN 326 (Del), per Sen J.

90 Ramesh Chandra Singh v Union of India 1981 Lab IC 781, 786 (All), per Mithal J.

91 Jitendra Nath Biswas v Empire of India & Ceylon Tea Co 1990 Lab IC 308, 311 : AIR 1990 SC 255 [LNIND 1989 SC 369]: (1989) 2 LLJ 572 [LNIND 1989 SC 369] : (1989) 3 SCC 582 [LNIND 1989 SC 369] (SC), per Oza J.

92 Sukhi Ram v State of Haryana 1982 Lab IC 1282, 1287 : (1982) ILR 2 P&H 328 (P&H) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

93 Orissa RTC Ltd v Sachidananda Kanungo 1985 Lab IC 140 (NOC) (Ori), per PC Misra J.

94 Kerala Rubber and Reclaims Ltd v PA Sunny 1989 Lab IC 964, 966 (Ker), per Malimath CJ.

95 Mookan, Major v BM, Southern Roadways Ltd 1989 Lab IC 2246, 2248 : (1991) 1 LLJ 533 (Kant), per Hiremath J.

1 VA Damodaran v EID Parry (I) Ltd 1991 Lab IC 1588 (Mad), per Somasundaram J.

2 Siten Bose v Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd 1980 Lab IC 466, 469 (Cal) (DB), per SM Guha J.

3 Oil India Ltd v Dhirendra Kumar Das 1980 Lab IC 410 (Gau) (DB), per Singh J.

4 Rajasthan SRTC v Krishan Kant 1995 Lab IC 2241, 2249 (SC), per Jeevan Reddy J.

5 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, p 349.

6 Pearlite Lioners (P) Ltd v Manorama Sirsi (2004) 3 SCC 172 [LNIND 2004 SC 23] : 2004 AIR SCW 273.

7 Apollo Tyres Ltd v PS Sebastian AIR 2009 SC 2174 : (2009) 14 SCC 360 : (2010) 1 LLJ 621 [LNIND 2009 SC 1064] (SC).

8 Nizam Sugars Ltd v G Veeraswamy 1996 Lab IC 2022 (AP), per KS Srivastav J.

9 United India Insurance Co Ltd v Paramjit Singh (1995) 1 LLJ 640 -41 (P&H), per NK Sodhi J.

10 Hindustan Lever Ltd v TOM & ACK Union 1996 Lab IC 1446 (Cal), per Basudeva Panigrahi J.

11 Assn of State Road Transport Undertakings v ASRTUE Union 1986 Lab IC 1543 : (1987) 1 LLJ 77 (Del), per Luthra J.

12 Chandrakant T Nikam v Municipal Corpn of Ahmedabad (2002) 1 LLJ 842 [LNIND 2002 SC 103], 847-8 : AIR 2002 SC 997 [LNIND 2002 SC 103]: (2002) 2 SCC 542 [LNIND 2002 SC 103] (SC), per Pattanaik J.

13 K Ponniah v Golden Hills Estates (P) Ltd (1998) 2 LLN 571 (Mad), per Thangaraj J.

14 Motor Industries Co Ltd v Presiding Officer (1998) 3 LLN 244 (Kant), per Mohan Kumar J.

15 Iqbal Singh v PO, LC (2001) 1 LLN 1207 (P&H) (DB), per Sudhalkar J.

16 Government of India (2002), Report of NCL-II, Chap 13, p 46, para 6.99.

17 BS Bharti v IBP Co Ltd AIR 2004 SC 4355 [LNIND 2004 SC 844]: (2004) 3 LLJ 549 [LNIND 2004 SC 844] : (2004) 7 SCC 550 [LNIND 2004 SC 844] (SC), per Hegde J.

18 Rajasthan State Road Transport Corpn v Zakir Hussain 2005 (7) SCC 447 [LNIND 2005 SC 623] : (2005) 3 LLJ 786 [LNIND 2005 SC 623] (SC).

19 State of Haryana v Bikar Singh AIR 2006 SC 2473 [LNIND 2006 SC 200]: (2006) 2 LLJ 754 [LNIND 2006 SC 200] : (2006) 9 SCC 450 [LNIND 2006 SC 200] (SC), per HK Sema J.

20 Chief Engineer, Hydel Project v Ravindra Nath, AIR 2008 SC 1315 [LNIND 2008 SC 160]: (2008) II LLJ 294: (2008) 2 SCC 350 [LNIND 2008 SC 160] (SC), per Sirpurkar J.

21 Rajasthan State Road Transport Corporation v Krishna Kant AIR 1995 SC 1715 [LNIND 1995 SC 618]: AIR 1995 SCW 2683 : (1995) II LLJ 728(SC).

22 RSRTC v Deen Dayal Sharma AIR 2010 SC 2662 [LNINDORD 2010 SC 167]: (2010) 6 SCC 697 [LNINDORD 2010 SC 167] : 2010 (5) SCALE 1 [LNINDORD 2010 SC 167] (SC), per Lodha J.

23 Rameshwar Prasad v State of Bihar (1973) 2 LLJ 15, 22 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

24 Workmen of Sri Ranga Vilas Motors Pvt Ltd v Sri Ranga Vilas Motors Pvt Ltd (1967) 2 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1967 SC 26], 17 (SC), per Sikri J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER III Reference of Disputes to Boards, Courts or Tribunals

[10][S. 10A. Voluntary Reference of Disputes to Arbitration.—

(1) Where any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended and the employer and the workmen agree to refer the dispute to arbitration, they may, at any time before the dispute has been referred under section 10 to a Labour Court or Tribunal or National Tribunal, by a written agreement, refer the dispute to arbitration and the reference shall be to such person or persons (including the presiding officer of a Labour Court or Tribunal or National Tribunal) as an arbitrator or arbitrators as may be specified in the arbitration agreement.

11[(1A) Where an arbitration agreement provides for a reference of the dispute to an even number of arbitrators, the agreement shall provide for the appointment of another person as umpire who shall enter upon the reference, if the arbitrators are equally divided in their opinion, and the award of the umpire shall prevail and shall be deemed to be the arbitration award for the purposes of this Act.]

(2) An arbitration agreement referred to in sub-section (1) shall be in such form and shall be signed by the parties thereto in such manner as may be prescribed.

(3) A copy of the arbitration agreement shall be forwarded to the appropriate government and the conciliation officer and the appropriate government shall, within [12][one month] from the date of the receipt of such copy, publish the same in the Official Gazette.

13[(3A) Where an industrial dispute has been referred to arbitration and the appropriate government is satisfied that the persons making the reference represent the majority of each party, the appropriate government may, within the time referred to in sub-section (3), issue a notification in such manner as may be prescribed; and when any such notification is issued, the employers and workmen who are not parties to the arbitration agreement, but are concerned in the dispute, shall be given an opportunity of presenting their case before the arbitrator or arbitrators.]

(4) The arbitrator or arbitrators shall investigate the dispute and submit to the appropriate government the arbitration award signed by the arbitrator or all the arbitrators, as the case may be.

14[(4A) Where an industrial dispute has been referred to arbitration and a notification has been issued under sub-section (3A), the appropriate government may, by order, prohibit the continuance of any strike or lockout in connection with such dispute which may be in existence on the date of the reference.]

(5) Nothing in the Arbitration Act 1940 (10 of 1940)[15] shall apply to arbitrations under this section.]

LEGISLATION

This section was inserted by s 8 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 and it was enacted with the object of enabling employers and employees to voluntarily refer their disputes to arbitration themselves by a written agreement and for the enforcement of agreements between them, reached otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings.[16] The provisions of the various sub-sections of s 10A and s 17 project a time bound programme from the stage of reference to the culmination of the award. Strict adherence to these provisions is a condition precedent for passing a valid award.[17]

SUB-SECTION (1)

(i) Reference to Arbitrator

The requirements of sub-s (1) are:

(a) there should be an existing or apprehended industrial dispute;

(b) the reference to arbitration should be by a written agreement;

(c) the reference should be made before the dispute has been referred under section 10 to a labour court, an industrial tribunal or national tribunal; and

(d) the names of the person or persons to act as arbitrator or arbitrators must be specified in the arbitration agreement. Such persons may be presiding officers of labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals.

The section is not very clearly worded, but the essential features of its scheme are not in doubt.[18]The first requirement of this section is that there must be an 'industrial dispute' which is in existence or is apprehended. The words 'where any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended' postulate that what is in existence or is apprehended must be an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of s 2(k) of the Act. If the dispute which is existing or apprehended is not an 'industrial dispute' at all, the reference will not be competent.[19] In Sindhu-Hochtief, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the dispute as to what should happen to the undistributed bonus will not fall within the definition of 'industrial dispute' as defined in s 2(k) inasmuch as it would not be a dispute or difference connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour. Hence, even the consent of the parties to the reference of such dispute to arbitration under s 10A could not validate the reference.[20] An agreement, to refer an 'industrial dispute' to an arbitrator under this section, is not a 'settlement' of the dispute as postulated by s 2(p) of the Act, because the dispute subsists after such an agreement and does not come to an end.[21] The scope of the words 'at any time' has been limited by the words that immediately follow, viz, 'before the dispute has been referred under s 10 to a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal'. It follows that after an industrial dispute has been referred to an arbitrator under s 10A, it cannot be validly referred to a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal for adjudication.[22]

The reference of a dispute to arbitration under s 10A can, however, be made even if the conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer are pending or a reference regarding that dispute under s 10(1)(a) or (b) has already been made to a board or a court of inquiry. The wording of this sub-section enables and confers the powers on parties to enter into an arbitration agreement. However, such agreement must be in the prescribed form and must specify the name of the arbitrator or arbitrators and a copy of the arbitration agreement should be forwarded to the 'appropriate government', on receipt of which the 'appropriate government' is required to publish the same in the Official Gazette. It means that all parties interested in the dispute should have notice of reference of the dispute to arbitration and such of them might present their viewpoint to the arbitrator, as choose to do so. The procedure to be followed under s 10A is directory and the government is required to adopt, if it wants to make the award of the arbitrator binding on the parties or persons who have not joined the reference to arbitration. However, sub-s (4) requires that the award has to be submitted to the 'appropriate government'. It is after the parties have named the arbitrator and entered into a written agreement in that behalf that the 'appropriate government' steps in to assist the further proceedings before the named arbitrator.[23] An arbitration agreement which affects the interest of large number of employees could never be a private agreement outside the scope of s 10A, and the non-publication of the arbitration agreement under s 10A(3) would be fatal to the arbitration award.[24]

The arbitrator or arbitrators may be private persons or even the presiding officer of labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals. However, when an industrial dispute is referred to an arbitrator, his jurisdiction to arbitrate on the dispute will be under s 10A and not under s 10 and his award will not be governed by the provisions of the Act relating to the awards of the labour courts or tribunals but will be governed only by the provisions relating to the awards of the industrial arbitrators. However this section will have no application to an arbitration agreement which is not in compliance with the requirements of sub-ss (2) and (3) thereof.[25] On a reference to more than one arbitrator, when there is no provision for an award made by less than all being valid, each one of them must act personally in performance of the duties of his office, as if he were the sole arbitrator, for, as the office is joint, if one refuses or omits to act, the others can make no valid award. Such a provision is, implied, unless a contrary intention is expressed, whenever the arbitration agreement requires that there shall be three arbitrators (as distinguished from merely permitting the appointment of three arbitrators) the award of any two is then binding.[26] For the making of an award it is enough that the arbitrators act together and finally make up their mind and express their decision in writing. This writing must be authenticated by their signatures. The award thus made and signed is complete and final so far as the arbitrators are concerned. The giving of a written notice to either party is not essential to the making of an award.[27]

(ii) Procedure before the Arbitrator

Section 11 lays down that an arbitrator shall follow such procedure as he may think fit. The Madhya Pradesh High Court appears to have misread s 11 in KP Singh,[28] where it observed that s 11 of the Act prescribes the procedure to be followed by a conciliation officer, the board, the court or the tribunal; but leaves the arbitrator to follow his own procedure. The observation is not in accordance with the clear language of sub-s (1). From this observation, the court further deduced that 'that is certainly in consonance with the principles of arbitration...' This observation is not correct as an arbitrator has to follow the same procedure a board, court, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal has to follow. In other words, the arbitrator has to evolve his own procedure in accordance, however, with the rules of natural justice. The law has been correctly stated by another Division Bench of the same High Court in Aftab-e-Jadid, where speaking for the court, CP Sen J said:

> Subject to any limitations contained in the arbitration agreement and to any statutory direction as to the manner in which he has to discharge his duties, an arbitrator may conduct any proceedings in any manner he thinks fit so long as he acts in accordance with the principles of natural justice, equity and good conscience. Though the Arbitrator is not bound by the procedure laid down either in the Civil Procedure Code or by the strict rules of evidence but this does not mean that his procedure might be opposed to natural justice or he must disregard the rules of evidence which are founded on fundamental principles of justice and public policy. An arbitrator is also not bound to reduce the evidence in writing unless the terms of agreement so required.[29]

On the reference having been made to the arbitrator, he has all the powers, the terms of reference, to which both sides are partly, conferred.[30] Before the arbitrator acquires jurisdiction to arbitrate on the industrial dispute referred to it, it is imperative that the mandatory requirements of s 10A must be complied with.

SUB-SECTION (1A): UMPIRE

From a cursory glance of sub-s (1) and sub-s (1A), it would appear that the parties can appoint an even number of arbitrators. Previously there was no provision to resolve the matter if the arbitrators were equally divided in opinion. In such a situation, the parties had to make a reference to an arbitrator over again or to move the government for making a reference under s 10. This difficulty has now been removed by the legislature by the insertion of sub-s (1A), which makes an imperative provision for the appointment of an umpire in case an even number of arbitrators is appointed by the parties. Where in the course of such arbitration, the arbitrators are equally divided in their opinion, the award of the umpire shall prevail and shall be deemed to be the arbitration award for the purposes of this Act.

SUB-SECTION (2): ARBITRATION AGREEMENT—'AS MAY BE PRESCRIBED'

Sub-section (1) requires the arbitration agreement to be in writing and sub-s (2) requires such agreement in the prescribed form and to be signed by the parties thereto in the prescribed manner. Part 2 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 deals with arbitration agreements. Rule 7 prescribes that an arbitration agreement shall be in Form C and also lays down the procedure for its delivery to the authorities mentioned therein and also the requirement of the consent in writing by the arbitrator or arbitrators. The Orissa High Court held that it is not necessary that the arbitration agreement must be in form 'C' and it is sufficient if the requirements of that Rule and form are substantially complied with by the arbitration agreement. Similarly, state governments have prescribed their own corresponding Rules.[31]

SUB-SECTION (3): PUBLICATION OF THE ARBITRATION AGREEMENT

The first part of this provision requires the parties to forward a copy of the arbitration agreement to the appropriate government and the conciliation officer and the second part further requires the appropriate government to publish the agreement in the Official Gazette within 'one month' from the date of the receipt of such copy. In both the cases, the legislature has used the imperative word 'shall'. On the question of the requirement of forwarding the copy of the arbitration agreement to the appropriate government and the conciliation officer, there is complete unanimity of judicial opinion that the requirement is mandatory and its non-compliance will render any arbitration proceedings and award invalid.[32] However, with respect to the second requirement, viz, the publication of the agreement in the Official Gazette within one month from the date of its receipt, there was wide divergence among different High Courts, some holding the provision as mandatory, while others stating that it was merely directory. The cobwebs of confusion were finally cleared by the conclusive pronouncement of the Supreme Court in Karnal LK Sangahtan, in which it was held that the arbitration agreement must be published before the arbitrator considers the merits of the dispute and non-compliance of this requirement would be fatal to the arbitral award. In other words, publication of the arbitration agreement in the Official Gazette is a mandatory condition, non-compliance of which would invalidate the arbitral proceedings and the award while the requirement of publication within a period of one month from the date of the receipt of the agreement by the government is merely directory. According to this holding, the award may be published at any time 'before the arbitrator considers the merits of the case.[33]

SUB-SECTION (3A): EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN WHO ARE NOT PARTIES

This sub-section is introduced by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964, and it provides that even though the government is satisfied that the persons making the reference represents the majority of each party, it may still, within a period of one month, issue a notification with a view to give an opportunity to those employers and workmen who are not parties to the arbitration agreement but are concerned in the dispute, to present their case before the arbitrator or the arbitrators. If the requirements of this section are not complied with, the government will not be able to issue a notification under s 10A(4A) prohibiting the continuance of any strike or lockout which may be in existence on the date of the reference in connection with the dispute under reference. The Madras High Court held that the requirements of this provision are, therefore, mandatory and an award made by the arbitrator where the requirements of this provision have not been complied with, will be rendered invalid.[34] However, a single judge of the Delhi High Court in DCM Clerks, has taken the view that the provisions of this sub-section are not mandatory but they are directory.[35]

SUB-SECTION (4)

(i) Award of Arbitrator

This sub-section empowers the arbitrator to investigate and adjudicate upon the 'industrial dispute' referred to him under the arbitration agreement and then to submit the award signed by him. Such award is also to be published, like any other award under the Act, by the appropriate government within a period of thirty days from the date of its receipt, in accordance with the provisions of s 17 and it is final after being published under s 17(2). An award of the arbitrator which is not published as required by s 17 (1) of the Act, will be incapable of being enforced as postulated by s 17 A and as such will have no force of law. Section 17A makes an award enforceable on the expiry of thirty days from the date of its publication under s 17. Section 18(2) makes an arbitration award, which has become enforceable, binding on the parties to the agreement who referred the dispute to arbitration. Section 18(3) makes the arbitration award, in case where a notification has been issued under sub-s (3A) of s 10A, which has become enforceable, binding not only on all parties to the dispute but also on all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings, the heirs, successors or assigns of the employer and all present and future workmen. Under s 19(3), the arbitral award remains in operation for a period of one year from the date on which it becomes enforceable subject to the powers of the 'appropriate government' to reduce or extend the period of its operation. According to s 19(6), such award further continues to be binding on the parties even after the expiry of the period of its operation under s 19(3) until a period of two months have lapsed from the date on which either of the parties intimates its intention to the other to terminate the award. By fiction of s 20, proceedings before an arbitrator under s 10A are deemed to have commenced on the date of the reference for arbitration and concluded on the date when the award becomes enforceable. Section 21 makes provision for keeping certain matters confidential by the arbitrator. Section 29 makes the breach of any terms of an award, a penal offence. Section 30 provides for penalty in cases of unlawful disclosure of information required to be kept confidential. Section 33C makes provision for recovery of money or computation of any benefit capable of being computed in terms of money, due under an award from the employer.

(ii) Jurisdiction of the Arbitrator

The arbitrator 'functioning within the framework of such agreement of the parties under s 10A of the Act, does not have the status of a statutory arbitrator, though there may be similarities between the two; nor could it be said of him, that he is a court even if some trappings of a court are present, as he lacks the fundamental, inherent judicial power vested by the state in a court. His jurisdiction, based on specific agreement of parties to abide by his decision, is consensual in nature. Reference of an industrial dispute to an arbitrator under s 10A is more or less an ad hoc arrangement to serve a particular purpose as desired by the parties. It may differ from private arbitration simpliciter inasmuch as the reference in terms of the agreement is made by the government by due publication in the Official Gazette, and the award given by him also is to be published in the Official Gazette. In a sense proceedings before him are quasi-judicial in character. Once the award is rendered he becomes functus officio and it will not be competent thereafter for him to consider, or do anything further in relation to the dispute referred to him for adjudication pursuant to the specific agreement in that behalf.[36] If the arbitrator finds that what is referred to him is not an industrial dispute at all, he has no jurisdiction to proceed further with the arbitration proceedings. Sub-section (4) requires the arbitrator or arbitrators to 'investigate the dispute'. This provision, unlike sub-s (4) of s 10, does not talk of the adjudication of any matters 'incidental to' the dispute. Nor sub-s (1) like sub-s (1)(d) of s 10, talks of the reference of 'any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the dispute'. The arbitrator, therefore, has to strictly adjudicate upon the dispute as specifically referred to him by the agreement of the parties and it cannot go into any other matters whether connected with or relevant or incidental to the dispute. Though the provisions of Arbitration Act 1940 do not apply to the proceedings before an industrial arbitrator, the general principles regarding the validity of such arbitrator's award would apply. For instance, where the award can be held to be vitiated on account of the misconduct on the part of the arbitrator or where he exceeds jurisdiction, or does not hear the parties or fails to determine an important question referred to them to be answered, the award will be amenable to judicial review under Art 226 of the Constitution. However, the award of the arbitrator cannot be called in question as a defective award on any procedural ground or that a particular criterion has not been kept in view by the arbitrator. This is so, because the arbitrator has been invested with authority to settle the dispute between the parties on joint agreement between them, so he is well expected to do substantial justice between the parties in giving his award.[37]

The award of an arbitrator under this section is of quasi-judicial character. The question whether such an award should state reasons for its decision, has given rise to conflicting judicial dicta. The Punjab High Court preferred the view that 'the law does not intend to confer on the arbitrator under the Act, uncontrolled and absolute power to make the award completely bare of reasons so as to render it incapable of judicial scrutiny. It was further observed that 'as an arbitrator had to decide a proposal and an opposition, in other words, to determine, a lis, the decision which he had to give could not be devoid of any reference to the mode or manner by which the opinion was formed'.[38] The Madhya Pradesh High Court,[39] has categorically stated that there is an applied statutory obligation on the arbitrator to give reasons in support of the conclusions of fact and law reached by him in the award. Though he is not required to write a lengthy judgment, like a court, he must briefly indicate the working of his mind, ie, the process of reasoning which led him to decide the dispute referred to him. Hence, his failure to state reasons, which is obligatory, would constitute an error of law apparent on the face of the record. In other words, an award not based on any reasons is liable to be quashed. On the other hand, the Patna High Court held that the desirability for giving the grounds on which a decision is based does not ipso facto lead to the conclusion that such grounds must be given in the quasi-judicial decision of an arbitrator, where there is no specific provision in the law itself to that effect. It was further observed that the court or tribunal to which the reference was made would be bound to give reasons for its findings in accordance with the provisions of law. If, however, the parties voluntarily choose a private person, it cannot necessarily follow that such a person also would be bound to give reasons for the decision arrived at by him.[40] A single judge of the Delhi High Court, also held that the award of an industrial arbitrator will not be invalid merely because he has not given the reasons for his decision because there is no provision in the Act, mandatory or directory, that an arbitrator must give reasons for his award.[41]The view of the Patna and the Delhi High Courts does not appear to be correct. No doubt there is no provision in the Act which requires a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal to state reasons for its award. All that s 16(2) requires a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, is that their awards 'shall be in writing and shall be signed by its presiding officer'. Similarly, sub-s (4) of s 10A requires that the award of an industrial arbitrator shall be signed by him. Thus, in either case there is no requirement of stating reasons. However, in both cases, the requirement of stating reasons is implied in order to enable the scrutiny of the judicial review of such awards. It is now well-settled that the award of an industrial arbitrator is amenable to judicial review. In Rohtas Industries, the Supreme Court observed:

> Suffice it is to say, an award under section 10A is not only not invulnerable but more sensitively susceptible to the writ lancet being a quasi-statutory body's decision. The absence of reasons in support of the award will shut-out the judicial scrutiny by making it an inscrutable face of sphinx. [42]

Industrial arbitration is based altogether on different principles and norms and the scope of arbitration is also not like civil arbitration. The analogy of civil arbitration adopted by the Delhi High Court is, therefore, not apposite. The view of the Punjab and the Madhya Pradesh High Courts is correct law. A single judge of the Madras High Court, took the view that a person appointed to arbitrate upon an 'industrial dispute' in the course of conciliation proceedings under s 12(3) will not acquire the status of an arbitrator under s 10A. He will merely be a private arbitrator. Since such an arbitrator will not be governed by the provisions of s 10A, the exclusion of the Arbitration Act under sub-s (5) will not apply to such an arbitrator.[43]In this case, the court had recorded that it was common ground between the parties that the impugned decision was not an award following an arbitration under s 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act.

SUB-SECTION (4A): PROHIBITION OF CONTINUANCE OF STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

This provision corresponds to sub-s (3) of s 10 of the Act. It empowers the government to prohibit the continuance of a strike or lockout, in connection with an industrial dispute, which may be in existence on the date such dispute is referred to arbitration. The only pre-condition to the exercise of this power is that a notification under sub-s (3A) should have been issued. The power is, however, discretionary with the government whether or not to prohibit the continuance of a strike or lockout in the circumstances of each case.[44]

SUB-SECTION (5): EXCLUSION OF THE ARBITRATION ACT

This provision specifically excludes the application of the provisions of the Arbitration Act 1940 (Act 10 of 1940)[45]to the award of an arbitrator under s 10A. The effect of this is that the jurisdiction of the civil courts and the application of other provisions of civil law to the award of industrial arbitrator under s 10A has been barred. In other words, the scheme of this Act does not contemplate a private arbitration outside the Act as a method of resolving an industrial dispute merely because the parties say that the matter will be left for informal arbitration, the agreement cannot be stated to refer the dispute to an arbitration, outside the preview of s 10A.[46] In Hindustan National Glass, the Calcutta High Court held that an application under s 30 of the Arbitration Act challenging the award of an arbitrator under s 10A is not maintainable. The award of an industrial arbitrator is not amenable to any provisions of civil law but it is subject to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act only. Section 17 requires the publication of the award of the arbitrator like the award of any other adjudicatory authority. After such award is published, it is to be dealt with under the same provisions of the Act as the awards of other adjudicatory authorities,viz, a labour court, a tribunal or a national tribunal.[47]

JUDICIAL REVIEW

In Dental Technicians, Lord Goddard CJ stated, 'There is no instance of which I know in the books, where certiorari or prohibition has gone to any arbitrator, except a statutory arbitrator, and a statutory arbitrator is a person to whom, by a statute, the parties must resort'. [48] This dictum gave rise to a conflict of judicial opinion on the question 'whether an arbitrator functioning under s 10A was a statutory arbitrator and whether his decision would be binding on the parties'. The Kerala High Court held that such an arbitrator is not a statutory arbitrator, because s 10A leaves the choice of arbitration and arbitrator to the will of the parties.[49] The same view was taken by the Madras High Court.[50] On the other hand, the High Courts of Bombay,[51] and Patna,[52] held that the arbitrator contemplated by s 10A has all the attributes of a statutory arbitrator. However, in Engineering Mazdoor Sabha, as an obiter, the Supreme Court observed:

> Article 226 under which a writ of certiorari can be issued in an appropriate case is, in a sense wider than Article 136, because the power conferred on the High Court to issue certain writs is not conditioned or limited by the requirement that the said writs can be issued only against the orders of courts or tribunals. Under Article 226(1), an appropriate writ can be issued to any person or authority, including in appropriate cases any government, within the territories prescribed. Therefore, even if the arbitrator appointed under section 10A is not a tribunal under Article 136, in a proper case, a writ may lie against his award under Article 226.[53]

Now, these obiter observations have been accepted as correct law by the Supreme Court in Rohtas, where Krishna Iyer J observed:

> It is legitimate to regard such an arbitrator now as part of the methodology of the sovereign's dispensation of justice, thus falling within the rainbow of statutory tribunals amenable to judicial review...Suffice it to say, an award under section 10A is not only not invulnerable but more sensitively susceptible to the writ lancet being a quasi statutory body's decision. [54]

If, therefore, an arbitrator records findings based on no legal evidence and the findings are either his ipse dixit or based on conjectures and surmises or his findings suffer from additional infirmity of non-application of mind, the award will be quashable being perverse.[55] For a complete understanding of judicial trends, which disclose not only the progressive evolution and consolidation of the law relating to the scope of 'judicial review' of the awards of arbitrators appointed under s 10A, but also of the approbation and reprobation resorted by the later judges of Supreme Court, it is necessary to examine the decisions commencing from Air Corporation, in some detail. In that case, the facts were that the corporation and its employees entered into an agreement whereby the parties agreed under s 10A of IDA to submit their disputes to a committee of arbitration consisting of two representatives each of the corporation and the union with an independent chairman of the status of a High Court judge to be appointed by the government. The agreement provided that a unanimous agreement of the arbitrators would be binding on the parties, but failing such unanimity the decision of the chairman was to be deemed to an award made by a single and sole arbitrator. The government of Bombay appointed Mr Vyas, a retired judge of Bombay High Court as the chairman. During his absence from Bombay, the representatives of the corporation and the union in the committee of arbitrators arrived at a 'unanimous agreement' on all demands except one, which was left to be decided by him; and by a letter addressed to him, the representatives asked him to sign the agreement and declare the award in terms of it. On his return to Bombay, he declined to do so till he had studied the agreement and understood its full implications, more so as he conjectured that the union representatives had brought pressure upon the representatives of the corporation. Thereafter, he and his wife went on an inaugural flight by a 'Boeing' to USA at the invitation of the corporation and accepted substantial hospitality from the corporation. Thereafter, he came to the conclusion that the agreement was vague and proceeded to give 'directions' subject to which the agreement was to be implemented. The union filed a writ petition under Arts. 226 and 227 to set aside the chairman's directions on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to give them, and on the ground that he had disqualified himself as an arbitrator. The High Court rejected the preliminary objection, ie, that there was no jurisdiction to entertain the petition under Art. 227, since the arbitration was that of a private tribunal. Chandrachud J (as he then was), on a consideration of the provisions of ID Act, held that the arbitration contemplated by s 10A had all the essential attributes of statutory arbitration under s 10 of the Act, and assuming that the word 'tribunals' in Art. 227 meant statutory and not private tribunals, an arbitration functioning under s 10A was a statutory tribunal. On this view of the matter, he held that the arbitrator under s 10A was subject to the superintendence of the High Court.[56] He distinguished the English Law as expounded in Dental Technicians, wherein Lord Goddard CJ observed:

> I have never heard of certiorari or prohibition going to an arbitrator...It would be an enormous departure from the law relating to prerogative writs if we were to apply these remedies to an ordinary arbitrator... [57]

Citing the above decision, Chandrachud J of Bombay High Court (as he then was), observed (supra):

> Now, in the first place, it must be remembered that in England, the issue of prerogative writs is largely conditioned by historical reasons. Secondly, the arbitrators against whom the writ was sought in the English case were a purely private body to whom reference was made in pursuance of a clause in the indenture of apprenticeship...The observations contained in the judgment of Lord Goddard, CJ, that a statutory arbitrator is a person to whom by statute the parties must resort cannot be read to mean that in no other case could a tribunal be deemed to be a statutory tribunal. The only question which arose for decision in that case was whether a writ of certiorari or prohibition could lie against what was admittedly a private body of arbitrators and in repelling the argument that it could, the learned Law Lord has mainly relied upon English practice.

In his commentary on the above decision, Seervai observes:

> The misconduct of the chairman was so grave that it is not surprising that the court should have arrived at the result it did and quashed the chairman's direction. It is submitted, however, that the decision that the chairman acting under section 10A, Industrial disputes Act, was a tribunal within the meaning of Article 227, was contrary to the decisions in Bharat Bank Ltd... and in Durga Shankar Mehta,[58]...and it is submitted further that this part of the judgment must be treated as overruled by the Supreme Court in Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles ,[59]... Does a writ of certiorari lie to quash the award of an arbitrator appointed under section 10A, Industrial Disputes Act, that is, an arbitration award as it is called in the Act? The question is not free from difficulty, for the arbitrator under that section derives his authority to act from the consent of parties in the first instance, nor is there any legal obligation on the parties to resort to a private arbitrator. Consequently, a court in India may feel that the decision in the Dental Technicians' case covers an arbitration award. However, the judgments in that case show that the application for a writ of certiorari was there designed as a short-cut to the normal procedure under the English Arbitration Act 1950, by which parties can get an award set aside, or an arbitrator restrained from proceeding with an arbitration. The Indian Arbitration Act 1940, confers similar rights to challenge an award or to restrain an arbitrator from proceeding further. Therefore, persons resorting to private arbitration in England or in India do not bind themselves to accept an award, if it should be fraudulent or in excess of the arbitrator's jurisdiction. And yet, if certiorari does not lie in India, such acceptance must be the result of the combined effect of section 10A(5) and section 17, Industrial Disputes Act, the first of which excludes the application of the Indian Arbitration Act, 1940; and the second of which provides that an award published under that section is not to be called in question by any court in any manner whatsoever... a court would be justified in holding that though arbitration under section 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act is not compulsory, and though the arbitrator derives his authority in the first instance from the consent of parties, section 10A(4) of the Act imposes a legal obligation, and confers a legal authority, on the arbitrator to decide questions affecting the rights of subjects and having the duty to act judicially. The award is to be sent not to the parties but to the appropriate government, which is under an obligation to publish it within thirty days. This view of section 10A(4) is justified by its plain language and harmonises with the whole scheme of the Act which largely assimilates an arbitration award to the award of a court or tribunal constituted under the Act so far as the making, publication and the finality attaching to the award are concerned, as also in the consequences which flow from a failure to carry out the award. It also harmonises with the object for which the Act was enacted, namely, that the settlement of industrial disputes is not a matter, which concerns the parties alone, but is also a matter, which concerns the State and the public. The above considerations show that the writ of certiorari issued in the Air Corporation case, was rightly issued.[60]

In Rajinder Kumar Kindra,[61] the facts were that the dispute relating to the dismissal of a salesman was referred to an arbitrator under s 10A. The arbitrator held that the findings of the inquiry officer were based on no legal evidence and therefore perverse. The management did not ask for an opportunity before the arbitrator to lead evidence afresh before him to substantiate the charges. The arbitrator, having recorded his findings, did not pass an award of reinstatement. In the meantime, he was elevated as a judge of the Delhi High Court. As there was no formal order from him, a second reference was made to a retired additional district and sessions judge, Delhi, as an arbitrator, who found that the dismissal of the workman was based on proved charges, that the inquiry proceedings were not vitiated by violation of the principles of natural justice etc, and passed an award stating that the workman was not entitled to relief. The workman filed a writ petition in the Delhi High Court, which dismissed the matter in limine observing that the matter depends upon assessment of evidence and the court cannot reappraise the same under Art. 226 of the Constitution. The workman appealed to the Supreme Court by special leave. Desai J, having made a solemn declaration to the effect that the court was not re-appreciating the evidence, exactly did that by minutely dissecting, as it were, the enquiry proceedings and other documents to arrive at the conclusion that the enquiry was vitiated. Some of his observations are reproduced below:

> (1) Let it be made absolutely clear...that the only misconduct imputed to the appellant was that he was negligent in keeping the cheque book...There is not a little of evidence in support of the allegation of misappropriation or embezzlement of funds or manipulation of accounts by the appellant...there is absolutely not an iota of evidence which could indicate that the appellant issued any cheques himself or that he aided or abetted someone to issue the bogus cheques (para 9).
>
> (2) Someone so minded to forge the cheque and to withdraw money from some one's account may use anybody's cheque book. In such a situation, the owner of the cheque book unless he had participated in the conspiracy in any manner for facilitating withdrawal of the amount cannot be attributed any misconduct for keeping his cheque book unattended or not in safe custody. Therefore, first limb of charge no 3 can be rejected as per se untenable without anything more (para 10).
>
> (3) Mr Jain contended that once Mr Kakkar came to the conclusion that the appellant was given full opportunity to participate in the domestic enquiry, neither High Court under Art 226 nor this Court under Article 136 can sit in appeal over the findings of the enquiry officer and reappraise the evidence. We have not at all attempted to reappreciate the evidence though in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by section 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 both arbitrator and this Court can reappraise the evidence led in the domestic enquiry and satisfy itself whether the evidence led by the employer established misconduct against the workman.
>
> (4) This court in Workmen of M/s Firestone...,[62] held that since the introduction of section 11A ...the industrial tribunal is now equipped with the powers to reappraise the evidence in the domestic enquiry and satisfy itself whether the said evidence relied upon by the employer establishes the misconduct alleged against the workman. It is equally well settled that the arbitrator appointed under section 10A is comprehended in section 11A.
>
> (5) This court in Gujarat Steel Tubes...,[63] held that an arbitrator appointed under section 10A is comprehended in section 11A and the arbitral reference apart from section 11A is plenary in scope. Therefore, it would be within the jurisdiction both of the arbitrator as well as this Court to reappreciate evidence though it is not necessary to do so in this case.
>
> (6) It is thus well-settled that where the findings of misconduct are based on no legal evidence and the conclusion is one to which no reasonable man would come, the arbitrator appointed under section 10A or this court in appeal under Article 136 can reject such findings as perverse. Holding that the findings are perverse do not constitute reappraisal of evidence, though we would have been perfectly justified in exercise of powers conferred by section 11A to do so. (para 16)

The above decision of Desai J furnishes a classic example of the extent to which judges over-reach themselves in blatant violation of the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court to the contrary. In this connection, it is pertinent to recall the observations of Mahajan J to the effect that the Supreme Court would not constitute itself into a mere 'court of error' and substitute its decision for the determination of a tribuna1.[64] In a subsequent case, the learned judge, as Chief Justice of India, reiterated:

> ...the Constitution having trusted the wisdom and good sense of the Judges of this Court in this matter, that itself is a sufficient safeguard and guarantee that the power will only be used to advance the cause of justice, and that its exercise will be governed by well established principles which govern the exercise of overriding Constitutional power.[65]

Where to place the likes of Desai J, in the legal history of India, which was characterised by an uncompromising approach of eminent judges like Justice Mahajan and others towards maintaining high standards of judicial disposition? However, an arbitrator under this section is not a tribunal' within the meaning of Art. 136 of the Constitution. Likewise, it is not a 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art. 227 of the Constitution.[66] The Madhya Pradesh High Court in MG Panse v SK Sanyal , has expressed the view that after the decision of the Supreme Court in Rohtas Industries, the earlier decision in Engineering Mazdoor Sabha to the effect that an arbitrator functioning under s 10A is not a 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art. 136 of the Constitution, does not now hold the field.[67] The Mysore,[68] the Madhya Pradesh[69] and the Orissa[70] High Courts have taken the view that an arbitration award made under sub-s (4) based on an arbitration agreement which does not comply with the requirements of sub-s (3) will be invalid and unenforceable. However, a Full Bench of the Madras[71] High Court held that the arbitration agreement which does not comply with the requirement of sub-s (3) will not be invalid.

Hence, the award made on the basis of such agreement will be valid. In taking this view, the Full Bench relied on the above Bench decisions of the three High Courts. However, none of those decisions, supports the view of the Full Bench. Apart from relying on these decisions, the Full Bench has not given any reasons of its own. The view of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court is incorrect.

However, all these High Courts appear to have got confused, perhaps in their overenthusiasm, on the question of jurisdiction under Art. 226. An arbitration agreement which does not comply with the requirements of various sub-sections of s 10A cannot be deemed to be an agreement under that section. Sub-section (5) excludes the application of Arbitration Act 1940 only to 'arbitration under this section'. It is obvious that where the mandatory requirements of this section have not been complied with, such agreement cannot be 'under this section'. Where an agreement is not under this section, the application of the Arbitration Act 1940 is not barred. Therefore, arbitration agreement between the parties which does not comply with the requirements of sub-s (3) will not be under s 10 A and shall be governed by the provisions of the Arbitration Act. Hence, a petition under Art. 226 challenging the validity of such arbitration agreement or of an award made under sub-s (4) based on such an agreement, will not be maintainable. The general principles of the validity of an arbitrator's award apply to the award passed by an arbitrator under this section. The award is vitiated if the arbitrator is guilty of misconduct or exceeds his jurisdiction or does not hear the parties or fails to determine an important question referred to him to be answered. However, the award cannot be challenged on any procedural grounds or on the ground that the arbitrator has not kept in view many particular criterion.[72] In CITU, a single judge of MP High Court held that an arbitrator functioning under s 10A is a statutory tribunal, and the question as to the jurisdiction of the High Court to interfere with the award of an arbitrator is no longer res integra.[73] In NS Giri, the facts were: the arbitrator under s 10A passed an award enhancing the age of superannuation of the employees of Mangalore Corporation to 58 years as against the age of 55 years prescribed under the regulations framed under the Karnataka Municipal Corporation Act 1976. The main question was whether the award so made could be given effect to, if it were inconsistent with the statutory provisions governing the service conditions of the employees. The Supreme Court, relying on Marina Hotel,[74] and Hindustan Times,[75] held that an award passed under the ID Act should not be inconsistent with the law laid down by the legislature and, if it were so, it was illegal and could not be enforced. On this view of the matter, the Court upheld the order of the High Court quashing the award of the arbitrator.[76] Where the arbitrator proceeded illegally and decided the dispute on evidence which is not admissible, a ground for interference has been made out.[77]

---

10 Ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 8 (wef 10-3-1957).

11 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 6 (wef 19-12-1964).

12 Subs by Act 36 of 1964, s 6, for "fourteen days" (wef 19-12-1964).

13 Subs by Act 36 of 1964, s 6 (wef 19-12-1964).

14 Ins by Act 36 of 1964, s 6 (wef 19-12-1964).

15 Repealed by the Arbitration and Conciliation Act 1996 (26 of 1996).

16 Gazette of India Extraordinary, dated 21 September 1955, Pt 2, s 2, p 411.

17 Andhra Pradesh Country TCM Federationn v Commr of Labour 1985 Lab IC NOC 3 (AP), per Rama Rao J.

18 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 760 [LNIND 1962 SC 337], 796 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

19 Cf, Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v IT (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268] (SC), per Bhargava J.

20 Sindhu-Hochtief (India) Pvt Ltd v Pratap Dialdas (1968) 2 LLJ 515 (Bom), per Tulzapurkar J.

21 Rasbehary Mohanty v PO, LC (1974) 2 LLJ 222, 226 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

22 North Orissa Workers Union v State of Orissa (1971) 2 LLJ 199 (Ori) (DB), per Patra J.

23 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 760 [LNIND 1962 SC 337] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

24 KM Sangh v GM, Western Coal Fields Ltd (1998) 2 LLN 604 (MP), per Kulshrestha J.

25 Ved Prakash v Ram Narain Goyal 1976 Lab IC 1375, 1377 (Del), per Yogeshwar Dayal J.

26 Russell on Arbitration, 1928, 20th ed, p 234.

27 Janardhanprasad v Chandrashekhar AIR 1951 Nag 198 (DB).

28 KP Singh v Gokhale (1970) 1 LLJ 125, 128 (MP) (DB) : ILR [1972] MP 1016 : 1969 JLJ 449, per Tare J.

29 Aftab-e-Jadid v Bhopal SP Sangh 1985 Lab IC 164 [LNIND 1984 MP 29] (MP) (DB), per CP Sen J.

30 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v Gujarat Steel Tubes Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

31 North Orissa Workers' Union v State of Orissa (1971) 2 LLJ 199 (Ori) (DB), per Patra J.

32 Moorco (I) Ltd v Govt Tamil Nadu 1993 Lab IC 1663, 1664 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram Acg CJ.

33 Karnal Leather Karamchari Sangahtan v Liberty Footwear Co 1989 SCR (3) 1065, per Shetty J.

34 Madras Machine Tools Mfrs v Spl Deputy Commr of Labour 1980 Lab IC 329 [LNIND 1979 MAD 89], 332 (Mad) (DB), per Mohan J.

35 DCM Clerks Assn v Mgmt CW No 1355 of 1981 (Delhi), per HL Anand J.

36 Kerala SRTC v A Kunjukrishna Pillai 1976 Lab IC 541, 543 (Ker), per K Bhaskaran J.

37 Mgmt of National Projects Construction Corpn Ltd v Workmen (1976) 1 LLJ 86 [LNIND 1975 SC 395] (SC), per Alagiriswami J.

38 Rohtak Delhi Transport Pvt Ltd v Risal Singh (1964) 1 LLJ 89, 96 (Punj) (DB).

39 MG Panse v SK Sanyal 1980 Lab IC 524, 526-27 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

40 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 710, 715-16 (Pat) (DB) : AIR 1967 Pat 224, per Dutta J.

41 Mgmt. of Daily Aljamiat v Gopi Nath Aman 1971 Lab IC 1353 (Del), per Avadh Behari Rohatgi J.

42 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Rohtas Industries Staff Union (1976) 1 LLJ 274 [LNIND 1975 SC 523] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 425 [LNIND 1975 SC 523]: (1976) 2 SCC 82 [LNIND 1975 SC 523], per Krishna Iyer J.

43 Estates Staff Union of South India v Commr of Labour (1970) 1 LLJ 94 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

44 For detailed discussion, see, notes and comments under sub-s (3) of s 10.

45 Repealed by the Arbitration and Conciliation Act 1996 (26 of 1996).

46 Spl Officer, TUCS Ltd, v S Laganathan (1986) 2 LLJ 225 [LNIND 1986 MAD 40], 229 (Mad), (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

47 Hindustan NG & IM Union v SN Singh (1982) 1 LLJ 168 (Cal) (DB), per Chittatosh Mookherjee J.

48 Regina v Disputes Committee of Dental Technicians [1953] 1 All ER 327.

49 ATKM Employees'Assn v Musaliar Industries Pvt Ltd (1961) 1 LLJ 81 (Ker), per Velu Pillai J.

50 Anglo-American Direct Tea Trading Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 752 [LNIND 1963 MAD 259] (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

51 Air Corpns Employees' Union v DV Vyas (1962) 1 LLJ 31 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46] (Bom) (DB) : AIR 1962 Bom 274 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46]: 1962 (64) BOMLR 1 : ILR 1962 Bom 292 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46], per Chandrachud J.

52 Rohtas Industries Staff Union v State of Bihar (1962) 2 LLJ 420 (Pat) (DB), per Ramaswami CJ.

53 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 760 [LNIND 1962 SC 337] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 874 [LNIND 1962 SC 337]: 1963 (6) FLR 103, per Gajendragadkar J.

54 Rohtas Industries v Workmen (1976) 1 LLJ 274 [LNIND 1975 SC 523], 279 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 425 [LNIND 1975 SC 523]: (1976) 2 SCC 82 [LNIND 1975 SC 523], per Krishna Iyer J.

55 Rajinder Kumar Kindra v Delhi Administration (1984) 2 LLJ 51 7 (SC), per Desai J.

56 Air Corpn Employees' Union v DV Vyas (1962) 1 LLJ 31 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46] (Bom) : AIR 1962 Bom 274 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46]: ILR 1962 Bom 292 [LNIND 1961 BOM 46], per Chandrachud J.

57 Regina v Disputes Committee of Dental Technicals (1953) 1 ALL ER 327.

58 Durga Shankar Mehta v Thakur Raghuraj Singh AIR 1954 SC 520 [LNIND 1954 SC 97], per Mukherjea J.

59 Engg Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 760 [LNIND 1962 SC 337] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

60 HM Seervai, Constitutional Law of India, 1993, Vol 2, 4th ed, pp 1694-96.

61 Rajinder Kumar Kindra v Delhi Administration (1984) 2 LLJ 517 [LNIND 1984 SC 267] (SC), per Desai J.

62 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Ltd v Mgmt 1973 I LLJ 278 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 430]: (1973) 1 SCC 813 [LNIND 1973 SC 430], per Vaidialingam J.

63 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC), per Iyer J.

64 Bharat Bank Ltd v Workmen (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4], 935-36 (SC), per Mahajan J.

65 Dhakeswari Cotton Mills Ltd v Commissioner of Income-tax AIR 1955 SC 65 [LNIND 1954 SC 149], 69, per Mahajan CJI.

66 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v Hind Cycles Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 760 [LNIND 1962 SC 337] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 874 [LNIND 1962 SC 337]: 1963 (6) FLR 103, per Gajendragadkar J.

67 1980 Lab IC 524,526 (MP) (DB), per GP Singh CJ.

68 Workmen of Madras Woodlands Hotel v KS Rao 42 FJR 223, 226 (Mys) (DB), per Chandrasekhar J.

69 KP Singh v SK Gokhale (1970) 1 LLJ 125, 128 (MP) (DB), per Tare J.

70 Rasbehary Mohanty v LC (1974) 2 LLJ 222, 226 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

71 Ramakrishna Kulwantrai Steels Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1977) 1 LLJ 382 [LNIND 1976 MAD 317], 384 (Mad) (FB), per Ramaswami J.

72 National Projects Construction Corp Ltd v Workmen 1970 Lab IC 907, 913 (Pat) (DB), per Misra CJ.

73 Centre of Indian Trade Unions v State of MP (2002) 2 LLN 256 (MP), per Mishra J.

74 Manna Hotel v Workmen (1961) 21 LLJ 431 (SC).

75 Hindustan Times Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 108 [LNIND 1962 SC 431] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1332 [LNIND 1962 SC 451]: [1964] 1 SCR 234 [LNIND 1962 SC 451].

76 NS Giri v Corporation of City of Mangalore (1999) 3 LLN 388 (SC), per Lahoti J.

77 Eastern Coalfields Ltd v SK Mukhopadhyaya, Arbitrator (2003) 3 LLJ 1082 (Jhar .)(DB)

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

SUB-SECTION (2): 'REFERENCE BY APPLICATION OF PARTIES

Section 10(2) makes it obligatory for the government to make reference of an industrial dispute if the parties to that dispute apply in the prescribed form. The parties to an 'industrial dispute' may make a joint application or they may make separate applications. In any case the government must be approached by the parties by means of an application in the prescribed manner to refer a particular dispute. It is not material whether they approach by a joint application or by separate applications as long as the subject matter of the dispute is the same. The government has to satisfy itself that the persons applying represent the majority of each party. It is only when these two conditions are satisfied that the appropriate government would be bound to refer the dispute.

In Poona Labour Union, a joint application was made by the workmen and the employer to the Deputy Commissioner of Labour, Maharashtra under s 10(2) for referring the dispute for adjudication. The deputy commissioner wanted to make an on the spot inquiry in respect of the aforesaid dispute and asked the union to produce their membership register along with the counterfoils of receipts on a particular day. However, the union wrote back to the deputy commissioner that if there be any doubt about the representative character of the union, the only course would be to hold a secret ballot. In other words, the union wanted their membership register to be accepted as correct for determining the majority of the workmen of the union or in the alternative, the secret ballot to be conducted to ascertain the wishes of the majority of the workmen for the purposes of making the reference. As this request of the union was not acceded to by the deputy commissioner of labour, the union filed a writ petition in the High Court for a writ of mandamus on the ground that it was mandatory for the State Government to refer the dispute to adjudication as soon as the parties applied jointly or separately in the manner prescribed under s 10(2). The court found that though the first condition was satisfied, viz, that the application in the prescribed form had been made but the second condition namely, that the union represented the majority of the workmen was not satisfied. In view of the fact that the Act does not require any rules to be made with respect to the manner in which the appropriate government has to hold an inquiry to satisfy itself that the parties making an application under s 10(2) represent the majority of each part, it is open to the State Government to hold such an inquiry in any manner which is in consonance with principles of natural justice. Therefore, the government was justified to hold an inquiry under r 28A of the Bombay Industrial Relations Rules 1947 for the purpose of ascertaining the membership of the union.[25] Rule 3 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes that the application shall be in form A and shall be accompanied by a statement setting forth:

(a) the parties to the dispute;

(b) the specific matters in dispute;

(c) the total number of workmen employed in an undertaking affected;

(d) an estimate of the number of workmen affected or likely to be affected by the dispute; and

(e) the efforts made by the parties themselves to adjust the dispute.

The rule also prescribes the mode of service of the application. However this rule applies only to a reference under s 10(2) and it does not apply to a reference under s 10(1) of the Act. The parties to an industrial dispute, desiring to have their differences settled by an industrial tribunal, cannot themselves apply to the tribunal, but must move the appropriate government to refer the matter to the tribunal. The government has the power to lay down the scope of the dispute requiring adjudication only in a reference under sub-s (1), but it cannot interfere with the scope, decided by the parties themselves by agreement, in a reference made under this provision. However, by agreeing to a joint application under s 10(2) of the Act, the employer is not estopped from raising a preliminary objection as to the maintainability of a reference, for instance on the ground that what is referred is not an 'industrial dispute' or that the concerned employee is not a 'workman', or that the undertaking is not an 'industry'. An application in form 'A' does not have the effect of depriving a party of the right to raise all objections which the party would have if the reference is under ss 10(1) and 12(5) of the Act. The observation of Bishan Narain J to the effect that 'the employer is not estopped from raising a preliminary objection as to the maintainability of reference' sounds paradoxical. If the employer has even an iota of doubt that what is sought to be referred is not an 'industrial dispute', why should he, in the first instance, be a party to the joint application requesting a reference of the dispute? The very fact that he signed the application along with the union in form 'A' should give rise to the irrebuttable presumption that the employer is of the opinion, and is fully convinced, that there was an industrial dispute which required adjudication and, hence, on the same presumption, he should not be permitted to retract from that position at a later stage. It is not as if the employer had signed the joint application under duress, undue influence or misrepresentation! This part of the decision is manifestly wrong and deserves to be rejected as being without any substance.[26]

Sub-section (2) does not explicitly lay down whether it is open to the parties to choose a particular labour court or an industrial tribunal out of several functioning in the state and approach the appropriate government for reference to that particular labour court or tribunal. However as the overall power is given to the government alone, it appears that it is the government's choice of a particular labour court or tribunal, that matters, and it is not open to the parties to select a particular labour court or tribunal and approach the government that the same be referred to that particular tribunal. The government may, however, accept the proposal of the parties.[27] Jurisdictional objections can always be raised by anyone of the parties, because jurisdiction of the tribunal entirely depends on existence or apprehension of an 'industrial dispute' as defined in the Act.[28] Furthermore, the jurisdiction of the tribunal emanates from the order of reference made by the 'appropriate government'. Hence, if the referring government is not the 'appropriate government', the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate on such a reference. In such cases, the general principle of law is that neither consent nor waiver can be a substitute for jurisdiction and cure the initial want of jurisdiction. The basis of jurisdiction can always be looked into by the tribunal irrespective of the agreement of the parties to make a joint request for reference.[29] In the case of associations or unions, the requirement of majority on both the sides arises but if the dispute is only between an employer and his employees, the requirement of majority with respect to that employer would not arise. Upon an application being made by the parties to refer the dispute and the government being satisfied with respect to the fact that the persons applying to it represent the majority, it is bound to refer the dispute under this sub-section. However, this provision does not entitle anyone of the parties to an 'industrial dispute', to compel the appropriate government to make a reference,[30] because in such a case the reference will not be under s 10(2), it will be only under s 10(1), in which case there is no need of an application, much less in form 'A'. Though the requirement of making an application in the prescribed form, viz, in form A is mandatory for a valid reference under s 10(2) of the Act,[31] a reference under s 10(1) would not be vitiated merely on the ground that an application by one of the parties in form 'A' was not made.[32]

SUB-SECTION (2)(A): SPECIFYING THE PERIOD OF ADJUDICATION

Period of Adjudication

This sub-section has been inserted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982. It requires the appropriate government to specify the period in the order of reference of an industrial dispute, to a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, within which it should submit its award on the dispute to the appropriate government. From the language of this provision, it is evident that no uniform period has been fixed by the legislature for adjudication of all sorts of disputes. It has, advisedly, been left to the discretion of the appropriate government to specify the period of adjudication, taking into account the nature and incidence of each particular dispute. In other words, the appropriate government has the discretion to fix the period of adjudication in each case. The procedure for submitting the award has been prescribed in sub-rr (10) and (11) of r 10B of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. No doubt this provision, subject to the discretion of the adjudicator, will ensure time bound adjudication. However, these tribunals have their own physical limitations and constraints of time. Apart from making the adjudication time-bound, it is necessary for the government to consider increasing the number of these tribunals, commensurate with the workload on them. Otherwise, the pious hopes raised by this provision will end in disappointment. The Industrial Disputes Act is a piece of social welfare and beneficial legislation aimed at amelioration of hardships of the working class by providing the machinery for resolving their grievances by settlement and failing that, by compulsory adjudication expeditiously. The purpose will be frustrated if the adjudication gets enmeshed in litigative marshes. In HD Singh, the court deprecated the tendency of employers to stifle the efforts of the workmen in their legitimate claims seeking benefits under the industrial law by tiring them out in adjudication proceedings raising technical and hyper-technical pleas and dragging industrial adjudication for years together on such pleas. The court counselled the employers to meet the case of the employees squarely on merits and get them adjudicated quickly for ensuring industrial peace and contended labour and exhorted the labour to reciprocate to prevent industrial unrest.[33]

In a public interest litigation, the Delhi High Court directed the Central Government to constitute, for the time being, one more industrial tribunal and two more labour courts for the Union Territory of Delhi to deal with large number of arrears and pending references with further recommendation that the government should look into this aspect in greater depth and it may itself feel impelled to constitute even larger number of labour courts and industrial tribunals consistent with the actual requirements and needs.[34] In this case, the court noticed the startling number of applications and references pending before the labour courts and the industrial tribunals which were escalating with terrific speed. In view of such a heavy work load, making the adjudication of references time-bound is a contradiction in terms and nothing more than an eyewash. Similar situations may not be denied in the other states of the country as well. It is, therefore, imperative to increase the number of adjudicatory tribunals commensurate with the work load.

First Proviso*: Disputes of Individual Workmen

This proviso carves out an exception to sub-s (2A). Here the legislature itself has fixed the maximum uniform period of three months with respect to industrial disputes connected with individual workmen. It takes away the discretion of the appropriate government to fix the period of adjudication in the order of reference. The maximum period of adjudication with respect to disputes referred to adjudication under s 2A will be three months by virtue of this proviso. Likewise, the maximum period of adjudication of the disputes which are connected with individual workmen though not comprehended in s 2A, have partaken the character of industrial dispute under s 2(k) on being espoused by workmen or unions, is also three months. Apart from the disputes relating to discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of the service of an individual workman as comprehended in s 2A, this proviso also takes the disputes connected with individual workmen relating to their service such as suspension, leave and transfer etc; when espoused by trade unions or substantial number of fellow workmen.

Second Proviso*: Extension of the Period

This proviso further gives discretion to an adjudicator to extend the period fixed by the appropriate government or by the first proviso, for such further period as he may think fit in two circumstances, viz, (1) when the parties to the dispute whether jointly or separately apply in the form prescribed by the relevant rules under the Act for extension of such period; or (2) for any other reason. Even in the absence of any application by the parties for extension of time, an adjudicator has been given suo motu power to extend the time for 'any other reason'. However, the adjudicator is required to record his reason for such extension in writing. This makes the order of the adjudicator reviewable. In other words, the High Court in its writ jurisdiction under Arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution can scrutinise the legality and validity of the order on the grounds of justifiability of the reasons recorded by the adjudicator. If the extension of period is for extraneous, irrelevant or non-germane reasons, the order extending the period will be subject to quashing on certiorari.

Third Proviso*: Exclusion of the Period of Injunctions

In reckoning the period of adjudication under this sub-section, if the proceedings before an adjudicator have been stayed by an injunction or an order of a civil court, the period of operation of the stay shall not be taken into account. For instance, if the period of adjudication specified in the order of reference is one year and the proceedings before the adjudicator are injuncted by a civil court or a writ court by a stay order after three months for adjudication and the injunction of the stay continues to operate for a period of three years, before the matter comes back to the tribunal, the period of three years during which the injunction or stay remained operative, will not be taken into account and the computation of the period specified in the order of reference will be as if only three months had expired.

Fourth Proviso*: Abatement of Proceedings

This proviso makes it clear that any proceedings pending before an adjudicatory authority, shall not abate merely on the ground that the period specified in the order of reference under this sub-section has expired. From this it would appear that the requirements of a definite period is not mandatory but it is merely directory.[35] This proviso must be read with the second proviso which vests the discretion in the adjudicator to extend the period of adjudication. This proviso makes it clear that in cases where the period specified in the order of reference expires before the order of extension is made by the tribunal either on application of the parties or suo motu, the proceedings will not abate. From the language of this proviso it further appears that even if the order of the adjudicator extending the period for adjudication is quashed by a writ court, still the proceedings will not abate. It will be open to the adjudicator to sustain the extension on valid reasons or to extend the further period on valid and justifiable reasons. The second and the fourth provisos put together takes much of the wind out of the sail of the main section, if not make it entirely illusory. The requirements of the main section appear merely to be directory, not mandatory particularly so when no penalty has been provided for its non-compliance or breaches.[36]

SUB-SECTION (3): PROHIBITION TO CONTINUANCE OF STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

Prohibition to continuance after making the Order of Reference

The Act prohibits the commencement and continuance of strikes and lockouts in certain circumstances for achieving its object, viz, the investigation and settlement of 'industrial disputes' in a peaceful atmosphere. Section 10(3) and s 10A(4A) empowers the appropriate government to prohibit the continuance of strikes. The pre-conditions to the exercise of the power under this sub-section are:

(i) an 'industrial' dispute should have been referred to a board, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal under section 10 or arbitrator under section l0A ; and,

(ii) on the date of the reference there should be a strike or lockout in existence in connection with such dispute.

When these two conditions are existing, the appropriate government has the power to prohibit by order the continuance of such strike or lockout. The words 'the appropriate government may by order', indicate that unless the appropriate government makes the prohibitory order, the strike or lockout will not be automatically prohibited. The power, therefore, has to be exercised by the government in its discretion. The effect of this sub-section is that even though a strike or lockout when commenced was legal, it would become illegal if continued after the prohibitory order under s 10(3) has been made. In a case where there is a number of demands, if the government refers all the demands to a tribunal for adjudication, it derives its powers to prohibit a strike or a lockout which was resorted to in connection with the points of dispute referred for adjudication.[37] The words 'which may be in existence on the date of reference' refer to 'any strike or lock-out' and not to 'such dispute'. However, the Delhi High Court in Edward Keventers, took the view that if out of the number of demands only some are referred for adjudication, the continuance of the strike can be prohibited only regarding the disputes which have been referred for adjudication, the prohibition of the continuance of the strike with respect to the matters which have not been referred to adjudication is not warranted by sub-s (3) of s 10 of the Act. From the language of the statute, viz, sub-s (3), it is obvious that the question of the existence of an industrial dispute is irrelevant to the exercise of power under this sub-section. What is material is the existence of a strike or a lockout. The court has correctly noticed that the words 'such dispute' in the sub-section 'indicate an industrial dispute mentioned in the earlier part, namely, an industrial dispute referred to a board, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal under this section'. However, the premises that 'in order to invoke sub-s (3) of s 10, it would also have to be shown that such a dispute was in existence on the date of reference' and that for exercising the power in sub-s (3), it is necessary that 'the industrial dispute had been referred to the authority concerned under the section and the dispute was such as was in existence on the date of reference', are not warranted by the language or the grammar of the statute.[38] The use of the words in the judgment 'that the dispute was such as was in existence on the date of reference' indicates that the High Court has substituted the word 'as' for the word 'which' after the words 'such dispute'. The word 'which' occurring in the phrase 'which may be in existence on the date of reference' does not refer to the words 'such dispute', but it refers to the words 'any strike or lockout'. In other words, the power of the government is to prohibit the continuance of 'any strike or lockout...which may be in existence on the date of the reference'. If the purpose of the legislature was to connect 'such dispute' with the words 'may be in existence' on the date of reference, then the qualifying words should have been 'as' instead of the word 'which'. Grammatically the word 'which' connects the words, 'may be in existence on the date of reference' with the words 'any strike or lockout and not with the words, 'such dispute'. A priori, the further conclusion of the High Court that 'likewise the sub-section would not apply if some disputes were in existence on the date of reference but the same has not been referred to a board, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal' is also not correct as it is not warranted by the plain language of the statute. According to Maxwell:

> A statute is to be expounded according to its obvious meaning. In other words, unless the language is ambiguous in its literal sense or leads to any absurdity, repugnancy or inconsistency with the other provisions of the statute, the ordinary and natural sense of the words cannot be departed from as the words of the statute in such cases, best declares the intention of the statute.[39]

It is well-settled that the meaning which words ought to be understood to bear is not to be ascertained by any process akin to speculation and the primary duty of a court is to find the natural meaning of the words used in the context in which they occur...to give a literal meaning to the language used by Parliament unless the language is ambiguous or, its literal sense gives rise to an anomaly or, results in something which would defeat the purpose of the Act.[40] In this case the language of the statute is quite clear and unambiguous and the ordinary and normal meanings do not lead to any absurdity or repugnancy or inconsistency with any provisions of the Act. On the other hand, the construction put on the words of the section by the High Court in using the word 'as' for the word 'which' after the words 'such dispute' leads to an absurdity.[41] Strike, as contemplated under s 10(3), is to be treated as whole, it cannot be said that there are separate and concurrent strikes relating to each one of the demands raised by the workmen. The result of this holding is that if some demands out of the total number of demands are referred under s 10(1), the 'appropriate government' will be empowered only to prohibit the strike with respect to those demands which have been referred and it will not be empowered to prohibit the strike for the demands which have not been referred. If that be so, the purpose of sub-s (3) would be defeated by including in the charter of demands some frivolous or unreferable demands which the government will not refer and it would become impossible to prohibit the continuance of a strike with respect to such frivolous or unreferable demands consequently rendering the provisions of sub-s (3) otiose. The holding of the High Court is also repugnant to the provisions of s 23, which prohibits the commencement of strikes or lockouts during the pendency of the proceedings and the ban on commencement of strike is complete. It will be, therefore, illogical that though a strike during the pendency of adjudicatory proceedings of an 'industrial dispute', cannot be commenced whether it relates to the matters under reference or un-referred matters, but with respect to the matters which have not been referred, it can be continued according to the interpretation of sub-s (3) by the High Court. This will further be repugnant to the object of the Act itself which seeks to investigate and settle industrial disputes in peaceful and harmonious atmosphere by securing industrial peace. If the strike commenced before the reference can be continued on the ground that some of the demands have not been referred, the object and purpose of s 10(3) to achieve a peaceful atmosphere during adjudicatory or arbitral proceedings will be frustrated. This decision, therefore, does not propound correct law. In appeal, the Supreme Court reproduced the text of s 10(3), instead of construing the language of the statute, it had nevertheless gone on a tangent observing: 'this stands to reason and justice and a demand which is suppressed by a prohibitory order and is not allowed to be ventilated for adjudication before a tribunal will explode into industrial unrest and run contrary to the policy of industrial jurisprudence'.[42] The court took the illustration of a situation where out of 20 demands in a charter of demands, the appropriate government referred only one demand for adjudication and posed the question to itself as to how can this result in the anomalous situation of the workmen being deprived of their basic right to go on strike be supportive of those 19 demands'? In posing this question the court appears to have lost sight of the clear language of the statute which prohibits only the 'continuance' of any strike in connection with the dispute which has been referred. It does not prescribe the right of the workmen to go on strike subsequently in connection with the disputes which were not referred.

On a true construction of s 10(3), the position of law is that when there is a strike in connection with a number of demands some of which have been referred to adjudication to an adjudicatory authority, the government has the right to prohibit the continuance of the strike by invoking that provision. When the strike was commenced, it was in connection with the demands in dispute. After the reference of some of the demands for adjudication, the strike does not cease to be in connection with the referred disputes. This gives the right to the government to prohibit continuance of the strike. However, after the prohibition of the continuance of the strike in existence at the time of the reference, the workmen may commence a fresh strike in connection with the demands which have not been referred to adjudication, after complying with the requirements of s s 22 and 23 of the ID Act. The Patna High Court held that where the strike or lockout is not in connection with any dispute referred for adjudication, but is itself the subject-matter of a dispute, it would not attract the provisions of s 10(3), and it would not justify an order of prohibition under the said sub-section.[43] The words 'in continuation of any strike or lockout in connection with such dispute which may be in existence on the date of the reference', have to be read with reference to the facts of each particular case. The words 'in connection with' mean 'concerning' such dispute or 'relating to' such dispute. It also means 'with reference to' such dispute. These words seem to be significantly wide. The connection of the dispute and the strike or lockout may be direct or indirect or even remote. Whether the order of prohibition of the continuance of any strike or lockout relates to the dispute or has reference to the dispute, directly or indirectly, are questions which have to be decided on the facts and circumstances of each case.[44] In order that the strike or lockout may be 'in connection with' a dispute, it is necessary that the strike or lockout should be something different from the dispute itself. Therefore, an order prohibiting a strike or lockout can only be made where such strike or lockout is in connection with a dispute, which should be, in order that the strike or lockout might be in its connection, something different from the strike or lockout itself. On this construction of s 10(3), the Rajasthan High Court[45] has taken the view that a strike or lockout which is the subject-matter of the dispute itself, cannot be termed to be a strike or lockout in connection with such dispute. Hence, a strike or lockout, which is itself in dispute, would not justify an order under s 10(3) for its prohibition.

In other words, unless the government makes the order there is no statutory bar on the continuance of strike or lockout. The Kerala High Court was of the view that the power exercised under s 10(3) is a quasi-judicial power and an order thereunder could not be passed without giving a reasonable opportunity to all those who would be affected by the order to state and establish their case.[46] As against this, the High Courts of Delhi,[47] Andhra Pradesh,[48] Karnataka,[49] and Bombay,[50] held that it was not necessary for the government to issue a show cause notice to the parties before passing an order prohibiting the strike and lockouts under this provision. The latter view lays down the correct law, whereas the Kerala High Court is clearly wrong. In Birla Tyres, the appropriate government invoked s 10(3) and issued an order prohibiting the strike, which was followed by a letter from the Labour Commissioner to the union to refrain from strike and threatening legal action under r 20 of Trade Union Rules in the event of failure on the part of the union. Quashing the order of the government and the communication of the Labour Commissioner, Mahapatra J (for self and Gopala Gowda J) held that no reference of an industrial dispute was made under s 10, and that in the absence of a reference, the order prohibiting strike was illegal and could not be sustained.[51] Where the branch of a company was closed, the prosecution launched by the government, on the ground that the company had declared a lockout in contravention of the order passed under s 10(3), was illegal and liable to be quashed in view of the fact that the labour court in its award did not record a finding to the effect that it was a case of lockout.[52]

Constitutional Validity of sub-section (3)

The discretion of the government under sub-s (3) is not un-channelled or arbitrary because it provides for the exercise of the discretion for attaining the objects of the Act which are the settlement of industrial disputes, the promotion of industrial peace, maintenance of production and benefit to the community in general. It cannot be assumed that the 'appropriate government' will abuse its power even though the power is wide and is to be exercised in its discretion. In view of the objects of the Act, the discretion vested in the 'appropriate government' cannot be said to be unfettered and uncontrolled because to make the exercise of the powers justiciable will defeat the very purpose of it. While giving the power to the 'appropriate government' to prohibit the continuance of the strikes and lock-outs, the legislature could not have foreseen every contingency or situation that would arise and to specifically enumerate such contingencies in the Act itself. Though the statute cannot be struck down, the abuse of power, whenever occurs, would be liable to be struck down.[53]

SUB-SECTION (4): JURISDICTION OF ADJUDICATORY AUTHORITIES

This sub-section delineates the perimeter of the jurisdiction of the adjudicatory authorities under the Act, viz, the labour court, the industrial tribunal or the national tribunal to adjudicate. These authorities, hereinafter will be compendiously referred to as 'the tribunal'. The word 'jurisdiction' means authority to decide,[54]or the 'legal authority of a court to do certain things'. In the context of the Industrial Disputes Act, the word 'jurisdiction' may be used in three senses viz:

(i) the jurisdiction by Constitution of the tribunal or the qualifications of the presiding officer;

(ii) local jurisdiction of the tribunal; or

(iii) the jurisdiction with respect to the subject-matter of the dispute. In this sense of the word 'jurisdiction', the tribunal may have power to entertain a dispute, though in another sense, it may be said that it has exceeded its power in granting a relief which it was not authorised to grant.[55]

An industrial tribunal is the statutory creation, viz, the Industrial Disputes Act. Hence its jurisdiction is confined by the Act, and it follows that the tribunal will have no jurisdiction, to adjudicate upon any dispute or lis to which the Act does not apply. The jurisdiction of the tribunal has further been limited by the provisions of s 10(4) to confine its adjudication to 'the points specified in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto'. In United Commercial Bank, Kania CJI observed:

> Nor can consent give a court jurisdiction if a condition which goes to the root of the jurisdiction has not been performed or fulfilled. No appearance or consent can give a jurisdiction to a court of limited jurisdiction which it does not possess...The absence of a condition necessary to find the jurisdiction to make the award or give a decision deprives the award or decision of any conclusive effect. The distinction clearly is between the jurisdiction to decide matter and the ambit of the matters to be heard by a tribunal having jurisdiction to deal with the same. ... When however the question is of jurisdiction of the tribunal to make the award...no question of acquiescence or consent can affect the decision.[56]

The mere fact that an objection was not taken before the tribunal, would not give it jurisdiction if it had no inherent jurisdiction.

Constitution of the Tribunal

If the tribunal is not properly constituted or the presiding officer does not possess the requisite qualifications under ss 7, 7A or 7B or suffers from any of the disqualifications enumerated in s 7C, he will have no jurisdiction to proceed with the adjudication of an 'industrial dispute', even though such an 'industrial dispute' has been referred to him by the 'appropriate government' or the Central Government.

Local Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of the tribunal emanates from the order of reference. A reference for adjudication to a labour court or industrial tribunal can be made by the 'appropriate government'. Therefore if, the subject-matter of the dispute does not lie within the local limits of the state government which makes the reference or the cause of action not arising within its territories, the reference will not be competent and the tribunal constituted by such a state government will not be competent to adjudicate upon such a reference.

Adjudicatory Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of the tribunal to adjudicate upon an industrial dispute referred to it may be conveniently dealt with under the following heads:

(i) Industrial adjudication

(ii) Subject matter

Industrial Adjudication

(i) General Principles

Once a reference has been properly made to an adjudicatory authority, the dispute has to be resolved by it and adjudication cannot be avoided on the ground that the workman failed to pursue another remedy. The adjudicator cannot refuse to adjudicate upon the dispute and surrender its jurisdiction to some other authority. Though the appropriate government has jurisdiction to refer or not to refer a dispute for adjudication, the adjudicator to whom the dispute has been referred has no discretion to decide whether to adjudicate or not.[57]In the words of Mahajan J, 'the expression "adjudication" implies that the tribunal is to act as a judge of the dispute; in other words, it sits as a court of justice and does not occupy the chair of an administrator. It is pertinent to point out that the tribunal is not given any executive or administrative powers'.[58] However, the scope of adjudication by a tribunal under the Act, is much wider and also in view of the increasing complexity of modern life and the interdependence of the various sectors of a planned national economy, it is obviously in the interest of the public that labour disputes should be peacefully and quickly settled within the framework of the Act rather than resort to methods of direct action which are only too well calculated to disturb the public peace and order and diminish production in the country and the court should not be astute to discover formal defects and technical flaws to overthrow settlement.[59]

The task of an industrial adjudicator is indeed tedious. He has to reconcile the head-on dash between the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution such as freedom of trade, freedom to practice any profession or to carry on any occupation and the Directive Principles enshrined in the Constitution which are fundamental in the governance of the country. In addition he has the delicate task of balancing the conflicting interests of employer, employee and the public on basic policies such as freedom and sanctity of contract, protection of business, right to work, making training available to employees, earning of livelihood for oneself and family, utilisation of one's skill and talent, continued productivity, betterment of one's status, avoidance of one's becoming a public charge, encouragement of competition and development of national and international trade and avoidance of monopoly, promotion of collective bargaining and elimination of indiscipline in industry and so on. The adjudication by the industrial adjudicators under the Act is only an alternative form of settlement of industrial disputes on a fair and just basis.[60] The Constitution has vested the powers of judicial review in the High Courts and invested the Supreme Court with power to sit in appeal over the awards of industrial tribunals, 'which are founded on somewhat hazy background of maintenance of industrial peace, which secures the prosperity of the industry and improvement of conditions of the workmen employed in the industry'.[61] Industrial adjudication has also necessarily to be aware of the current socio-economic thought around; it must recognise that in a modern welfare state, healthy industrial relations are matters of paramount importance and its essential function is to assist the state by helping in the solution of industrial disputes which constitute a distinct and persistent phenomenon of modern industrialised state.[62] In the language of Krishna Iyer J:

> Industrial jurisprudence does not brook nice nuances and torturesome technicalities to stand in the way of just solutions reached in a rough and ready manner…Grim and grimy life-situations have no time for the finer manners of elegant jurisprudence.[63]

The ultimate object of industrial adjudication is to help the growth and progress of national economy and it is with that ultimate object in view that industrial disputes are settled by industrial adjudication on principles of fair-play and justice.[64]The provisions of this Act confer wide powers and jurisdiction upon the adjudicatory authorities to make appropriate awards in determining industrial disputes brought before them. In the interest of social justice and with a view to securing peace and harmony between the employer and his workmen, industrial adjudication may impose new obligations or abolish the old ones or alter or modify the terms and conditions of employment, if it is thought fit and necessary to do so.[65] Speaking for the federal court, on the scope and powers of industrial adjudication in Western India Automobile Assn, Mahajan J observed:

> Adjudication does not, in our opinion, mean adjudication according to strict law of master and servant. The award of the tribunal may contain provisions for settlement of a dispute which no court could order if it was bound by ordinary law but the tribunal is not fettered in any way by these limitations.[66]

In other words in deciding industrial disputes, the jurisdiction of an industrial adjudicator is not confined to administration of justice strictly according to law.[67] but it can confer rights and privileges on either party which it considers reasonable and proper, though they may not be within the terms of any existing agreement. Therefore the tribunal, has not merely to interpret or give effect to the contractual obligations between the parties which it considers essential for keeping industrial peace,[68] but its jurisdiction is much wider and can be reasonably exercised with the object of keeping industrial peace and progress.[69] This holding in Western India Automobile Assn was reverberated by the Supreme Court in Bharat Bank, in which Mukherjee J observed:

> In settling the disputes between the employers and the workmen, the function of the tribunal is not confined to administration of justice in accordance with law. It can confer rights and privileges on either party which it considers reasonable and proper, though they may not be within the terms of any existing agreement, It has not merely to interpret or give effect to the contractual rights and obligations of the parties. It can create new rights and obligations between them which it considers essential for keeping industrial peace. [70]

In Rohtas Industries, SK Das J held:

> A court of law proceeds on the footing that no power exists in the courts to make contracts for people; and the parties must make their own contracts. The courts reach their limit of power when they enforce contracts which the parties have made. An industrial tribunal in not so fettered and may create new obligations or modify contracts in the interests of industrial peace, to protect legitimate trade union activities and to prevent unfair practice or victimisation.[71]

Now in Premier Automobiles, Untwalia J pointed out:

> ...the powers of the authorities deciding industrial disputes under the Act are very extensive-much wider than the powers of a civil court, while adjudicating a dispute which may be an industrial dispute. The labour courts and the tribunals to whom industrial disputes are referred by the appropriate government under section 10 can create new contracts, lay down new industrial policy for industrial peace, order reinstatement of dismissed workmen, which ordinarily a civil court could not do.[72]

These dicta of the federal court and the Supreme Court are based on the celebrated statement of law by Ludwig Teller to the following effect:

> ...industrial arbitration may involve the extension of an existing agreement, or the making of a new one, or in general the creation of new obligations or modifications of old ones, while commercial arbitration generally concerns itself with interpretation of existing obligations and disputes relating to existing agreements.[73]

This principle enunciating the scope of industrial adjudication has since been followed and adopted by the courts in the field of industrial adjudication in India.[74] The industrial adjudicators therefore, are to adjudicate upon the disputes between the employers and their workmen and in the course of such adjudication, they must determine the 'rights' and 'wrongs' of the claims made, and in doing so they are undoubtedly free to apply the principles of justice, equity and good conscience, without attaching undue importance to legal technicalities and keeping in view, the further principle that their jurisdiction is invoked, not for the enforcement of mere contractual obligations but for preventing labour practices regarded as unfair and for restoring industrial peace on the basis of collective bargaining.[75] It is for this reason that the industrial tribunals are armed with extraordinary powers and have been entrusted with duty of adjudicating disputes of a peculiar character. Therefore, the rights of an employer to hire labour, to dismiss the employees, to fix wages, dearness allowance, bonus and gratuity, to grant leave facilities, housing accommodation and other amenities have been controlled and regulated by well-recognised limits placed upon the contractual rights of the employers by the industrial adjudication. Therefore, industrial adjudication is always a matter of making adjustment between the two competing claims.[76] But, howsoever wide or flexible the scope of industrial adjudication and the power of the adjudicator may be, it cannot exercise arbitrary jurisdiction.[77] No doubt, an industrial adjudicator can substitute a new contract if it is essential for industrial peace, but 'it would be arrogating too much power if the tribunal were to make an award altering a statutory provision'.[78] Therefore the industrial adjudication has to proceed on the basis of certain broad guidelines. The powers of the tribunals are derived from the statutes, which lay down the rules of the game and the tribunal has to decide according to these rules. The powers conferred upon the tribunal have the sanction of law behind it and are not exercisable by reason of discretion vested in it.[79] The exercise of discretion itself means that something is to be done according to rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion but according to law and not humour. It cannot be arbitrary, vague and fanciful but must be legal and regular.[80] The tribunal cannot also ignore altogether the existing obligations without any rhyme or reason.[81] In New Maneckchowk, Wanchoo J observed:

> There is no doubt, therefore, that it is open to an industrial court in an appropriate case to impose new obligations on the parties before it or modify contracts in the interests of industrial peace or give awards which may have the effect of extending existing agreement or making a new one. This, however, does not mean that an industrial court can do anything and everything when dealing with an industrial dispute. This power is conditioned by the subject-matter with which it is dealing and also by the existing industrial law and it would not be open to it while dealing with a particular matter before it to overlook the industrial law relating to that matter as laid down by the legislature or by this court.[82]

In these matters, there are no absolutes and no formula can be evolved which would invariably give answer to different problems which may be posed in different cases on different facts. In the branch of law relating to industrial relations, in the words of Shah J 'the temptation to be crusaders instead of adjudicators must be firmly resisted'.[83] It cannot be too strongly stated and reinstated that every industrial dispute depends upon its own peculiar circumstances. In sailing across the sea of industrial adjudication, more ships of justice have gone down for failure to sense the treacherous reefs of generality than for any other reason. 'In order that industrial adjudication should be completely free from the tyranny of dogmas or the sub-conscious pressures of preconceived notions, it is of utmost importance that the temptation to lay down broad principles should be avoided'.[84] For, 'vague and indefinite directions instead of fostering harmony, are likely to open up vistas for future bickerings and disputes in their implementation'.[85] The approach of industrial adjudication, has to be necessarily pragmatic, and the tests which it applies and the considerations on which it relies would vary from case to case and would not admit of any rigid or inflexible formula. In attempting to solve industrial disputes, industrial adjudication is generally to be reluctant to lay down any hard and fast rules or adopt any test of general or universal application.[86] It should, therefore, refrain from enunciating any general principles or adopting any doctrinaire consideration,[87] and should avoid formulating and adopting abstract generalisations.[88] Das Gupta J observed:

> Nor can the tests and the principles that have been laid down be applied mechanically or by way of syllogism. A mechanical or syllogistic approach may appear to furnish the easiest way of solving a complicated problem, but the allurement of the easy way has to be resisted. For, while such ways are beset with risks of errors in all branches of law, they are even more unsafe and inexpedient in industrial law, where sensitive problems of human relations have to be solved in the mist of all the complexities of modern industrial organisation. That is why in applying the well-settled tests and principles on these problems, we have to bear in mind that while all tests that are possible of application should be applied, the value and importance to be attached to individual tests will vary according to the nature of the industrial activities and according to the nature of the disputes in which the problem has arisen, viz, whether it is in respect of lay-off, retrenchment, production bonus, profit bonus or something else.[89]

The tribunals, therefore, should not decide abstract question of law,[90] nor should they be unduly influenced by academic questions of law, but should make an attempt to deal with the merits of each case according to its facts and circumstances.[91] While adjudicating a dispute, the tribunal is not vested with the power to decide whether any statutory provision is intra virus or otherwise. The question whether there was a rationale or logic in making the provision is not to be examined by the tribunal, and cannot be done by It.[92] In Delhi Cloth Mills, speaking of the futility of precedent in the field of industrial adjudication, Shah J said thus:

> We consider it right to observe that in adjudication of industrial disputes settled legal principles have little play; the awards made by industrial tribunal are often the result of ad hoc determination of disputed questions, and each determination forms a precedent for determination of other disputes. An attempt to search for principle from the law built up on those precedents is a futile exercise. To the courts accustomed to apply settled principles to facts determined by the application of the judicial process, an essay into the unsurveyed expanses of the law of industrial relations with neither a compass nor a guide, but only the pillars of precedents is disheartening experience...and even generally in the settlement of disputes arising out of industrial relations, there are no fixed principles, on the application of which the problems arising before the Tribunal or the Courts may be determined and often precedents of cases determined ad hoc are utilised to build up claims or to resist them. It would, in the circumstances, be futile to attempt to reduce the grounds of the decisions given by the Industrial Tribunals, the Labour Appellate Tribunals and the High Courts to the dimensions of any recognised principle.[1]

An industrial tribunal is not a court of general or residuary jurisdiction but a tribunal with specific jurisdiction enumerated by the terms of the orders of reference. In other words, it is an ad hoc tribunal with ad hoc jurisdiction to determine specific industrial disputes.[2] It should not base its conclusions on some airy view of what it considers would be a good thing for workmen.[3] In other words, the tribunal has to confine itself to the pleadings and the issues arising therefrom and it is, therefore, not open to it to fly off at a tangent, with disregard to the pleadings and thus, reach any conclusion that it considers as just and proper.[4] It is 'desirable that industrial adjudication should deal with problems as and when they arise and confine its decision to the points which strictly arise on the pleadings between the parties'.[5] Therefore, the best course to adopt in dealing with an industrial dispute is to consider the facts of the case, the nature of the demand made by employees, the nature of the defence raised by the employer and decide the dispute without unduly enlarging the scope of the inquiry. Care must be taken not to evolve large principles which may affect the facts and circumstances which are not before the tribunal or which would tend to prejudice issues not directly raised in the case under adjudication.[6] If in the decision of the dispute, some working principles have to be evolved, that must be done.[7] Nevertheless, it may not be irrelevant to point out that in avoiding generalisations

(however commendable), the guidance afforded by the statute through its own dictionary cannot be ignored.[8] In HD Singh, the Supreme Court remorsefully deprecated the practice of the employers to stifle the efforts of the workmen in their legitimate claims seeking benefits under the industrial law by tiring them out in adjudication proceedings, raising technical and hyper-technical pleas and thus, dragging on litigation for years on such pleas. The court counselled the employers to meet the case of the, workmen squarely on merits and get them adjudicated quickly. It also advised the employers to achieve industrial peace by evolving a contented labour and the workmen should reciprocate to prevent industrial unrest. [9] The primary duty of the industrial tribunal is to establish peace in the industry between the employer and workmen but while settling an industrial dispute with a view to establishing industrial peace, it should not lose sight of the interest of the industry. Any settlement of a dispute ignoring the interest of the industry is likely to have far-reaching and detrimental effects on the workmen themselves.[10]

During the past half century, industrial adjudication in India, has served remarkably well. It is a striking testimony to the work, not only of those who framed the legislation, but also and to a greater degree, of the industrial tribunal, labour appellate tribunal, High Court and in particular, the Supreme Court whose duty it has been to interpret and apply it. Refusing to lay down general principles because it has always conceived its function to be the adjudication of issues properly before it for decision and confining its judgment to the facts and circumstances calling for its intervention in the dispute of the parties. The industrial adjudication has maintained a steady adherence to the determination of the law in its application to particular facts, avoiding political or equally vague or ill-defined standards, unaffected by considerations characterised as 'dynamic', yet contriving to a remarkable degree, to infuse common sense and practical considerations into its decisions. Some topics relating to tribunal jurisdiction which have not been dealt with elsewhere in the book are being dealt with under the following heads:

(a) Employer's Right of Management

On the right of an employer to organise and carry on his business in any manner he likes, the following words of Hidayatullah J in Ghatge and Patil, are noteworthy:

> A person must be considered free to so arrange his business that he avoids a regulatory law and its penal consequences which he has without the arrangement, no proper means of obeying. This, of course he can do only so long as he does not break that or any other law.[11]

In Parry & Co, Shelat J observed:

> It is well-established that it is within the managerial discretion of an employer to organise and arrange his business in the manner he considers best. So long as that is done bona fide it is not competent to the tribunal to question its propriety...it is for the employer to decide whether a particular policy in running his business will be profitable, economic or convenient and we know of no provision in the industrial law which confers any power on the tribunal to inquire into such a decision so long as it is not actuated by any consideration of victimisation or any such unfair labour practice.[12]

Acting bona fide means that the organisation or reorganisation should not be affected with the ulterior object of victimising his employees so as to get rid of their services which would not otherwise be permissible or possible. If an employer remaining within the four corners of law and acting bona fide organises or reorganises his business, an industrial adjudicator will have no jurisdiction to interfere with his policy. In Hathisingh, it was held that permitting the tribunal to exercise jurisdiction to inquire into the prudence of the employer or foresight displayed by him in organising or reorganising his business, will be fraught with danger or unreasonableness or unfairness to the employer. It may infringe the fundamental right of the employer to carry on his business.[13]

(b) Modifying Terms of Contract

As already pointed out, industrial arbitration may involve the extension of an existing agreement or the making of a new one or in general the creation of new obligations or modification of old ones.[14] In Bombay Labour Union, Wanchoo J held:

> It is too late in the day now to stress the absolute freedom of an employer to impose any condition which he likes on labour. It is always open to industrial adjudication to consider the conditions of employment of labour and to vary them if it is found necessary…unless the employer can justify an extraordinary condition by reason, which carry conviction.[15]

The terms and conditions of a contract between the employer and an employee can, however, be interfered with by a tribunal only when it is found necessary in the interest of social justice or exigencies of the situation. The tribunal cannot indiscriminately interfere with contracts.[16] In other words, the jurisdiction of the tribunal is hedged in by the requirements of social justice. In Orissa Cement, the Supreme Court upheld the requirement of a condition in the contract requiring that a wireman should take the examination qualifying him to be a wireman.[17]

(c) Disputes covered by Standing Orders

The question whether an 'industrial dispute' can be raised in respect of the matters covered by the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 arose in Bangalore WCS Mills.[18] Addressing the question, the court held that there was no warrant for holding that merely because the Standing Orders Act is self-contained statute, the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal, to adjudicate upon the matters covered by the Standing Orders, has been abridged or taken away in any manner. It will always be open in a proper case for the union to raise an 'industrial dispute', and if such a dispute is referred by the government, concerned for adjudication, the industrial tribunal will have jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the same.

(d) Disputes relating to Service Conditions of Government Employees

In State of Bihar, it was held that the powers under Art 309 did not affect the jurisdiction of a properly constituted tribunal to adjudicate in relation to an industrial dispute between the government servants and the state, and the industrial tribunal was not precluded from adjudicating an industrial dispute which might have an impact either direct or indirect on the service conditions of persons serving in the union or the state.[19]

(e) Jurisdiction to give Relief

Under this Act, tribunals have full powers to adjudicate upon all matters in dispute between the employers and workmen and give adequate relief. For instance, where the dispute is with respect to the termination of service of a workman, the tribunal has the jurisdiction to award reinstatement and back-wages if the termination is found to be wrongful.[20] Industrial adjudication is not adjudication according to the strict law of master and servant but unlike commercial adjudication, it may involve extension of an existing agreement or making of a new one as long as it is within the scope of the reference.[21] Therefore, the tribunals have given the relief of reinstatement, bonus, gratuity, provident fund, wages, dearness allowance and various other allowances, amenities and facilities in the course of industrial adjudication of variegated industrial disputes. The industrial tribunals intended to adjudicate industrial disputes between the management and workmen, settle them, and pass effective awards in such a way that industrial peace between the employers and the employees may be maintained so that there can be more production to benefit all concerned. For the above purpose, the industrial tribunals, as far as practicable, should not be constrained by the formal rules of law and should avoid inability to arrive at an effective award to meet justice in a particular dispute.[22] But a tribunal cannot grant relief not claimed by workmen.[23] Likewise, it will have no jurisdiction to award relief in excess of the demand of workmen.[24] Nor can it grant relief with respect to disputes not referred to it because 'it cannot proceed to adjudicate disputes not referred'.[25] On the other hand, the tribunal cannot deprive the workmen of the benefits which they were entitled to, in making an award under the pre-existing arrangement and place them in a worse position than before the award particularly, when the employer did not want any change in their favour.[26]

Once a reference is made by the government under s 10(1)(c), it is the duty of the labour court to answer the reference and not to dismiss the same in default or for non-prosecution. If the workman has not produced any evidence or has not filed the claim statement, it is open to the labour court to decline the reference by passing an appropriate order.[27] A labour court cannot refuse adjudication of the dispute on the ground that the reference was defective and not happily worded.[28] It is not competent for the tribunal to arrive at a finding that the reference is not maintainable only because a settlement had been arrived at with another union, more so, when the said settlement was arrived at under s 18(1) and not s 18(3). In terms of s 18, the minority union is also entitled to raise a dispute.[29] In KGID, a single judge of Karnataka High Court held that, in a reference made by the government even if the points of dispute are very vague and suffer from ambiguity, it is the statutory duty of the tribunal to find out the exact dispute between the parties and adjudicate the same.[30] The tribunal has power to refuse reinstatement notwithstanding violation of s 25F and award only compensation.[31] Where, during the pendency of an adjudication proceeding relating to the transfer of 22 employees to various places, another employee was transferred by the management, he can approach the tribunal under the original reference.[32] The provisions of LIC of India (Staff) Regulations 1960 which provide for appeal and review of disciplinary actions taken against the employees of the corporation cannot be said to bar the jurisdiction of industrial tribunal from adjudicating the industrial dispute.[33]

(ii) Social Justice in Industrial Adjudication

According to Holmes J, social justice is 'an inarticulate major premise which is personal and individual to every court and every judge'. In Muir Mills Ltd, Bhagwati J speaking for the Supreme Court held that the concept of social justice does not emanate from the fanciful notions of any particular adjudicator but must be founded on a more solid foundation.[34] This view was reverberated by Vivian Bose J, in JK Iron.[35] In the same strain SK Das J observed that '...social justice does not mean that reason and fairness must always yield to the convenience of a party—convenience of the employee at the cost of employer as in this case—in an adjudication proceeding. Such one-sided or partial view is really next-of-kin to caprice or humor.[36]

Gajendragadkar J persistently emphasised that social and economic justice is the ultimate ideal of industrial adjudication,[37] and that social and economic justice has been given a place of pride in our Constitution.[38] In the words of Hidayatullah J, Social justice is not based on contractual relations and is not to be enforced on the principles of contract of service. It is something outside these principles, and is invoked to do justice without a contract to back it.[39] In JK Cotton, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> In our opinion, the argument that the considerations of social justice are irrelevant and untenable in dealing with industrial disputes, has to be rejected without any hesitation. The development of industrial law during the last decade and several decisions of this court in dealing with industrial matters have emphasised the relevance, validity and significance of the doctrine of social justice...Indeed, the concept of social justice has now become such an integral part of industrial law that it would be idle for any party to suggest that industrial adjudication can or should ignore the claims of social justice in dealing with industrial disputes. The concept of social justice is not narrow, or one-sided, or pedantic, and is not confined to industrial adjudication alone. Its sweep is comprehensive. It is founded on the basic idea of socio-economic equality and its aim is to assist the removal of socio-economic disparities and inequalities; nevertheless, in dealing with industrial matters, it does not adopt a doctrinaire approach and refuses to yield blindly to abstract notions, but adopts a realistic and pragmatic approach. It, therefore, endeavors to resolve the competing claims of employers and employees by finding solution which is just and fair to both parties with the object of establishing harmony between capital and labour, and good relationship. [40]

In Ahmedabad Mfg, Dua J said:

> This concept of social justice has a comprehensive sweep and it is neither pedantic nor one-sided but is founded on socio-economic equality. It demands a realistic and pragmatic approach for resolving the controversy between capital and labour by weighing it on an even scale with the consciousness that industrial operations in modern times have become complex and complicated and for the efficient and successful functioning of an industry various amenities for those working in it are deemed as essential for a peaceful and healthy atmosphere. [41]

Thus, though industrial adjudication cannot and should not ignore the claims of social justice—a concept based on socio-economic equality—it has to resolve the conflicting claims of employers and employees by finding not one sided but a fair and just solution.[42] In Burmah Shell, Hegde J observed:

> Social security for the weaker sections of our nation is of utmost importance: but then we cannot forget the limitations under which we are living. While we should not forget our social goals, our purpose may be defeated if we do not approach our problems in a pragmatic way. It is one thing to settle a dispute by agreement, which affects only the interests of the parties to the agreement; it is a quite different thing for this court to lay down a rule which will have a wider application. [43]

However, in Indian Express, Krishna Iyer J has rather emotively suggested a go-by to pragmatism in the following words:

> Industrial jurisprudence is not static, rigid or textually cold but dynamic burgeoning and warm with life. It answers in emphatic negative the biblical interrogation. 'What men is there of you whom if his son asks bread will give him a stone'? The Industrial Tribunals of India in areas unoccupied by precise block letter law, go by the Constitutional mandate of social justice in the claims of the 'little people'.[44]

Then, in Basti Sugar Mills, the same learned judge spoke in the same strain thus:

> Social justice is made of rugged stuff...Where social justice is the touchstone where industrial peace is the goal where the weak and the strong negotiate to reach workable formulae unruffled by the rigidities and formalisms of the law of contracts, it is impermissible to frown down the fair bonus agreement reached by the representatives of both camps and accepted by the employees in entirety...labour law is rough hewn and social justice sings a different tune. [45]

(iii) Jurisdiction on Remand

The jurisdiction of the tribunal on remand will depend on the order of remand. The High Court in writ proceedings or the Supreme Court in appeal under Art 136 of the Constitution may order a de novo adjudication of the reference or the remand may be for a limited purpose. This point is illustrated in 'Western India Vegetable Products.[46]

(iv) Distinction in Jurisdiction under Section 10(4) and Section 33C(2)

There is an important distinction between a reference under s 10(4), and the proceedings under s 33C(2) of the Act. In a reference under s 10(4), the tribunal is required to confine its adjudication to the points in dispute and also matters incidental thereto. Therefore, while in a reference under s 10, the tribunal or the labour court may adjudicate upon matters connected with the dispute or associated with the dispute, in proceedings under s 33C(2), the jurisdiction of the labour court is confined to compute in terms of money, any benefit due to the workmen or the amount at which the benefit claimed by them should be computed. The legislature has not given to the labour court the Jurisdiction to adjudicate upon matters incidental to the claim made by the workmen for any money or benefit due to them under s 33C(2). Therefore, the labour court cannot go into incidental matters under s 33C(2). For instance, in s 33C(2) proceedings, the labour court cannot enlarge the scope of its inquiry and proceed to adjudicate on the question of closure, the question of enforceability of the terms of settlement, the question whether the transferor or the transferee of an undertaking is liable and also the question whether the claim of the workmen could be enforced against the transferee.[47]Where industrial disputes arise between the employees acting collectively and their employers in the manner prescribed by the Act, such disputes can be resolved only by adjudication on a reference under s 10 and cannot be brought within the purview of s 33G. Similarly, with regard to the fact that the policy of the legislature in enacting s 33C is to provide a speedy remedy to the individual workman to enforce or execute his existing rights, the case of existing rights of individual workman has to be dealt with under s 33C(2).[48]

(v) Res judicata

The doctrine of res judicata is codified in s 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It means that if by any judgment or order any matter in issue has been directly and explicitly decided, the decision operates as res judicata and bars the trial of an identical issue in subsequent proceedings between the same parties. This principle also comes into play when by such judgment and order a decision of a particular issue is implicit in it, that is, it must be deemed to have been necessarily decided by implication. Explanation 4 to that section gives further recognition to the rule of constructive res judicata. In situations where the principle of direct res judicata would not apply, the rule of constructive res judicata may bar the subsequent proceedings. In other words, when any matter which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence or attack in a former proceeding but was not so made, then such a matter to avoid multiplicity of litigation and to bring about finality in it, is deemed to have been constructively in issue in the eye of law, and, therefore, is taken as decided. Section 11 generally comes into play in relation to civil suits. It is, however, not exhaustive. Apart from codified law, the principle of res judicata has been applied in various other kinds of proceedings and situations by courts in England and in India and other countries.[49] In Nawab Hussain, the Supreme Court dilated upon the doctrine of res judicata as under:

> The principle of estoppel per rem judicatam is a rule of evidence. As has been stated in Marginson v Blackburn Borough Council [1939] 2 KB 426, 437 it may be said to be "the broader rule of evidence which prohibits the reassertion of a cause of action". This doctrine is based on two theories: (i) The finality and conclusiveness of judicial decisions for the final termination of disputes in the general interest of community as a matter of public policy, and (ii) the interest of the individual that he should be protected from multiplication of litigation. It, therefore, serves not only a public but also a private purpose by obstructing the reopening of matters which have once been adjudicated upon. It is thus not permissible to obtain a second judgment for the same civil relief on the same cause of action, for otherwise the spirit of contentiousness may give rise to conflicting judgments of equal authority, lead to multiplicity of actions and bring the administration of justice into disrepute. It is the cause of action which gives rise to an action, and that is why it is necessary for the courts to recognise that a cause of action which results in a judgment must lose its identity and vitality and merge in the judgment when pronounced. It cannot therefore survive the judgment, or give rise to another cause of action on the same facts. This is what is known as the general principle of res judicata.[50]

There is a diffused spectrum of judicial dicta dealing with various aspects of the application of the principle of res judicata to the orders and awards of the industrial adjudicators. Section 19(3) provides that an award of an industrial adjudicator remains operative for a period of one year from the date on which it becomes enforceable. Then, it can be terminated by any party bound by it by giving a notice as required by s 19(6). But unlike the decree or order of a civil court, the industrial award is not perpetual and conclusive as it is limited to the duration for which it remains effective and in force under s 19 of the Act.[51] It continues to be binding on the parties only as long as an award remains in operation. There is, thus, a statutory bar to the reference of an industrial dispute which is the subject-matter of an operative award. In such cases, the question of application of the principle of res judicata does not arise. But there is no provision in the Act indicating as to when and under what circumstances the subject-matter covered by an industrial award can be validly referred for adjudication again after the termination of such award; whether an award given on a matter in controversy between the parties after its termination in terms of s 19(6) after the expiry of the period of one year as postulated by s 19(3) would operate as res judicata to a subsequent reference of the same matter for adjudication or, whether the tribunal has no option when such a matter is again referred to it for adjudication but to proceed to try it de novo, traverse the ground again and come to a fresh decision.

In Burn and Co, dealing with these questions, the Supreme Court held that though s 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure is inapplicable to industrial adjudication, the principle underlying it as expressed in the maxim interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium - which is founded on sound public policy and is of universal application being a rule 'dictated by a wisdom which is for all time - is applicable to the decisions of industrial adjudicators for 'good reasons'. Venkatarama Aiyyer J observed that it 'would be contrary to the well recognised principles that a decision once rendered by competent authority on a matter in issue between the parties after a full inquiry should not be permitted to be re-agitated'. It was further pointed out that if 'an adjudication loses its force when it is repudiated under s 19(6) and the whole controversy is at large, then the result would be that far from reconciling themselves to the award and settling down to work it, either party will treat it as a mere stage in the prosecution of prolonged struggle, and far from bringing industrial peace, the awards would turn out to be but truces giving the parties breathing time before resuming hostile action with renewed vigour'. However, realising that it was dealing with a case of fixation of wage-structure which would not admit the application of the principle of res judicata in view of rise in cost of living with the passage of time and various other transitory factors, the court added that by regarding the awards of the industrial adjudicators to have long term operations and liable to be modified by change in the circumstances on which they were based, the objects of the Act would be served.[52] The ratio of this case is, generally the principle of res judicata will apply to the decisions of industrial adjudicators but the awards based on prevailing circumstances such as wage-structure and dearness allowance, etc, though normally treated to have long term operations would be liable to be modified by change in circumstances on which they were based. In subsequent decisions,[53] the court adopted this principle with respect to awards based on prevailing circumstances such as wage-structure and dearness allowance. In Straw Board, Goswami J observed that 'multiplicity of litigation and agitation and re-agitation of the same dispute at issue between the same employer and his employees will not be conducive to industrial peace which is the principle object of all labour legislations bearing on industrial adjudication'.[54] In Sankar Prasad Banerjee, the Calcutta High Court observed thus:

> ...the principle of res judicata would be normally applicable to industrial adjudications or awards as industrial settlements are intended, consistent with the policy of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, to be operative for a fairly long period unless there is change of circumstances which may be the basis of the award. In cases where the award is based on prevailing circumstances like determination of wage structure and the like on existing price index, with the constant change of circumstances like spiraling of prices, the principle of res judicata would be inappropriate and inapplicable. Such principle would however be applicable when the award is not based on prevailing circumstances but on rights claimed long existing but found by the labour court as non-existent and there is no scope for any change of the rights or in the claim of the workmen on the employer by reason of change of circumstances. In this state of affairs there can be no dispute that in such cases, the principle of res judicata will have full application.[55]

In Hindustan Lever, Desai J observed that though this highly technical concept of civil justice may be kept in precise confined limits in the field of industrial arbitration which must as far as possible be kept free from such technicalities that thwart resolution of industrial disputes; it can safely be said that principle analogous to res judicata can be availed of to scuttle any attempt at raising industrial disputes repeatedly in defiance of operative settlements and awards.[56] In Punjab Coop Bank, the Court upheld the validity of the application of the principle of res judicata to an issue raised in subsequent proceedings under s 33C(2) which had already been decided by a competent labour court in that regard in earlier industrial dispute.[57] In Bombay Gas, a three judge Bench of the court has gone to the extent of even applying the principle of constructive res judicata where speaking for the Court Alagiriswami J observed:

> The doctrine of res judicata is a wholesome one which is applicable not merely to matters governed by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure but to all litigations. It proceeds on the principle that there should be no unnecessary litigation and whatever claims and defences are open to the parties should all be put forward at the same time, provided no confusion is likely to arise by so putting forward all such claims.[58]

In Mumbai Kamgar Sabha, the court entertained a doubt about the extension of the sophisticated doctrine of constructive res judicata to industrial law which is governed by special methodology of conciliation, adjudication and considerations of peaceful industrial relations, where collective bargaining and pragmatic justice claim precedence over formalised rules of decision based on individual contests, specific causes of action and findings on particular issues.[59] A single judge of the Calcutta High Court in Deepak Puri observed:

> In my view considering the purpose for which Industrial Disputes Act has been engrafted in the statute book and the socio economic conditions of the country it would be positive injustice if the doctrine of constructive res judicata is given a narrower meaning than is intended to subserve. The doctrine of constructive res judicata ought not and should not be restricted in its applicability.[60]

Whether a matter in dispute in a subsequent case had earlier been directly and substantially in issue, between the same parties and the same had been heard and finally decided by the tribunal, will be of pertinent consideration and will have to be determined before holding, in a particular case, that the principle of res judicata is attracted.[61] The earlier question at issue must be relevant and germane in determining the question of res judicata in the subsequent proceedings'.[62] The principle will be applicable only when there is an express adjudication on merits of the dispute and not otherwise.[63] Furthermore, in order a decision should operate as res judicata, it must have been directly and substantially in issue in the former proceeding.[64] In Mathura Prasad, the Supreme Court held that if, by an erroneous decision, the court assumes jurisdiction which it does not possess, its decision cannot operate as res judicata between the parties.[65] In Rajendra Jha, the Supreme Court rejected the plea of the workman that the labour court did not permit the employer to lead evidence by erroneous exercise of jurisdiction but the court held that the labour court had the jurisdiction to decide whether to allow the employer to lead evidence or not. It might have acted irregularly in the exercise of that jurisdiction but that is to be distinguished from the cases in which the court inherently lacks jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding or to pass a particular order. A priori, the plea of the workman was held to be barred by res judicata.[66]

In Bharat Barrel, the company decided to close down its factory on a particular date on account of non-availability of raw material and other compelling circumstances and informed the workmen accordingly that their services would stand terminated on account of the closure of the factory and they would be paid compensation in terms of the provisions of s 25FFF but subsequent to the notice of closure, the workmen created a grave law and order situation and consequently, the company decided to terminate the services of the workmen on a date prior to the date of closure. Then, the workmen raised an industrial dispute with respect to the bona fide and validity of the closure. In this reference while upholding the validity of the closure, the tribunal also found that all the Workers had been discharged by the company prior to the date of closure and held, 'since the termination of service of the Workers is not connected with the closure, the Workers would not be entitled to any compensation due to closure'. This award remained unchallenged and became final. Thereafter, at the instance of some of the Workers, another reference was made by the government. The employer raised an objection before the tribunal that the claim of the Workers was barred by the principle of res judicata. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that, having allowed the finding that the workmen had been validly discharged prior to the operation of the notice of closure to become final in the earlier disputes, it was not open to the workmen to reagitate the same question in the subsequent industrial dispute. Accordingly, the court held that the award of the tribunal in the subsequent reference was invalid.[67]

In Punjab State Coop Bank, an employee of the Punjab State Cooperative Bank was retrenched from service on payment of retrenchment compensation and one month's salary in lieu of notice. The workman challenged the validity by filing a writ petition which was dismissed on merits after hearing the parties. Then, the employee raised an industrial dispute which was referred to a labour court for adjudication which set aside the order of retrenchment and directed the reinstatement of the workmen with continuity of service. In a writ petition filed by the employer, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that since the same question between the same parties had been adjudicated upon by the High Court, subsequent reference of the same dispute was barred by the principles of res judicata. Speaking for the court, Bahri J held that when different remedies were available and the workman chose to avail the remedy of the writ jurisdiction under Art. 226 of the Constitution and failed on merits, he was debarred from approaching the labour court again on the same cause of action and for the same relief.[68] If in the earlier proceedings, it was held that the relief was barred by limitation under the statute of limitation, it would not operate as res judicata to the same relief in a subsequent proceeding before an authority constituted by a different statute which does not provide for limitation. For instance, the holding of the labour court functioning under s 26 of the Bihar Shops and Establishments Act to the effect that the relief was barred by limitation was held not to operate as a bar in granting compensation by the labour court in reference under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. The Patna High Court in*B Choudhury*, observed that for the purpose of attracting the principles of res judicata, the issues in the two proceedings must be common. Section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act does not prescribe any time limit, whereas s 26 of the Bihar Shops and Establishments Act prescribes a period of limitation; hence, there can be no issue in the reference case as to whether the dispute is barred by limitation. In the absence of an issue in respect of limitation in the reference case, the findings recorded on the question of limitation in the proceedings under the Shops and Establishments Act, shall not operate as res judicata in the reference case.[69]

Some distinction of whatever shade or magnitude, may have to be borne in mind in application of the principle of res judicata in industrial adjudication in contradistinction to civil proceedings. Extremely technical considerations, usually invoked in civil proceedings, may not be allowed to outweigh substantial justice to the parties in an industrial adjudication. The real character of the controversy between the parties is the determining factor and in complex and manifold human relations between labour and capital giving rise to diverse kinds of ruptures of varying nuances, no cast-iron rule can be laid down. [70]Industrial disputes generally relate to claims of wage-structure including dearness allowance and bonus etc and other terms of employment or conditions of labour of workmen or termination of service whether under the contract, as a measure of retrenchment or by way of punishment for an act of misconduct. It cannot be said in all cases of industrial adjudication that a question which is once decided can never be reagitated. For instance, there are certain classes of cases like disputes regarding wage structure, service conditions etc which arise as circumstances change and new situations arise which may not be barred by the rule of res judicata.[71] The application of the principle of res judicata to adjudication of such disputes is discussed under the following heads:

(a) Wage-structure

The labour appellate tribunal was of the view that an award of an industrial tribunal dealing with wage-fixation should be taken as binding on the parties, even after having been terminated under s 19(6), unless there was a change of circumstances. In other words, such an award should operate as res judicata to any further reference.[72] However, in Burn & Co, the labour appellate tribunal apparently resiled from this stand with the observation that it was 'a rule of prudence and not of law'. In this case, the industrial tribunal had given an award fixing the pay-scales for the clerical and subordinate staff of the company in June 1950. Exactly after one year of the publication of this award in July 1951, the workmen terminated this award in terms of s 19(6) declaring their intention not to be bound by it and shortly afterwards, raised an industrial dispute regarding their pay-scales which was referred for adjudication. The industrial tribunal took the view that the same question had been directly adjudicated upon by the earlier tribunal and since there was no change in the circumstances, the pay-scales as fixed by the earlier tribunal should not be disturbed. The labour appellate tribunal disagreed with this view and made certain alterations in the pay-scales. In appeal, the Supreme Court on principle, disagreed with the view of the labour appellate tribunal and agreed with the view of the industrial tribunal that in the absence of any change in the circumstances between the first award and the subsequent reference, the earlier award should not be disturbed. It is in this context that the court enunciated the general proposition of law that the principle of res judicata should apply to industrial adjudication. However, with respect to awards based on the prevailing circumstances, it held that, even though such awards should be regarded as having long-time operation, they were liable to be modified on change of circumstances on which they were based.[73]

In IGN Rly, dealing with an award of wage fixation while dissenting from the general rule in Burn & Co and emphasising that s 19(6) of the Act itself 'contemplates that the award cannot be binding after it is terminated', Wanchoo J suggested a cautious approach in applying the principle of res judicata to 'such matters as wages and dearness allowance'. The learned judge further held that, if the circumstances have changed, there is a good case for a change in the award, and on this view of the matter, he made come changes in the existing wage-structure in view of a noticeable rise in prices between the previous award and the subsequent reference.[74] In Remington, the court explained the principle enunciated in Burn & Co in the background of its peculiar circumstances relating to wage fixation.[75] However, in Balmer Lawrie, Gajendragadkar J observed that the adjudicator would not normally be justified in rejecting the claim of the workmen for revision of wage-scales, solely on the ground that enough time had not passed after the making of the earlier award or that material change in the relevant circumstances had not been proved. In other words, these factors were not considered as justification to bar the claim for revision of wage-scales. On the other hand, some other factors such as increase in the paying capacity of the employer, upward trend in the cost of living, other anomalies, mistakes or errors in the earlier award fixing the wage-structure, the rise in the wage-structure in comparable industries in the region, were considered as valid justification for wage-revision. The court, however, refrained from laying down any hard and fast rule in the matter and said that the question of revision of wage-structure must be examined on the merits in each case that is brought before the adjudicator for his adjudication. On the application of the principle of res judicata, the learned judge held:

> While dealing with the question about revision of wage-scales, it is necessary to remember that the technical considerations of res judicata should not be allowed to hamper the discretion of industrial adjudication…It is undoubtedly true that wage-scales are devised and wage-structures constructed as matters of long term policy, and so, industrial adjudication would naturally be reluctant to interfere with the wage- structures without justification or in light-hearted manner. When a wage-structure is framed, all relevant factors are taken into account and normally it should remain in operation for a fairly long period; but it would be unreasonable to introduce considerations of res judicata as such, because for various reasons which constitute the special characteristics of industrial adjudication the said technical considerations would be inadmissible...the principle of gradual advance towards the living wage, which industrial adjudication can never ignore, itself constitutes such a special feature of industrial adjudication that it renders the application of the technical rule of res judicata singularly inappropriate.[76]

The effect of these dicta is that when on the expiry of the time fixed by s 19(3), an award is terminated by a party under s 19(6), it is no longer binding on the parties and will not, therefore, bar subsequent reference for fresh wage fixation on which a fresh award is permissible on account of the changing nature of industrial problems and constant spiraling of prices.[77] Lastly, the application of the principle of res judicata is in so far as claim for revision of wages is concerned is inconsistent with the approach of the industrial adjudication from the minimum wage towards living wage. In other words, wage structure is in the process of metamorphosis, an evolution from the subsistence level to the living wage level and it cannot be checkmated by introducing the technical rules like res judicata in the adjudicatory process.[78]

(b) Dearness Allowance

By and large, the same principles as applicable to wage revision would apply to the adjudication of dearness allowance disputes as well in connection with the application of the principle of res judicata but in Remington Rand (supra), Gajendragadkar J observed that considerations which are relevant in regard to the fixation of wage-structure by an award would not be relevant in respect of dearness allowance. In this case, a comprehensive settlement was arrived at in the year 1953 including dearness allowance. The relevant clause relating to the dearness allowance provided for variations in the payment of the dearness allowance with rise in the index of cost of living. Subsequently, in the year 1958 by another interim settlement, it was agreed that the adjustment in the dearness allowance to the rise in the cost of living index will be made by the management every month instead of every six months as was done till then. It was also agreed that the minimum dearness allowances in Delhi and Simla would be raised from Rs 58 to Rs 60 per month. This agreement became operative from July 1958, which inter alia provided that the parties would negotiate amongst themselves for a final settlement. In case no settlement was reached, it would be open to the union to approach the conciliation authorities. Since the parties could not come to a final settlement in respect of the dispute raised by the workmen, the dispute was referred for adjudication. The tribunal revised the scheme of the dearness allowance. In appeal, Gajendragadkar J rejected the contention of the employer in the light of the comfortable financial position of the company and the rise in the cost of living subsequent to the settlement, and held that the demand for the revision in the rates of dearness allowance was justified. In Bengal Chemicals, certain rates of dearness allowance were fixed by an industrial tribunal in the year 1957. This award was challenged in appeal, both by the employer as well as the workmen before the Supreme Court. The appeal of the employer was dismissed, as no interference with the award was permissible while the appeal of the workmen was dismissed as it was not pressed.[79] Subsequently, in November 1963, a dispute relating inter alia to dearness allowance was referred for adjudication. The tribunal rejected the contention of the company in view of the fact that the earlier award was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Thus, it accepted the union's contention that there should be an increase or decrease of dearness allowance by one rupee for every five points in the cost of living index. In appeal, it was contended on behalf of the workmen that there should have been a complete de novo examination of the claim for revision of the dearness allowance, without being influenced by the earlier award. Repelling the contention, the Supreme Court held that the tribunal was perfectly justified in proceeding on the basis of the earlier award for considering the nature of the revision of dearness allowance.[80]

(c) Bonus

The claim of bonus is for each year. The fact that the claim of the workmen for a particular year was the subject-matter of an earlier award will not bar the reference of a claim for bonus for a subsequent year but it is not impossible to visualise a situation where the tribunal awards certain quantum of bonus for a particular year and after the lapse of one year, the workmen terminate the award in terms of s 19(6) and then claim that the bonus awarded to them for that year was not adequate and seek to re-open the award by having a further reference made for adjudication. In such a case, the general principle of Burn & Co will apply with full force and the reference will be barred by the principle of res judicata. Even if some new points are raised to support the claim for higher quantum of bonus they too will be barred by the rule of constructive res judicata as these points could have been raised in the earlier adjudication.[81] The application of the principle of res judicata to bonus cases appears to have been misapprehended by a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Varahalakshmi Rice, in which the facts disclosed that the workmen raised an industrial dispute for bonus for the year 1953-54, 1954-55 and 1955-56, but the government referred the dispute only for the year 1955-56. The tribunal rejected the said claim on the ground of delay as well as on merits. Subsequently, the government referred the claim of workmen for bonus for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55. The employer challenged this order of reference by a writ petition on the ground that the claim for payment of bonus for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55 was barred by the principle of res judicata. The High Court held that the matter of demand for bonus for the year 1955-56 having been concluded by the specific decision of the industrial tribunal, it was implicit in the finding that the claim for bonus for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55 was also untenable and that such a finding would operate as bar to the adjudication of the impugned reference. In taking this view, the learned judge has displayed unawareness even of the statutory provisions. According to s 10(4) of the Act, the jurisdiction of the tribunal is confined to the points of dispute specified in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto. The earlier reference had clearly specified the claim of the workmen for payment of bonus for the year 1955-56 and it had no reference to the claim for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55. Hence, the jurisdiction had to be confined only to the payment of bonus for the year 1955-56. By pleadings, the parties cannot enlarge the scope of the jurisdiction of the tribunal which emanates from the order of reference. The earlier tribunal was incompetent to decide the question of bonus for the years 1953-54 and 1954-55 as it had not been referred for adjudication. Hence, there was no decision by a competent court. The question of actual or constructive res judicata would therefore, not arise.[82] Dealing with a case of rehabilitation charge in Trichinopoly Mills, Gajendragadkar J observed that the principles of res judicata could not be strictly invoked in respect of such points though it was equally true that industrial tribunals would not be justified in changing the amounts of rehabilitation from year to year without sufficient cause.[83]

(d) Discharge or Dismissal affirmed in Adjudication on Reference

The action of termination of the services of a workmen by the employer either under the contract or by way of retrenchment or as measure of punishment by way of discharge or dismissal, may be affirmed or set aside by an industrial adjudicator in adjudication on a reference of an industrial dispute relating to such termination of the service. In terms of s 19(3), an award remains in operation for a period of one year from the date on which it became enforceable. After the lapse of that period, either of the parties bound by the award may terminate the award by giving two months' notice to the other party under s 19(6). By virtue of s 19(5), the provisions of s 19(3) shall not apply to any award which 'by its nature, terms or their circumstances does not impose, after it has been given effect to, any continuing obligation on the parties bound by the award'. An award relating to termination of service of a workman after being given effect to does not impose any continuing obligation on the workman or the employer. The award, therefore, becomes final and shall not cease to be operative after lapse of one year. It cannot be terminated by a notice under s 19(6). That dispute cannot be referred to adjudication subsequently. A single judge of the AP High Court held that, if a workman approaches the civil court for the relief of reinstatement, it would not be open to him to invoke the jurisdiction of industrial adjudication once again by raising an industrial dispute seeking the relief of reinstatement with back wages, merely because the civil court did not grant the entire relief sought by him.[84]

(e) Decision under Section 33C(2)

It is now settled law that the jurisdiction of the labour court under s 33C(2) is not of adjudicatory nature. It is merely analogous to the jurisdiction of an executing court. Therefore, while purporting to decide the question as to the amount of money due or as to the amount at which the benefit claimed by the workman should be computed, the labour court cannot arrogate to itself the jurisdiction of adjudicatory authorities on a reference under s 10 of the Act. In exercise of its limited jurisdiction, no doubt, the labour court can make an incidental inquiry into the existence of the right of the workman to claim a benefit in terms of money, but it cannot entertain a claim which is based on the right which is the subject matter of an industrial dispute. Therefore, the decision of the labour court in its jurisdiction under s 33C(2) will not operate as res judicata in a subsequent reference under s 10. But a single judge of the Delhi High Court in Shoba Puri, held that even a finding of fact by the labour court while deciding a matter will not operate as res judicata.[85] This view is not correct. No doubt the jurisdiction of the labour court under s 33C(2) is not of adjudicatory nature, but in deciding certain questions of fact, it is the competent court. Therefore, it cannot be said that the findings of fact by the labour court in exercise of its jurisdiction under s 33C(2) will not operate as res judicata if the same questions of fact are raised in the course of adjudication proceedings before an adjudicatory authority on a reference under s 10.

(f) Other terms of employment and conditions of service

The question of application of the principle of res judicata to adjudication of disputes relating to other terms of employment and conditions of service in a subsequent reference, would be governed by the rule, as laid down by the Division Bench of Calcutta High Court in Sankar Prasad Banerjee.[86]

(g) Jurisdictional issues

In determining the question whether the principle of res judicata in a given case would apply, the heart of the matter will always be: what was the substantial question that came up for decision in the earlier proceeding? Sometimes, additional issues may have to be framed upon which the jurisdiction of the tribunal will depend for deciding the principal issue which has been referred for adjudication, ie, (i) whether the dispute in question is an 'industrial dispute' or (ii) whether the establishment to which the dispute relates is an 'industry' or (iii) the concerned employee is a 'workman' or (iv) whether the government making the reference is the 'appropriate government'?[87] In Theosophical Society, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the question whether the activities of the industrial establishment is of an 'industry' is to be decided on the state of affairs obtaining on the date of the order of reference but not on the basis of the circumstances which prevailed at the time of the earlier decision of the High Court holding that the activities of the establishment were not of an industry. Therefore, the earlier decision cannot operate as res judicata to subsequent reference because during the period between the last decision and the order of reference the activities of the establishment might have undergone a change bringing it within the ambit of the definition of industry.[88] The principle of res judicata is governed by the doctrine of the competence of the court whose decision is put forward as a bar, which requires that the decision must be given by a competent court having jurisdiction to decide the point. An industrial tribunal is not a court of general jurisdiction to finally decide its own jurisdiction nor is it competent to decide the question of its jurisdiction in a manner so as to exclude the judicial review to examine its assumption of jurisdiction. In other words, an industrial tribunal will not be a 'competent court', when it assumes jurisdiction outside the Act under which it acts. In these premises, a prior decision of an industrial tribunal on the question whether a firm of solicitors was an 'industry' was held not to operate as res judicata in a subsequent adjudication of the question by another tribunal.[89] An industrial tribunal constituted under this Act possesses a limited jurisdiction and has not been invested with the powers of general administration to finally decide its own jurisdiction. If the tribunal, therefore, assumes jurisdiction, by an erroneous decision over a subject-matter, which is not an industrial dispute covered by the Act, in a fresh reference, it would be open to any of the parties to say that the previous decision was without jurisdiction. In such a case, the previous award would be of incompetent jurisdiction. For the purpose of deciding a question which relates to the special jurisdiction, if a tribunal finds it necessary to decide another matter, that matter does not become a matter of special jurisdiction and a decision on it would not bind the parties.

A tribunal of a limited jurisdiction may be invested with powers to deal with a subject-matter only if a certain state of facts exists or it may be entrusted with jurisdiction also to determine the existence of such facts. In the former case, if the tribunal wrongly holds or assumes the existence of those facts on which its jurisdiction depends, then that decision or assumption is not final or conclusive. Hence, the industrial tribunals do not possess power to finally and conclusively decide whether or not a particular establishment is an 'industry'. The earlier decision of a tribunal on a jurisdiction at fact would not, therefore, shut out an inquiry by a reviewing court and if that court decides that the establishment is not an 'industry', the previous decision of the tribunal on such an issue will not be final between the parties. If the decision of a tribunal on a jurisdictional question were to operate as res judicata, it would mean that in every case where the tribunal assumes jurisdiction, where in fact it has none, over a subject-matter by an erroneous decision, that will bind the parties for all times to come. It is open, therefore, to a party in a subsequent proceeding to say that the previous decision of the tribunal, being a decision on collateral or jurisdictional fact by the tribunal of limited jurisdiction, is not conclusive.[90] Hence, a previous award of an industrial tribunal erroneously deciding a jurisdictional issue would not operate as res judicata barring a subsequent reference or the Constitutional remedy of judicial review.[91] For instance, the decision of a tribunal in a prior reference on a question as to whether an establishment to which the dispute relates falls within the definition of 'industry' cannot operate as res judicata.

Where an organisation consists of several units, the decision of a tribunal with respect to a particular unit that it falls within the definition of 'industry' or not would not operate as res judicata in a subsequent reference with respect to another unit.[92] A single judge of the Calcutta High Court in Walford Transport, held that the decision of a tribunal in an earlier decision on the jurisdictional fact as to whether the employee concerned fell within the definition of 'workman' would constitute res judicata in a subsequent reference.[93] In Rajagopal Transport, the Madras High Court held that the decision of an industrial tribunal on the merits of a dispute after holding that it has no jurisdiction, if affirmed by a writ court, will operate as res judicata to a subsequent reference.[94] This decision is not correct as it goes beyond the scope of writ jurisdiction while dealing with jurisdictional issues. Any decision of a tribunal beyond its jurisdiction is a nullity. It cannot either be affirmed by the reviewing court nor can it be within the jurisdiction of such court to deal itself with the adjudication of the dispute, which the tribunal itself had no jurisdiction to decide. The jurisdiction of the writ court is confined only to see whether the tribunal had jurisdiction. It cannot itself assume the role of an industrial adjudicator. In Indodan Milk Products, a single judge of Allahabad High Court held that if a dispute has been settled by settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings or otherwise, the industrial tribunal or the labour court will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the same because such a settlement is binding on the management as well as the union of which the workmen with respect to whose termination of service, the dispute relates.[1]

Subject-matter

An industrial tribunal is the creation of statute. Hence its jurisdiction is circumscribed by the Act. Its adjudication must, therefore, be confined to the perimeter of the provisions of the Act. It cannot dispense its own brand of industrial dispute. It may, of course look for guidance, to various sources, yet its award is legitimate only so long as it draws its sustenance from the order of reference. Section 10(4) lays down that the adjudication by the tribunal is to be confined only to:

(i) the points specified in the reference; and,

(ii) the matters incidental thereto.

(i) The Points Specified in the Order of Reference

The industrial tribunal is not a court of general and residuary jurisdiction, but is a tribunal with specific jurisdiction circumscribed by the terms of an order of reference.[2] The scheme of the Act is that a tribunal constituted under the Act has to determine the dispute referred to it. In other words, unlike an ordinary civil court, a tribunal has no general or inherent jurisdiction in any class of matters. It can have no power or authority whatever to deal with a dispute beyond that which can be derived from or traced to ss 7, 7A, 10H and 15 of the Act. Before the tribunal can acquire jurisdiction in any particular case, the 'industrial dispute' must be referred to it by the 'appropriate government' and its jurisdiction is limited to the dispute so referred.[3] For instance, in Manabendra Choudhury, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that after a workman resigns from his job during the pendency of the adjudication proceedings no dispute with respect to 'non-employment' of the workman was left before the tribunal. Therefore, the tribunal could not have embarked on a field of inquiry as to the factum of such resignation even for the purpose of computation of the benefits arising out of the decision on the main portion of the issue referred to it because the tribunal cannot travel beyond the ambit and scope of the issue specifically referred to it for adjudication. In the circumstances of the case, the court remanded the matter to the tribunal for answering the consequential part of the issue relating to the relief to which the petitioner would be entitled.[4] Where a dispute relating to payment of wages to certain Workers was not referred, such dispute cannot be validly entertained by the adjudicator and any award determining such dispute will be without jurisdiction.[5] The functions of a tribunal are quasi-judicial but it is not a civil court. It does not have the inherent power to decide any of the disputes raised by the parties in their pleadings beyond reference. Its jurisdiction is limited and restricted only to the issues referred to it by the appropriate government by an order of reference.[6]In other words, the tribunal has to function within the limits imposed upon it by the statute and has to act according to its provisions.[7] In adjudicating upon an 'industrial dispute', the tribunal cannot allocate to itself powers which the legislature alone can confer or do, something which the legislature has not permitted to be done. The tribunal acquires jurisdiction to adjudicate upon an 'industrial dispute' only after it has been referred to it. In other words, without such a reference, the tribunal does not get any such jurisdiction to adjudicate upon any dispute.[8]

In adjudicating upon an industrial dispute, the tribunal must look at the order of reference itself as it is only the subject-matter of reference with which the tribunal can deal with.[9] The tribunal cannot go beyond the terms of reference.[10] Where in an order referring an industrial dispute to a tribunal under s 10(1) or in a subsequent order, the government had specified the points of dispute for adjudication, the tribunal shall confine the adjudication to those points and matters incidental thereto. It would, therefore, appear that while it is open to the 'appropriate government' to refer the dispute or any matter appearing to be connected therewith for adjudication, the tribunal must confine its adjudication to the points of dispute referred and the matters incidental thereto. The government may not always specify the points upon which a reference is made; it may make a reference generally. In most cases, the order of reference is so cryptic that it is impossible to cull out therefrom the various points about which the parties were at variance leading to trouble. In such cases, of course the tribunal can ascertain the points of dispute from the pleadings of the parties to find out the exact nature of the dispute and decide them. Section 10(4) permits the tribunal to decide only disputes or points referred to it and matters incidental thereto.[11] The points of dispute should, therefore, be carefully formulated and should be so worded as to avoid ambiguity or prejudice or advantage to one or the other party to the dispute.[12] The order of reference by which an industrial dispute is referred to the tribunal for adjudication gives jurisdiction to the tribunal to deal with the merits of dispute.[13] However, what are the merits of a dispute, would depend on the nature of the reference and the specific questions referred to adjudication.[14] The jurisdiction of the tribunal being limited to the matters referred to it by the government, it would have no right to travel outside the reference, and proceed to adjudicate the matters not referred to it.[15] The legal position is that mere wording of the reference is not decisive in the matter of tenability of reference. It may contain the defence or may not. If the points of difference are not discernible from the material before the court or tribunal, it has only one duty, and that is to decide the points on merits and not to be astute to discover formal defects in the wording of the reference. In other words, inelegant or clumsy wording of the order of reference will not justify short-circuiting the reference by ignoring the basic background of the dispute and subjecting the workman to unnecessary misery and hardship in moving the administrative machinery all over again after a long time.[16] However, the tribunal has to confine itself to the pleadings and the issues arising therefrom and it is not open to it to fly off at a tangent disregarding the pleadings and reach any conclusion that it deems just and proper.[17]

In Delhi Cloth Mills, the Supreme Court pointed out that the tribunal can look into the pleadings of the parties to find out the exact nature of the dispute, but it cannot allow the parties to go a stage further and contend that the foundation of the dispute mentioned in the order of reference was non-existent and that the true dispute was something else. In other words, once a reference is made to the tribunal, the parties cannot be permitted to make out an entirely new case than the one which was raised by it and which alone the appropriate government was persuaded to refer for adjudication. An industrial adjudicator dealing with a reference made to it has no general or inherent jurisdiction to cover all matters which a party might raise before it for the first time and its jurisdiction is limited only to the dispute referred to it. [18]. In Uttar Pradesh SEB, the facts were: a dispute relating to dismissal was raised by the contract Workers alleging that, the contractor not being a registered contractor, they should be treated as being directly employed by the State Electricity Board. The tribunal passed an award directing that all the Workers should be absorbed as regular staff of the State Electricity Board. Quashing the award, a single Judge of Allahabad High Court held that it was only the government, which had the powers to abolish contract labour, and not the tribunal.[19]

The High Courts of Madras,[20] Delhi,[21] Mysore,[22] Madhya Pradesh,[23] and Bombay,[24] held that the tribunal was not at liberty to enlarge the scope of the reference. Even if a reference is made on an incorrect assumption, it is not open to the tribunal to enlarge, by its own choice, the scope of the reference and widen the issues for decision and the field of inquiry. In Indian Oxygen, certain disputes were referred to adjudication on a joint application under s 10(2). The notification of reference stated that 'an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended between the management of Indian Oxygen Ltd, Jamshedpur and their workmen represented by Indoxco Labour Union, Jamshedpur regarding the matters specified in their joint applications dated 7 September 1963'. The notification thus made it clear that the disputes referred to the tribunal were disputes set out in the said agreement and statements and were between the management of the company's factory at Jamshedpur and their workmen represented by the Indoxco Labour Union. However, in view of the amendment of the Constitution of the union, the tribunal made its award applicable to all workmen employed in the various establishments of the company in the state of Bihar. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the award made by the tribunal must necessarily be confined to the disputes referred to it, the parties to those disputes and the parties who had agreed to refer those disputes for adjudication.[25]

In Jaipur Udyog, it was held that, it was not open to the tribunal to enlarge the ambit of the dispute between the parties by reference to difference in the age of superannuation under two sets of Standing Orders relating to two different establishments owned by the same employer.[26] In Firestone, the court observed that the plea for reinstatement of the workmen was based on the alleged invalidity of the action taken by the management in dismissing these workmen. Therefore, the issue of unfair labour practice or discrimination by reason of subsequent reinstatement on permanent basis of some workmen was not a matter referred to the tribunal for adjudication nor was it in any way connected with or incidental to the right of reinstatement. Hence, the plea of unfair labour practice or discrimination was altogether an independent question. Therefore, it held that the tribunal travelled outside the jurisdiction in recording a finding of unfair labour practice and discrimination.[27] In Central Inland Water, the Calcutta High Court held that the question whether the corporation was the 'successor' of the company was beyond the scope of reference and in the circumstances of the case, hence the determination of this question was beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal.[28] However, there is nothing in s 10(4) or any other section of the Act specifying the duties of the tribunal and requiring it to adjudicate upon the points in the order of reference which have been given up by the workmen through their union without any allegation that they were unfairly given up because it is impossible for any tribunal to adjudicate upon any point of dispute without evidence on record and those who give up the dispute are hardly likely to produce any evidence.[29] In EID Parry, the Madras High Court held that an industrial tribunal is a 'court' within the meaning of the Interest Act 1978. Therefore, the tribunal has the jurisdiction to grant interest on bonus awarded to the workmen from the due date as the tribunal has wider powers than a civil court while adjudicating an industrial dispute. The fact that the Interest Act 1978 which came into force in the year 1981 is not applicable, is immaterial.[30] In HPCL, the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that a declaration by the tribunal, that casual Workers were entitled to wages on par with regular Workers, was illegal and was beyond the terms of reference. The Bench further observed that such a declaration could not also be said to be a decision on a matter incidental to the point referred to it by the government.[31] Where the dispute referred was 'whether the management of the Bank was justified in terminating the services of the employee, while engaging a fresh hand in his place was justified', the award of tribunal directing reinstatement with full back wages and attendant benefits to the workman was beyond the scope of reference, as the terms of reference did not contemplate relief of reinstatement to the workman.[32]

(ii) 'Matters Incidental Thereto'

The word 'incidental' means according to Webster's New World Dictionary: 'Happening or likely to happen as a result of or in connection with something more important; being an incident; casual, hence, secondary or minor, but usually associated'. Mitter J held:

> Something incidental to a dispute must, therefore, mean something happening as a result of or in connection with the dispute or associated with dispute. The dispute is a fundamental thing while something incidental thereto is an adjunct to it. Something incidental, therefore, cannot cut at the root of the main thing to which it is an adjunct.[33]

A point is incidental to another point when the former necessarily depends upon the other.[34] 'Incidental' implies a subordinate and subsidiary thing related to some other main or principal thing requiring casual attention while considering the main thing.[35] It is obvious, therefore, that the matters which require independent consideration or treatment and have their own importance, cannot be considered as 'incidental'. The words 'matters incidental thereto' should not be interpreted so as to give vague and indeterminate jurisdiction to the tribunal, especially over independent matters.[36] A matter which is independent in one context, may become subsidiary in another matter in a different context. It all depends on how and under what circumstances it arises. In other words, the question whether the adjudication of one matter is incidental to the adjudication of another matter depends on the facts of the case, the pleadings of the parties and the issues which properly arise for determination on the pleadings.[37] The words 'incidental thereto' in s 10(4) do not have the same meaning as the words 'appearing to be connected with or relevant to' occurring in cll (b), (c) and (d) of s 10(1). The matters covered by the latter expression must be specifically referred for adjudication, while the matters covered by the former expression need not be specifically referred as they can be adjudicated upon as a part of the main dispute. For instance, on an industrial dispute being referred to it, the tribunal has jurisdiction to determine whether on the facts placed before it, an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of s 2(k) has really arisen, or the concerned persons are 'workmen' as defined in s 2(s) or a particular undertaking is an 'industry' within the meaning of s 2(j) or such industry is a live industry or a closed industry. Such questions can be validly examined and adjudicated upon by the tribunal as matters incidental to the points of dispute specified in the order of reference. These matters have not only to be determined as matters incidental to the dispute but have necessarily to be determined as collateral or jurisdictional issues, as the jurisdiction of the tribunal depends upon such determination, or adjudication.[38] Some of the matters held to be 'incidental' and 'non-incidental' have been discussed in the following paragraphs:

(a) Incidental Matters

In view of the words 'incidental thereto' appearing in s 10(4), interim relief of compensation pending application under s 33 can be granted by the tribunal, being 'incidental' to the main question without being itself referred in express terms.[39] The question of grant of interim pay and allowances is incidental and ancillary to the main relief of 'payment of wages and allowances, etc'. It is not necessary to specify the relief in the order of reference.[40] If for the purpose of deciding a bonus claim, it is necessary to determine whether the employer employed certain persons, the tribunal has the power and duty to determine the question. The question, therefore, whether the persons claiming bonus are workmen or not is an incidental question to the main dispute.[41] In a dispute in relation to a claim for gratuity and compensation for the past services rendered by workmen referred for adjudication, it was held that the reference was not confined to the claim for gratuity for the past services only, but also included the fixation of a scheme of gratuity which could come into force at a future date, as such fixation of a scheme of gratuity is a matter incidental to the claim of the workmen for gratuity.[42] Where the question referred to an industrial tribunal was 'whether the existing rates of basic wages in a particular concern needed any revision', it was held that the reference authorised the tribunal to introduce 'time-scales of wages'.[43] In an order of reference, the industrial dispute was mentioned to be existing 'between Kirloskar Bros Ltd Kirloskarwadi and its Workmen', it was held that the order of reference included not only the workmen of the machine factory at Kirloskarwadi but also those employed in that company's press which was formerly at the place, but before the date of reference had been shifted to Pune. The name of the place was clearly descriptive and included the workmen working there and also at Pune. It was, therefore, held, that the tribunal should first have decided the pleas of the company that the press was a separate and independent business, as an incidental question.[44]

A provision in an award that certain persons shall not be deemed to be workmen was held to be incidental to the point of reference.[45] The determination of the cadre of each category of workmen regarding permanency of servants was not only a matter incidental to the point referred, ie, 'rules regarding permanency of servants' but was also absolutely necessary.[46] Fixation of scales of pay was held to be 'incidental' to fixation of grade, of pay.[47] The demand of the workmen included revision of overtime for workmen covered by issue no 1 and revision of the scheme of payment of overtime with directions for additional payment in respect of workmen covered by issue no 2. The references were actually made by the government in pursuance of an agreement. The ad hoc arrangement that was arrived at in order to overt the strike was a matter incidental to the reference which had to be made to the industrial tribunal in pursuance of that agreement. In deciding as to what should be the payment for over-time in future under the award, the tribunal had to consider whether it would be justified to continue the ad hoc payments and convert them into regular pay because of the claim of the workmen: it was held that there was no ground at all for enhancing the overtime rates over and above those payable prior to the agreement. The Supreme Court upheld that competency of the tribunal in holding that these ad hoc payments need not be made in future, as incidental matters to the issues under reference.[48] The question before the tribunal was regarding the adjustment of the workmen in the different grades which were recommended by the central wage board and the effect to that fixation was to be given retrospectively, Hence, it became necessary for the employer to raise the issue that if the workmen are to get the benefit of the new grades with retrospective effect, then whatever the overtime wages and the bonus they had already received shall not be increased according to the increase in the wages under the agreement. It was held that this matter was undoubtedly incidental to the increase of wages in accordance with the new grades in which the workmen were to be fixed Up.[49] The question of adjustment or otherwise payment of ad-interim bonus was held to be incidental to the dispute relating to the payment of bonus for a particular year.[50] The question whether the workmen concerned were the employees of the company or its contractor can be decided by the tribunal as incidental to the main question where the termination of the service was legal and valid.[51]

(b) Matters Non-incidental

In a dispute between the workmen and the management of Airlines Hotel, one of the demands of the workmen was 'inspection of the company's account books, bills and receipt-book, etc, to ascertain the correct amount collected by the management and due to the Workers'. The government referred all the demands but refused to refer this demand. The tribunal still gave direction to the employer 'to give access' to the Workers to the account books. Held that the direction was without jurisdiction as the government had in terms refused to refer the dispute regarding inspection of accounts. There could be no justification for the direction for what could not be done directly because of the refusal of the government, could not be done indirectly on the plea that it was incidental.[52] In Express Beedi Factory, the question referred to the tribunal was related to 'leave', 'wages', etc, which question could arise only in a going concern. The tribunal, however, found that the concern had closed down before it started the proceedings, and awarded compensation for closure under s 25FFF, a point not referred to it. It was held that the jurisdiction of the tribunal being confined to the matters referred to it by the government, it would have no right to travel beyond the reference and to proceed to adjudicate upon matters not referred to it. The fact that the tribunal proceeded at the invitation of the parties would make no difference to the competence of the tribunal to adjudicate upon the question.[53] Where the reference read as 'whether leave facilities should be increased, and if so, to what extent?', the industrial tribunal would have no jurisdiction to fix the quantum of festival holidays, as it would be beyond, the ambit of the reference, 'holidays', being entirely different from 'leave' facilities.[54]

The issues referred to the tribunal for adjudication related to the question of justification in the increase of workload. The tribunal granted an interim relief passing an interim award directing continuance of the increased workload on payment of higher wages. The question of wages, in the circumstances, was considered to be wholly independent and foreign to the question referred to the tribunal. It was held that such a matter could not be considered to be a matter incidental to the issues referred for adjudication within the meaning of s 10(4) of the Act.[55] The question referred to the tribunal was whether a workman should be reinstated. The tribunal found that he was not entitled to be reinstated but as a matter 'incidental' to the dispute, it awarded certain compensation to the workman. The labour appellate tribunal not only confirmed the decision of the industrial tribunal but also increased the quantum of compensation. In writ proceedings, the Calcutta High Court held that where a specific issue is referred, the tribunal must confine itself to that issue and it is not called upon to exercise general jurisdiction and adjust disputes between the parties, it was further observed that compensation for wrongful dismissal or loss of service is a completely different thing; it does not arise because a man is reinstated, but because he is not reinstated. Furthermore, it was a complicated matter to be worked out on evidence which had not been led in this case, as no issue arose. The matter decided was neither 'incidental' nor related to the dispute.[56] In a reference, the question was as to what should be 'the service conditions of 59 female Workers'. Before the tribunal, the Workers claimed that the wages should be paid retrospectively. The tribunal rejected the demand for 'retrospective' wages. In writ proceedings against the award of the tribunal, the High Court observed that on proper construction the expression 'incidental matters' referred to prospective and not retrospective matters, unless the actual terms of reference either expressly or by compelling and necessary implication, gave jurisdiction to the tribunal to pass orders retrospectively.[57]

The claim of a company by way of damages on account of an illegal strike which was not referred in the order of reference for adjudication inter alia on the question whether the strike was illegal, could not be treated as 'incidental' to the main question. The labour appellate tribunal held that the scope of adjudication was entirely limited and determined by the reference and it was not open to any tribunal to travel outside the same and to decide the question on fanciful notions of social justice.[58] The question of retrenchment could not be adjudicated upon, being an incidental question to the main question whether the 'non-absorption' of certain workmen was justified.[59] One of the demands referred to a tribunal was for 'fixation of working hours'. After fixing the working hours, the tribunal went a step further and awarded that if the employees were asked to do overtime work, then the employer would have to pay overtime allowance at a particular rate. However, the question of payment of overtime work was not referred. In a writ petition against the award, it was held that the direction was beyond the scope of the reference in view of the language of s 10(4) of the Act.[60] The order of reference was, 'whether the demotion of a particular workman is justified? If not, is he entitled to the post of fitter-mate or any other relief in lieu thereof?' The labour court found that there was no demotion in fact but directed reinstatement of the concerned Worker as a fitter-mate holding that his transfer was actuated by malice on the part of the manager. It was held that the tribunal exceeded the scope of reference as the question considered by the labour court was not incidental to the alleged demotion.[61]

The changing of designations to fit-in with, particular type of work which the Workers have to perform, is a matter which cannot be said to be incidental to or to be logically dependent on the question of revision of wages.[62] The point of provident fund was not held to be incidental to the retrenchment compensation. The question whether any amount should be added to the provident fund account of a retrenched workmen is not incidental to the dispute relating to the validity of retrenchment and the compensation payable to the retrenched workman.[63] The question of amalgamation of dearness allowance cannot be considered to be incidental to, 'increase of wages', as it raises specific and distinct issues some of which might be of a far-reaching effect in the concerned region. Increase of wages is a very different matter, as such an increase would not necessarily comprise even incidentally the question of amalgamation of dearness allowance with basic wages. For considering such a question there must be a specific reference.[64] Where a dispute related to the demand of the workmen for abolition of the contract system in the sphere of chassis delivery work and absorption of the convoy leaders, drivers, as regular Workers and the terms of reference did not include the determination by the tribunal as to whether there was any retrenchment and if there was any retrenchment, whether proper retrenchment notice was given. Held, the questions relating to retrenchment were not incidental to the points in dispute referred for adjudication.[65] Where the order of reference itself stated the designation of the concerned workmen and the only question referred for adjudication was, whether the workman was entitled to higher grade and scale of pay, it was held that on the terms of reference the question of designating the workman did not arise and it could not also be said that it was a matter incidental to the point referred for adjudication.[66] Where the appropriate government referred certain specific disputes but did not refer the dispute as to the date or dates from which the workmen of a particular section became the employees of the company, it was held that the disputes relating to the date or dates of employment of such workmen could not be decided as matters incidental to the specific disputes referred for adjudication.[67] Where the claim for bonus payable to the operatives of the company was referred for adjudication, it was not open to the tribunal to widen the scope of the inquiry beyond the terms of reference by entertaining individual applications by the clerical staff of the company for bonus.[68] In a case where the demand for reinstatement was based on the alleged invalidity of the action taken by the management in dismissing the workmen, the issue of unfair labour practice or discrimination by reason of subsequent reinstatement on permanent basis of some of a workmen was not a matter referred to the tribunal for adjudication nor was it in any way connected with, or incidental to, the right of reinstatement, it was held that the tribunal travelled outside its jurisdiction in recording a finding of unfair labour practice without even framing an issue on the alleged unfair labour practice and discrimination, as unfair labour practice and discrimination was altogether a different question.[69]

(iii) Construction of the Order of Reference

The scope of reference is a matter of considerable importance. Although it is open to an adjudicator to follow his own procedure, he has to confine his adjudication to the points of dispute specified in the order of reference and to matters incidental thereto. Before embarking on adjudication, therefore, the adjudicator has to determine the scope of the order of reference. Hence, the question of the scope and construction of the order of reference becomes relevant. The construction of the order of reference will, in all probability, be easy or difficult, according to whether the document has been skillfully or carelessly drawn. In India Paper Pulp, speaking for the federal court, Kania CJI said that not infrequently, the orders of reference are 'far from satisfactory and are not carefully drafted'.[70] In Delhi Cloth Mills, one of the issues raised before Supreme Court was: 'which of the two provisions - s 4K of the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947 ('State Act') and s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 ('Central Act') - applies in so far as it relates to the jurisdiction of the labour court in respect of adjudicating 'matters incidental to the reference'. In the context of the fact that the subject 'labour' is enumerated in 'Concurrent List', it is considered to take a look at cl (2) of Art. 254 of the Constitution for a better understanding of the relative turfs of the Centre and States in such circumstances. The said clause runs thus:

(2) Where a law made by the Legislature of a State with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the concurrent List contains any provision repugnant to the provisions of an earlier law made by Parliament or an existing law with respect to that matter, then the law so made by the Legislature of such State shall, if it has been reserved for the consideration of the President and has received his assent, prevail in that State:

> Provided that nothing in this clause shall prevent Parliament from enacting at any time any law with respect to the same matter including a law adding to, amending, varying or repealing the law so made by the Legislature of the State. (Italics supplied).

Justice Mitter held that s 4K of UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947 does not talk of 'matters incidental to reference'. Hence, the labour court had no jurisdiction to decide such matters by invoking provisions of s 10 of the Central Act. as the provisions of the State Act would prevail by virtue of Art 254 (2) of the Constitution.[71] Inaccuracy of language employed in the order of reference, however, does not always make any difference to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to proceed with the reference and adjudicate upon it,[72] as the tribunal can interpret and find out the real meaning of the order of reference as it stands.[73] In the language of Krishna Iyer J, industrial jurisprudence is an alloy of law and social justice and one cannot be too pedantic in construing the terms of a reference respecting a dispute for industrial adjudication.[74] The general principle, in construing the public orders made by public authorities in exercise of a statutory power is that they must be construed objectively with reference to the language used in the order itself, because such orders are meant to have public effect and are intended to affect the manner and conduct of those to whom they are addressed.[75] The tribunals must attempt to construe the order of reference not too technically or in a pedantic manner, but fairly and reasonably. Even if the phraseology of the order of reference is not elegant, the tribunals should take to the substance rather than to the form of the order of reference.[76] In other words, the tribunal not only has the power but a duty is cast on it to find out what was the real dispute which was referred to it and to decide it and not to throw it out on a mere technicality.[77] It would involve no hardship if the reference is also made in wider terms provided, of course, the dispute is one of the kinds described in s 2(k) and the parties between whom such dispute has actually arisen or is apprehended in the opinion of government, are indicated either individually or collectively with reasonable clearness.[78] In construing the terms of the order of reference and determining the scope and nature of the points referred, 'the order of reference itself has to be looked into'.[79] However, the words 'order of reference' do not mean 'order of reference only'. The scope of the order of reference gets crystallised from the statements of the respective cases of the parties.[80] In Delhi Cloth Mills (supra), Mitter J held:

> The tribunal must, in any event, look to the pleadings of the parties to find out the exact nature of the dispute, because in most cases the order of reference is so cryptic that it is impossible to cull out therefrom the various points about which the parties were at variance leading to the trouble.

It is, thus, clear that where the order of reference is vague or cryptic, the tribunal may look to the pleadings of the parties and other circumstances with a view to 'cull out therefrom the various points about which the parties are at variance' leading to the dispute and to determine the real nature of the dispute. It was, however, pointedly stated that 'the parties cannot be allowed to go a stage further and contend that the foundation of the dispute mentioned in the order of reference was non-existent and the true dispute was something else. Under s 10(4) of the Act, it is not competent to the tribunal to entertain such a question'. Therefore, the tribunal cannot allow the parties to challenge the very foundation of the dispute by means of the pleadings or evidence. Likewise, in Pottery Mazdoor Panchayat, the terms of reference showed that the point in dispute was not about 'the fact of closure of business', but was confined to the narrow question 'whether the closure was proper and justified'. That being so, it was held that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to go behind the fact of closure and inquire into the question whether the business in fact was closed down by the management; and that the tribunal was not at liberty to enlarge the scope of the reference.[81] Even if a reference is made on an incorrect assumption, it is not open to the tribunal while so holding, to enlarge, by its own choice, the scope of the reference and widen the issues for decision and the field of inquiry including evidence.[82]In Jaipur Udyog, the court struck down the award on the ground that the tribunal went beyond the scope of reference.[83]

However, in Enfield India, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that a dispute expressly stated in the order of reference to be 'between the workman...and the management' is to be construed as a dispute between the workman represented by the union and the management.[84] In this case, though the union had been representing the workman with respect to his non-employment before the management and the conciliation officer, from the judgment it does not appear that the dispute was espoused by the union. Therefore, to say that the dispute was between the workmen of the employer company represented by the union and its management, is incorrect. It is well-settled that the government is bound by the report of the conciliation officer. In Sitaram Shirodkar, the case of the workman was that the employer had terminated his services while the case of the management was that the workman had abandoned the job by absenting from duty. However, the government made reference to the effect as to whether the action of the management in 'terminating the services' of the workman was 'legal and justified'. The Bombay High Court held that the reference proceeded only on the basis that 'there was termination of service' while completely leaving out the question of abandonment of job on the part of the workman. Thus, the only question left open for adjudication was as to whether the 'termination was legal and proper.' This disabled the tribunal from going into the question whether the workman had, in fact, abandoned his job. In this view of the matter, the court held that the reference was bad and could be quashed on certiorari.[85]

Adjudication of Individual Dispute: Karnataka Amendment

Section 10(4A) of the Industrial Disputes (Karnataka Amendment) Act 1987 states:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in section 9C and in this section, in the case of a dispute falling within the scope of section 2A, the individual workman concerned may, within six months from the date of communication to him of the order of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination or the date of commencement of the Industrial Disputes (Karnataka Amendment) Act 1987, whichever is later, apply, in the prescribed manner, to the labour court for adjudication of the dispute and the labour court shall dispose off such application in the same manner, as a dispute referred under sub-section (1).[86]

An application under sub-section (4A) may be made even in respect of a dispute pending consideration of the government for reference, on the date of the commencement of the Industrial Disputes (Karnataka Amendment) Act 1987. This entitles an individual workman directly to approach the labour court for adjudication of a dispute falling under s 2A of the Act instead of approaching it through the appropriate government asking for a reference of the dispute and the labour court shall dispose of the same 'in the same manner as a dispute referred under sub-s (1)'. Therefore, the consideration of the application under s 10(4A) is post-reference stage and shall be in the manner as if a dispute has been referred for adjudication under s 10(1). However, in order to invoke the adjudicatory machinery of the labour court, the existence of an 'industrial dispute' on the date of invoking the jurisdiction under s 10(4A) is a basic requirement the absence of which will take away the jurisdiction of the labour court to proceed further with adjudication. Therefore, every application made before the labour court under this provision, should not be treated as relating to a dispute that existed on the date of the application. The labour court is required to examine and form an opinion as to whether the dispute before it for adjudication existed, which could be adjudicated by it. Each case should be decided on its own merits. The question whether a dispute exists or not should be decided by the labour court taking into account several aspects. In Banavasi VS Sangh, a single judge of Karnataka High Court held that the fact that the government had earlier refused to refer the dispute for adjudication will, by itself, not bar the workmen from filing an application under this sub-section because this right is de hors the provisions of s 10.[87] In Bijapur Coop Milk Producers Society, the issue before the Supreme Court was about the date from which the ouster of jurisdiction of labour courts and tribunals in service disputes between a cooperative society and its employees became effective. The Karnataka Cooperative Societies Act 1959 was amended by Act 19 of 1976, by which service disputes between a cooperative society and its employees was to be referred to the Registrar for adjudication, and there was no specific provision therein to the extent of ousting the jurisdiction of labour courts and industrial tribunals, with the result that the Registrar of Cooperative Societies provided an alternative remedy in addition to the machinery provided under the ID Act. However, the said Amendment of 1976 was neither reserved for, not received, the assent of President. In the meantime, the said Act was further amended by Act 2 of 2000 specifically excluding the jurisdiction of labour courts and industrial tribunals coupled with a 'non obstante' clause. Specifically, two questions fell for the consideration of the Court.

(1) Whether the jurisdiction of Labour Court under the Industrial Disputes Act, was barred by section 70 of the Karnataka Cooperative Societies Act with reference to co-operative societies and if so, from when.

(2) Even if Labour Court had jurisdiction, whether the appellant was entitled to file an application under Section 10(4A) of Industrial Dispute Act in respect of a cause of action which occurred in 1978.

The decision of the Court on question (1) has been discussed in the preceding paragraphs. The learned Judge answered question (2), which directly falls under Section 10 of the Central Act as amended by Karnataka. With reference to this particular aspect, the facts of the case were: the appellant workman, whose service was terminated on 1-3-1980 approached the labour court under the amended s 10(4A). The labour court passed an award in 1996 holding that the workman had worked for more than 240 days in the year preceding termination and that his termination without complying with the provisions of s 25F was illegal and directed reinstatement with 50% back wages and continuity of service. The most significant fact of the case is that the termination of service of the workman was effected some 7 years before the Amended section came into force. The said award was quashed by the Division Bench of Karnataka High Court. Justice Raveendran, while interpreting that portion of the amended s 10(4A), ie, "the individual workman concerned may, within six months from the date of communication to him of the order of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination or the date of commencement of the Industrial Disputes (Karnataka Amendment) Act, 1987, whichever is later", held that the legislative intent behind the said portion of the amendment was not to revive stale or non-existing claims, but only ensures that claims which were live, by applying the six month rule in s 10(4A) as on the date when the section came into effect, have a minimum of six months' time to approach the Labour Court; and therefore, the words within six months from the date of commencement of the Karnataka Amendment 1987, whichever is later only enables those who had been communicated order of termination within six months prior to 7-4-1988, to apply under s 10(4A). On this view of the matter, the learned judge summarized the position with regard to question (2) above thus:

(i) In regard to termination orders communication on or after 7-4-1988, the outer limit for making an application under Section 10(4A) is six months from the date of communication of the order.

(ii) In regard to termination orders communicated during a period of six months prior to 7-4-1988, the period of limitation would be up to 7-10-1988 even though the six months' period from the date of communication may actually expire between 7-4-1988 to 7-10-1988.

(iii) In regard to termination orders communicated prior to 7-10-1987, no claim application under Section 10(4A), could be filed, as there is no provision for such applications. The remedy under section 10(1) (c) and (d) will continue to be available, subject, however, to the rule that stale and dead claims will not be referred.

The learned judge finally concluded thus:

> The intent of Section 10(4A) is to give a right to the aggrieved workman to challenge the termination order within six months from the date of accrual of cause of action and not to furnish an one time revival in regard to stale and non-existing claims. Therefore, a claim application of the petitioner filed on 4.10.1988 in regard to alleged termination on 1.3.1980 (or 19.2.1978 as found by the Labour Court) was not maintainable under Section 10(4A) of ID Act and could not have been entertained by the Labour Court... We, therefore, find no reason to interfere with the final order in the judgment of the High Court setting aside the award, though for different reasons. The appellant is not entitled to any relief. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed.[88] (Paras 30 & 31)

SUB-SECTION (5): POWER OF GOVERNMENT TO ADD PARTIES

This provision confers jurisdiction on the 'appropriate government' to include in an order of reference any other establishment, group or class of establishments of a similar nature, who in the opinion of the government are likely to be interested in or affected by, the dispute. The government has to form its opinion suo motu on an application being made to it. Further, the government can include such establishments, group or class of establishment, at the time of making an order of reference or at any time subsequent to that. It is not material whether at the time of inclusion of such establishments, group or class of establishments, any dispute actually exists or is apprehended in it.[89] The 'appropriate government' can, by a common order of reference, refer a common dispute between various establishments engaged in the same business and their respective workmen.[90] This provision contemplates the case of adding of parties to a reference which has already been made when the dispute involved is of such a nature that any other establishment, group or class of establishments of a similar nature is likely to be interested in or affected by such dispute. In such a case, the 'appropriate government' making the reference may, either at the time of making the reference or at any time thereafter, but before the submission of the award by the tribunal, include in that reference such establishment, group or class of establishments. This power can be exercised by the government even when such dispute did not exist or was not apprehended in that establishment, group or class of establishments at the time of such inclusion. This sub-section, therefore, applies to the establishment other than the one or ones who are parties to the 'industrial dispute' in respect of which a reference has been made under s 10(1)(d) of the Act.[91] The order under s 10(5) is an administrative order.[92]No doubt, the words 'any other establishment, group or class of establishments of a similar nature is likely to be interested in, or affected by such dispute' in this section are of wide amplitude. However, they cannot be interpreted so as to bring in the establishments in which a dispute cannot be raised on account of subsisting settlements. Otherwise, the result will be that even after adjudication in a reference, the parties bound by such adjudication could claim to be interested in or affected by a dispute in an establishment of a similar nature and seek to be included as parties to reference of such a dispute. The harmonious construction which could be placed on ss 10(1), 10(5), 18 and 19 of this Act is that parties who are bound by subsisting settlements cannot seek to be included in a reference by virtue of this provision even if such a reference is industry-wise. Furthermore, this sub-section does not override ss 18 and 19 of the Act.[93] Subject to the conditions mentioned in s 10(5), the 'appropriate government' is authorised to add other parties to a pending dispute.[94] However, under the guise of adding parties under s 10(5), the government cannot supersede the previous order of reference or substantially vary it. In DN Ganguly, the order of reference inter alia referred the point 'whether the dismissal of workmen in attached list A and the indefinite suspension of workmen in attached list B are justified'. By a subsequent notification, the government issued a corrigendum to the order of reference purporting to be under s 10(5), by which the names of the workmen in list B were included in list A and the names of workmen in list A were included in list B and also included further certain other names in list B. The Supreme Court held that the corrigendum including fresh names in list B in the circumstances of the case was beyond the powers of the state government and did not fall within the provisions of s 10(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act.[95] In Pioneer Ltd, the government, after making a reference of the dispute under s 3(1) of the Working Journalists and Other Newspaper Employees (Conditions of Service) and Miscellaneous Provisions Act 1955 read with s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 added parties to the reference and made certain other amendments to the original reference, which was challenged by the management. Rejecting the contention, DP Singh J of Allahabad High Court held that the government was entitled to add parties and to make the amendments to the reference.[96]

SUB-SECTION(6): BAR OF REFERENCE TO NATIONAL TRIBUNAL

Reference to National Tribunal bars reference to adjudication by Labour Court and Industrial Tribunal

Section 10(1A) empowers the Central Government to refer an industrial dispute to a national tribunal in the circumstances stated therein. However, sub-s (6) has been devised for avoiding multiplicity of proceedings which may result from such a reference. This provision bars adjudication upon any matter by a labour court or an industrial tribunal, when such matter has been referred for adjudication to a national tribunal, under sub-s (1A). The effect of the non-obstante clause is that irrespective of the other provisions in the Act, it is the national tribunal alone which will be seized of the matter referred to it after a reference under sub-s (1A) to the complete exclusion of adjudication by other adjudicatory authorities either under this Act or any state statute.

Pending proceedings to be deemed to have been quashed

This clause provides that if the matter, referred to the national tribunal under sub-s (1A), is at the time of such reference pending in a proceeding before a labour court or industrial tribunal, the proceeding before such labour court or tribunal, as the case may be, insofar as it relates to such matter, shall be deemed to have been quashed. The opening part and cl (a) are not independent of one another, but are linked together by the use of the word 'accordingly'. The combined effect of these provisions is not merely to impose a prohibition against proceeding with the inquiry before the tribunal, but there is also an obligation cast on the tribunal to treat the proceedings which would include the reference itself, as void as having been quashed by the reference to the national tribunal. This provision should be applied only if the tribunal is satisfied that the subject-matter of the specific reference in regard to which the provision is invoked, is comprised in the subject-matter of the general reference to the national tribunal.[97]

Appropriate Government barred from referring matter pending before the National Tribunal to any Labour Court or a Tribunal

This clause bars the 'appropriate government' from referring a matter to a labour court or an industrial tribunal for adjudication during the pendency of the proceeding in relation to such matter before the National Tribunal. The effect of this provision is that if such a matter is referred to a labour court or an industrial tribunal for adjudication, the order of reference shall be void ab initio and the labour court or the industrial tribunal shall have no jurisdiction to proceed with the adjudication.

Explanation—The effect of the explanation is that not only the reference of a matter pending adjudication before a national tribunal cannot be made to any labour court or industrial tribunal under the Industrial Disputes Act 1947, but that such reference cannot be made even to adjudicatory authorities under the state statutes as well. Further, if such a matter is pending before anyone of such adjudicatory authorities under any state statute, it shall be deemed to have been quashed.

SUB-SECTION (7): CENTRAL GOVERNMENT IS THE APPROPRIATE GOVERNMENT - REFERENCE TO NATIONAL TRIBUNAL

This sub-section provides that if a dispute is referred to a national tribunal, then notwithstanding anything contained in ss 15, 17, 19, 33A and 36A, the 'appropriate government' in relation to such dispute shall be the Central Government.

SUB-SECTION (8): ABATEMENT

This sub-section has been inserted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[1]It lays down that by reason of the death of a workman who was a party to an industrial dispute pending adjudication before a layout court, tribunal or national tribunal, the proceedings before such adjudicatory authority will not abate. However, the adjudicator will have to complete such proceedings and submit his award to the appropriate government. The scope of adjudication by the adjudicatory authority under the Act is much wider than the determination of the legal rights of the parties involved in redressing the grievances of an aggrieved workman in accordance with law. Resolution of industrial disputes by such authorities is necessary for industrial peace notwithstanding the death of the workmen concerned pending proceedings.[2] This provision gives effect to the law evolved by the Supreme Court when the maxim 'actio personalis moritur cum persona, a personal action dies with the person' has limited application. It operates in a limited class of actions, ex delicto actions such as for damages for defamation, assault or other personal injuries not causing the death of the party, and in other actions where after the death of the party, the relief granted could not be enjoyed or granting it would be nugatory.[3] This maxim 'though part of English law, has been subjected to criticism even in England. It has been dubbed as an unjust maxim, obscure in its origin, inaccurate in its expression and uncertain in its application. It has often caused grave injustice'.[4] The applicability of this maxim depends upon the 'relief claimed and the facts of each case. By and large, the industrial dispute under s 2A of the Act relates to wrongful termination of services of a workman. In the event of death of the workman during the pendency of the proceedings, the relief of reinstatement, obviously, cannot be granted. However, the final determination of the issues involved in the reference may be relevant for regulating the conditions of service of other workmen in the industry. The adjudicatory authorities under the Act are the instruments for achieving the primary object of the Act to bring industrial peace. The death of a workman during the pendency of proceedings, therefore, cannot deprive his heirs or the legal representatives of their right to continue the proceedings and claim the benefits as successors to the deceased workmen.[5]

The Bombay High Court in Ambabai Amin, observed that this provision implies that the effective hearing of the dispute must continue despite the death of one of the parties and an order on merits of the rival contentions should be pronounced and not that an award dismissing the reference or rejecting the claim simpliciter should be passed by reason of the death. This provision can only be read to imply that the cause of action which is not personal to the Worker will ensure for the benefit of his heirs and legal representatives and will be gone into by the tribunal which will dispose of the matters referred to it as are necessary for deciding these points. In other words, this provision makes it unequivocally clear that the adjudication proceedings will not abate even if the dispute was of an 'individual' nature and the relief could only be given to the workman himself.[6] For instance, in case of wrongful termination of the service of an individual workman, where he claims the relief of reinstatement and back wages, the tribunal will continue the adjudication proceedings even after the death of the workman. In case he is awarded reinstatement with back wages, the heirs and successors of the deceased workman will be entitled to the back wages and other benefits from the date of termination of the service to the date of death of the workman. However, in such a case, the reinstatement of the workman will be notional for quantifying the benefits up to the date of his death. A single judge of the Karnataka High Court, held that even if the workmen dies while the dispute is in the conciliation stage before a conciliation officer, the dispute will not abate by reason of the death of the workman and the legal representatives of the workman can be brought on record in the conciliation proceedings and continue the same.[7] The provisions of this sub-section should be deemed to apply to all references and other proceedings which were pending on that day.[8] In view of s 10(8), an industrial dispute does not come to an end with the death of the workman, and his legal heirs can initiate and prosecute the industrial dispute.[9]

---

25 Poona Labour Union v State of Maharashtra (1969) 2 LLJ 291, 293 (Bom) (DB), per Madon J.

26 Travancore Mineral Workers' Union v Govt of India (1957-58) 12 FJR 180 (Punj), per Bishan Narain J.

27 Indian Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Triegi Nath (1965) 1 LLJ 620, 628 : AIR 1964 Cal 102 [LNIND 1963 CAL 132] (Cal) (DB), per Mitter J.

28 Vallamalai Estate v Workers of Vallamalai Estate (1973) 1 LLJ 273 [LNIND 1972 MAD 165], 276-77 (Mad) (DB), per Veeraswami CJ.

29 Toronto Rly Co v Corpn of City of Toronto [1904] AC 809.

30 Free Press Labour Union v State of Madras (1951) 2 LLJ 302 (Mad), per K Naidu J.

31 Travancore Mineral Workers' Union v Government of India 12 FJR 180 (Punj), per Bishnu Narain J.

32 Karamchand Thapar & Bros Ltd v Clerical Employees 4 FJR 365, 371 (LAT).

33 HD Singh v Reserve Bank of India 1985 Lab IC 1733, 1738 : AIR 1986 SC 132 [LNIND 1985 SC 278]: (1986) I LLJ 127(SC), per Khalid J.

34 Inder Mohan v Union of India CWP No 2646 of 1982 (Delhi).

35 Cf, Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 866 [LNIND 1967 SC 226] (SC), per Mitter J.

36 Ganges Printing Ink Factory EIC Societies Ltd v 7th IT 1985 Lab IC 1762 (Cal), per Padma Khastgir J.

37 Mysore City PGW Assn v State of Karnataka 1984 Lab IC 1735, 1737 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

38 Workmen of Edward Keventers Pvt Ltd v Delhi Admn 1969 ILR Del 767(DB), per HR Khanna CJ.

39 Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes, 1969, 12th ed, p 1.

40 Shahdara-Saharanpur Light Rly Co Ltd v SS Rly Workers' Union (1969) 1 LLJ 734 [LNIND 1968 SC 281], 749 (SC), per Shelat J.

41 Keventers Karamchari Sangh v Lt Governor, Delhi (1971) 2 LLJ 375 [LNIND 1970 DEL 70] (Del) (DB), per Andley J.

42 Delhi Administration v Workmen of Edward Keventers 1978 Lab IC 706, 707 : AIR 1978 SC 976 [LNIND 1978 SC 31] (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

43 Badri Narayan Saha v Union of India (1999) 3 LLN 365 (Pat) (DB), per Sharma J.

44 Dewar's Garage (I) Pvt Ltd v Third IT 1977 Lab IC 86 (NOC) (Cal), per Hazra J.

45 Maharaja Kishangarh Mills Ltd v State of Rajasthan AIR 1953 Raj 188 [LNIND 1953 RAJ 188], 190-91, per Ranawat J.

46 AK Kaliappa Chettiar and Sons v State of Kerala (1970) 1 LLJ 97 (Ker), per Isaac J.

47 Keventers Karamchari Sangh v Lieutenant Governor, Delhi (1971) 2 LLJ 375 [LNIND 1970 DEL 70] (Del), per Andley J.

48 Eenadu Press Workers Union v Govt of AP (1979) 1 LLJ 391 (AP) (DB), per Kuppuswami J.

49 Mysore City P&GW Assn v State of Karnataka 1984 Lab IC 1735, 1738 (Kant), per Rarna Jois J.

50 Harish Bijaykumar Khaitan v State of Maharashtra 1987 Lab IC 836, 840 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

51 Birla Tyres Workers Union v State of Orissa (2011) 3 LLJ 859 : 111 (2011) CLT 554 (Orr), per Mahapatra J.

52 Coats India v State of Bihar (2011) 4 LLJ 872 (Pat), per SP Singh J.

53 Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd v Second Punjab Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 460 [LNIND 1957 SC 1], 470 (SC), per Bhagwati J. .

54 Ujjambai v State of Uttar Pradesh AIR 1962 SC 1621 [LNIND 1962 SC 584], 1629, per SK Das J.

55 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245, 253 (FC), per Mahajan J.

56 United Commercial Bank Ltd v Workmen (1951) 1 LLJ 621 [LNIND 1951 SC 26], 630 : AIR 1951 SC 230 [LNIND 1951 SC 26] (SC), per Kania CJI.

57 Jai Bhagwan v Mgmt of Ambala CCB Ltd 1983 Lab IC 1694, 1696 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

58 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4], 931 (SC), per Mahajan J.

59 State of Madras v CP Sarathy (1953) 1 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1952 SC 84] (SC), per Patanjali Sastri CJI.

60 Cawnpore Tannery Ltd v S Guha (1961) 2 LLJ 110 [LNIND 1960 SC 266], 112 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

61 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 767 (SC), per Shah J.

62 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 257 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

63 Basti Sugar Mills Co Ltd v State v Uttar Pradesh (1978) 2 LLJ 412 [LNIND 1978 SC 232], 419 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

64 JK Cotton Spg and Weaving Mills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 157], 444 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

65 Patna Electric Supply Co Ltd v Panza Electric Supply Workers' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1959 SC 75], 370 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

66 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245, 256 : AIR 1949 FC 111 (FC), per Mahajan J.

67 Bidi, Bidi Leaves and TM Assn v State of Bombay (1961) 2 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1961 SC 353], 670 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

68 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Kania CJI.

69 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) 1 LLJ 245 (FC), per Mahajan J.

70 The Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of the Bharat Bank Ltd., Delhi and The Bharat Bank Employees' Union, Delhi (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4], 948 : AIR 1950 SC 188 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Mukherjee J.

71 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Brijnandan Pandey (1956) 2 LLJ 444 [LNIND 1956 SC 77], 449 (SC) ; AIR 1957 SC 1 [LNIND 1956 SC 77]; (1957) 27 AWR 210, : 1957 (5) BLJR 26, per SK Das J.

72 Premier Automobiles v KS Wadke (1975) 2 LLJ 445 [LNIND 1975 SC 299], 450 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2238 [LNIND 1975 SC 299]: [1975] (31) FLR 195 : 1975 Lab IC 1651 : (1976) 1 SCC 496 [LNIND 1975 SC 299], per Untwalia J.

73 Ludwig Teller, Labour Disputes & Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 536.

74 Patna Electric Supply Co v Patna Electric Supply Co Workers' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1959 SC 75], 370 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

75 Niemla Textile Finishing Mills Ltd v Second Punjab Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 460 [LNIND 1957 SC 1] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

76 Rai Bahadur Diwan Badri Das v Industrial Tribunal (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], 370 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 630 [LNIND 1962 SC 293]: [1963] 3 SCR 930 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], per Gajendragadkar J.

77 Punjab National Bank Ltd v IT (1957) 1 LLJ 455 [LNIND 1956 SC 113], 458 (SC), per SK Das J.

78 General Secretary, Madras Harbour Workers' Union v IT (1972) 1 LLJ 8, 14(Mad), per Palaniswamy J.

79 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4], 932 (SC), per Mahajan J.

80 Sussanah Sharp v Wakefield [1891] AC 173, 179, per Lord LC Halsbury.

81 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Brijnandan Pandey (1956) 2 LLJ 444 [LNIND 1956 SC 77], 449 (BC), per SK Das J.

82 New Maneckchowk Spg and Wvg Co Ltd v Textile Labour Association (1961) 1 LLJ 521 [LNIND 1960 SC 321], 526 (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 867 [LNIND 1960 SC 321]: [1961] 3 SCR 1 [LNIND 1960 SC 321], per Wanchoo J.

83 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 767 (SC), per Shah J.

84 RB Dewan Badri Das v IT (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], 370 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

85 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen CAS No 856, 1475 & 2119 of 1968 (SC) per Shelat J.

86 Workmen of Dharampal Premchand (Saughandhi) v Mgmt (1965) 1 LLJ 668 [LNIND 1965 SC 83], 673 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

87 Harinagar Cane Farm v State of Bihar (1963) 1 LLJ 692 [LNIND 1963 SC 71], 695 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

88 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 257 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

89 Western India Match Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 459 [LNIND 1963 SC 142], 463-64 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

90 NR Mukherjee v Arnold Hartman Just AIR 1961 Cal 95 [LNIND 1960 CAL 112] (DB), per Lahiri CJ.

91 Workmen of Dahingeapar Tea Estate v Dahingeapar Tea Estate (1958) 2 LLJ 498 [LNIND 1958 SC 79] (SC), per SK Das J.

92 Mgmt of OSRT Corporation v IT (1998) 3 LLN 470 (Ori) (DB), per Pasayat J.

1 Delhi Cloth and Genl Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 767-68 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 919 [LNIND 1968 SC 298]: [1970] (20) FLR 176 : 1970 Lab IC 78, per Shah J.

2 Rifle Factory Co-op Society Ltd v Fourth IT (1960) 2 LLJ 517 [LNIND 1959 CAL 4], 521 (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

3 JK Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Iron & Steel Mazdoor Union (1956) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1955 SC 119], 234 (SC), per Bose J.

4 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438 (SC), per Shelat J.

5 Harinagar Lime Farm v State of Bihar (1963) 1 LLJ 692 [LNIND 1963 SC 71], 695 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

6 Rai Bahadur Diwan Badri Das v Industrial Tribunal (1962) 2 LLJ 366 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], 370 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 630 [LNIND 1962 SC 293], per Gajendragadkar J.

7 State of Bombay v Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (1960) 1 LLJ 251 [LNIND 1960 SC 19], 257 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

8 Madras Gymkhana Club Employees' Union v Gymkhana Club (1967) 2 LLJ 720 [LNIND 1967 SC 292] (SC), per Hidayatulla J.

9 HD Singh v Reserve Bank of India 1985 Lab IC 1733, 1738 (SC), per Khalid J.

10 Assam Chah Karmachari Sangha v Assam Co Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 157 (LAT).

11 Ghatge and Patil CE Union v G&P (Tpt) Pvt Ltd (1968) 1 LLJ 566 [LNIND 1967 SC 239], 570 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 503 [LNIND 1967 SC 238]: [1968] 1 SCR 300 [LNIND 1967 SC 238], per Hidayatullah J.

12 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 1334 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], per Shelat J.

13 Hathising Manufacturing Co Ltd v Union of India (1960) 2 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1960 SC 122] (SC), per Shah J.

14 Ludwig Teller, Labour Disputes and Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 536.

15 Bombay Labour Union v International Franchises Ltd (1966) 1 LLJ 417 [LNIND 1965 SC 294], 419 (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 942 [LNIND 1965 SC 294]: : [1966] 2 SCR 493 [LNIND 1965 SC 294], per Wanchoo J.

16 Doom Dooma Circle Cha Mazdoor Sangh v Budla Beta Tea Estate (1953) 2 LLJ 828 (LAT).

17 Orissa Cement Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 91 [LNIND 1960 SC 86] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

18 Bangalore WCS Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 555 [LNIND 1967 SC 274]-65 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 585 [LNIND 1967 SC 273]: : [1968] 1 SCR 581 [LNIND 1967 SC 273], per Vaidialingam J.

19 State of Bihar v PO, IT 1977 Lab IC 803, 807-09 (Pat) (DB).

20 Western India Automobile Assn v IT (1949) LLJ 245 (FC), per Mahajan J.

21 Ludwig Teller, Labour Disputes and Collective Bargaining, 1940, Vol 1, p 536.

22 Workmen of Willamson Milgor & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1982) 1 LLJ 33 [LNIND 1981 SC 452] (SC), per Baharul Islam J.

23 Tocklai Experimental Station v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 694 [LNIND 1961 SC 361], 697-98 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

24 Gujarat Engineering Co v Ahmedabad Misc Industrial Workers' Union (1961) 2 LLJ 660, 662 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

25 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 767 (SC), per Shah J.

26 Imperial Chemical Industries (Ind) Pvt Ltd v Workmen [1961] 2 SCR 349 [LNIND 1960 SC 268], 354, per Gajendragadkar J.

27 Abhey Raj Singh v LC (1998) 1 LLN 668 (P&H) (DB).

28 A Sambanthan v PO Addl LC (1998) 3 LLN 388, 392 (Mad), per Balasubramanian J.

29 Workmen of Andrew Yule & Co Ltd v Eighth IT (1999) 1 LLN 722, 725 (Cal), per Sinha J.

30 Workmen of KGID v Principal IT (1999) 3 LLN 219 (Kant), per Gopala Gowda J.

31 Blow Plast Ltd v NSH Mashraqui (1997) 4 LLN 430 (Bom).

32 First Flight Couriers Ltd v KCCGE Union (2001) 4 LLN 1221 (Kant), per Chinnappa J.

33 LIC of India v IT (2002) 1 LLN 305 (Ker), per Hariharan Nair J.

34 Muir Mills Ltd v Suti Mill Mazdoor Union (1955) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1954 SC 159], 6 (SC) : AIR 1955 SC 170 [LNIND 1954 SC 159]: [1955] 1 SCR 991 [LNIND 1954 SC 159], per Bhagwati J.

35 JK Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Iron and Steel Mazdoor Union, Kanpur AIR 1956 SC 231 [LNIND 1955 SC 119]: (1956) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1955 SC 119] SC : [1955] 2 SCR 1315 [LNIND 1955 SC 119] : 1955 SCR (2) 1315

36 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Sri Ram Kanwar, Industrial Tribunal (1957) 1 LLJ 455 [LNIND 1956 SC 113], 456-58 (SC) : 1957 (1) An WR 53 : [1957] 1 SCR 220 [LNIND 1956 SC 113], per SK Das J.

37 Crown Aluminimum Works v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1957 SC 106],6 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

38 State of Mysore v Workers in Gold Mines (1958) 2 LLJ 479 [LNIND 1958 SC 82], 484 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

39 Rashtriya Mill Mazdoor Sangh v Apollo Mills Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 263 [LNIND 1960 SC 72], 271 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

40 JK Cotton Spg and Wvg Mills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 435, 444 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

41 Ahmedabad Mfg and Calico Ptg Co Ltd v Ram Tahel Ramnand (1972) 2 LLJ 165 [LNIND 1972 SC 226], 174 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1598 [LNIND 1972 SC 226]: 1972 Lab IC 864 [LNIND 1972 SC 226] : (1972) 1 SCC 898 [LNIND 1972 SC 226], per Dua J.

42 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1968 SC 193], 242 (SC), per Shelat J.

43 Burmah Shell OS&D Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 363, 366 (SC), per Hegde J.

44 Indian Express Newspapers (B) Pvt Ltd v Employees Union (1978) 2 LLJ 11 [LNIND 1978 SC 97] (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1137 [LNIND 1978 SC 97]: [1978] (36) FLR 333 : 1978 Lab IC 848 : (1978) 2 SCC 188 [LNIND 1978 SC 97], per Krishna Iyer J.

45 Basti Sugar Mills Co Ltd v State of UP (1978) 2 LLJ 412 [LNIND 1978 SC 232], 419 (SC) : AIR 1979 SC 262 [LNIND 1978 SC 232]: 1979 Lab IC 129 [LNIND 1978 SC 232] : (1979) 2 SCC 88 [LNIND 1978 SC 232], per Krishna Iyer J.

46 Western India Vegetable Products Ltd v Workmen CA 497 of 1966 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

47 Central Inland Water Transport Corpn Ltd v Second LC 1971 Lab IC 229, 236 (Cal), per BC Mitra J.

48 Central Bank of India Ltd v PS Rajagopalan (1963) 2 LLJ 89 [LNIND 1963 SC 117], 94 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

49 Workmen of Cochin Port Trust v Board of Trustees 1978 Lab IC 1111 [LNIND 1978 SC 158], 1115 (SC), per Untwalia J.

50 State of UP v Nawab Hussain 1977 Lab IC 911 [LNIND 1977 SC 167], 913 (SC) : AIR 1977 SC 1680 [LNIND 1977 SC 167]: (1977) 2 SCC 806 [LNIND 1977 SC 167] : [1977] 3 SCR 428 [LNIND 1977 SC 167], per Singhal J.

51 DP Dunderdale v GP Mukherjee (1958) 2 LLJ 183 [LNIND 1958 CAL 103] (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

52 Burn and Co Ltd v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 226 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], 230 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 38 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], per Venkatarama Aiyyar J.

53 India General Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 561 [LNIND 1960 SC 89]-62 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

54 Workmen of Straw Board Mfg Co Ltd v Mgmt (1974) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1974 SC 114] (SC), per Goswami J.

55 Sankar Prasad Banerjee v Central Government, Labour Court (1975) 1 LLJ 71 (Cal) (DB) : 78 CWN 780, per SK Datta J.

56 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 276 [LNIND 1984 SC 6], 286 (SC), per Desai J.

57 Punjab Cooperative Bank Ltd v RS Bhatia (1975) 2 LLJ 373, 375 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1898 [LNIND 1975 SC 537]: 1975 Lab IC 1439 : (1975) 4 SCC 696 [LNIND 1975 SC 537], per Untwalia J.

58 Bombay Gas Co Ltd v Jagannath Pandurang (1975) 2 LLJ 345 [LNIND 1975 SC 268], 351 (SC), per Alagiriswami J.

59 Mumbai Kamgar Sabha v Abdulbhai Fazullabhai (1976) 2 LLJ 186 [LNIND 1976 SC 84], 203 (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 1455 [LNIND 1976 SC 84]: (1976) 3 SCC 832 [LNIND 1976 SC 84] : [1976] 3 SCR 591 [LNIND 1976 SC 84] per Krishna Iyer J.

60 Deepak Puri v Fifth IT, 1986 Lab IC 132, 136 (Cal), per UC Banerjee J.

61 Workmen of Straw Board Mfg Co Ltd v Mgmt (1974) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], 501 (SC), per Goswami J.

62 National Projects Construction Corpn Ltd v Workers Union 1974 Lab I C 812, 814-15 (All), per Gopi Nath J.

63 Dalmia Dadri Cement Ltd v Avtar Narain Gujral (1962) 1 LLJ 261 [LNIND 1962 SC 65] (SC), per Venkatarama Aiyyar J.

64 National Tobacco Co Ltd v Miriyala Kalidas (1962) 2 LLJ 207 (AP), per Chandra Reddi CJ.

65 Mathura Prasad Bajoo Jaiswal v DNB Jeejeebhoy AIR 1971 SC 2355 [LNIND 1970 SC 84], 2359 : (1970) 1 SCC 613 [LNIND 1970 SC 84], per Shah J.

66 Rajendra Jha v PO, LC 1984 Lab IC 1583 [LNIND 1984 SC 218] (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

67 Bharat Barrel & Drum Mfg Co Pvt Ltd v Bharat Barrel Employees Union (1987) 1 LLJ 492 [LNIND 1987 SC 375], 497 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 1415 [LNIND 1987 SC 375]: (1987) 2 SCC 591 [LNIND 1987 SC 375], per Venkataramiah J.

68 Punjab State Coop Bank Ltd v Presiding Officer, Labour Court (1993) 2 LLJ 260, 262 (P&H) (DB) : (1993) 103 PLR 310 [LNIND 1992 PNH 59], per Bahri J.

69 B Choudhury v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1755, 1758 (Pat) (DB), per Nagendra Prasad Singh J.

70 Workmen of Straw Board Mfg Co Ltd v Straw Board Manufacturing Co. Ltd. (1974) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], 510 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 1132 [LNIND 1974 SC 114]: [1974] (28) FLR 357 : 1974 Lab IC 730 [LNIND 1974 SC 114] : (1974) 4 SCC 681 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], per Goswami J.

71 Bharat Barrel & Drum Mfg Co Pvt Ltd v BB Employees Union (1987) 1 LLJ 492 [LNIND 1987 SC 375], 497 (SC), per Venkataramiah J.

72 Army & Navy Stores Ltd v Workmen (1951) 2 LLJ 31 (LAT).

73 Burn & Co Ltd v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 226 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], 229 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 38 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], per Venkatarama Aiyyar J.

74 India General Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 561 [LNIND 1960 SC 89], 562 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1286 [LNIND 1960 SC 89], per Wanchoo J.

75 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Workmen, (1962) 1 LLJ 287 [LNIND 1962 SC 87], 288-90 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

76 Workmen of Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd, v Mgmt (1964) 1 LLJ 380 [LNIND 1963 SC 248], 383-84 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 728 [LNIND 1963 SC 248], per Gajendragadkar J.

77 Shahdara-Saharanpur Light Rly Co Ltd v Workers Union (1969) 1 LLJ 734 [LNIND 1968 SC 281], 742 (SC), per Shelat J.

78 Workmen of Balmer Lawrie & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1964) 1 LLJ 380 [LNIND 1963 SC 248], 381-84 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

79 Bengal Chemical & Pharmaceutical Works Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 413 [LNIND 1959 SC 13] (SC), per Subba Rao J.

80 Bengal Chemical & Pharmaceutical Works Ltd v Workmen (1969) I LLJ 751, 756 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 360 [LNIND 1968 SC 279], per Vaidialingam J.

81 Cf, Bombay Gas Co Ltd v Jaganath Pandurang (1975) 2 LLJ 345 [LNIND 1975 SC 268] (SC), per Alagiriswami J.

82 Varahalakshmi Rice and Oils Mills v Industrial Tribunal (1960) 2 LLJ 473 (AP), per Seshachalapathi J.

83 Trichinopoly Mills Ltd v NCT Mills Workers Union (1960) 2 LLJ 46, 48 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1003 [LNIND 1960 SC 6],, per Gajendragadkar J.

84 Chittivalasa Jute Mills v BV Rao (1989) 2 LLJ 76, 80 (AP) : 1989 (1) APLJ 473, per Panduranga Rao J.

85 Shoba Puri v Sadhu Ram 1987 Lab IC 1751 (Del), per Sunanda Bhandare J.

86 Sankar Prasad Banerjee v Central Government, Labour Cour t (1975) 1 LLJ 71, 76 (Cal) (DB) : 78 CWN 780, per SK Datta J.

87 Workmen of Straw Board Mfg Co Ltd v Straw Board Manufacturing Co. Ltd. (1974) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], 510 (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 1132 [LNIND 1974 SC 114]: [1974] (28) FLR 357 : 1974 Lab IC 730 [LNIND 1974 SC 114] : (1974) 4 SCC 681 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], per Goswami J.

88 Workmen of Theosophical Society v Govt of TN (1992) 1 LLJ 375, 378 (Mad), per Kanakaraj J.

89 DP Dunderdale v GP Mukherjee (1958) 2 LLJ 183 [LNIND 1958 CAL 103], 189-90 (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

90 Sir Sobha Singh & Sons Pvt Ltd v Delhi Administration (1968) 1 LLJ 752, 754 (Punj), per SK Kapur J.

91 DP Dunderdale v GP Mukherjee (1958) 2 LLJ 183 [LNIND 1958 CAL 103], 189-90 (Cal), PB Mukharji J.

92 Indian Statistical Institute v State of West Benga1 1975 Lab IC 99 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

93 Walford Transport Ltd v First IT (1961) 2 LLJ 25, 28-29 (Cal), per Ray J.

94 Mgmt of Rajagopal Transport Pvt Ltd v State of TN (1974) 2 LLJ 154 (Mad) (DB).

1 Indodan Milk Products Ltd v LC (1992) 2 LLJ 234 [LNIND 1991 ALL 536], 237 (All) per Palok Basu J.

2 Rifle Factory Co-op Society Ltd v Fourth IT (1960) 2 LLJ 517 [LNIND 1959 CAL 4] (Cal), per PB Mukharji J.

3 Tamil Nadu Madurai v Working Journalists (1958) 2 LLJ 752 [LNIND 1958 MAD 100], 756 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

4 Manabendra Kumar Choudhury v First Labour Court (1992) 1 LLJ 455 [LNIND 1989 CAL 354], 457 (Cal) : 94 CWN 743, per K Ganguly J.

5 Mgmt of Food Corpn of India v IT 1992 Lab IC 2059, 2066 (Ori) (DB), per Hansaria J.

6 Bengal River Transport Assn v Calcutta PS Union 1978 Lab IC 1416 (Cal), per Amiya Kumar Mookerji J.

7 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Kania CJI.

8 RS Ramdayal Ghasiram Oil Mills v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1963) 2 LLJ 65 [LNIND 1962 SC 415], 67-68 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 567 [LNIND 1962 SC 415]: 1964 (66) Bom LR98, per Mudholkar J.

9 Calcutta Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v CES Workers Union AIR 1959 SC 1191, 1192, per Gajendragadkar J.

10 Pottery Mazdoor Panchayat v Perfect Pottery Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 827, 829 (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

11 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 423 [LNIND 1966 SC 261] (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 469 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], per Mitter J.

12 Mgmt of Madhadevi Textile Mills v Addl IT 1976 Lab IC 1284, 1288 (Kant), per Shetty J.

13 Jhagrakhand Collieries Pvt Ltd v CGIT (1960) 2 LLJ 71 [LNIND 1960 SC 41] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

14 Jardine Henderson Ltd v State of West Bengal 1969 Lab IC 1259, 1261 (Cal), per TK Basu J.

15 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workers (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 234 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

16 Sheshrao Bhaduji Hatwar v PO, First Labour Court (1992) 1 LLJ 672, 674 (Bom) (DB), per Mohta J.

17 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 438, per Shelat J.

18 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 423 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], 431 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 469 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], per Mitter J.

19 Uttar Pradesh SEB v PO, IT (2002) 2 LLN 41 (All), per Singh J.

20 WPAR Ramamoorthy v Tirunelveli Dist National Plantation Workers' Union (1963) 1 LLJ 507 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

21 Hindustan Housing Factory Ltd v Hindustan Housing Factory Employees' Union 1969 Lab IC 1450 (Del), per Tatachari J.

22 Workmen of Mysore Paper Mills Ltd v Mysore Paper Mills Ltd 1970 Lab IC 1113, 1116-17 (Mys) (DB).

23 Hindustan Steel Ltd v IT-cum-LC 1971 Lab IC 241 (MP) (DB), per Bishambhar Dayal CJ.

24 A Raman v KN Vani (1982) 2 LLJ 1 (Bom), per Pendse J.

25 Indian Oxygen Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 235 [LNIND 1968 SC 193] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 306 [LNIND 1968 SC 193]: [1969] 1 SCR 550 [LNIND 1968 SC 193], per Shelat J.

26 Jaipur Udyog Ltd v CWK Sangh (1972) 1 LLJ 437 [LNIND 1972 SC 66] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1352 [LNIND 1972 SC 66]: 1972 Lab IC 676 [LNIND 1972 SC 66], per Mitter J.

27 Firestone Tyre India Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1981) 2 LLJ 218 [LNIND 1981 SC 294], 221 (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 1626 [LNIND 1981 SC 294]: 1981 Lab IC 1110 [LNIND 1981 SC 294], per Gupta J.

28 Central Inland Water Tpt Corpn Ltd v Seventh IT (1983) 1 LLJ 157, 162 (Cal) (DB) : AIR 1983 SC 658 [LNIND 1983 SC 147]: (1983) 3 SCC 401 [LNIND 1983 SC 147], per Pyne J.

29 Glaxo Laboratories (India) Ltd v PO, LC 1977 Lab IC 1523, 1533-34 (AP) (DB), per Sheth J.

30 EID Parry (India) 1990 Lab IC NOC 135 (Mad) (DB).

31 Senior Regional Manager, HPCL v PO, IT (2002) 4 LLN 893 (AP) (DB), per Nayak J.

32 State Bank of India v IT (2002) 4 LLN 909 (AP) (DB), per Nayak J.

33 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 423 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], 427 (SC), per Mitter J.

34 Industry Publishers Ltd v Lal Mohan Pal 6 FJR 285 (LAT).

35 Hukumchand Jute Mills Ltd v Labour Appelate Tribunal AIR 1958 Cal 68 [LNIND 1957 CAL 151], 70, per Sinha J.

36 Jaipur Spg & Weaving Mills Ltd v Jaipur SWMM Mazdoor Union (1959) 2 LLJ 656 (Raj) (DB), per Chhangani J.

37 Workmen of Harrisions & Crosfield Ltd v Harrisions & Crosfield Ltd (1969) 1 LLJ 61, 64 (Ker), per Issac J.

38 PPMS Nagarathnam v State of Madras (1965) 1 LLJ 84 (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

39 Hotel Imperial v Hotel Workers' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 544 [LNIND 1959 SC 136] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

40 Punjab National Bank Ltd v AN Sen (1952) 1 LLJ 371 (Punj) (DB), per Harnam Singh J.

41 Workmen of Kettlewell Bullen & Co Ltd v Mgmt (1960) 2 LLJ 189 (Cal) (DB), per Bachawat J.

42 Nilgiris Tea Estates Ltd v Workmen of Stagbrook Estate (1961) 2 LLJ 573 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

43 Workmen of Indian Turpentine & Rosin Co Ltd v Mgmt (1961) 1 LLJ 208 [LNIND 1960 SC 111] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

44 Kirloskar Bros Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 732 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

45 Aluminium Factory Workers' Union v Indian Aluminium Co Ltd (1962) 1 LLJ 210 [LNIND 1962 SC 26] (SC), per Sarkar J.

46 Route Committee, Bengal Bus Syndicate v Rashtriya BM Congress (1953) 1 LLJ 61 (LAT).

47 Hindustan Steel Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 253 (Ori) (DB), per Narasimham CJ.

48 Workmen of Calcutta Port Commr v Employers CA Nos 1220 & 1222 of 1968, (SC), per Bhargava J.

49 Cement Works Karmachari Sangh v IT 1971 Lab IC 143, 152 (Raj), per Tyagi J.

50 Assam Oil Co Ltd v PO, CGIT 1976 Lab IC 216, 220 (Gau) (DB), per Islam J.

51 Indian Farmers Fertiliser Co-operative Ltd v IT 1991 Lab IC 1747, 1753 (All), per Mehrotra J.

52 Airlines Hotel Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1961 SC 16] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

53 Express Beedi Factory v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 669 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

54 DCM Chemical Works v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 338, 389 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

55 Jaipur Spg and Weaving Mills Ltd v Jaipur SWMM Union (1959) 2 LLJ 656 (Raj) (DB), per Chhangani J.

56 Hukumchand Jute Mills Ltd v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1959) 1 LLJ 595 (Cal), per Sinha J.

57 Workmen of Bengal Electric Lamp Works Ltd v Mgmt (1958) 1 LLJ 571 [LNIND 1958 CAL 49] (Cal), per Mukharji J.

58 KP Dos and Co Ltd v Howrah Zillah Loha Karkhana Mazdoor Congress (1956) 1 LLJ 679 (LAT).

59 Spencer and Co Ltd v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1954) 2 LLJ 310 (Mad), per Balkrishna Iyer J.

60 Royal Calcutta Golf Club v Third IT (1960) 1 LLJ 464 (Cal), per Sinha J.

61 Teok Tea Estate v LC (1962) 1 LLJ 178 (Assam), per Deka CJ.

62 Birla Cotton, Spg and Weaving Mills Ltd v Workmen (1956) 2 LLJ 188 (LAT).

63 Industry Publishers Ltd v Lal Mohan Pal 6 FJR 285 (LAT).

64 Workmen of British India Corpn Ltd v British India Corpn Ltd (1965) 2 LLJ 433 [LNIND 1964 SC 290] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

65 K Venkatachalam v Ashok Leyland Ltd (1968) 2 LLJ 807 (Mad), per Kaliasam J.

66 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Workmen 1968 Lab IC 82 (Pat) (DB), per ABN Sinha J.

67 Jardine Henderson Ltd v State of West Bengal 1969 Lab IC 1259, 1291 (Cal), per TK Basu J.

68 Burmah-Shell OS & D Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 124 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

69 Balaji Vegetable Products Pvt Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh 1982 Lab IC (Noq 130 (All), per KS Varma J.

70 India Paper Pulp Co Ltd v India PPW Union (1949) 1 LLJ 258 (FC), per Kania CJI.

71 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1967) 1 LLJ 423 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], 427 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 469 [LNIND 1966 SC 261]: AIR 1967 SC 469 [LNIND 1966 SC 261], per Mitter J.

72 State Bank of India v Workmen [1959] LIC 483 (LAT).

73 Hotel Imperial v Chief Commr of Delhi (1957) 1 LLJ 92 (Punj) (DB).

74 Agra Electric Supply Co Ltd, Agra v Workmen (1983) 1 LLJ 304, 305 (SC), per Krishna Iyer J.

75 Commr of Police v Gordhandas Bhanji AIR 1952 SC 16 [LNIND 1951 SC 63], per Bose J.

76 Express Newspapers Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 227, 234 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 569 [LNIND 1962 SC 253]: [1963] 3 SCR 540 [LNIND 1962 SC 253], per Gajendragadkar J.

77 Minimax Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 369 (Pat) (DB), per KBN Singh J.

78 State of Madras v CP Sarathy (1953) 1 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1952 SC 84] (SC) : AIR 1953 SC 53 [LNIND 1952 SC 84]: (1953) I MLJ 212(SC), per Patanjali Sastri CJI.

79 Calcutta Electric Supply Corpn Ltd v CESW Union AIR 1959 SC 1191, per Gajendragadkar J.

80 State of Madras v CP Sarathy (1953) 1 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1952 SC 84], 180 (SC), per Patanjali Sastri CJI.

81 Pottery Mazdoor Panchayat v PPC Ltd 1979 Lab IC 827, 829 (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

82 WPAR Ramamoorthy v Tirunelveli Dist NPW Union (1963) 1 LLJ 507 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

83 Jaipur Udyog Ltd v CWK Sangh (1972) 1 LLJ 437 [LNIND 1972 SC 66], 440-41 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1352 [LNIND 1972 SC 66]: 1972 Lab IC 676 [LNIND 1972 SC 66], per Mitter J.

84 Mgmt of Enfield India Ltd v Second Additional LC (1981) 2 LLJ 287, 291-92 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

85 Sitaram Vishnu Shirodkar v Administrator, Govt of Goa (1985) 1 LLJ 480 [LNIND 1984 BOM 207] (Bom) (DB) : 1984 Mh LJ 566.

86 Ins by the Industrial Disputes (Karnataka Amendment) Act 1987 (Karnataka Act 3 of 1988), s 2 (wef 7-4-1988).

87 Banavasi Vyavasaya Sahakari Sangh Ltd v NC Bapat (1995) 1 LLJ 520, 524 (Kant), per Krishna Moorthy J.

88 Dharappa v Bijapur Co-op Milk Producers Societies Union AIR 2007 SC 1848 [LNIND 2007 SC 542]: (2007) 9 SCC 109 [LNIND 2007 SC 542] : (2007) II LLJ 844SC, per Raveendran J.

89 Chandra Spg and Weaving Mills Ltd v State of Mysore (1964) 2 LLJ 604, 610 (Mys) per Tukol J.

90 MK Textile Mills v Punjab State (1962) 1 LLJ 560 (Punj), per Dua J.

91 Kanji Jadhavji & Co v Transport & Dock Workers Union (1969) 2 LLJ 123, 126-27 (Bom) (DB), per Madon J.

92 Hochtief Gammon v State of Orissa (1969) 2 LLJ 207, 208-09 (Ori) (DB), per Barman CJ.

93 Mgmt of Binny Ltd v Govt of Tamil Nadu (1989) 1 LLJ 180, 196-97 (Mad) (DB), per Srinivasan J.

94 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Second LC (1963) 1 LLJ 169 [LNIND 1962 CAL 131] (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

95 State of Bihar v DN Ganguly (1958) 2 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1958 SC 92], 639 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 1018 [LNIND 1958 SC 92], per Gajendragadkar J.

96 Pioneer Ltd v State of UP, (2011) 2 LLJ 250 (All.), per DP Singh J.

97 Indian Bank Ltd v IT (1961) 1 LLJ 604 (Mad), per Ramakrishnan J.

1 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

2 Gwalior Rayon, Mavoor v LC (1978) 2 LLJ 188 (Ker) (DB), per Chandrasekhara Menon J.

3 Girijanandini Devi v Bijendra Narain AIR 1967 SC 1124 [LNIND 1966 SC 149], 1131, per Shah J.

4 Anjilamma v LC-III, Hyderabad (1996) 1 LLJ 733, 737 (AP), per SR Nayak J.

5 Rameshwar Manjhi v Mgmt of Sangramgarh Colliery (1994) 1 LLJ 376 [LNIND 1993 SC 958] (SC) per Kuldip Singh J.

6 Ambabai M Amin v PO, First LC (1987) 1 LLJ 36, 39 (Bom) (DB), per SK Desai J.

7 Prema v Mgmt, Hulkah GSC Society Ltd (1986) 2 LLJ 546 (Kant), per Bopanna J.

8 Ambabai M Amin v PL Majumdar, PO, LC (1987) 1 LLJ 36, 39 (Bom) (DB), per SK Desai J.

9 Dhanalakshmi v Reserve Bank of India (1999) 1 LLJ 1018 (Kant) (DB).

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

*CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 11. Procedure and Powers of Conciliation Officers, Boards, Courts, and Tribunals.—

1[(1)Subject to any rules that may be made in this behalf, an arbitrator, a Board, Court, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall follow such procedure as the arbitrator or other authority concerned may think fit.]

(2) A conciliation officer or a member of a Board [2][or Court or the presiding officer of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] may for the purpose of inquiry into any existing or apprehended industrial dispute, after giving reasonable notice, enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates.

(3) Every Board, Court, [3][Labour Court, Tribunal and National Tribunal] shall have the same powers as are vested in a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (5 of 1908), when trying a suit, in respect of the following matters, namely:

(a) enforcing the attendance of any person and examining him on oath;

(b) compelling the production of documents and material objects;

(c) issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses;

(d) in respect of such other matters as may be prescribed;

and every inquiry or investigation by a Board, Court, [4][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] shall be deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of sections 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

(4) A conciliation officer [5][may enforce the attendance of any person for the purpose of examination of such person or call for] and inspect any document which he has ground for considering to be relevant to the industrial dispute [6][or to be necessary for the purpose of verifying the implementation of any award or carrying out any other duty imposed on him under this Act, and for the aforesaid purposes, the conciliation officer shall have the same powers as are vested in a Civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (5 of 1908), [7][in respect of enforcing the attendance of any person and examining him or of compelling the production of documents]].

8[(5)A Court, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal may, if it so thinks fit, appoint one or more persons having special knowledge of the matter under consideration as assessor or assessors to advise it in the proceeding before it.

(6) All conciliation officers, members of a Board or Court and the presiding officers of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall be deemed to be public servants within the meaning of section 21 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

(7) Subject to any rules made under this Act, the costs of, and incidental to, any proceeding before a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall be in the discretion of that Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal and the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, shall have full power to determine by and to whom and to what extent and subject to what conditions, if any, such costs are to be paid, and to give all necessary directions for the purposes aforesaid and such costs may, on application made to the appropriate government by the person entitled, be recovered by that government in the same manner as an arrear of land revenue.]

9[(8) Every [10][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] shall be deemed to be civil court for the purposes of [11][Sections 345, 346 and 348 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973(2 of 1974)]].

12[(9) Every award made, order issued or settlement arrived at by or before Labour Court or Tribunal or National Tribunal shall be executed in accordance with the procedure laid down for execution of orders and decree of a Civil Court under order 21 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (5 of 1908).

(10) The Labour Court or Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, shall transmit any award, order or settlement to a Civil Court having jurisdiction and such Civil Court shall execute the award, order or settlement as if it were a decree passed by it.]

LEGISLATION

This section corresponds to s 9 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929, which dealt with 'procedure and powers'. However, the section as enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947 has been made much wider in ambit and scope than its counterpart in the old Act. The section has undergone further substantial amendments as indicated in the footnotes to the text of the section.

SUB-SECTION (1): PROCEDURE IN ADJUDICATION OF THE REFERENCE

Unlike the superior courts, the tribunal being the creation of statute, derives power from the statute. Such tribunals have no inherent powers. But apart from powers expressly mentioned in the statute, these tribunals may have powers which are incidental or ancillary. Such incidental or ancillary powers might have been derived by the tribunals either from the express provisions of the statute creating such tribunals or by necessary implication of the powers conferred.[13]Section 11 (1) empowers an industrial adjudicator to follow 'such procedure' as he 'may think fit' subject to any rules that may be made in this behalf. In other words, the conduct of the adjudication is absolutely within the control of the adjudicator, subject only to any rules that may be made by the appropriate government in this behalf.[14]In other words, if the Act and the Rules prescribe a particular procedure, the adjudicator shall have to follow that and no other procedure. If, however, the rules are silent on any particular matter, it is open to the adjudicator to follow such procedure, as he may think fit. That is to say, the width and amplitude of the power of the adjudicator is unrestricted unless the same is restricted by any provision of the Act and the Rules.[15]The wide powers given to the adjudicators to follow their own procedure are aimed at mitigating the rigors of the technicalities of the procedural law for achieving expeditious investigation and settlement of industrial disputes. However, the words 'as it thinks fit' used in this sub-section are not to be taken literally. They do not mean that an adjudicator or arbitrator is a lawless autocrat and he can follow any procedure or no procedure according to his whim or fancy or that he can act in one way in one case and in a different way in another case.[16] This power is conferred on the tribunals for regulating the procedure and not for the exercise of the substantive power conferred under provisions of the Act and is by itself no source of substantive power.[17] An adjudicator, therefore, has to follow the rules of natural justice in carrying out his functions under the statute because the courts have implied such procedure in construing the statutes.[18] Except to the extent specified in sub-s 3 and the relevant rules, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, are not applicable to proceedings before the authorities mentioned in sub-s (1). The provisions of the Evidence Act, in their strict sense too, do not apply to proceedings before these authorities. Nevertheless, all these authorities, being of a quasi-judicial character objectively determining matters referred to them, have to exercise their discretion in a judicial manner, without caprice, and according to the general principles of law and rules of natural justice.[19]

The first point of importance is that the adjudicator should inform himself as to the nature of the dispute and as to the powers and duties entrusted to him or, in other words, as to the scope of the reference. His next duty is to hear the case, for being able to give a decision in the matter. In some cases, the parties may be ready to appear before the adjudicator at once, but in others, time may be required by the parties for the preparation of their cases or preliminary proceedings may be necessary before the actual hearing. In connection with adjudication, it is necessary to consider the evidence that may be adduced by the parties, the circumstances under which the adjudicator may obtain the assistance of assessors, and the method of dealing with points of law which may arise in the course of the adjudication. An arbitrator under s 10A, labour court, industrial tribunal or national tribunal which has to adjudicate upon a matter on reference under s 10 or s 36A or applications under s 33 or s 33C(2), exercises quasi-judicial powers which means that certain content of the judicial powers of the state is vested in it and it is called upon to exercise it.[20] A quasi-judicial decision pre-supposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves presentation of their case by the parties to the dispute and if the dispute between them is on a question of fact, the ascertainment of the fact by means of evidence adduced by the parties to the dispute and often with the assistance of arguments by or on behalf of the parties on the evidence.[21] Parties are arrayed before these quasi-judicial tribunals. There is thus a lis between the parties. There would be assertion and denial of facts on either side. With the permission of the tribunal and consent of the opposite side, parties are entitled to appear through legal practitioners before these quasi-judicial tribunals. The system adopted by these tribunals is the adversary system, a word as understood in contradistinction to inquisitorial system. Rules 9 to 30 contained in Pt III of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 and the forms prescribed thereunder, lay down the powers, procedure and duties of these tribunals. Forms prescribed under the rules are more or less analogous to a plaint in a suit and the reply to be filed would take, more or less, the form of a written statement. Any party appearing before these tribunals must make a claim or demur a claim of the other side. Where the parties are at variance, for facility of disposal, issues will have to be framed. It is open to the tribunal to frame an issue and dispose it off as a preliminary issue.[22]

Parties have to lead evidence. When there is a burden upon a party to prove or establish the fact so as to invite a decision in its favour, it has to lead evidence. Obligation of leading evidence to establish an allegation or averment made by a party is on the party making such allegation or evidence. It must seek an opportunity to lead evidence but evidence can be led only in support of the contentions pleaded. If there is no pleading raising a contention, there is no question of substantiating such a non-existing contention by evidence. It is well-settled that, an allegation which is not pleaded, even if there is evidence in support of it, cannot be examined because the other side had no notice of it and if entertained, it would tantamount to granting an unfair advantage to the first party. Though pleadings before such tribunals have not to be read strictly, it is equally true that pleadings must be such as to give sufficient notice to the other party of the case it is called upon to meet.[23] The rules of fair-play demand that where a party seeks to establish a contention which, if proved, would be sufficient to deny relief to the opposite side, such a contention has to be specifically pleaded and then proved. But if there is no pleading, there is no question of proving something which is not pleaded. The tribunal would then proceed to decide the lis between the parties. It has to decide the lis on the evidence adduced before it by the parties, in respect of the averments and allegations made and contentions raised in their pleadings. Rule 15 provides that the tribunal may accept, admit or call for evidence at any stage of the proceedings before it and in such a manner as it may think fit. While it may not be hidebound by the Rules prescribed in the Evidence Act, it is nonetheless a quasi-judicial tribunal proceeding to adjudicate upon a lis between the parties before it and must decide the matter on the evidence produced by the parties before it. It would not be open to it to decide the lis on any extraneous considerations. Justice, equity and good-conscience will inform its adjudication. Therefore, these tribunals have all the trappings of a court of law. Sub-section 1 of s 11 confers powers upon the authorities mentioned therein to follow such procedure as they 'may think fit' and sub-s 3 confers upon them powers of a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure in respect of matters therein specified.[24] Rules 10A and 10 B of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribe the procedure for filing pleadings of the parties, hearings, grant of adjournments, examination of witnesses etc before the labour courts, the tribunals and the national tribunals, it has been made mandatory for the national tribunals to follow the procedure laid down in r 5 of O 18 of the First Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 while it is only directory for the labour courts and the industrial tribunals to follow these provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure if they consider it necessary in view of the nature of the particular industrial dispute pending before them.

(i) Notice of Proceedings

An industrial adjudicator, after receipt of a reference, is enjoined to serve notice upon the parties to the reference in accordance with the relevant rules. But it is not clear as to whether the government should give notice to the parties when it makes an order of reference. Rule 13, however, requires the authority to whom a reference has been made to 'inform the parties' of the time and place of hearing fixed by it 'in such manner as he thinks fit'. Rule 18 prescribes that any notice or summons of such authority may be served either personally or by registered post. Rule 19 lays down the manner of describing the parties where there are numerous persons arrayed on any side before such authority. Rule 20 prescribes the manner of service in a case where there are numerous parties to a dispute. In GSeshagiri Rao, a notice was issued by the labour court under r 20 of the Andhra Pradesh Industrial Rules, which provides that a notice, summons, process or order may be served either personally or by registered post. The notice was returned with the postal indorsement 'not available'. Thereupon a second notice was again issued and that was also returned with the postal indorsement 'evading to take delivery'. In these circumstances, the labour court found it unnecessary to order notice once again to the workman. The Andhra Pradesh High Court held that there was no service either personally or by registered post. It was held that the case of evasion to take delivery could not be equated with service of the notice. Therefore, the requirement of personal service or service through registered post was not complied with. Consequently, the award of the labour court was quashed.[25]

On the construction of r 22(2) of the Industrial Disputes (Bihar) Rules, the Patna High Court in Rameshwar Prasad, held that the correct, reasonable and legitimate view is that when an industrial dispute is raised on behalf of the entire body of workmen, they must be deemed to have knowledge of the reference when the notification is published in the Gazette. Hence, publication of the notification must be held to be constructive notice to them and it is not obligatory on the government to forward copies of orders of reference to all the unions if there be more than one which have raised the dispute individually or collectively or to other workmen who are not members of any union. It is not possible to do so nor any rule casts any such obligation on the government. Nor is there any obligation on the tribunal to give any notice to the workmen individually either in accordance with r 22(2) of the Bihar Rules or otherwise. However, the High Court observed that it would be better for the tribunals to whom reference is made, to avoid any technical dispute, to take recourse to the general method of service of notice prescribed in r 22(2) of the Bihar Rules which would obviate any objection. A reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing should be given to the parties so that they may be prepared for the hearing.[26] An award made by a tribunal without summoning the parties likely to be affected by its award will be fundamentally wrong.[27] In Bengal Box Manufacturing Co, the facts were: on the date fixed for hearing of the dispute before the industrial tribunal, none of the parties appeared; hence the tribunal fixed another date for hearing. Even on the next date, none of the parties appeared. The notice of hearing was not sent to the principal place of business of the employer, but was sent to another address, which was returned as 'refused'. Hence, the tribunal fixed another date for ex parte hearing with notice only to the union and passed an ex parte award against the employer. The award was challenged by the employer on the ground of violation of the rules of natural justice. The High Court quashed the award holding that proper opportunity was not given to the employer for presenting its case and the case was remanded to the tribunal for hearing after fresh service of notice was served to the employer firm at its principal place of business.[28]

(ii) Procedure and Practice

Though an adjudicator has the power to follow his own procedure, it is usual practice in all adjudication proceedings to follow the procedure of an action at nisi prius, ie, a civil suit before a civil court. Depending upon the terms of the order of reference, the tribunal will decide which party shall have the right to begin, by custom the party having to prove the affirmative is entitled to open to the case first. After the receipt of the order of reference, the adjudicator issues a notice to the parties to the dispute and then the following order of proceedings is usually followed:

(1) The claimant files his claim statement.

(2) The respondent files the reply to the claim statement.

(3) The claimant may file a rejoinder to the reply of the respondent.

(4) On these pleadings, the adjudicator frames issues. It also may frame preliminary issues where preliminary objections are raised.

(5) The claimant opens his case by himself or through his representative and examines his witnesses, who are, in turn cross-examined by or on behalf of the respondent.

(6) The respondent opens his case by himself or through his representative and examines his witnesses, who are, in turn cross-examined by or on behalf of the respondent.

(7) The claimant or his representative addresses 'oral arguments' to the tribunal.

(8) The respondent or his representative addresses his 'arguments' to the tribunal.

(9) The claimant may reply to the arguments of the respondent.

(10) The hearing is then finished and the case is closed by the parties. Then it only remains for the tribunal to consider the materials before him and prepare his award.

In JK Iron, Bose J delineated the contours of the scope of the procedural jurisdiction of the industrial tribunals in following words:

> Very broadly it follows the pattern of the civil courts when the reference is made by government, the tribunal has to take the pleadings of the parties in writing and to draw up issues. Then it takes evidence, hears arguments and finally pronounces its 'judgments' in open court. It is evident from this that though these tribunals are not bound by all technicalities of civil courts, they must nevertheless follow the same general pattern. Now, the only point of requiring pleadings and issues is to ascertain the real dispute between the parties to narrow the area of conflict and to see just where the two sides differ. It is not open to the tribunals to fly off at a tangent and disregarding the pleadings, to reach any conclusions that they think are just and proper.[29]

This principle equally applies to the adjudicatory proceedings on a reference under s 10 or on an application under s 33 as well as on a petition under s 33C(2).[30]It is the duty of the tribunal to act fairly between the parties and to hear and determine the case as a judge upon the evidence, oral and documentary, adduced before, him. If the tribunal allows a prayer from one party, it should not refuse a similar prayer by the other party.[31] He should endeavour to exclude from his mind any previous personal knowledge or pre-conceived notion of the dispute. Both parties should be present when the hearing is commenced unless the case has taken such a course as to justify the tribunal in proceeding ex parte. Subject to this exception, the case should be opened and the evidence taken in the presence of both the parties. At no time during the adjudication proceedings should the tribunal receive any evidence or communication, relating to the case from one of the parties or give him an attendance behind the back of another. To do so would have the appearance of partiality or unfair dealing between the parties which might vitiate the award. If any such communication does come before him he should at once inform the other party. It is desirable that all entries in the roznama of the tribunal in the proceedings should be signed by the presiding officer and all corrections or alterations therein should be signed or initialed by him. Not doing so would leave scope for the parties to make allegations with respect to the correctness of such corrections or alterations.[32]

(iii) Parties

Section 11(3) of the Act prescribes, inter alia, that the tribunal shall have the same powers as are vested in a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure, when trying a suit in respect of the matters specified in cll (a) and (b), from which it is clear that the power to add a party to the proceedings pending before a tribunal, which a civil court may exercise under the Code of Civil Procedure, O 1, r 10, is not included in s 11(3). There is no other section in the Act which confers such a power on the tribunal. However, there is ample authority under s 18(6) to add any person, including the government or establishment, whose presence is necessary or proper for due adjudications. In other words, while dealing with an industrial dispute, if the tribunal comes to the conclusion that persons other than those mentioned as parties to the order of reference were necessary for a valid determination of the dispute, it has the power to summon them; and if such persons are summoned to appear in the proceedings, the award of the tribunal would be binding on them. Since in cases where persons are added as parties to an industrial dispute, are likely to raise the question as to whether the joinder of the parties was justified or not, s 11(3)(b) requires that the tribunal should record its opinion as to whether these persons were summoned without proper cause. However, it is not open to the tribunal to travel materially beyond the terms of reference for it is well-settled that the terms of reference determine the scope of its power and jurisdiction from case to case. In other words, this power cannot be exercised by the tribunal so as to enlarge materially the scope of the reference itself, because basically the jurisdiction of the tribunal to deal with an industrial dispute is derived solely from the order of reference made by the appropriate government. 'If the reference directs the tribunal to adjudicate upon a dispute between X and Y, the tribunal cannot enlarge the scope of inquiry by bringing in additional parties'. Addition can be made incidentally but not substantially so as to open up new avenues of inquiry. The test in such cases, therefore, must always be: Is the addition of the party necessary to make the adjudication effective and enforceable?[33] Once a person is impleaded as a party in the proceedings before a tribunal, principles of natural justice would require that he should be given an opportunity to lead his own and rebut evidence of other sides.[34]

(iv) Representation of Parties

A party to an industrial dispute may conduct his case in person or they may be represented by a representative as permitted by s 36 of the Act.

(v) Pleadings

It is well-settled now that the industrial adjudicators are exercising quasi-judicial powers. A quasi-judicial decision presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves presentation of their case by the parties to the dispute and if the dispute between them is on a question of fact, the ascertainment of the fact by means of evidence adduced by the parties to the dispute. Any party appearing before the adjudicator must make a claim and demur the claim of the other side and when there is a burden upon it to prove or establish the fact so as to invite a decision in its favour, it has to lead evidence.[35] Claim statements and written statements are called for enabling the parties to set out their own cases as well as to give the adversary an opportunity to meet the objections.[36] A tribunal is not required to advise the parties about their rights or what they should do or omit to do.[37] Normally, in industrial adjudication, the plaint of the workmen is known as 'claim statement' to which the employer files the 'written statement'. Then, the workmen may file a 'rejoinder' to the 'written statement' of the employer. These pleadings are to be made as prescribed by the rule of the 'appropriate government'. Rule 10B of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 provides procedure before the adjudicatory authorities. Sub-rules (1) to (4) prescribe procedure and the time-limit for filing the pleadings before such authorities. Various states have promulgated their own rules detailing the procedure of filing the pleadings. Since under s 10(4), the tribunal has to confine its adjudication to the points specified in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto, the parties are not permitted to introduce any matters de hors the points of reference and matters incidental thereto. The parties, however, may raise preliminary objections with respect to the maintainability of the reference. At the preliminary hearings, any question as to the production of documents may be raised and the adjudicator's directions taken thereon. It is within the power of the tribunal to make an order for 'discovery, production and inspection of documents'. It is common practice in industrial adjudication for the parties to exchange lists of documents upon which they rely and to which they propose to refer in the proceedings. An adjudicator will generally make an order to this effect-a course which, although not so far-reaching as an order for discovery, is often sufficient to meet the requirements of the dispute.

Pleadings in industrial disputes need not strictly conform to the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. Not only for the reason that the Code of Civil Procedure has restricted application to the industrial adjudication under the Act, but the fact that the Workers generally are illiterate and not conversant with legal formalities, has also to be borne in mind. Hence, the pleadings in industrial adjudication cannot be strictly construed. Merely because a provision of law has not been mentioned in a pleading, it cannot be said that there was no proper pleading as long as a party is not taken by surprise and disabled from leading proper evidence to meet the case of the opposite party.[38]For instance, where though s 9A of the Industrial Disputes Act was not pleaded by either party, the consideration of that provision by the tribunal was upheld by the High Court because it had a vital bearing on the dispute before it.[39] but the rules of natural justice require that the pleadings must at least be such as to give sufficient notice to the other party of the case it is called upon to meet.[40] In any case, the pleadings must be definite for laying the foundation of the evidence in the case. Though the pleadings before the industrial tribunals have not to be read strictly, it is equally true that the pleadings must be such as to give sufficient notice to the other party of the case, it is called upon to meet. Where a party seeks to establish a contention, which if proved would be sufficient to deny relief to the opposite side, such a contention has to be specifically pleaded and proved. If there is no pleading, there is no question of proving something which is not pleaded. In other words, a contention which is not pleaded even if there is evidence in support of it, cannot be examined because the other side has no notice of it and if entertained, it would tantamount to granting an unfair advantage to the first party.[41] It is well settled that no amount of evidence can be looked upon a plea which was never put forward. The reason is that a party cannot be allowed to benefit himself from such evidence which is at variance with his pleadings. If he were allowed to do so, the opposite party would be taken by surprise.[42] After a plea has been rejected by the tribunal, a party cannot be permitted to make a somersault and take a different plea. For instance, where the management had taken the plea that the employee in question was not a workman because he was employed in a supervisory capacity and was drawing wages more than Rs 1600 was not allowed subsequent to the rejection of this plea, to take the new plea that the employee was actually employed in a managerial and administrative capacity.[43]

(vi) Amendments

The amendments are to be allowed so as to give full effect to the adjudication without, however, causing substantial injury to the other party. An injury may be remedied by an amendment and an appropriate order as to costs. The principle governing the amendments of pleadings cannot be better stated than in the words of Shah J speaking for the Supreme Court in Jai Jai RM Lal:

> Rules of procedure are intended to be a hand-maid to the administration of justice. A party cannot be refused just relief merely because of some mistake, negligence, inadvertence or even infraction of the rules of procedure. The court always gives leave to amend the pleadings of a party, unless it is satisfied that the party applying was acting mala fide, or that by his blunder, he had caused injury to his opponent which may not be compensated for by an order of costs. However, negligent or careless may have been the first omission, and, however, late the proposed amendment, the amendment may be allowed if it can be made without injustice to the other side ... all amendments should be permitted as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in controversy between the parties, unless by permitting the amendment injustice may result to the other side ... In our view, there is no rule that unless in an application for amendment of the plaint it is expressly averred that the error, omission or mis-description is due to a bona fide mistake, the court has no power to grant leave to amend to plaint. The power to grant amendment of the pleadings is intended to serve the ends of justice and is not governed by any such narrow or technical limitations. [44]

Thus, the tribunal always ought to give leave to amend pleadings of a party, unless it is satisfied that the party applying was acting mala fide or that by his blunder he caused injury to his opponent which cannot be compensated for by an order of costs. However, there is no rule that in the application for amendment, the party must expressly aver that the error, omission or mis-description was due to a bona fide mistake. It would be sufficient if a prima facie case for the amendment is made out by the applicant. The amendment can only be refused on recording findings that the party applying was acting mala fide or the injury caused to the opposite party by the mistake, omission or mis-description committed by the applying party cannot be compensated for by payment of costs. But where no injury is caused to the opponent and the applying party acted bona fide, the rules of natural justice required that in appropriate cases, the tribunal may allow the amendment of pleadings. In other words, the industrial adjudicators are competent to allow the parties, when they are not actuated by any oblique motive, to modify their pleadings to sub-serve the interests of justice.[45] In Patna Electric Supply, the original application was filed by the employer for permission to dismiss the concerned workmen from its employment under a particular Standing Order but by a subsequent application, the employer sought permission to discharge the workmen under a different Standing Order, thus altering the relief which it had prayed for in his original application. In other words, the subsequent application, in substance, was a new application made by the employer to the tribunal, though relying upon the same facts and circumstances which were set out in the original application. This application was resisted by the workmen, but was entertained by the tribunal in permitting the employer to discharge the concerned workmen. In view of the express finding recorded by the tribunal that the application for leave to discharge the workmen was bona fide and what the employer did by making the subsequent application was actuated by the honest motive of exercising its right to discharge the workmen under the relevant Standing Orders instead of dismissing them, the Supreme Court held that once the tribunal was of the opinion that the subsequent application and the discharge of the workmen for which its permission was sought was in the honest exercise of the employer's right, its decision could not be assailed. Amendment of pleadings should be liberally allowed provided it does not make out a new case. [46]

In Royal Nepal Airlines, the Calcutta High Court upheld the validity of an amendment of the written statement for bringing on record the fact that a certain employee was a Nepalese national because the question of nationality was relevant for the determination of relief to be granted. The court observed that there was no reason why such amendment should not be allowed and it could not be said that it would extend the scope of the dispute or introduce a new dispute.[47] Likewise, in Lipton, the tribunal disallowed the amendment of an application filed by the employer for amending its written statement for the reason that the application was 'belated, repetitive, argumentative, raising legal pleas and was mala fide in certain other respects'. The Delhi High Court set aside the order of the tribunal holding that the amendments sought were neither frivolous nor in the nature of surprise to the workman concerned nor did they amount to withdrawal of any admission made by the management earlier. The amendment application was made even before the evidence of the workmen was started. In that sense the application was not belated. The mere fact that the application was repetitive and argumentative and in some parts legal submissions were elaborate, did not make the application bad in law or mala fide. The holding of the tribunal, therefore, was contrary to well-known principles of law in regard to amendment of pleadings.[48]

(vii) Issues

In Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co , the Supreme Court observed:

> 'Where parties are at variance for facilities of disposal, issues will have to be framed.' Issues in industrial disputes are usually of two types, namely, (a) issues referred by the government for adjudication, and (b) incidental issues which are sometimes issues of law or issues of mixed law and fact.[49]

As far as issues of the first category are concerned, there is no question of framing such issues by the tribunals, because they have to adjudicate upon such issues as are referred to them. The tribunal has no power to vary or alter such issues. However, on pleadings of the parties, the tribunals may frame issues of the second category. Such additional or ancillary issues are framed for better appreciation of the cases of the parties with reference to the principal issue or issues which have been referred for adjudication and on the basis of which the jurisdiction of the tribunal will have to be determined.[50] It is open to the tribunal to frame an issue on a jurisdictional point and dispose it off as a preliminary issue. The tribunal may as well frame preliminary issues if the point on which the parties are at variance, as reflected in the preliminary issue, would go to the root of as the matter. However, the tribunal cannot travel beyond the pleadings and arrogate to itself the power to raise issues which the parties to the reference are precluded or prohibited from raising; to wit if the employer does not question the status of the workman, the tribunal cannot suo motu raise the issue and proceed to adjudicate upon the same and throw out the reference on the sole ground that the concerned workman was not a 'workman' as defined in the Act.[51] Sometimes, the failure of the tribunal to frame such preliminary issues may lead to miscarriage of justice. For instance, where having framed one omnibus vague issue as to validity of a Worker's dismissal, because of criminal misconduct, the tribunal committed several errors in proper assessment of evidence and laid wrong burden of proof on the management in respect of points of fact not even agitated in the pleadings and which the management was not even called upon, in law, to meet, the resulting award was held to be defective.[52]

But where the tribunal has ascertained the real dispute, the omission to frame formal issues cannot by itself vitiate its order, if it has dealt with the contentions raised by the parties before it.[53] In framing the issues, the tribunal has to consider the question of placing the burden of proving the issue on one of the two parties. All that 'burden of proof means is as to who has the right to begin leading evidence. The tribunal also in its discretion may, in the circumstances of a case, shift the burden of proof from one party to another. A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court has taken the view that the question of shifting of burden of proof on an issue howsoever erroneous is not amenable to judicial review.[54] If an objection as to the maintainability of the dispute or jurisdiction of the tribunal is raised, the tribunal has to examine it as a preliminary issue. The finding which the tribunal may record on this preliminary issue, will decide whether it has jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the dispute or not. For instance, in a disciplinary case, the tribunals must decide the legality and validity of the domestic inquiry as a preliminary issue and on that decision being pronounced, it will be for the management to decide whether it will adduce any evidence before the tribunal.[55] The consequences which ensue if the domestic inquiry is valid, are entirely different from the consequences which ensue if it is held invalid. In other words, scope of inquiry and hearing gets restricted or enlarged, as the case may be. Therefore, it is not possible for the tribunal to hear such a preliminary issue along with the main reference, as the scope of hearing and inquiry stands restricted and enlarged, depending on the finding one way or the other on the preliminary issue.[56] If the tribunal finds that it has no jurisdiction, there will be an end of the proceedings before it, so far as the main dispute is concerned and the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to go into the merits of the reference and any finding recorded by the tribunal on merits will be ineffective, being without jurisdiction.[57]

(viii) Burden of Proof

The general principle of the law of evidence is that he who asserts must prove. In other words, burden of proof is the obligation to adduce evidence to the satisfaction of the tribunal or court in order to establish the existence or non-existence of a fact contended to by a party. The principle of burden of proof is founded on the rule of roman law, ie, ei incumbit probatio, qui dicit, non qui negat—the burden of proving a fact rests on the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue and not upon the party who denies it, for a negative is usually incapable of proof. This rule of evidence has been adopted in practice not because it is impossible to prove a negative but because the negative does not admit of direct and simple proof, of which the affirmative is capable. The expression 'burden of proof has two distinct and often blurred meanings viz:

(a) the burden of proof as a matter of law and pleadings. This, burden, as it has been called, for establishing a case, whether by preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt; and,

(b) the burden of proof in the sense of introducing evidence.

In the Indian Evidence Act, s 101 uses the expression in the former sense while s 102 uses it in the latter sense. The former type of onus viz the burden of proof of the facts in issue is usually known as the general burden of proof or the burden of proof on pleadings. This type of burden of proof has been called by jurists, the 'legal burden'. The phrase 'legal burden' was coined by Lord Denning while the phrase 'persuasive burden' was used by Dr Glanville Williams. Other jurists have referred to it as the burden of proof on the pleadings.[58] This burden is entitled to be called the 'legal burden' because its incidence is determined by the substantive law, and the adjective 'persuasive' gives some indication of its real nature. The legal or persuasive burden is the burden borne by the party who will lose the issue unless he satisfies the tribunal of the facts to the appropriate degree of conviction. The pleadings do not always indicate which party bears the burden, and the answer to a somewhat controversial question is assumed if it is said to be 'fixed', for the epithet is designed to emphasise the fact that this burden does not shift in the course of a trial-a matter of words about which there is room for two views in the case of issues to which certain rebuttable presumptions of law are applicable.[59] The latter type of onus is called the professional or the tactical burden.[60] The burden of proof in the first sense is fixed at the beginning of the trial by the state of pleadings and it is settled as a question of law, remaining unchanged, throughout the trial exactly where the pleadings place it and never shifts in any circumstances whatsoever. The burden of proof in the second sense, however, constantly shifts, as one scale of evidence or the other preponderates.[61]

In Shankar Chakravarti, the Supreme Court observed that though the adjudicatory authorities under the Act have all the trappings of a court, they are not hide-bound by the statutory provisions of the Evidence Act. Section 11 (3) of the Act confers on them powers of a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure, only in respect of the matters specified therein. Such authorities are created for adjudication of the industrial disputes between the parties arrayed before them. Their functions being of quasi-judicial nature, they have to adjudicate upon such disputes, on the basis of pleadings of the parties and the evidence adduced before them in accordance with the rules of natural justice. Therefore, any party appearing before anyone of such authorities must make a claim or demur the claim of the other side. When there is a burden upon a party to establish a fact so as to invite a decision in its favour, it has to lead the evidence. The obligation to lead evidence to establish an averment made by a party is on the party making the averment. The test would be as to who would fail if no evidence is led. Such party, therefore must seek opportunity to lead evidence. The burden of proof in this sense as the proceedings advance, may be as to shifted from one party on whom it rested at the first instance by his proving facts which raise a presumption in his favour. In other words, the difference between the onus of proof and burden of proof is that the onus of proof is fixed whereas the burden of proof shifts, is to be borne in mind. It is, however, not necessary that such burden must be discharged by positive evidence of a party. A party could rely on the evidence given by the other party and prove certain facts. In case, no evidence is adduced on either side, the party on whom the onus lies to prove certain facts must fail. But if it has on the evidence no difficulty in arriving at a definite conclusion, then the burden of proof on the pleadings recedes to the background.[62] Where, however, evidence has been led by the contesting parties on the mooted question, abstract considerations of onus are out of place and in such a situation the truth or otherwise of the case must always be adjudged on the evidence led by the parties.[63] This point has been illustrated in the judgment of the Supreme Court in Damodar Valley Corpn, in which an argument was advanced on behalf of the management that the contents of a document filed along with the written statement on behalf of the workmen before the tribunal were not explained by any witness with reference to categories of workmen eligible to construction allowance. But the court held that this did not absolve the management, which was in possession of all information, of its responsibility to place the necessary materials before the tribunal to show the distinguishing and differentiating feature of the categories of workmen entitled to construction allowance. Since the management was in possession of all facts, it was for it to furnish the relevant information to the tribunal.[64]

The Evidence Act does not apply to industrial adjudicators, but even so the principle of law enunciated on the burden of proof and onus, is a basic principle of law which the industrial tribunals are also required to follow. If there is no sufficient evidence on the part of a party to prove the existence of facts which would entitle him to the reliefs prayed for, it must be held that he has failed to discharge the burden of proof on pleadings which lie on him only. Where the court finds it difficult to make up its mind, the question comes to the fore-ground and takes a deciding factor. When after the entire evidence is adduced, the tribunal feels that it cannot make up its mind as to which of the versions is true, it will hold the party on whom burden lies, has not discharged the burden.[65] Where an employee claims that he is entitled to a benefit under the provisions of ch 5 A, by claiming compensation for retrenchment, he must prove that he was retrenched from service. Normally, it is for the person putting forward the claim to establish the facts and circumstances supporting his claim. It is not for the employer to prove that the discharge or termination of the services of the employee was otherwise than by way of retrenchment.[66] Likewise, where the workman alleged a practice of the management, that bonus had been paid even to Workers dismissed for misconduct in the prior years, the burden of proof as to such practice is on the workman and the management cannot be asked to prove that there was no such practice. But on the other hand, in case of the refund of the security which belongs to the workman and normally he is entitled to its refund, it is for the management to prove satisfactorily that it had a lien on that amount for loss caused to it. [67]

In Dominent Offset, where the management terminated the services of a few workmen by serving on them a notice of termination containing allegations of indisciplined behaviour purporting to be in terms of the Standing Orders, but without holding any inquiry into the said allegations, a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the burden lies on the management to prove that its action has a legal basis in the Standing Orders.[68] Where the workmen claimed that they did not resign from service, but alleged that the management forged the blank papers on which it obtained their signatures/thumb impressions and terminated their services, the burden of proving that the management so obtained their signatures/thumb impressions on blank papers rests on the workmen who raised the dispute, and it is only after such evidence is adduced that the management should be called upon to prove that the workmen have voluntarily resigned.[69] While the burden of proof of misconduct lies with the employer, the contention of victimisation has to be proved by the employee.[70] When the industrial tribunal is called upon to decide the validity of domestic enquiry as preliminary issue, the burden of proving such validity is on the employer who wants to rely on the fairness of domestic enquiry in defence.[71] In Northcote, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that, where a 'resident medical officer' raised an industrial dispute against his dismissal, which was contested by the employer, the burden was on the employee to prove that he was a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s) and it was not for the management to prove the negative facts.[72] Where the workman claimed that he had worked for over one and a half year before being terminated on grounds of unauthorised absence, the burden of proof is cast on the person having the best evidence, ie, the management. The management having failed to produce the muster roll, adverse inference has to be drawn against them.[73] In Range Forest Officer, the Supreme Court held that where the workman claims to have worked for 240 days in a year preceding his termination not supported by salary receipt or record, the onus of proving that he had worked for 240 days lies on him, and that the mere filing of an affidavit, being only his statement in his favour, is not adequate evidence for a court or tribunal to come to the conclusion that the workman had, in fact, worked for 240 days in the year preceding his termination.[74] Where the management contended that the employee, who was employed as gradation analyst and assistant production manager was not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s), the burden of proving that he was not a workman lies on the management.[75] Where the labour court upheld the contention of the employer that the workman, whose service were terminated, had worked only for 239 days (ie, less than 240 days) and hence there was no violation of s 25F, and the High Court reversed the order of the labour court, the Supreme Court held that the burden of proving that he had worked for 240 days was on the workman and he himself having stated at the evidence stage that he had not worked for 240 days, the High Court erred in overturning the order of labour court without there being anything to show that the said order was perverse, and, hence, the order of High Court is set aside.[76]

(ix) Ex-parte Adjudication

At the time of the commencement, the parties should be present unless the case has taken such a course as to justify the adjudicator in proceeding ex parte. If, however, a party willfully absents himself or conducts himself in such a way that the adjudication is likely to be impeded, or willfully tries to delay or avoid the proceedings, the tribunal may fix a preemptory hearing on a particular day. After reasonable notice of hearing has been given to the defaulting party, if he still neglects or refuses to attend, the tribunal may and ought to hear in his absence. Prompt discharge of business is of particular importance before a tribunal adjudicating an industrial dispute. Dilatory tactics must, therefore necessarily be discouraged. When a claimant in a dispute appears to be contumacious in his conduct, the tribunal is justified in relieving the opposite party of the ill-effects of such harassing dilatoriness.[77] But to proceed ex parte is a serious matter, and before doing so the tribunal should satisfy itself that the absenting party has no good ground for not appearing. Rule 10B(9) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes the procedure to be followed by a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal and r 22 empowers the authorities specified therein to proceed ex parte where any party fails to attend or to be represented, as if that party 'had duly attended or had been represented'. Rule 10B(9) and r 22 somewhat overlap one another. However, the purpose of both the provisions is that if any party, without sufficient cause, defaults and fails to appear at any stage of adjudication before the tribunal, the tribunal may proceed with the reference ex parte and decide the reference or any application in the absence of the defaulting party. But the proviso to sub-r (9) provides that on an application made by either party before the submission of the award, the tribunal may revoke its order to proceed ex parte, if it is satisfied that the absence of the party was on justifiable grounds. However, neither the Act, nor the Rules framed under it authorise or empower an industrial adjudicator to decide references without going into the merits of the disputes even in cases where one of the parties does not file written statements or does not appear before it.[78]

A rule empowering the tribunal to proceed ex parte if a party is absent and sufficient cause is not shown for his absence, would not enable it either to do away with the inquiry or to straightway pass an award without giving a finding on the merits of the dispute. In other words, the absence of a party does not entail consequence that an award will straightway be made against him.[79] A reference made to an adjudicatory authority, by appropriate government under s 10, confers upon it jurisdiction to adjudicate on the issues referred to it. Section 20(3) says that the proceedings before such an authority commence on the date of reference of the dispute and are concluded on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s 17A. A reference under s 10 sets in motion adjudication proceedings and they cannot be stopped except by passing of award. An adjudicatory authority cannot refuse to adjudicate on the dispute and it cannot dismiss the dispute for non-prosecution. It is of necessity to make an award and forward the same to the appropriate government. An award, once published, becomes final and enforceable after the lapse of 30 days from the date of publication and it cannot be called into question by any court in any manner whatsoever.[80] To satisfy the definition of an award, there must be an interim or final 'determination' of the dispute and there is none where the tribunal merely dismisses the reference for non-prosecution.[81] The normal procedure before a tribunal is that whenever a date is fixed, parties or their representatives are required to note the next date and sign the order sheet accordingly. In case on a date fixed for hearing, there is no sitting of the tribunal for unforeseen reasons, the parties are not required to appear before it. In such a case, unless the next date is fixed in the presence of the parties or their representatives, the tribunal cannot proceed with the case on the next date without informing the parties concerned about it. In UPRTC, on a date fixed for hearing, the presiding officer of the tribunal was absent and another date was fixed for hearing in the absence of the parties. On the next date of hearing, the tribunal made an ex parte award against the employer directing the reinstatement of the workman with back wages. The application of the employer for setting aside the ex parte award was also rejected by the tribunal. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court set aside the award holding that the tribunal by not granting an opportunity to the employer of being heard violated the principles of natural justice.[82] Likewise, where the tribunal arbitrarily rejects the application for setting aside the ex parte award, such order of the tribunal is liable to be set aside.

In Jagran Prakashan, the employer's representative could not attend the hearing before the tribunal because on his way he fell from the bus and suffered injuries. The tribunal rejected the application for the reason that the name of the employer's representative was not mentioned in the application for setting aside the ex parte award though it was mentioned in the affidavit in support of the application. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court set aside the order of the tribunal being not proper. The further reason of the tribunal for rejecting the application that some other person should have been deputed to conduct the case was not found proper.[83] The expression 'ex parte' only means in the absence of the other party but the absence of such party shall not hinder or affect the progress of the proceedings. Rule 22 not only authorises an adjudicatory authority to proceed in the absence of a party, but it also creates a fiction which enables the tribunal to presume that all the parties are present before it although, in fact, it is not true, and thus make an ex parte award. Hence, an adjudicator may imagine that the absentee is present, and having done so, he may give full effect to his imagination and carry it to its logical conclusion. It has to bear in mind the purposes for which fiction is created and has to give effect to them. Obviously, the intention of r 22 is to enable the tribunal to imagine that a person is present, he is unwilling to adduce evidence or argue his case. The adjudicator then has of necessity to pass an order on the basis of the evidence placed before it by the party that, in fact, participated in the proceedings. That is the object of the fiction caused by the words 'as if he had duly attended'. Of course, this does not mean, that the adjudicator could have shut his eyes to the intrinsic character of such evidence produced by the party present and blindly put its imprimatur to it. It has to apply its mind like any other judicial officer who examines the evidence and hears arguments before forming conclusions. In other words, the adjudicator has to focus his judicial mind on the merits of the points in dispute, impartially, dispassionately and objectively.[84]

He is required to take into account the pleadings of the parties and whatever evidence has been produced by the other party and come to a judicial conclusion stating its reasons for the same.[85] But the tribunal is not saddled with the additional responsibility to embark on an independent research and investigation of its own to collect materials for adjudication of the disputes so long as the tribunal has applied its mind fully to the statements and documents placed before it by the appearing party before making the award, although ex parte, such an award is not assailable.[86] For instance, where the employer fails to file the written statement to the claim of the workman despite sufficient opportunity having been afforded, an ex parte award in favour of the workman is passed on the facts found by the workman to exist, the award is not liable to be interfered with.[87] The language of r 22 unequivocally makes the jurisdiction of the tribunal, to render the ex parte award, conditional upon the fulfilment of its requirements. If there is no sufficient cause for the absence of a party, the tribunal undoubtedly has jurisdiction to proceed ex parte. But if there is sufficient cause shown which prevented a party from appearing, then under the terms of r 22, the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to proceed ex parte.[88] In ND Patel,[89] the employer had not appeared before the labour court after receiving notice on the ground that the notice was not in the prescribed form. The Gujarat High Court held that the employer did have the notice and it was not material whether the notice was in the prescribed form or in any other form. He was, therefore, bound to appear before the court.

Rule 24 of the Andhra Pradesh Industrial Disputes Rules 1958 empowers the industrial adjudicators to proceed ex parte with a case if any of the parties is absent and if sufficient cause is not shown for the absence. The concept of 'sufficient cause' differs from case to case. It is, therefore, not to be applied rigidly. The tribunal has to consider the facts and circumstances of each case whether 'sufficient cause' has been shown or not. The Andhra Pradesh High Court in DM, APSRTC,[90] held that the rule merely enables the adjudicator to proceed as if the party is present, but this does not enable it either to do away with the inquiry or to straightaway pass an award without giving a finding on the merits of the dispute before him. The absence of a party does not entail the consequences that an award straightaway be made against him. It is incumbent on the adjudicator to go into the merits of the dispute and give such finding as can be on the material placed before him. Accordingly, the court set aside the award of the tribunal. In Eagle Wood, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the award of the tribunal was a nullity for non-compliance of the mandatory requirements of r 20B(1) and (5) which prescribe the mode and manner of filing pleadings and serving a copy of such pleadings on the opposite party. Apart from these mandatory requirements, there was also the question of compliance of the rules of natural justice. The learned judge held:

> The employer, however, bad cannot be denied the opportunity of hearing in accordance with the provisions of law. If in spite of such compliance the employer or the employee as the case may be, chooses not to appear, then the tribunal need not wait for the pleasure of appearance of such a party but not before that.[91]

In this view of law, the court held that the award was a nullity ab initio or a non-est phenomenon. If there is no award in the eye of law, mere publication of the same will not confer any sanctity conferring the status of an 'award' on it. Accordingly, instead of quashing the award the court issued a writ of mandamus commanding the government not to give any effect to the impugned award and remanded the matter to the tribunal with the direction to rehear the matter de novo.

(x) Restoration of Proceedings

Some State Governments like Assam, Madras, UP and Kerala have framed rules under the Act for setting aside ex parte decisions of the industrial tribunals on showing sufficient cause. Such cases present no difficulty for a tribunal to set aside its ex parte order, where the defaulting party can show sufficient cause for not attending the proceedings when the order to proceed ex parte was made. In such a case, an application for restoration should be moved in the open court and should not be prefaced by a private visit to the presiding officer of the tribunal.[92] However, the rules of some of the states such as Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra, Orissa etc like the Central Rules, have no provisions for setting aside the ex parte orders or awards. On the question, whether in the absence of the enabling Rules, a tribunal has jurisdiction to set aside an ex parte order or award and restore the proceedings, there is conflict of judicial dicta. The various High Courts expressed diametrically opposite views on the question 'whether the tribunal has the inherent power to set aside an ex parte order in the absence of an express rule to that effect'. While some High Courts were against such an implied power, other High Courts held that the tribunal had the power to set aside an ex parte award if sufficient cause was shown by the party for its absence. The conflict was set at rest by the decision of the Supreme Court in Grindlays Bank.[93]The court observed that even if there is no express provision in the Act or the rules framed thereunder giving the tribunal jurisdiction to set aside an ex parte order, words 'shall follow such procedure as the arbitrator or other authority concerned may think fit' in s 11 (1) of the Act, are of the widest amplitude and confer ample power upon the tribunal and other authorities to devise such procedure as the justice of the case demands. In view of this power, the industrial tribunal must necessarily be endowed with all powers, which bring about an adjudication of an existing industrial dispute, after affording all the parties an opportunity of hearing. Therefore, 'where a party is prevented from appearing at the hearing due to sufficient cause and is faced with an ex parte award, it is as if the party is visited with an award without a notice of the proceedings. It is needless to stress that where the tribunal proceeds to make an award without notice to a party, the award is nothing but a nullity. In such circumstances, the tribunal has not only the power but also the duty to set aside the ex parte award and to direct the matter to be heard afresh.'

The discretion conferred on the authorities to determine the procedure as they think fit, is subject to the rules made by the appropriate government in this behalf Rule 22 of the IDCR empowers the authorities to proceed ex parte where any party fails to attend the proceedings. If this power is implicit, the power to set aside the ex parte award because the power to proceed ex parte carries with it the power to inquire whether or not there was sufficient cause for the absence of the party at the hearing. The court further held that even if the award was published in the Official Gazette, the tribunal has the power to deal with the application properly made before it for setting aside the ex parte award and pass suitable orders. This holding was followed by the court in Satnam Verma, in which the first date of hearing of the reference was fixed for framing issues, leading evidence and disposal of the reference on 23 February 1982. But the workman understood the date of hearing to be 26 February 1982 on which date he appeared and found that the matter had been disposed of ex parte on 23 February 1982. On the same day, he moved an application pointing out that his information about the date was incorrect. But the labour court held that since the award had already been published in the Official Gazette, it had no jurisdiction to recall and set aside the ex parte order and to restore the case to the file. The Supreme Court held that the labour court was in error in rejecting the request of the workman, particularly, when the assertion on the part of the workman was bona fide and was not seriously controverted.[94] It is, therefore, now settled law that the adjudicator has ample jurisdiction to entertain an application to set aside an ex parte award even after it has published. But it does not mean that the tribunal can entertain such an application to set aside an ex parte order even after an inordinate delay. For instance, in CJ Thomas, a single judge of Kerala High Court refused to entertain an application to set aside the ex parte order after a delay of more than three years.[95] Furthermore, it will be well within the jurisdiction of the adjudicator to reject an application for setting aside an ex parte order or award, if the applicant fails to show sufficient cause for his default.[96] However, good or sufficient cause should relate to the date of absence on which the tribunal decides to proceed ex parte and not to a date subsequent to that date. Refusal of the tribunal to entertain an application showing good cause relating to absence of a date subsequent to the date on which the labour court decided to proceed ex parte, will not normally be amenable to interference in judicial review.[1] But in Maharashtra GK Union, the orders of the labour court, dismissing the application for setting aside the ex parte award as well as the ex parte award were quashed. In this case, the workman was represented before the labour court by the union which had sponsored the dispute. But the union lost interest in the case as the workman had joined another union and failed to appear before the labour court. Furthermore, the absence was also due to industrial unrest and strike. In these circumstances, it was held that the workman should not suffer for lapse of the union and the matter was remitted back to the labour court for deciding it afresh.[2] An application for reviewing an ex parte award passed by an industrial tribunal, filed before the tribunal after 30 days of the publication of the award, was held to be barred by limitation as the tribunal had become functus officio after the expiry of 30 days from the date of the publication of the award.[3]

In Indian Metals & Ferro Alloys, after the written statement had been filed, issues were framed. On the next date of hearing, the management was present while the union representing the workmen did not appear. The tribunal, therefore, made a no dispute award which was subsequently published. The union, then, filed an application for restoration of the proceedings after setting aside the ex parte award. On the date fixed for hearing of the application, neither party appeared and the tribunal dismissed the application for non-appearance of the parties. The union again filed another application for restoration of the earlier application and the tribunal dismissed the same as not maintainable. In writ proceedings against that order, the Orissa High Court upheld the order of the tribunal and held that O 9, r 13 of the CPC was applicable to proceedings by reason of Orissa Rules specifically applying O 17 and s 11(1) of that Act provided that the tribunal shall devise such procedure as it thinks fit but unless s 141 or 151 is applied to proceedings before the labour court, a second application would not be maintainable.[4] A single judge of Madras High Court, interpreting r 22 of the IDCR, held that the adjudicator should take into consideration the statements filed by the party which remained ex parte and only on comparative merits of claims and counter claims an ex parte award has to be passed. It is clear that the ex parte award passed without considering the contentions raised in the counter statement filed before the conciliation officer or before the labour court or industrial tribunal would not be valid.[5] In Virendra Bhandari, the facts were that a dispute regarding termination of service was referred for adjudication. The tribunal held that there was no dispute as the workman did not appear in spite of notice and hence the workman remained ex parte. Thereafter, the government by another order made a reference of a dispute to the tribunal on the same questions on which the earlier reference was made. The tribunal adjudicated the matter and passed its award. In a writ petition challenging both the reference and award, the High Court held that in the first reference, the tribunal recorded a finding that no industrial dispute existed and the said determination fell within the definition of the term ‘award’ under the ID Act, and, therefore, the second reference on the same dispute was incompetent. On special leave, the Supreme Court, while quashing the order of the Division Bench of High Court, observed that a perusal of the award made on the earlier occasion would clearly indicate that there was no adjudication of the dispute at all, and what was stated was that the parties had not appeared before the tribunal; that where there was no adjudication of the dispute on merits, it could not be said that the industrial dispute did not exist. In such a situation, it is open to the government to make a second reference of the dispute.[6]

The above decision calls for some analysis. Once an award was passed by the tribunal in the first reference, setting the workman ex parte on ground that he did not enter appearance in spite of notice, the matter stood disposed off once and for all. An award passed ex parte, after going into the merits of the dispute, is still an award unless it is shown that the tribunal had recalled the award on an application made by the party explaining his absence to the satisfaction of the tribunal. It is also not the case that the workman made an application to the first tribunal with a request to condone his non-appearance, before the publication of the ex parte award. By the same token, a second reference of the same dispute is incompetent. The observation of the apex court that 'there was no adjudication' of the dispute is equally without basis. If the parties do not appear despite notice, what should the labour court or tribunal do? Should it be asked to wait indefinitely and keep the matter hanging till such time, the parties find it convenient to appear or respond at their sweet will? Going by the view expressed by the Supreme Court, either party at its sole discretion may choose not to enter appearance, and raise a fresh dispute on the same matter on which an ex parte award was already passed and published. It is submitted that the decision of Supreme Court is clearly wrong and that of the Division Bench of the High Court is right.

(xi) Adjournments

Rule 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, prescribes that among other matters, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply to the authorities mentioned in s 1 (3) in connection with granting adjournments.[7] Rule 10B(8) of these rules lays down the procedure and prescribes the time-limit for granting adjournments. The question, therefore, whether an adjournment should or should not be granted in a particular case, is in the discretion of the tribunal.[8] The discretion, however, has to be judicially exercised in the circumstances of the case.[9] The tribunal, therefore, must grant such reasonable adjournments as may be necessary so that justice may be done.[10] But while granting adjournments in the course of adjudication of industrial disputes, the tribunal has to bear in mind that speedy settlement of an industrial dispute is the very essence of industrial adjudication. Hence, long and elaborate adjournments for any small step that a party may intend to take, would defeat the purpose of such adjudication.[11] Nevertheless, expedition though has its own virtue, an adjudicator must realise that he has to decide and not simply dispose of a case as quickly as possible. A short adjournment, therefore, if required by the exigencies of a case, must be allowed in the interest of fair adjudication.[12] The order refusing to grant adjournment in an arbitrary manner or in violation of the rules of natural justice resulting in injustice to a party will be liable to be quashed on certiorari.[13] For instance, where after refusing to grant an adjournment on account of the illness of the employer's representative, the tribunal did not adjourn the case for the evidence of the witnesses, who had not turned up on that date and proceeded ex parte to decide the entire case on the very same day, in the absence of the party and without hearing him at all, the award was quashed on certiorari.[14] A typical illustration of arbitrariness in exercising discretion in the matter of adjournment is the case of Technological Institute.[15] The tribunal adjourned the matter on various occasions from time to time to enable the workmen to produce evidence. As a matter of fact, it had been doing nothing but merely adjourning the matter for over two years at the request of the workmen. Ultimately, after adducing some evidence, the union closed its case. Inspite of the helpful attitude adopted by the management, the tribunal rejected the request of the management, for leave to adduce evidence and closed the case of the management suo motu very abruptly without permitting the management to produce evidence on its behalf which it was entitled, in law, to place before the tribunal. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court not only set aside the award of the tribunal but strongly deprecated the arbitrary attitude of the tribunal and observed that 'to say the least, this attitude of the tribunal is highly arbitrary and unjust'. But, where a party remained absent on the date fixed for recording evidence in the presence of representatives of the parties, nor sent a request for adjournment, there was no denial of opportunity to the party to produce evidence when the tribunal proceeded ex parte.[16] Likewise, where the company had taken some adjournments and on the last occasion its counsel had given an undertaking not to pray for further time in future, it was held that the tribunal had not denied reasonable opportunity of being heard by refusing to grant further adjournment to the company. It was observed that the tribunal had not acted unfairly in disallowing unreasonable prayer for adjournment made by the employer company.[17]

(xii) Evidence

(a) Application of the Indian Evidence Act 1872

After the pleadings have been completed and issues have been framed, the tribunal has to record evidence. On an analysis of the provisions of s 11, it will appear that the adjudicatory authorities under the Act, are authorised to take evidence and may be treated as courts within the meaning of s 3 of the Indian Evidence Act. But proceedings before such authorities are to be deemed as judicial proceedings only within the meaning of s s 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code and such authorities are to be deemed as civil courts only for the purposes of s s 345, 346 and 348 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. For all other purposes, these authorities shall not be deemed to be 'civil courts' and the proceedings before them shall not be treated as judicial proceedings. Rule 15 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 authorises the board, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal or an arbitrator under s 10A to accept admit or call for evidence at any stage of proceedings in such manner as it may think fit. Rule 16 empowers these authorities to administer oath. The state governments have also framed rules under the Act relating to the procedure of recording evidence after the issues have been settled. The pleadings of the parties do not amount to evidence. The evidence may be oral or by affidavits. The party controverting the statement of the deponent of an affidavit should either file a counter affidavit or ask for an opportunity to cross-examine the deponent of the affidavit. It is not the duty of the tribunal to invite the party concerned to cross-examine the deponent. Not inviting a party to cross-examine the deponent will not amount to denial of an opportunity to cross-examine the deponent.[18]

Proceedings before these tribunals are quasi-judicial proceedings but on the question whether s 1 of the Indian Evidence Act makes it applicable of its own force to proceedings before the adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act there is some divergence of judicial opinion. In an early decision, the Madras High Court went to the extent of saying that though a court of law is not generally entitled to arrive at a finding in any manner except on the evidence adduced before it, quasi-judicial tribunals, like the industrial tribunal not hampered by the rules of evidence applicable to proceedings in a court of law, would be entitled to rely on data available to them otherwise than from evidence adduced on behalf of the parties.[19] On the other hand, the Calcutta High Court, has not only dissented from this decision of the Madras High Court, but also has dissented from some of its own earlier decisions and held that 'an industrial tribunal is a 'court' in the wider connotation of the terms as defined in s 3 of the Evidence Act and the Act applies to judicial proceedings before an industrial tribunal'.[20]But the preponderance of judicial opinion is that the industrial tribunals not being civil 'courts' except for limited purposes within the meaning of s 3 of the Evidence Act, the proceedings before them are merely of quasi-judicial nature and s 1 of the Indian Evidence Act does not make that Act applicable of its own force to such proceedings.[21]Hence, they are not bound by the strict rules of procedure of the Indian Evidence Act. The trend of recent judicial thinking is that the application of technical rules such as acquiescence, and estoppel etc, are not appropriate to industrial adjudication.[22] The question of acquiescence was dealt with by the Supreme Court in Guest Keen Williams, in which the pleas of acquiescence and laches were negatived by the court.[23] Industrial tribunals should be slow and circumspect in applying technical principles such as acquiescence and estoppel.[24] In Bennett Coleman, the Supreme Court observed:

> ... assuming that the rule of estoppel, as incorporated in section 115 of the Evidence Act, were to apply, the foundation of that rule is that it is inequitable and unjust to person, that if another person by a representation induces him to act as he would not have otherwise acted, the person who made the representation should be allowed to deny the effect of his former statement on the loss, and injury of the person who has acted on it [Sarut v Gopal]. [25]The rule is one of evidence only and does not create any substantive right or confer any cause of action on the other. It comes into operation if a statement as to the existence of a fact has been made with the intention that the other person to whom it is made should believe and act on it and that another person does in fact act upon the faith of it ... The burden of proving the ingredients of section 115 of the Evidence Act lies on the party claiming estoppel. The representation which is the basis for the rule must be clear and unambiguous and not indefinite, upon which the party relying on it is said to have, in good faith and in belief of it, acted.[26]

The Assam and Nagaland High Court, however, held that the employees who were pitched against the management were not in an equal position in bargaining. Therefore, it was open to the union, which took up the cause of the employees to raise the dispute by way of collective bargaining on their behalf. Hence, no question of estoppel would arise in industrial matters.[27] On the other hand, the Madras High Court has on the facts of the case in Natarajan Engineering, applied the principle of estoppel.[28] Though not bound by strict rules of the Evidence Act, industrial tribunals have to comply with the rules of natural justice in the proceedings before them. Stating it broadly and without intending it to be exhaustive, it may be said that: rules of natural justice require that a party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies, that the evidence of the opponent should be taken in his presence, and that he should be given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined by that party, and that no materials should be relied on against him without his being given an opportunity of explaining them.[29] Fair play requires that evidence on an allegation made against a delinquent workman, must be produced before the tribunal in the 'appropriate manner' giving an opportunity to the workman to rebut the same. If that is not done, it will be against the rules of natural justice. For instance, if the past record of the workman is to be taken into account for determining the quantum of punishment then that record must be produced before the labour court and the workmen should be given an opportunity before such record is taken into account. If that is not done, the award of the labour court not taking such record into consideration will not be vulnerable[30] but, when documents are admitted in evidence and are taken into consideration by the tribunal, opportunity should be given to the party adversely affected by them to rebut such evidence or to contradict statements contained in such documents which are prejudicial to such party.[31]

Similarly, even though all the technicalities of the Evidence Act may not be strictly applicable, it is inconceivable that an industrial tribunal could act on what was not evidence such as hearsay. Nor can the tribunal be justified in basing its award on copies of documents when the originals which were in existence but were not produced and proved by one of the methods ie either by an affidavit or by witnesses who had executed them if they were alive and could be produced.[32] The general principles of law of evidence, however, may be applicable.[33]For instance, parties to industrial adjudication are entitled to inspect the record of the tribunal and also to get certified copies under s 74 of the Evidence Act. Even in proceedings governed by the strict requirements and rules of the Evidence Act, it might not be correct to rule out certain instances altogether as irrelevant, because they might specifically become relevant as res gestae. That apart, the tribunal has wide powers in regard to industrial adjudication and is not hide-bound by the niceties of the Evidence Act or the principles or res gestae.[34] It is however, well settled that where there is no evidence before the tribunal on the basis of which it can form the opinion which finds expression in the award, such opinion will not be sustainable in law.[35] Though in industrial adjudication, the evidence of recognition and identification may have to be considered, the requirement of recognition and identification cannot be stretched to import the standard of criminal trials, viz that before a workman can be found guilty of an offence meriting dismissal, he must be recognised, implicated and named by more than one witness.

It is not the quantity of evidence but the quality of the same which has to be looked into and the evidence has to be read as a whole.[36] In Bhagwandas Chopra, during the pendency of adjudication proceedings in connection with the termination of the services of the workmen before the industrial tribunal in place of the original employer, Narang Bank of the India Ltd, its successor-in-interest, the United Bank of India, was impleaded as a party to the proceedings before the tribunal. Prior to the United Bank of India becoming a party, the workman examined himself and he was examined by the representative of the Narang Bank of India Ltd. Thereafter, the evidence of the workman was closed. Sometime after being impleaded as a party, the United Bank of India made an application to the tribunal for recalling the workman for cross-examination by it, but the tribunal rejected the application. The award of the tribunal was quashed by the Delhi High Court on the ground that the tribunal violated the rules of natural justice by not allowing the United Bank of India to cross-examine the workman. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court set aside the decision of the High Court and held that if the Narang Bank of India had no right to recall the workman for cross-examination on the day on which the United Bank of India applied to the tribunal for his cross-examination, the latter bank also could not be granted permission to do so. In the absence of any exceptional circumstance which would have entitled, in the ordinary course, a party to a proceeding to recall a witness whose evidence had already been completed, for further cross-examination, the latter bank could also not make such a claim at all, particularly after both the parties had closed their respective cases before the tribunal. The dismissal of the application of the United Bank of India for recalling the workman for further cross-examination, in the absence of any exceptional circumstances, could not be considered as violation of the rules of natural justice.[37]

A Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court, in Nalgonda CMS Ltd, held that merely because an industrial tribunal had certain trappings of a civil court, it could not be considered to be a civil court because the judicial functions performed by an industrial tribunal under this Act are different from those performed by ordinary courts of law. An industrial tribunal has no other function except that of adjudicating matters entrusted to it under the provisions of this Act. It is therefore, outside the hierarchy of the ordinary judicial system. Hence the provisions of Code of Civil Procedure or Evidence Act are applicable to its proceedings only to a limited extent and it is open to the tribunal to adopt such procedure which it deems necessary. Furthermore, the preponderance of judicial opinion based on well-established principles of law is to the effect that the provisions of s 5 of the Limitation Act are not applicable to the proceedings before an Industrial Tribunal. [38] In FCI, under an earlier order of the Supreme Court, the only question that the tribunal was required to consider was 'the identity' of certain workmen and not whether they or anyone of them had been in employment of the corporation at the relevant time. However, the tribunal conducted a fresh appraisal to determine as to whether all or any of such workmen were in employment of the corporation at the relevant time. Apart from holding that the tribunal misconceived the nature of the orders of the Supreme Court, in conducting a fresh appraisal as to whether all or any such workmen were in employment of the corporation at the relevant time, the court observed that the tribunal, even in the matter of marshalling or considering the material placed before it, had gone wrong. As the tribunal is not a court, there should be only 'material' and not 'evidence' as required by the Evidence Act to prove the facts. The tribunal had examined a number of witnesses and stated that the evidence of the workmen was not 'duly proved', 'legally proved' or 'proved beyond reasonable doubt'. This approach of the tribunal was also wrong because the only question before it was whether, on weighing the probabilities, the material placed by the workmen was acceptable or rendered probable. It was not required to consider at length the minutest particulars in the case, in the light of requirements of the Evidence Act and it should not have magnified the minor lapses in evaluating the probability.[39]

(b) Admissibility of Evidence

A quasi-judicial decision presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves presentation of their cases by the parties to the dispute and if the dispute between them is on a question of fact, the assertion of the fact by means of evidence adduced by the parties to the dispute. Any party appearing before a tribunal must make a claim or demur the claim of the other side and when there is a burden upon it to prove or establish a fact so as to invite a decision in its favour, it has to lead evidence. The obligation to lead evidence to establish an allegation made by a party is on the party making the allegation. The test would be as to who would fail if no evidence is led. It must seek an opportunity to lead evidence.[40] Sub-rules (5) and (6) of r 10B prescribe the procedure and time-limit for recording evidence while sub-r (7) prescribes the procedure and time-limit for hearing the arguments after closing of evidence by the parties. The question as to what evidence should be allowed to be adduced on the facts and in the circumstances of a case is in the discretion of the tribunal. Since the technicalities of the Evidence Act regarding the admissibility of evidence, do not apply to industrial adjudication, the discretion, of the tribunal is to be exercised for achieving the effective settlement of the industrial disputes.

In National Insurance, at the stage of arguments, the union produced before the tribunal, a statement showing various items which should be added back to the net profits, on the basis of which the tribunal added back the items shown in the statement, to the net profits of the company. The award of the tribunal was challenged in appeal before the Supreme Court on the ground that at the stage of arguments the tribunal ought not to have permitted the union to adduce additional evidence and by so doing it deprived the employer-company of the opportunity to lead evidence to counter the contents of the statement. The court rejected this plea as the statement was not produced as additional evidence before the tribunal which was, in fact, merely a statement of certain figures from the company's own balance sheet and the profit and loss account produced before the tribunal by the company and the statement in question was produced before the tribunal merely for its ready reference. It was observed that since it did not contain any new material, the company could not rightly complain that it was taken by surprise or that it was entitled to lead any additional evidence to contest the figures in that statement and further that if the company wanted to refute that statement, it could very well have done so from the balance sheet, its directors' report and profit and loss accounts and other documents on record. On this fact-situation, the court upheld the view taken by the tribunal in relying upon the statement and declining the company's request to lead additional evidence on the ground that the statement contained fresh material.[41]

However, from Khardah & Co, decided earlier, it would appear that the Supreme Court justified the admission of certain evidence by the tribunal even after the case had been fully argued, and without notice to the other side. In this case, after the hearing of the case was over, the union requested the tribunal to send for the records from the registrar of trade unions to ascertain the fact about the status of the concerned workman as to whether he was an office-bearer of the union, which fact was disputed by the employer, while dealing with the plea of victimisation. The tribunal acceded to the request of the union without notice to the other side. In the peculiar circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court, in appeal by special leave, against the resulting award, held that it could not be contended that the procedure adopted by the tribunal to send for an authenticated record to ascertain the disputed fact about the status of the concerned workman vitiated the award made by it. Since this case was decided on its own peculiar facts, it does not lay down a general proposition of law that the tribunal can always admit evidence after the case has been closed by the parties.[42] Even if the tribunal has the power to allow the parties to adduce further evidence in support of their case at the stage after the closure of arguments and before the passing of the award on an application made for this purpose and explaining the bona fides of the delay, the tribunal has the discretion to reject such an application if no case has been made out justifying the production of such evidence.[43]

If an ex parte inquiry is ordered against a delinquent workman on the ground of his non-participation in the inquiry and the validity of the inquiry is upheld by the tribunal, there is no provision in the Act which, in such a case, entitles the workman to lead evidence before the tribunal to show that the charges levelled against him were false and baseless.[44] In such a situation, the employer can validly take advantage of relying on findings of the domestic inquiry as prima facie proof of alleged misconduct.[45] It is well-settled that an allegation which is not pleaded, even if there is evidence in support of it, cannot be examined because the other side had no notice of it and if entertained, it would tantamount to granting unfair advantage to the other side.[46] But the mere fact that a party has not filed its written statement would not disentitle it to adduce evidence to rebut or demolish the case of the other side, as it would not be proper to refuse examination of witnesses when the party later presses for it as it would be against the principles of natural justice.[47] In NBCC, in support of the case of the workman, the labour court principally relied on the oral testimony of an employee of the corporation who had left its service and subsequently had made claim for damages against the corporation. In a writ petition against the award of the labour court, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that the fact that the witness had left the service of the corporation and had made a claim for damages, by itself would not make his evidence inadmissible and disentitle the labour court to accept his sworn evidence.[48] In Oriental Containers, the Bombay High Court observed that the evidence of an accomplice cannot be rejected outright and it can be accepted if it receives some independent corroboration.[49] In Chennai ACW Union, a single judge of Madras High Court held that so long as proceedings are pending, there is no lack of jurisdiction in the adjudicating forum for permitting any party to the proceedings to let in evidence at any stage of the proceedings before the passing of the award, so long as the material sought to be introduced by way of evidence would bring forth the truth of the claim made or the defence taken.[50]

(c) Appreciation of Evidence

The oral or documentary evidence adduced before industrial tribunals must be the evidence which is legally adduced.[51] But a tribunal in its discretion may consider that some evidence adduced by one of the parties is irrelevant or immaterial.[52] The admission or rejection of a piece of evidence placed before a tribunal and its appreciation is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the tribunal and sufficiency and quality of evidence on which a finding would be arrived at, is also a matter for the tribunal to consider.[53] Refusal to admit evidence by a tribunal cannot in every case necessarily be deemed to render the adjudication unfair. But if it has totally ignored certain evidence on record in arriving at a finding, such a finding will be perverse.[54] Similarly where the tribunal finds that a witness has no regard for truth and still relies on his statement, the resulting conclusion will be perverse.[55] Nor can the tribunal allow evidence to be led by one party in the absence of the other,[56] but the tribunal cannot completely ignore the evidence adduced by the parties and record a finding contrary to such evidence as such a finding would be perverse.[57] In Singareni Collieries Ltd, the Supreme Court held that where the tribunal, on the appreciation of oral and documentary evidence, passed an award granting 'charge allowance' to fitters as referred by the government, it would not be proper for the High Court to interfere with the said award and direct the payment of said allowance to electricians without any evidence before it.[58]

(xiii) Preliminary Issues

Section 10(4) of the Act circumscribes the parameters of the jurisdiction of the adjudicatory tribunals requiring them to confine their adjudication to the points specified in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto. Thus, there are two categories of points which a tribunal has to decide. Firstly, the points which have been specified in the order of reference for adjudication. Secondly, the points which are incidental to the points specified in the order of reference for adjudication. In this category, will come the determination of the questions which go to the root of the jurisdiction of the tribunal. On the determination of such points will depend the question as to whether the tribunal has the jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the points referred to it for adjudication. If the decision on the preliminary issues is in the affirmative, the tribunal proceeds further with the adjudication while if it decides it in the negative, it will have no jurisdiction to proceed further with the adjudication. Preliminary issues in a suit or proceeding may relate to a question of law, which, if decided at the commencement of the proceeding, would render the very suit or proceeding incompetent and save the precious time of the court and unnecessary costs to parties. The purpose of framing preliminary issue, generally on the request of the defendant, and deciding it at the commencement of the proceeding is that in a number of cases, the very decision thereon can dispose of the suit or proceeding, without the court having to go into the merits of the case. In TISCO, while observing that the Tribunal was in error in refusing to decide, as a preliminary issue, the question whether s 33 applied to the case, Gajendragadkar CJI, held:

> It would be legitimate for an employer. to make an application under section 33 without prejudice to his case that section 33 did not apply...it would be idle and unreasonable to suggest that the employer should make up his mind whether section 33 applies or not, and if he thinks that section 33 does not apply, he need not make the application; on the other hand, if he thinks that section 33 applies, he should make an application, but then he cannot be permitted to urge that the application is unnecessary. Such a view is...wholly illogical and unsatisfactory.[59]

The judicial process outlined by the learned Chief Justice is the only right way of handling cases which fall in the twilight zones involving questions of jurisdiction. The above view was followed in several subsequent cases. In Strawboard, Goswami J, held that additional or ancillary issues are framed for better appreciation of the cases of the parties with reference to the principal issues which have been referred for adjudication and on the basis of which the jurisdiction of the tribunal would have to be determined.[60] Justice Desai held that it is open to the tribunal to frame an issue on a jurisdictional point and dispose it of as a preliminary issue.[61] Sometimes, the failure of the tribunal to frame such preliminary issues may lead to miscarriage of justice.[62] In Cooper Engineering, Goswami J, held that in a case of dismissal or discharge, if the employer makes a request to the labour court to try the validity of the domestic enquiry as a preliminary issue before proceeding with the merits of the case, the court should first decide that issue as a preliminary issue; that on the said issue being pronounced against the employer, it would be for him to decide whether he would adduce additional evidence; and that if the employer chooses not to adduce additional evidence, it would not thereafter be permissible to him to raise the issue in any further proceeding.[63] In Shankar Chakravarty, the facts disclosed that the management, in an application under s 33(2)(b), did not make a formal request to permit it to lead evidence. Accordingly the tribunal passed the award, which was challenged by the management on the ground that the said award was vitiated as the tribunal did not call upon the management to adduce additional evidence and justify the dismissal. Repelling the contention, Desai J, held:

> In an application under section 33 the employer has to plead that a domestic enquiry has been held and it is legal and valid. In the alternative it must plead that if the Labour Court or Industrial Tribunal comes to the conclusion that either there was no enquiry or the one held was defective, the employer would adduce evidence to substantiate the charges of misconduct alleged against the workman. ...there is no duty cast on the Industrial Tribunal or the Labour Court while adjudicating upon a penal termination of service of a workman either under section 10 or under section 33 to call upon the employer to adduce additional evidence to substantiate the charge of misconduct by giving some specific opportunity after decision on the preliminary issue whether the domestic enquiry was at all held, or if held, was defective, in favour of the workman.[64]

As rightly held by Desai J, no duty is cast upon the tribunal to prompt the employer to lead additional evidence, and it is the sole responsibility of the employer to make a request therefor at the appropriate stage. If the employer does not make any such request, the tribunal would be perfectly right in deciding the case on the strength of the material on record. However, contrary to this settled legal position, Varadarajan, J, held that the employer must seek permission to adduce evidence either at the time of making application under s 33 or after the written statement of defence is filed by the workman u/s. 10 and that, if it fails to make a request at the commencement of proceedings, it would not be allowed to do so at any later stage, as any delay in making such a request would prejudicially affect the workman and compel him to surrender which he may not otherwise do.[65] Before analysing the merits of this case, we may take a look at another set of observations of Hegde J (for majority) in Laxmidevamma's case:

> ...the directions issued by this Court in Shambhu Nath Goyal's case need not be varied, being just and fair. There can be no complaint from the management side for this procedure because this opportunity of leading evidence is being sought by the management only as an alternative plea and not as an admission of illegality in its domestic enquiry. At the same time, it is also of advantage to the workman inasmuch as they will be put to notice of the fact that management is likely to adduce fresh evidence, hence, they can keep their rebuttal or other evidence ready. ...There is one other reason why we should accept the procedure laid down by this Court in Shambhu Nath Goyal's case. ...This judgment having held the field for nearly 18 years...the doctrine of stare decisis require us to approve the said judgment to see that a long standing decision is not unsettled without strong cause…[66]

Justice Sabharwal, dissenting, observed:

> To allow or not to allow the prayer of the management to adduce in such a matter should essentially lie within the discretion of labour court/Industrial Tribunal to be exercised on well settled judicial principles. ..It appears that earlier to Shambhu Nath Goyal...it was not doubted that the employer could ask for an opportunity to adduce evidence before the proceedings are closed before the labour court/Industrial Tribunal. The departure came up only in Shambhu Nath Goyal. ...Except the main judgment of Shambhu Nath Goyal…, no other decision of the court was cited before us wherein it may have been held that the prayer of the management to adduce evidence is to be rejected if not made either in the written statement filed to the statement of claim in a reference under section 10 or at the initial stage of proceedings under section 33(2)(b) … (at pp 206-11).

The settled law has been that the employer has a right to make a request to the Tribunal for adducing evidence at any stage, but before the close of the adjudication proceedings. Even so, given the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, the decision in Shambhu Nath Goyal was correct, regardless of the departure made by the court on a vital aspect. Justice Varadarajan observed that it was the duty of the management to have got the issue 'whether the workman was gainfully employed or not in the intervening period' framed by the Tribunal and adduced the necessary evidence, unless the object was to rake up that question at some later stage to the disadvantage of the workman. The exceptional facts and circumstances disclosed in that case do not justify the laying down of an inflexible rule of universal application, contrary to the settled principles. The question of adducing additional evidence arises only after the tribunal records a finding that the domestic enquiry suffers from some infirmity, and not before. No employer can be asked to proceed ab initio on the presumption that the domestic enquiry was defective and accordingly make a pre-emptive request for adducing evidence at the stage of filing written statement or an application under s 33(2)(b). The record of domestic enquiry should be presented to the tribunal for its scrutiny and a result thereon pronounced before the employer could make a request for permission to lead further evidence. If, for instance, the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the domestic enquiry is unassailable, then the question of employer adducing additional evidence does not arise. Thus, the employer's right to make a request for adducing additional evidence is contingent upon the tribunal recording a finding against the domestic enquiry. The rulings in Motipur, Ludh Budh Singh, and Cooper Engineering consistently upheld the right of employer to make the request at any stage before the close of proceedings, and not compulsorily at the commencement of the proceeding. The observation of Varadarajan J, that the filing of application at a later stage would 'result in delay' is ill-founded and without substance. As a matter of fact, any denial of opportunity to the employer to adduce additional evidence for the reasons mentioned by the learned judge would work out to the ultimate detriment of the workman himself, as the employer would go back, initiate fresh disciplinary action, cure the defects and file a foolproof case for approval. In such an event, the workman would be permanently deprived of the benefit of an enquiry held by an independent judicial authority. The observations of Hegde J, in Laxmidevamma are as misconceived as those of Varadarajan J. Once the right of employer to adduce additional evidence is conceded, the discretion whether or not to permit the employer to lead evidence should rest with the labour court, which can always go into the question of genuineness or otherwise of the request. At any rate, it should not be superimposed by higher courts thereby robbing the flexibility and, what is more, the discretionary power available to the trial court under ss 33 & 10(1) read with s 11A.

There is no rule of law which mandates the employer to make a request even before the court has recorded a finding against the validity of domestic enquiry. If the employer makes a request immediately after the labour court records a finding against the domestic enquiry, it could not be said that the employer was guilty of delaying the adjudication process nor could it be said that such a request operates to the prejudice of the workman. His further observation that 'it is also of advantage to the workmen inasmuch as they will be put to notice of the fact that management is likely to adduce fresh evidence, hence, they can keep their rebuttal or other evidence ready', is equally without merit for the reason that the question of the workman leading evidence contra arises only after management has adduced evidence from its side. At any rate, the workman cannot be expected to indulge in guesswork as to the kind and quality of evidence to be led by him contra without first knowing what the management has adduced in support of the order of dismissal. His observation that Shambhu Nath Goyal held the field for 18 years rests on a tenuous foundation. The concern shown by Hegde J for upholding stare decisis, though commendable, is unsupported by facts, because Motipur was decided by a four-judge Bench comprising Gajendragadkar CJI, Wanchoo, Hidayatullah and Ramaswamy JJ, which was no less long-standing, having held the field for as many years as Shambhu Nath Goyal. From the standpoint of judicial precedent, the ratio of Motipur is binding on all the subsequent Benches of four judges or less, and thus it clearly binds the three-judge Bench which decided Shambhu Nath Goyal. With respect, it is submitted that both Shambhu Nath Goyal and Laxmidevamma are monumental illustrations of judicial indiscipline at its pinnacle. It is shocking that Hegde J (speaking for a Constitution Bench), should have affirmed Shambhu Nath Goyal over the decision of a four-judge Bench and, in the same strain, express his concern for stare decisis. The dissenting judgment of Sabharwal J places the law in the correct perspective and is right, whereas that of the majority is completed misconceived and flawed. In Divyash Pandit, the labour court framed the following issues:

(1) Whether the management is an industry or not under section 2(j) of IDA?

(2) Whether Delhi Administration is not the appropriate Government'?

(3) Whether the petitioner is a 'workman' under section 2(s) of IDA?

(4) Whether the domestic enquiry is improper/invalid and whether the finding is perverse?

The labour court decided issue (4) by holding that the findings were perverse and hence was 'non est in the eye of law', and accordingly directed reinstatement of the workman. The court noted the fact that no request was made by the management to lead evidence in support of charges and to prove the same. A two-judge Bench of the Supreme Court comprising Ruma Paul and Thakkar JJ swung to the other extreme, and held:

> It is true no doubt that the respondent may not have made any prayer for additional evidence in its written statement but, as held by this Court in Karnataka Road Transport Corporation... did not place a fetter on the powers of the Court/Tribunal to require or permit parties to lead additional evidence including production of document at any stage of proceedings before they are concluded. Once the Labour Court came to the finding that the enquiry was non est…the Labour Court should have given one opportunity to the respondent to establish the charges before passing an Award in favour of the workman.[67]

The above decision swung the pendulum to the other extreme and is as misconceived as that of Laxmidevamma. It is a little difficult to understand what prompted the learned judges in Shambhu Nath, Laxmidevamma and Divyash cases, to struggle so hard to read so many possibilities within a single set of facts, which ipso facto were comprehensively covered by a spate of authoritative decisions in the 1960s itself. It is not in dispute that the responsibility to make a request to the labour court at the appropriate stage for leading additional evidence squarely rests on the employer. But, in no case could it be contended that the Labour Court is under an obligation to read into the mind of the employer and direct him to lead additional evidence even without a formal request from the latter. Further, such a course on the part of labour court amounts to prompting one party to do something against the other and would place the dismissed workman's case in jeopardy, apart from being repugnant to the principles of natural justice and of sound judicial disposition. If the employer does not make a formal prayer for permission to lead additional evidence, the implication is that he relies on the validity of the domestic enquiry proceedings as being unassailable and that he is not interested in leading additional evidence. The employer would thus miss the opportunity for ever, and cannot be permitted to agitate before the High Court or Supreme Court that the labour court denied opportunity to him, as the situation was of his own making. The decision in Divyash Pandit is as unsatisfactory and defective as that of Hegde J in Laxmidevamma. The law on the subject is well-settled and unambiguous. Eschewing the judicial extremes disclosed in Laxmidevamma and Divyash Pandit, the correct legal position can be stated thus: 'The management should make a specific prayer for permission to adduce additional evidence, either in the application under s 33(2)(b) or in the written statement in a reference under s 10(1) or at a later stage in the adjudication process, but certainly before the conclusion of the proceeding. Once a prayer is thus made, it is not within the power of the Labour Court to refuse permission. However, no obligation of whatsoever nature is cast on the Labour Court to direct the employer, on its own motion, to adduce additional evidence'.

In Cooper Engineering, the case turned on the question 'whether the Labour Court should decide, as a preliminary issue, whether the domestic enquiry violated the principles of natural justice, particularly, where the parties are at variance on that issue'. The main question was rightly decided by Goswami J, by holding that it is for the employer to take a stand and seek permission to adduce additional evidence before the labour court; that if it chooses not to adduce any evidence, it would not thereafter be permissible for the management to raise the issue in any proceeding. But the further gloss added by the learned judge, to the effect that 'there would be no justification for any party to stall the final adjudication of the dispute by the labour court by questioning its decision with regard to the preliminary issue when the matter, if worthy, can be agitated even after the final award', is capable of producing great public mischief to the detriment of justice itself. In the first place, the said observation was more in the nature of obiter and, by no means was part of the ratio decidendi, as can be seen from his own statement: 'We are making these observations in our anxiety that there is no undue delay in industrial adjudication' (in para 22). In this connection, it should be noted that the above case was decided long before s 17B was inserted in IDA. According to the then prevailing legal position, it made no difference in terms of the legal consequences for employer, whether the labour court decided the preliminary issue first or decided both the preliminary issues and merits together. Secondly, the insertion of s 17B changed the complexion of the Act insofar as the employer is required to pay the last drawn wages, in the event he chooses to challenge the order of reinstatement, which means the final order of the labour court on merits gives rise to certain legal and financial consequences to the employer. And, lastly, whatever might be the considerations that weighed with Goswami J in Cooper Engineering, as regards the power to decide preliminary and merits together, they ceased to have any application or sanctity the moment s 17B was enforced. In HD Singh, Khalid J (for self and Reddy J), held that the employer was prohibited from raising preliminary objections touching upon fundamental questions of law or jurisdiction of the court, and that the High Court should not interfere under Art 226. In DP Maheshwari, Reddy J, who was a member of the Bench that decided HD Singh, added further gloss in his own ultra-radical style, which runs thus:

> There was a time when it was though prudent and wise policy to decide preliminary issues first. But the time appears to have arrived for a reversal of that policy. We think it is better that Tribunals, particularly those entrusted with the task of adjudicating labour disputes where delay may lead to misery and jeopardise industrial peace, should decide all issues in dispute at the same time without trying some of them as preliminary issues. Nor should High Courts in exercise of their jurisdiction under Article 226 of the constitution stop proceedings before a Tribunal so that a preliminary issue may be decided by them. [68](Italics supplied).

The above observations of Khalid and Reddy JJ are not only misplaced but are patently unconstitutional as well. The need for determining the preliminary issue is not merely confined to s 33, but extends to the adjudication of disputes referred u/s 10 as well. Order 14, r 2 of CPC, runs thus:

> 2. Court to pronounce judgment on all issues—
>
> (1) Notwithstanding that a case may be disposed of on preliminary issue, the Court shall, subject to the provisions of sub-rule (2), pronounce judgment on all issues.
>
> (2) Where issues both of law and of fact arise in the same suit, and the Court is of opinion that the case or any part thereof may be disposed of on an issue of law only, it may try that issue first if that issue relates to—
>
> (a) the jurisdiction of the Court, or
>
> (b) a bar to the suit created by any law for the time being in force, and for that purpose may, if it thinks fit, postpone the settlement of the other issues until after that issue has been determined, and may deal with the suit in accordance with the decision on that issue.

Rules 10B to 29 of IDCR prescribe the procedure to be followed by the Labour Courts and Tribunals, which, to a large extent, is similar to that of a civil court. Reading the provisions of CPC and IDCR together, it becomes clear that where the issue raised is one of jurisdiction or of law, and if the proceeding can be disposed of on that issue only, the court should try that issue as a preliminary issue before going into the merits. It would be futile for the court to go into the merits of the case, if it has no jurisdiction at all to try the matter or if the issue involves a question of law. In the face of this legal position coupled with the lethal effect of s 17B, to say that the Tribunals would be justified in short-circuiting the adjudication process by arrogating jurisdiction wrongfully, merely because the trying of preliminary issues would lead to misery to one party, is outrageous. The further observation of Reddy J to the effect that the time had changed so much, warranting the trying of preliminary issues and merits together, is no less ill-founded. Even assuming so, yet the letter and spirit of Arts. 226 & 32 have certainly not changed to such an extent as to justify cutting corners by Tribunals. It is not as if the Constitution is meant exclusively for the benefit of one section of society to the detriment of others. This country has not yet decided to patronise communism as an ideology to be pursued at the national level so as to dispense the kind of lop-sided justice advocated by Reddy J. The said issue 'whether the Tribunals should decide preliminary issues first or decide them together with merits' was not raised at any forum below or even before Supreme Court. In these circumstances, should the above observation be taken as ratio decidendi or an irrelevant and uncalled for obiter coming from an over-speaking judge?

Chief Justice Sethi of Karnataka High Court followed the anarchic view of Reddy J and held that the practice of framing preliminary issues in industrial disputes was contrary to 'law' and if permitted would defeat the very purpose for which the IDA was enacted.[69] It is obscure as to which 'law' the learned Chief Justice was referring to—is it the law of jungle or of a modern, civilised democracy governed by a Constitution of its own? If it were contrary to the so-called 'law', what prevented him from enlightening the Bar and Bench by citing the relevant legal provision? In the first place, whatever may be the legislative intent as regards 'speedy disposal' of industrial disputes, no provision of IDA prescribes 'summary procedure' of the kind provided for under O 37 of CPC. Section 11(3) of the IDA clearly states that the Labour Courts, etc., shall have the same powers as are vested with the civil court under CPC when trying a suit in respect of enforcing attendance, examination on oath, production of documents, issuing commissions, and other matters. It further stipulates that every investigation by Labour Court, etc, shall be deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of s s. 193 and 228 of IPC. Rule 10B of the IDCR prescribes the powers of, and procedure to be followed by, Labour Courts, etc, which are analogous to that of a civil court.[70]

The observation of Reddy J in Maheswari, though does not deserve to be elevated to the status of a sound, much less a sane, legal proposition, suffers from the further vice of being repugnant to the Constitution, given that it comes from a Supreme Court Judge, who is supposed to be the custodian of the Constitution. Even assuming that it was right, without conceding in the least, still its validity stood expired with the insertion of s 17B. Examples of gross abuse of power, self-misdirection, jurisdictional lapses and excesses on the part of Labour Courts far outnumber those which had been, and are being, decided in accordance with the law. A glance at the ever-inflating volumes of law journals in this branch bears eloquent testimony to this fact. If, in a chaotic dispensation bordering on licentiousness, the trial courts were to be directed not to frame preliminary issues that touch upon questions of jurisdiction and law, it would produce great public mischief to the detriment of the very concept of justice. To illustrate, where the preliminary issue touches upon questions such as -

(i) whether the Labour Court has jurisdiction at all to try the dispute; or

(ii) whether the person raising the dispute was the employee of the principal employer or of the contractor; or

(iii) whether the person answers at all to the definition of 'workman' under section 2(s) ; or

(iv) whether it is a case of abandonment on the part of the workman or a positive act of termination by the employer; or

(v) whether a workman can be said to be a 'workman concerned in the dispute' under section 33 ; or

(vi) whether the dispute referred for adjudication is an 'industrial dispute' under section 2(k) -

if the Labour Courts were to decide preliminary issues along with merits, it corrupts the judicial process and reduces it to what may be called 'unadulterated gambling'. Should the employer go on paying last drawn wages to the employee under s 17B on the basis of an award, which is prima facie incompetent, absurd and outside the competence of the labour court? Could it be said that s 17B is meant for imposing such a preposterous obligation on the employer with no recourse in the event of the Labour Court arrogating to itself jurisdiction beyond the contemplation of the law? The decisions rendered in Maheshwari and Senapathy deserve to be condemned in the strongest possible language and terms as being perverse and repugnant to CPC as well as ultra vires the Constitution. In the midst of judicial chaos of this magnitude, the decision of the Supreme Court in Hussain Mhasvadkar comes very refreshing in that the apex court made an attempt to undo the damage done by the likes of Reddy J. Two points were urged in the said case: (i) Whether the Bombay Iron and Steel Labour Board constituted under the provisions of the MMHOMWREWA falls within the definition of 'Industry' under s 2(j) of IDA; and (ii) Whether the appellant, working at the relevant point of time as an Inspector, discharging duties, powers and obligations envisaged under s 15 of the said Act answers to the description of 'workman' under s 2(s) of IDA. Justice Raju (for self and Rajendra Babu, J), held that, in view of the fact that the court below entertained doubts about the status of the workman under s 2(s) of IDA, they should have refrained from embarking upon adjudication on merits, and that the larger issue should have been entertained for consideration only if it was absolutely necessary, and not when the claim could have been disposed of otherwise without going into the nature and character of the undertaking itself.[71] This decision is consistent with the principles laid down in Motipur, Tata Iron and Steel and DCM as against the defective rulings given in Maheshwari and other cases.[72] In Satyadev Chemicals, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court observed:

...It is always desirable that all the issues arising in a matter should be decided together and as expeditiously as possible. However, > in the present case, the issue is in respect of the inherent jurisdiction of the authority and the application of the Act itself. Further, no evidence is required to be led for deciding the said issue. It is an admitted fact that each of the above referred 50 employees received monthly wages exceeding Rs 1600. In view of the provision contained in sub-s (6) of s 1, the provisions of the Act shall not apply. The application made before the concerned authority is, therefore, not maintainable. Besides, it is also an admitted fact that all the said employees have also availed of thestatutory remedy available under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 and have filed recovery application before the labour court at Vadodara.[73] (in Para 7)

In Gujarat Kamgar Panchayat, Tripathi J rightly held that, where a preliminary objection which goes to the root of the matter touching upon the very jurisdiction of the tribunal to adjudicate the dispute was raised, the tribunal must first decide that issue, before deciding other issues. The learned judge further observed that, having decided the preliminary issue about jurisdiction, there was no reason for the tribunal in the instant case to postpone the decision on the preliminary issue of such nature, the decision of which would have disposed of the entire case.[74] It is submitted that the above two decisions of Gujarat High Court lay down the correct law consistent with the ratio of Express Newspapers.[75]

(xiv) Review and Rectification of Errors

The expression 'review' is used in two distinct senses, namely,

(i) a review on merits when the error sought to be corrected is one of law and is apparent on the face of the record; and,

(ii) a procedural review which is either inherent or implied in a court or tribunal to set aside a palpably erroneous order passed under a misapprehension by it.

No review lies on merits unless a statute specifically provides for it. In other words, the power of review is not an inherent power. It must be conferred either specifically or by necessary implication.[76]Industrial tribunals and labour courts, therefore, have no power of review because there is no provision in the Act vesting inherent powers in such tribunal or courts analogous to those expressly vested in the civil courts by s 151 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The operative words of s 11 (3) of the Act cannot be construed to confer power of review on the authorities mentioned therein expressly or by necessary implication. Therefore, such tribunals, do not have the power to alter, clarify or even interpret or explain the award they have already made, except the power to correct the clerical mistakes.[77]The provisions of s 36A of the Act which require a reference to labour court, industrial tribunal or national tribunal of any matters of doubt or difficulty arising as to interpretation of an award, clearly indicates that an industrial tribunal does not have an inherent power to interpret or to review its award.[78] In Tata Consulting Engineers, the industrial tribunal reduced the wage scales with retrospective effect and it also laid down the principle enabling the actual fitment of the workmen in their respective wage-scales and also provided for a number of increments to which they would be entitled having regard to the period of completed service. Subsequently, on an application by the workmen, the tribunal made an insertion in the award purporting to clarify and correct the award. A majority of the Supreme Court has taken the view that the words subsequently inserted by the tribunal were omitted by an accidental slip which the tribunal was entitled to correct.[79] But according to the minority judge, it was not a case of accidental slip or omission because the insertion completely changed the character of the award, which was not permissible in the guise of correcting an accidental slip or omission. Therefore, the tribunal travelled outside and beyond the terms of the original award and thus committed a jurisdictional error. On the facts and circumstances of the case, the view of the minority judge is correct.

However, when the 'review' is due to a procedural defect, the inadvertent error committed by the tribunal must be corrected ex debito justitiae to prevent the abuse of its process and such power is inherent in every court or tribunal.[80] Rule 28 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, empowers the industrial tribunals to correct clerical mistakes or errors arising from an accidental slip or omission in any award issued by them. Such clerical errors or mistakes, tribunals are entitled to correct even without notice to the opposite party.[81] This correctional jurisdiction conferred on tribunals is, in terms, identical with the one conferred on the civil courts under s 152 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is in consonance with the first and foremost principles that no party should suffer any detriment on account of a mistake or an error committed by a tribunal. The circumstance that the proceedings before the tribunal are deemed to be concluded when its award becomes enforceable or that thereupon it becomes functus officio would be no ground for inferring any limitation of time in the correctional jurisdiction of the tribunal. The legislature has not chosen to lay any limitation of time for exercising the correctional jurisdiction of the tribunal.[82] In Grindlays Bank (supra), the tribunal passed an ex parte award against the workman which was duly published by the Central Government. Before the award became enforceable on the expiry of 30 days after its publication, the workmen applied for setting it aside on the ground that they were prevented by sufficient cause from appearing when the reference was called for hearing. Accordingly, the tribunal set aside the ex parte award on being satisfied that there was sufficient cause. The Supreme Court repelled the contention that the tribunal had become functus officio, and therefore, had no jurisdiction to set aside the ex parte award. In view of the provisions in s 20(3) of the Act, which lays down that the proceedings before a tribunal would be deemed to be continued till the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s 17A, after the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication, the court held that the tribunal retains jurisdiction over the dispute referred to it for adjudication up to the date it becomes enforceable and till that date it has the power to entertain an application in connection with such dispute. Since the application for setting aside the ex parte award was filed before the expiry of 30 days of its publication, the tribunal rightly entertained it and had jurisdiction to entertain it and decide it on merits. It was further held that the jurisdiction of the tribunal had to be seen on the date of the application made to it and not on the date on which it passed the order setting aside the ex parte award as 'there is no finality attached to an ex parte award because it is always subject to its being set aside on sufficient cause being shown'.

Against an ex parte order or award, the aggrieved party has to apply to the labour court for setting aside such order or award and the labour court has the jurisdiction to entertain such an application. In Chanchal Singh, an ex parte order was made against the employer company on 17 March 1979 which was published on 12 April 1979. The company applied for setting aside the award on 25 April 1979 which was dismissed on 2 November 1979 for default of appearance. The company then filed a review petition on 30 November 1979 which was rejected by the labour court on 5 March 1980 on the ground that it had no power to review its judgment. The company then filed a fresh review petition for review of the order dated 5 March 1980 which was entertained by the labour court. In a writ petition by the workman, against the order of the labour court entertaining the review petition, the Delhi High Court held that the order of the labour court dated 5 March 1980 was a decision finally deciding the case as far as the labour court was concerned.[83] This decision even if erroneous in law or on facts was not defective due to any procedural defect. Hence the order could not be reviewed by the labour court though could have been challenged in a writ petition before the High Court or by a petition for special leave to appeal before the Supreme Court.

In Subrata Guha Sarkar, the company filed a review application of an order of the labour court computing the back wages and other benefits to which the workman was entitled under an award of the industrial tribunal which was rejected by the labour court. Subsequently, the employer filed another review petition which was, allowed by the labour court depriving the legal representatives of the workman, who had died in the meanwhile. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court, in the circumstances of the case, particularly the dilatory tactics adopted by the employer company, held that the second application for review was not maintainable particularly when the review application had been disposed of on contest after hearing both the parties. Speaking for the court, Bhattacharjee J made a very touching observation: 'What may be a luxury for the affluent employer is a death-knell to the poor employee. Indeed, if any honest reckoning is made, it will be evident that the employer incurred expenditure much more than its liability towards the outstanding wages of the employee'.[84] This attitude on the part of the unscrupulous employers apart from being deprecated requires serious sanctions. The analogy of an ex parte order or decree of a civil court does not apply to an ex parte order or award of the labour court. In the Code of Civil Procedure which governs the trial of suits by civil courts, there are no provisions analogous to s 17 A(2) and s 20(3) of this Act. The Code of Civil Procedure does not declare that any order or decree of the civil court shall be final or the proceedings before a civil court shall be concluded within the prescribed time of the publication of such order or decree. There is an elaborate procedure enacted in r 30 of O 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure for setting aside an ex parte order or decree and limitation has been provided therefor.[85] In Birla CSW Mills, the Calcutta High Court held that the operative words of s 11 (3) could not certainly be construed to confer on the tribunal, the power to review or recall the award. Once the award is published, the tribunal cannot alter, modify, clarify or even interpret the award except a possible power to correct clerical mistakes. The Bench further observed: we are of the view that the tribunal was not justified in exercising the power of review/recall of its earlier order on the premise or that it was competent to set aside the ex parte award.[86]

SUB-SECTION (2): POWER OF ENTRY INTO PREMISES - REQUIREMENT OF NOTICE

This sub-section is analogous to O 18, r 18 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: 'The court may at any stage of a suit inspect any property or thing concerning which any question may arise'.[87] The sub-section authorises the authorities mentioned therein to enter the premises occupied by any establishment to which the dispute relates after giving reasonable notice. This notice is only for the purpose of entering the premises to make an inquiry into any existing industrial dispute or any apprehended industrial dispute. In the under-noted case,[88]where the conciliation officer had entered the premises of a distillery without giving any reasonable notice as required by s 11(2), the Supreme Court discountenanced the contention that the settlement brought about by him was not legal and binding, as he had lost jurisdiction on account of non-compliance with the requirement of the notice under s 11(2) and held that the purpose of the notice under s 11(2) is merely to apprise the establishment that it is a conciliation officer who is coming and not an absolute stranger who has no connection at all with the machinery set up for the purpose of the Act and that non-compliance with the requirement of notice under s 11(2), therefore, would not affect the competence of the conciliation officer, to bring about a settlement.

SUB-SECTION (3): POWERS UNDER THE CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE 1908

This sub-section provides that the authorities mentioned therein, such as, industrial tribunals, etc, shall have the same powers as are vested in a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, when trying a suit, in respect of the matters enumerated therein. It is evident that the entire Code of Civil Procedure has not in terms been made applicable to the proceedings under this Act. Consequently, the specific provisions of the Code pertaining to jurisdiction do not strictu sensu govern the adjudicatory proceedings. However, even if the language of the specific sections of the Code is not applicable to a situation, the broader general principles underlying them would undoubtedly be relevant.[89]

(i) Oral Evidence - Enforcing Attendance of Witnesses

The evidence to be submitted in industrial adjudication may be:

(a) 'oral' consisting of statements made verbally by the parties or their witnesses at the hearing; or

(b) 'documentary', consisting of letters, agreements, deeds, statements of accounts, balance-sheets and other documents put in by either side.

This clause vests the tribunal with the same powers as are vested in a civil court in the matter of enforcing attendance of any person and examining him on oath. This power includes the power to recall a witness for further examination or cross-examination.[90] The relevant provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in this behalf are s 27 to s 32 and Orders 16 and 18. Section 27 to s 32 deal with 'summons and discovery'. Order 16 deals with 'summoning and attendance of witnesses' and O 18 deals with 'hearing of the suits and examination of witnesses'. Where the summons issued by the tribunal to the Managing Director was challenged on the ground that the summons should have been issued to the Branch Manager who is dealing with the issues raised in the dispute and not to the Managing Director, it was held that under s 11 (3), the tribunal is vested with the same powers as a civil court under the CPC in respect of enforcing attendance of any person, etc., and that the Managing Director alone was competent to file the writ petition against the summons issued to him.[91] The evidence is to be taken on oath. However, a party must produce all the witnesses whose evidence is relevant and material to the case. Particularly in disciplinary matters, the real witness who can prove or disprove the charge levelled against the delinquent must be produced and failure to produce such a witness would lead to the adverse inference against the party who should have produced that witness.[92]False evidence given on oath or affirmation in industrial adjudication proceedings is perjury, and the person guilty of willfully giving such evidence may be prosecuted and punished for such crime. Similarly, it is offence to manufacture false evidence to be used in industrial adjudication, even though the adjudication may not have taken place or the false evidence may not, in fact, have been used. Though the strict technicalities of the Evidence Act do not apply to industrial adjudication, the rules of evidence to be observed by industrial adjudication are the same as those which will apply in the courts of law. Adjudicators are often called upon to decide difficult questions as to admissibility of evidence which is tendered before them. Objections may be taken to the admission of evidence, either on the ground of incompetency of the witness or of the nature or materiality of the evidence. In the former case, the adjudicator is the absolute judge, and if he makes an error in receiving or rejecting any evidence, the award cannot usually be challenged or set aside. But an error as to the materiality of evidence on the part of the adjudicator may be attended with more serious consequences. The danger usually lies, not in receiving immaterial evidence, but in rejecting material evidence. If he takes the evidence which is not material, and therefore, ought to have been rejected, no harm will be done, if such evidence has not been taken into consideration.

An award cannot, in general, be impeached on the ground that the adjudicator has admitted inadmissible evidence, though where the irrelevant and extraneous evidence goes to the root of the matter and the adjudicator had taken it into consideration in arriving at his conclusion, the award will be quashable. But if the tribunal erroneously refuses to admit evidence, which is, in fact, material, he will not have heard everything which might have influenced his mind in coming to a decision upon the dispute. In such an event, the award will be liable to be quashed. Generally, an adjudicator should hear all the witnesses and examine all the documents tendered by the parties, though he may be of the opinion that sufficient evidence has already been adduced. A party will not be successful in getting the adjudicator's award quashed on the ground that he has rejected material evidence unless he has, in fact tendered the evidence to the adjudicator, and, if necessary, has stated its purport. If evidence is of a type which would not be admissible in a court of law, the tribunal must reject it. For instance, generally, all 'hearsay' evidence is inadmissible, ie, any written or verbal statement made by a person who is not going to be called as a witness at the adjudication. If either side wants to refer to a statement made by a certain person supporting his view of the case, he must, as a rule, call that person as witness. If he does not, then neither he nor any of his witnesses may introduce the statement in question as evidence of the truth of the fact stated.[93] In examining his own witnesses—'examination-in-chief', a party is not entitled to put 'leading questions'—ie questions so framed as to suggest the answer required or actually put that answer into the witness's mouth. But 'leading questions' are permissible in cross-examination. A party may sometimes wish to put further questions to one of his witnesses after cross-examination. Such 're-examination' must be confined to matters raised in cross-examination, fresh matter should not be introduced except with the tribunal's consent.

(ii) Documentary Evidence—Discovery, Production and Inspection of Documents

This clause invests the tribunal with the powers of civil court under s 30 and s 32 and O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the matter of 'compelling production of documents and material objects'. Section 30 deals with power of the court, inter alia, of discovery of documents and s 32 gives the court some penal rights to compel the compliance of the orders under s 30. Order 11 deals with the discovery and inspection of the documents. Rule 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 also, inter alia, gives the powers under O 11 of the tribunals in the matter of 'discovery and inspection of documents'. The combined effect of s 11(3)(b) and r 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 is that the tribunal's powers in the matter of production, discovery and inspection of documents are strictly governed by the provisions of O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An industrial adjudicator has jurisdiction to direct a party to produce any document that may be in possession of such party for the purpose of proper adjudication of any issue referred to it by the government or framed by it. However, in connection with the documentary evidence, the adjudicator has to observe a number of rules. For instance, it is desirable that he should allow evidence to be adduced in respect of all issues and not piecemeal. [94] In Veeraraghavan, on an application being made by the employer, the labour court issued summons to the electrical inspector for production of the register showing the employee as cinema operator and the electrical inspector did not attend the hearing and the application was closed but the employer again filed an application for summoning the electrical inspector on which the labour court refused to issue summons to the electrical inspector to produce the register. In a writ petition against the subsequent order of the labour court, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the mere fact that the earlier application was closed on the ground of non-appearance of the electrical inspector is no grounds for rejection of the subsequent application because the document summoned was a material document.[95] The adjudicator is only entitled to consider documents put in evidence. He ought not to allow himself to be influenced by documents which might have come into his possession but have not been put in as evidence. Where a party wishes to prove the contents of a document, the 'best' or 'primary' evidence is production of the document itself 'secondary' evidence in the form of a copy or verbal evidence as to the contents, is admissible only where there is some good reason for failure to produce the original, but where the object of the party is not to prove the contents of a document but only to establish the position created by it, independent evidence is admissible. Where parties have entered into a written contract, external evidence - verbal or written - is not admissible to add to and vary or contradict what is written. However, there are important exceptions to this general rule. The adjudicator should take a careful note of the evidence called or put in before him or of any legal points raised in the course of the hearing.

(a) Interrogatories

Rules 1 to 11 of O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure deal with interrogatories. A party to adjudication proceedings before an industrial tribunal cannot request it to deliver interrogatories to the other party in regard to points to be proved by the evidence of the other party, for 'a party to a suit may administer interrogatories on the material facts relied upon by the other party for his claim or defence as set out in the pleadings but not on the evidence by which a party's case may be proved'. Every party to the adjudicatory proceedings is entitled to see the nature of his opponent's case, so that he may know before-hand what case he has to meet at the hearing. But he is not entitled to know the facts which constitute exclusively the evidence of his opponent's case. Every adjudication contemplates two sets of facts, namely (1) facts which constitute a party's case, this must be pleaded with sufficient details, and (2) facts which constitute a party's case to be proved ie evidence which need not be pleaded. [1]

(b) Discovery, Production and Inspection of Documents

Rules 12 and 13 of O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure deal with the discovery of documents. Rule 14 deals with the production of the documents and rr 15 to 20 deal with the inspection of documents. The employers and employees must make available to the tribunal all the relevant documents including account books as they are likely to assist proper decision of a question in issue. Where, therefore, any of the parties to the dispute asks the other for the production of such documents, it should ordinarily be possible for the opposite party to comply with the request, subject however, to the protection of s 21 of the Industrial Disputes Act. When any such prayer is made, the tribunal has to use its judicial discretion in the matter. In the absence of any special circumstances, it would ordinarily be justified in asking one party to give to the other party, reasonable access to all relevant papers and documents.[2]The tribunal on examination of the confidential information can record its conclusions without referring to the figures and facts provided in the confidential documents, unless the employer gives up his privilege under s 21 of the Act[3] but a party can only be ordered to produce documents which are in its possession or in its power, which evidently refer to existing documents which though not actually in the immediate possession of the party, are readily available to it. A party cannot be directed to prepare abstracts or lists from the records in his possession. Neither s 11 of the Act nor r 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 specifically provides for the application of all the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure governing discovery, inspection and production of documents. Nevertheless, in considering the powers of industrial adjudicators to order inspection of documents, the deciding factor should be as to what are the powers of civil court to order inspection.[4]Similarly, where confidential correspondence of a party is sought to be discovered, such party can claim privilege under the provisions of the Evidence Act.[5]Section 34A of the Banking Companies Act and s 24 of the Payment of Bonus Act 1965, indicate that the tribunal dealing with a dispute regarding bonus between a banking company and its workmen has no power to direct the company to furnish particulars in respect of provisions made for doubtful and bad debts and other usual necessary provisions, because such a direction would be against the statutory provision and as such bad in law.[6] Once a privilege is claimed, it is not open to the tribunal to question the claim and assert the right to examine documents. There is no estoppel in claiming such privilege, and the fact that such a document has already been submitted, does not prevent a party from subsequently claiming the privilege.[7]

(c) Procedure to Order Discovery and Inspection

It is not an unlimited power or rather a power, the exercise of which is limited only by the discretion of the judge, that even s 30 of the Code of Civil Procedure, confers on a civil court. The power conferred by s 30 of the Code of Civil Procedure is specifically subjected to 'limitations and conditions as may be prescribed', ie the conditions and limitations prescribed, for instance, by relevant rules in O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An industrial adjudicator, therefore, must conform to the general principles that underlie the provisions in O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, governing the inspection of documents. Unless the condition prescribed by r 18(2) of O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure are satisfied, the power to order inspection of documents referred to in r 18(2) does not spring into existence. The court or a tribunal must apply its mind and satisfy itself that the limitations, under which jurisdiction or power is exercisable, are satisfied. If a tribunal fails to appreciate and apply its mind to the preliminary question it has to decide, it would amount to erroneous assumption of jurisdiction.[8] It follows that the tribunal must comply with the principles contained in the provisions of O 11, r 18, of the Code of Civil Procedure, before ordering production and inspection of documents. An order passed in contravention of the principles of the provisions in O 11, especially rr 11 and 18 will be quashable.[9] Under O 11, r 15, the right to seek inspection is confined to the documents referred to in the pleadings or affidavits of the parties against whom the right can be claimed. Rule 18 (1) of O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides for inspection of documents other than those referred to in r 15. The conditions to be satisfied, before the power under r 18(2) can be exercised, are:

(i) there should be an affidavit to show the documents, inspection of which is sought;

(ii) party who applies for the inspection of documents should establish that he is entitled to inspect them; and

(iii) the documents inspection of which is sought, must be in the possession of the party against whom the order for inspection is sought.

Overriding all these conditions is the further requirement that the court should be of the opinion that the document of which inspection is sought is necessary either for disposing of fairly the suit or for saving costs. Failure to confirm to the requirements of the affidavit will affect the power of the court to order inspection. The court, therefore, must insist upon filing of such affidavit. A party applying for inspection should establish that he is entitled to inspect the documents, full proof of which the court must insist upon, before ordering the inspection of the documents that fall within the scope of r 18(2). Whether the right to inspect claimed in a given case is to be held established or not must, of course, depend on the circumstances of that case and it is neither desirable nor even possible to prepare an exhaustive list of cases that would amount to an established right. The mischief of roving inspection should always be in the mind of the tribunal. Section 11 does not contemplate preparation of evidence by one party for the benefit of the other.[10] Until an affidavit of inspection of document has been directed to be filed, the court would have no jurisdiction to order inspection. This is not a procedure which can be omitted. It is not merely a shadow but a matter of substance that the party should be called upon and should be enabled to state on oath as to what documents are relevant and are in his possession or power, before being called upon to give inspection thereof. The industrial tribunals are creatures of statute and, therefore, they are bound to follow the procedure laid down by the statute. They cannot evolve their own procedure in the case of discovery and inspection of documents.[11]Though the principles regarding discovery and inspection of documents as observed in ordinary judicial trials are to be observed, 'in adjudicatory proceedings under the Act as well, in such proceedings 'too many technical rules ought not to be imported especially when such rules tend to defeat the purpose for which the Industrial Disputes Act was promulgated'. Normally, workmen have no access to the books and documents which remain in the possession of the employer. If on technical grounds, inspection is ruled out, no workman can prove his case. If the tribunal fails to order production and inspection of relevant evidence and bases its findings on insufficient evidence, its award will be unsustainable in law.[12]

In order to determine the relevance, there must be some material before the tribunal. In order that there should be material before the tribunal, the applicant must place it before the tribunal, and this he can do by setting out in the application, the necessary facts, the necessary contentions as to the nature of the document, the necessity for their production, what kind of reliance he wishes to place thereon and what is the case which he wishes to make out. The application for production of documents must contain all the necessary materials in order to enable the tribunal to apply its mind, to determine relevancy of the documents and ascertain whether inspection should be allowed or not and then pass a proper order. It is settled law that a party to any litigation cannot be permitted to embark on a fishing or roving inquiry in the hope that some material will come to hand on the basis of which he can set out his case. No doubt, in a proper case, after the necessary material is on record, the tribunal may order production of relevant documents which would be necessary for the purpose of the adjudication. But before that can be done, it would be the duty of the party asking for production of the documents to make out a case as to why it would be necessary for certain documents to be produced.[13] Documents of confidential or privileged nature, such as proceedings, books of the board of directors' meetings or income tax returns etc, cannot be demanded, by one party from the other. The aid of the tribunal cannot be invoked for a roving investigation or discovery of possible or potential causes of action.[14] Nor can a party call upon the other to furnish information to him to make out a case to be presented in the plaint. The question of discovery arises only after the claim statement has been filed. An order passed by a tribunal, without having the statement of claim before it and with a view to enabling workmen to prepare their statement of claim, would be bad in law, being not in consonance with the fundamental principle of law contained in O 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure.[15] The tribunal should pass appropriate orders allowing or refusing discovery as discovery does not only relate to the specific documents mentioned in the application, but has to be made, if ordered by the tribunal, by filing an appropriate affidavit under O 11, r 13 of the Code in the prescribed Form 5 in the Appendix to the Code. So far as inspection is concerned, it is for the party claiming inspection to serve an appropriate notice on the other to allow inspection and on the failure of that party to do the needful, to take appropriate proceedings, before the tribunal in accordance with law.[16]

(d) Proof of Documents

In the words of Mahajan J, the adjudication of a dispute has to be in accordance with evidence legally adduced.[17]By s 11(3), and r 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure have been made applicable to the authorities mentioned therein. Those authorities have been given the same powers as are vested in civil courts for the purposes specified. There is considerable judicial opinion which holds that to the extent to which the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure have been made applicable to the authorities in s 11, they are courts within the meaning of s 3 of the Indian Evidence Act and are therefore bound by its provisions.[18] Anyhow, it is now well settled that a party to an industrial dispute has to prove by satisfactory evidence, the particular claim he wishes to make.[19] But in Sindhu Resettlement Corpn, Bhargava J observed that if no objection is taken to the admissibility or about the genuineness of a document which has been filed but has not been proved by oral evidence, such document in certain circumstances may be relied upon by the tribunal because in proceedings before the industrial tribunal, strict proof of documents in accordance with the provisions of theEvidence Act is not required.[20] But this proposition seems to be confined to the facts of that case alone and cannot be said to be of uniform or universal application in industrial adjudication. In Bareilly Electricity Supply, Jaganmohan Reddy J observed:

> Even if technicalities of the Evidence Act are not strictly applicable except in so far as section 11 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 and the rules prescribed thereunder permit it, it is inconceivable that the tribunal can act on what is not evidence such as hearsay, nor can it justify the tribunal in passing its award on copies of documents when the originals which are in existence are not produced and proved by one of the methods either by affidavit or by witnesses who had executed them if they are alive and can be produced. Again if a party wants an inspection, it is incumbent on the tribunal to give inspection, in so far as that is relevant to the inquiry. The applicability of these principles is well-recognised and admits of no doubt.[21]

In other words, documents such as profit and loss account statements or balance sheets etc which are produced in the course of adjudication proceedings, must be proved like any other documents filed in a court of law,[22]though such documents may not be strictly admissible in evidence under the Evidence Act.[23] In Metro Goldwyn Mayer, the workmen relied upon a copy of the agreement in respect of wage scales said to have been entered into by their employer with the workmen at one of their branches. The employer, instead of producing the original agreement which was in its possession, attacked the accuracy of the wage scales mentioned in the copy produced before the labour court. The labour court accepted the copy of the agreement produced by the workmen as the basis of its award. In the writ petition against the award of the labour court, the High Court held that the award was not based on inadmissible or unproved evidence, as the employer did not do anything to prove the correct scales in force at the particular branch and it was open to the labour court to accept the evidence led in by the workmen.[24] If the signatures of a workman on a document is not disputed, it is not necessary to examine the person who signed it to prove the document.[25] It is well settled that where a party fails to produce a document required to be produced, it is open to the tribunal to draw an adverse inference against the party failing to produce the document. However, adverse inference can only be drawn where the documents in possession of a party is not produced before the tribunal. But such inference cannot be drawn if the document does not exist or is not in the possession of the party from whom it has been called.[26]

Profit and Loss Account and Balance Sheets

In Associated Cement Companies, for the purpose of working out the bonus formula, the Supreme Court stated as a general rule that the amount of 'gross profits' ascertained in the profit and loss account of the employer, is to be accepted without submitting such statement to a close scrutiny. Nevertheless, if it appears that entries have been made on the debit side deliberately and mala fid e to reduce the amount of 'gross profit', it would be open to the tribunal to examine the question and if it is satisfied that the impugned entries have been made mala fide, it may disallow them. Likewise, the tribunal may also exclude any items either on the credit or the debit side, if such items are wholly extraneous or entirely unrelated to the trading profits of the year. It was, however, pointed out, that it is only in glaring cases where the impugned item may be patently and obviously extraneous, that a plea for its exclusion should be entertained and the tribunal must resist the temptation of dissecting the balance sheet too minutely or of attempting to reconstruct it in any manner.[27] On the same day, the same Bench in Indian Hume Pipe, accepted the balance sheet of the company as good evidence to prove that certain amounts out of the returns were actually used as working capital. Since, these two cases did not talk of the requirement to prove the correctness of the items included in the profit and loss account statement or the balance sheet, it gave scope for the view that these documents could be relied upon for providing that the amounts of expenses stated therein were correct and were available for using as working capital and that it showed that they were in fact so used. But from the report of the case, it appears that, as a matter of fact, it was conceded that the reserves in fact were used as working capital. Presumably to meet the contention that the balance sheet had not been proved, Bhagwati J observed, 'moreover no objection was urged in this behalf, nor was any finding to the contrary recorded by the tribunal'.[28] The ratio of Indian Hume Pipe was explained in Khandesh Spg & Wvg Mills, in which Subba Rao J pointed out that the observations of Bhagwati J in that case were not intended to lay down the law that the balance sheet by itself was good evidence to prove as a fact the factual utilisation of reserves as working capital and the court would not have accepted the items in the balance sheet as proof of user if it was not satisfied that no objection was taken in that behalf In support of this view, it was stated that since the accounts of the company were prepared by the management and so also, the profit and loss account statements and balance sheets, there would be tendency on the part of the employers to deflate the figures of rehabilitation etc and the labour has no concern with it and when so much depends upon a particular item in the balance sheet, the principles of equity and justice demand that the industrial adjudicator should insist upon a clear proof of the same and also give a real and adequate opportunity to the labour to canvass the correctness of the particulars furnished by the employer.[29] Thus in this case, the court clearly envisaged the requirement of the proof of the items included by the employer in the balance sheet and the right of the labour to test the veracity of the evidence adduced by the employer to prove such items.

The question as regards the sufficiency of the balance sheet itself to prove the fact of utilisation of any reserves as working capital was also considered in Trichinopoly Mills, where the court held that the balance sheet does not by itself prove any such fact and that the law requires such an important fact as the utilisation of a portion of the reserves as working capital has to be proved by the employer by evidence given on affidavit or otherwise and after giving an opportunity to the workmen to contest the correctness of such evidence by cross-examination.[30] The necessity of proof of the correctness of the statements in the balance sheet was again precisely pointed out in Petlad Turkey, where it was observed that it could not be presumed that the statements made in a balance sheet are always correct and that the burden is on the party who asserts the statements to be correct, to prove the same by relevant and acceptable evidence.[31] In Metal Box, the court said that if an employer claims the deduction of any items, say, depreciation, the burden of proof, that depreciation claimed by him is the correct amount in accordance with the provisions of Income-tax Act, is on the employer and that burden the employer must discharge once his figures are challenged.[32]

In Peirce Leslie, the balance sheet of the company for the year in question allowed some amount as provisions for taxation liability and other amount as provisions for proposed dividend on deferred ordinary shares. No evidence was let in by the company to show that these amounts were used as working capital in the year in question. The company did not contend that whatever appeared on the assets side in the balance sheet over and above the 'paid-up' capital came out of the reserves, apparently on the ground that some of the items shown as 'current liabilities and provisions' in the balance sheet would have to be met during the year out of the portion of current assets which portion would accordingly not be available for use as working capital. If that was the case as regards the other items under 'current liabilities and provisions', the same must be the case as regards the current liability under 'liability for taxation other than income-tax' and under 'proposed dividend on deferred ordinary shares'. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the court held that these 'current liabilities' had also to be met out of the current assets during the year in question as the company failed to prove that the amounts were used as working capital.[33] In Cannanore Spg and Wvg Mills, the requirement of proving the statements in the balance sheet was highlighted by pointing out that before an analysis of the statement in the balance sheet is undertaken, it is necessary to establish that the statements in it are, in fact, correct and in the absence of any evidence to show that any particular entry in the balance sheet is true, it cannot be presumed that the statements is correct.[34] In Anil Starch, the requirement of proper opportunity being given to the labour, to test the correctness of the evidence given on affidavit on behalf of the management in regard to the user of the reserves as working capital was emphasised.[35] These requirements were taken as settled law in Bengal KM Union, in which the court held:

> It is now well-settled that the balance sheet cannot be taken as proof of a claim as to what portion of the reserves has actually been used as working capital and that utilisation of a portion of reserves as working capital has to be proved by the employer by evidence on affidavit or otherwise, after opportunity to the workmen to contest the correctness of such evidence by cross-examination.[36]

In UP Electric Supply, the witness, deposing on the expenses incurred in connection with fuel, gave detailed break-up of the expense in his examination-in-chief and repeated in his cross-examination. In the cross-examination no question was posed to him as to how the figure of the expense was arrived at. The court held that though the tribunal was not bound to accept a particular figure appearing in the audited balance sheet, when a witness had deposed about the break-up thereof and was subjected to cross-examination, his evidence should not be discarded. On this view of the matter, it was held that the tribunal had erred in not accepting the balance-sheet figure and testified by the witness.[37] In Bareilly Electricity Supply, the court observed:

> When a document is produced in a court or a tribunal the questions that naturally arise are: is it a genuine document, what are its contents and are the statements contained therein true. When the appellant produced the balance sheet and Profit and Loss Account of the company, it does not by its mere production amount to a proof of it or of the truth of the entries therein. If these entries are challenged, the appellant must prove each of such entries by producing the books and speaking from the entries made therein. If a letter or other document is produced to establish some fact which is relevant to the inquiry, the writer must be produced or his affidavit in respect thereof be filed and opportunity afforded to the opposite party who challenges this fact. This is both in accord with principles of natural justice as also according to the procedure under Order 19, Civil Procedure Code and the Evidence Act both of which incorporate these general principles. Even if all technicalities of the Evidence Act are not strictly applicable except insofar as section 11 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 and the rules prescribed therein permit it, it is inconceivable that the tribunal can act on what is not evidence such as hearsay, nor can it justify the tribunal in basing its award on copies of documents when the originals which are in existence are not produced and proved by one of the methods either by affidavit or by witnesses who have executed them, if they are alive and can be produced.[38]

Again if a party wants an inspection, it is incumbent on the tribunal to give inspection, insofar as that is relevant to the inquiry. The applicability of these principles is well recognised and admit of no doubt. But a rebuttable presumption in favour of the duly audited profit and loss account statements and the balance sheets of the companies has been enacted by s 23 of the Payment of Bonus Act.[39]

Auditor's Certificates

The presumption raised by s 23 of the Payment of Bonus Act 1965 in favour of the duly audited profit and loss account and the balance sheets of the companies, will not apply to the auditor's certificate. As the Act does not provide for any such presumption, the auditor's certificates, therefore, have to be proved before the tribunal by adducing proper and sufficient legal evidence. In Metal Box, the Supreme Court said the burden of proof that depreciation claimed by it was the correct amount in accordance with the Income Tax Act, was on the employer and that burden he must discharge, once the figures were challenged and there was no presumption in favour of auditor's report as is available in case of audited balance sheets and profit and loss account under s 23 of the Payment of Bonus Act. Shelat J stated the principle in the following words:

> Mere production of auditor's certificate, especially when it is not admitted by labour, not by the auditor but by the employees of the company who admitted not to have been concerned with its preparation or the calculations on which it was based, would not be conclusive. We do not say that in such a case the tribunal should insist upon proof of depreciation on each and every item of the assets. It should, however, insist on some reasonable proof of the correctness of the figure of depreciation claimed by the employer either by examining the auditors who calculated and certified it or by some other proper proof Depreciation in some cases would be of a large amount affecting materially the available surplus. Fairness, therefore, requires that an opportunity must be given to the employees to verify such figures by cross-examination of the employer or his witnesses who have calculated depreciation amount. The proper course for the tribunal in such a case was to insist upon the company adducing legal evidence in support of its claim instead of taking the figure of depreciation from the profit and loss account which was not worked out in accordance with the Income Tax Act but under section 205 of the Companies Act, and saying that the company had failed to prove that it was a mistaken figure.[40]

(iii) Commissions

This clause vests the tribunal with the powers of the civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure to issue commission for examination of witnesses. Order 26, rr 1 to 8 deal with the subject of commissions to examine the witnesses. The power to issue a commission also includes to re-issue the commission.[41]

(iv) 'Matters Prescribed'

The power with which the authorities mentioned in sub-s (3) have specifically been vested are enumerated in cll (a) to (c) of this sub-section. But with respect to other matters, powers have to be prescribed by the Central or the state government as the case may be.[42] With a view to enable the tribunal to function with a certain amount of agility, the legislature has not made its procedure hidebound. Only limited and specific provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure have been made applicable to the procedure of the tribunals in the investigation and adjudication of industrial disputes. However, with a view to overcome some unforeseen eventualities, the Central Government and the state governments have been empowered to further apply certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. Rule 24 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes the following further matters with respect to which the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to the investigation and adjudication of industrial disputes by the authorities mentioned in sub-s (3) will apply, namely:

(i) Discovery and inspection: this power has in fact been given by cl (b) of sub-s (3) as well.

(ii) Granting adjournments.[43]

(iii) Reception of evidence taken on affidavit.[44]

These are the powers under the Code of Civil Procedure which have been invested in the authorities by the Central Rules. The various state governments have made their own rules in this behalf applying certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure with respect to the procedure of the authorities mentioned in the sub-section. But in the absence of rules, other provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure are not applicable to the proceedings before these authorities,[45] though in certain cases the general principles of law which have been given legislative form by enacting them in the Code of Civil Procedure, would always apply to the proceedings before the tribunals; for instance the principles relating to pleadings, issues, evidence and hearing etc. The power to bring on record the legal representatives of the deceased workman in a pending industrial dispute is not one of the powers conferred or prescribed under s 11 (3) of the Act.[46]

(v) Tribunal - Not a Court

An industrial tribunal is not a 'court' within the meaning of s 195(1)(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, because the award given by the tribunal is not final and binding in nature. Even though sub-s (3) provides that for the purpose of s 193, the proceedings before the tribunal will be considered to be judicial, yet it does not provide that an industrial tribunal will be considered to be a court within the meaning of s 195(1)(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is, therefore, not necessary, for the tribunal to file a complaint for an offence under s 193 of the Indian Penal Code. The tribunal, therefore cannot take cognisance of a complaint under s 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for lodging a complaint.[47]

SUB-SECTION (4): POWERS OF CONCILIATION OFFICER TO ENFORCE ATTENDANCE AND INSPECT DOCUMENTS

Previously a conciliation officer was empowered only to call for and inspect any document which he has grounds for considering to be relevant to the industrial dispute under conciliation, or for other purposes specified in this sub-section. Now, by the Amending Act 46 of 1982,[48] a conciliation officer has been empowered to 'enforce the attendance of any person for the purpose of examination of such person' in addition to the power to inspect any document. For this limited purpose, he is vested with the same powers as are vested in a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. But the powers of the conciliation officers even after the amendment are not as wide as those of the authorities mentioned in sub-s (3). In Ganesan, the facts were that the special deputy commissioner of labour passed an order to the effect that the dismissal orders passed by the employer against the workmen after conducting enquiry shall be kept in abeyance and that a decision shall be taken only after discussions with him. Single judge of the Madras High Court quashed the said order of the deputy commissioner of labour and held that such an order was not sustainable in law and that there was no provision in the Standing Orders requiring the management to place his decision before the Special Deputy Commissioner of labour. The learned judge further held that when once it had been agreed before the conciliation officer that an inquiry would be conducted, the conciliation officer had no power to impose any restriction on the management from proceeding with the findings of such inquiry and imposing punishment depending upon the seriousness of the offence.[49]

SUB-SECTION (5): ASSESSORS

Sub-section (5) empowers the adjudicatory authorities referred to therein, to appoint assessors to advise them in the proceedings before them. It clearly vests discretion in these tribunals to appoint an assessor or assessors to advise them in such proceedings, which has been made clear beyond doubt by the use of the words 'may, if it so thinks fit'. But every case must depend on its own facts.[50] It is, therefore, open to an adjudicator to consult an expert on any technical questions arising in the case which presents special difficulty relating to engineering or accountancy etc. But the adjudicator who invokes expert assistance must not delegate his own functions or allow his advisor to decide the case. It is the decision of the adjudicator, and not that of the expert, for which the dispute has been referred to adjudication. The expert can only offer an opinion upon the points upon which he is consulted, it is the adjudicator's duty to apply the advice he has received, and to exercise his own judgment, making such use as he may choose of the expert's opinion in deciding the dispute. The function of the 'assessors' is to assist the tribunal, and to be able to perform their functions properly, they must have before them the entire evidence. Hence, unless they have an opportunity to hear and consider the entire evidence which is tendered in a case, they cannot give proper opinion in the matter.[51]

SUB-SECTION (6): PUBLIC SERVANTS

By virtue of this sub-section, all the authorities enumerated therein shall be deemed to be 'public servants' within the meaning of s 21 of the Indian Penal Code.

SUB-SECTION (7): COSTS OF ANY PROCEEDINGS—DISCRETION OF TRIBUNALS, ETC

On a plain reading of this sub-section, it is manifest that:

(i) the expression 'costs of any proceeding' means the costs of the entire proceeding as determined on its conclusion and not costs in a pending proceeding, nor costs to be incurred in future by a party; and

(ii) the expression 'costs incidental to any proceeding' similarly means costs of interlocutory applications, etc—such costs as have been determined therein, at the conclusion of the hearing.

Neither of the two expressions has any reference to costs payable in advance or to be incurred in future by a party. Naturally, such costs cannot refer to halting and travelling expenses to be incurred by a party while attending the court on his own behalf. The provisions of this sub-section are in terms similar to those of s 35 of the Code of Civil Procedure except for the concluding portion of the sub-section which relates to the recovery of costs as arrears of land revenue. The provisions analogous to those contained in sub-ss (2) and (3) of s 35 of the Code of Civil Procedure too do not find place in s 11(7) of the Act. There is no power in the tribunal to direct payment of costs of a party in advance by another party, irrespective of the final result of a proceeding, nor can the principles of natural justice be invoked in aid of an order which penalises one party to a dispute by making it pay for the costs of the other party in advance, irrespective of the result of the proceeding. In the words of SK Das J, such an order is neither natural nor has any element of justice in it.[52]Tribunals have been vested with the discretion to award costs. However, this discretion is subject to any rules made under the Act. The discretion again is to be exercised according to rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion; according to law and not humour; it to be not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular.[53] Orders for costs can only be made by tribunals on well-recognised principles and not on any abstract ideas as to what, irrespective of such principles, should be considered desirable in a particular case.[54] A tribunal has no power to pass orders which are not consistent with the recognised principles governing such matters, under s 11 (7) of the Act, which specifically deals with the subject.[55]

On the same principle, the tribunal would have no power under s 11 (7) to direct an employer to treat workmen as on duty when they come to attend a hearing before it, which tantamounts to, in effect, directing the management to pay in advance the costs of a proceeding.[56] In Bank of India, the facts were in an application by the union of employees, the tribunal passed an order directing the management to treat the appearance of office-bearers of the union and the workmen concerned in pending reference as on 'duty leave'. A single judge of the Bombay High Court quashed the order of the tribunal, and held that there was no law to support such an order and that even otherwise, granting such an application could have very serious consequences, firstly, because such an order would be without any legal authority and, secondly, because it could give rise to indiscipline and financial implications on the employer.[57] Ordinarily, in industrial adjudication, costs do not follow the event. It is unwise to give costs in labour disputes, unless the conduct of either party has called for it. But where the conduct of party is reprehensible, such as harassing the opposite party or keeping the opposite party out of their legitimate rights, tribunals would be justified in awarding costs.[58] The provisions of s 11(7) are so worded that the authority concerned shall have the power to determine by whom and to what extent and subject to what conditions, if any, the costs awarded shall be payable. The power of awarding costs is not limited to parties to the disputes, like s 35A of the Code of Civil Procedure. Though discretion is conferred on the tribunal to make even a stranger to a proceeding to pay costs, in appropriate cases, such discretion has to be exercised in accordance with well-recognised principles by a court in making an order for costs against or in favour of a person not a party to a proceeding before it. An order of a tribunal in disregard of such well-recognised principles in awarding costs against or in favour of a person not a party to a proceeding before it, shall be wrong exercise of its discretion and as such would be quashable.[59]

SUB-SECTION (8): ADJUDICATORS - CIVIL COURTS FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES

By virtue of this sub-section, the authorities enumerated therein shall be deemed to be a civil court for the purpose of s s 345, 346 and 348 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

---

* Chapter IV is continued in Volume II of this book, which begins with Section 11A.

1 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for sub-s (1) (wef 10-3-1957).

2 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for "Court or Tribunal" (wef 10-3-1957).

3 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for "and Tribunal" (wef 10-3-1957).

4 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for "or Tribunal" (wef 10-3-1957).

5 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 9, for "may call for" (wef 21-8-1984).

6 Ins by Act 36 of 1956, s 9 (wef 10-3-1957).

7 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 9, for "in respect of compelling the production of documents" (wef 21-8-1984).

8 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for sub-ss (5), (6) and (7) (wef 10-3-1957).

9 Ins by Act 48 of 1950, s 34 and Sch.

10 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 9, for "Tribunal" (wef 10-3-1957).

11 Subs by Act 46 of 1982, s 9, for " Sections 480, 482 and 484 of the CrPC, 1898 (5 of 1898)" (wef 21-8-1984).

12 Ins by Act 24 of 2010, s 7 (wef 15-9-2010 vide S.O. 2278 (E), dated 15-9-2010).

13 Grindlays Bank Ltd v CGIT (1978) 2 LLJ 371 (Cal), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

14 Shambu Nath & Sons Ltd v Addl IT (1957) 2 LLJ 287 (Punj), per Bishan Narayan J.

15 Mgmt of Dhenkanal Municipality v IT (1974) 1 LLJ 44, 49 (Ori) (DB), per Misra CJ.

16 Metal Fabricators (India) v BD Gupta 1975 Lab IC 1707, 1710 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

17 ITC Ltd v PO, LC 1985 Lab IC 637, 646 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

18 Metal Fabricators (India) v BD Gupta 1975 Lab IC 1707, 1710 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

19 Harchura Tea Estate v Labour Appellate Tribunal (1961) 1 LLJ 174, 177 (Cal), per Mukharji J.

20 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4], 930 (SC), per Mahajan J.

21 Cooper v Wilson [1937] 2 KB 309, per Grear LJ, cited with approval in ibid, p 930, per Mahajan J.

22 Dalmia Dadri Cement Ltd v Workmen 1970 Lab IC 350 [LNIND 1960 SC 82] (P&H), per Narula J.

23 Tin Printers Pvt Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 677 [LNIND 1966 PNH 89], 680-81 (P&H), per SK Kapur J.

24 Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd (1979) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 206-08 (SC), per Desai J.

25 GSeshagiri Rao v PO, LC 1979 Lab IC 485, 486 (AP) (DB), per Chowdary J.

26 Rameshwar Prasad v State of Bihar (1973) 2 LLJ 15 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

27 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Mukherjea J.

28 Bengal Box Mfg Co v Second IT (1963) 2 LLJ 475 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

29 JK Iron & Steel Co Ltd v I&S Mazdoor Union (1956) 1 LLJ 227 [LNIND 1955 SC 119], 231 (SC) : AIR 1956 SC 231 [LNIND 1955 SC 119]: [1955] 2 SCR 1315 [LNIND 1955 SC 119], per Bose J.

30 Hindustan Development Corpn Ltd v LC (1993) 2 LLJ 356 [LNIND 1992 CAL 324]-57 (Cal), per PK Mukherjee J.

31 Mgmt of Pheros & Co Pvt Ltd v LC 1971 Lab IC 600, 603 (Assam & Nagaland) (DB), per Goswami CJ.

32 Engineering Mazdoor Sabha v DM Anry (1969) 2 LLJ 296, 299 (Bom) (DB), per Madon J.

33 Hochtief Gammon v IT (1964) 2 LLJ 460 [LNIND 1964 SC 118], 462-66 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

34 United Bank of India v PO, CGIT-cum-LC 1988 Lab IC 108 (Del), per Kirpal J.

35 Shankar Chakravorti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1205 (SC), per Desai J.

36 Mgmt of Beverage & Food Products Pvt Ltd v PO, IT 1980 Lab IC 894, 895 (Gau), per Lahiri J.

37 Shankar Chakravorti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1204-05 (SC), per Desai J.

38 Raymond Woollen Mills Ltd v CS Sonawane 1993 Lab IC 1494, 1496 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

39 Bombay Mothers and Children's Society v General Labour Union 1991 Lab IC 1653, 1656 (Bom), per Daud J.

40 Tin Printers Pvt Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 677 [LNIND 1966 PNH 89], 680-81 (Punj), per Kapur J.

41 Shankar Chakravorti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1205 (SC), per Desai J.

42 Lachman Das v Indian Express Newspapers (B) Pvt Ltd [1977] IC 823, 825 (Del) (DB), per Deshpande J.

43 RG Makwana v Gujarat SRTC (1987) 1 LLJ 172, 174 (Guj) (DB), per Gokulakrishnan CJ.

44 Jai Jai RM Lal v NBM Supply AIR 1969 (SC) 1267 [LNIND 1969 SC 129], 1269-70 : (1969) 1 SCC 869 [LNIND 1969 SC 129] : [1970] 1 SCR 22 [LNIND 1969 SC 129], per Shah J.

45 Mgmt of Borpukhurie Tea Estate v IT (1978) 1 LLJ 558 [LNIND 1978 SC 85], 562 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

46 Patna Electric Supply Co Ltd v Bali Rai (1958) 1 LLJ 257 [LNIND 1957 SC 118], 259 (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 204 [LNIND 1957 SC 118]: [1958] 1 SCR 871 [LNIND 1957 SC 118], per Bhagwati J.

47 Royal Nepal Airlines CE Union v State of WB 1977 Lab IC (NOC) 83, (Cal), per DK Sen J.

48 Lipton India Ltd v IT (1992) 2 LLJ 427 [LNIND 1991 DEL 315]-28 (Del) (DB) : 45 (1991) DLT 452 : [1991 (63) FLR 347, per Wad J.

49 Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co (1979) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 207 (SC) : AIR 1979 SC 1652 [LNIND 1979 SC 276]: (1979) 3 SCC 371 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], per Desai J.

50 Workmen of Straw Board Mfg Co Ltd v Mgmt (1974) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], 510 (SC), per Goswami J.

51 Workmen of Hindustan Lever Ltd v Mgmt 1984 Lab IC 276 [LNIND 1984 SC 6], 289 (SC), per Desai J.

52 Mgmt of Chopra Motors Pvt Ltd v PN Thukral 1973 Lab IC 1025 -28 (P&H), per Suri J.

53 Kaleswarar Mills Ltd v Sakthivelu 12 FJR 279 (Mad) (DB).

54 Dalmia Dadri Cement Ltd v Workmen [1970] IC 350 (P&H), per Narula J.

55 Cooper Engineering Ltd v PP Mundhe (1975) 2 LLJ 379 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], 385-86 (SC), per Goswami J.

56 T Chowdappa v PO, LC 1978 Lab IC 1452 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

57 Prabhakar Shamrao Marathe v Maharashtra State Electricity Board 1975 Lab IC 697, 702 (Bom) (DB), per Desai J.

58 'Presumption and Burden' [1945]; 1961 LQR 397.

59 Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277, 284, per Delvin J.

60 Cowen and Carter, Essays on the Law of Evidence, 1956, p 242.

61 Pick Up v Tames English Co, 3 QBD 594, 600.

62 Shankar Chakravarty v Brittania Biscuit Co Ltd (1979) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 207 (SC), : AIR 1979 SC 1652 [LNIND 1979 SC 276]: (1979) 3 SCC 371 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], per Desai J.

63 British India Corpn Ltd v PO, IT 1989 Lab IC 716, 719 (All), per RR Misra J.

64 Damodar Valley Corpn v Workmen (1973) 2 LLJ 136 [LNIND 1973 SC 134] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 2292 [LNIND 1973 SC 134]: 1973 Lab IC 1035 [LNIND 1973 SC 134], per Vaidialingam J.

65 Ramendra Narayan Deb v Eighth IT 1975 Lab IC 94, 98 (Cal) (DB), per SK Datta J.

66 ECP Rathinaswami Nadar v LC (1964) 2 LLJ 86 [LNIND 1963 MAD 280] (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

67 Kodaikanal Motor Union v A Nallathambi (1969) 2 LLJ 141 [LNIND 1968 MAD 125], 144 (Mad) : AIR 1969 Mad 374 [LNIND 1968 MAD 125]: 1969 (18) FLR 151, per Ramakrishnan J.

68 Dominent Off-set (P) Ltd v IT 1998 (1) LLN 659 (P&H), per Malte, J.

69 Delta Engineering Co (P) Ltd v IT 1998 (2) LLN 493 (All), per Jain J.

70 Mackinnon Makenzie & Co Ltd v WN Pereira 1999 (3) LLN 521 (Bom), per Pandya J.

71 Mitra AB v PO, III IT [1999 II LLJ 1243(Cal)], per Samaresh Banerjee J.

72 Northcote Nursing Home (P) Ltd v (Dr) ZH Rahilla 2001 (3) LLN 550 (Bom), per Kochar J.

73 Gurbachan Singh v Jagyasu Re-Rolling Mills 2001 (4) LLN 1157 (P&H), per Sudhalkar J.

74 Range Forest Officer v ST Hadimani 2002 (2) LLN 391 (SC).

75 Mgmt of Hindustan Motors Ltd v Lakshmaiah 2002 (2) LLN 72 S (Mad) (DB), per Kalifulla J.

76 Essen Deinki v Rajiv Kumar 2002 (4) LLN 1176 (SC), per Banerjee J.

77 KV Kumaran v LC 1982 Lab IC 1241, 1243 (Ker), per Sukumaran J.

78 Har Prasad Engg Workshop v State of Uttar Pradesh (1964) 1 LLJ 607 (All), per GC Mathur J.

79 Dawood Khan v LC (1969) 2 LLJ 611 (AP), per Chinnappa Reddi J.

80 FACT Employees' Assn, Cochin v FACT Ltd (1977) 1 LLJ 182 [LNIND 1996 MAD 736], 185 (Ker), per Thommen J.

81 Karnataka SRTC v S Veerabhadrappa 1988 Lab IC 896 -97 (Kant), per Chandrakantharaj Urs J.

82 Uttar Pradesh RTC v State of UP 1990 Lab IC 1444, 1446 (All), per RA Sharma J.

83 Jagran Prakashan Pvt Ltd, Kanpur v IT 1992 Lab IC 513, 516 (All), per Trivedi J.

84 FACT Employees' Assn, Cochin v FACT Ltd (1977) 1 LLJ 182 [LNIND 1996 MAD 736], 185 (Ker), per Thommen J.

85 Tamil Nadu Housing Board v II Addl LC (1997) 1 LLJ 923 [LNIND 1996 MAD 736]-24 (Mad) (DB), per Swami J.

86 KV Kumaran v LC 1982 Lab IC 1241, 1243 (Ker), per Sukumaran J.

87 Sr Divl Mechanical Engineer, Northern Rly, v PO, CGLT 1992 Lab IC 1586, 1588 (All), per Sahay J.

88 Grindlays Bank Ltd v CGIT 1981 Lab IC 155 [LNIND 1980 SC 484], 158 (SC) per AP Sen J.

89 ND Patel & Co v MK Parmar 1984 Lab IC 1245 [LNIND 1983 GUJ 243] (Guj) (DB), per Ravani J.

90 Depot Mgr, APSRTC v Govt of AP (1991) 1 LLJ 235, 237 (AP) : 1990 (2) APLJ 360, per Radha Krishna Rao J.

91 Eagle Wood Agencies Pvt Ltd v State of WB (1991) 1 LLJ 85 (Cal) : 1990 (60) FLR 397, per Kalyanmoy Ganguli J.

92 Re Jitendra Nath Banerjee (1966) 1 LLJ 220, 223 (Cal), per Banerjee J.

93 Grindlays Bank Ltd v CGIT 1981 Lab IC 155 [LNIND 1980 SC 484], 157-58 (SC), per AP Sen J.

94 Satnam Verma v Union of India 1985 Lab IC 738, 740 (SC), per Desai J.

95 CJThomas v LC 1991 Lab IC 2481, 2485 (Ker), per KA Nayar J.

96 Nav Bharat & MPC Group of Newspapers v KS Shrivastava (1990) 1 LLJ 339, 398 (MP), per TN Singh J.

1 State of Rajasthan v Bhanwar Lal 1982 Lab IC 75, 78 (Raj), per Lodha J.

2 Maharashtra General Kamgar Union v Calico Chemicals 1983 Lab IC 1456, 1458 (Bom) per Dharmadhikari J.

3 Vivek Salvi v Second IT 1981 Lab IC (NOC) 176 (Cal), per GN Ray J.

4 Indian Metals & FAE Union v State of Orissa (1992) 1 LLJ 581 -82 (Ori) (DB).

5 CMD, Tamil Nadu Minerals Ltd v PO, LC 2000 (3) LLN 1025 (Mad), per Sathasivam J.

6 Virendra Bhandari v Rajasthan SRTC 2002 (3) LLN 758 (SC).

7 R Sarojini v B Laxmana Rao (1969) 1 LLJ 9 (AP), per Obul Reddi J.

8 SK Burman (Dr) Dabur Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 836 [LNIND 1967 MAD 199] (SC), per Ghargava J.

9 Pradip Lamp Works v Pradip Lamp Workers Karamchari Sangh (1971) 1 LLJ 538, per Dim J.

10 Re Enoch and Zaretz Ky Book & Co [1910] 1 KB 327.

11 GC Bezbarua v State of Assam AIR 1954 Ass 161 (DB), per Sarjoo Prasad CJ.

12 Bordubi Tea Estate v Workmen (1954) 2 LLJ 46 (LAT).

13 Pradip Lamp Works v Prdip Lamp Workers, Karmachari Sangh CA No 482 of 1967, (SC), per Dua J.

14 Elite Engineering and General Works v LC 1969 Lab IC 58, 60-61 (P&H)), per Pandit J.

15 Technological Institute of Textiles v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 654 [LNIND 1972 SC 141] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1933 [LNIND 1972 SC 141]: (1972) 4 SCC 26 [LNIND 1972 SC 141], per Vaidialingam J.

16 Hindustan Aluminium Corpn Ltd v Murari Singh 1978 Lab IC (NOC) 96 (All) (DB).

17 Rallis India Ltd v State of West Bengal (1983) 2 LLJ 293, 297 (Cal) (DB), per Amitabha Dutta J.

18 SRamaiah Mudaliar Bros v PO, IT (1992) 1 LLJ 9, 13 (Mad) (DB), per Srinivasan J.

19 Electro-Mechanical Industries Ltd v IT (1950) 1 LLJ 1133 (Mad) (DB), per Rajarnannar CJ.

20 Raghu Singh v Burrakur Coal Co Ltd (1967) 1 LLJ 483; 489 (Cal) (DB), per Bose CJ.

21 Mgmt of WIMCO Ltd v IT (1958) 2 LLJ 315 [LNIND 1958 MAD 23], 320 (Mad) (DB) : AIR 1958 Mad 398 [LNIND 1958 MAD 23]: (1958) ILR Mad 672, per Rajagopalan J.

22 Samnuggur Jute Factory Co Ltd v Workmen 1982 Lab IC 1354 -55 (Cal) (DB), per Banerjee J.

23 Guest, Keen, Williams Pvt Ltd v PJ Sterling (1959) 2 LLJ 405 [LNIND 1959 SC 127] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1279 [LNIND 1959 SC 127]: [1960] 1 SCR 348 [LNIND 1959 SC 127], per Gajendragadkar J.

24 Heavy Engineering Corpn Ltd v LC 1990 Lab IC 1057, 1061 (Pat) per SB Sinha J. .

25 (1891) ILR 19 IA 203.

26 Bennett Coleman & Co Pvt Ltd v PP Das Gupta (1969) 2 LLJ 554 [LNIND 1969 SC 150], 562-63 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 426 [LNIND 1969 SC 150]: (1969) 2 SCC 1 [LNIND 1969 SC 150] : 1970 Lab IC 512 [LNIND 1969 SC 150], per Shelat J.

27 Namburnadi Tea Co Ltd v Workmen 1968 Lab IC 1386 (A&N) (DB), per Goswami J.

28 Mgmt of Natarajan Engg Works v GS Naicker 1970 Lab IC 334 (Mad) (DB), per Anantanarayanan CJ.

29 Cf, Union of India v TR Varma (1958) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1957 SC 91], 264 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 882 [LNIND 1957 SC 91]: (1958) I MLJ 67(SC) : [1958] 1 SCR 499, per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

30 Karnataka State Road Transport Corpn v N Nagendrappa (1992) 2 LLJ 168, 172 (Kant), per Shyamsundar J.

31 Raghu Singh v Burrakur Coal Co Ltd (1967) 1 LLJ 483, 490 (Cal) (DB), per Bose CJ.

32 Bareilly Electricity Supply Co Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1971 SC 383], 417 (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

33 Metro Goldwyn Mayeor (India) Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 287, 294 (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

34 Mahaboob Shahi Kulbarga Mills Co Ltd v K Vittal Kamath (1959) 2 LLJ 196 (Mys) (DB) : AIR 1959 Kant 180 [LNIND 1958 KANT 94]: ILR 1958 Kar 914.

35 John Lee v Chief Commr, Delhi (1967) 2 LLJ 673 (Punj), per Kapur J.

36 Ramakant Rajmangal Yadav v Ramnilan Vijay 1988 Lab IC 296 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

37 Bhagwan Das Chopra v United Bank of India 1988 Lab IC 366 [LNIND 1987 SC 771], 370 (SC), per Venkataramiah J.

38 Nalgonda Coop Mktg Society Ltd v LC, (1994) 2 LLJ 716, 728 (AP) (VB) : 1993 (2) ALT 661 : 1993 (2) An WR 214 [LNIND 1993 AP 130] : 1993 (2) APLJ 336, per A Lakshmana Rao J.

39 Food Corpn of India Workers Union v FCI 1996 Lab IC 2047, 2052-53 (SC), per Paripoornan J.

40 Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1205 (SC), per Desai J.

41 National Insurance Co Ltd v Workmen CA 693 and 841 of 1966 (SC), per Shelat J.

42 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 458 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 719 [LNIND 1963 SC 138]: [1964] 3 SCR 506 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], per Gajendragadkar J.

43 Santak Singh v Ninth IT 1984 Lab IC 817, 821 (Cal), per Amitabha Dutta J.

44 MJ Mudaliar Bus Service v LC (1960) 1 LIJ 761(AP), per Seshachalapathi J.

45 Sheo Sampat Lal v State of UP 1983 Lab IC 324, 328 (All), per TS Misra J.

46 Shankar Chakravarti v Britiannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1205 (SC), per Desai J.

47 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Workmen 1977 Lab IC 1190, 1190 (SC), per Goswami J.

48 National Buildings Construction Corpn Ltd v MK Jain 1981 Lab IC 62, 68 (Del), per Anand J.

49 Oriental Containers Ltd v Engg Workers Assn (1996) 2 LLJ 454, 472 (Bom) (DB) : 1996 (3) Bom CR 488 [LNIND 1996 BOM 158], per Majithia J.

50 Chennai ACW Union v PO, CGIT 2002 (1) LLN 353 (Mad), per Kalifulla J.

51 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Mukherjea J.

52 Western India Match Co Ltd v IT (1962) 1 LLJ 629 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

53 Nellikkai Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 751, 757 (Ker), per Vaidialingam J.

54 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 458 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

55 India Gen Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v B Chakraborty (1959) 2 LLJ 242 [LNIND 1959 SC 68] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

56 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 458 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

57 Nellikkai Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 751, 757 (Ker), per CA Vaidialingam J.

58 Mgmt of Singareni Collieries Ltd v Workmen 2002 (1) LLN 653 (SC).

59 Tata Iron and Steel Company Ltd v DR Singh (1965) II LLJ 122(SC), : [1995 (70) FLR 184] per Gajendragadkar CJI.

60 Workmen of Strawboard Mfg Co Ltd v Mgmt (1974) I LLJ 499 (510) (SC) : AIR 1974 SC 1132 [LNIND 1974 SC 114]: [1974] (28) FLR 357 : 1974 Lab IC 730 [LNIND 1974 SC 114] : (1974) 4 SCC 681 [LNIND 1974 SC 114], per Goswami J.

61 Workmen v Mgmt of Hindustan Lever Ltd (1984) Lab IC 276 [LNIND 1984 SC 6] (289) (SC), per Desai J.

62 Mgmt of Chopra Motors (Pvt) Ltd v PN Thukral (1973) Lab IC 1025 (P&H), per Suri J.

63 Cooper Engineering Limited v PP Mundhe (1975) II LLJ 379 (385) (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1900 [LNIND 1975 SC 284]: [1975] (31) FLR 188 : 1975 Lab IC 1441 [LNIND 1975 SC 284] : (1975) 2 SCC 661 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], per Goswami J.

64 Shankar Chakravarty v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd AIR 1979 SC 1652 [LNIND 1979 SC 276]: 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276] : (1979) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1979 SC 276] : (1980) 2 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1979 SC 276] : (1979) 3 SCC 371 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], per Desai J.

65 Shambhu Nath Goyal v Bank of Baroda (1983) II LLJ 415 (422-3) (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 289 [LNIND 1983 SC 267]: 1983 (2) SCALE 931 [LNIND 1983 SC 267] : (1983) 4 SCC 491 [LNIND 1983 SC 267]per Varadarajan J.

66 KSRTC v Lakshmidevamma (2001) II LLJ 199 (203-4) (SC) : AIR 2001 SC 2090 [LNIND 2001 SC 1128]: (2001) 5 SCC 433, per Santosh Hegde J.

67 Divyash Pandit v Mgmt, NCCBM AIR 2006 SC 92 [LNIND 2005 MP 578]: (2005) 2 SCC 684 [LNIND 2005 SC 45] : 2005 (3) SLT 293 : (2005) 2 LLJ 151 [LNIND 2005 SC 45].

68 DP Maheshwari v Delhi Administration (1983) Lab IC 1629 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

69 Senapathy Whitelay Ltd v Puttaswamy (2001) 1 LLN 268 (270) (Kant) (DB), per Sethi CJ.

70 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 426-7.

71 Hussan M Mhasvadkar v BISLB, (2001) 4 LLN 766 (SC), per Doraiswamy Raju J.

72 EM Rao, Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2015, 2nd ed, pp 420-8.

73 Satyadev Chemicals (P) Ltd v DGGL Association CA No 1572 of 1999 (Guj) (DB).

74 Gujarat Kamdar Panchayat v Maize Products 2002 (4) LLN 985 (1007) (Guj), per Tripathi J.

75 Mgmt of Express Newspapers (P) Ltd v Workmen AIR 1963 SC 569 [LNIND 1962 SC 253].

76 Grindlays Bank Ltd v CGIT 1981 Lab IC 155 [LNIND 1980 SC 484], 158 (SC), per AP Sen J.

77 Silk Cloth Producers' Assn v State of Madras (1954) 2 LLJ 410 (Mad) per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

78 Kammavar Achukudam Ltd v IT (1959) 1 LLJ 395 [LNIND 1958 MAD 140] (Mad), per Balakrishna Iyer J.

79 Tata Consulting Engineers v Workmen 1981 Lab IC 594 [LNIND 1980 SC 453] (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 1088 [LNIND 1980 SC 453]: [1981] (42) FLR 1 : (1981) 2 LLJ 147 [LNIND 1980 SC 453] SC : (1981) 1 LLJ 332 [LNIND 1980 SC 453] SC : [1981] 2 SCR 166 [LNIND 1980 SC 453], per O Chinnappa Reddy J.

80 Grindlays Bank Ltd v Central Government Industrial Tribunal 1981 Lab IC 155 [LNIND 1980 SC 484] (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 606 [LNIND 1980 SC 484]: 1981 (29) BLJR 104 : (1981) 1 LLJ 327 [LNIND 1980 SC 484] SC : [1981] 2 SCR 341 [LNIND 1980 SC 484], per AP Sen J.

81 Lipton Ltd v Employees (1959) 1 LLJ 431 [LNIND 1959 SC 14] (SC), per SK Das J.

82 Tulsipur Sugar Co Ltd v State of Uttar Pradesh (1969) 2 LLJ 662 [LNIND 1969 SC 132], 669 (SC), per Shelat J.

83 Chanchal Singh v Labour Court 1983 Lab IC 823 (Del) (DB), per Dalip Kapur J.

84 Subrata Guha Sarkar v Second LC (1996) 2 LLJ 116 [LNIND 1995 CAL 303], 120 (Cal) : 100 CWN 182, per Bhattacharjee J.

85 Warring Co-op Agriculture Services Society Ltd v State of Punjab 1987 Lab IC 359, 363-64 (P&H) (DB), per SS Kang J.

86 Mgmt of Birla CSW Mills Ltd v KME Union 2002 (1) LLN 506 (Del) (DB), per Jain J.

87 Rule 23 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957.

88 State of Bihar v Kripa Shankar Jaiswal (1961) 1 LLJ 334 [LNIND 1960 SC 233] (SC), per Kapur J.

89 Paritosh Kumar Pal v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 1254, 1257 (Pat) (FB), per Sandhawalia CJ.

90 Karam Chand Thapar & Bros Pvt Ltd v Workmen of North Chirimiri Colliery (1968) 2 LLJ 261 (MP), per Bhave J.

91 EIP Works Ltd v Addl IT-cum, Addl LC 2001 (3) LLN 151 (AP), per VVS Rao J.

92 Ganesh Rajan Servai v Bennett Coleman & Co Ltd 1989 Lab IC 534, 546 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

93 With respect to hearsay evidence, s 60 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.

94 Employees of Hindustan Steel Ltd v Hindustan Steel Ltd 1978 Lab IC 799, 801 (Cal) (DB), per MM Dutt J.

95 V Veeraraghavan v Labour Court (1992) 2 LLJ 137, 139 (Mad), per KM Natarajan J.

1 Workmen of Otis Elevator (I) Ltd v Fourth Industrial Tribunal (1963) 2 LLJ 147 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

2 Workmen of JS Companies v Joint Steamer Companies (1963) 2 LLJ 349 [LNIND 1963 SC 135], 354 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

3 Garment Cleaning Works v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 513 [LNIND 1961 SC 147] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

4 Shama Magazine v State of Delhi (1958) 2 LLJ 241 (Punj), per Falshaw J.

5 Reserve Bank of India v CGIT (1959) 1 LLJ 539 (Punj) (DB).

6 Punjab Co-operative Bank Ltd v Workmen 1968 Lab IC 1437 (P&H), per Sharma J.

7 Reserve Bank of India v CGIT (1959) 1 LLJ 539 (Punj) (DB).

8 Mettur Chem & Indl Corpn Ltd v Workers (1955) 1 LLJ 27, 30 (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

9 Kannan Devon Hills Produce Co Ltd v Staff (1959) 1 LLJ 608 (Ker), per TK Joseph J.

10 Mettur Chem & Indl Corpn Ltd v Workmen (1955) 1 LLJ 27 (Mad), per Rajagopalan J.

11 Burn & Co Ltd v Jitendra Nath Maitra AIR 1956 Cal 592 [LNIND 1956 CAL 107]-93, per Sinha J.

12 BN Elias & Co Pvt Ltd v Fifth IT, West Bengal (1961) 2 LLJ 14 [LNIND 1960 CAL 136] (Cal), per DN Sinha J.

13 Twentieth Century Fox Corpn (India) Pvt Ltd v FH Lala (1974) 2 LLJ 156, 160-61 (Bom), per Mukhi J.

14 All India Bank Employees' Assn v NIT (1961) 2 LLJ 85 (SC), per Rajagopala Ayyangar J.

15 Associated Cement Co Ltd, Porbandar v NL Vyas (1955) 2 LLJ 525 (Sau), per SJ Chhatpar J.

16 Dalmia Dadri Cement Ltd v Workmen 1970 Lab IC 350 [LNIND 1960 SC 82] (P&H), per Narula J.

17 Bharat Bank Ltd v Employees of Bharat Bank Ltd (1950) 1 LLJ 921 [LNIND 1950 SC 4] (SC), per Mahajan J.

18 Burrakur Coal Co Ltd v LAT (1958) 2 LLJ 580 [LNIND 1957 CAL 156] (Cal), per Sinha J.

19 Trichonopaly Mills v National Cotton Textile Mills Union (1960) 2 LLJ 46, 47 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

20 Sindhu Resettlement Corpn Ltd v Industrial Tribunal of Gujarat (1968) 1 LLJ 834 [LNIND 1967 SC 268] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 529 [LNIND 1967 SC 267], per Bhargava J.

21 Bareilly Electricity Supply Co Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1971 SC 383] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 330 [LNIND 1971 SC 383]: 1972 Lab IC 188 : (1971) 2 SCC 617 [LNIND 1971 SC 383], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

22 Petlad Turkey Red Dye Works Co Ltd v D& C Workers Union (1960) 1 LLJ 548 [LNIND 1960 SC 22] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

23 Leonard Biermam Workers' Union v Second IT (1962) 1 LLJ 68 [LNIND 1961 CAL 115] (Cal), per Banerjee J.

24 Metro Goldwyn Mayer (India) Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 287 (Mad), per Srinivasan J.

25 North Bihar Sugar Mills Ltd v State of Bihar 1980 Lab IC 669, 673 (Pat) (DB), per Jha J.

26 State of Bihar v PO, IT 1977 Lab IC 803, 809 (Pat) (DB)

27 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 644 [LNIND 1959 SC 94], 663 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 967 [LNIND 1959 SC 94]: [1959] 1 SCR 925 [LNIND 1959 SC 94], per Gajendragadkar J.

28 Indian Hume Pipe Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 357 [LNIND 1959 SC 89], 362 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1081 [LNIND 1959 SC 89]: [1959] Supp (2) SCR 948, per Bhagwati J.

29 Khandesh Spg & Wvg Mills Co Ltd v RG Kamgar Sangh (1960) 1 LLJ 541 [LNIND 1960 SC 1] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 571 [LNIND 1960 SC 1]: SC, [1960] 2 SCR 841 [LNIND 1960 SC 1], per Subba Rao J.

30 Mgmt of Trichinopoly Mills Ltd v NCTM Workers' Union AIR 1960 SC 1003 [LNIND 1960 SC 6], per Gajendragadkar J.

31 Petlad TRDW Co Ltd v Dyes & Chemical Workers' Union (1960) 1 LLJ 548 [LNIND 1960 SC 22], 550 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1006 [LNIND 1960 SC 22]: [1960] 2 SCR 906 [LNIND 1960 SC 22], per Das Gupta J.

32 Metal Box Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 785 [LNIND 1968 SC 223] (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 612 [LNIND 1968 SC 223]: [1969] 39 Comp Cas 410 (SC) : [1969 (18) FLR 336] : [1969] 73 ITR 53 [LNIND 1968 SC 223] (SC), per Shelat J.

33 Peirce Leslie & Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 809 [LNIND 1960 SC 71], 815-16 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 826 [LNIND 1960 SC 71]: [1960] 3 SCR 194 [LNIND 1960 SC 71], per Das Gupta J.

34 Cannanore Spg and Wvg Mills Ltd v Workers Union (1960) 2 LLJ 43 [LNIND 1960 SC 27], 44 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

35 Anil Starch Products Ltd v Ahmedabad Chemical Workers Union (1960) 2 LLJ 88 [LNIND 1959 SC 97], 94 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1346 [LNIND 1959 SC 97], per Wanchoo J.

36 Bengal KM Union v Titagarh Paper Mills Co Ltd (1963) 2 LLJ 358 [LNIND 1963 SC 109], 361 (SC) : [1963 (7) FLR 202] : [1964] 3 SCR 38, per Wanchoo J.

37 Uttar Pradesh Electric Supply Co Ltd v Workmen 1971 Lab IC 1495, 1503 (SC), per Mitter J.

38 Bareilly Electricity Supply Co Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 407 [LNIND 1971 SC 383], 416-17 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 330 [LNIND 1971 SC 383]: 1972 Lab IC 188 : (1971) 2 SCC 617 [LNIND 1971 SC 383], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

39 Section 23 of the Payment of Bonus Act 1965.

40 Metal Box Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1969) 1 LLJ 785 [LNIND 1968 SC 223], 792 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 612 [LNIND 1968 SC 223]: [1969] 39 Comp Cas 410 (SC) : [1969 (18) FLR 336] : [1969] 73 ITR 53 [LNIND 1968 SC 223] (SC), per Shelat J.

41 Krishna Mahadev v FH Lala (1970) 1 LLJ 68 (Bom) (DB), per Madan J.

42 Malayalam Plantations Ltd v Ponnuswami (1956) 1 LLJ 69 (LAT).

43 See, notes and comments under s 11(1).

44 Order 19, Code of Civil Procedure 1908.

45 Punjab National Bank Ltd v IT (1957) 1 LLJ 455 [LNIND 1956 SC 113] (SC), per SK Das J.

46 V Veeramani v Mgmt of Madurai DCSM Society Ltd 1983 Lab IC 687, 690 (Mad), per Ratnam J.

47 Sudhindra Kumar Deb v Gopika Rajan Datta AIR 1960 Assam 55 -57 (DB), per Mehrotra J.

48 Brought into force wef 21 August 1984.

49 G Ganesan v PO, LC 2001 (3) LLN 631 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

50 Bombay Port & Dock Employees' Union v MR Meher (1965) 2 LLJ 687, 689 (Bom), per Patel J.

51 Provincial Transport Services v State IC (1958) 1 LLJ 755 (Bom), per Mudholkar J.

52 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Sri Ram Kanwar, Industrial Tribuna (1957) 1 LLJ 455 [LNIND 1956 SC 113], 459 (SC) : 1957 (1) An WR 53 : [1957] 1 SCR 220 [LNIND 1956 SC 113], per SK Das J.

53 Susannah Sharp v Wakefield [1891] AC 173, 179.

54 United Commercial Bank Ltd v Kartar Singh Campbell-Puri (1952) 2 LLJ 1 (Cal), per HK Bose J.

55 Jeevan Textile Mills v Workmen (1956) 1 LLJ 423 (LAT).

56 Delhi Cloth Mill Chemical Works v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 449 (Punj), per Bishan Narain J.

57 Bank of India v BOI Workers' Organisation 2002 (3) LLN 716 (Bom), per Deshpande J.

58 Aryan Cinema, Poona v Workmen (1953) LAC 403(LAT).

59 United Commercial Bank Ltd v Kartar Singh Campbell-Puri (1952) 2 LLJ 1 (Cal), per HK Bose J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[1][S. 11A. Power of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals to give Appropriate Relief in case of Discharge or Dismissal of Workmen.(

Where an industrial dispute relating to the discharge or dismissal of a workman has been referred to a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal for adjudication and, in the course of the adjudication proceedings, the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal was not justified, it may, by its award, set aside the order of discharge or dismissal and direct re-instatement of the workman on such terms and conditions, if any, as it thinks fit, or give such other relief to the workman including the award of any lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal as the circumstances of the case may require:

Provided that in any proceeding under this section the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, shall rely only on the materials on record and shall not take any fresh evidence in relation to the matter.]

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS[2]

In Indian Iron and Steel Co, the Supreme Court, while considering the tribunal's power to interfere with the management's decision to dismiss, discharge or terminate the services of a workman, has observed that in cases of dismissal for misconduct, the tribunal does not act as a court of appeal and substitute its own judgment for that of the management and that the tribunal will interfere only when there is want of good faith, victimisation, unfair labour practice, etc, on the part of the management.[3] The International Labour Organisation, in its recommendation (No 119) concerning 'termination of employment at the initiative of the employer' adopted in June, 1963, has recommended that a worker aggrieved by the termination of his employment should be entitled to appeal against the termination, among others, to a neutral body such as an arbitrator, a court, an arbitration committee or a similar body and that the neutral body concerned should be empowered to examine the reasons given in the termination of employment and the other circumstances relating to the case and to render a decision on the justification of the termination. The International Labour Organisation has further recommended that the neutral body should be empowered (if it finds that the termination of employment was unjustified) to order that the worker concerned, unless reinstated with unpaid wages should be paid adequate compensation or afforded some other relief. In accordance with these recommendations, it is considered that the tribunal's power in an adjudication proceedings relating to discharge or dismissal of a workmen should not be limited and that the tribunal should have the power, in cases wherever necessary to set aside the order of discharge or dismissal and direct reinstatement of the workmen on such terms and conditions, if any as it thinks fit or give such other relief to the workman including the award of any lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal as the circumstances of the case may require. For this purpose, a new s 11A has beeninserted in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 —'ID Act' in short). From this Statement of Objects and reasons, it is dear that this provision was inserted in the Act, not to limit the jurisdiction of the tribunal as evolved by the dicta of the Supreme Court, but it was inserted to confer power on the adjudicators to 'reappraise the evidence adduced in the domestic inquiry and to grant proper relief to workmen, powers which the tribunal did not possess earlier'.[4] The NCL-II observed:

> The appropriate Government may also approach the Labour Relations Commission on any individual or collective dispute in any establishment. All disputes, claims or complaints under the law on labour relations should be raised within one year of the occurrence of the cause of action. Section 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 may be retained. However, the law may be amended to the effect that where a worker has been dismissed or removed from service after a proper and fair enquiry on charges of violence, sabotage, theft and/or assault, and if the labour court comes to the conclusion that the grave charges have been proved, then the court will not have the power to order reinstatement of the delinquent worker.[5]

Constitutional Validity of Section 11A

In Delhi Cloth Mills, the Rajasthan High Court has upheld the validity of s 11A. Speaking for the court, Verma CJ, held that for the purpose of granting relief under this section, there is a clear indication that relief which is considered fit in the circumstances of the case is to be given after a conclusion is reached that the discharge or dismissal was not justified. Therefore, there are sufficient guidelines for any authority discharging such functions and whenever a challenge is made to the decision of the industrial adjudicator, correctness of the decision can be decided on the touchstone of these guidelines and in case of contravention of such guidelines, the remedies by way of writ petition under Art 226, by way of appeal by special leave under Art 136 to the Supreme Court are available. Hence, it cannot be said that wide powers conferred on the industrial adjudicators by s 11A are arbitrary or violative of Art 14 of the Constitution.[6]

APPLICATION OF THE SECTION

To Pending Reference Cases

In Firestone, the Supreme Court held that s 11A applies only to disputes which are referred for adjudication, after this section came into force. The prior disputes are, therefore, to be dealt with in accordance with the law laid down in the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject.[7] But in cases of the disputes referred to adjudication after the section has come into force, an adjudicator is bound to apply the provisions of this section irrespective of the fact whether the workman has mentioned it in his pleadings and claimed relief thereunder or not.[8]Section 11A of the ID Act was held to be applicable to a proceeding under the UP Industrial Disputes Act 1947, even before the incorporation of s 6(2A) in 1978 therein by the state legislature.[9]

To Punishment of Discharge or Dismissal

The expressions ‘discharge’ and ‘dismissal’ have acquired definite connotations in Industrial jurisprudence. The word ‘dismiss’ as used in the common parlance is unequivocally understood to mean the termination of the services of a workmen as a measure of punishment for an act of misconduct, but the word ‘discharge’ is wider in its connotation and, in the Indian legal context, has acquired a definite meaning to mean termination of the services in terms of the contract of employment or under the standing orders by serving the prescribed notice or paying wages in lieu thereof. Thus it refers to what is generally termed as termination/discharge simpliciter. Therefore, when an employer terminates the services of a workman for the reason that he was a temporary employee and his services were no longer required, it is a case of ‘discharge’ simpliciter under the contract and the provisions of s 11A will not be attracted. Hence, in the course of adjudication of a dispute relating to such termination of service, the employer cannot claim the right to justify the termination of service by adducing evidence as if it was an order of dismissal for an act of misconduct committed by the workman.[10] It is only in cases of discharge or dismissal by way of punishment that this section vests the discretionary jurisdiction in the tribunal to direct reinstatement with or without any terms or conditions or to vary the punishment as the circumstances of a case may warrant. Furthermore, the section applies only to the punishment of discharge or dismissal and does not apply to other minor punishments such as warning, fine, withholding increment, demotion or suspension etc. Similarly, from the words employed in the opening part of s 11A, it is clear that the jurisdiction under this section is available to a labour court, tribunal and national tribunal, only when a dispute is referred to it for adjudication under s 10. This jurisdiction is not available to the aforestated tribunals while acting under s 33 or s 36A of the Act.

It is not uncommon that the employers dress the punishment of discharge in the cloak of discharge simpliciter by wording the order in innocuous language. Conversely, workmen too challenge the discharge simpliciter as a penal discharge. In such cases, the tribunal can go behind the order to see its substance rather than the form. It is well established law that the language in which the order of termination of service is couched is not conclusive. It is open to the tribunal to lift the veil to see whether the form is a mere camouflage for an order of dismissal or vice versa. If the tribunal finds that the order of discharge simpliciter, by its nature and character in reality, is a measure of punishment for misconduct, it may set aside the order for non-compliance of the procedure required to be followed in a disciplinary action.[11] Where the services of a temporary employee was terminated on the ground that he had concealed the fact of his removal from service under the former employer on the charge of corruption at the time of applying for the post but the order of the employer purported to terminate the service under the contract and no inquiry was held into the matter before termination of the service, such an order of termination had cast stigma on the service career of the employee. It was a camouflaged dismissal, which was liable to be set aside.[12]Where the order of reference was in terms: ‘whether termination of the service of the employees is justified or legal' and the employer too, in his pleadings sets up a case of discharge simpliciter, he cannot subsequently be permitted to adduce evidence before the tribunal for the first time on the ground that it was not simple discharge, but dismissal for an act of misconduct. Where however, the workman challenges such termination on the ground that it was a mere ruse and it was in fact a case of dismissal for an act of misconduct, it would be open to the employer to plead:

(i) that it was a case of termination simpliciter and not at all a case of punishment and alternatively

(ii) that even if it was a case of punishment for an act of misconduct he should be permitted to justify the same by adducing evidence before the tribunal. [13]

In MK Ravi, the reference was 'whether the termination of the service of the workman was justified and proper?', but in his claim statement, the workman pleaded that the termination of his service was not discharge simpliciter but it was a clear case of wrongful dismissal. In view of this pleading, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the labour court was justified in treating it to be a case of punitive discharge falling within the purview of s 11A. Likewise in Anand Cinema, an innocuous order of 'retrenchment' was found to have been passed for an act of misconduct. the Madhya Pradesh High Court therefore held that in this situation the evidence of the employer under s 11A could not be shut out.[14] Where the services of a person appointed as a probationer were terminated during the period of probation, the labour court directed reinstatement on the ground, inter alia, that there was an incident of misconduct or incompetency prior to his discharge from service. A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court had set aside the award on the ground that the employee was on probation, which meant on 'trial', and that the employer was not obliged to suffer an incompetent employee for the full term of probation. In appeal, the Division Bench had set aside the order of the single judge and restored the award of the labour court. Quashing the order of the Division Bench and the labour court, and restoring the order of the single judge, the Supreme Court through Hegde J (for self and Sinha J) observed:

> As noticed above in the instant case, the respondent having been appointed as a probationer and his working having been found not to the satisfaction of the employer, it was open to the management to terminate his services. Assuming that there was an incident of misconduct or incompetencey prior to his discharge from service, the same cannot be ipso facto be termed as misconduct requiring an inquiry. It may be a ground for the employer's assessment of the workman's efficiency and efficacy to retain him in service, unless, of course, the workman is able to satisfy that the management for reasons other than efficiency wanted to remove him from services by exercising its power of discharge.. .. On the facts of this case, we are satisfied that the incident referred to in the evidence of the management's witness does not give rise to a conclusion that the discharge of the respondent was colourable exercise, with a collateral intention of avoiding an inquiry. Nor does the order of discharge carry any stigma. Hence, the. .. Labour Court as well as the Appellate Bench of the High Court have erred in coming to a contra conclusion.[15]

To Arbitrators under Section 10A

The jurisdiction under this section (s 11A) by express language is vested only in 'labour court, tribunal or national tribunal'. An arbitrator under s 10A has not been included. Despite this fact, a majority of a three-judge bench in Gujarat Steel Tubes, held that an arbitrator under s 10A is comprehended in the expression 'tribunal' as used in s 11A. Therefore, the arbitrator has the same jurisdiction as a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal while adjudicating upon a dispute relating to disciplinary discharge or dismissal of a workman.[16] On no plausible canons of construction or by ingenuity of 'interpretative technology', one expression can be said to cover the other. Krishna Iyer J, who delivered the majority opinion, has invoked the doctrine of casus omissus, in his 'interpretative technology' for bringing the expression 'arbitrator' within the comprehension of the expression 'tribunal' used in s 11A. It amounts to inventing casus omissus, where none really exists. According to the rules of interpretation, the court cannot interpret a statute to produce a casus omissus.[17] It is a naked usurpation of the legislative function in the guise of interpretation. The learned judge also referred to a number of foreign and indigenous dicta for arriving at his conclusion but there is nothing in those decisions to support his activist conclusion that the expression 'tribunal' comprehends an 'arbitrator'. Lord Denning MR who has been relied on mostly, even in his, provocative heterodoxies has not gone to such an extent. The dissenting judge, Koshal J, rightly observed that the 'court would step beyond the field of interpretation, and enter upon the area of legislation 'if it resorts to guess work'. Where the text of the statute is unambiguous and not susceptible to dual interpretation, in the language of Tulzapurkar J:

> it would not be permissible for a court, by indulging in nuances, semantics and interpretative acrobatics, to reach the opposite conclusion than is warranted by its plain text and make it plausible or justify it by specious references to the object, purpose or scheme of the legislation or in the name of judicial activism.[18]

Krishna Iyer J, has said thus:

> ... the literal latitude of the words in the definition cannot be allowed grotesquely inflationary play but must be read down ...To bend beyond credible limits is to break with facts, unless language leaves no option.[19]

To hold that an 'arbitrator' under s 10A is comprehended in the term 'tribunal' used in s 11A is, to be sure, to bend the definition 'beyond credible limits' by 'grotesquely inflationary play'. It is submitted that 'an ornate, pretentious, grandiose style replete with superfluous frills and rhetorical extravagance' is a poor substitute for logical legal reasoning and is rather an 'undesirable distraction'.[20] Prefaces and exordial exercises, perorations and sermons as also these and philosophies (political or social), whether couched in flowery language or language that needs simplification have ordinarily no proper place in judicial pronouncements.[21] This case strikingly illustrates how far beyond the confines of a case can the court travel when it chooses to 'jettison' the judicial restraint. It also shows, how judiciary is prone to misconceived public good by confounding private notions with constitutional requirements. The majority opinion is prefaced with a sermon on morals of litigation and then proceeds to quote 'the Bible' and 'Gandhi Ji'. The judgment turns into 50 pages of print. It conjures up hyperbolic images; appeals to the Directive Principles in Part-IV of the Constitution, substitutes wholesale dogmatic assertions for a reasoned consideration of the opposing interests. The slightest invasion of interest has been confounded with the worst. The most emotive and instigative sentiments have been evoked by most trivial occasions. The sense of balance, proportion and judicial propriety was completely discarded by Iyer J, while interpreting s 11A. It comes strangely at a time when working class was more and more gravitating towards militancy and violence stoked by extremist leaders of the hue and shade of Datta Samant, Suryanarayana Rao, etc., thereby holding the industry and the community to ransom. This decision reflects nothing worthwhile in terms of reason or logic, except a display of dysfunctional judicial activism coupled with gross abuse of judicial power on the part of the learned judge.

MISCONDUCT

The expression 'misconduct' has not been defined either in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 or in the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946. The dictionary meaning of the word 'misconduct' is 'improper behaviour; intentional wrong doing or deliberate violation of a rule of standard of behaviour'. In Ram Singh, after noticing the etymological definition of the expression 'misconduct', K Ramaswsamy J, observed:

> Though this expression is 'not capable of precise definition, its reflection receives its connotation from the context, the delinquency in its performance and its effect on the discipline and the nature of duty. It may involve moral turpitude, it must be improper or wrong behaviour; unlawful behaviour, willful in character; forbidden act, a transgression of established and definite rule of action or code of conduct but not mere error of judgment, carelessness or negligence in performance of the duty; the act complained of bears forbidden quality or character. Its ambit has to be construed with reference to the subject matter and the context wherein the term occurs, regard being had to the scope of the statute and the public purpose it seeks to serve. [22]

Generally speaking, misconduct is a transgression of some established and definite rule of action where no discretion is left except what necessity may demand; it is violation of definite law, a forbidden act.[23] It means intentional wrong doing, it would include unlawful behaviour. A conduct which is blameworthy would be misconduct, if by the commission or omission of the acts of the employee, the employer suffers loss or it generates an atmosphere destructive of discipline, the same is misconduct.[24] An interesting question arose before the Kerala High Court in Peethambaran. The superintendent of police invoked Lord Ganapathy's blessings by performing a special worship at the CBI office in Ernakulam on the occasion of shifting his office from one wing to another wing of a building. A small amount needed for the worship was spent by him from his own pocket. A public spirited advocate filed a writ petition in the High Court of Kerala seeking a writ of mandamus to the Union of India to initiate disciplinary proceedings against the officer as the act of offering prayer was an act of misconduct being unsecular in nature. The court observed:

> We have no doubt that secularism is not an anti-religious doctrine inspite of its emphasis on absolvement of politics from religion and theocratic society is not the solitary antonym of secular society. Secularism as enshrined in our Constitution respects a person's right to believe in any faith and to practise any religion so long as such practice does not hinder public order or morality and health and so long as such practice won't interfere with another man's fundamental rights. It enables both religionists as well as nullifidians to maintain their respective view points. Neither shall be intolerant towards the other in a secular society.[25]

In this view of the constitutional concept of secularism, the court held that the conduct of the officer would in no way constitute an act of misconduct for initiating disciplinary proceedings against him, particularly when he had not spent any amount from the state exchequer and he honestly believed that such a worship would better the efficiency of his official functions. It was a case where a person, despite his public office believed in the blessings of God as necessary for the commencement of his official work when the office was shifted from one room to another building. In so far as the relationship of Industrial employment is concerned, a workman has certain express or implied obligations towards his employer. Any conduct on the part of an employee inconsistent with the faithful discharge of his duties towards his employer would be a misconduct. Any breach of the express or implied duties of an employee towards his employer, therefore, unless it be of trifling nature, would constitute an act of misconduct.

In Industrial law, the word 'misconduct' has acquired a specific connotation. It cannot mean inefficiency or slackness. It is something far more positive and certainly deliberate. The charge of 'misconduct', therefore, is the charge of some positive act or of conduct which would be quite incompatible with the express and implied terms of relationship of the employee to the employer. 'What is misconduct will naturally depend upon the circumstances of each case'.[26] For instance, deliberate disobedience of any order of the superior authority will be one species of misconduct.[27] In workmen of Shalimar Rope Works, the labour appellate tribunal laid down the following criteria for determining as to whether the act would be an act of 'misconduct', viz, the act :

(i) is inconsistent with the fulfilment of the express or implied conditions of service or

(ii) is directly linked with the general relationship of employer and employee or

(iii) has a direct connection with the contentment or comfort of the men at work or

(iv) has a material bearing on the smooth and efficient working of the concern.[28]

In Tata Oil Mills, while approving the above criteria, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> If the answer to any of these criteria is in the affirmative, the act in question would amount to an act of misconduct. In any case, the act of misconduct must have some relation with the employee's duties to the employer. In other words, there must be some rational connection of the employment of the employee with the employer.[29]

If the act complained of is found to have some relationship to the affairs of the establishment, having a tendency to affect or disturb the peace and good order of the establishment or be subversive of discipline in any direct or proximate sense, such act would amount to 'misconduct'. Conversely, if the act complained of has no relation to his duties towards his employer, it would not be an act of misconduct towards his employer.'[30] However, breach of contract or a rule of the employer will not constitute an act of misconduct. For instance, where an employee sub-let a tenement in breach of the undertaking given by her, it was held that this act was not a breach of discipline, but was merely a breach of contract.[31] Likewise, a workman cannot be charged with 'misconduct' merely because other workmen threatened to go on strike if he is not dismissed. the Bombay High Court in Santosh Nadkarni, held that it is no part of the business of the employer to take sides in intra-union rivalries or disputes. If this is permitted, it would open a flood gate for abuses. Besides, it would lead to a 'closed-shop policy', it will also suppress all freedom of expression and encourage union bossism. It will then always be open for a majority to remove any employee not only from its fold but from the employment itself.[32] In terms of cl. 14(3) of the Model Standing Orders appended to the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules 1946, the following acts and omissions shall be treated as misconduct:

(a) wilful insubordination or disobedience, whether alone or in combination with others, to any lawful and reasonable order of a superior;

(b) theft, fraud or dishonesty in connection with the employer's business or property;

(c) wilful damage to or loss of employer's goods or property;

(d) taking or giving bribes or any illegal gratification;

(e) habitual absence without leave, or absence without leave for more than 10 days;

(f) habitual late attendance;

(g) habitual breach of any law applicable to the establishment;

(h) riotous or disorderly behaviour during working hours at the establishment or any act subversive of discipline;

(i) habitual negligence or neglect of work;

(j) frequent repetition or any act or omission for which a fine may be imposed to a maximum of two per cent of the wages in a month;

(k) striking work or inciting others to strike in contravention of the provisions of any law, or rule having the force of law;

(l) Sexual harassment which includes such unwelcome sexual determined behaviour (whether directly or by implication) as—

(i) physical contact and advances; or

(ii) a demand or request for sexual favours; or

(iii) sexually coloured remarks; or

(iv) showing pornography; or

(v) any other unwelcome physical verbal or non-verbal conduct of sexual nature.

Provided that where there is a complaint of sexual harassment within the meaning of clause (l) of sub-paragraph (3), the Companies Committee constituted under sub-paragraph (3B) in each establishment for inquiring into such complaints, shall, notwithstanding anything contained in paragraph 15, be deemed to be the inquiring authority appointed by the employer for the purpose of these rules.

From the language of this Model Standing Order itself, it is clear that it does not define misconduct or illustrate it, exhaustively. These cases of misconduct are merely illustrative and by no means exhaustive.[33] It is not possible to provide for every type of misconduct in the Standing Orders for justifying disciplinary action against the workman.[34] In Mahendra Singh Dhantwal, a three judge bench of the Supreme Court observed that Standing Orders of a company only describe certain cases of misconduct and the same cannot be exhaustive of all the species of misconduct which a workman may commit. Even though a given conduct may not come within the specific terms of misconduct described in the Standing Order, it may still be a misconduct in the special facts of a case, which it may not be possible to condone and for which the employer may take appropriate action. There may be many more acts which may constitute misconduct. The employers may frame their own Standing Orders suited to the peculiar exigencies of their industries and establishments. Ordinarily, the Standing Orders may limit the concept of misconduct but not invariably so.[35]

But in Glaxo Laboratories, glossing on the above, Desai J held that these observations cannot be elevated to a proposition of law that some misconduct neither defined nor enumerated and which may be believed by the employer to be misconduct ex post facto would expose the workman to a penalty. The court further pointed out that it cannot be left to the vagaries of management to say ex post facto that some acts of omission or commission, nowhere found to be enumerated in the relevant Standing Orders, are nonetheless acts of misconduct not strictly falling within the enumerated misconduct in the relevant Standing Orders but yet misconduct for the purposes of imposing a penalty.[36] The learned judge applied the same lop-sided logic while deciding Rasiklal Patel.[37] In this case, the employee was removed from service by the Ahmedabad Municipal Corporation on the ground that he made a false suggestion that he had voluntarily left his earlier service because of transfer while he had actually been removed from service, on the ground of a proved act of misconduct, by his previous employer. The labour court affirmed the punishment holding that the misconduct alleged against the employee was proved. The High Court of Gujarat dismissed the writ petition of the employee against the order and judgment of the labour court with the observation that 'even if the allegation of misconduct does not constitute misconduct amongst those enumerated in the relevant service regulations, yet the employer can attribute what would otherwise per se be a misconduct though not enumerated, and punish him for the same'. Against the judgment of the High Court, the employee filed a petition for special leave to appeal before the Supreme Court which was dismissed for the reason that it did not merit consideration as the petitioner was guilty of suppression of material facts. However, in view of the foregoing observation of the High Court, the court felt that if this statement of law is 'permitted to go uncorrected, some innocent persons may suffer in future'. Justice Desai concluded that it is 'well-settled that unless either in the certified Standing Orders or in the service regulations an act or omission is prescribed as misconduct, it is not open to the employer to fish out some conduct or misconduct and punish the workman even though the alleged misconduct would not be comprehended in any of the enumerated misconduct'. Hence, everything which is required to be prescribed has to be prescribed with precision and no argument can be entertained that something not prescribed can yet be taken into account as varying what is prescribed. Again, in AL Kalra, the same bench elaborating the rule in Glaxo Laboratories observed:

> Where the misconduct when proved entails penal consequences, it is obligatory on the employer to specify and if necessary define it with precision and accuracy so that any ex post facto interpretation of some incident may not be camouflaged as misconduct.[38]

There may be various types of misconduct other than those included in the Standing Orders, which may expose a delinquent employee to penal consequences. These may be acts of misconduct relating to establishments or undertakings to which the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946 does not apply. These acts would, no doubt, be misconduct in industrial parlance. On an analysis of the holding of the Supreme Court in Glaxo and Kalra, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court in Jyoti Home Industries, observed that:

> ...it can be safely concluded that any act of an employee which would constitute an offence of penal consequences under the Indian Penal Code or such other analogous legislation is a misconduct. Broadly stated all offences with penal consequences are misconducts but not all misconducts an offence ...[39]

In Agnani, it was held that the nature and extent of what constitutes misconduct, will naturally depend upon the circumstances of each case. When there are Standing Orders, there would be no difficulty because they define 'misconduct'. In the absence of the Standing Orders, however, the question will have to be dealt with reasonably and in accordance with commonsense. What acts could be treated as acts of misconduct would depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.45 In the absence of Standing Orders, it would be open to the employer to consider reasonably what conduct can be properly treated as misconduct, it would be difficult to lay down any general rule in respect of the problem. The management, however, has to act in good faith in determining what constitutes major misconduct within the Standing Orders sufficient to merit dismissal of a workman. For this, it must have facts upon which it bases its conclusions and it must act without caprice or discrimination and without motive of vindictiveness or intimidation or resorting to unfair labour practice. There must be infraction of the accepted principles of natural justice. If the act alleged is connected with vital interest of the workman regarding his earnings, the management should not treat it as an act of misconduct.[40]

Whether a particular act of misconduct has been committed or not, even though it may not be described, in so many words in the Standing Orders, will be a matter for the tribunal, to consider. Likewise, whether a particular misconduct will entitle the employer to punish the employee with dismissal will also be a matter, in an appropriate case, for the decision by the tribunal. But the mere omission of a certain type of misconduct in the Standing Orders would not entitle the tribunal to completely shut its eyes to the act of misconduct and to hold the order of dismissal as unjustified for that reason.[41] Generally, disciplinary action is based on one or more of the charges of misconduct enumerated in the Standing Orders or otherwise. The fact that an employee has been erroneously charged under one of the heads of the misconduct, would not preclude the employer from taking action under another if the actual act committed would fall under the other head. For instance, under the Standing Orders workmen were charged for 'wilful insubordination' instead of 'striking work' for going on illegal strike, the fact that the act fell under the latter head would not prevent the employer from taking action under either of the clauses.[42] The expression 'misconduct' covers a large area of human conduct. On the one hand, are the habitual late attendance, habitual negligence and neglect of work, on the other hand, are riotous or disorderly behaviour during working hours at the establishment or acts subversive of discipline, wilful insubordination or disobedience. In the words of Shah J:

> Misconduct spreads over a wide and hazy spectrum of Industrial activity; the most seriously subversive conducts rendering an employee wholly unfit for employment to mere technical default are covered thereby.[43]

The Bombay High Court in Sharda Prasad, enumerated broadly the following specific illustrative cases of acts of misconduct, the commission of which would justify dismissal of the delinquent employee:

(i) an act or conduct prejudicial or likely to be prejudicial to the interest or reputation of the master;

(ii) an act or conduct inconsistent or incompatible with the due or faithful discharge of his duty to his master;.

(iii) an act or conduct making it unsafe for the employer to retain him in service;

(iv) an act or conduct of the employee so grossly immoral that all reasonable men may say that he cannot be trusted;

(v) an act or conduct of the employee which may make it difficult for the master to rely on the faithfulness of the employee;

(vi) an act or conduct of the employee opening before him temptations for not discharging his duties properly;

(vii) an abusive act or an act disturbing the peace at the place of his employment;

(viii) insulting or insubordinate behaviour to such a degree as to be incompatible with the continuance of the relation of master and servant;

(ix) habitual negligence in respect of the duties for which the employee is engaged; and

(x) an act of neglect, even though isolated, which tends to cause serious consequences. [44]

The effect of such misconduct on the relation of employment has been stated by Lopes L.J, in the following words:

> If a servant conducts himself in a way inconsistent with the faithful discharge of his duty in the service, it is misconduct which justifies immediate dismissal. That misconduct, according to my view, need not be misconduct in the carrying on of the service or the business. It is sufficient if it is conduct which is prejudicial or is likely to be prejudicial to the interests or to the reputation of the master and the master will be justified, not only if he discovered it at the time, but also if he discovers it afterwards, in dismissing that servant. [45]

In the same case, Lord Esher MR observed:

> The rule of law is, that where a person has entered into the position of servant, if he does anything incompatible with the due or faithful discharge of his duty to his master, the latter has a right to dismiss him. The relation of master and servant implies necessarily that the servant shall be in a position to perform his duty duly and faithfully, and if by his own act he prevents himself from doing so, the master may dismiss him...What circumstances will put a servant into the position of not being able to perform, in a due manner, his duties, or of not being able to perform his duty in a faithful manner, it is impossible to enumerate. Innumerable circumstances have actually occurred which fall within that proposition and innumerable other circumstances which never have yet occurred, will occur, which also will fall within the proposition. But if a servant is guilty of such a crime outside his service as to make it unsafe for a master to keep him in his employ, the servant may be dismissed by his master; and if the servant's conduct is so grossly immoral that all reasonable men would say that he cannot be trusted, the master may dismiss him.[46]

However, there is no fixed rule of law defining the degree of misconduct which will justify dismissal.[47] Hence each case will depend upon its own facts and circumstances. Whether a particular misconduct is severe or otherwise would depend upon the facts of each particular case. No hard and fast rule can be laid down to gauge the severity or triviality of the misconduct. A misconduct which may not be viewed in certain circumstances to be serious, can be serious in another set of circumstances. A single judge of the Bombay High Court in Basu Deba Das, pointed out that a standard of conduct expected of an employee in respect of a roadside dhaba or a country liquor bar will not be the same as expected of it while serving in a five star hotel or in a permit room located in such a hotel. In this case, the punishment of dismissal of the workman for the misconduct of assaulting a co-worker with a kitchen knife was held to be serious enough to justify the punishment of dismissal.[48] But, when management takes the responsibility to level the charge of misconduct', there must be material in support of it, in the absence of which the action taken by the employer would be vitiated by a 'basic error' or 'perversity'. An inference of victimisation also may be plausible.[49] Misconduct in industrial employment can broadly be dealt with under the following headings but these heads are not exhaustive. Nor are they water-tight compartments because many acts of misconduct falling under one head may also dovetail into or fall under the others as well. These heads and sub-heads are, therefore, devised merely for the purpose of convenience of treatment.

Misconduct Relating to Duty

In industrial law, like the contract law, existence of duty is the foundation of the misconduct or non-observance, breach or dereliction of duty. In other words, before an employee can be charged of this type of misconduct, the employer has to show that the employee had a duty to do the act alleged to have been omitted or to refrain from doing the act alleged to have been committed. In other words, an ascertainable duty owed by the employee towards the employer in connection with the employment should have been breached by the employee.[50] Such duties may be express or implied.

Express duties are generally created by a statute or the contract inter se the parties or the collective agreement between the employer and the union, whereas legally enforceable implied duties may be spelt out by the application of common law. Though it may not be possible to comprehend a general rule covering all possible sources of such duties, in practice, most of the sources of duty are discernible with sufficient degree of accuracy. Express duties may be created by statute such as the Factories Act or the Standing Orders framed and certified under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act.

(i) Non-Observance of Duty

The duties of an employee would include that he would be trustworthy, that his acts would justify the confidence of the employer, that he would not so act as to prejudice or damage the interests of the employer, that he would not act or conduct or behave himself in a way inconsistent or incompatible with the faithful discharge of his duties to the employer, that he would not behave in an insulting or insubordinate manner, that he would not be habitually negligent, etc. Every employee is expected to behave himself in such a manner so as not to damage or prejudice the interests or reputation of his master, whatever be the sphere of activity/work of the employee. These principles will be applicable to every employee right from the beginning of his employment up to the termination of his employment. These are no additional duties. It is impossible to define in writing all the duties of every individual employee in an establishment, because any rigid rule delimiting the several interlinked parts of the technical process of production where labour is employed, that labour cannot be moved from one aspect of the technical process to another closely-related aspect, would practically paralyse the management. However, the matter may be very different where there is a covenant for service of a particular type and the person is called upon to perform some duties totally outside that covenant or is being assigned to some post which is not within the contract at all.[51]

The fact that some employees were employed to work as clerks and some as typists would not necessarily lead to the conclusion that a person who is employed as a clerk can never be employed as a typist or can never be allotted typing duties.[52] It is a general contractual principle, particularly relevant to the industrial employment relationship which takes effect as an implied term in the contract that the employee should facilitate performance of his obligations under the contract and must not put it out of his power to do what he has promised to do.[53]An employee who refuses to carry out an order is usually making it difficult for the employer to perform his side of the contract. An employee is expected to discharge not only express duties allotted to him but also the implied duties incidental to his job and the contract of service. However, the duties which are not allotted to an employee nor are implied or incidental to his job or contract would not be within his competence. In other words, if an employee does any such act as he is not authorised to do, that by itself would be a breach of his implied duties. For instance, where a workman deliberately exhibited an advertisement slide which he was not authorised by the management without the permission of the management during a performance, giving the advertising firm the benefit of the advertisement to the definite loss of the management, the behaviour of the workman was held to amount to misconduct and even a misconduct of grave character justifying dismissal.[54] Likewise, if an employee actively anti-canvasses against the quality of goods where the goods are exposed for sale to the public, he has not served the employer honestly and faithfully and he has not used utmost endeavour to promote the interests of the employer. On the contrary, he can be said to have acted against the interests of the employer. However, such act should be deliberate and not otherwise justified.[55] To justify the disciplinary action, the employer has to prove that the employee contravened the express or implied conditions of service. However, the question whether the breach of duty gives rise to a right to dismiss the workman will depend on a variety of other factors, in particular, the seriousness of the refusal. In other words, not every uncooperative act is necessarily a repudiation of the fundamental terms of the contract.[56]

(ii) Non-Performance of Work

Apart from the statutory duties, the generic covenants contained in the contract of service or the implied duties are incidental to the contract of employment. In practice every employee is entrusted with a specific job in the plant, office or field which he is required to carry out or perform during the working hours depending upon the nature of the job. The refusal of the employee to perform or carry out that job or the matters incidental thereto will constitute misconduct in the absence of any contract, settlement or custom to the contrary. An employee may be guilty of 'non-performance of work' in two ways, viz, by deliberately refusing to attend to the job or work or by neglecting to do the work. The cases falling under the second category have been dealt with under the next sub-head, viz, 'negligence of duty'.

(iii) Negligence of Duty

A workman owes a duty to his employer to exercise reasonable care in the performance of his duty. In other words, an employee must exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of his duties. A workman, who deliberately neglects to carry out his work or perform his duty, when required to do that with reasonable care, is guilty of misconduct of negligence. However, in deciding what is reasonable care, 'the standards of men and not those of angels',[57] have to be applied. The concept of negligence has been the subject-matter of great deal of juridical literature. The decided cases on the application of this duty in any particular circumstance are no more than an analogy and cannot be regarded more than an existence of a general duty of care. The precise scope of this implied term in the contract of employment is a matter of controversy. In Lister, the House of Lords was unanimous in deciding that there was an implied term in a lorry driver's employment contract that he would exercise reasonable care when going about his employer's business.[58] This part of the decision seems to have been misconstrued in the latter case of Harvey, in which it was held that a store keeper was not obliged to indemnify his employer in respect of his negligent driving of his own motor-cycle while fetching some spare parts in the course of his employment.[59] A narrow definition of the 'duty' was applied, ie, not to cause damage by his negligence while doing that which he was actually engaged to do, namely store-keeping. It has been suggested that a wide definition, ie, to take reasonable care while going about the employer's business, was what the House of Lords intended to lay down in Lister's case.[60] A detailed discussion of the subject is beyond the scope of this work. But for practical purposes, the statement of law relating to negligence in Halsbury's Laws of England, is instructive:

> Negligence is a specific tort and in any given circumstances is the failure to exercise that care which the circumstances demand. What amounts to negligence depends on the facts of each particular case. In may consist in omitting to do something which ought > to be done or in doing something which ought to be done either in a different manner or not at all. Where there is no duty to exercise care, negligence in the popular sense has no legal consequence. Where there is a duty to exercise care, reasonable care must be taken to avoid acts or omissions which can be reasonably foreseen to be likely to cause physical injury to persons or property. The degree of care required in the particular case depends on the surrounding circumstances, and may vary according to the amount of risk to be encountered and to the magnitude of the prospective injury. The duty of care is owed only to those persons who are in the area of foreseeable danger; the fact that the act of the defendant violated his duty of care to a third person does not enable the plaintiff who is also injured by the same act to claim unless he is also within the area of foreseeable danger. The same act or omission may accordingly in some circumstances attract liability for being negligent, although in other circumstances it will not do so. The material considerations are the absence observance of duty which is on the part of the defendant owed to the plaintiff in the circumstances of the case and the damage suffered by the plaintiff, together with a demonstrable relation of cause and effect between the two.[61]

Thus negligence in legal sense is a negative rather than a positive term and, in any given circumstances, is the failure to exercise that care which the circumstances demand.[62]In other words, it is the absence of such care, skill and diligence, which is the duty of the person to bring in the performance of his work. In case of negligence, a man does not intend that consequence. Negligence is characterised subjectively by an attitude of indifference and it is, therefore, opposed to intentional act.[63] Negligence and wrongful intentions are rather mutually exclusive states of mind. Where there is a duty to take care or to exercise certain skill, failure to take care or exercise skill may indicate negligence. An error can be indicative of negligence and the degree of culpability may indicate the grossness of the negligence. Carelessness can often be productive of more harm than deliberate wickedness or malevolence. The omission to perform the duty may consist of a variety of things, for instance, doing nothing or wasting time by loitering, loafing, idling or gossiping or sleeping during the duty hours or the pretence of waiting instructions with a view to shirk work or because of laziness or wilful indolence. In day to day work, an honest mistake may be committed and the mistake may be of such a nature as from its own gravity, it may be indicative of negligence but every error in performing duties can hardly be styled as negligence. A single instance of such act or omission would not constitute the misconduct of habitual negligence.[64] But when these acts are committed or omitted habitually, they would constitute serious misconduct justifying even the extreme penalty of dismissal because such negligence of duty is a good ground for the dismissal of the employee.[65] 'Habitual negligence or neglect of work' has been included in the list of misconducts in the Model Standing Orders framed under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946. Generally, industrial employers also include this head of misconduct in the Standing Orders applicable to their establishments.

Habitual negligence or neglect of work on the part of a workman refers to the habit of being negligent or neglectful in the discharge of his duties. Therefore in order to bring a particular act or omission under this head, it is necessary to establish that the workman was negligent or neglectful in the discharge of his duties as a habit or confirmed tendency on his part. Hence isolated or stray incidents of negligence unless attended by serious consequences will not constitute the misconduct to warrant the punishment of discharge or dismissal. But before a person can be said to be guilty of habitual negligence, it has to be shown that he has been guilty of negligence on several occasions so as to show that negligence is his habit.[66] For instance, where the concerned workman was found guilty on the charge of negligence in connection with one single matter, viz, the improper arrangement and labelling of stores, which was alleged to have been committed on one single occasion, it was held that it was not a case of habitual negligence despite the fact that such arrangement continued for over several months. Apart from habitual negligence, there may be some acts of gross negligence which may entail serious damage or consequences to the establishment of the employer. Classic examples of such acts of negligence are, for example, a sentry who sleeps at his post and allows enemies to slip through; a compositor carelessly placing a plus sign instead of minus sign in a question paper may cause numerous examinees to fail; a compounder in a hospital or chemist's shop who makes up mixture or other medicines carelessly may cause quite a few deaths; the man at an airport who does not carefully filter the petrol poured into a plane may cause it to crash; the railway employee who does not set the point carefully may cause a head-on collision.[67] In such cases, one act itself would constitute a serious misconduct and it is not necessary to prove the habit of being negligent on the part of the employee. Therefore, the employers usually include gross negligence as a separate head in their Standing Orders.

In Kalyani, the facts disclosed that the workman was charge-sheeted for gross dereliction of duty inasmuch as he made mistakes in the preparation of load-sheet on one day and a balance-chart on another day, which mistakes might have led to a serious accident to the aircraft. Before the domestic inquiry the workman admitted the mistakes mentioned in the charge-sheet but contended that he was over-worked and that it was also the duty of the superiors to check the load-sheets and balance-charts prepared by him. After finding him guilty of the gross negligence involving the possibility of serious accident, the employer dismissed him from service. It was held that the mistakes committed were of serious nature and the argument, that other persons were also responsible for checking the work done by the workman, would not mitigate the mistakes committed by him as he was primarily responsible for the load-sheets and the balance-charts. In view of the serious nature of the mistakes, the plea of the workman that he was over-worked in mitigation of the misconduct was also rejected.[68] Likewise, in Caltex, the workman was charge-sheeted for having been caught red-handed while smoking near an aircraft that was being refueled resulting in a serious accident to the aircraft. After holding the inquiry, the workman was dismissed from service, which was upheld by the tribunal and affirmed by the Supreme Court.[69] In Surendra Kumar Dash, a sales assistant was discharged from service for misappropriation of funds on the ground that there was short-fall in the balance amount because he sold the goods without being so authorised. The Orissa High Court held that in the facts and circumstances of the case, it was a case of negligence and not a case of misappropriation of funds.[70]The question whether a particular act of negligence constitutes gross misconduct or not, will depend on its own peculiar facts and circumstances and the nature of work performed by an employee as well as the status or position he occupies.[71] Where a driver was dismissed for rash and negligent driving causing the death of a 7-year old boy, the labour court ordered reinstatement. Quashing the award of the labour court, the Madras High Court observed that the direction given by the labour court was not based on proper appreciation of the issues involved.[72]

Habitual sleeping during duty hours would constitute an act of gross negligence,[73] and serious dereliction of duty. The seriousness of the misconduct would be aggravated particularly, when the principal duty of the employee is to keep watch and vigilance on the life and property of the employer as in the case of watch and ward staff.[74] For instance, the importance of the duty of a durban was noted by the Supreme Court in Francis Klein, where it observed that the post of a durban in an industrial concern, where valuable property, both manufactured goods and assets, required to be guarded, was a post where trust and confidence of the company were to be maintained and if a durban has failed to give assistance in apprehending a thief, the refusal of the durban was certainly an act for which the employer was justified in dismissing him on the ground of loss of confidence.[75] In inflicting the punishment of discharge or dismissal from service, the distinction between mere negligence and wilful or deliberate negligence is also relevant.[76] Mere slackness of work, however, is not sufficient to constitute serious offence of 'habitual negligence' or 'neglect of work' to warrant an order of dismissal.[77] Likewise, the mere loss of identity card on more than one occasion may not behove a workman as he is expected to be vigilant, but it will not constitute the misconduct of habitual negligence or neglect of work. Therefore, for such a lapse, he may be liable for some punishment like a warning, censure or loss of an increment but the punishment of discharge or dismissal for such lapse is not justifiably warranted.[78]

Another misconduct which is usually committed by industrial employees is loitering about during the duty hours by leaving their machines or the seats of work on various pretexts such as chitchatting with others or moving about aimlessly. If a workman is found guilty of the misconduct of habitual loitering about, that would be a good ground for his dismissal and the employer will be justified to dismiss him from service. This point has been illustrated by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Burn & Co.[79] In this case, inspite of the findings that the workman was always in the habit of loitering outside his place of work without the permission of his departmental head and that he did not care to get any permission for going out and further that the warning by the employer had no effect on him, probably because he was the assistant secretary of the union and he could break discipline with impunity, the tribunal directed the reinstatement of the workman as it took the view that the penalty of dismissal was rather harsh and out of proportion to the misconduct committed by him. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the tribunal ordering reinstatement as the misconduct in question was held sufficient to justify the dismissal. Irrespective of whether a right to dismiss a workman exists, the workman is under an implied duty to indemnify the employer in respect of the consequence of his negligent conduct.[80]

(iv) Engaging in Work Similar to that of the Employer

Some employers provide in their Standing Orders that a workman will not engage himself in any work similar in nature to that carried on by the employer or in which he is employed. Such provisions are made where the employers want to prohibit clandestine competition by their own employees. In a suitable case, if an employee is found guilty of such act of misconduct, it may warrant penalty of dismissal. However, the charge has to be specifically alleged and proved. In Remington Rand, the Supreme Court held that 'engaging in any work similar in nature' meant continuity of transactions and not a single, casual or solitary transaction. In the circumstances of the case, the act of selling one second-hand typewriter was held not to be a contravention of the relevant standing order.[81] In T Krishnamoorthy, the act of borrowing of agricultural loans at low interest in the names of relatives of the employee and utilising the same for personal purposes has been held to be an act of misconduct prejudicial to the interest of the employer bank. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the punishment of reduction in basic pay by one stage for two years has been held not to be excessive.[82]

(v) Absence without Leave

An employee is under an obligation not to absent himself from work without good cause during the time at which he is required to be at work by the terms of his contract of service.[83] Absence without leave is misconduct in industrial employment warranting disciplinary punishment. Even if the workman is not absent from the employer's business premises, his absence from the specific place of duty where he is required to be, without permission, would also constitute an act of misconduct. Therefore, the absence of an employee from duty, if it amounts to misconduct inconsistent with faithful discharge of his duties, would constitute good cause for his dismissal.[84] Habitual absence from duty without leave has been made a misconduct under the Model Standing Orders framed under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946. Likewise, the industrial employers also include the 'absence from duty' without leave in the list of acts of misconduct in their Standing Orders. Sanction of leave will be a good defence to a misconduct of absence without leave. This presupposes that before a workman absents himself, he must have applied for and obtained leave from the employer, whether the leave is of casual nature or earned one.[85] No employee can claim leave of absence as a matter of right and remaining absent without leave will constitute violation of discipline.[86] The mere fact that he had applied for leave would not be a good defence when the leave was refused by the employer in exercise of his discretion, unless it could be shown that the action taken was actuated by the desire to victimise the workman.[87] The fact that the workman was continuously absent from work without leave on account of his detention in jail for an offence, will not give an immunity to the workman to remain absent without leave and the employer will be justified in discharging him from service.[88] In IISCO, seven workmen were absent without leave for 14 consecutive days as they were in police custody. From the police custody, they applied for leave which was refused and the company terminated their service under the relevant Standing Order for remaining absent without leave. The Industrial tribunal took the view that the relevant Standing Order was not the inflexible rule and mere application for leave was sufficient to arrest the operation of the Standing Order. In appeal, the Labour Appellate Tribunal held that in view of the circumstance that the workmen were in custody, the company was not justified in refusing leave. Quashing the order, SK Das J, observed:

> It is true that the arrested men were not in a position to come to their work, because they had been arrested by the police. This may be unfortunate for them; but it would be unjust to hold that in such circumstances the company must always give leave when an application for leave is made. If a large number of workmen are arrested by the authorities in charge of law and order by reason of their questionable activities in connection with a labour dispute (as in this case), the work of the company will be paralysed if the company is forced to give leave to all of them for more or less indefinite period. Such a principle will not be just; nor will it restore harmony between labour and capital or ensure normal flow of production. It is immaterial whether the charges on which the workmen are arrested by the police are ultimately proved or not in a court of law. The company must carry on its work and may find it impossible to do so if a large number of workmen are absent. Whether in such circumstances leave should be granted or not must be left to the discretion of the employer. It may be readily accepted that if the workmen are arrested at the instance of the company for the purpose of victimisation and in order to get rid of them on the ostensible pretext of continued absence, the position will be different. It will then be a colourable or mala fide exercise of power under the relevant Standing Order; that, however, is not the case here.[89]

In TELCO, the workman absented himself without leave or permission with effect from 19 December, 1970 and the employer issued a memo and charge-sheet on 8 January, 1971 notifying the domestic inquiry to be held against him. Since the workman failed to appear in the domestic inquiry and the inquiry proceeded ex parte on the basis of which he was discharged from service, by order dated 5 March 1971. However, on 4 February 1980, the workman informed the management that he was arrested by the police on 9 December 1970 in connection with a murder case and requested the management to allow him to join duty. The refusal of the management to accede to this request led to an industrial dispute. A single judge of the Patna High Court held that the discharge of the workman was valid and justified for continuous absence without permission or leave.[90]Another defence open to an employee against the charge for absence without leave is that the absence was on account of circumstances beyond his control. For instance, where the absence of a workman was on account of his sudden or serious illness or the serious illness of a relation, that would be an extenuating circumstance which the employer will have to take into consideration. However, if a workman malingers, feigns sickness in order to avoid duty by producing a false medical certificate, this would itself be a serious act of misconduct. If the management requires the application for leave on the ground of sickness to be accompanied by a medical certificate, the workman will not be justified in absenting himself without producing the medical certificate and grant of leave.[91] But whether a workman was in fact, ill or not, is a question of fact which has to be considered by the inquiry officer on the basis of the evidence produced before him and cannot obviously be a matter of conjecture or presumption.[92] When an employee goes on applying for extension of leave on the ground of sickness, the employer is not bound to grant him leave for an indefinite period, especially when no leave is due to him. However, the burden of proof would be on the employee to show that this absence was justified.[93] Such absence without leave constitutes a misconduct justifying disciplinary action against the delinquent workman. The punishment can only be imposed either by complying with the procedure prescribed by the Standing Orders of the establishment, if any,[94] or with the rules of natural justice. Normally, the punishment should be inflicted after the workman has been found guilty of the misconduct after holding a domestic inquiry.[95]

The quantum of punishment in cases of misconduct of absence from duty without leave would depend upon the facts of each case.[96] For instance, where the worker absented after the tiffin hour continuously for two days, such temporary absence would not amount to misconduct justifying the penalty of dismissal.[97] The absence of a workman, belonging to watch and ward staff, on account of his arrest for an offence under the Arms and Excise Act, was held sufficient justification for dismissal in view of the past record of habitual absence without leave on the part of the workman and the gravity of the offence with which he was charged, was considered to be a good ground for his dismissal.[98] On the other hand, in the absence of a provision in the Standing Orders of a company making 'absence without leave' for a short period of time a misconduct justifying dismissal, the absence of the workman without leave for three days for which he offered explanation, the extreme penalty of dismissal was held to be unwarranted.[99]

Absence for mere three occasions in a month, was held not to be sufficient in law to prove the misconduct of habitual absence.[1]Systematically leaving work without permission is another variant of absence without leave. When, therefore, a workman systematically absents himself from work without permission and without making any application for leave, such act is gross violation of discipline. The fact that the workman happens to be an office bearer of the workers union cannot confer immunity upon him from punishment for breach of discipline. Such misconduct when proved would justify the punishment of dismissal.[2] In Swaraj Tractors, the facts were: the workman remained absent without leave from 27 March 1991. Three days later, he was arrested by police under s 302 of IPC and kept under detention. A charge-sheet was issued to the workman for unauthorised absence. The workman did not present himself before the enquiry officer despite notice, nor was there any communication from him regarding his inability to participate in the enquiry. The enquiry officer submitted his findings on the basis of which, he was dismissed from service. The said order was challenged by the workman by filing a civil suit which was decreed on 19 April 1995. The ground for holding the order of termination illegal was that there had been denial of principles of natural justice and the respondent was not allowed to participate in the inquiry proceedings. The said order was upheld by the lower appellate Court and the High Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, a three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court held:

> .. . It was not correct for the Courts below to come to the conclusion that principles of natural justice were violated. Admittedly, wife of the respondent received the notice and there was nothing to prevent her from participating in the inquiry proceedings or for the respondent to appoint some person to represent him. Furthermore, even at this stage, there is nothing on record to show that the respondent made any attempt to communicate with the appellant seeking leave of absence. It is, therefore, quite evident that the report of the Inquiry Officer that the respondent had been absent without leave was factually correct and as per the Standing Orders this tantamounted to a misconduct. According to the respondent, he was, first apprehended on 30th March, 1991 but till the order of dismissal was passed he had not joined duty nor was there any application for grant of leave. In our opinion, therefore, the Courts below could not have come to the conclusion that the principles of natural justice had been violated.. .. We, therefore, allow this appeal and set aside the orders of the Courts below, but in view of the fact that the respondent had put in twelve years of service we direct the appellant to pay to the respondent within four weeks from today an ex-gratia amount of Rs. 3,00,000/-.[3]

In YP Sarabhai, the facts disclosed that a bank employee remained continuously absent for a long period without any reasonable cause or justification and inspite of the direction from the management to report for duty and also the permission granted to him from time to time extending the date to join duty. His conduct showed that he was remaining absent on the ground of ailment with a view to avoid transfer, even though he was attending court proceedings on different dates. He was dismissed him from service, which dismissal was upheld by the High Court. Dismissing the appeal filed by the employee, Lakshmanan J (for himself and Panta J) of the Supreme Court awarded a compensation of Rs. 1,50,000/-, which included the provident fund dues of Rs. 75,930/-.[4] In L&T Komatsu, the respondent-workman was dismissed, after conducting enquiry, for remaining absent without leave for a total of 105 days in a period of nine months. The labour court directed reinstatement and substituted dismissal with stoppage of increments. A single judge of the High Court modified the award denying continuity of service, while retaining the other part of the award. In writ appeal, the division bench further modified the award by ordering reinstatement without back wages and continuity of service. Allowing the appeal filed by the company, Pasayat J (for self and Sathasivam J) of the Supreme Court held:

> When the factual background is considered in the light of principles indicated above, the inevitable conclusion is that the Labour Court and the High Court were not justified in directing the reinstatement by interference with the order of termination. The orders are accordingly set aside. The order of termination as passed by the concerned authority stands restored.[5]

Where the workman was charged of unauthorised absence, apart from certain other consequential charges, such as, failure to take interest in work and disobedience, and the said absence being only of few days, the punishment of dismissal was disproportion and is liable to be set aside. In the instant case, in view of the fact that he had failed to participate in the enquiry despite notice, he is not entitled to backwages.[6] Even where the enquiry held was fair and proper, the tribunal adjudicating the dispute can go into the question of quantum of punishment and, in the instant case where the employee had put in 30 years of service, the punishment of dismissal for unauthorised absence for a few days and his argumentative nature is disproportionate. The order of the labour court substituting dismissal with stoppage of increment was proper.[7] Where a workman was dismissed from service on charges of using filthy language and answering superiors insolently, the misconduct is trivial and the punishment is disproportionate. However, considering the bitter relations developed and fact that delinquent was out of employment for several years, a compensation of Rs. 10 lakhs was paid instead of reinstatement.[8] In Jagdish Singh, the facts were: the workman employed as a sweeper remained absent without leave on four occasions in two months. Absence without leave for a total of 15 days in a period of two months could not be said to be 'habitual'. The punishment of dismissal is disproportionate, in view of the fact that he had to sort out the domestic problems of his daughter with her in laws.[9]

(vi) Late Attendance

Punctuality in attendance is always an implied condition of service. The management is entitled to demand regular and punctual attendance on the part of the employees and it has a right to take disciplinary action, if necessary, to dismissal, in order to ensure that these requirements are fulfilled. Habitual late attendance is a misconduct and is generally included in the Standing Orders of industrial establishments because late attendance is a species of absence without leave between the time an employee is required to arrive and the time he actually arrives. Though casual or isolated cases of late attendance may not warrant serious punishment, yet if an employee makes late attendance a matter of habit, it can be seriously viewed particularly when the workman has been previously warned to be punctual. The question as to what punishment should be inflicted in a particular case would depend on the facts and circumstances of that case. For instance, where the workman concerned, on more than six occasions within a period of twelve months, came late to the office, was warned thrice and on one occasion was suspended and in spite of that, he continued to persist in his habit of late attendance without any valid excuse, his dismissal for habitual late attendance was held justified. On the other hand, where the workman was charge-sheeted for late coming on one occasion, it was held that the punishment of suspension for 10 days without pay was held to be excessive.[10] Where the relevant Standing Orders of the company provided inter alia that an employee would be discharged for frequent absence without permission and for frequent late or irregular attendance, but this was subject to a proviso that an employee could not be discharged from service until he had previously received at least one warning, one severe warning and one suspension which should be recorded on his service sheet, the discharge of the employee was held invalid for not complying with requirements of the proviso.[11]

(vii) Strikes

It is an accepted principle of industrial adjudication that workmen can resort to strike in order to press their demands without snapping the relationship of employer and employee. It is equally a well-accepted principle that the work of the factory cannot be paralysed and brought to a standstill by an illegal strike, in spite of the legal steps being taken by the management to resolve the conflict. In such circumstances, the employer has the right to take disciplinary action for the misconduct of strike against the delinquent workman and also 'to carry on the work of the factory in furtherance of which it could employ other workmen and justify its action in any industrial adjudication of the dispute arising therefrom.[12] The Model Standing Orders have included 'striking work or inciting others to strike work in contravention of the provisions of any law, or rule having the force of law' as a head under the acts of misconduct. A further limitation on the right to strike, viz, the justification 'has been developed by industrial adjudication. Hence apart from 'illegal strikes', the Standing Orders of the industrial employers include 'unjustified strikes' also in the list of acts of misconduct warranting dismissal but the punishment for taking part in an illegal or unjustified strike would depend upon the construction of the Standing Orders and also the facts and circumstances of each case. The law with respect to determination of the quantum of punishment for taking part in an illegal strike has been stated by Sinha CJI, in IGN Rly, in the following words:

> The only question of practical importance which may arise in the case of an illegal strike, would be the kind or quantum of punishment, and that, of course, has to be modulated in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. Therefore, the tendency to condone what has been declared to be illegal by statute, must be deprecated, and it must be clearly understood by those who take part in an illegal strike that thereby they make themselves liable to be dealt with by their employers. There may be reasons for distinguishing the case of those who may have acted as mere dumb-driven cattle from those who have taken an active part in fomenting the trouble and instigating workmen to join such a strike, or have taken recourse to violence...To determine the question of punishment, a clear distinction has to be made between those workmen who not only joined in such strike, but also took part in obstructing the loyal workmen from carrying on their work, or took part in violent demonstrations, or acted in defiance of law and order, on the one hand, and those workmen who were more or less silent participators in such a strike, on the other hand. It is not in the interest of the industry that there should be a wholesale dismissal of all the workmen who merely participated in such a strike. It is certainly not in the interest of the workmen, themselves. An Industrial tribunal, therefore, has to consider the question of punishment, keeping in view the overriding consideration of the full and efficient working of the industry as a whole. The punishment of dismissal or termination of services, has, therefore, to be imposed on such workmen as had not only participated in the illegal strike, but had fomented it, and had been guilty of violence or doing acts detrimental to the maintenance > of law and order in the locality where work had to be carried on.[13]

In Model Mills, the Standing Orders of the employer-company provided for dismissal for taking part in an illegal strike. Some workmen were dismissed from service in accordance with the relevant Standing Order for taking part in an illegal strike. On the construction of the Standing Order, the dismissal was held as proper and justified.[14] In Burn & Co, the court affirmed the award of the tribunal holding that the suspension and dismissal of the workmen for going on illegal strike was unjustified in the circumstances of the case. In this case, after the dismissal of the workmen, the employer company had taken back in service a large number of workmen while leaving out the concerned workman. The court observed that mere participation in the strike would not justify the suspension or dismissal, particularly when no clear distinction could be made between workmen not taken back into service and those taken back, although they had also participated in the strike.[15] In Caltex, the court reversed the holding of the labour appellate tribunal that the punishment of dismissal for going on illegal strike was unduly severe with the observation that the labour appellate tribunal appeared to have been influenced by the consideration that mere participation in an illegal strike might not always and in every case deserve dismissal. The court itself noticed that it was shown in the inquiry to the satisfaction of the inquiry officer that the workman was guilty of not merely participating in an illegal strike but also of several other acts of gross indiscipline for which the punishment of dismissal was provided under the Standing Orders.[16] Later, in Bata Shoe Co,[17] the court observed that it may be that participation in an illegal strike may not, necessarily and in every case, be punished with dismissal; but where an inquiry has been held and the employer has inflicted the punishment of dismissal upon the employee on finding him guilty of the misconduct of joining an illegal strike, the tribunal should not interfere, unless it finds an unfair labour practice and victimisation against him. In this case, in spite of the clear finding that the strike was illegal and staged in hot haste, a misconduct which merited dismissal under the relevant Standing Orders and that the managerial inquiry was proper, the tribunal had directed the reinstatement of the workmen. The Supreme Court disagreed with the award of the tribunal and held that on these findings, the tribunal should not have interfered with the action of dismissal. In IMH Press, the court observed that mere taking part in an illegal strike without anything more would not necessarily justify the dismissal of all the workmen taking part in the strike.[18] In Oriental Textile, the Supreme Court observed:

> ...merely because workmen go on strike it does not justify the management in terminating their services. In any case, if allegations of misconduct have been made against them those allegations have to be inquired into by charging them with specific acts of misconduct and giving them an opportunity to defend themselves at the inquiry. Even where a strike is illegal, it does not justify the management from terminating their services merely on that ground though if it can be shown on an inquiry that the conduct of the workmen amounted to misconduct it can do so.. .. .in the case of a domestic inquiry where misconduct is held to be proved, the tribunal can only interfere with that order if there is mala fide or want of good faith, there was victimisation or unfair labour practice or the management has been guilty of basic error or violation of the principles of natural justice or on the materials the finding is completely baseless or perverse. If, however, the management does not hold such an inquiry or the inquiry is due to some omission or deficiency not valid, it can nonetheless support its order of discharge, termination or dismissal when the matter is referred for Industrial adjudication by producing a satisfactory evidence and proving misconduct.[19]

After the insertion of s 11A, the first part of these observations is no longer good law. The jurisdiction of the tribunal by this provision has been enlarged to go into the merits of the case instead of confining itself to the circumstances delineated in Indian Iron Steel Co. Furthermore, the jurisdiction of the tribunal to take fresh evidence has on the other hand been curtailed. However, where during an illegal and unjustified strike, the workmen physically obstructed other willing workers from work by sitting down between the tram lines, it was a serious misconduct for which the action of dismissal was justified and no inference of victimisation could be drawn.[20] In East Asiatic, in view of the fact that all the workmen who participated in the strike were given the punishment of cut of a day's wage alone and in view of the further fact that the charge of instigation against the concerned workman not having been proved, it was held that the punishment of dismissal inflicted upon him could not be sustained, as the charge of instigation had failed.[21] The mere participation of the workers in the strike either during working hours or beyond working hours will not itself be such a serious misconduct even if such presence constitutes a civil trespass,[22] but where the workmen forcibly entered the premises of the mills in spite of the warnings by the watchman and had entered the workshop, the boiler house and the mill house and continued to stay there, threatening violence towards the property and persons, the action of dismissal was held to be justified.[23] The workmen who staged an illegal strike cannot successfully plead that their action was justified or that the strike was peaceful, and that it would be against the principles of social justice to punish them with dismissal for such action on their part.[24] There can be no distinction between an illegal strike which may be said to be justifiable and one which is not justifiable, as it is not permissible to characterise an illegal strike as justifiable which is not warranted by the Act. Every one participating in an illegal strike is liable to be dealt with departmentally, subject, of course, to the action of the department being questioned before the Industrial adjudicator.[25] Nevertheless, the employer will have the right to dismiss a workman joining an unjustified strike only when:

(i) the strike itself is not bona fide, or

(ii) when it is launched on other extraneous considerations and not solely with a view to better the conditions of labour.[26]

A worker cannot always be dismissed for joining a strike which is not illegal, but is simply unjustified. In such cases, in the absence of any evidence to show that the workmen concerned were guilty of violence during the strike, the action of dismissal cannot be sustained. The question whether a strike is illegal or not is a question of law but the further question whether the strike was justified or not is a question of fact. When, therefore, on consideration of all the facts and circumstances, the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the strike was justified, that finding cannot be interfered with in judicial review even if the tribunal placed undue weight on one or more circumstances.[27]The act of going on strike would not constitute abandonment of employment by a workman.[28] It is not open to the employer to give employment to some of the striking workmen and refuse it to others as that would amount to victimisation and unfair labour practice. [29] In Amrit Vanaspati, the facts were: the respondent-workman was dismissed for misconduct involving riotous and disorderly behaviour, throwing of a coolie into the boiler, forcing the workers to stop work, etc., after holding enquiry. The labour court accepted the findings of the enquiry officer and upheld the dismissal. The High Court, in exercise of is writ jurisdiction, set aside the order of the labour court and directed reinstatement with back wages. Quashing the orders of the High Court and restoring the award passed by the labour court, Lakshmanan J (for self and Panta J) of the Supreme Court held:

> The Labour Court in the concluding part of its award has held that the charges framed against the workman are charges of misconduct of serious nature and, therefore, it agreed with the argument of Management that it was not in the interest of Management and industrial peace to retain such a person in service who was guilty of creating indiscipline in the factory which affects the production of the factory adversely.. .. Hence, the Labour Court held the dismissal of the workman from service from 8.3.76 by the Management as justified, proper and lawful and the concerned workman was held to be not entitled to receive any benefit or relief. However, the High Court, as stated earlier, interfered with the factual and categorical findings of the Labour Court and ordered reinstatement with back wages and other benefits. In our opinion, the High Court while exercising powers under writ jurisdiction cannot deal with aspects like whether the quantum of punishment meted out by the Management to a workman for a particular misconduct is sufficient or not. This apart, the High Court while exercising powers under the writ jurisdiction cannot interfere with the factual findings of the Labour Court which are based on appreciation of facts adduced before it by leading evidence. In our opinion, the High Court has gravely erred.. the High Court is not right in interfering with the well considered order passed by the Labour Court confirming the order of dismissal.[30] (para 11) (Italics supplied).

In Bangalore Hospital, seven workmen were dismissed for going on an illegal strike causing serious hardships to patients. The labour court, having recorded a finding that the workmen resorted to an illegal strike, nevertheless ordered reinstatement on the ground that no untoward incident happened due to the strike. Quashing the order of the labour court, the Karnataka High Court held that merely because no untoward incident happened, the dismissal could not be held to be disproportionate.[31] Once it is found that the workman was guilty of inciting other workmen to stage an illegal strike, the award of the labour court that the said workman was not entitled to any relief does not call for interference by the High Court.[32] Where the workman was dismissed for instigating and forcing his fellow workmen to go on an illegal strike, the labour court, in the first instance did not record any finding on the merits of the case. On a direction issued by the High Court to give its finding on merits, the labour court held that the dismissal was not justified and accordingly directed reinstatement with 50 per cent back wages. Dealing with the matter in a writ petition filed by the management, Marlapalle J of the Bombay High Court, while quashing the award, castigated the labour court for proceeding with misplaced sympathy and passing a perverse award. The learned judge further observed that it was necessary for the adjudicator to set out reasons before interfering with the punishment ordered by the employer.[33]

In UB Gadhe, the facts disclosed that the management charge-sheeted a few workmen on some 12 counts and dismissed them, after enquiry, for leading and instigating their fellow workers to resort to an illegal strike in a public utility service, which continued for about 5-6 months. The labour court directed their reinstatement but without back wages. The High Court quashed the order of the labour court. Upholding the order of the High Court, Pasayat J (for self and Panta J) of the Supreme Court, observed:

> Power and discretion conferred under the Section needless to say have to be exercised judicially and judiciously. The Court exercising such power and finding the misconduct to have been proved has to first advert to the question of necessity or desirability to interfere with the punishment imposed and if the employer does not justify the same on the circumstances, thereafter to consider the relief that can be granted. There must be compelling reason to vary the punishment and it should not be done in a casual manner.[34]

(viii) Go-slow

Slow-down or go-slow, whether as a concerted action by the workmen or by an individual workman, in reducing production is a breach of duty and has been condemned as misconduct in Industrial adjudication. An employee who deliberately works slowly and thereby curtails production or does not complete a job in proper time, is guilty of intentional omission of duty, which would constitute misconduct. In the words of Das Gupta J:

> 'Go-slow' which is a picturesque description of deliberate delaying of production by workmen pretending to be engaged in the factory is one of the most pernicious practices that discontented or disgruntled workmen some time resort to. It would not be far wrong to call this dishonest. For, while thus delaying production and thereby reducing the output, the workmen claim to have remained employed and thus be entitled to full wages. Apart from this also, 'go-slow' is likely to be much more harmful than total cessation of work by strike. For, while during a strike much of the machinery can be fully turned off, during the 'go-slow' the machinery is kept going on a reduced speed which is often extremely damaging to machinery parts. For all these reasons 'go-slow' has always been considered a serious type of misconduct.[35]

In SU Motors, the Supreme Court held that the misconduct of 'go-slow', being of a serious nature would expose the guilty workman to the consequences of dismissal from service. By its very nature, the proof of 'go-slow' particularly when it is disputed involves into various aspects such as nature of the process of production, the stages of production and their relative importance, the role of the workers engaged at each stage of production, the pre-production activities and the facilities for production and the activities of the workmen connected therewith and their effect on production, the factors bearing on the average production etc. The 'go-slow', may be further indulged in by an individual workman, either in one section or different sections or in one shift or both the shifts affecting the output in varying degrees and to different extent depending upon the nature of the product and the productive process. Furthermore, even where it is admitted, in some cases, there may be difficulties in determining the 'go-slow' or approximate loss on account of the 'go-slow', as it may have repercussions on production even after the 'go-slow' ceases which may be difficult to estimate. Sawant J, observed:

> There cannot be two opinions that 'go-slow' is a serious misconduct being a covert and a more damaging breach of the contract of employment. It is an insidious method of undermining discipline and at the same time a crude device to defy the norms of work. It has been roundly condemned as an Industrial action and has not been recognised as a legitimate weapon of the workmen to redress their grievances.[36]

'Go-slow' is not like an ordinary strike, which has been recognised as a lawful weapon under certain circumstances. It has also been made a misconduct under the Model Standing Orders, and it is generally included in the Standing Orders of Industrial establishments as an act of misconduct liable to disciplinary action. Workers are under an obligation to procure average production and if they deliberately refuse to give that average, they must be held guilty of the misconduct of 'go-slow'.[37] In other words, 'go-slow' is not a legitimate weapon in the armoury of labour in the process of collective bargaining.[38] In Sasa Musa Sugar Works, Wanchoo J observed that 'go-slow' has always been considered as a serious type of misconduct. The misconduct of 'go-slow' may entail two-fold consequences, viz, discharge or dismissal from service and deduction of wages. In either case, it is necessary that the factum of 'go-slow' and/or extent of the loss of production on account of it is disputed, there should be a proper inquiry on the charges which furnish particulars of the 'go-slow' and the loss of production on that account. The principles of natural justice require it, and whether they have been followed or not, will depend on the facts of each case. The question of deduction of wages is not as simple as in the case of strike where measure of pro rata deduction from wages may provide a fair and just remedy, the extent of deduction of wages on account of 'go-slow' action may in some cases raise a complex question. Therefore, the simplistic method of deducting uniform percentage of wages from the wages of all workmen calculated on the basis of the percentage fall in production compared to the normal or average production may not always by equitable.[39] On the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the learned judge directed that the employer will not deduct more than 5 per cent of the wages of the workmen for the month in which the workmen indulged in 'go-slow'.

(ix) Gherao

The expression gherao in its etymological sense means 'to encircle', but in the field of Industrial relations, it has acquired 'a connotation and meaning' which is entirely new. It is comparatively a new form of demonstration which is being largely resorted to by labour in this country. The meaning of the word gherao and its Industrial implications have been discussed by a special Bench of five judges of the Calcutta High Court in Jay Engineering Works, in which Sinha CJ, observed:

> ...we might now define the word 'gherao' as a physical blockade of a target, either by encirclement or forceable occupation. The 'target' may be a place or a person or persons, usually the managerial or supervisory staff of an Industrial establishment. The blockade may be complete or partial and is invariably accompanied by wrongful restraint, and/or wrongful confinement, and occasionally accompanied by assault, criminal trespass, mischief to person and property, unlawful assembly and various other criminal offences. Some of the offences complained of are cruel and inhuman, like confinement in a small space without lights or fans, and for long periods without food or communication with the outside world. The persons confined are beaten, humiliated by abuse and not allowed even to answer calls of nature and subjected to various other forms of torture, and are completely at the mercy of the besiegers. The object is to compel those who control industry to submit to the demands of the workers, without recourse to the machinery provided for by law and in wanton disregard of it. In short to achieve their object, not by peaceful means, but by violence.[40]

In Krishnakali Tea Estate, the events disclosed that certain workers came in a mob on the night of 12th-13th of October 1980 to the bungalow of Manager of the Tea Estate, armed with lethal weapons such as lathis, bows and arrows and axes and they gheraoed the Manager and others and by threat demanded bonus at the rate of 20% as against 8.33% offered by the management. The gherao according to the management continued till 3.00 A.M. on 13 October 1980. On being informed, the police, Bilasipara, arrived at the estate, but the mob consisting of the workmen became violent and damaged the bungalow and other property of the estate. During the wrongful confinement of the manager, he was compelled to sign a document, agreeing to pay 20% bonus. On the basis of above allegations, a domestic enquiry was instituted against the concerned workmen and after the enquiry, on the report of the Enquiry Officer, the workmen concerned were dismissed from service. Several events took place post their dismissal including criminal trial and acquittal of the workmen therein. The labour court, based on the material produced before it, upheld the dismissal. A single judge of Gauhati High Court quashed the award and directed reinstatement of the workers, which order was upheld by the Division Bench. Quashing the orders of the High Court and restoring the award of the labour court, Hegde J (for self, Sinha and Mathur JJ) of the Supreme Court, held:

> From the above, it is seen that the approach and the objectives of the criminal proceedings and the disciplinary proceedings are altogether distinct and different. The observations therein indicate that the Labour Court is not bound by the findings of the criminal court.. . the Tribunal has come to the conclusion that the concerned workmen had participated in the gherao armed with deadly weapons and caused damage to the property of the Estate and wrongfully confined the Manager and others for nearly 8 hrs. Therefore, it found all those workmen who took part in the said incident guilty of the misconduct.. .. This leaves us to consider whether the punishment of dismissal awarded to the concerned workmen dehors the allegation of extortion is disproportionate to the misconduct proved against them. From the evidence proved, we find the concerned workmen entered the estate armed with deadly weapons with a view to gherao the Manager and others in that process they caused damage to the property of the estate and wrongfully confined the Manager and others from 8.30 p.m. on 12th of October to 3 a.m. on the next day. These charges, in our opinion, are grave enough to attract the punishment of dismissal even without the aid of the allegation of extortion. The fact that the Management entered into settlement with some of the workmen who were also found guilty of the charge would not, in any manner, reduce the gravity of the misconduct in regard to the workmen concerned in this appeal because these workmen did not agree with the settlement which others are agreed instead chose to question the punishment.. .. For the reasons stated above, this appeal succeeds. The orders of the High Court are set aside that of the Labour Court is restored.[41]

In Onkar Nath Misra, the workman was dismissed after conducting enquiry for the misconduct of gheraoing the senior officers for long hours and inflicting injuries on one of them during the gherao. Hegde J (for self, BP Singh and SB Sinha JJ) of the Supreme Court, held that it was improper for the labour court to interfere with the order of dismissal.[42]

Misconduct Relating to Discipline

The word 'discipline' has been defined in Webster's Third New International Dictionary to mean—'behaviour in accordance with the rules (as of an organisation)', —'Orderly conduct'—'a rule or system of rules governing conduct or action'—'a body of laws relating to conduct'—'an orderly or regular pattern of behaviour'. The word 'disciplinary', inter alia, has been defined to mean 'relating to discipline'. Discipline in one form or the other is an element of all organised activity. Its function is to maintain order by setting limits to individual behaviour which may jeopardise the interests of the organised establishment. The law of work discipline has three aspects:

> There are first of all the sanctions imposed, external to the employment relationship, by the law of social security upon employees > seeking some social security benefit in cases where they have been guilty of conduct which social security law seeks to deter or penalise. Secondly, there may be civil or criminal remedies available to the employer in the courts and tribunals as a means of disciplining the work force. Such remedies may arise out of the contract of employment itself, as in the case of a claim for damages against an employee who acts in breach of his contract ...Thirdly, there are the disciplinary rules imposed by employers inside the employment relationship.[43]

It is this third aspect of work discipline with which the Industrial adjudication or Industrial law is concerned. In Industrial service, the norms of behaviour not only prescribed by the contract of service or the Standing Orders, but also expected a workman to conform to the regular pattern of behaviour, working in an organised cross-section of the society i.e., industry, is generally known as Industrial discipline. The action taken by the Industrial employer to enforce such discipline in his establishment by censuring or punishing an employee by dismissing him or otherwise, for acts of wrong behaviour-misconduct, is popularly known as 'disciplinary action'. Industrial discipline is necessary for the well-ordered conduct of the Industrial activity. Apart from the productivity of the industry, discipline is essential for the workers themselves and, in fact, for the entire nation which depends upon the productivity of the Industrial activity in the country. Unfair and wrongful discharge or dismissal of Industrial workmen as a measure of disciplinary action is one of the major causes of Industrial disputes. Industrial adjudication has infused a great degree of legalism into the Industrial employment, though the employers have always regarded the right of disciplinary action as a concomitant to the efficient attainment of the objectives of Industrial activity. On the other hand, the workers and their unions have tended to regard protection from arbitrary or unjustified disciplinary action as one of the most important functions of the trade union activity. Large scale Industrial strife is apt to disturb Industrial peace and harmony and affect not only the production of particular plants or industries, but may also have an adverse effect even on the national economy. The following acts particularly pertain to the discipline in a factory or office: (i) Disobedience and/or Insubordination; (ii) Acts subversive of Discipline; (iii) Riotous or Disorderly Behaviour; and (iv) Damage to Property or Reputation.

(i) Disobedience and/or Insubordination

The word 'insubordination' means unwillingness to submit to authority; disobedience to orders; infraction of rules, or generally disaffected attitude towards authority.[44] The word 'disobedience' means refusal to obey or negligence in obeying a command; violation or disregard of a rule or prohibition. For instance, where an employer orders an employee that he should disclose the names of the members of superior staff who were in fault, it is the duty of the workman to comply with the order and his refusal to comply with the order will constitute the misconduct of disobedience.[45] The Concise Oxford Dictionary gives the meaning of 'insubordinate' as 'disobedient, rebellious'. The two meanings given by the dictionary do not mean that only a rebellious conduct would amount to insubordination but even disobedient conduct would amount to insubordination. The Random House Dictionary gives the meaning of 'insubordination' as 'not submitting to authority; disobedient, one who is insubordinate'. These meanings would indicate that any person who is 'disobedient' becomes 'insubordinate' and his conduct amounts to 'insubordination'. Therefore, where a workman disobeys a lawful order, he can be said to be guilty of 'insubordination' and it need hardly be stated that a misconduct of disobedience and insubordination would also amount to indiscipline. In American Words and Phrases, the word 'insubordination' has been defined to mean 'insubordination in a civil service implies intentional, wilful disobedience. Insubordination can be rightly charged against a police officer only upon refusal to obey some order which a superior officer is entitled to give and have it obeyed. Insubordination of employee imports wilful disregard of express or implied direction and refusal to obey reasonable orders, and when established, warrants his discharge.'[46] An employee must obey all lawful orders given to him by his employer. Whether an order is lawful or not depends first upon whether the terms of the contract enable the employer to give such an order, and secondly, in the absence of any express provision, upon the character of the employment'.[47] It is the duty of the workman to comply with the lawful order of the employer because obedience of superior officers and loyalty to the management are inherent in the jural relationship of master and servant and they need not be prescribed.[48]

There is no doubt that an employee however old and senior in service has no right to defy the orders of his superiors whatever his grievance in that behalf.[49] A subordinate officer is, therefore, duty bound to obey the lawful order of a superior officer. The concept of obedience is implicit in the fact that officer receiving the order is subordinate to the officer giving the order and a lawful order has to be obeyed, unless there is good justification for not complying with such a lawful order. It is this conduct of declining to obey an order which not only results in disobedience but the conduct of workman would also amount to insubordination.[50]Though the concept of insubordination or disobedience do considerably overlap, they have also certain distinguishing features. For instance, deliberate refusal to obey the orders of the authority will also constitute insubordination but the negligence in obeying the order will be an act of disobedience though it may fall within the connotation of the expression 'insubordination'. Likewise, the expression 'insubordination' would include defiance of persons in authority which may also fall within the connotation of disobedience, but it would also include disorderly and riotous conduct which makes it impossible for the higher officers to discharge their duties properly and such conduct may not be strictly disobedience of their order.[51] Even when a workman is an active member or offce bearer of a union representing the workmen in an Industrial establishment, he is primarily an employee of the establishment. It is therefore, his duty to answer all reasonable queries addressed to him by the management relating to his work. The fact that he is an office bearer of a trade union does not confer immunity upon him from the performance of his duty and he cannot be allowed to adopt a truculent attitude merely because of his holding the capacity of an office bearer of the union. Persistent refusal by a workman to answer the queries addressed to him from his superiors would amount to insubordination and breach of discipline and if the charge of such insubordination is proved, the workman would be liable to disciplinary action.[52] Wilful insubordination or disobedience of the employer's orders, has therefore, been treated as a serious misconduct in industrial law.[53] Such insubordination or disobedience, whether alone or in combination with any other, of a lawful or reasonable order of a superior, constitutes misconduct which may justify dismissal of the delinquent employee.[54] However, 'the refusal to obey an order which does not properly relate to the character or capacity of the service for which the workman is employed,[55] or an order contrary to the contract of service,[56] would not constitute disobedience or insubordination. Hence, the refusal of a workman to do the work which he is not obliged to do, would not constitute disobedience or insubordination.[57]

Similarly, the impossibility, illegality or ambiguity of the orders or mistake in the orders would be valid defence against the charge of insubordination or disobedience of orders. For instance, refusal to obey an order, which involves a reasonable apprehension of danger to the life or person of the workman or is an unlawful order which the workman is justified in refusing to obey, would not justify dismissal for misconduct of insubordination or disobedience.[58] Similarly, the refusal to work on new equipment requiring intensive practical training for its operation would not constitute an act of insubordination or disobedience.[59] And the refusal of the employee to give in writing about certain events too would not constitute the misconduct of insubordination.[60] In Calcutta Jute (supra), it was held that though the cases of 'disobedience' and 'insubordination' may considerably overlap in certain cases, 'insubordination' and 'disobedience' would constitute different categories of misconduct. In the instant case, the facts disclosed that the Standing Orders of the company contemplated two types of misconduct: one, 'wilful insubordination' and other, 'disobedience of any lawful and reasonable orders' of a superior. On a proper construction of the Standing Orders, the Supreme Court held that 'insubordination' was not the same thing as 'disobedience' of the order of an officer directly under whom the workmen charged with misconduct worked, as was obvious from the two separate heads of the misconduct. 'Insubordination' would include defiance of the person in authority whether such persons were direct superiors of the workman or not and this head of misconduct also would include a riotous conduct which made it impossible for the higher officers to discharge their duties properly. In connection with this misconduct, Sarkar J, observed, > it was clearly an implied rule of the factory that higher officers would not be thwarted and prevented from bringing to the notice of the management the wastefulness of the workman causing loss to the employer.[61]

In India Marine Service, the workman concerned was a clerk in the purchase department of the company and was working under a superior officer. The officer took away from the desk of the concerned workman, the purchase estimate book maintained by him for the purpose of checking the entries made by the workman therein. The workman, thereupon, got infuriated and abused the officer in the presence of the entire staff and threatened him with violence and even after the warning by the manager, the workman again repeated the threat to the superior officer. This conduct was held to be an act of grave insubordination warranting punishment of dismissal.[62] In Ananda Bazar Patrika, the militant attitude adopted by the workman that he would assign to himself his duties and would take no orders from his superiors, was held to be an act of insubordination and disobedience.[63] In Tractors India, refusal on the part of the workman to receive written orders of the employer was held to be an act of insubordination and a gross misconduct.[64] In Caltex, breach of prohibition to smoke while on duty in the vicinity of the place where an aircraft was being refuelled was held to be a misconduct of disobedience of orders and an act subversive of discipline.[65] In Laxmi Devi Sugar Mills, refusal by the workman, to answer the questions put to him during the course of a domestic inquiry, was held to be an act of insubordination in breach of discipline. The fact that the workman was an office bearer of the trade union would not confer any immunity on him to breach the discipline, as he had to realise that first and foremost he was an employee and owed duty to answer to all queries which were addressed to him.[66]

However, the question of signing a statement recorded during a domestic inquiry was held to be standing on a different footing and a workman giving evidence in the course of domestic inquiry might, if he chooses, sign the report, but he could not be compelled to do so and his refusal to sign the statement cannot be treated as a misconduct or disobedience of the lawful orders of his employer.[67] Refusal by the compositors in a newspaper office to do the work of 'joining' has been held to be a misconduct of willful disobedience and insubordination.[68] Refusal to disclose the names of the members of the superior staff who were in fault when required by the employer is a misconduct of disobedience.[69] Though the refusal to obey a lawful order of transfer constitutes willful disobedience and insubordination,[70] the refusal to obey an order of transfer contrary to the contract would not constitute disobedience or insubordination.[71] Disobedience of orders which are not enforceable under any rule cannot be the basis of discharge or dismissal.[72] The refusal of a workman to do a particular kind of new work given to him, which he is not accustomed to do and particularly when the refusal is on account of fear of doing the work wrongly rather than to willfully disobey the order, would not constitute the misconduct of willful disobedience warranting disciplinary action.[73] Giving evidence in an Industrial adjudication which may be disbelieved by the tribunal, cannot constitute misconduct of insubordination or disobedience.[74] Again, in the absence of rules, requiring a workman to appear before a particular doctor for medical examination, and the mere disobedience of the workman to appear before such a doctor would not lead to the inference that he was pretending to be sick.[75]

The refusal of a bus driver to ply an over-crowded bus was held to be justified in view of the provision of the Motor Vehicles Act.[76] A 'solitary and single instance' will not amount to insubordination and 'in order to prove insubordination of this nature, there should be strong, cogent, clear evidence of various instances that the employee was not only in habit of disobeying his superior, but it is his practice to behave towards them in an impertinent manner'. Then, only the charge of insubordination in question can be taken into consideration along with other instances of habitual misbehaviour, insolent, arrogant and impertinent manner.[77] In Sarabhai Chemicals, the Bombay High Court distinguished Vadivelu on facts and observed that the observations made therein could not be read as laying down a proposition that disciplinary proceedings for misconduct can never be taken against an employee on a charge of 'insubordination' arising out of a solitary instance of disobedience of a lawful order or in order for sustaining a charge of insubordination, there should be several and repeated instances of disobedience. In the circumstances of this case, the refusal of the workman to obey the orders requiring delivery of challans to be typed was an act of insubordination and gross indiscipline; hence the punishment of dismissal was justified.[78] In Banamali Palei, the Orissa High Court has upheld the validity of the dismissal of the workman from service for disobedience of the order of transfer made after affording adequate opportunity to participate in the inquiry.[79] It is for the management to establish by relevant evidence that a particular act will constitute misconduct. In the absence of such proof, the action based on such misconduct will not be sustainable. For instance, in Ram Bilash Goel, the employer did not elicit information from witnesses as to whether working beyond a particular time constituted overtime, and refusal to work after that time constituted misconduct. The failure to elicit this material information, therefore, resulted in error of law apparent on the face of the record vitiating the inquiry and the finding of misconduct.[80]

In Biecco Lawrie, the facts briefly were: The workman was appointed as general mazdoor in the switch gear works of the company and his duty, inter alia, was to bring materials from the shop rack to the working benches and afterwards to take them to their respective racks. On the 04 August 1984, a charge sheet was issued against the respondent on charges of major misconduct, namely, instigation, insubordination and using of abusive and filthy language against his superiors and dilatory tactics, which constitute major misdemeanor in terms of standing orders of the company. After enquiry, he was dismissed, which was affirmed by the industrial tribunal. On remand from the High Court, the tribunal heard the dispute again and passed an order holding that the dismissal was illegal and invalid, thus reversing its own earlier decision. The High Court, having dismissed the writ petition filed by the management, the matter landed in Supreme Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Tarun Chatterjee J (for self and Bedi J) of the Supreme Court, cited several decisions of Supreme Court covering this particular aspect, and made certain significant observations on the limits imposed on tribunals and High Courts on the power to interference with the punishment imposed by the employer, particularly, when it is not harsh and is based on proved misconduct thus:

> From a perusal of these observations, made in the aforesaid decisions of this Court as noted hereinabove, it is crystal clear that the general trend of judicial decisions is to minimize the interference when the punishment is not harsh and definitely for charges that are levelled against the respondent and in the instant matter, dismissal is absolutely not shocking to the conscience of the court.. .. The learned Single Judge also misused the power vested in him by remanding back the matter to the Industrial Tribunal for reconsideration when the charges were found to be proved. The Tribunal also erred in reversing its own decision on the same evidence for which we fail to see as to how the same Forum can appreciate the same evidence differently. The arguments advanced by the respondent that there was violation of the principles of natural justice does not stand true and if it does it was duly redressed by the fresh inquiry conducted by the Tribunal after its order dated 9th of October, 1990.. .. The argument that the work assigned to the respondent was not a part of his job, even if accepted does not entitle him to abuse his superiors and create an unhealthy atmosphere where the remaining might just take a clue from the unruly behaviour and subsequently use it to the detriment of the company. Further the letter by which he accepted all the charges sets up a strong proof against the respondent beyond which nothing remains to be analyzed.. .. In view of our discussions made hereinabove, we are of the view that the impugned judgment and order of the Division Bench of the High Court as well as of the learned Single Judge are liable to be set aside and the order of dismissal passed against the respondent herein must be restored.[81]

The above observations of the learned judge put the records straight in the context of unabated disturbing awards of trial courts, and even more irresponsible and reckless decisions of several High Courts in cases involving grave acts of indiscipline. These dysfunctional trends on the part of labour courts, tribunals and the High Courts deserve to be squarely condemned in the strongest possible language and terms.

(ii) Acts Subversive of Discipline

The dictionary meaning of the word 'subversive' is 'tending to subvert' 'having a tendency to overthrow, upset, or destroy'.[82]The acts subversive of discipline are such acts as tend to subvert discipline or have tendency to overthrow, upset or destroy discipline in an establishment. 'An act subversive of discipline is far different from an act of indiscipline on the part of a particular workman, and the expression 'act subversive of discipline' has got a wider impact and connotation, in that the act must be capable of having an impact on or of impairing the discipline of the Industrial establishment as a whole'.[83] Broadly speaking, all acts which tend to destroy discipline would tantamount to 'acts subversive of discipline' which may include misconduct relating to duty, negligence, going on illegal strikes, go-slow, insubordination and disobedience of orders, riotous and disorderly behaviour etc. but most of these acts of misconduct constitute separate heads of misconduct by themselves and are treated as such in the Model Standing Order or the Standing Orders of particular Industrial establishments. The expression 'acts subversive of discipline' in the Standing Orders is generally used in a narrower sense, viz, such acts of workmen, which have the tendency or effect to disturb the peace and good order have, generally been regarded as acts subversive of discipline.[84] Though, it would be difficult to lay down any general rule as to what acts are subversive of discipline amongst the employees, generally speaking; rowdy conduct in the course of working hours; misbehaviour committed even outside working hours but within the precincts of the concern and directed towards the employees of the said concern; the conduct proved against an employee which would render him not worthy of employment, may constitute acts subversive of discipline tantamounting to misconduct. However, whether an act subversive of discipline constituting misconduct will depend upon the circumstances of each case.[85] The following acts have been treated as acts subversive of discipline:

(a) writing a letter to the director of the company containing offensive remarks against him,[86]

(b) behaviour insulting and insubordinate to such a degree as to be incompatible with the continuance of the relation of employer and employee,[87]

(c) abusing a superior officer by using vulgar and filthy language[88] and use of immoderate language,[89]

(d) preferring a false complaint to police against a superior officer knowing it to be false with a view to bringing the management into humiliation,[90]

(e) the act of wrongfully restraining and confining the manager by workmen with a view to making him concede to their demands,[91]

(f) preventing a superior officer from discharging his duties towards the management,[92]

(g) sleeping in office while on duty,[93]

(h) rowdy conduct in the course of working hours, or in some cases, even outside the working hours but within the precincts of the concern and directed towards the employees of the concern[94] and

(i) constructing a pacca structure in the labour quarters contrary to the directions of the management and subsequent refusal to dismantle the same in disobedience to the order of the management.[95]

In Rama Kant Misra, the Supreme Court held that an act of adopting threatening posture though would amount to 'riotous or disorderly behaviour' it would not amount to an act 'subversive of discipline'; 'indiscreet, improper, abusive language may show lack of culture but merely the use of such language on one occasion unconnected with any subsequent positive action and not preceded by any blame-worthy conduct may be an act of misconduct subversive of discipline, but it may not warrant the extreme penalty of dismissal.[1] In Bharat Fritz Werner, the court held that the misconduct involving acts of threatening the highest executive, viz, the president of the company with dire consequences, wrongly confining him in his room and compelling him to withdraw a notice, constituted acts subversive of discipline on the part of the workmen.[2] In Ram Kishan, the court again emphasised:

> When abusive language is used by anybody against a superior, it must be understood in the environment in which that person is situated and the circumstances surrounding the event that led to the use of the abusive language. No strait-jacket formula could be evolved in adjudging whether the abusive language in the given circumstances would warrant dismissal from service. Each case has to be considered on its own facts.[3]

In Syed Khader Mohiuddin, the use of intemperate language used by the delinquent in his explanation to the charge-sheet was held to be an act of misconduct but the extreme penalty for the misconduct was held to be unwarranted.[4] In Nanabhai Parmar, a single judge of Gujarat High Court upheld the award of the labour court setting aside the order of dismissal and ordering reinstatement without backwages.[5]It is legitimate for workmen to demand the removal of a particular person from a particular post in an establishment on the basis that there are circumstances warranting his removal from that post. Pursuant to this demand, if a workman makes a speech at a meeting held by the union criticising the attitude of an officer and exhorts the workmen to agitate for his removal or passes a resolution demanding his removal, such action would not amount to misconduct or insubordination nor would it be an act subversive of discipline[6] but it would be an act of gross misconduct to make a speech at a meeting of workmen which is inflammatory and tends to undermine the discipline of the workmen or incite them to violence or breach of peace.[7] In New Shorrock Mills, the facts were: a badli workman entered the office of the Deputy Manager and started abusing him and threatened that the mill officers will not be safe outside the mill and that he did not care if he had to go to jail for murder of four to five officers. A charge-sheet was issued and after conducting enquiry, the management, instead of dismissing, took a lenient view and discharged him from service. The labour court passed an order dated 22 June 1980 and, inter alia, held as follows:

(a) That the charge against the respondent was neither vague nor unclear:

(b) That the finding of the Departmental Enquiry was legal and proper;

(c) That the order of discharge was not passed by way of victimisation;

(d) That the Departmental Enquiry had been conducted legally and properly and the respondent was offered reasonable opportunity of hearing;

(e) That in passing the order of discharge, the appellant management had not acted outside the scope of the enquiry;

(f) That the respondent workman had seriously misbehaved with his superior officers and was thus guilty of misconduct;

(g) That the finding of misconduct reached in the enquiry was neither perverse nor baseless but was proved on the basis of evidence on record.

Having held that the disciplinary action was foolproof, the labour court surprisingly ordered reinstatement on the ground that the discharge from service was disproportionate. In appeal, quashing the order of labour court to the extent of reinstatement, Kirpal J (for self and Verma J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> It appears to us that the Labour Court completely misdirected itself in ordering the respondent's reinstatement with forty per cent back wages. The Labour Court was exercising jurisdiction under Section 78 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946. It had the jurisdiction, inter alia, to decide the disputes regarding the propriety and legality of an order passed by an employer acting or purporting to act under the Standing Orders. The Labour Court, in the present case, having come to the conclusion that the finding of the departmental inquiry was legal, and proper, respondent's order of discharge was not by way of victimisation and that the respondent workman had seriously misbehaved and was thus guilty of misconduct, ought not to have interfered with the punishment which was awarded, in the manner it did. This is not a case where the court could come to the conclusion that the punishment which was awarded was shockingly disproportionate to the employee's conduct and his past record. The Labour Court completely overlooked the fact that even prior to the incident in question the respondent had misconducted himself on several occasions and had been punished. According to the appellant there were at least three other instances where the respondent had misconducted himself and that he had failed to improve his conduct despite his assurances from time to time. Another aspect which was overlooked by the Labour Court was that on the finding of the Inquiry officer that the respondent had misbehaved with his superior officer and was guilty of misconduct, the appellant could have dismissed the respondent from service. The appellant chose not to do so. Instead it passed on order of discharging the respondent from service. Lesser punishment having been given by the management itself there was, in our opinion, no justifiable reason for the Labour Court to have set aside the punishment so awarded. We are unable to accept that the punishment imposed by the management was in any way disproportionate to warrant interference by the Labour Court. The direction of the Labour Court ordering reinstatement of the respondent with forty per cent back wages was clearly unwarranted.[8] (Italics supplied)

In Mahindra & Mahindra, Hegde J (for self, Chatterjee and Balasubramanian JJ) of the Supreme Court observed:

> It is no doubt true that after introduction of Section 11-A in the Industrial Disputes Act, certain amount of discretion is vested with the Labour Court/Industrial Tribunal in interfering with the quantum of punishment awarded by the management where the workman concerned is found guilty of misconduct. The said area of discretion has been very well defined by the various judgments > of this Court referred to hereinabove and it is certainly not unlimited as has been observed by the Division Bench of the High Court. The discretion which can be exercised under Section 11-A is available only on the existence of certain factors like punishment being disproportionate to the gravity of misconduct so as to disturb the conscience of the Court, or the existence of any mitigating circumstances which require the reduction of the sentence, or the past conduct of the workman which may persuade the Labour Court to reduce the punishment. In the absence of any such factor existing, the Labour Court cannot by way of sympathy alone exercise the power under Section 11-A of the Act and reduce the punishment. As noticed hereinabove at least in two of the cases cited before us i.e. Orissa Cement Ltd. and New Shorrock Mills, this Court held : "Punishment of dismissal for using of abusive language cannot be held to be disproportionate." In this case all the forums below have held that the language used by the workman was filthy. We too are of the opinion that the language used by the workman is such that it cannot be tolerated by any civilised society. Use of such abusive language against a superior officer, that too not once but twice, in the presence of his subordinates cannot be termed to be an indiscipline calling for lesser punishment in the absence of any extenuating fact or referred to hereinabove.[9]

The act or omission, however, resulting from the disobedience, must have some connection with the affairs of the establishment in that one of the consequences of such act or omission would be to affect the smooth relationship between the labour and management or between the groups of workmen or be generally subversive of discipline or disturb the peace in the establishment.[10]If the act complained of does not relate to the discipline in the employer's establishment, for instance, a private quarrel between an employee of an establishment and another citizen, outside the factory premises, would not fall within the category of misconduct tantamounting to an act 'subversive of discipline,[11]but if the act relates to or subverts the discipline in the establishment even though committed outside, the act would be subversive of the discipline of the establishment. This point is illustrated in the decision of the Supreme Court in Mulchandani, in which the relevant Standing Order provided that 'commission of any act subversive of discipline or good behaviour within the premises or precincts of the establishment' would constitute misconduct. The labour court took the view that alleged assault was not covered by the Standing Order as it had taken place in a railway train outside the premises or precincts of the establishment. Disagreeing with this view, the Supreme Court observed that on a plain reading of the clause the words 'within the premises or precincts of the establishment' referred not to the place where the act, which is subversive of discipline or good-behaviour, is committed but where the consequence of such act manifests itself. The act wherever committed, if it has the effect of subverting the discipline or good-behaviour within the premises or precincts of the establishment, will amount to an act of misconduct subversive of discipline.[12] In Hindustan Aeronautics, the relevant standing order made 'gambling and money-lending or doing another private business within the company's premises, a punishable act of misconduct. It was contended that it was only 'money-lending' inside the company's premises and not receiving money already lent outside the premises and, hence, the charge under the Standing Order was not sustainable. Repelling the contention of the workman, the learned judge held that the act of paying money as loan to any other person as also collecting repayment, both fell within the expression 'money-lending'. Since, admittedly, the workman had collected the repayment within the factory premises, it constituted a misconduct within the meaning of the Standing Order. The court rejected the further contention on behalf of the workmen that in order to constitute misconduct, 'money-lending' should be done as a regular business, and held that even a single transaction of money-lending would amount to misconduct.[13]However, the misappropriation of funds or fabrication of accounts of a society, by an employee of a company, which had no financial interest in the society even though it provided certain amenities to the society, was held not to be an act subversive of discipline against the management of the company.[14]

(iii) Riotous and Disorderly Behaviour

Riotous and disorderly behaviour is one of the heads of misconduct under the Model Standing Orders in Sch 1 to the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Rules, 1946 framed under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946. The Standing Orders framed by the Industrial employers with respect to their establishments also generally include 'riotous and disorderly behaviour' committed on the premises of the establishment or in the vicinity thereof during the working hours or otherwise as a misconduct. The expression 'riotous and disorderly behaviour' is very wide in its scope. It covers acts of committing nuisance on one hand and the acts of assault and riots on the other. Fighting, assaulting, abusing, drunkenness, etc, on the premises of an establishment during duty hours are some of common instances of riotous or disorderly behaviour'.[15] In the absence of Standing Orders, it would be open to the employer to consider reasonably what conduct can be properly treated as misconduct and it is difficult to lay down, any general rule in respect of this problem. Acts which are subversive of discipline being of riotous and disorderly nature amongst the employees would constitute misconduct. Rowdy conduct in the course of working hours would constitute misconduct; misbehaviour even outside working hours within the precincts of a concern and directed towards an employee of that concern may, in certain cases, constitute misconduct, if the conduct proved against the employee is of such a character that he would not be regarded as worthy of employment, it may in certain circumstances, be liable to be called misconduct. What constitutes the misconduct or 'riotous or disorderly behaviour' would depend on the circumstances of each case. When there are Standing Orders, there would be no difficulty because they generally define the misconduct but in the absence of Standing Orders, the question will have to be dealt with reasonably and in accordance with common sense. [16] If the superior officers are assaulted by the workmen, it would be impossible for them to discharge their duties properly.[17] Participating in an assault on an officer of the employer or his manager would constitute misconduct of riotous or disorderly character for which the punishment of discharge or dismissal may be warranted.[18] Likewise, raising of provocative and abusive slogans in the premises of the workshop would constitute misconduct of riotous and disorderly behaviour.[19]

Howsoever wide the scope of the expressions used in a particular Standing Order making riotous or disorderly behaviour as a head of misconduct, it must be shown that such behaviour has some rational connection with the employment of the assailant or the victim.[20]Generally, the Standing Orders make 'riotous or disorderly behaviour' committed during office hours in the premises of the establishment as misconduct. In such cases, whether a particular act of 'riotous and disorderly behaviour' would fall within the ambit of the Standing Orders, will depend on the construction of the order. However, in certain cases, particularly where there are no Standing Orders, acts of 'riotous and disorderly behaviour' committed even beyond the working hours and outside the premises of the establishment may also constitute misconduct provided that there is a rational connection of the act with the employment of the assailant and the victim. Even under the pristine law of master and servant, a delinquent workman could not escape the consequences of his misconduct for the only reason that it was committed outside the working premises. For instance, a workman who carries the money of his master to the bank situated outside the factory premises and misappropriates it while outside the boundaries of the factory premises, cannot be heard to say that there was no misconduct at all as the act attributed against him was just outside the factory gate. On the other hand, there can be extreme cases where some act totally unconnected with the employer-employee relationship, but amounting to one of the offences as provided by statutory provisions such as drunken brawl, may not be appropriately constituted as an Industrial misconduct. Actions encroaching into the area of crimes may expose the employee to the process of ordinary criminal law though it may not appropriately fall in the disciplinary jurisdiction of an industry. In between, there may be many cases falling in the grey area where the contours are hazy and consequently, rendering the decision difficult.[21]Therefore, whether any such act will constitute misconduct justifying disciplinary action would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[22]

What constitutes establishment or its vicinity would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. In Central India Coalfields, the workman was dismissed for the misconduct of 'drunkenness fighting, riotous or disorderly or indecent behaviour in the quarters of the workers attached to a colliery. Though the Industrial tribunal found the workman guilty of the misconduct in terms of the relevant Standing Order, it set aside the order of dismissal in view of the fact that the misconduct had taken place outside the colliery premises where he was discharging his duties and also beyond the working hours. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that normally the Standing Order would apply to the behaviour on the premises where the workman discharged their duties and during the hours of their work and if the quarrel took place between workmen beyond the working hours and away from the colliery premises, that would be a private matter which may not fall within the relevant Standing Order. However, in view of the fact that the incident took place in the quarters at a short distance from the colliery and the fact that the conduct of the workman clearly amounted both to drunkenness and riotous and disorderly behaviour, the court upheld the dismissal and set aside the award of the tribunal.[23] On the other hand, in Agnani, the Supreme Court upheld the award of the tribunal setting aside the dismissal of the workman for having indulged in abusive and vulgar language and creating a riotous scene in a provision store in the colony of the tribune trust. The court observed that it was plain from the language of the Standing Order which provided that if an employee causes or threatens to cause mental and/or physical pain or injury to other employees in the trust's estate, it would be an act of misconduct entailing dismissal and that the misconduct proved against the workman did not fall under the Standing Order because the owner of the provision store was not an employee of the tribune. Speaking for the court, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> It may, however, be relevant to observe that it would be imprudent and unreasonable on the part of the employer to attempt to improve the moral or ethical tone of his employees, conduct in relation to strangers not employed in his concern by the use of the coercive process of disciplinary jurisdiction.[24]

In Tata Oil Mills, though the court reiterated that it would be unreasonable to include within the relevant Standing Order any riotous behaviour 'outside the factory' which was the result of a purely private and individual dispute, it evolved the rule to bring certain acts of misconduct of riotous and disorderly behaviour within the ambit of the relevant Standing Order, that the management should show that the disorderly or riotous behaviour had some 'rational connection' with the employment of the assailant and the victim. In this case, two workmen were dismissed for the misconduct of way-laying and assaulting the charge-man of the soap plant of the company's factory at Tatapuram while he was returning home after his duty in the second shift. The court held that it was quite clear that the assault committed by the delinquent workman was not a purely private or individual matter as it was committed because the assaulted workman was supporting the plan of the company for more production. The assault, therefore, was committed with the motive to terrorise the workman against supporting the company's incentive plant for more production, and so was an act subversive of discipline.[25] In Mulchandani, the relevant Standing Order provided that the commission of any 'act subversive of discipline or good behaviour within the premises or precincts of the establishment would constitute an act of misconduct. In this case, the delinquent workman was dismissed from service for assaulting his superior officer in the train on his way from the factory to his house after the day's work. On behalf of the workman, it was contended before the Supreme Court that the alleged assault having taken place in the train which was obviously outside the 'premises or precincts' of the establishment was not covered by the relevant Standing Order. The Supreme Court held that on a plain reading, the expression 'within the premises or precincts of the establishment' refers not to the place where the act subversive of discipline of good behaviour is committed but where the consequence of such an act manifests itself. In other words, an act wherever committed, if it has the effect of subverting discipline or good behaviour within the precincts of the establishment, will amount to misconduct. The court rejected the contention that the Standing Order leaves out of its scope an act committed outside though it may result in subversion of discipline or good behaviour within the premises or precincts of the establishment in question as such a construction would be quite unreasonable.[26]

In Glaxo Laboratories, Desai J took a diametrically opposite view from the one taken by it in Tata Oil Mills case and Mulchandani's case. The facts of these cases are more or less similar to this case. In this case, the court set aside the dismissal of the delinquent workman who was dismissed for manhandling some other workmen of the company in a bus chartered by the employer company for the use of the workmen commuting between the factory and the city. The relevant Standing Order of the company, inter alia, made the commission of such acts 'committed within the premises or precincts of the establishment' as misconduct entailing dismissal. In the first instance, the court has sought to draw a distinction between the language of the Standing Order in Mulchandani's case which uses the expression 'within the premises or precincts of the establishment' and that of the Standing Order in Glaxo Laboratories, which uses the expression 'within the premises of the establishment or in the vicinity thereof'. The distinction, if any, is as between tweedledee and tweedledum. Then, the court, ignored the principles laid down in the earlier dicta and has sought to rest its holding on the principle of strict construction of penal statutes observing that in that case, the court had to put a 'wide construction on a penal measure but did not choose to set out its reasons for departing from the well-established principle that penal statutes generally receive a strict construction'. Justice Desai observed:

> The employer has hardly any extra territorial jurisdiction. He is not the custodian of general law and order situation nor the Guru or mentor of his workman for their well regulated cultural advancement. If the power to regulate the behaviour of the workmen outside the duty hours and at any place wherever they may be was conferred upon the employer, contract of service may be reduced to contract of slavery. [27]

Then, with a view to make it 'abundantly clear and incontrovertible' and in order to avoid any ambiguity being raised in future and a controversial interpretation question being raised, the court stated the principle that 'the casual connection in order to provide linkage between the alleged act of misconduct and employment must be real and substantial, immediate and proximate and not remote and tenuous'. The principle stated by the court is ambivalent. Its application to the fact-situation of the case is far from being correct. This decision does not lay down correct law. The consensus of judicial dicta has been correctly summed up by the court in Mulchandani. Glaxo case is in direct conflict with Mulchandani. The consequences of Glaxo may be that any officer or worker of an employer can by way-laid, man-handled, assaulted and even murdered by the disgruntled workmen with impunity as soon as he goes out of the premises, precincts or vicinity of the establishment. It is with a view to avoid situations like this that Mulchandani's case had correctly adumbrated the principle that the expression 'within the premises or precincts of the establishment' refers not only to the actual place where the act of misconduct is committed but also to the place where the consequences of such an act manifests itself. In Kalyani Steel, the Bombay High Court rejected the contention on behalf of the workman that the Glaxo Laboratories case overruled Mulchandani, therefore to fall within the ambit of the relevant Standing Order, the act subversive of discipline must necessarily be committed within the premises of the establishment, and observed that there was no conflict between the two judgments of the Supreme Court and that a proper reading of Glaxo case, would show that the ratio in the case of Mulchandani was emphatically reiterated.[28] A similar view has been taken by the Kerala High Court in BPL Systems.[29]

Where it was established that the workmen concerned formed themselves into an unlawful assembly, armed with deadly weapons, assaulted managing staff, the sole fact that the General Manager, even after suffering head injury caused by a lathi, did not die could not be said to be a mitigating circumstance justifying the reduction of the punishment of dismissal. Assault of such a nature is gross misconduct and in the given situation demoralises managing officials. The order of the tribunal substituting the order of dismissal with stoppage of one increment, and directing reinstatement without backwages is untenable and is liable to be set aside.[30] In a case involving riotous and disorderly behaviour, wherein the enquiry officer had, after appreciating evidence available on record, come to the conclusion that the charges were proved, the labour court set aside the order of dismissal on the ground that the enquiry officer had not examined independent witnesses. The High Court too upheld the order of the labour court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, the Supreme Court Ashok Bhan J held that the labour court fell into a factual and legal error in setting aside the findings recorded by the domestic tribunal and so also the High Court, and restored the dismissal ordered by the employer.[31] In T Sreekantan, the facts were: the respondent workman, who was working as a typist-cum-clerk in the petitioner-bank, behaved in a riotous, disorderly and indecent manner towards a co-worker and threatened him of dire consequences including to his life in the presence of higher officials, colleagues and customers. He was charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed after conducting domestic enquiry. The labour court, while recording a finding that the disciplinary action was in order and that the misconduct alleged and proved against the workman was a major misconduct, reduced the punishment on the ground that dismissal was 'shockingly disproportionate'. Quashing the order of the labour court and restoring the dismissal ordered by the bank, Ramachandra Menon J, of the Kerala High Court observed:

> It is true that the power under Section 11-A enables the Labour Court or Industrial Tribunal to vary, alter or modify the punishment imposed by the Management even after sustaining the validity of the enquiry, if the punishment imposed is shockingly disproportionate. Referring to the scope of judicial review exercisable by the High Court, it has been made clear by the Apex Court on many an occasion that such power shall not be read and misunderstood as a power of appeal and that, it is exercisable only when the course adopted by the Management would not have been pursued by any person of reasonable prudence and conscience so as to make it 'shockingly disproportionate'.. .. It has been observed in paragraph No.10 [of the award] that that the charge was for 'major misconduct' and that the disciplinary authority is definitely justified in imposing a 'major punishment'. On the next breath, the second respondent states that the misconduct in the present case cannot however be termed as a grave one as there was no misappropriation of money or fraud, which shows that the second respondent is having some misconceived idea that unless and until a misconduct involving misappropriation of funds or any fraud is involved, nobody can be inflicted with the punishment of dismissal.. .. The specific circumstance for interference contemplated under Section 11-A of the Act is that the punishment should be 'shockingly disproportionate'; i.e., it should evoke some sense of 'shock' to the conscience in relation to the gravity of the proven misconduct. Considering the same, no such inference could be drawn in view of the observation of the second respondent in the previous sentence that the charge was for 'major misconduct' and that the disciplinary authority was definitely justified in imposing major punishment. The second respondent also arrived at a finding that the conduct on the part of the worker made him to be sent out from the service and that he was no longer liable to be continued in the service of the Bank. It is after justifying the said extent of the finding arrived at by the Management, that the second respondent sought to substitute the punishment of 'dismissal' with that of 'discharge' with all superannuation benefits; thus enabling the worker to simply go away with all service benefits including pension. The course pursued by the second respondent [labour court, here] appears to be rather puerile by extending misplaced sympathy which cannot be held as correct or sustainable.. .[32]

In Madhavsinh Solanki, the brief facts were: a daily wager was dismissed after conducting enquiry for a misconduct involving unruly behaviour, interrupting enquiry proceedings, burning official documents, etc. The labour court ordered reinstatement despite recording a finding that the disciplinary action was in order. Setting aside the order of labour court, Sahai J (for self and Shah J) of the Gujarat High Court observed that while exercising jurisdiction, the labour court could not act as an appellate body, and that the discretion exercised by it should be judicious and not whimsical. The learned judge further held that past record of service could not be a ground to condone serious misconduct of the kind that was established in the case.[33] Where the charge-sheet did not disclose that the workman used filthy language against the superior, but only mention that he used inappropriate language, the punishment of dismissal was disproportionate to the misconduct.[34]

(iv) Damage to Property and Reputation

Willful damage to the employer's property, goods or reputation is therefore, usually made misconduct under the Standing Orders of Industrial establishments. The word 'willful' means 'deliberate', 'full of desire to see one's own wishes or plans fulfilled'. The conduct of a workman, in handling his employer's property which indicates that he is unfit for a position of trust and confidence may justify the employer in dismissing him.[35]Hence, a willful act is such an act as is done for a purpose. It is done intentionally and not by accident. It is deliberately done; so compulsion, ignorance or accident is not an excuse.[36] If, therefore, an employee either deliberately or negligently damages the employer's property or reputation, he will expose himself to disciplinary action for the misconduct. Deliberate infliction of harm or damage to the employer's business with the intent to cause him loss is also known by the name of 'sabotage', which is included in the list of misconducts in the Standing Orders. It may consist of deliberately disrupting the production by tampering with or damaging machinery or turning off electric current required for operation of the plant and machinery though a break-down in machinery may by itself not prove that the operator is guilty of sabotage.[37]Deliberate spoiling of products to cause harm is also sabotage. Likewise, deliberate disturbance in supply of power to the works by switching off electric power during the working hours without permission or order of a superior is a misconduct of sabotage deserving the punishment of dismissal unless the act is shown to have been done due to an error of judgment.[38] The order of a superior to switch off power or error of judgment in doing so would be a good defence to the charge of damage to property on account of switching off the electrical power. Making grave allegations against his employer which are false and which the workman knows to be false or when he gives evidence against the employer which he knows to be untrue,[39] will be damage to the reputation of the employer.

The fact that the workman is an office bearer of the union of workers does not give him any immunity, as an office-bearer of the union gets no better or higher right than its constituents.[40] However, in such cases the employer has to establish that the false charges were intentionally made and false evidence was intentionally given by the workman and the mere fact that the evidence given by the employee has not been accepted by the authority is not a good ground for taking disciplinary action against him.[41] Imputing dishonesty or misuse of public funds by the management of a public concern amounts to misconduct of subversion and damage to the reputation of the employer.[42] In Hindustan GEC, the facts were: the workman made a complaint in writing to the police that the assistant manager and the labour welfare officer of the company along with others had broken open the lock of the room of a worker and thrown away his belongings when he was actually on duty. After making investigations, the police reported that the workman had deliberately brought a false complaint and consequently the complaint was dismissed by the sub-divisional officer. The management dismissed the workman from service after finding him guilty of the act subversive of discipline in making serious and defamatory allegations against the officers of the company, who had been put to great harassment and humiliation at the investigation by the police. The dismissal was upheld as there was no justification for the workman to complain against the officers company's officers. It was further held that the workman's action was subversive of discipline in undermining the authority of the officers and thereby affecting the maintenance of peace and good order in that factory.[43]

Misconduct Relating to Morality

'Morality' means particular moral principles or rules of conduct, good and uprighteous behaviour and conduct conforming to customs or accepted standard of a particular culture or group.[44] Any behaviour of an Industrial employee which does not conform to good and uprighteous conduct of a human being or the customs and accepted standards of a civilised society, such as justice, honesty, modesty etc, may, apart from being a criminal offence, constitute an act of Industrial misconduct. Acts involving moral turpitude are such acts which involve grave infringement of moral sentiments of the community or are acts of base vileness and depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to fellowmen for a society in general, contrary to the accepted customary rule or right and duty between man and man. Devotion to duty is faithful service which requires confirmation to the moral principles. Modern approaches to life have changed many ideals which used to be held sacred and such approaches have also worked a change in our sense of the sublime but even then, the idea of right and wrong has not been forgotten and the difference between honesty and dishonesty, fidelity and unfaithfulness has not been wholly lost. Considerations of expediency may be irresistible at times but their evils may have merely to be put up with and not to be extolled or prescribed as standards of life and work.[45] A term will be implied in every contract of Industrial employment that the employee will serve honestly and faithfully. This duty may be amplified and extended by express agreement. However, it would be imprudent and unreasonable on the part of the employer to attempt to improve the moral or ethical tone of his employee's conduct in relation to strangers not employed in his concern by use of the coercive process of disciplinary jurisdiction.[46]In other words, the act complained of must have some rational connection or bearing on the contract of employment between the employer and the employee.

In Industrial law, the acts of theft, fraud and dishonesty, have been treated as acts of misconduct justifying dismissal apart from being exposed to the penal liability under criminal law.[47] The Model Standing Orders include 'an act or conduct inconsistent or incompatible with due or faithful discharge of his duty to the master and an 'act of conduct of the employee so grossly immoral that all reasonable men may say that he cannot be trusted' in the scope of the expression 'misconduct'. The Standing Orders of Industrial employers also make such acts and conduct as 'misconduct' by including them in their Standing Orders. There is, however, a distinction between such acts committed by an employee towards his employer and towards others. In the former case, the misconduct will justify the disciplinary action of dismissal or discharge of a workman by his employer, but in the latter case, a further consideration arises, whether the act is committed towards an utter stranger or towards other persons employed by the employer. Criminal law makes special provisions for dealing with delinquent servants who steal or embezzle the property of the employer or commit fraudulent or dishonest acts, such as criminal breach of trust, misappropriation, falsification of accounts, etc. Some of the acts which will constitute misconduct against morality have been discussed under the following sub-heads:

(i) Theft

The acts of theft, fraud and dishonesty committed towards utter strangers may not make a workman guilty of Industrial misconduct unless he is convicted by a criminal court in which case the employer will have the justification to dismiss him on the basis of the conviction itself, but in a case, where such an act is committed by a workman against his co-employees, the employer may have the justification of treating it as an act of misconduct and discharge or dismiss him from service for loss of confidence. In Kushal Bhan,[48] the dismissal of a workman for stealing a bicycle of a co-workman was held justified. The offence of theft, committed by an employee, shows that he is dishonest and his suitability and reliability to continue in service may be affected by that reason and will have a bearing on the contract of service. It will therefore be good ground for dismissing him from service.[49] It may, however, be noted that in inflicting the punishment for the misconduct of theft, the nature of the theft is an important factor. In cases of minor or trifling acts of theft, the punishment of dismissal from service may be unwarranted and unsustainable. For instance, in P Orr & Sons, the workman was dismissed for theft of an empty oil tin worth thirty paise only. The employee had put in 24 years of service with no warning or black-mark. The dismissal was set aside as the punishment was held to be too harsh and shockingly disproportionate having regard to the nature of the offence.[50] On the other hand, in Ruston & Hornsby, the Supreme Court held that even an attempt to steal the employer's property on the part of the workman who was a watchman was a serious charge and deserved nothing short of the dismissal and the labour court was not justified in interfering with the punishment in the circumstances of the case.[51] Likewise, the Calcutta High Court in Wimco Sramik Union, held that the order of dismissal passed against the workman for the proved misconduct of theft of the property valued at Rs 150 was not unjustified as to warrant interference by tribunal under s 11A of the Act. It was observed that the offence of theft which was committed by the employee concerned showed that he was dishonest and his suitability and reliability to continue in service might be affected by that reason and would have a bearing on his contract of service and as such, the said offence was a good ground for dismissing other workman from service. The fact that the workman had rendered a long period of unblemished service and property stolen was worth Rs 150 did not justify lesser punishment. Furthermore, an attempt to steal the employer's property by the workman was a serious charge and deserved nothing short of dismissal. If he was allowed to get away with lesser punishment, it would be very difficult for the employer to maintain discipline in the organisation. After finding that the inquiry was fair and proper, there is no justification for interference with the order of dismissal.[52]

(ii) Dishonesty and Fraud

Section 24 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 —'Code' in short) lays down the definition of the term 'Dishonestly' as 'whoever does anything with the intention of causing a wrongful gain to one person or wrongful loss to another person is said to do that thing 'dishonestly''. Section 25 of the Code lays down the definition of the term 'fraudulently' as 'person is said to do a thing fraudulently if he does that thing with the intent to defraud but not otherwise.' 'Dishonesty' and 'fraud' have distinct meanings in law in contradistinction to their meanings in the ordinary parlance. Dishonesty requires an intention to cause wrongful loss or wrongful gain of property, but it does not require deception or concealment as a constituent element. On the other hand, fraud does not require an intention to cause a wrongful loss or wrongful gain to somebody as there can be fraud even where there is no intention to cause pecuniary loss or damage to the person deceived. Fraud, however, does require concealment or deception. The element of deception is an essential ingredient of fraud and it is not necessary for dishonesty. In the words of Subba Rao J:

> ...the expression 'defraud' involves two elements, namely, deceit and injury to the person deceived. Injury is something other than economic loss, ie, deprivation of property, whether movable or immovable, or of money and it will include any harm whatever caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or such others. In short, it is a non-economic or non-pecuniary loss. A benefit or advantage to the deceiver will almost always cause loss or detriment to the deceived. Even in those rare cases where there is a benefit or advantage to the deceiver, but no corresponding loss to the deceived, the second condition is satisfied. [53]

Dishonesty by lying idle is as much a misconduct as making any record or document which intentionally makes a false statement. For instance, the case of making false entries in the official records, certifying receipt of more than what has, in fact, been received or certifying receipt of goods which never were received at all, will constitute acts of dishonesty or fraud. To forge or present a forged document, therefore, would also fall in this category of misconduct. For instance, making an alteration or change in a document or paper so that it no longer reflects the truth, will constitute an act of fraud or dishonesty. Likewise, malingering i.e, obtaining leave on false pretence of being ill, will constitute a misconduct. Any other fraud, such as attempt to obtain wages for work done by others or wages for the period for which the employee did not work at all, would constitute misconduct under this head. To obtain the employer's property through a false statement would also constitute an act of fraud warranting disciplinary action irrespective of the fact that such conduct is sufficient to amount to a criminal—offence or not. Likewise, obtaining money through false book entries, a false travelling allowance report, a wage taken for a fictitious worker or a receipt in the name of a fictitious person, would constitute fraudulent acts warranting disciplinary action of dismissal. Intentional retention of the money of an employer by a workman which does not belong to him even for a temporary period will tantamount to misappropriation of such money.[54] Acts of dishonesty or fraud constitute misconduct of a serious nature warranting the penalty of dismissal.[55] It is, therefore, a grave misconduct on the part of the employee holding responsible position whose duty is to supervise over the work of the others to deliberately allow an outsider to impersonate as a permanent workman on the rolls of the employer and claim the benefit to which a permanent workman is entitled.[56]

To warrant the punishment of dismissal, the act must be of a grave nature as casual or minor acts which may technically constitute fraud or dishonesty will not warrant severe punishment. Furthermore, such acts must have a rational connection with the employment of the employee with his employer. The acts of theft or dishonesty which have no relation with employment of the employee with his employer or which relate to outsiders, will generally not constitute misconduct for the purposes of Industrial discipline as an employer is not the general custodian of the morals of his employees.[57] In a case where a bus conductor was dismissed from service for possessing an amount of Rs. 93/- in excess of the sale of tickets, which was proved in the course of enquiry, the labour court set aside the order on the ground that the evidence of passengers in the bus was not adduced and their statements not recorded to verify matter of either non-issuance of tickets or issuance of tickets of lesser denomination, a single judge and the Division Bench of Karnataka High Court upheld the award of the labour court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Hegde J (for self and Sinha J) of the Supreme Court, held that the interference with the order of dismissal was erroneous.[58] In Hoti Lal, the facts disclosed that a conductor was dismissed for carrying ticketless passengers and was also found in possession of old and used tickets. A division Bench had set aside the termination on the ground that the amount involved was only Rs. 16/- and the loss suffered by the state was not heavy. Quashing the order of the Division Bench, Pasayat J (for self and Patil J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> It is not only the amount involved but the mental set up, the type of duty performed and similar relevant circumstances which go into the decision-making process while considering whether the punishment is proportionate or disproportionate. If the charged employee holds a position of trust where honesty and integrity are inbuilt requirements of functioning, it would not be proper to deal with the matter leniently. Misconduct in such cases has to be dealt with iron hands. Where the person deals with public money or is engaged in financial transactions or acts in a fiduciary capacity, highest degree of integrity and trust-worthiness is must and unexceptionable. Judged in that background, conclusions of the Division Bench of the High Court do not appear to be proper. We set aside the same and restore order of learned single Judge upholding order of dismissal.[59]

In Bank of India, an employee obtained employment in a public sector bank by furnishing a false caste certificate claiming that he belonged to a Scheduled Caste. The High Court, in exercise of its writ jurisdiction, ordered his reinstatement on the ground that the proceedings for the verification of caste certificate were not initiated within a reasonable period. Quashing the order of the High Court, the Supreme Court held:

> The order of termination does not suffer from any infirmity and the High Court should not have interfered with it. By giving protection for even a limited period, the result would be that a person who has a legitimate claim shall be deprived of the benefits. On the other hand, a person who has obtained it by illegitimate means would continue to enjoy it notwithstanding the clear finding that he does not even have a shadow of right even to be considered for appointment.[60] (para 13)

In V Ramana, where the facts disclosed that the bus conductor was guilty of professional misconduct in so far as he did not issue tickets to the passengers at the boarding point nor did he collect the fare at the alighting point, and was further guilty of not maintaining the records of tickets and fare, the order of dismissal could not be said to be disproportionate and the action of management did not call for interference.[61] In a case where the services of a bank employee of Regional Rural Bank were terminated on ground that he had unauthorisedly withdrawn amount from bank, the High Court without recording any reason as to how and why it found that the punishment shockingly disproportionate, ordered reinstatement of the workman. In its order, it was found that there was no discussion on this aspect. Quashing the order of the High Court, Pasayat J, of the Supreme Court held that the very discipline of an organization more particularly a bank is dependent upon each of its officers and officers acting and operating within their allotted sphere. Acting beyond one's authority is by itself a breach of discipline and is a misconduct. The charges against the employee were not casual in nature and were serious. These aspects do not appear to have been kept in view by the High Court. Mere expression that the punishment is shockingly disproportionate would not meet the requirement of law. Even in respect of administrative orders.[62] In Pallappa Rao, the workman was charge-sheeted for accepting illegal gratification of Rs 950/- and cheating a consumer, and was dismissed after conducting enquiry. The labour court directed his reinstatement. Quashing the order of the labour court, NV Ramana J, of AP High Court observed that the charge against the workman was serious reflecting moral turpitude and that the labour court did not assign any reason to show how the dismissal ordered by the employer was disproportionate. The learned judge further observed that the discretion of labour court to interfere with the punishment, though wide, cannot be exercised arbitrarily or fancifully.[63] In Suresh R Bhokare, the employee was charge-sheeted for fraudulently obtaining recommendation for appointment from social welfare department and was dismissed. The labour court upheld the dismissal, which order was reversed by industrial court in a revision petition filed by the workman. The writ petition filed by the management having been dismissed, the matter landed in the Supreme Court. On the basis of the conclusions reached by the industrial court to the effect that, in the show cause notice, no basis was laid to show what was the nature of fraud that was being attributed to the workman; that no particulars of the alleged fraud were given; and that the said pleadings did not even contain any allegation as to how the appellant was responsible for sending the so called fraudulent proposal or what role did he play in such proposal being sent, the Supreme Court restored the order of the industrial court and High Court directing reinstatement of the workman.[64] In Bharat Heavy Electricals, a workman, having mortgaged the title deeds of his property with the employer as a security, fraudulently took away the same and attempted to sell the mortgaged property. In the course of the enquiry, the workman attempted to justify the removal of the documents by producing fabricated documents. After enquiry, the workman was dismissed. The labour court, as is the usual practice with most of them, gave an irresponsible verdict to the effect that the punishment was harsh in view of the fact that his past record was clean and, on this view of the matter, directed reinstatement. Both the tiers of High Court approved the decision of the labour court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Hegde J (for self and Sinha J) of the Supreme Court held:

> .. . the reasons given by the Labour Court to reduce the penalty are reasons which are not sufficient for the purpose of reducing the sentence by using its discretionary power. The fact that the misconduct now alleged is the first misconduct again is no ground to condone the misconduct. On the facts of this case as recorded by the Labour Court the loss of confidence is imminent, no finding has been given by the courts below including Labour Court that either the fact of loss of confidence or the quantum of punishment is so harsh as to be vindictive or shockingly disproportionate. Without such finding based on records interference with the award of punishment in a domestic inquiry is impermissible. (para26). .. For the reasons stated above the appeals succeed. The impugned orders to the extent they direct the reinstatement of the respondent is set aside. The order of dismissal of the respondent made by the appellant pursuant to the inquiry is upheld.[65] (para 27).

In H Amaresh, the respondent-workman was employed as a conductor. He was found to be under influence of alcohol while on duty, apart from not issuing tickets to the passengers and indulging in misappropriation of the money of the corporation. He was charge-sheeted and finally dismissed after holding disciplinary enquiry. The misconduct of pilferage was also proved. The labour court taking a lenient view of the misconduct, including pilferage on the ground that the amount pilfered was petty, directed reinstatement with back wages. Having lost the case at both the tiers of the High Court, the Corporation approached the Supreme Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Lakshmanan J (for self and Panta J) of the Supreme Court held:

> In our view, even short remittance amounts to misconduct and, therefore, applying the rulings of this Court, the impugned order ought not to have been passed by the Division Bench ordering reinstatement. We, therefore, have no hesitation to set aside the order passed by the learned Judges of the Division Bench and restore the order of dismissal of the respondent from service. It is stated that pursuant to the order of the Labour Court the respondent was reinstated in service. Since there was no stay granted by this Court the respondent had continued in service of the Corporation. In view of the law laid down by this Court and of the facts and circumstances of this case, the respondent, in our opinion, has no legal right to continue in service any further. We, therefore, direct the appellant-Corporation to immediately discharge the respondent from service. However, we make it clear that the salary paid to the respondent and other emoluments during this period shall not be recovered from the respondent. We also make it further clear that in view of the order of dismissal the respondent shall not be entitled to any further emoluments.. .. For the foregoing reasons, we allow the appeal filed by the appellant-Corporation and set aside the orders passed by the Labour Court, learned single Judge and also of the Division Bench as perverse and are against the proved facts and circumstances of the case.[66] (Paras 23 & 24)

Although the charges in a departmental proceedings are not required to be proved like in a criminal trial i.e., beyond all reasonable doubts, we cannot lose sight of the fact that the Enquiry Officer performs a quasi-judicial function, who upon analysing the documents must arrive at a conclusion that there had been a preponderance of probability to prove the charges on the basis of materials on record. While doing so, he cannot take into consideration any irrelevant fact. He cannot refuse to consider the relevant facts. He cannot shift the burden of proof. He cannot reject the relevant testimony of the witnesses only on the basis of surmises and conjectures. He cannot enquire into the allegations with which the delinquent officer had not been charged with.[67] In APSRTC, the facts were: an employee of the Corporation was found involved in committing theft of property of the Corporation. The employee admitted his guilt. The act of theft, being a serious misconduct, there was nothing wrong in the Corporation losing confidence in such an employee and the awarding punishment of removal from service. The labour court too held that the removal from service was proper after taking into consideration entire facts and circumstances of case. The AP High Court took a sympathetic view and ordered reinstatement with continuity of service, after considering the past services of workman. Quashing the order of the High Court, the Supreme Court held that the interference of the High Court with the order of labour court was improper and observed that past conduct of workman is not relevant in departmental proceedings.[68] In Roop Singh Negi, quashing the dismissal, Sinha J (for self and Joseph J) of the Supreme Court held that suspicion, however high may be, can under no circumstances be held to be a substitute for legal proof. The materials brought on record pointing out the guilt are required to be proved. A decision must be arrived at on some evidence, which is legally admissible. The provisions of the Evidence

Act may not be applicable in a departmental proceeding but the principles of natural justice are. As the report of the Enquiry Officer was based on mere ipse dixit as also surmises and conjectures, the same could not have been sustained. The inferences drawn by the Enquiry Officer apparently were not supported by any evidence. If the Enquiry Officer had relied upon the confession made by the appellant, there was no reason as to why the order of discharge passed by the Criminal Court on the basis of self-same evidence should not have been taken into consideration. Since the orders passed by the disciplinary authority and appellate authority have severe civil consequences, appropriate reasons should be assigned.[69]

In Chauhan Vajesinh, the facts disclosed that a conductor was dismissed, after enquiry, for not issuing tickets to 8 passengers though he had collected the fare from them, Rathod J of Gujarat High Court observed that the order passed by the tribunal upholding dismissal need no interference in a writ proceeding. The learned judge discountenanced the contention of the workman that the passengers were not examined in the domestic enquiry, and held that in a case involving dishonesty and misappropriation, dismissal was the only punishment which could be imposed on the workman.[70] Where the witnesses deposed that the delinquent workman had confessed to the commission of theft, and the delinquent workman did not cross-examine the witnesses coupled with the further fact that the no plea was raised by the workman that the said confession was made by him under duress, it is improper for the labour court to interfere with the findings of the Inquiry Officer. The order of the labour court directing reinstatement is liable to be set aside.[71] In Sarva UP Gramin Bank, the Supreme Court held that the punishment imposed, reducing the salary of the employee in six stages permanently, cannot be said to be disproportionate to the gravity of the charges proved against the respondent. The charges related to the conduct of the respondent in a financial institution whereby, taking advantage of the official position, he attempted to procure unlawful pecuniary benefits for himself. The charges related to misappropriation, fraud and irregularities with regard to the maintenance of accounts. He had been siphoning off money belonging to the account holders. He was holding a position of trust in the Bank, which he betrayed. The court further took notice of the fact that that the Bank had already been sympathetic and lenient enough.[72]

(iii) Disloyalty

One of the basic requirements of what an employer would expect to be satisfied from an employee is loyalty towards him. In other words, the employee is expected to promote the employer's interest in connection with which he has been employed and a necessary implication which must be engrafted on such a contract is that the servant undertook to serve his master with 'good faith' and 'fidelity'.[73] The acts of making defamatory and false statements against the employer would apart from being subversive of discipline, also constitute the misconduct of disloyalty towards the employer as the offence constitutes willful harm to the employer.[74] Likewise, to reveal an employer's confidential information to unauthorised persons, particularly when such persons are competitors or otherwise averse to the interests of the employer, who might use it against him, would constitute a misconduct of disloyalty warranting disciplinary action as such an act by its very nature would be dishonest. However, the loyalty that law expects of an employee is in connection with his employment. An employee is not, however, expected to be loyal to all whims, vagaries, creeds or ideologies of the employer because such things will have no connection with the contract of employment. The question whether a particular act of disloyalty constitutes misconduct would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.

(iv) Corruption

Accepting bribes or illegal gratifications is a criminal offence against government employees. Accepting such gratifications or bribes, by commercial or Industrial employees, though may not constitute a criminal offence, would constitute a misconduct, 'for gifts blind the eyes of the wise and change the words of the just'. The act of receiving bribes or illegal gratifications constitute a sale by the employee of the information or discretion confided in him by the employer for his benefit. Industrial employers, therefore, generally include acts of corruption, bribery and undue gratification as acts of misconduct in their Standing Orders. Demanding bribe, accepting bribe as well as giving bribe are all acts of misconduct.

(v) 'Moral Turpitude'

'Moral turpitude' is an expression which is used in legal as also societal parlance to describe conduct which is inherently base, vile, depraved or having any connection showing depravity.[75] In fact, in the modern world, there are innumerable offences for instance, relating to traffic rules, with which any person employed may become guilty of at any time. Such offences do not involve 'moral turpitude'. The expression 'moral turpitude' used in a statute, therefore, is not to receive the narrow construction. Wherever conduct of the delinquent is contrary to honesty or is opposed to good morals, or is unethical, it may safely be held that it involves 'moral turpitude,.[76] 'That is why the law-makers have carefully circumscribed the nature of the offence, the conviction therefore would have implication in the matter of employment and the only category of offences are those which invite shame on the person who became guilty, which shame will irradiate on the institution which employs'.[77]

The term 'moral turpitude' by its very nature is somewhat nebulous because it involves an examination of an action in the light of the prevailing moral norms. Unlike legal norms, moral norms are somewhat nebulous. They can vary from time to time, from society to society and even from individual to individual. It is possible that an act which may be violative of moral norms in one society, may be acceptable to another society. Therefore, in a given case, the act has to be judged in the light of what one considers to be prevailing moral norms of the society in which such an act has been committed. Hence, the act should not only be contrary to moral norms, it should also involve violation of the moral code in such a manner that it indicates baseness or depravity of character.[78] The Industrial employers generally include acts of moral turpitude in the list of misconducts warranting disciplinary action. The expression 'moral turpitude' implies depravity and wickedness of character or disposition of the person charged with the misconduct of moral turpitude.[79]Broadly speaking, acts of baseness, vileness or depravity in private or social duties which a man owes to his fellowmen or to the society in general, contrary to the accepted customary norms or right and duty between man and man, would constitute moral turpitude. The Allahabad High Court, has laid down the following tests for determining as to whether a particular act involves moral turpitude:

> (i) whether the act leading to a conviction was such as could shock the moral conscience of society in general,
>
> (ii) whether the motive which led to the act was a base one, and
>
> (iii) whether on account of the act having been committed the perpetrator could be considered to be of a depraved character or a person who was to be looked down upon by the society? [80]

As to whether a person has committed an offence involving moral turpitude; there are two ways of looking at the matter—one is of considering the nature of the act done and the other of considering the nature of the offence punished under the statutory provision.[81] The question whether a particular act involves 'moral turpitude' or not would depend upon its own facts and circumstances in which the offence was committed. In Pawan Kumar, the Government of Haryana while considering the question of rehabilitation of ex-convicts took a policy decision, accepting the recommendations of the Government of India that ex-convicts who were convicted for offences involving 'moral turpitude' should not be taken in government service. A list of offences involving 'moral turpitude' which was prepared for information and guidance of the authorities did not include the offence under s 294 IPC which deals with 'obscene acts and songs'. This section makes any person who does any obscene act in any public place or sings, recites or utters any obscene songs, ballad or words, in or near any public place, is liable to imprisonment for a term extending up to 3 months or with fine or with both. In this case, a fine of Rs 20 was imposed on the employee but from the records of the Chief Judicial Magistrate who had imposed the fine it was not discernible as to whether the conviction was validly or legally recorded. The Supreme Court, deprecated the action of the Government in having proceeded to adversely certify the character and antecedents of the employee on the basis of the conviction per se to the effect that he was guilty of an act involving 'moral turpitude'. Even assuming that the conviction was not open to challenge at that stage, the court held that the courts below had failed to see that the act complained of did not satisfy the tests laid down in the policy decision of the Government. Speaking for the court, Punchhi J expressed his anguish thus:

> We are rather unhappy to note that all the three courts below, even when invited to judge the matter in the said perspective, went on to hold that the act/acts involved in conviction under s 294 IPC per se established 'moral turpitude'. They should have been sensitive to the changing perspectives and concepts of morality to appreciate the effect of s 294 on today's society and its standards, and its changing view of obscenity. The matter unfortunately was dealt with casually at all levels.[82]

Not content with that, the learned judge suggested law reform to the Parliament to take immediate remedial measures in raising toleration limits with regard to petty offences especially when tried summarily and to make a provision that punishment of fine up to a certain limit, say upto Rs 2000/- or so, on a summary/ordinary conviction, shall not be treated as conviction at all for any purpose and all the more for entry into and retention in government service. This can brook no delay, whatsoever. One wonders whether the law officers of the Government have drawn the attention of the Parliament at all to this judicial recommendation. A person convicted for the offence of consuming liquor without a permit in violation of the Prohibition Act cannot be said to have been convicted of an offence involving moral turpitude.[83] the Kerala High Court, in Saseendran Nair, observed that the question whether the act of issuing a cheque without sufficient funds will involve element of 'moral turpitude' has to be considered de hors the element of cheating. Since, issuance of a cheque without sufficient funds is not an offence unless it falls under s 415, IPC and also not generally regarded as morally wrong or corrupt, it can be said that offence under s 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act 1881 will not normally involve moral turpitude.[84] In this view of law, the court held that the discharge order passed against the employees under s 10 of the Banking Regulation Act 1949 on the ground of conviction for offence of issuing cheque without sufficient funds in the account was improper. Similarly, the discharge of the workman, in Noor Ahmed, was held to be unjustified and invalid by a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court for the reason that it was not based on an offence involving moral turpitude. In this case, before entering the services of the bank, the workman had been convicted under s 304A of IPC which involves 'moral turpitude' and sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment but the sentence was suspended under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 and the sentence was not executed on account of good behaviour of the workman. This fact was suppressed by the workman in the declaration made by him at the time of entering into the service. The High Court held that since the sentence was not executed, the workman was not guilty of an offence involving moral turpitude.[85]The correctness of this decision is not free from doubt. The suppression of the information relating to his conviction under s 304A amounted to obtaining employment by a deceitful declaration. This was surely an act of misconduct involving moral turpitude. The fact that the sentence on conviction under s 304A was not executed under the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 was not a relevant consideration. In PGIMER v LC , the Punjab & Haryana High Court upheld the dismissal of a Chowkidar in the Lady Doctor's Hostel of PGI, Chandigarh, for the misconduct of creating nuisance under the influence of liquor by undressing himself at the canteen of the Lady Doctor's Hostel beyond the duty hours because an employee is required to possess better norms with regard to the morality and was expected not to behave in an unbecoming manner to the extent of vulgarity.[86]

PROCEDURE OF DISCIPLINARY ACTION

There is no procedure prescribed for disciplinary action, either in the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 or in the rules made thereunder, which should be complied with before inflicting disciplinary punishment upon an industrial employee. Neither the requirements of procedure which a trial court adopts nor the procedural safeguards crystallised under Art 311 of the Constitution of India can be said to be strictly binding on the employer for his taking disciplinary action against an industrial worker.[87]Nevertheless, the infusion of legal formalism into the law of work-discipline by industrial adjudication has made the industrial employers aware of the restriction of law on their common law right to 'hire and fire'. This has also encouraged the workmen to challenge any unlawful act on the part of an employer in imposing a disciplinary action. The rule that the case should be 'heard in a judicial spirit and in accordance with the principles of substantial justice',[88] has been infused as an essential concomitant of disciplinary procedure, even though there is no obligation to adopt the regular forms of legal procedure. In all cases of detrimental action taken against a worker for misconduct, the employer has to establish whether the action was taken for 'just and sufficient reasons'. An industrial worker is always entitled to question the propriety and justice of a punitive or detrimental action taken against him, in spite of any contract between the employer and the worker, or the worker's consent to suffer the said action.[89] In Sur Enamel, Das Gupta J, observed that an inquiry cannot be said to have been properly held unless:

(1) the employee proceeded against has been informed clearly of the charges levelled against him;

(2) the witnesses are examined—ordinarily in the presence of the employee—in respect of the charge;

(3) the employee is given a fair opportunity to cross-examine witnesses;

(4) he is given a fair opportunity to examine witnesses including himself in his defence if he so wishes on any relevant matter; and

(5) the inquiry officer records his findings with reasons for the same in his report. [90]

In Jai Bhagwan, the Supreme Court quashed the award of the tribunal which had upheld the termination of the service of the workman without giving him the charge-sheet or holding any inquiry against him.[91] But disciplinary proceedings can be commenced or continued only against an employee as long as he is in the service of the employer. For instance, after the retirement of the workman, there cannot be any disciplinary control over him. To allow employers to commence or continue disciplinary proceedings against an employee after his retirement, would be destructive of the principles of social and economic justice which the Constitution of India is designed to secure to all citizens. This will also be destructive of the concept of relationship of employer and employee which does not exist after retirement of the employee.[92]

Preliminary Inquiry

Before framing the charges, the disciplinary authorities occasionally make a preliminary investigation or fact-finding inquiry with a view to satisfy themselves whether any disciplinary action against the workman should be launched or not. Such investigations are also loosely called 'Preliminary Inquiries'. In such investigations there may be ex parte examination or investigation and ex parte reports but these investigations do not form a part of the procedure of the domestic inquiries. The depositions of the witnesses in such investigations, if any, or the reports of the investigators are meant merely for ascertaining whether there is any prima facie case justifying disciplinary proceedings. However, if the reports of the preliminary inquiry are used against the delinquent workman, they must be properly proved in the course of the domestic inquiry. In Shivabasappa (a case under Art 311), the Supreme Court held that if the deposition of a witness recorded in the absence of a public servant in the course of the preliminary investigation is taken on record of the departmental inquiry against such public servant and after supplying him with a copy of such deposition an opportunity is given to him to cross-examine the witness who affirms, the truth of his statement already recorded, in a general way, that would conform to the requirements of natural justice.[93] In Kesoram Cotton Wanchoo J, observed:

> The minimum that we shall expect where witnesses are not examined from the very beginning at the inquiry in the presence of the person charged is that the person charged should be given a copy of the statements made by the witnesses which are to be used at the inquiry well in advance before the inquiry begins and when we say that the copy of the statements should be given well in advance, we mean that it should be given at least two days before the inquiry is to begin.[94]

In Khardah & Co, Gajendragadkar J emphasized:

> unless there are compelling reasons to do so, the normal procedure should be followed and all evidence should be recorded in the presence of the workman who stands charged with the commission of acts constituting misconduct. [1]

Bhargava J, summed up the position thus:

> The evidence, as indicated in these cases, should consist of statements made in the presence of the workman charged. An exception was envisaged where the previous statement could be used after giving copies of that statement well in advance to the workman charged, but with the further qualification that the previous statement must be affirmed as truthful in a general way when the witness is actually examined in the presence of the workman. [2]

However, if the preliminary reports do not form part of the evidence before the inquiry officer and are not relied on for arriving at the findings of the domestic inquiry, it is not obligatory on the employer to disclose them and the omission to disclose them would not be a non observance of the rules of natural justice in the course of the domestic inquiry.[3] For the purpose of starting the inquiry, the law does not require that the delinquent workman has to be supplied with the copies of the reports made to the authorities or the management before the charge-sheet has been issued.[4] Another interesting facet of the preliminary inquiry was examined by the Supreme Court in Firestone, in which the workman complained that the domestic inquiry was held immediately after the preliminary investigation and without taking his explanation in such investigation and he was thus put at a disadvantage. Hidayatullah J, observed:

> ...although it may be desirable to call for such an explanation before serving a charge-sheet, there is no principle which compels such a course. The calling for an explanation can only be with a view to making an inquiry unnecessary, where the explanation is good, but in many cases it would be open to the criticism that the defence of the workman was being fished out. If after a preliminary inquiry, there is prima facie reason to think that the workman was at fault, a charge-sheet setting out the details of the allegations and the likely evidence may be issued without offending against any principle of justice and fair-play.[5]

In Atlas Copco, a single judge of the Bombay High Court observed:

> .. . it may be open to the employer to make discreet inquiries behind the back of the employee as regards various aspects of his mode of working in the company, but if any adverse order is to result from such inquiry, a due and necessary proceeding has got to be held in which the employee concerned has got to be given appropriate opportunity to defend himself.[6]

The law with respect to preliminary inquiries can be stated thus: If the employer makes preliminary inquiry or investigation for seeing a prima facie case in the allegations made against an industrial workman, it is not incumbent upon him to call for the explanation of the workman in such preliminary inquiry or before serving the charge-sheet. On the other hand, calling such an explanation in a preliminary inquiry stands the risk of criticism that the defence of the workman is being fished out. It may, however, be desirable to hold such a preliminary inquiry for seeing whether there is a prima facie reason to think that the workman is at fault. If as a result of such inquiry, the employer had reason to think that the workman is at fault, charge-sheet setting out the details of allegations and the likely evidence, without offending against any principles of justice and fair-play, may be served on-the workman but unless there are compelling reasons to do so, evidence recorded at the back of the workman in such a preliminary inquiry should not be used against him.

Charge-sheet

(i) Requirements of Charge-sheet

Charge-sheet is the charter of disciplinary action. The domestic inquiry commences with the service of the charge-sheet.[7] In other words, before proceeding with the domestic inquiry against an offending employee, he must be informed clearly, precisely and accurately of the charges levelled against him.[8] It is the duty of the employer to indicate to the delinquent employee not only the precise nature of the charges, but also the documents, if any, upon which the charges are based. This is all the more necessary where the charges are of a general nature and pertain to accounts maintained over a period of time.[9] The charge-sheet should specifically set out all charges which the workman is called upon to show-cause against and should also state all relevant particulars without which he cannot defend himself.[10] The object of this requirement is that the delinquent workman must know what he is charged with and have the amplest opportunity to meet the charge.[11] Fair hearing presupposes a precise and definite catalogue of charges, so that the person charged may understand and effectively meet them. If the charges are imprecise or indefinite, the person charged would not be able to understand them and defend himself, effectively, and the resulting inquiry would not be a fair and just inquiry.[12] The charge-sheet must be in writing and should not be vague.[13] After serving the charge-sheet, the delinquent workman should further be given sufficient opportunity enabling him to give a proper explanation and defend himself.[14] The employer cannot justify his action on any grounds other than those contained in the charge-sheet.[15] If the charges are vague and the workman has no opportunity to reply to them, and the particulars of such charges are also not disclosed to the workman, the inquiry will not be in conformity with the rules of natural justice.[16] Any amount of evidence led in the inquiry is no substitute for a charge-sheet clearly setting forth allegations, with sufficient precision, so as to enable the employee to defend himself. Any charge-sheet which fails to comply with this requirement of the principles of natural justice is no charge-sheet at all.[17]

Where the charge is quite clear even though the misconduct is not mentioned by a specific name, the order will not be invalid. For instance, where though the charge-sheet did not specifically use the words 'go-slow', the workmen understood the charge and the facts on record clearly showed that the charge against them was of 'go-slow' right from the beginning, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the tribunal ordering reinstatement, and held that the order of dismissal could not be interfered with merely because the words 'go-slow' were not mentioned in the charge-sheet.[18] A charge-sheet, however, is not expected to be a record of evidence. When it gives the necessary particulars of the misconduct alleged, it cannot be characterised imprecise. It is not necessary to give the statements recorded in the preliminary inquiry with the charge-sheet. Nor is it necessary to state in the charge-sheet, the particulars of the statements made by witnesses in a preliminary inquiry.[19] When the charge mentions specific instances giving such details as : (i) the time and place of occurrence; (ii) the names of the complainants; (iii) the acts alleged against the workman; and (iv) the statements of allegation on each count, the charge would not be defective.[20] For instance, where the precise abusive slogans were not incorporated in the charge, the charge was not held to be defective because the actual slogans would be a matter of evidence, which need not be incorporated in the charge. Some charges, such as the charge of behaving rudely, do not require specification of the words actually used. The rude behaviour can be inferred from the gestures, tone, actions as well as the use of various expressions.[21] In Remington Rand, the workman was dismissed from the service for having sold one repaired second hand typewriter to a customer in contravention of an undertaking given by him to the management that he would not sell any repaired typewriter to any customer for a period of one year; but since the charge referred only to the sale of the machine, and not to its repair, the action of dismissal was held to be unsustainable.[22]

In Burn & Co, the facts disclosed that no charge-sheet was formally drawn against the delinquent workman before dismissing him from service for an act of misconduct. In the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court held that this would not vitiate the order of dismissal as the workman knew what the charge against him was and had an opportunity of giving his explanation. However, this is an extreme view based on the peculiar facts of that case and cannot be treated as a general principle, in this case, a number of employees participated in an assault on the works manager and the company dismissed 14 of them including the concerned workman. From the record, it appeared that subsequent to the order of dismissal, there were conciliation proceedings and an inquiry by the labour minister as a result of which, he recommended the reinstatement of seven out of the 14 workmen who had been dismissed, leaving the order of dismissal in operation as regards the other seven. The LAT took the view that since no charge was framed against the concerned workman and no inquiry was held, the dismissal of the workman was in violation of the principles of natural justice. Quashing the award, the Supreme Court held that it would be idle for the workman to contend that he had been dismissed without hearing or inquiry.[23] The person signing the charge-sheet is not the accuser and does not make himself responsible for the truth of facts stated therein. The charge-sheet merely tells the workman what he is supposed or alleged to have done.[24] The mere fact that the charge-sheet was signed by a person who was not competent to dismiss the delinquent employee would not vitiate the inquiry and the punishment. In Indian Aluminum, the Karnataka High Court raised the following questions: (i) has the workman suffered any prejudice? (ii) was he in a position to understand the nature and scope of the charges? (iii) was he in a position to meet the charges and, therefore, was he in a position to furnish proper explanation, and held that, if the answer to these questions was in the affirmative, it could not be successfully contended that the initiation of disciplinary proceedings was bad. The court finally observed thus:

> The disciplinary inquiry is only for the purpose of establishing the guilt of a particular workman or the delinquent officer as the case may be. Beyond that there is no logic that the charge memo must be issued by the competent officer...it cannot be contended that the initiation of the disciplinary inquiry lead on ultimately to the order of dismissal and where, therefore, the foundation has not been properly laid, the edifice cannot remain. [25]

In Bharat Heavy Electricals, the charge sheet was neither signed by the competent person nor served by the employer, though it was subsequently approved by the competent authority. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that such approval would not mean compliance of the requirement of the relevant Standing Order regarding service of the charge sheet.[26] Normally, a reviewing court, cannot issue a writ to quash the memo of charge-sheet unless there is a total want of jurisdiction or the action is motivated by mala fide intention.[27] Disciplinary authority may drop certain charges or frame fresh charges, which, on a further consideration, might become appropriate or preferable to the charges originally framed.[28] The tribunal also cannot suggest what would have been proper charges but it is incumbent upon the tribunal to adjudicate on the basis of the charges as framed by the management.[29] Generally, the order of dismissal has always a reference to one or more charges against the workman. In a case, where no domestic inquiry has been held or the domestic inquiry has been found to be defective, the management would be entitled to adduce evidence in support of those charges. Even in a case where a valid domestic inquiry has been held in respect of certain charges, the tribunal has to confine itself to the charges levelled against the concerned workman both in the domestic inquiry and in the order imposing the penalty. However, where few charges are framed against the workman but the order imposing the penalty is based on certain other charges, the management was not justified in imposing penalty on the basis of those charges in respect of which the workman had no opportunity to defend himself. In such a case, it is open to the workman to contend before the tribunal that:

(i) the domestic inquiry conducted in respect of a few charges is vitiated on account of illegality committed in the conduct of the inquiry and also,

(ii) he is punished on the charges in respect of which no inquiry was held.

The tribunal has to confine itself to the charges levelled against the workman in the charge-sheet on the basis of which the penalty was imposed. It is not open to the management to level new charges against the workman before the tribunal which did not figure or form the basis of the order of punishment or did not figure in the domestic inquiry. Hence, the management-cannot be allowed to lead evidence on such new charges nor the tribunal has the jurisdiction to record findings on such new charges and justify the imposing of penalty. If the tribunal, comes to the conclusion on a preliminary issue that the domestic inquiry is invalid, it may hold an inquiry itself on the charges on which the penalty was imposed giving full opportunity to the management and the workman concerned. The charges, mentioned in the charge-sheet and also in the order of dismissal, do not cease to be charges merely because they were not investigated in the domestic inquiry. Such charges cannot be considered as new charges.[30]

(ii) Service

Normally, the Standing Orders of industrial establishments provide for the mode of service of notice of disciplinary proceedings in addition to postal communication. There are generally rules providing for service of the charge-sheet by affixing the same on the company's notice board. In G Mckenzie, the employer affixed the notice of inquiry against the concerned workmen both inside and outside the company's premises and also sent registered notices to the concerned workmen out of which some came back unserved. The employer's request to the union for supplying the addresses of the concerned workmen also did not elicit any reply. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the resulting inquiry was valid and proper.[31] However, in Bata Shoe, the facts disclosed that the charge-sheets sent to the residential addressed were returned unserved, whereafter the management displayed the said notices on the notice board. The Supreme Court held that in such an event the proper course was to publish the notices in a vernacular newspaper having circulation in the area. In these cases, there was no provision in the standing orders of the company for displaying charge-sheets on the notice boards of the company. Hence, the resulting order of dismissal was held to be invalid for want of proper service of charge-sheets.[32]

Suspension pending Inquiry

After the service of the charge-sheets, where the charges are of serious nature, the employer may suspend the delinquent workman pending the inquiry but there is no hard and fast rule that the service of charge-sheet must precede the suspension order. If the misconduct alleged is of very grave nature and the workman is apprehended at the spot of the commission of the offence, the employer, in such circumstances may forthwith suspend the workman and then serve him with the charge-sheet. In DESU, Khanna J, of the Delhi High Court observed that the power of suspension has to be exercised with circumspection, care and after application of mind. The disciplinary authority must make a fair and proper assessment of the matter in the given circumstances and carefully scrutinise that prima facie there exists grave and compelling circumstances which are likely to lead to the dismissal of the employee. A proper judgment exercised by the management would prevent unnecessary harassment and humiliation of suspension.[33] Though the right of an employer to suspend a delinquent employee pending domestic inquiry is well-recognised in Industrial law, it has to be exercised in accordance with the procedure laid down by the rules of service or the Standing Orders. Furthermore, such suspension should be secured by an order on the part of the authority empowered to suspend the person according to law, to debar the employee temporarily from attending the office and performing his functions.[34] 'Suspension' connotes temporary cessation of the right to work or labour,[35] or temporary deprivation of office, position or privilege.[36] Lord Goddard, in English Electric, described suspension as dismissal initiated at the discretion of the employer by a promise to re-employ.[37] It merely amounts to a postponement of the actual performance of the contract, and in the case of a continuing contract like the contract of service between master and servant suspension means that the relationship of master and servant remains in abeyance for a certain period. If the terms of the contract between the two contracting parties permits, suspension may be partial but where suspension was not in contemplation of the contract of service, no suspension can take place. The master is obliged to give a subsistence allowance to the servant, though he may not be obliged to pay him the full wages which are to be paid for the specific work done by the servant. [38]

The legal position as regards the master's right to place his servant under suspension is now well settled. In Hotel Imperial, Wanchoo J observed that, under ordinary law of master and servant, the power to suspend the servant without pay is not an implied term of contract of service, but must arise either from an express term in the contract itself or a statutory provision governing such contract. It was, therefore, held that ordinarily the absence of such a power would mean that the master cannot suspend a workman, and if he does so in the sense that he forbids the employee to work, he will have to pay the wages during the so-called period of suspension.[39] Where there is power to suspend either in the contract of employment or in the statute or the rules framed thereunder, the suspension has the effect of temporarily suspending the relationship of master and servant with the consequences that the servant is not bound to render service and the master is not bound to pay.[40] In Balvantrai Patel, Ramaswami J stated the general principles in the following words:

> It is now well settled that the power to suspend, in the sense of a right to forbid a servant to work, is not an implied term in an ordinary contract between master and servant, and that such a power can only be the creature either of a statute governing the contract, or of an express term in the contract itself. Ordinarily, therefore, the absence of such power either as an express term in the contract or in the rules framed under some statute would mean that the master would have no power to suspend a workman and even if he does so in the sense that he forbids the employee to work, he will have to pay wages during the period of suspension. Where, however, there is power to suspend either in the contract of employment or in the statute or the rules framed thereunder, the order of suspension has the effect of temporarily suspending the relationship of master and servant with the consequence that the servant is not bound to render service and the master is not bound to pay. This principle of law of master and servant is well established.. .. It is equally well settled that an order of interim suspension can be passed against the employee while an inquiry is pending into his conduct even though there is no such term in the contract of appointment or in the rules, but then in such a case the employee would be entitled to his remuneration for the period of suspension if there is no statute or rule under which it could be withheld. In this connection, it is important to notice the distinction between suspending the contract of service of an officer and suspending an officer from performing the duties of his office on the basis that the contract is subsisting. The suspension in the latter sense is always an implied term in every contract of service. When an officer is suspended in this sense, it means that the Government merely issues a direction to the officer that so long as the contract is subsisting and till the time the officer is legally dismissed he must not do anything in the discharge of the duties of his office. In other words, the employer is regarded as issuing an order to the employee which, because the contract is subsisting, the employee must obey.[41]

The expression 'pending inquiry' generally used in the Standing Orders in relation to such suspension, means only the inquiry by the employer and not the inquiry pending before any authority under the Industrial Disputes Act. In Ranipur Colliery, the Standing Orders of the colliery inter alia provided suspension without pay for a period of ten days 'pending inquiry'. Dealing with the question whether the expression 'pending inquiry' in the relevant Standing Orders of the company included inquiry by the Industrial tribunal under s 33 of the Act, the Supreme Court said that, 'Standing Orders are concerned with employers and employees and not with tribunals'. Hence, in the context of the relevant Standing Order, the 'inquiry' meant only the inquiry by the employer and not by the authority under s 33.[42]

Subsistence Allowance during the Period of Suspension

In government service, there are rules providing for an allowance generally known as 'subsistence allowance' during the pendency of departmental proceedings.[43] Occasionally, there are provisions in the rules or bye-laws of the governmental bodies or state institutions vesting discretionary powers in the relevant authorities to grant subsistence allowance to the suspended workman or not, but this discretion coupled as it is with a benefit has to be exercised in every case reasonably and according to law and justice and not whimsically or arbitrarily. It is only for stated reasons that the authority suspending an employee pending inquiry can deny subsistence allowance. The seriousness of the charge levelled against a delinquent workman can be a valid ground for declining to grant subsistence allowance.[44] In Hira Sugar, the Karnataka High Court set aside an order of the labour court directing payment of subsistence allowance to the employee at the rate of 75 per cent of the wages last drawn by him without affording an opportunity of hearing to the employer. The court observed that the order was passed without application of mind and as such was arbitrary per se and even mala fide in law.[45] The Standing Orders of Industrial establishments make provision for payment of such 'subsistence allowance' to Industrial employees during the pendency of disciplinary proceedings against them. In the model Standing Orders, in Sch 1, under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules 1946, framed under the Standing Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, r 14(4) makes the provision for payment of subsistence allowance to Industrial employees to whom the provisions of that Act apply during the period of suspension, pending a domestic inquiry into the misconduct alleged against them.

The same principle will apply to the suspension of an Industrial worker. If there is a provision regarding payment of an allowance for the period of suspension pending disciplinary proceedings against a workman, payment will be made to him according to that provision. Non-payment of the subsistence allowance to the workman during the pendency of the domestic inquiry would vitiate the inquiry proceedings,[46] but if there is no such provision in the contract of employment or the Standing Orders or the Standing Orders are not applicable to the establishment, the workman will be entitled to full wages for the period of interim suspension. An Industrial workman may be suspended pending a domestic inquiry. If such inquiry results in punishment to the workman, he will not be entitled to any wages (other than the subsistence allowance) for the period of suspension, because the punishment will be effective from the date of suspension. On the other hand, If the inquiry does not result in dismissal or the dismissal is found to be bad and the workman is reinstated by Industrial adjudication, he will be entitled to full wages for the period of suspension, on the footing that he was never legally dismissed and continued in service. In National Insurance, the court observed:

> Suspension pending an inquiry being not a suspension of the contract of employment but only preventing, during the interim period, the employee from discharging his duties, the employee would be entitled to his wages unless he is ultimately validly dismissed and dismissal dates back from the date when suspension was ordered. Subsistence allowance during the period of suspension is generally allowed to government servants under the rules framed in that regard and which have statutory force. No such rules are ordinarily found in Industrial establishments. To accede to such demand is more or less equating Industrial employees with civil servants for which there appears to be no justification.[47]

Since this case was dealing with a commercial establishment to which the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 did not apply, these observations did not take note of the Industrial establishments where the Standing Orders provide for payment of 'subsistence allowance' for the period of suspension pending disciplinary proceedings. In such cases, the 'subsistence allowance' paid would not be recoverable if the workman is dismissed, nor would the workman be entitled to anything more if he is reinstated, unless the tribunal expressly directs otherwise.[48] It is well settled that if there is a term in this respect in the contract of employment or the service rules providing for the scale of payment during the suspension, the payment will be made in accordance therewith.[49] Where the employer has the power, to suspend an employee while the domestic inquiry is pending, under a statute or rules or Standing Orders governing the employment or an express term in the contract of employment,[50] and he places a workman under suspension, then, for the period of suspension, mutual rights and duties, including the right to wages would be suspended as a rule, ie, the wages and allowances, etc, of the workman would be withheld for the time being.[51] Even if the employer inflicts the lesser punishment of suspension, the workman still will not be entitled to any wages as in such a case, suspension and withholding the wages for the period of suspension is by itself punishment.[52] In such a situation, the employee will not be entitled to the benefit of increments during the period of suspension.[53] But where the suspension is not permitted by any statute or rules, Standing Orders, it will be no suspension in the eyes of law and the workman will be entitled to full wages for the period of the so-called suspension because he would be deemed to be in service for that period. The denial of wages to the workman in such a case merely because no work was assigned to him or no work was done by him, would not be sustainable.[54]

The suspension of the workman solely for the reason that a criminal case was pending against him would be invalid but after the punishment of dismissal has been inflicted on the workman, he will not be entitled to subsistence allowance. The only possibility of the workman getting the full wages, in accordance with the Standing Orders is when no penal action is taken against him pursuant to the inquiry during the pendency of which he was suspended.[55] Where the employer terminated the services of a bus conductor for allowing passengers without ticket, without holding any inquiry, the labour court adjudicating the said dispute would be justified in directing the employer to pay subsistence allowance.[56] Refusal of payment of subsistence allowance would certainly result in denial of opportunity to the workman to defend himself, such denial amounts to a violation of principles of natural justice.[57] Non-payment of subsistence allowance could be linked to slow poisoning the employee, and he would gradually starve himself to death.[58] A bank employee can be suspended before serving charge sheet and there is nothing illegal in such an action in view of the bipartite settlement arrived at under s 18(1) between the State Bank of India and the All India SBI Staff Federation, by which para 521(10(b) of the Sastri Award was modified providing for suspension pending enquiry or 'initiation of such enquiry'.[59] The NCL-II recommended that if any worker is placed under suspension pending completion of domestic enquiry, he should be entitled to 50 per cent of his wages as subsistence allowance, and at 75 per cent of wages for the period beyond 90 days if the period of suspension exceeds 90 days for no fault of the worker, however, the total period of suspension shall not, exceed one year in any case. If, as a result of continued absence of the worker at the domestic inquiry or if the inquiry and disciplinary action cannot be completed in time for reasons attributable wholly to the worker's default or intransigence, the employer will be free to conduct the inquiry ex parte and complete the disciplinary proceedings based on such ex parte inquiry and further, there would be no increase in subsistence allowance beyond 50% for the period exceeding 90 days in such cases.[60]

---

1 * Chapter IV is continued from Volume I of this book, which contains Sections 1 - 11.

Ins. by Act 45 of 1971, s 3 (wef 15-12-1971).

2 The Gazette of India, Extraordinary, dated 9 December 1971, Pt 2, S 1, 589.

3 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 130 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], per SK Das J.

4 Indian Aluminium Co Ltd v LC (1991) I LLJ 328, 333 (Pat) (DB) : 1990 (2) BLJR 1368, per G Sohani CJ.

5 Government of India (2002), Report of the NCL-II, Chapter 13, p 46, para 6.96.

6 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Shriram FK Union 1989 Lab IC 490, 492 (Raj) (DB) : (1993) 3 LLJ 567 (Raj), per Verma CJ.

7 The Workmen of Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co of India (Pvt) Ltd v Mgmt (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133], 300-03 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 430], per Vaidialingam J.

8 Workmen of Engine Valves Ltd v Engine Valves Ltd (1983) 2 LLJ 232 [LNIND 1983 MAD 110] (Mad) (DB), per Sathiadev J.

9 Satya Narain Singh v IT (1999) 2 LLN 108 (All) : 1999 1 AWC 611 All, per Aloke Chakrabarty J.

10 Digambar Swain v PO, LC 1988 Lab IC 1123 -24 (Ori) (DB) : (1994) 3 LLJ 219 (Ori), per Patnaik J.

11 Ramprasad Ambaram Verma v President, Industrial Court (1991) 2 LLJ 488, 490 (MP) (DB) : 1989 MPLJ 797, per SK Dubey J.

12 Jagdish Prasad v Sachiv, Zila Ganna Committee 1986 Lab IC 1377 (SC) : AIR 1986 SC 1108 [LNIND 1986 SC 65], per BC Ray J.

13 Gaur BVP Sabha v IT-cum-LC (1993) 2 LLJ 500 -01 (P& H) (DB).

14 Anand Cinema v Mohan Tiwari 1993 Lab IC 651, 661 (MP) (DB) : (1993) 1 LLJ 1105 [LNIND 1992 MP 68] MP, per Dharmadhikari J.

15 Municipal Committee, Sirsa v Munshi Ram AIR 2005 SC 792 [LNIND 2005 SC 116]: (2005) 1 LLJ 1077 [LNIND 2005 SC 116] (SC), per Hegde J.

16 Gujarat Steel Tubes Ltd v GST Mazdoor Sabha (1980) 1 LLJ 137 [LNIND 1979 SC 464] (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 1896 [LNIND 1979 SC 464], per Krishna Iyer J.

17 Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v Henderson Bros [1888] 13 AC 595, 600.

18 Manohar Nathusao Samarth v Marotrao AlR 1979 SC 1084, 1090 : [1979] 3 SCR 1078, per Tulzapurkar J.

19 Bangalore Water Supply & Sewerage Board v Rajappa 1978 Lab IC 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 89]-68 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 548 [LNIND 1978 SC 70], per Krishna Iyer J.

20 Stern, Writing on Judicial Opinions 18 PABAQ 40 (1947).

21 Manohar Nathusao Samarth v Marotrao AlR 1979 SC 1084, 1095 : [1979] 3 SCR 1078, per Tulzapurkar J.

22 State of Punjab v Ram Singh 1992 Lab IC 2391, 2394 (SC) : AIR 1992 SC 2188 [LNIND 1992 SC 452], per K Ramaswamy J.

23 Workmen of Tanganagaon Tea Estate v Mgmt (1987) 2 LLJ 491, 494 (Gau) (DB), per Saikia J.

24 Jyoti Home Industries v Addl LC 1996 Lab IC 1211, 1214 (Kant), per Mohan Kumar J.

25 CP Peethambaran v Superintendent of Police 1996 Lab IC 1520 -21 (Ker) (DB), per Thomas Ag CJ.

26 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74], 691 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

27 Presidency Talkies v NS Natarajan (1968) 2 LLJ 801 [LNIND 1967 MAD 205]-02 (Mad) : (1968) 2 MLJ 221 [LNIND 1967 MAD 38], per Anantanarayanan CJ.

28 Shalimar Rope Works Mazdoor Union v Shalimar Rope Works Ltd, [1953] LAC 584 (LAT) : 1953 2 LLJ 876.

29 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], 116 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 155 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], per Gajendragadkar J.

30 Lomdhar Tanti v Manager, Murmuria Tea Estate 1975 Lab IC 194 -95 (Gau) (DB) : (1975) 2 LLJ 157 (Gau), per Sen J.

31 Nandita B Palekar v YS Kasbekar (1985) 2 LLJ 336 (Bom) (DB) : 1985 (87) BOMLR 135, per Madhava Reddy CJ.

32 Santosh Dattaram Nadkarni v New India Industries Ltd, (1988) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1988 BOM 109], 394-5 (Bom) (DB), per Sawant J.

33 Cf New Victoria Mills Co Ltd v LC 1970 Lab IC 428, 431 (All) : AIR 1970 All 210 [LNIND 1968 ALL 89], per Beg J.

34 Express Newpapers Pvt Ltd v IT AIR 1961 Mad 362 [LNIND 1960 MAD 252]: (1961) 1 MLJ 100 [LNIND 1960 MAD 252], per Jagadeesan J.

35 Mahendra Singh Dhantwal v Hindustan Motors Ltd (1976) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1976 SC 222] (SC) : AIR 1976 SC 2062 [LNIND 1976 SC 222], per Goswami J.

36 Glaxo Laboratories (I) Ltd v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1909, 1919-20 (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 505 [LNIND 1983 SC 289], per Desai J.

37 Rasiklal Vaghajibhai Patel v Ahmedabad Municipal Corpn 1985 Lab IC 729, 731 (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 504 [LNIND 1985 SC 5], per Desai J.

38 AL Kalra v Project & Equipment Corpn of India Ltd (1984) 2 LLJ 186 [LNIND 1984 SC 136], 193 (SC) : (1984) 3 SCC 316 [LNIND 1984 SC 136], per Desai J.

39 Jyoti Home Industries v Addl LC 1996 Lab IC 1211. 1214 (Kant), per Mohan Kumar J.

40 Workmen of Tanganagaon Tea Estate v Mgmt (1987) 2 LLJ 491, 495 (Gau) (DB), per Saikia J.

41 Mgmt of Kasojan Tea Estate v LC 1974 Lab IC 372 -73 (Ass&Nag) (DB), per Goswami CJ.

42 Mill Mazdoor Sabha v JA Baxi (1962) 2 LLJ 326 (Bom) (DB), per Chainani CJ.

43 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1969) 2 LLJ 755 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], 772 (SC) : AIR 1970 SC 919 [LNIND 1968 SC 298], per Shah J.

44 Sharda Prasad Onkarprasad Tiwari v Central Rly (1960) 1 LLJ 167, 170 (Bom) (DB) : AIR 1961 Bom 150 [LNIND 1959 BOM 83], per Raju J.

45 Pearce v Foster (1886) 17 QB D 536, 542, per Lopes LJ.

46 Ibid.

47 Bell v Lever Bros [1932] AC 161 (HL), per Lord Balnesburgh.

48 Basu Deba Das v MR Bhope (1993) 2 LLJ 1022,1035 (Bom) : 1993 (2) Bomcr 90 [LNIND 1992 BOM 639], per Ashok Agarwal J.

49 Presidency Talkies v NS Natarajan (1968) 2 LLJ 801 [LNIND 1967 MAD 205]-3 (Mad) : (1968) 2 MLJ 221 [LNIND 1967 MAD 38], per Anantanarayanan CJ.

50 Cf Empress v Mohd Hussain 3 All Weekly Notes 42.

51 Press Labour Union v Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd (1963) 1 LLJ 492 [LNIND 1962 MAD 189] (Mad), per Anantanarayanan J.

52 Goswami v General Manager, Southeastern Rly (1966) 1 LLJ 194 (Cal) : AIR 1965 Cal 557 [LNIND 1964 CAL 144], per BN Banerjee J.

53 JF Burros v Contractual Cooperation and Implied Term [1968] 31 MLR 390.

54 Presidency Talkies Pvt Ltd v LC (1969) 1 LLJ 90 (Mad) (DB) : (1968) 2 MLJ 221 [LNIND 1967 MAD 38], per Anantanarayanan J.

55 Vasanti M Shah v All India HFMC Society Ltd (1986) 1 LLJ 69, 76 (Guj) (DB) : (1985) 1 GLR 281, per Majmudar J.

56 Cf Edwards v SOGET (1970] 3 WLR 713, 719-20, per Lord Denning MR.

57 Jupiter General Insurance Co Ltd v Shroff [1937] 3 All ER 67, per Lord Maugham.

58 Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 (HL).

59 Harvey v RG Dell Ltd [1958] 2 QB 78.

60 BA Hepple and Paul O'Higgins, Individual Employment Law(An Introduction.

61 Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol 34, fourth edn, paras 1, 3.

62 Glasgow Corpn v Muir [1943] AC 448, 456 (HL), [1943] 2 All ER 44,48, per Lord Macmillan.

63 Kesari Mal v State of Rajasthan AIR 1957 Raj 284 [LNIND 1956 RAJ 98] (DB), per Bapna J.

64 Navinchandra S. Shah v Ahmedabad CDS Ltd (1979) 1 LLJ 60 [LNIND 1977 GUJ 35], 63 (Guj) (DB) : (1978) 19 GLR 108, per DA Desai J.

65 Luma v Arding [1955] 10 Exch 734, 736, per Pollock CB.

66 Edward v Levy [1960] 2 F&F 94-95, per Hill J.

67 Andhra Scientific Co Ltd v A Seshagiri Rao (1961) 2 LLJ 117 [LNIND 1960 SC 340], 121 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 408 [LNIND 1960 SC 340], per Das Gupta J.

68 PH Kalyani v Air France (1963) 1 LLJ 679 LNIND 1963 SC 45, per Wanchoo J.

69 Caltex (India) Ltd v Eugene Fernandes (1957) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1956 SC 86] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

70 Surendra Kumar Dash v Orissa State HDC Ltd 1992 Lab IC 1158 (Ori) (DB), per Padhi J.

71 Baster v London & County Printing Works [1899] 1 QB 901.

72 Ayyavu K v Tiruvalluvar Transport Corpn (2003) 4 LLJ 663 (Mad .)

73 Nirmal Sen Gupta v National Carbon Co Ltd CA No 155 of 1959 (1960) (SC), per Wanchoo J.

74 Ford Motor Co of India Ltd v SKK Naik (1952) 1 LLJ 388 (LAT).

75 Francis Klein & Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 615 [LNIND 1971 SC 480], 619 (SC), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

76 Bhaskar Textile Mills Ltd v IT (1975) 1 LLJ 77, 79 (Ori) (DB), per RN Misra J.

77 Mgmt of Mettur Spg Mills v Labour Officer, Salem 1977 Lab IC 1462, 1464 (Mad), per Mohan J.

78 TK Bandkar v Board of Trustees of Bombay Port Trust 1996 Lab IC 1967 -68 (Bom), per Majithia J.

79 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen. (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 452-53 (SC), per Imam J.

80 Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 (HL).

81 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Tahir Ali Baifi (1975) 2 LLJ 376 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1896 : (1976) 3 SCC 69, per Alagiriswami J.

82 T Krishnamoorthy v Mgmt of Indian Bank (1995) 1 LLJ 816 [LNIND 1994 MAD 214], 822 (Mad), per Bakthavatsalam J.

83 National Coal Board v Galley [1958] 1 All ER 91 (CA), per Pears LJ.

84 Hanley v Pease and Partners Ltd [1915] 1 KB 698, 705 (DC), per Lush J.

85 Rabindranath Sen v First IT (1963) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1962 CAL 172] (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

86 Burn & Co v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 452 (SC), per Imam J.

87 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (I958) 1 LLJ 260, 267-68 (SC), per SK Das J.

88 Burn & Co Ltd v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 226 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], 234 (SC), per Venkararama Ayyar J.

89 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 130 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], per SK Das J.

90 TELCO Ltd v PO, IT, (1990) 1 LLJ 403, 407 (Pat) : [1989 (59) FLR 648] per Satyeshwar Roy J.

91 Rabindranath Sen v First IT (1963) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1962 CAL 172] (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

92 Venkatayya v Buckingham & Carnatic Co Ltd (1963) 1 LLJ 16 [LNIND 1962 MAD 14] (Mad) (DB), per Ramachandraayyar CJ.

93 Thomas v Vivian [1872 J 37 JP 288.

94 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] (SC), per Wanchool.

95 Mafatlal Narandas Barot v Div. Controller, State Tpt. (1966) 1 LLJ 437 [LNIND 1965 SC 372], 439 (SC), per Raju J.

96 Nagaraja Rao v State of Mysore (1958) 1 LLJ 319, 322 (Mys) (DB), per SR Das Gupta CJ. Art

97 Shalimar Rope Works Ltd v State of West Bengal (1965) 1 LLJ 625 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

98 Muir Mills Co Ltd v Sri Harbans Singh (1954) 2 LLJ 627 (LAT).

99 MacLeod & Co Ltd v Amar Mukherjee (1954) 2 LLJ 353 (LAT).

1 Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd v Lattu Tury (1967) 2 LLJ 207 (Pat) (DB) : [1967 (14) FLR 138], per Narasimham CJ.

2 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 452 (SC), per Imam J.

3 Swaraj Tractors Division v Raghbir Singh, AIR 2004 SC 1234 [LNIND 2002 SC 1527]: (2004) 3 SCC 50 : 2002 (6) SCALE 36 [LNIND 2002 SC 1527] : (2004) 1 LLJ 458.

4 YP Sarabhai v Union Bank of India AIR 2006 SC 2316 [LNIND 2006 SC 423]: (2006) 5 SCC 377 [LNIND 2006 SC 423], per Lakshmanan J.

5 L& T Komatsu Ltd v N Udayakumar AIR 2007 SC (supp) 1752 : 2007 (13) SCALE 648 [LNIND 2007 SC 1404] : (2008) 1 SCC 224 [LNIND 2007 SC 1404], per Pasayat J.

6 Pepsu Road Transport Corpn v Rawel Singh AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1591, per CK Thakker J.

7 Mavji C. Lakum v. Central Bank of India, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1817 : 2008 (7) SCALE 32 [LNIND 2008 SC 820] : (2008) 12 SCC 726 [LNIND 2008 SC 820], per Sirpurkar J.

8 Mgmt of Aurofoods Pvt Ltd v S Rajulu, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1885, per HS Bedi J.

9 Jagdish Singh v Punjab Engg College, AIR 2009 SC 2458 [LNIND 2009 SC 1290]: (2009) 7 SCC 301 [LNIND 2009 SC 1290], per HL Dattu J.

10 Tobacco Manufactures (India) Ltd v Kaleshripat Bala (1953) 2 LLJ 263 (LAT).

11 Madras Electric Tramways Ltd v R Vijarajoo (1954) 1 LLJ 781 (LAT).

12 Oriental Textile Finishing Mills v LC (1971) 2 LLJ 505 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], 510 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 277 [LNIND 1971 SC 426]:, 1972 Lab IC 157 [LNIND 1971 SC 426] : (1971) 3 SCC 646 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

13 India General Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Workmen, in (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22, 26-27 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], per Sinha CJI.

14 Model Mills Ltd v Dharamdas (1958) 1 LLJ 539 [LNIND 1957 SC 110] (SC), per Imam J.

15 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 454 (SC), per Imam J.

16 Caltex India Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 12 [LNIND 1960 SC 34], 14-15 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 1262 [LNIND 1960 SC 34], per Gajendragadkar J.

17 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1158 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], per Wanchoo J.

18 IMH Press v Additional IT (1961) 1 LLJ 499 [LNIND 1960 SC 110], 501 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

19 Oriental Textile Finishing Mills v LC (1971) 2 LLJ 505 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], 510 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 277 [LNIND 1971 SC 426]: 1972 Lab IC 157 [LNIND 1971 SC 426] : (1971) 3 SCC 646 [LNIND 1971 SC 426], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

20 Bengal Bhatdee Coal Co v Ram Prabesh Singh (1963) 1 LLJ 291 [LNIND 1963 SC 13], 293 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

21 East Asiatic Co (India) Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 626 [LNIND 1964 MAD 166] (Mad), per Ramachandra, Ayyar CJ.

22 Punjab National Bank Ltd v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 666 [LNIND 1959 SC 166], 684-85 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

23 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills v Ram Sarup (1957) 1 LLJ 17 [LNIND 1956 SC 85] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

24 Sridharan Motor Service v IT (1959) 1 LLJ 380 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

25 India Gen. Navigation & Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 13 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], 22 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 219 [LNIND 1959 SC 182], per Sinha CJI.

26 Ramakrishna Iron Foundry v Workers (1954) 2 LLJ 372 (LAT).

27 Swadeshi Industries Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1960 SC 7], 81 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

28 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v Michael Mark (1962) 2 LLJ 220 [LNIND 1962 SC 242] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

29 A Raman v KN Vtlni (1982) 2 LLJ 1, 6 (Bom), per Pendse J.

30 Amrit Vanaspati v Khem Chand, AIR 2006 SC 2739 [LNIND 2006 SC 500]: (2006) 6 SCC 325 [LNIND 2006 SC 500] : (2006) 3 LLJ 344 [LNIND 2006 SC 500] : 2006 LIC 3992, per Lakshmanan J.

31 Bangalore Hospital v. Workmen, (2009) 1 LLJ 661 (Kant .) : [2008 (119) FLR 1128] : 2008 (6) Kar LJ 344 [LNIND 2008 KANT 179].

32 Velusamy K v LC, (2009) 3 LLJ 844 (Cal .).

33 Force Motors Ltd v Shrikrishna Shivram Tungar (2008) 2 LLJ 771 [LNIND 2008 BOM 290] (Bom) : 2008 (3) Bom CR53 : [2008 (117) FLR 606], per BH Marlapalle J

34 UB Gadhe v GM, Gujarat Ambuja Cement Pvt Ltd AIR 2008 SC 99 [LNIND 2007 SC 1147]: 2007 (11) SCALE 581 [LNIND 2007 SC 1147] : (2007) 13 SCC 634 [LNIND 2007 SC 1147], per Pasayat J.

35 Bharat Sugar Mills Ltd v Jai Singh, (1961) II LLJ 644(647) (SC) : [1962] 3 SCR 684 [LNIND 1961 SC 306] : [1960] 11 STC 793 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

36 SU Motors Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1990) 2 LLJ 39 [LNIND 1990 SC 308], 53 (SC), per Sawant J.

37 Janab Muhammad Israil v Saxby & Farmer (India) Ltd (1956) 1 LLJ 72 (LAT).

38 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Bhoja shetty (1953) 1 LLJ 599 (LAT).

39 Sasa Musa Sugar Works Pvt Ltd v Shobrati Khan (1959) 2 LLJ 388 [LNIND 1959 SC 79], 393 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

40 Engineering Works Ltd v State of West Bengal AIR 1968 Cal 407 [LNIND 1967 CAL 171] (FB), per Sinha CJ.

41 Mgmt of Krishnakali Tea Estate v ABCM Sangh AIR 2004 SC 4647, per Hegde J.

42 Onkar Nath Misra v State of Haryana AIR 2005 SC 2783 [LNIND 2005 SC 286]: (2005) 3 SCC 736 [LNIND 2005 SC 286], per Hegde J.

43 BA Hepple & Paul O'Higgins, Individual Employment Law(An Introduction, 1971, p 105.

44 Websters Third New International Dictionary.

45 Somanath Sahu v State of Orissa (1965) 1 LLJ 349 (Ori), per Mishra J.

46 Permanent edn, Vol 21, pp 698-99.

47 Gayler-Industrial Law [1955], 39.

48 Somanath Sahu v State of Orissa (1965) 1 LLJ 349 (Ori), per Mishra J.

49 AA Fernandes v Modern Mills Ltd (1990) 1 LLJ 538, 541 (Bom) (DB).

50 Sarabhai M Chemicals Ltd v MS Ajmere (1980) 1 LLJ 295, 301 (Bom) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

51 Calcutta Jute Mfg. Co Ltd v Calcutta JMW Union (1961) 2 LLJ 686 [LNIND 1961 SC 354], 688 (SC), per Sarkar J.

52 Laxmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Nand Kishore Singh (1956) 2 LLJ 439 [LNIND 1956 SC 75] (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 7 [LNIND 1956 SC 75]: 1957 (5) BLJR 5 : [1956] 1 SCR 746 [LNIND 1956 SC 75], per Bhagwat J.

53 Strawboard Manufacturing Co v Gobind (1962) 1 LLJ 420 [LNIND 1962 SC 105] (SC) AIR 1962 SC 1500 [LNIND 1962 SC 105], per Wanchoo J.

54 Cambodia Mills Ltd v IT (1959) 2 LLJ 80 [LNIND 1959 MAD 23] (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

55 Prive v Muat [1862] 2 CBNS 508.

56 Manjumalai Estate v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 220 (Ker) (DB), per MS Menon CJ.

57 Andhra Scientific Co Ltd v Seshagiri Rao (1961) 2 LLJ 117 [LNIND 1960 SC 340] (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 408 [LNIND 1960 SC 340], per Das Gupta J.

58 Turner v Mason [1845] 14 M&W 112, 118, per Alderson & Rolfe, BB.

59 Assn of Chemical Workers v BD Borude 1993 Lab IC 711, 718 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

60 J Durgappa v Industrial-cum-LC, Ananthapur 1996 Lab IC 837, 839 (AP), per Bikshapathy J.

61 Calcutta Jute Manufacturing Co Ltd v Calcutta JMW Union (1961) 2 LLJ 686 [LNIND 1961 SC 354] : AIR 1966 SC 1731 [LNIND 1961 SC 354], per Sarkar J.

62 India Marine Service Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 122 [LNIND 1962 SC 260]-23 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 528 [LNIND 1962 SC 260], per Mudholkar J.

63 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Employees (1963) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 147] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 339 [LNIND 1963 SC 147], per Gajendragadkar J.

64 Tractors (India) Ltd v Mohammed Sayeed (1959) 2 LLJ 224 [LNIND 1959 SC 57] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

65 Caltex (India) Ltd v Eugene Fernandes (1957) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1956 SC 86] (SC), per Bhagwati J.

66 Laxmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Nand Kishore Singh (1956) 2 LLJ 439 [LNIND 1956 SC 75] (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 7 [LNIND 1956 SC 75]: 1957 (5) BLJR 5, per Bhagwati J.

67 SKumbalingam v Indian Metal & Metallurgical Corpn, (1964) 1 LLJ 81 [LNIND 1963 MAD 51] (Mad), per Anantanarayanan J.

68 Express Newspapers Pvt Ltd v IT (1959) 2 LLJ 793 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

69 Somanath Sahu v State of Orissa (1965) 1 LLJ 349 (Ori), per Mishra J.

70 Diwan Sugar and Genl. Mills Ltd v Mazdoor Sabha (1954) 1 LLJ 36 (LAT).

71 Manjumalai Estate v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 220 (Ker) (DB), per MS Menon CJ.

72 Northern Rly Cooperative Credit Society Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 46 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1182 [LNIND 1967 SC 419], per Bhargava J.

73 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 454 (SC), per Imam J.

74 Orissa Cement Ltd v Habibuilah (1960) 1 LLJ 522 [LNIND 1959 SC 81] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

75 Northern Rly Cooperative Credit Society Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 46 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1182 [LNIND 1967 SC 419], per Bhargava J.

76 M Mayandi v Director, Tamil Nadu State Transport Corpn (1981) 2 LLJ 146 [LNIND 1981 SC 39]-47 (SC) : AIR 1981 SC 1707 [LNIND 1981 SC 39]: [1981] (43) FLR 325 : (1981) 3 SCC 89 [LNIND 1981 SC 39].

77 KP Vadivelu v Superintendent of Police 1967 FLR 286 (Mad), per Venkatadari J.

78 Sarabhai M Chemicals Ltd v MS Ajmere (1980) 1 LLJ 295, 304 (Bom) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

79 Banamali Palei v Steel Authority of India Ltd, 1986 Lab IC 1685,1687 (Ori) (DB), per Patnaik J.

80 Ram Bilash Goel v Mgmt of Lakwa Tea Estate 1981 Lab IC 1640, 1646 (Gau), per Saikia J.

81 Biecco Lawrie Ltd v State of West Bengal AIR 2010 SC 142 [LNIND 2009 SC 1538]: (2009) 4 LLJ 644 [LNIND 2009 SC 1538] : (2009) 8 MLJ 451 [LNIND 2009 SC 1538] : 2009 (10) SCALE 334 [LNIND 2009 SC 1538] : (2009) 10 SCC 32 [LNIND 2009 SC 1538], per Aftab Alam J.

82 Webster's Third New International Dictionary, p 2281.

83 Mgmt of SRP Tools Ltd v PO, Second Addl. LC (1974) 1 LLJ 413, 416 (Mad), per Ismail J.

84 Shalimar Rope Works Mazdoor Union v Shalimar Rope Works (1953) 2 LLJ 876 (LAT).

85 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74], 689 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

86 Jai Chand Bansal v IT (1966) 1 LLJ 289 (Bom) (DB), per Chainani CJ.

87 Edwards v Levy [1860] 2 F&F 94-95, per Hill J.

88 Orissa Cement Ltd v Adikanda Sahu (1960) 1 LLJ 518 [LNIND 1959 SC 82] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

89 Syed Khader Mohiuddim v Chairman TNPSC (1997) 2 LLJ 111 [LNIND 1997 MAD 452], 117-18 (Mad), per Lakshmanan J.

90 Agarpara Jute Mills v Sukdeo Roy (1957) 2 LLJ 418 (LAT).

91 Titagarh Paper Mill, Ltd v Employees' Union (1957) 2 LLJ 550 (LAT).

92 Calcutta jute Mfg. Co Ltd v Calcutta JMW Union (1961) 2 LLJ 686 [LNIND 1961 SC 354] (SC), per Sarkar J.

93 Manekchowk & Ahmedabad Mfg.Co Ltd v IC (1967) 1 LLJ 463 (Guj) (DB), per Shelat J.

94 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74], 689 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

95 Lomdhar Tanti v Manager, Murmuria Tea Estate 1975 Lab IC 194, 196 (Gau) (DB), per Sen J.

1 Rama Kant Misra v State of UP 1982 Lab lC 1790-91 (SC).

2 Workmen of Bharat Fritz Werner Pvt Ltd v Mgmt 1990 Lab IC 844, 853 (SC), per SC Agrawal J.

3 Ram Kishan v Union of India (1996) 1 LLJ 982, 985 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 255 [LNIND 1995 SC 858]: 1995 (5) SCALE 431 : (1995) 6 SCC 157 [LNIND 1995 SC 858].

4 Syed Khader Mohiuddin v Tamil Nadu Public Service Commission (1997) 2 LLJ 111 [LNIND 1997 MAD 452] (SC).

5 Nanabhai B Parmar v Ahmedabad MC Workshop 1997 Lab IC 3463, 3465 (Guj) per Keshote J.

6 Laxmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Nand Kishore Singh (1956) 2 LLJ 439 [LNIND 1956 SC 75], 443 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

7 Workmen of Dem Dima Tea Estate v Dem Dima Tea Estate (1963) 1 LLJ 250 [LNIND 1962 SC 231] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

8 New Sherrock Mills v. Maheshbhai T. Rao, AIR 1997 SC 252 [LNIND 1996 SC 1731]: (1996) 6 SCC 590 [LNIND 1996 SC 1731] : 1997 (1) LLJ 1212 [LNIND 1996 SC 1731] : 1997 LIC 158, per Kirpal J.

9 Mahindra and Mahindra Ltd. v. NB Naravade, 2005 AIR SCW 1115, per Hegde J.

10 Lomdhar Tanti v Manager, Murmuria Tea Estate 1975 Lab IC 194 --99 (Gau) (DB), per Sen J.

11 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

12 Mulchandani Electrical and Radio Industries Ltd v Workmen (1975) 1 LLJ 391 [LNIND 1975 SC 35] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2125 [LNIND 1975 SC 35]: 1975 (30) FLR 169 : 1975 Lab lC 1508, per Gupta J.

13 Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd v Gulab Singh 1986 Lab IC 1403, 1407 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

14 Indian Express & Chronicle Press v MC Kapur (1974) 2 LLJ 240 [LNIND 1973 SC 98] (SC), per Grover J.

15 Rama Kant Misra v State of Uttar Pradesh 1982 Lab IC 1790 [LNIND 1982 SC 149] (SC).

16 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74], 691 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

17 Boisahabi Tea Estate v PO, LC 1981 Lab IC 557, 565 (Gau) (DB), per Lahiri J.

18 Bum & Co Ltd v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 226 [LNIND 1956 SC 78] (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

19 Balwant Singh v New Sutlej Transport Co Pvt Ltd (1989) 2 LLJ 217 -18 (P& H), per Sodhi J.

20 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], 116 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

21 BPL India Ltd v BPL & PSP Thozhilali Union (1992) 1 LLJ 115, 117 (Ker), per Sukumaran J.

22 SamnuggurJute Factory v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1963 SC 247] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

23 Central India Coalfields Ltd, Calcutta v Ram Bilas Shobnath, (1961) 1 LLJ 546 [LNIND 1960 SC 103] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

24 WM Agnani v Badri Das, (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

25 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111] (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 155 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], per Gajendragadkar CJI.

26 Mulchandani Elec. and Radio Inds. Ltd v Workmen (1975) 1 LLJ 391 [LNIND 1975 SC 35] (SC), : AIR 1975 SC 2125 [LNIND 1975 SC 35] per Gupta J.

27 Glaxo Laboratories (1) Ltd v PO, LC 1983 Lab IC 1909 (SC), per Desai J.

28 Khandu Krishna Bhogade v Kalyani Steel Ltd, (1995) 2 LLJ 314, 317 (Bom) : [1995] (70) FLR 159, per BN Srikrishna J.

29 Narayanan v BPL Systems Pvt Ltd (1995) 1 LLJ 43, 46 (Ker) (DB) : 1994 (1) KLJ 760, per Jagannadha Rao CJ.

30 Bharat Coking Coal Ltd v Bihar Colliery Kamgar Union, AIR 2005 SC 2006 [LNIND 2005 SC 169]: (2005) 10 SCC 393 [LNIND 2005 SC 189], per Hegde J.

31 Mgmt, WB Colliery v. Ram Pravesh Singh , AIR 2008 SC 1162 [LNIND 2008 SC 226] (2008) 3 SCC 729 [LNIND 2008 SC 226], per Ashok Bhan J.

32 Federal Bank Ltd v T Sreekantan, (2009) 4 LLJ 809 (Ker .) : 2009 (2) KLJ 317, per Ramachandra Menon J.

33 Madhavsinh N. Solanki v. Gujarat Electricity Corpn Ltd., (2012) 1 LLJ 811 (Guj .), per Sahai J.

34 RK Ramaswamy v. Presiding Officer (2013) 2 LLJ 682 (Mad .) (DB).

35 Sinclair v Neighbour [1967] 2 QB 279.

36 Philips India Ltd v Fifth IT, 1978 Lab IC (NOC) 115 (Cal) (DB).

37 Janata Pictures & Theatres Ltd v Amulya Chakraborty (1956) 2 LLJ 67 (LAT).

38 India General Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Employees (I96 1) 2 LLJ 372 (SC), per Gupta J.

39 Orissa Cement Ltd v Habibullah (I960) 1 LLJ 522-23 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

40 MH Devendrappa v Karnataka State SIDC 1988 Lab IC 1319, 1323 (Kant), per Doddakalegowda J.

41 Orissa Cement Ltd v Habibullah (1960) 1 LLJ 522 [LNIND 1959 SC 81]-23 (SC) per Gajendragadkar J.

42 Punjab National Bank v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 666 [LNIND 1959 SC 166], 693-94 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

43 Hindustan GEC Ltd v Bishwanath Prasad (1971) 2 LLJ 340 [LNIND 1971 SC 386] (SC) : AIR 1971 SC 2417 [LNIND 1971 SC 386], per Mitter J.

44 Webster's Third New International Dictionary, p 1469.

45 Sripati Ranjan Biswas v Collector of Customs AIR 1964 Cal 415 [LNIND 1963 CAL 126], 417, per BN Banerjee J.

46 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74], 691 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

47 JK Cotton Spg & Weaving Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 153 [LNIND 1965 SC 153] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

48 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Kushal Bhan (1960) 1 LLJ 520 [LNIND 1959 SC 30] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 806 [LNIND 1959 SC 30]: [1960] 3 SCR 227 [LNIND 1959 SC 30], per Wanchoo J.

49 New Victoria Mills Co Ltd v LC 1970 Lab IC 428 (All), per Beg J.

50 P Orr & Sons Pvt Ltd v PO, LC (1974) 1 LLJ 517 (Mad), per Ismail J.

51 Ruston & Hornsby (I) Ltd v TB Kadam (1975) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1975 SC 231] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2025 [LNIND 1975 SC 231]: [1975] (31) FLR 173 : (1976) 3 SCC 71 [LNIND 1975 SC 231] : [1976] 1 SCR 119 [LNIND 1975 SC 231], per Alagiriswami J.

52 Wimco Sramik Union v Seventh IT 1987 Lab IC 77 (Cal) (DB), per MN Roy J.

53 Vimla (Dr) v Delhi Administration AIR 1963 SC 1572 [LNIND 1962 SC 397], 1576-77 : 1963 Cr LJ 434 : [1963] Supp 2 SCR 585, per Subba Rao J.

54 Bank of India v D Padmanabhadu (1995) 1 LLJ 233, 235 (Kant), per Shivappa J.

55 Tika Ram & Sons Ltd v Workmen (1960) 1 LLJ 514 [LNIND 1959 SC 84] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

56 Workmen of Dem Dima Tea Estate v Dem Dima Tea Estate (1963) 1 LLJ 250 [LNIND 1962 SC 231] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

57 Cf WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

58 Divl. Controller, KSRTC v AT Mane, AIR 2004 SC 4761 [LNIND 2004 SC 998]: : (2005) 3 SCC 254 [LNIND 2004 SC 998] : 2004 (8) SCALE 308 [LNIND 2004 SC 998] : (2004) 3 LLJ 1074 [LNIND 2004 SC 998] : 2004 LIC 3744, per Hegde J.

59 Regl. Mgr., UPSRTC v Hoti Lal, AIR 2003 SC 801 [LNIND 2003 SC 9]: 2003 Cr LJ 894 : 2003 (1) SCALE 76 [LNIND 2003 SC 9] : (2003) 2 SCC 202 [LNIND 2003 SC 9], per Pasayat J.

60 Bank of India v Avinash D Mandivikar, AIR 2005 SC 3395 [LNIND 2005 SC 693]: (2005) 7 SCC 690 [LNIND 2005 SC 693], per Pasayat J

61 V Ramana v APSRTC , AIR 2005 SC 3417 [LNIND 2005 SC 672] (2005) 7 SCC 388, per Pasayat J

62 DPS Rural Regional Bank v Munna Lal Jain, AIR 2005 SC 584 [LNIND 2004 SC 1266]: 2004 (10) SCALE 590 [LNIND 2004 SC 1266] : (2005) 10 SCC 84 [LNIND 2004 SC 1468], per Pasayat J.

63 Divl. Exec. Engineer, APSEB v Pallappa Rao (2006) 4 LLJ 343 (AP), per NV Ramana J.

64 Maharashtra SEB v Suresh R Bhokare AIR 2005 SC 1622 [LNIND 2004 SC 1261]: (2005) 1 LLJ 429 [LNIND 2004 SC 1261] : 2004 (10) SCALE 526 [LNIND 2004 SC 1261] : (2005) 10 SCC 465 [LNIND 2004 SC 1261], per Hegde J.

65 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v M Chandrasekhara Reddy, AIR 2005 SC 2769 [LNIND 2005 SC 83]: (2005) 1 LLJ 865 [LNIND 2005 SC 83] : (2005) 2 SCC 481 [LNIND 2005 SC 83], per Hegde J.

66 Divisional Controller, NEKRTC v H Amaresh, AIR 2006 SC 2730 [LNIND 2006 SC 519]: (2006) 6 SCC 187 [LNIND 2006 SC 519], per Lakshmanan J.

67 MV Bijlani v Union of India (2006) 5 SCC 88 [LNIND 2006 SC 257] : AIR 2006 SC 3475 [LNIND 2006 SC 257]: 2006 (2) LLJ 800 [LNIND 2006 SC 257].

68 APSRTC v Raghuda Siva Sankara Prasad, AIR 2007 SC 152 [LNIND 2006 SC 915]: (2007) 1 SCC 222, per Laskhmanan J.

69 Roop Singh Negi v Punjab National Bank, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 921, per Sinha J.

70 Chauhan J Vajesinh v Gujarat SRTC (2008) 2 LLJ 1155 (Guj .), per HK Rathod J.

71 Workmen of Balmadies Estates v. Mgmt, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1366, per Pasayat J

72 Sarv UP Gramin Bank v Manoj Kumar Sinha AIR 2010 SC 2491 [LNIND 2010 SC 161]: (2010) 3 SCC 556 [LNIND 2010 SC 161], per SS Nijjar J.

73 Roble v Green [1895] 2 QB 315, 320 (CA).

74 Cf Daljeet& Co Pvt Ltd v State of Punjab (1963) 2 LLJ 17 (Punj), per Capoor J.

75 Pawan Kumar v State of Haryana (1996) 2 LLJ 703, 705 (SC), per Punchhi J.

76 Re: 'P' an advocate AIR 1963 SC 1313, 1316, per Gajendragadkar J.

77 GMohan v Assistant Collector of Customs, (1990) 1 LLJ 468 -69 (Mad), per David Annoussarny J.

78 Jaysingh Rangarao Raut v Maharashtra SEB (1980) 1 LLJ 117 [LNIND 1979 BOM 72], 120 (Bom), per SV Manohar J.

79 Risal Singh v Chandgi Ram AIR 1966 Punj 393 (DB), per Capoor J.

80 Mangali v Chhakki Lal AIR 1963 All 527 [LNIND 1962 ALL 75], 529, per Srivastava J.

81 Buddha Pitai v Sub-Divisional Officer, Malihabad, Lucknow AIR 1965 All 382 [LNIND 1965 ALL 147], 385 (FB).

82 Pawan Kumar v State of Haryana (1996) 2 LLJ 703, 705 (SC), : AIR 1996 SC 3300 [LNIND 1996 SC 2868]: 1996 Lab IC 1740 : (1996) 2 LLJ 703 : 1996 (4) SCALE 480 [LNIND 1996 SC 2868] : (1996) 4 SCC 17 [LNIND 1996 SC 2868] per Punchhi J.

83 Mgmt of T&FEtd v First Addl. LC (1982) 2 LLJ 403, 409 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

84 CSaseendran Nair v GM, State Bank of Tranvancore 1996 Lab IC 2543 (Ker) (DB), per Dhinakar).

85 SNoor Ahmed v State Bank of India 1992 Lab IC 1469, 1471 (AP), per Eswaraprasad J.

86 Post-Graduate IMER v LC (1990) 1 LLJ 70, 72 (P&H) (DB), per Bhalla J.

87 VB Dutt & Co Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 1 LLJ 374 [LNIND 1962 SC 33] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1914 [LNIND 1963 SC 146]: [1964] 3 SCR 616 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], per Wanchoo J.

88 Cf Local Government Board v Arlidge [1915] AC 120, 140, per Lord Parmoor.

89 Kannan Devon Hills Produce Co Ltd v LC (1967) 2 LLJ 631 (Ker), per Isaac J.

90 Sur Enamel and Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], 369 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1914 [LNIND 1963 SC 146]: [1964] 3 SCR 616 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], per Das Gupta J.

91 Jai Bhagwan v Mgmt. of the Ambala CCB Ltd 1983 Lab IC 1694 -96 (SC), per Chinnappa Reddy J.

92 Mrinal Kanti Chakraborty v State of WB 1993 Lab IC 1747, 1750 (Cal) (DB), per BP Banerjee J.

93 State of Mysore v Shivabasappa Shivappa (1964) 1 LLJ 24 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 375 [LNIND 1962 SC 214] per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

94 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], 380 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 708 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], per Wanchoo J.

1 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 456 (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 719 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], per Gajendragadkar J.

2 Central Bank of India Ltd v Parkash Chand Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 384 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 983 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], per Bhargava J.

3 Tata Engg. and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 812 (SC), per Shelat J.

4 Jessop & Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522, 525 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

5 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243], 717 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

6 AG Kher v Atlas Copco (India) Ltd (1992) 1 LLJ 423, 427 (Bom), per Sharad Manohar J.

7 CHC Tannery v LC 1969 Lab IC 1253, 1255 (All), per Gulati J.

8 Sur Enamel and Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

9 Sundarlal Dhanraj Kasliwal v Karmaveer KWSK Ltd (1996) 1 LLJ 332, 336 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

10 Amulya Ratan Mukherjee v Deputy Chief Mechanical Engineer AIR 1961 Cal 40 [LNIND 1960 CAL 117], per Sinha J.

11 Sisir Kumar Das v State of West Bengal AIR 1955 Cal 183 [LNIND 1954 CAL 36], 187, per Sinha J.

12 JK Cotton Spg & Wvg.Mills Co Ltd v Jagannath (1963) 1 LLJ 475 (All), per SN Dwivedi J.

13 Marwari Relief Society, Calcutta v Bacha Misra [1953] LAC 537(LAT).

14 Ziakh v Firestone TRCI Ltd (1954) 1 LLJ 281 [LNIND 1953 BOM 121] (Bom) (DB), per Chagla CJ.

15 Laxmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Nand Kishore Singh (1956) 2 LLJ 439 [LNIND 1956 SC 75]-40 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

16 Northern Rly CCS Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 46 (SC), per Bhargava J.

17 Miraj TGK Sangh v Manager, Shree Gajanan wvg. Mills (1992) 2 LLJ 686 [LNIND 1991 BOM 469]. 688 (Bom), per Srikrishna J.

18 Dunlop Rubber Co (India) Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 426 [LNIND 1964 SC 318] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

19 New Victoria Mills Co Ltd v Jagannath (1964) 1 LLJ 110 (All), per Dwivedi J.

20 Bhanuprasad Deviprasad Mankad v State of Saurashtra AIR 1956 Sau 14 (DB), per Shah CJ.

21 Anand Parkash & Sons v Girja Shankar 1976 Lab IC 212, 214 (Del), per BC Misra J.

22 Remington Rand of India Ltd v Tahir ALI Baiji (1975) 2 LLJ 376, 378 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1896 : 1975 Lab IC 1437 : (1976) 3 SCC 69, per Alagiriswami J.

23 Burn & Co v Employees (1957) 1 LLJ 226 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], 234 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 38 [LNIND 1956 SC 78], per Venkararama Ayyar J.

24 Bennett Coleman & Co Ltd v M Valladores [1956] LAC 1(LAT).

25 S Nagiah v Indian Aluminum Co (1991) 1 LLJ 554 (Kant) (DB), : ILR 1990 Kant 2744 per Mohan CJ.

26 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v LC 1996 Lab I C 1178, 1180 (All), per Ganguli J.

27 N Subbiah v Indian Bank (1992) 1 LLJ 752, 755 (Mad), per Govindswamy J.

28 Cf, Binod Chandra Mazumdar v Union of India AIR 1960 Punj 147, per Grover J.

29 Oil India Ltd v CGIT 1980 Lab IC (NOC) 93 (Cal), per Amiya Kumar Mookerji J.

30 BS Hiremath v Sri Ganeshar Textile Mills 1979 Lab IC 155 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

31 G Mckenzie & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) I LLJ 285 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 389 [LNIND 1958 SC 131], per Kapur J.

32 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1158 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], per Wanchoo J.

33 Delhi Electric Supply Undertaking v GP Satsangi, 1984 Lab IC 54, 65 (Del) (DB), per Khanna J.

34 N Lakshmanan Nambiar v State of Kerala 1991 Lab IC 1740, 1744 (Ker), per KA Nayar J.

35 Abid Mohammad Khan v State of MP (1958) 2 LLJ 425 (MP) (DB), per Dixit J.

36 Mohammad Azam v State of Hyderabad AIR 1958 AP 619, 623 (DB), per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

37 Marshall v English Electric Co Ltd [1945] 1 All ER 653, 655 (CA), per Lord Goddard.

38 Divl.Supdt., Northern Rly v Mukand Lal (1957) 2 LLJ 452, 456 (Punj) (FB), per GD Khosla J.

39 Hotel Imperial v Hotel Workers' Union (1959) 2 LLJ 544 [LNIND 1959 SC 136] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1342 [LNIND 1959 SC 136], per Wanchoo J.

40 VP Gindornia v State of MP (1970) 2 LLJ 143 [LNIND 1970 SC 16], 149 (SC), per Hegde J.

41 Balvantrai Ratilal Patel v State of Maharashtra (1968) 2 LLJ 700 [LNIND 1967 SC 369], 703 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 800 [LNIND 1967 SC 368], per Ramaswami J.

42 Ranipur Colliery v Bhuban Singh (1959) 2 LLJ 231 [LNIND 1959 SC 62], 235 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 833 [LNIND 1959 SC 62], per Wanchoo J.

43 Khem Chand v Union of India (1963) 1 LLJ 665 [LNIND 1962 SC 309], 669 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 687 [LNIND 1962 SC 309], per Das Gupta J.

44 V Subramaniam v SBI Staff Co-op. Society Ltd 1981 Lab IC 952 -53 (Mad) (DB), per Ismail CJ.

45 Hira Sugar Co-op Consumers Stores Ltd v PP Korvekal, 1995 Lab IC 1559, 1561 (Kant), per Thakur J.

46 Kailash Nath Pandey v State of Uttar Pradesh 1996 Lab IC 1485, 1487 (All), per Bhargava J.

47 National Insurance Co Ltd v Workmen CA Nos 693& 841 of 1966 (SC), per Shelat J.

48 Mangal Prasad verma v Bihar Coop Mktg Union 1969 Lab IC 788 -90 (Pat) (DB), per Kanhaiyaji J.

49 SSambandam v Secretary, Rly ECB Ltd (1978) 1 LLJ 342 -43 (Mad) (DB), per Veeraswami J.

50 Hotel Imperial, New Delhi v Hotel Workers Union (1959) 2 LLJ 544 [LNIND 1959 SC 136] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

51 Burn & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 450 [LNIND 1958 SC 174], 459 (SC), per Imam J.

52 Cf Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95],378 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

53 Rajasthan SEB v Narayan Lal Meena 1995 Lab IC 864 -65 (Raj) (DB), per Chopra J.

54 KSE Board v IT Calicut 1978 Lab IC 917 (Ker), per Khalid J.

55 Mgmt of Ideal Jawa (I) Ltd v T Ramu 1979 Lab IC (NOC) 32 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

56 Rajasthan SRTC v LC (1998) 1 LLN 318 (Raj), per Bhagwati Prasad J.

57 Fakirbhai F Solanki v PO (1986) 2 LLN 741 (SC), per Venkataramaiah J.

58 Capt M Paul Anthony v BGML (1999) 1 LLJ 746 (SC).

59 State Bank of India v Harbans Lal (2000) 3 LLN 488 (SC).

60 Government of India (2002), Report of the NCL-II, Chapter 13, p 42. para 6.79.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[S. 11A. Power of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals to give Appropriate Relief in case of Discharge or Dismissal of Workmen.(

Domestic Inquiry Proper

Domestic inquiry in Industrial law has acquired great significance and Industrial adjudication attaches considerable importance to such inquiry.[61] In a number of cases, the Supreme Court held that an inquiry is not an empty formality but an essential condition to the legality of the disciplinary order. In other words, before the delinquent workmen can be dismissed for misconduct, the employer should hold a fair and regular inquiry in to the misconduct and dismissal without holding a regular inquiry would be an illegality.[62]It is well-settled that disciplinary inquiry has to be a quasi-judicial inquiry held according to principles of natural justice and the inquiry officer has a duty to act judicially,[63] because the charges of misconduct, if proved, will result not only in deprivation of livelihood of the workman but will also attach stigma to his character. Industrial adjudication, therefore, insists on a proper inquiry being held and that nothing should happen in the inquiry either when it is held or after it is concluded and before the order of dismissal is passed, which would expose the inquiry to the criticism that it was undertaken as an empty formality.[64] However, in a case where the workman, in answer to the charge levelled against him, admits his guilt, there will be nothing more for the management to inquire into and in such a case holding of an inquiry would be a mere empty formality.[65] A misconduct owned and admitted by the delinquent workman is the antithesis of the violation of the principles of natural justice or victimisation, as the question of prejudice does not arise under such circumstances,[66] but in such a case, there must be an admission of guilt by the delinquent workman in clear terms. Normally, therefore, in the absence of clear or unambiguous admission of guilt, failure to hold domestic inquiry would constitute serious infirmity in the order of dismissal.[67] In JS Khadgawat, the Rajasthan High Court held that it is not a hard and fast rule that where the facts are indisputable or that they are admitted, it is not necessary to observe the principles of natural justice. The so called admission of guilt by the employee may not be conclusive evidence against him, and the employee is not bound to disclose his defence and give any explanation during the course of preliminary inquiry. Therefore, where it was concluded that the employee was guilty of offence solely on the basis of admissions made by him in the preliminary inquiry, the termination of his service without holding a regular inquiry would be invalid.[68] In Madikal Service Co-op Bank, in view of an alleged inculpatory statement, the employee was dismissed from service without holding a full fledged domestic inquiry but the inquiry officer ignored the written statement of defence in which the employee had denied all the charges and had also challenged the alleged inculpatory statement said to have been given by him to the audit party as not a voluntary statement. Furthermore, the statement itself did not specifically admit the facts mentioned in the charges and it contained only a general statement that he had committed mistakes and was, therefore, guilty. In the circumstances, the perfunctory inquiry in which no witness was examined on behalf of the employee, nor was he allowed to cross-examine the witnesses of the management, was held to be invalid.[69]

But in Mangal Sen, a single judge of Allahabad High Court held that the mere fact that the employee had asked to be excused did not mean that he pleaded guilty, particularly when his explanation contained a clear assertion that he was not guilty. Therefore, the apology of the workman must be read in the context in which it was tendered. In the absence of proper inquiry, the court held that the dismissal was void and ordered reinstatement of the workman with full backwages and all attendant benefits.[70] In the other hand, in a parallel line of cases,[71] the Supreme Court has stated that in cases where the inquiry has been found to be invalid or where no inquiry at all was held, 'the tribunal may give an opportunity to the employer to prove his case and in doing so the tribunal tries the merits of the case itself. The ratio of these cases is that where the domestic inquiry held by the employer is found to be invalid by the Industrial tribunal or no inquiry at all has been held by the employer, the action of dismissal may still be sustained by the employer by justifying it before the tribunal by adducing relevant evidence. In Motipur Sugar Factory, the defective-inquiry-cases were equated with no-inquiry-cases. In such cases, the tribunal would have jurisdiction to go into the facts and the employer would have to satisfy it that the order of dismissal was proper on facts.[72] In RK Jain, Vaidialingam J elaborated that it is open to the management to rely on the domestic inquiry conducted by it and satisfy the tribunal that there is no infirmity attached to the same and the management has also got a right to justify on facts as well that its order of dismissal was proper.[73] This principle was reaffirmed in Ludh Budh Singh.[74] In Firestone, the Supreme Court reiterated the law that in both the cases of 'no inquiry' and 'defective inquiry', the employer can still justify his action by adducing evidence before the tribunal. Faced with this situation, the court tried to clarify that it should not be understood as laying down that there is no obligation whatsoever on the part of an employer to hold an inquiry before passing an order of discharge or dismissal. The court enumerated four advantages of a domestic enquiry held by the employer:

(i) in spite of its wider powers of adjudication now, the tribunal will have to give cogent reasons for not accepting the conclusions of the inquiry officer in a case where a proper inquiry has been held and a correct finding is arrived at regarding the misconduct of the workman;

(ii) it will also enable the employer to persuade the tribunal to accept the inquiry as proper and the finding as correct;

(iii) by holding a proper inquiry, the employer will escape the charge of having acted arbitrarily and mala fide; and

(iv) the holding of a proper and valid inquiry will conduce to the harmonious and healthy relations between the employer and the workmen and it will serve the cause of Industrial peace.[75]

In Makhan Singh, Venkataramiah J, held that, on a consideration of the whole material placed before the court, the decision of the management to terminate the services of the appellant without holding any domestic inquiry was not a bona fide one. The court noticed that the labour court upheld the dismissal on the basis of the evidence led by the employer before it in order to justify the dismissal of the workman. Then, on its own appraisal of the evidence, the Supreme Court held that the order of the labour court was not sustainable as 'the approach adopted by it to the whole case was highly casual and superficial.[76] Upto this extent, the holding of the court is correct but the further observation that the termination of the service of the workman was not bonafide, on the sole ground that no domestic inquiry was held, is misconceived. The mere fact that the employer has not held the domestic inquiry cannot lead to the inference that the termination of service was not bona fide. The law relating to the requirement of holding domestic inquiries in disciplinary action against Industrial workmen, as enunciated by the Supreme Court in its pronouncements bristles with contradictions and requires complete restatement. In the absence of judicial guidelines, the legislature must clarify the position so that the parties know about the right course to be followed. The decision rendered by Venkataramaiah J in Makhan Singh was itself wrong and misconceived, being wholly inconsistent with the law laid down in Delhi Cloth Mills, Motipur Sugar Factory and Firestone, which are authorities for the proposition that, even in the rarest of rare cases where the employer did not conduct an enquiry before dismissing a workman, his right to adduce evidence before the labour court in support of the action of dismissal remains unscathed. In Khichrolia, a single judge of Madhya Pradesh High Court held that in the absence of any provision in the rules for continuance of departmental enquiry after superannuation, the employer had no legal authority to continue with disciplinary inquiry and to take any consequential action by way of punishment or recovery.[77]

(i) Inquiry (Enquiry) Officer

After service of charge-sheet on the delinquent employee, the management has to appoint an inquiry officer for holding inquiry into the charges levelled against him. In the absence of any statutory provision or contractual postulate, holding of disciplinary proceedings is purely a managerial function. Therefore, even if an order appointing an inquiry officer has been made on behalf of the management by an authority who is not competent under the rules which have no statutory force, the same cannot be regarded as invalid, but where the Standing Orders provide the mode of appointment of an inquiry officer, the inquiry will be illegal if the inquiry officer is not appointed in accordance with such Standing Orders.[78] In Capstan Meters, the relevant Standing Order provided that in case of a major misdemeanour, the inquiry against the delinquent workman, shall be held by 'an officer or officers' of the company appointed for the purpose, before taking any disciplinary action but the impugned inquiry was held by an advocate instead of 'an officer' of the company. A single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that the inquiry held by the advocate was invalid because the Standing Orders were binding on the employer as well as on the employee.[79] In Bernard, in terms of a settlement, the employer bank appointed a special officer of the bank to hold inquiry into the alleged acts of misconduct against the delinquent employee but during the pendency of the inquiry, the inquiry officer retired from the service on superannuation. However, the inquiry officer completed the inquiry after his retirement, in which the employee participated throughout even after the retirement of the inquiry officer, without raising any objection. The Bombay High Court in a writ petition filed by the employee held that on retirement, the inquiry officer had no authority to proceed further with inquiry. Hence, the order imposing punishment based on such inquiry, was incompetent and without jurisdiction. The court, therefore, quashed the order of punishment and directed that the workman be paid 'all consequential benefits'. In appeal by special leave against the order of the High Court, the Supreme Court upheld the order of the High Court quashing the impugned order of punishment but having regard to the special facts and circumstances of the case, it held that the High Court should not have ordered payment of 'all consequential benefits', and modified the order of the High Court to the extent that the employee will be paid only 50 per cent of the consequential benefits.[80]

Though domestic inquiries need not be conducted in accordance with the technical requirements of criminal trials, they must be fairly conducted and in holding them, considerations of fair-play and natural justice must govern the conduct of the inquiry officer.[81] A domestic inquiry must be held by an unbiased person. The inquiry officer should not be biased in favour of or against either of the parties.[82] In other words, the delinquent is entitled to have the disciplinary proceedings dealt with by an unbiased person, who is wholly unconnected with the incident in question.[83] 'If it's a goose that's on trial there must be no fox in the jury'. The principle that justice must not only be done but must manifestly and undoubtedly be done applies with equal force to domestic inquiries just as it applies to the quasi-judicial, administrative and judicial tribunals. If the employer appoints a person as an inquiry officer who has directly dealt with the charge or guilt complained of, such an inquiry will be nothing but a mockery and idle ceremony because there will be real likelihood of bias on the part of the inquiry officer.[84] A person with a bias against anyone of the parties interested in the disputed misconduct shall not be a proper person to hold the inquiry, and the inquiry held by such a person would be improper. Any person who sits in judgment over the rights of others should be free from any kind of bias and must be able to bear an impartial and objective mind to the questions in controversy. Where a person who discharges a quasi-judicial function has shown by his conduct, that he is interested in either of the parties, that will disentitle him from acting in that capacity.[85] If, therefore, from the record of a domestic inquiry, it is patent that there was a likelihood of bias in the person who conducted the inquiry, the inquiry would be vitiated.[86] The point of bias has been illustrated in the decision of the Supreme Court in Kalyani.[87] The workman objected to the inquiry being held by a particular officer on the ground that the officer was biased against him on account of the fact that he had given evidence against him in a case which had resulted in infliction of a fine on that officer. The conclusion of the labour court that the inquiry was vitiated as it suffered from a serious defect of bias, was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

However, the bias of the inquiry officer has to be specifically pleaded and proved before the adjudicator. In the absence of any particulars of bias, the inquiry cannot be held to be vitiated.[88] For instance, where the workman takes part in the inquiry without raising any objection and then makes imputation against the inquiry officer of bias, the inference of bias should not easily be drawn because otherwise the delinquent workman will be able to make the holding of an inquiry against him impossible by making imputations against every inquiry officer whenever he finds the trend of the inquiry going against him.[89] However, if from the records of the domestic inquiry itself it is patent that there was likelihood of bias in the person who conducted the inquiry, the fact that the question of bias was not specifically raised may be immaterial.[90] However, if the workman not only does not take any objection to the inquiry being held by a particular person but also categorically states that he has no objection to the inquiry being held by that person and does not make any allegation against the inquiry officer in his pleadings, he cannot be permitted to raise the question of the bias of inquiry officer.[91] The mere fact that the delinquent applied for change of inquiry officer which was not conceded would not give rise to inference of bias particularly when the delinquent is exonerated of some charges while he is found guilty of some others. Bias on the part of the inquiry officer, in such circumstances, cannot be said to have been proved.[92] The prevalent view is that the mere fact that the inquiry officer is an employee of the management cannot lead to the assumption that he was bound to decide the case in favour of the management.[93] Likewise, the fact that the inquiry officer was subordinate to the disciplinary authority would be no ground for holding that he acted mala fide or had bias against the delinquent employee.[94] Similarly, the fact that the inquiry was held by an employee of the company who had talks with the management about fixing the time and date of the inquiry would not vitiate the inquiry.[95] Nor does the mere fact that a person received remuneration from the employer for his services disqualify him from holding a domestic inquiry as a biased person.[96] The fact that the inquiry officer happened to be a shareholder of the company will not lead to the inference of bias.[97] It is well-known that inquiries of this type are generally conducted by officers of the employer companies and in the absence of any special bias attributable to a particular officer, it has never been held that the inquiry is bad just because it is conducted by an officer of the employer. For the same reason, a person who had been engaged as a lawyer by the employer in some other prior case and was subsequently engaged to hold a domestic inquiry against a workman, would not be incompetent on the ground of bias to conduct the domestic inquiry. It cannot, therefore, be said that the inquiry officer has a bias in favour of the employer merely because he is the employer's lawyer and was previously engaged by the employer in Industrial matters.[98] A lawyer must normally be presumed to be a man who can act with a sense of detachment and without bias or prejudice as he is trained in law and an inquiry, therefore cannot be said to be vitiated by the mere fact that the employer's lawyer conducted it,[99] but it would be a different matter if the lawyer has given advice to the employer in connection with the disciplinary proceedings against a workman for an act of misconduct and then was appointed inquiry officer to inquire into the same act of misconduct against the workman. Further, the fact that the examination of some of the witnesses was detailed or persistent, would also not warrant a finding that the inquiry officer was biased against the concerned workman.[1] Nor does the fact that the inquiry officer attested the statements of the witness lead to the inference that he was biased.[2]

Contrary to the settled law, a few High Courts took the view that the appointment of an outsider, an advocate, as inquiry officer would vitiate the proceedings, if there were a provision for appointment of inquiry officer from among the employees of the company only, and not otherwise.[3] This view seems to be ill-founded and incorrect. The mere fact that there is a provision in the Standing Orders for appointment of the inquiry officer from within the company does not operate as a bar to engage an advocate as the inquiry officer. It may be that in some cases of alleged misconduct directed against the supervisory or managerial personnel or those involving inter-group and inter-union clashes, it is to the distinct advantage of the workmen to have the enquiry conducted by an impartial outsider than by a company official. The fact that the outsider has no personal knowledge of the background of the workman against whom the charges were framed, itself is a factor which works out to the advantage of the charge-sheeted workman. Entrusting the domestic inquiry to an outsider, in such circumstances, would also absolve the management of the charge of infusing bias or importing personal knowledge into the inquiry process. An inquiry cannot be said to be held properly when the person holding it begins to rely on his own knowledge or statements.[4] In Associated Cement Companies, the Supreme Court observed that in deciding the question as to whether the explanation given by the workman was true or not, the inquiry officer should not have imparted his personal knowledge and the knowledge of his colleagues and should also not have relied on reports received from other witnesses.[5] Similarly in Doomur Dullang Tea Estate, the inquiry was held to be vitiated as the inquiry officer had imparted personal knowledge of the incident and also had earlier complained in the criminal cases arising out of the same incident against the workmen. In a case, where the inquiry officer claims to have seen the misconduct having been committed by the workman, in all fairness the inquiry should be entrusted to some other person. This is based on the salutary rule that justice must not only be rendered, but must also appear to be rendered.[6] Likewise, where the charges levelled against an employee were inquired into by the board of directors, two of whom had already made statements in support of the charges, copies of which statements were not furnished to the employee, the inquiry was held to be vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice.[7]

Andhra Scientific Co, illustrates the principle that where the inquiry officer takes on the role of a witness in addition to his own, the inquiry would be vitiated as being a clear violation of the canons of fair play and natural justice. The workman, in this case, was charged with recklessness and inefficiency in the conduct of his work as the store's manager. The inquiry was commenced by the general manager himself and after five witnesses had been examined, the general manager stepped down and the inquiry was taken over by another officer who was till then incharge of securing evidence in the case to establish charges against the workman concerned. The general manager then gave evidence as a witness in the case but the decision that the workman was guilty of the charges of the alleged misconduct was reached by the other officer. On the basis of these findings reached in the inquiry, the workman was dismissed. Affirming the conclusion of the labour court that the inquiry was vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice, the Supreme Court held that the inquiry suffered from two grave infirmities; firstly, the person who had presided over the inquiry at the initial stages, stepped down and came into the witness box in the later stage which was quite incongruous; secondly, the very person who was in charge of the prosecution at the earlier stage and was actively concerned in securing the evidence against the workman, took over the inquiry and after finding the workman guilty of the misconduct, passed the order of punishment. Speaking for the Supreme Court, Das Gupta J observed:

> One can see that in the facts of this case the general manager and Ramanatha Babu formed practically one entity, with two bodies. At one stage, the first acts as a judge; at a later stage, he steps down as a witness; and the second becomes a judge. There is the further fact here that the person who gave the actual decision had actively been procuring the evidence, with the avowed motive of securing a conclusion against the workman. These being the facts, the manner in which the inquiry was conducted in this case can hardly be said to have ensured fairplay which rules of natural justice require.[8]

In Meenglas Tea Estate, the inquiry into the alleged misconduct of assault against the delinquent workman was held by two officers who themselves were the victims of the alleged assault. Affirming the award of the tribunal, that the inquiry was vitiated, the Supreme Court observed 'that the inquiry officers were not only in the position of judges, but also the prosecutors and witnesses and there was no opportunity to the persons charged to cross-examine them and indeed they had drawn upon their own knowledge of the incident and instead cross-examined the person charged, which was a travesty of the principles of natural justice.[9] In Lambabari Tea Estate, in which the domestic inquiry was presided over by the manager himself and was conducted in the presence of the assistant manager and two others, the manager recorded the statements, cross-examined the labourers who were the offenders, made and recorded his own statement of facts and questioned the offending labourers about the truth of his own statements recorded by himself. Hidayatullah J observed:

> The manager did not keep his function as the inquiring officer distinct but became witness, prosecutor and manager in turns. The record of the inquiry as a result is staccato and unsatisfactory. [10]

In other words, inquiry should always be entrusted to a person who is not a witness or biased against the workmen because an inquiry cannot be said to be properly held when the person holding the inquiry is biased and begins to rely on his own statements. If it is not possible to find such a person, some officer from another establishment should be asked to help in the matter. Likewise, a person who has witnessed the event which is the subject-matter of the charge-sheet and held the domestic inquiry in the charges. For instance, where an officer himself had seen the stolen property recovered from the delinquent workman, was held not to be an unbiased inquiry officer against the workman[11] but the mere fact, that the inquiry officer accompanied the assaulted person to the police station on the day following the day of occurrence, would not make the inquiry officer an eye-witness of the occurrence and incompetent to hold the inquiry.[12] It is desirable that the inquiry should be left to be held by some other persons, who are not likely to import their personal knowledge into the proceedings which they are holding as inquiry officers because where the inquiry is held by a person, who has himself witnessed the alleged incident, injustice is likely to result.[13] It is open to the employer to entrust an inquiry against a delinquent workman in an act of misconduct to an outsider. There is no rule that in every case an inquiry must be held by an officer of the employer company and it cannot be said that a domestic inquiry is illegal or void merely because the person who held the inquiry was an outsider and not an officer of the employer.[14] Likewise, if an employer company, appoints a person from another establishment at another place who could be expected to take more detached and impartial view of things instead of appointing a local officer as inquiry officer, in the absence of any provision in the Standing Orders to the contrary, no prejudice can be said to have been caused to the workman, particularly when he does not take objection to the appointment of such an officer in the initial stages and appears before him and submits to his jurisdiction, he cannot later be heard to be saying that he was, in any way, prejudiced on account of the appointment of the inquiry officer.[15]

In Buckingham & Carnatic, the relevant Standing Order required that in dismissal cases, the 'manager' of the mills should hold the inquiry. The mill manager asked the senior labour officer of the mills to record evidence of the witnesses after issuing the charge-sheet to the concerned workman. After considering the evidence recorded by the senior labour officer, the mill manager found the workman guilty of the charges and dismissed him from service. The order of dismissal was challenged, before the labour court on the ground that it was only the mill manager who could validly hold the inquiry and since the evidence was recorded by the senior labour officer, it was bad for non-compliance with the requirements of the relevant Standing Orders. Affirming the decision of the labour court, the Supreme Court held that the senior labour officer had confined himself to merely collecting evidence and it was the mill manager who had found him guilty of the charge after giving fair and full opportunity to the workman, and consequently, passed the order of dismissal and there was no Standing Order prohibiting the mill manager from asking the senior labour officer from collecting the evidence.[16] In TELCO, speaking for the court, Shelat J observed that an inquiry officer is not entitled to bring the facts which do not form part of the evidence in his report and doing so would vitiate the inquiry. However, from the report of the inquiry officer, it was clear that no extraneous matter was relied on by him in holding any of the workman guilty of the charges against him and the observations regarding such matters were merely incidental. The court stated the general rule in the following words:

> Industrial tribunals, while considering the findings of domestic inquiries, must bear in mind that persons appointed to hold such inquiries are not lawyers and that such inquiries are of a simple nature where technical rules as to evidence and procedure do not prevail. Such findings are not to be lightly brushed aside merely because the inquiry officers, while writing their reports, have mentioned facts which are not strictly borne out by the evidence before them. Of course, if the inquiry officer were to transgress the rules of natural justice by relying on matters which the workman had no opportunity to meet, the validity of his findings would be affected. [17]

In Pravin Dudhara, the management appointed an inquiry officer, but it did not appoint any presenting officer to represent its case before the inquiry officer. In this situation, during the course of the evidence, the inquiry officer asked some clarificatory questions of the witnesses. The inquiry was challenged on the ground that the inquiry officer combined the role of the judge and the prosecutor by asking the questions of the witnesses. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, that the questions asked by the inquiry officer, were not in the nature of cross-examination but were merely of clarificatory nature. Furthermore, the inquiry officer had given full opportunity to the delinquent to cross-examine all the witnesses of the management. It was not obligatory on the part of the management to appoint a presiding officer. In this situation, it was held that the inquiry was not vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice.[18] In Shyam Bahadur Tripathi, the domestic inquiry into the charges against the delinquent employee was transferred to the departmental officer from impartial officers in violation of the departmental instructions which directed that the inquiry should be held by independent agencies like retired judicial officers. The Supreme Court held that the instructions were only guidelines for the authorities. It was, therefore, an appropriate case where the power of the corporation to entrust the inquiry to its own officer was validly exercised. The conduct of the inquiry officer in the circumstances of the case was not vitiated.[19]

(ii) Procedure of Domestic Inquiry

Neither the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 nor the rules thereunder prescribe any procedure to be followed by employers in domestic inquiries for investigating the misconduct of delinquent industrial employees.[20] An inquiry officer has limited powers, unlike a regular court where oath can be administered and attendance of witnesses can be compelled and where counsel can represent the parties, because domestic inquiries are not governed by strict rules of evidence. Therefore, while judging the evidence led before such a domestic inquiry, it is not open to apply strict standards.[21] It is well-settled that the domestic inquiries do not stand on the same pedestal with the trials of actions or cases in a court; they are not governed by technical rules or procedural law.[22] In the absence of any statutory provisions relating to procedure, the domestic inquiries held by employers in dealing with cases of misconduct alleged against their employees, though need not conform to all the requirements of judicial proceedings, they must, however, satisfy the essentials of natural justice.[23] The guiding principle, therefore, is that the inquiry should be conducted with scrupulous regard for the requirements of the rules of natural justice, that is, without bias, and by giving the delinquent employee, an opportunity for adequately representing his case, as the question of action taken by the employer is at issue. Apart from compliance with the requirement of the rules of natural justice, the inquiry must be held honestly and bona fide with a view to determine whether the charge against a particular employee is proved or not and care must be taken to see that these inquiries do not become empty formalities.[24]

The basic postulate of a domestic inquiry is that it must be fair in all respects and should not be conducted with 'evil eye and uneven hand'. Fairness, particularly requires that it must be conducted as expeditiously as possible without brooking any unnecessary delay. Normally, disciplinary proceedings must commence at an early date and should be completed without much delay. There is no period of limitation for initiating the disciplinary proceedings but it must be held within 'a reasonable time and the length of the reasonable time must be determined by the facts of the case and the nature of the order' passed in such proceedings.[25] The mere fact that there was some delay in initiating the disciplinary proceedings will not be sufficient to vitiate the inquiry. If the delay causes prejudice to the workman, normally courts will take serious note of it,[26] but initiation of disciplinary proceedings, itself may lead to the inference of mala fide on the part of the employer. In Jagdishmal Bhansali,[27] the employee was exonerated of the charges levelled against him on the basis of a preliminary inquiry and thereafter he was even promoted to the next rank but nine years after that, in the preliminary inquiry, a regular inquiry was initiated against him without assigning any reasons for revocation of the earlier decision. The Rajasthan High Court held that the initiation of the disciplinary proceeding culminating in dismissal of the employee was not only violative of the rules of natural justice but the entire exercise was mala fide and motivated to punish the workman. The steps generally taken in holding a domestic inquiry are: (a) Notice of Inquiry; (b) Pleadings; (c) Representation of Parties; (d) Evidence and Rules of Natural Justice.

(a) Notice of Inquiry

In order to be able to take part in the inquiry, the charged workmen must have notice of the day, time and place of inquiry. The charge-sheet cannot be equated to the notice of inquiry. Even if the workman fails to submit his reply to the charge-sheet, the inquiry officer is not absolved from his duty to send the notice to the delinquent employee informing him about the date, time and place of inquiry which would enable him to produce his witnesses and cross-examine the witnesses produced against him. Non-compliance of this requirement, would be violative of rules of natural justice.[28] Fairness demands that the workman should be told sufficiently in advance as to when and where the inquiry is going to be held so that he has an opportunity to prepare himself to make his defence at the inquiry and to collect such evidence as he wishes to lead in support of his defence. It would not be proper that the workman should be called on any day without previous intimation and the inquiry should begin straight-away. It may be that failure to intimate the workman concerned about the date of the inquiry may, by itself, not constitute an infirmity in the inquiry, but such a course should ordinarily be avoided in holding domestic inquiries in industrial matters.[29] A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held:

> It is the function of the management to serve notice and to inform the employee verbally in the presence of a witness the date and time at which the inquiry into his alleged misconduct is to be held. The Standing Orders do not require that the inquiry officer has to initiate the preliminary proceedings regarding giving of notice and informing the employee concerned of the date and time when the matter would be taken up and of the allegations against him. [30]

In this view of law, the High Court discountenanced the view taken by the tribunal that the inquiry officer assumed the functions of a judge and it is for him to fix a date and time for the inquiry and to inform both parties about the same, because the duty is cast upon the employer under the Standing Orders and the tribunal has to see whether the procedure laid down in the Standing Orders has been observed or not. If an inquiry is held without informing the workman of the specific time of the inquiry,[31] or if he is informed in the forenoon to attend the domestic inquiry in the same evening,[32] it will not be sufficient notice of inquiry and would be a denial of reasonable opportunity but there is no statutory provision requiring that a delinquent workman should be given an opportunity to explain why an inquiry in respect of a charge should not be conducted against him. All that he is entitled to have is that he should be given a notice of the charges against him and of the allegations on which the charges are based, and a fair and reasonable opportunity to meet the charges and establish his defence, if any, before the inquiring authority.[33] Though the principles of natural justice require that a notice of proposed domestic inquiry to be held should be given to the concerned workman, they do not require that even if after giving the notice the concerned person remains absent, the inquiry should not be held in his absence. In other words, a domestic inquiry, held ex parte after giving the concerned workman due notice, would not be violative of the principles of natural justice.[34]

The mode of giving the notice of the domestic inquiry may be provided by the Standing Orders of an establishment. If the notice is given in compliance with the requirements of the Standing Orders, it will be sufficient notice. In McKenzie, before commencing the inquiry, the management sent notices of the inquiry to the concerned workmen by registered post at their addresses registered with the company and also affixed the notices on the company's notice board, both inside the premises and outside the gate of the factory and these notices had remained so affixed for a month and a half. Some of the notices sent by registered post were returned unserved. The company had also written to the union asking for the addresses of the workmen who had not been served, but no reply was received. Subsequently, the inquiry proceeded ex parte against those workmen who were absent as a result of which some of the workmen were found guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged against them and their services were terminated. While upholding the action of the management, the Supreme Court observed that the company had made every effort, under the circumstances, to serve the notice on the workmen concerned in the inquiry and it could not be said that the workmen did not have a proper notice of the charges or were not given a proper opportunity to meet the case against them.[35] In Bata Shoe Co, the Standing Orders of the company provided that the workman charged with any misconduct shall receive a copy of the charge against him and there was no provision in the Standing Orders for affixing the charges on the notice board of the company. The company dismissed 60 of its workmen for having participated in an illegal strike and in the case of 13 of these workmen, it was proved that they had not been served with the charge-sheet and the notice of inquiry and the inquiry took place in their absence. The company had posted the notices and the charge-sheets on its notice board and also published the notices and charge-sheets in the local papers, when the charge-sheets sent by registered post had been returned unserved. However,the notice of inquiry published in the local papers did not contain the names of the 13 workmen. In these circumstances, it was held that these workmen did not have notice of the inquiry. The court observed that the mere display of the notices on the notice board or their publication in the newspaper without specifying the names of the persons charged would not meet the requirements of communication adequately. In view of this basic lapse, the order of dismissal was held invalid on the ground that principles of natural justice were violated.[36] Likewise, where the delinquent workman was not aware of the inquiry held against him and there was no allegation or proof adduced by the employer that the workman deliberately evaded service of the notice intimating him about the date of the inquiry, the inquiry was held to be vitiated for want of proper notice.[37]

(b) Pleadings

In industrial adjudication, for instance, the fact that all aspects of the question in reference to the charter of a worker's employment were not set out in the written statement, would not affect the credibility of the evidence led by him at the trial.[38]However, the pleadings of the parties before an inquiry officer must state their respective cases, though they may not strictly conform to the technical procedural requirements. Since, after the insertion of s 11A in the Industrial Disputes Act, the tribunals will have to confine themselves to the 'materials on record', the pleadings of the parties, before the inquiry officer, have become all the more of vital importance. The tribunals will not permit the parties to go beyond these pleadings while adjudicating upon the industrial disputes falling within the purview of s 11A.

(c) Representation of Parties

The traditional judicial approach to the representation of the parties before the domestic tribunals is that a domestic inquiry is a managerial function and as such, it is best left to the management without the intervention of outsiders and persons belonging to legal profession. This approach is based on the view that inquiries before the domestic tribunal are of simple nature where technical rules as to evidence and procedure do not prevail and the persons appointed to hold such inquiries are generally not lawyers.[39] In other words, inquiry officers holding inquiry without being unduly influenced by strict rules of evidence and the procedural juggernaut should hear the delinquent employee in person and in such an informal inquiry, the delinquent officer would best be able to defend himself.[40] There is no provision of law entitling the charged workman to be represented by anybody else before the domestic inquiries. The rules of natural justice do not postulate that in domestic inquiries into the charges of misconduct against an industrial employee, he should be represented by a member of his union.[41] In N Kalindi, the Supreme Court observed that a workman had no right to be represented in the domestic inquiry by a representative of his union though the inquiry officer in his discretion, may allow an employee to avail himself of such assistance. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the court held that the inquiry was not vitiated by the fact that the delinquent workmen were not allowed to be represented in the domestic inquiry by a representative of their union.[42] In Brooke Bond, the court held that the refusal by the inquiry officer to allow a workman to be represented by a lawyer or by an outsider, did not vitiate the inquiry.[43] In the absence of any provision in the Standing Orders, the general practice adopted by the domestic tribunals is that the accused person himself conducts his case but generally, the Standing Orders of large industrial establishments make provisions for representation of parties through outsiders in domestic inquiries. In other words, the refusal by the inquiry officer to a party to be represented by another person permitted by the Standing Orders would vitiate the inquiry.[44] In Dunlop, the Standing Orders of the company provided that only a representative of the union which was registered under the Indian Trade Unions Act 1926 and was recognised by the Government could represent a workman in the domestic inquiry. The Supreme Court held that the refusal by the inquiry officer to allow the workman to be assisted by the workman's own union which was not registered or recognised did not vitiate the inquiry. The court observed:

> In holding domestic inquiries, reasonable opportunity should be given to the delinquent employees to meet the charge framed against them and it is desirable that at such inquiry the employees should be given liberty to represent their case by persons of their choice if there is no Standing Order against such a course being adopted and if there is nothing otherwise objectionable in the said request.[45]

It was held that there is no right to representation as such, unless the employer by his Standing Orders recognised such a right and the refusal to allow representation by any union, unless Standing Orders confer that right, would not vitiate the proceedings. In the circumstances of the case, refusal of the inquiry officer to accede to the request made by the workman did not introduce any serious defect in the inquiry itself. However, the latest trend is in the direction of permitting a person who is likely to suffer serious civil or pecuniary consequences as a result of the inquiry, to enable him to defend himself adequately by outsiders or legal practitioners.[46] In England, speaking for the Court of Appeal in Greyhound Racing, Lord Denning, MR, observed that when a man's reputation or livelihood is at stake, he not only has a right to speak by his own mouth but has also the right to speak by counsel or solicitor.[47] This view of Lord Denning was not followed by the Indian courts earlier, but they gradually started recognising that the denial of assistance to a delinquent workman who is an illiterate person, would amount to denial of fair opportunity.[48] In the last edition of this book at p 820, it was stated thus:

> But the observations of Lord MR Denning, in Pett's case are worthy of a serious consideration. In this connection, it may not be irrelevant to point out that in a domestic inquiry in a disciplinary matter, verily the reputation and the livelihood of a workman are at stake. In a number of decisions, the Supreme Court has noted that industrial workmen in India are illiterate persons.[49]

These days, generally, the persons who are appointed to hold inquiries are well trained persons and occasionally even lawyers are appointed for this purpose. The employers also have highly trained persons who represent them in such inquiries. If a workman is not properly represented, he may be seriously prejudiced in his defence. Apart from illiteracy, it is not every man who has the ability to defend himself on his own as he may not be able to bring out the points in his own favour or the weakness of the other side as successfully as a skilled man in this behalf may be able to do. The workman may be nervous, tongue-tied, confused or wanting in intelligence and thus lack the ability to examine or cross-examine witnesses.[50] Desai J, observed:

> In the absence of embargo on the right of the delinquent employee to be represented by a legal practitioner, the matter would be in the discretion of the inquiry officer whether looking to the nature of the charges, the type of evidence and complex or simple issues that may arise in the course of inquiry, the delinquent employee in order to afford reasonable opportunity to defend himself should be permitted to appear through a legal practitioner .. In our view we have reached a stage in our onward march to fair play in action that where in an inquiry before a domestic tribunal the delinquent officer is pitted against a legally trained mind, if he seeks permission to appear through a legal practitioner refusal to grant his request would amount to denial of a reasonable request to defend himself and the essential principles of natural justice would be violated. [51]

The Calcutta High Court in Director General, P&T, held that the refusal to allow a public servant to be represented by a legal practitioner in a domestic inquiry was violative of the statutory rule as well as Art 311 (2) of the Constitution.[52] Another Division Bench of that High Court, dealing with an industrial matter in India Photographic, has enunciated the principle that though the court should discourage the involvement of legal practitioners in simple domestic inquiries like disciplinary inquiries for avoiding complication and delay, yet the court cannot ignore the necessity of such representation in exceptional circumstances where refusal of such a representation would constitute failure of the inquiry itself, the principles of natural justice demand conceding of such a claim. However, the court pointed out that no general rule could be laid down in this respect but the issue must be left for consideration in the light of the facts of each individual case. In this case, the delinquent workman was charged with the offences of misconduct of forgery and misappropriation, which if established would not only affect his reputation and livelihood but would also totally ruin his life. In the circumstances, it was held that the court rightly exercised its discretion when it directed that the workman be permitted to be represented by a lawyer in this domestic inquiry.[53]

On the other hand, a single-judge of the Madras High Court in A Veeman, held that the facts of the case did not warrant permitting engagement of a lawyer in the domestic inquiry. The court observed that in a domestic inquiry, the workman cannot insist on taking the assistance of the legal practitioner as an inherent right though it is to be ensured that he does not stand at a disadvantage and there is no breach of the rule of fair play.[54] In Harinarayan Srivastav, the Supreme Court held that where the allegations were very simple and were not complicated, the denial of permission to be represented by an advocate would not violate the principles of natural justice, even though the bipartite settlement provides for such representation with the permission of the management.[55] ln Bharat Petroleum, the Supreme Court held that the basic principle is that an employee has no right of representation in the departmental proceedings by any other person or lawyer unless the service rules specifically provided for the same.[56] Where the Standing Orders provided that a workman can be defended in a domestic inquiry by a lawyer only with the permission of the management, it was held that the workman had no absolute right to be defended by an advocate in the enquiry, and it could not be said that there was violation of principles of natural justice merely because he was denied permission to be defended by an advocate.[57] As against this, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that where the rules applicable to domestic inquiry do not provide for assistance of lawyer for both the employer and the employee, if the employer had chosen a person who is legally trained, the principles of natural justice require that the employee's request for assistance of a lawyer should be accepted by the management.[58] Merely because the word 'fraud' was used in the charge-sheet, it does not make the charges 'serious' in order to entitle the workman to be represented by a lawyer, as provided in the bipartite settlement, and the denial of representation by a lawyer could not be said to have vitiated the inquiry. The tribunal acted in excess of its jurisdiction in interfering with the inquiry on that count.[59]

There is no principle of natural justice that a person who had lodged a complaint cannot present his case and be a prosecutor in a domestic inquiry. A domestic inquiry, therefore, in which the complainant himself was the prosecutor would not be vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice.[60] Likewise, where a person who complains about the misconduct of the delinquent workman and in that capacity, gives evidence before the domestic inquiry and also represents the management in the course of the inquiry, there is no violation of the principles of natural justice,[61] as in no sense does he acts as a prosecutor and judge simultaneously. If any inquiry is not fair on the ground of denial of proper representation, it is open to the aggrieved workman to challenge its validity in the course of adjudication of the industrial dispute before the tribunal.[62] If the workman is not represented by a legal practitioner before an inquiry officer, the management cannot validly insist that it must be represented through a lawyer. If a workman is permitted to be represented through a lawyer before an inquiry officer in the facts and circumstances of a particular case, the management too cannot be denied the same facility. Normally, large industrial establishments have highly trained officers who are engaged to represent the management in the domestic inquiries. However, it is not incumbent on the management that it must appoint a representing officer before the domestic inquiry. It may leave to the inquiry officer himself to elicit relevant information from the witnesses presented before him by the management and the workman. Such procedure is permissible as long as the inquiry officer does not play the role of the representing officer.

In K Kasi, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that there was no legal compulsion that a presenting officer should be appointed. The mere fact that the presenting officer is not appointed by the management is no ground to invalidate an inquiry. If, however, the inquiry officer plays the role of a prosecutor and cross-examines the defence witnesses or puts leading questions to the prosecuting witnesses thus, clearly exposing a biased state of mind, the inquiry would be opposed to the principles of natural justice. However, if the questions put by the inquiry officer to the witnesses are merely for clarification wherever it becomes necessary, the inquiry cannot be impeached as unfair so long as the delinquent workman is permitted to cross-examine the witnesses after the inquiry officer has put the questions to the witnesses. In this case, the tribunal had not pointed out any particular question put by the inquiry officer to the witnesses, which could be regarded objectionable and exposing a state of mind on the part of the inquiry officer. It was, therefore, held that an inference that the inquiry officer had played the role of prosecutor was not permissible. Therefore, the inquiry could not be held to be unfair.[63] In Venkateshwara Reddy, on review of the earlier dicta, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court has stated the following principles regarding the employee's right to be defended by a legal practitioner in a domestic inquiry:

(a) The right to be represented by a legal practitioner is not an element of principle of natural justice.

(b) A delinquent employee will have the right to claim to be defended by a legal practitioner, where the rules or regulations permit the employee to be represented by a legal practitioner.

(c) Where the rules or regulations are silent about representation by a lawyer or vest discretion in the disciplinary authority or the inquiring authority, to permit the employee to be represented by a legal practitioner or other agent of his choice, denial of such permission on a request made by the employee, would violate the principles of natural justice—

(i) if the presenting officer is a legal practitioner or a person legally trained or experienced; or

(ii) if the charges are of a serious and complex nature.

(d) Where the rules or regulations specifically prohibit the employee from engaging the service of a legal practitioner, such rules or regulations will be read down as vesting a discretion in the disciplinary authority to permit the employee to engage a legal practitioner, where—

(i) the presenting officer is a legal practitioner or legally trained person; or

(ii) the charges are of a serious and complex nature. If it is not so read down, the rule itself may have to be held to be invalid as violating Art 14 of the Constitution. [64]

Where the employer granted the request of the delinquent to be represented by a legal practitioner in the domestic inquiry, the employer can also avail the services of a legally trained person to be the presenting officer, and the mere appointment of a legal practitioner as the presenting officer would not ipso facto violate the principles of natural justice.[65] Mere refusal by the inquiry officer to permit the delinquent employee to take the assistance of a co-worker at the domestic inquiry, as provided for in the Punjab Civil Services Rules, does not result in the invalidation of the inquiry proceedings and the order of punishment. The court has to examine whether violation of principles of natural justice has caused prejudice to the delinquent employee in such cases.[66]

(d) Evidence and Rules of Natural Justice

The strict technical rules of procedure of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 do not apply even to the adjudicatory proceedings before the adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 much less would they 'apply to domestic inquiries'.[67] In TR Varma, Venkatarama Ayyar J, observed:

> The law requires that such tribunals should observe rules of natural justice in the conduct of the inquiry, and if they do so, their decision is not liable to the impeached on the ground that the procedure followed was not in accordance with that, which obtained in a court of law,...the inquiry is not open to attack on the ground that the procedure laid down in the Evidence Act for taking evidence was not strictly followed.[68]

In Rattan Singh, Krishna Iyer J held:

> It is well-settled that in a domestic inquiry the strict and sophisticated rules of evidence under the Indian Evidence Act may not apply. All materials which are logically probative for a prudent mind are permissible. There is no allergy to hearsay evidence provided ithas reasonable nexus and credibility. It is true that departmental authorities and administrative tribunals must be careful in evaluating such material and should not glibly swallow what is strictly speaking not relevant under the Indian Evidence Act...The essence of a judicial approach is objectivity, exclusion of extraneous materials or considerations and observance of rules of natural justice. Of course, fair play is the basis and if perversity or arbitrariness, bias or surrender of independence of judgment vitiate the conclusions reached, such finding, even though of a domestic tribunal, cannot be held good.[69]

Merely because the rules of evidence and procedure do not apply to domestic inquiries and the employer and workmen are subject to rules laid down in the Standing Orders, it does not mean that the rules of natural justice and fair play are to be ignored. The rules of natural justice are matters not of form but of substance. The effect of the violation of the rules of natural justice must result in some sort of sufferance, handicap or prejudice to the delinquent. The alleged prejudice caused to the delinquent, resulting from the alleged violation of the rules of natural justice must be pleaded and proved before the tribunal.[70] However, mere breach of bare technicalities cannot be equated with violation of the rules of natural justice. Nor is it the duty of the inquiry officer to explain various aspects of law or natural justice as to what sort of representations he might have in law in case he chooses to ask for the same. The delinquent must assert his own right. If, however, the inquiry is proceeded with in a slip-shod way or in a manner which might indicate that the inquiry officer was proceeding on the basis of standard of proof which is wrong in law and not consistent with the principles of natural justice then in that event, the inquiry proceedings might be vitiated.[71] If the inquiry officer does not comply with the rules of natural justice, that is to say, does not give reasonable opportunity to the employee of being heard and to lead evidence and cross-examine the witnesses of the opposite party or he himself is biased against the employee, the inquiry will be invalid.[72] In other words, a domestic inquiry into the misconduct of an employee would be proper only if it is held in accordance with the rules of natural justice. The quintessence of the rules of natural justice was stated by B N Banerjee J of the Calcutta High Court in the following words:

> The principle of natural justice in its journey through the centuries, has shed much of its glories and is now crystallised into four principle of justice, namely:
>
> (i) opportunity for both the contesting parties to be heard;
>
> (ii) hearing before an impartial tribunal so that no man can be a judge of his own cause;
>
> (iii) decision made in good faith; and
>
> (iv) an orderly course of procedure.[73]

Apart from this, no other principle of natural justice is known in modern Jurisprudence. 'Principles of natural justice are not codified rules. Their greatest virtue is adaptability to changing situations. Once the principles of natural justice are reduced to formalistic straight jackets fettering administrative discretion, the principles cease to be natural.[74] The principle that before a workman can be found guilty for inflicting the punishment of dismissal, he must have been recognised, implicated and named by more than one witness, cannot be invoked in domestic inquiries or industrial adjudication.[75] In a domestic inquiry, guilt need not be established beyond reasonable doubt; proof of misconduct may be sufficient.[76]The inquiry officer can take into consideration the evidence of an accomplice which undoubtedly will be legal evidence. If the evidence of a co-accused would constitute legal evidence on which the inquiry officer could act, even though retracted from, would not in any way render finding of guilt in respect of the delinquent workman, incorrect.[77] The provisions of s 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 too have no application to departmental inquiries.[78]

Before commencing to record the evidence of the parties, it would be but fair that the inquiry officer should explain to the delinquent workman the charges levelled against him.[79]Legal evidence may be direct evidence or indirect evidence. Direct evidence is what has been defined in s 60 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 vis-a-vis oral evidence. As against direct evidence, (s s 60, 62 and 63 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872), there is another type of evidence which is known as circumstantial evidence. Direct evidence as well as circumstantial evidence is legal evidence but the concept of hearsay evidence is entirely different. In criminal law, hearsay evidence is inadmissible to prove the fact which is deposed to on hearsay. However, it does not necessarily preclude evidence as to a statement having been made upon which certain action was taken or certain results followed. In so far as domestic inquiries in disciplinary proceedings are concerned, the hearsay evidence may be admissible provided it has reasonable nexus and credibility. The word 'hearsay' is used in various senses. Sometimes, it means whatever a person is heard to say; sometimes it means whatever a person declares on information given by someone else. The evidence of a statement made to a witness who is not called as a witness may or may not be 'hearsay'. It is 'hearsay' and inadmissible when the object of the evidence is to establish the truth of what is contained in the statement. It is not 'hearsay' and is admissible when it is proposed to establish by the evidence, not the truth of the statement but the fact that it was made. The fact that it was made quite apart from its truth, is frequently relevant in considering the mental state and conduct thereafter of the witness or some other persons in whose presence such a statement is made.[80] In the language of Krishna Iyer J in Rattan Singh (supra) 'there is no allergy to hearsay evidence provided it has reasonable nexus and credibility'.

Generally, industrial employers may provide the procedure for holding domestic inquiries in their Standing Orders, if applicable, or the service rules. If there are any rules regarding holding of domestic inquiries prescribed either by the Standing Orders, rules or by any other provision of law, then those Standing Orders, rules or the law must be followed. A domestic inquiry against a charge-sheeted workman, without complying with the procedure laid down in the Standing Orders would be invalid as held by the Supreme Court in Imperial Tobacco.[81] In cases, where the Standing Orders or the service rules do not prescribe any procedure or there are no Standing Orders or service rules, though the domestic inquiries need not confirm to all requirements of judicial proceedings, they must, however, satisfy the essential requirements of natural justice.[82] The purpose of the rules of natural justice is to safeguard the position of the person against whom an inquiry is being conducted, so that he is able to meet the charges levelled against him, properly. Though the rules of natural justice do not change from tribunal to tribunal, even so the nature of inquiry and the status of person against whom inquiry is held will have some bearing on what should be the minimum requirements of the rules of natural justice. Where, for example, lawyers are permitted before a domestic tribunal holding an inquiry and the party against whom the inquiry is being held, is represented by a lawyer, mere reading of the material to be used in the inquiry may sometimes, be sufficient but where in a domestic inquiry against industrial workers, most of whom are illiterate, and lawyers are not permitted to defend them and sometimes even the representatives of the labour unions are also not present to defend them, something more than a mere reading of statements to be used against them will have to be required in order to safeguard their interest.[83] The ambit of the principles of natural justice which must be followed by the inquiry officers in such inquiries is well settled by judicial pronouncements.[84] Such inquiries, therefore, have to be held with scrupulous regard for the requirements of rules of natural justice as questions of bona fides or mala fides of employer are at issue.[85] The requirements of natural justice broadly are that:

(i) the inquiry must be held by a person who is not biased in favour or against either of the parties; and

(ii) the delinquent employee should be given a fair opportunity of adequately representing his case by hearing the evidence in support of the charge, and to cross-examine the witnesses produced against him and also be allowed to rebut the evidence led against him by examining witnesses including himself if he so wishes on any relevant matter.[86]

Bias

The principles of bias have been discussed in detail under the caption 'Rules of natural justice' under s 17(2) (infra). The law relating to the bias of the inquiry officers has been discussed under the topic 'Inquiry officer' (supra). However, it may be relevant to note here that a remote apprehension in the mind of the workman that the inquiry officer would be biased against him is not sufficient to vitiate the disciplinary proceedings on the ground of bias. Likewise, the mere fact that the inquiry officer was a superior to the delinquent workman, is not sufficient to hold that he was biased against the workman. It is only in cases where the court has acceptable materials to infer bias that the court will lean in favour of a delinquent, when a charge of bias is made against the enquiry officer. Otherwise, it will always be easy for a delinquent workman to defeat the domestic inquiry by making aspersions against the officer conducting the domestic inquiry or by making false imputations.[87] Particularly, where a man categorically says that he has no objection to a particular person holding the inquiry and also makes no allegation against him; he cannot be allowed to raise the question of bias of inquiry officer later.[88] There is no principle of natural justice that a person who has lodged a complaint cannot be a presenting officer and prosecutor in a domestic inquiry. That itself will not vitiate a domestic inquiry if no other question of prejudice is there.[89]

Reasonable Opportunity

Before imposing the punishment of discharge or dismissal, fair play requires that the delinquent workman is given a reasonable opportunity to put forth his defence before the inquiry officer in the inquiry proceedings in accordance with the rules of natural justice.[90] Natural justice ordains that the inquiry should be held impartially, objectively and after giving an opportunity of hearing to the delinquent workman.[91] Fair opportunity and fair trial are elements of the principles of natural justice which are always applied to the facts and circumstances of a case and not understood in the abstract.[92] The two elements of a reasonable opportunity of being heard are that firstly, an opportunity to be heard must be given; and secondly, this opportunity must be reasonable. Both these matters are justifiable and it is for the tribunal to decide whether an opportunity has been given and whether that opportunity has been reasonable.[93] There can be no invariable standard for 'reasonableness' in such matters except that the adjudicator's conscience must be satisfied, that the workman against whom disciplinary action is proposed has had a fair chance of convincing the inquiry officer that the grounds on which the action is proposed are either non-existent or even if they exist they do not justify the proposed action. The decision of this question will necessarily depend upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case, including the nature of the action proposed, grounds on which the action is proposed, the material on which the charges are based, the attitude of the workman against whom the action is proposed in defending himself in the inquiry, the nature of the pleas raised by him in reply, the request for further opportunity that may be made, his admission by conduct or otherwise of some or all the charges and all other relevant matters which help the mind in coming to a fair conclusion on the question.[94] What is 'reasonable opportunity' will depend on the facts of each case, depending particularly on the nature of the allegation, the witnesses and their availability and the time and assistance required for preparation to appear at the inquiry.[95]

In Thejvir Singh, where the inquiry officer gave the workman only one day's notice to face the inquiry, refused the request for adjournment, asked him to cross-examine witnesses with non-familiar matters and to present his defence in an hour, the Supreme Court held that the inquiry was conducted in gross violation of the principles of natural justice, without giving real and fair opportunity to the workman to participate in the proceedings.[96] Similarly, in Anglo American Direct Tea Trading, the charge-sheet did not show on what evidence the management would rely for the purpose of supporting the charge and the witnesses that the management wanted to examine were not disclosed and the workman was asked to send his list of witnesses within 24 hours, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that it could not be said that the workman was given a 'fair opportunity' to defend himself and establish his innocence with reference to the charge framed against him.[1] On the other hand in Ram Bilash Goel, where the delinquent was given 72 hours to submit explanation for refusing to work over-time, considering the nature of the charge and witnesses proposed to be cross-examined, the time allowed was not considered to be inadequate.[2] In TR Varma, Venkatarama Ayyar J observed:

> Stating it broadly and without intending it to be exhaustive, it may be observed that rules of natural justice require that a party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies, that the evidence of the opponent should be taken in his presence, and that he should be given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined by that party, and that no materials should be relied on against him without his being given an opportunity of explaining them.[3]

The basic requirement of a fair opportunity is that inquiry must be conducted honestly and in a bona fide manner with a view to determining whether the charge framed against a particular employee is proved or not, and therefore, care must be taken to see that the inquiry does not become empty formality.[4] 'Reasonable opportunity' means not only framing charges and asking for explanation but much more. The employee must be apprised of the material on which the charges were framed, so that he could have a proper opportunity of testing or challenging that material so far as would be possible for him.[5] Though the technical rules of procedure and evidence do not apply to domestic inquiries, the rules of natural justice require that when a fact is sought to be proved before a tribunal, it must be supported by statements made in the presence of the person against whom the inquiry is held and if a statement is made at his back, it ought not to be treated as substantive evidence.[6] Therefore, all the evidence against the person concerned should be taken in his presence and he should be given an adequate opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses giving evidence against him, and that no material should be relied on against him, without his being given an opportunity of explaining it. The delinquent workman should further be given the opportunity of questioning the witnesses after knowing in full what they have to state against him. The witnesses on whom the employer relies, should generally be examined in the presence of the delinquent workman and he must also be informed of the material sought to be used against him and give an opportunity to explain it.[7] In Meenglass, Hidayatullah J, observed:

> It is an elementary principle that a person who is required to answer a charge must know not only the accusation but also the testimony by which the accusation is supported. He must be given a fair chance to hear the evidence in support of the charge and to put such relevant questions by way of cross-examination as he desires. Then he must be given a chance to rebut the evidence led against him. This is the barest requirement of an inquiry of this character and this requirement must be substantially fulfilled before the result of the inquiry can be accepted. A departure from this requirement in effect throws the burden upon the person charged to repel the charge without first making it out against him.[8]

The basic concept is fair play in action—administrative, judicial or quasi-judicial but the concept of fair play in action must depend on the particular lis, if there be any, between the parties. When on the question of facts there is no dispute, no real prejudice has been caused to a party aggrieved by an order, absence of any formal opportunity of cross-examination per se does not invalidate or vitiate the decision arrived at fairly, particularly more so when the party against whom an order has been passed does not dispute the facts and does not demand to test the veracity of the version or the credibility of the statement. In KL Tripathi, Sabyasachi Mukharji J, observed:

> If the credibility of a person who has testified or given some information is in doubt, or if the version or the statement of the person who has testified, is in dispute, right of cross-examination must inevitably form part of fair play in action but where there is no lis regarding the facts but certain explanation of the circumstances there is no requirement of cross-examination to be fulfilled to justify the fair play in action...The party who does not want to controvert the veracity of the evidence from or testimony gathered behind his back cannot expect to succeed in any subsequent demand that there was no opportunity of cross-examination specially when it was not asked for and there was no dispute about the veracity of the statements. When there is no dispute as to the facts or the weight to be attached on disputed facts but only an explanation of the facts, absence of opportunity to cross-examination does not create any prejudice in such cases.[9]

In dealing with domestic inquiries held in industrial matters, the fact that in a large majority of cases employees are likely to be illiterate and ignorant, should be borne in mind.[10] The inquiry officer has to take care in the facts and circumstances of each case that the defence of the workman is not prejudiced in any manner. The rules of natural justice require that the workman proceeded against should be informed clearly of the charges levelled against him; witnesses should be normally examined in his presence in respect of the charges; if statements taken previously and given by witnesses are relied on, they should be made available to the workman concerned; the workman should be given a fair opportunity to examine witnesses, including himself, in support of his defence; and the inquiry officer should record his findings based on the evidence so adduced.[11] In other words, before a person is punished, he should be told fairly and clearly what is the offence charged against him and he should be given reasonable opportunity to adduce such evidence as he chooses in his defence and to cross-examine the employer's witnesses or demolish the evidence that is produced against him. All the materials relied against the delinquent workman in coming to the conclusion by the inquiring authority should be made known to the workman concerned.[12] A single-judge of the Karnataka High Court in Venkateshwara Reddy, has laid down the following requirements of reasonable procedure subject to any special provisions relating to procedure in the relevant rules, regulations, Standing Orders or a statute:

(a) the employee shall be informed of the exact charges which he is called upon to meet;

(b) he should be given an opportunity to explain any material relied on by the management to prove the charges;

(c) the evidence of the management witnesses should be recorded in the presence of the delinquent employee and he should be given an opportunity to cross-examine such witnesses;

(d) the delinquent employee shall either be furnished with copies of the documents relied on by the management or be permitted to have adequate inspection of the documents relied on by the management;

(e) the delinquent employee should be given the opportunity to produce relevant evidence—both documentary and oral which include the right to examine self and other witnesses; and to call for relevant and material documents in the custody of the employer;

(f) whenever the inquiring authority is different from disciplinary authority, the delinquent employee shall be furnished with a copy of the inquiry report and be permitted to make a presentation to the disciplinary authority against the findings recorded in the inquiry report.[13]

A single judge of Calcutta High Court, while quashing the award of tribunal directing reinstatement on the ground that the workman was not given reasonable opportunity because the inquiry was conducted ex parte, held that the principle of affording reasonable opportunity was not a one-way traffic. It was for the person who was on the receiving end to avail of such opportunity. If he did not avail of this opportunity upon his own misconduct then in that case the inquiry officer would be well within his right to proceed in his absence.[14] The following sub-heads deal with some important aspects of the manner in which a fair and reasonable opportunity can effectively be given to a delinquent workman:

Supply of Relevant Material:

It is settled law that in the charge sheet, specific averments in respect of the charge shall be made. If the management seeks to rely on any document in proof of the charge, the principles of natural justice require that such copies of those documents need to be supplied to the delinquent. If the documents are voluminous and cannot be supplied to him, an opportunity has got to be given to him for inspection of the documents. Failure of the management to supply the copies of such documents or to give inspection of the documents to him would violate the principles of natural justice. Furthermore, if the delinquent seeks to support his defence at the inquiry with reference to any of the documents in the custody of the management, then the documents either may be summoned or copies thereof may be given at the request and cost of the delinquent.[15] The rules of natural justice are not embodied rules. Therefore, before coming to the conclusion that any particular procedure adopted by the inquiry officer is violative of the rules of natural justice, the tribunal must be satisfied that the procedure adopted was not conducive to reach a just decision. A party is not entitled, as of right, to have his attention called to any material that may come before a quasi-judicial tribunal unless the material in question is likely to prejudice his case either directly or indirectly.[16]

Inquiry officers are not courts and, therefore, they are not bound to follow the procedure prescribed by the trial courts nor are they bound by strict rules of evidence. On the other hand, unlike courts, they can obtain all information of material for the points under inquiry from all sources, and through all channels without being fettered by rules of procedure, which govern proceedings in a court. The only obligation which the law casts on them is that they should not act on any information which they receive unless they put it to the party against whom it is to be used and give him a fair opportunity to explain it.[17] However, the principle that a fact sought to be proved must be supported by statements made in the presence of the person against whom the inquiry is held and that statements made behind the back of the person charged are not to be treated as substantive evidence is one of the basic principles which cannot be ignored on the mere ground that the domestic tribunals are not bound by the technical rules contained in the Evidence Act.[18] In PC Thomas, in the domestic inquiry held by the employer, there was no examination of the witnesses nor were there any exhibits on the record. No inquiry in the proper legal sense of the term at all was held. All that happened was that even when the delinquent workman replied to the charge, he was given notice to produce his evidence and documents, if any, in support of his evidence. Even in the notice, there was no indication of the gist or the substance of the evidence that was proposed to be adduced at the inquiry in support of the charge. In pursuance to the notice, the matter was posted for hearing when certain questions were put to the workman, at the end of which the order of dismissal followed. In the circumstances, the inquiry was held to be vitiated.[19] In a case where the enquiry officer allowed certain documents produced by the management as evidence without supplying copies of the same to the charge-sheeted workman, a single Judge of Calcutta High Court held that, in the circumstances, the findings of the enquiry officer that the workman had forged the signature of the Deputy General Manager was without evidence. On this view of the matter, the learned judge set aside the dismissal and ordered reinstatement, but with 50% of back wages.[20] Once the court sets aside an order of punishment on the ground that the enquiry was not properly conducted, the court should not severely preclude the employer from holding the inquiry in accordance with the law. It must remit the concerned case to the disciplinary authority to conduct the enquiry from the point that it stood vitiated and to conclude the same in accordance with law. However, resorting to such a course depends upon the gravity of delinquency involved. Thus, the court must examine the magnitude of misconduct alleged against the delinquent employee. It is in view of this, that courts/tribunals, are not competent to quash the charge-sheet and related disciplinary proceedings, before the same are concluded on the aforementioned grounds.[21]

Prima facie, when an employee who is facing an inquiry for misconduct requiring certain materials in the possession of the company to be produced and they are not made available, the workman may be prejudiced in properly placing his defence.[22] For instance, the refusal of the employer to supply to the workman the documents relating to the previous two inquiries started and dropped against him was held to be denial of the rules of natural justice.[23] An inquiry officer would be acting contrary to the rules of natural justice, if he acted upon information collected by him which has not been disclosed to the workman and in respect of which full opportunity of meeting the inferences which arise out of it has not been given.[24] It is highly improper for an inquiry officer to attempt to collect material from outside sources during the conduct of an inquiry, and not make the information so collected, available to the delinquent workman, and further make use of the same in the inquiry proceedings. There may also be cases where a very clever and astute inquiry officer may collect outside information behind the back of the delinquent workman and without any apparent reference to the information so collected may be influenced in the conclusion recorded by him against the workman. If it is established that the material was collected behind the back of the workman, collected during the inquiry and such material has been relied on by the inquiry officer without its having been disclosed to the workman, it can be stated that the inquiry proceedings would be vitiated.[25] A workman, who is to answer to a charge must not only know the accusation but also the testimony by which the accusation is supported.[26]

In Ashwani Kumar Suman, the Allahabad High Court quashed the order of dismissal passed against the employee as the order was founded on incriminating material which the employee was not aware of. Not only such material was not made available to the employee but he was not even given an opportunity to lead evidence in rebuttal. Furthermore, the previous record of the employee was taken into consideration while passing the order, without giving him an opportunity to make representation in regard to that consideration. It was apparent from the order that even the defence of the employee was not considered and no findings were recorded in spite of the fact that the employee had asserted that he was not afforded a reasonable opportunity to explain and the copies of the material documents were not furnished to him.[27] If a document is relied upon by a witness and also by the inquiry officer in his findings, it must be made available to the workman before he is called upon to cross-examine such witness.[28] Therefore, when the delinquent wants copies of certain documents which, according to him, are relevant to prove that the charges levelled against him are not true, failure to furnish the said documents even on the ground that they are not available will vitiate the inquiry unless proper explanation is given to the court as to how the documents sought for became unavailable. In the absence of such explanation, the delinquent employee can successfully contend that he has been denied the opportunity of meeting the charges.[29] In other words, if a delinquent is entitled to a copy of a particular document then he should be supplied with that document because non-supply of that document prejudices his defence.[30] If the documents mentioned in the memo of charge were neither relevant to the charge nor relied upon by authorities, the non-supply of such documents would not vitiate the proceedings.[31] However, if some document is not traceable and by non-production of such document, the delinquent will not gain while the management stands to gain, there would be no denial of the rules of natural justice.[32] In MN Mardikar, the original note book and the log book could not be supplied as they were missing and their transcripts prepared by the witnesses earlier were supplied to the delinquent officer. It was held by the Supreme Court that the employer could not be accused of deliberately suppressing evidence. Speaking for the court, Ahmadi J said:

> In such a situation, the evidence has to be evaluated bearing in mind the fact that the original notebook and the logbook of the jeep are missing. The non-supply of the original notebook and the logbook cannot, in the circumstances, efface the overwhelming evidence, both direct and circumstantial, tendered during the departmental inquiry. We are of the view that there is sufficient evidence on record to return a finding of guilt against the respondent. [33]

If a workman is not given copies of statements made by the witnesses before he is called upon to cross-examine the witnesses on such statements, the inquiry will not be fair even if the statements are read over in the presence of the workman and marked as evidence in examination-in-chief of the management's witness because fairness requires that the workman should have sufficient time to study the statements for preparing his defence.[34] Where the copies of letters marked as exhibits in the inquiry proceedings are not furnished to the delinquent employee even on demand, it is a serious infringement of the principles of natural justice.[35] Similarly, where the findings of the inquiry are based on reports given by the superior officers and such reports are not made available to the concerned workman nor are the officers made available for cross-examination, the inquiry would not be fair and proper.[36] Where the statements of witnesses deposing against the delinquent workman are recorded in his presence and at the time of the domestic inquiry, copies of statements so marked are not supplied to the workman nor are the statements read over to him before he is asked to cross-examine the witnesses who have given the statements, the inquiry would be vitiated for want of fair opportunity.[37] On the other hand, where domestic inquiry is conducted by the employer in an elaborate manner, but a copy of the report submitted by a witness is not furnished to the concerned workman before he is called upon to cross-examine the witness, it cannot be said that any prejudice is caused to the workman by such failure to furnish the copy and that there was denial of fair opportunity to him.[38] Likewise, failure to read out statements of witnesses to the delinquent workman will not vitiate the inquiry in the absence of any prejudice caused to him.[39] Where the conduct of the delinquent workman reveals a guilty mind in asking for the production of certain materials, no prejudice can be said to be caused to him. This point is illustrated by the holding in Awadesh Bhatnagar.[40] However, if the inquiry is to be impugned on the ground that the workman was not supplied with any document, it must be clearly stated by the workman as to which particular documents were not supplied which he had asked for and which caused prejudice to his case resulting in injustice.[41] Where certain documents were mentioned in the memo of charges, but were neither relevant to the charge nor referred to or relied upon by the authorities nor were necessary for cross-examination, the non-supply of such documents would not violate the proceedings and there would be no violation of the principles of natural justice.[42]

Production of Witnesses:

Section 11(3)(a) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 empowers the adjudicatory authorities under the Act to compel attendance and examination of witnesses as a civil court under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 but there is no provision of law, under which the inquiring officers holding domestic inquiries can compel the attendance of witnesses as under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 or Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. The purpose of a domestic inquiry is to find out whether the misconduct alleged against the delinquent workman has in fact been committed by him before a disciplinary punishment could be inflicted upon him. Therefore, the employer has to establish that the misconduct has been committed by leading all the relevant evidence before the inquiry officer. Likewise, the workman has to show that he has not committed the alleged act. He may do this either by picking holes in the evidence led by the employer by cross-examination or by leading his own evidence to rebut the evidence of the employer. It is open to the parties to summon such evidence, oral or documentary, which they consider necessary, and if one or the other party has omitted to summon a witness or a document, the inquiry officer cannot be blamed for it, nor is the inquiry rendered defective or unfair on that account.[43] The failure of a party to produce the relevant oral or documentary evidence may be prejudicial to his case. In Rashid Ahmad, the conductor of a bus was dismissed from service for having charged excess fare from the passengers. In the course of the domestic inquiry, at the outset the workman made a request for producing the passengers and the way-bill. In the circumstances of the case, the court held that the evidence of the passengers was relevant. Non-production of the passengers or the way-bill was tantamount to refusal of reasonable opportunity to the workman.[44] In a domestic inquiry, the officer holding the inquiry, however, can take no valid or effective steps to compel the attendance of any witnesses, just as a court can summon witnesses.[45]

In Tata Oil Mills, the charge-sheeted workman wanted to examine certain witnesses before the inquiry officer and, therefore, requested the inquiry officer to call these witnesses to give evidence. Though the inquiry officer told the workman that it was not a part of his duty to call the witnesses and he should in fact have kept them ready himself, yet he wrote letters to those witnesses in order to assist the workman. One of the witnesses wrote back to the inquiry officer expressing his inability to be present while the other sent an unsigned reply asking for a few days time on which the inquiry officer took no action. Consequently, the inquiry had to proceed without examining these witnesses. The tribunal took the view that the basis of the inquiry was unfair but in appeal, the Supreme Court held that if the workman did not take steps to produce his witnesses before the inquiry officer, it could not be said that the inquiry officer did not conduct the inquiry in accordance with the principles of natural justice. The inquiry, therefore, was held to be fair as the inquiry officer had given ample opportunity to the workman to lead his evidence. The court also rejected the further plea that since he was unable to lead his evidence for no fault of his own, he should be given an opportunity to prove his case before the tribunal, with the observations that merely because the witness did not appear to give evidence in support of the workman's case, it could not be held that he should be allowed to lead such evidence before the tribunal and if this plea was to be upheld, then no domestic inquiry would be effective and in every ease, the matter would have to be tried afresh by the industrial tribunal.[46] In Kameshwar Singh, the cashier of a bank was charged with coercing borrowers into paying him illegal gratification. The substantive evidence was available only with such borrowers whom the cashier threatened. Thus, the bank was not able to compel the appearance of the borrowers. It was able only to produce the statements of the borrowers recorded earlier before the inquiry officer. In the circumstances, a single judge of the Patna High Court held that the inquiry was not invalid even though the borrowers were not examined.[47]

A single judge of the Calcutta High Court in Golam Rasul, took the view that if a witness cited by a person facing disciplinary inquiry is under the control of the disciplinary authority and if the evidence of the witness is material for the purposes of the inquiry, then the authority should arrange for the production of that witness at the inquiry. In this case, a particular person was cited as a witness by the employee who was not unwilling to depose, if the inquiring officer found his examination necessary. The inquiry officer did not come to any conclusion that the examination of that witness was necessary or not but escaped to examine the witness on the pretext that he had not been cited as a witness at all. It was, therefore, held that the grievance of the employee, that at the inquiry he was not afforded proper opportunity to defend himself, in the sense that a witness cited by him was not examined, was justified and the inquiry was vitiated.[48] On the facts of the case, the decision of the High Court is correct, but the principle of law enunciated does not appear to be consistent with the principle laid down in TELCO,[49] where the Supreme Court held that the tribunal was in error in thinking that the inquiry officer was under any obligation in law to produce the witnesses required by the workman particularly not as his witnesses but for his cross-examination. Hence, there was no failure on the part of the inquiry officer when he told the workman that he could neither produce nor compel the company to produce those witnesses. In RK Jain, the court affirmed the principle that normally, it is the duty of the workman to have his witnesses produced before the inquiry officer but in the peculiar circumstances of the case, the position was held to be entirely different.[50] In Ruston & Hornsby, it was held that it is not the duty of the inquiry officer to seek the permission of the superiors of a witness to allow him to give evidence for a workman and it is the duty of the workman himself to summon his witnesses properly.[51]

In Anshuman Das Gupta, a single judge of the Gauhati High Court held that 'reasonable opportunity' envisaged in Art 311(1) of the Constitution includes an opportunity to the delinquent officer to defend himself not only by cross examining the witness produced against him but also by examining himself or any other witness in support of his defence. The inquiry would be vitiated if this opportunity were not made available to the delinquent. In this case, N G Das J, of the Gauhati High Court came to the conclusion that the inquiry was vitiated on the ground that the inquiry officer had not exhausted his powers in securing the attendance of one of the defence witnesses, who declined to give evidence. [52] This part of the decision runs counter to the nature of domestic inquiry and the scope and powers of the inquiry officer. What is meant by the observation 'the inquiry officer did not exhaust his powers to ensure attendance' and what powers does an inquiry officer in a domestic inquiry admittedly enjoy in the matter of enforcing attendance of witnesses? Is it possible that the learned judge was unaware of the legal position that an inquiry officer is not vested with any judicial power unlike a court to issue summons or to enforce the attendance of witnesses? The responsibility of producing witnesses in a domestic inquiry rests with the parties concerned and not with the inquiry officer. Further, this case was squarely covered by Tata Oil Mills, in which Gajendragadkar CJI, held that it was the responsibility of the parties to produce their witnesses and that if the workman did not take steps to produce his witnesses before the inquiry officer, it could not be said that the inquiry officer did not conduct the inquiry in accordance with the principles of natural justice.[53] In the face of a binding decision and well-settled law, to hold that the inquiry stood vitiated because the inquiry officer did not exhaust his powers to ensure the attendance of witnesses, revolts against common sense not to speak of legal sense or sound judicial process.

Examination of Witnesses

The barest requirement of a domestic inquiry is that the charged workman must be given a fair chance to hear the evidence in support of the charge and put such relevant questions by way of cross-examination as he desires and then must be given a chance to rebut the evidence led against him. If the allegations in the charge-sheet are denied by the workman, it is needless to state that the burden of proving the truth of those allegations will be on the management, and the witnesses called by the management must be allowed to be cross-examined by the workman and the latter must also be given an opportunity to examine himself and adduce any other evidence that he might choose in support of his plea.[54] The mere form of inquiry would not satisfy the requirements of the rules of natural justice in industrial law and would not protect the disciplinary action taken by the employers from challenge. Fair opportunity cannot be said to have been given unless the witnesses are examined, ordinarily in the presence of the employee in respect of the charges; the employee is given a fair opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses and he is given a fair opportunity to examine his own witnesses including himself in his defence if he so wishes, on any relevant matter.[55] It would be improper for the inquiry officer to hold a domestic inquiry while a person is on leave which has not been cancelled and the workman has not been recalled to duty.[56]Though the inquiry officer in a domestic inquiry is not bound by the technical rules or the procedure contained in the Indian Evidence Act 1872, he cannot ignore the substantive rules which form part of natural justice. 'The principle that the facts sought to be proved must be supported by the statements made in the presence of the person against whom the inquiry is held and that statements behind the back of a person charged are not to be treated as substantive evidence, is one of the basic principles which cannot be ignored on theground that the domestic tribunals are not bound by the technical rules or procedures contained in the Indian Evidence Act 1872'. Therefore, mere admission in evidence of a prior statement without putting the same to the witness would not be in consonance with the principles of natural justice.[57]

Not only the witnesses should be examined in the presence of the charge-sheeted workman but he must also be informed about the material sought to be used against him and then given an opportunity to explain it, because recording evidence in the presence of the workman concerned serves a very important purpose. The witness knows that he is giving evidence against a particular individual who is present before him and, therefore, he is cautious in making his statement.[58] When evidence is recorded in the presence of the accused, there is no room for persuading the witness to make convenient statements and it is always easier for an accused to cross-examine the witness if his evidence is recorded in his presence.[59] The proper course for the inquiry officer, therefore, is to examine the witnesses from the beginning to the end in the presence of the workman at the inquiry itself. Oral examination always takes much longer than a mere reading of a prepared statement of the same length and brings home the evidence more clearly to the person against whom the inquiry is being held.[60] The position is the same, when a witness is called, the statement given previously by him behind the back of the party is put to him, and admitted in evidence, a copy thereof is given to the party and he is given an opportunity to cross-examine him.[61] The conclusion of an inquiry based on a report given by other employees behind the back of the concerned workman without making them available for cross-examination would be vitiated for violation of the rules of natural justice.[62] Likewise, the statement made by a witness who is not examined in the presence of the charge-sheeted workman or is not produced for cross-examination at the inquiry, if taken into account in arriving at the finding of guilt or inflicting punishment would vitiate the action.[63] Any person can give evidence about what he heard but if it is to be used for proving the truth of that statement, then it would be hearsay and not admissible for that purpose.[64]

Evidence of statement made to a witness who himself has not been called as a witness may or may not be hearsay depending on the fact-situation of the case. It is not hearsay and is admissible when it is proposed to establish by evidence, not the truth of the statement but the fact that it was made. The fact that it was made, quite apart from truth itself, is frequently relevant for considering the mental state and conduct of a witness subsequently or some other person in whose presence the statement was made but such statement is hearsay and is inadmissible when the object of the evidence is to establish the truth of what is contained in the statement, in the absence of any other substantive evidence, hearsay or indirect evidence cannot take the place of conclusive evidence. Therefore, in regard to the charge against the delinquent, the proof of truthfulness of the hearsay evidence cannot be dispensed with in a domestic inquiry. In Chandrakumar Deshmukh (supra), the Bombay High Court further observed:

> The basic rule governing domestic inquiries requires that no order entailing penal consequences can be made on the basis of ex parte statements of witnesses or hearsay evidence. It must be adhered to particularly when facts are disputed and credibility of a person who has given testimony or some information, is in doubt or is challenged.[65]

Therefore, the basic rule, that if any document is relied on, the author of it should be examined so that he can be cross-examined to discover the truth of what is stated in the document. In this case, there was no direct or substantive evidence, against the delinquent, as regards the date and time of commission of the offence of theft. The finding of the inquiry officer was based on the evidence of four witnesses who had no personal knowledge regarding the commission of theft on the particular day. The source of their information was the statements of two other persons who were not available for cross-examination. The disciplinary punishment based on the domestic inquiry, therefore, was quashed. In a domestic inquiry as in a regular trial, the burden of proof of establishing the guilt on a charge is always on the accuser and not on the accused. This burden must be discharged fully.[66] If the delinquent seeks to cross-examine the witnesses examined in proof of the charge, he should be given the opportunity to cross-examine them, in case he is to examine his witnesses for himself to rebut the charge, that opportunity should be given. Failure to do that will violate the principles of natural justice.[67] Normally, in domestic inquiries, it is not fair at the very outset to closely cross-examine the delinquent employee, before any other evidence is led against him as it is necessary not to expose an illiterate and ignorant person to the risk of cross-examination. The employer should take steps first to lead evidence against the workman charged, give him an opportunity to cross-examine the said evidence and should then ask the concerned workman whether he wants to give any explanation about the evidence led against him.[68] Where two separate inquiries were held against two workmen, witnesses examined in one inquiry and the evidence recorded in that inquiry were used for finding the other worker guilty of misconduct, the findings against such other workman would be vitiated for violation of rules of natural justice which require that the findings should be based on evidence led in each inquiry. The fact that the other worker assisted another inquiry held against the other workman and cross-examined witnesses as legal assistant, does not mean that evidence recorded in that inquiry automatically becomes evidence recorded in the disciplinary inquiry against the other worker.[69] Similarly, where no evidence is tendered at the domestic inquiry in support of the charges made against the concerned workman and certain questions are put to him by way of cross-examination, the inquiry would be vitiated for want of fair opportunity.[70] There is an exception to this general rule. In certain circumstances as, for instance, where the workman admits his guilt, it will be open to the management to examine the workman, even in the first instance, so as to enable him to offer any explanation for his conduct or to place before the management any circumstances which will go to mitigate the gravity of the offence. The fact that in the domestic inquiry, the workman was questioned first to find out if there were extenuating circumstances before the formal evidence was allowed to complete the picture of his guilt, the inquiry would not be vitiated for want of fair opportunity. If after the examination of the workman, the management chooses to examine any witnesses, the workman must be given a reasonable opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses and also to adduce any other evidence he may choose.[71]

In certain other cases, it may even be fair to the delinquent workman to take his version first, so that the inquiry may cover the point of difference and the witnesses may be questioned properly on the aspect of the case suggested by him but even then, the examination of the workman should not 'savour of an inquisition', 'it is all a question of justice and fairplay'. If the second procedure leads to a just decision of the disputed points and is fairer to the delinquent than the ordinary procedure of examining evidence against him first, no exception can be taken to it. It is, however, wise to ask the delinquent whether he would like to make a statement first or wait till the evidence is over but the failure to question the workman in this way does not ipso facto vitiate the inquiry unless prejudice is caused to him. If, however, 'the person inquired against seems to have been held at a disadvantage or has objected to such a course, then the inquiry may be said to be vitiated'.[72] For instance, where the inquiry officer firmly based his conclusion as to proof of guilt of the delinquent workman on the evidence of certain witnesses by treating admission of the delinquent workman and his accomplice as corroborative evidence, but failed to recall the witness for cross-examination, it was held to be a case of absence of proper opportunity to the workman.[73] Where witnesses are not examined from the very beginning at an inquiry in the presence of the person charged, he should be given a copy of the statements made by the witnesses which are to be used at the inquiry well in advance, before the inquiry begins. If this is not done and the concerned workman is asked to cross-examine the witnesses then and there, a fair and adequate opportunity to the workman cannot be said to have been afforded. The court can take judicial notice of the fact that many of the industrial workers are illiterate and sometimes, even the representatives of labour unions may not be present to defend them. In such cases, in order to safeguard the interests of the worker, the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses should be effective and to read over a prepared statement in few minutes and then ask the workman to cross-examine the witness making the statement, would make a mockery of the opportunity that the rules of natural justice require.[74] The purpose of cross-examination is set at naught if all the witnesses are present at the spot of the inquiry during the entire period that the inquiry takes place. Holding of an inquiry in such a manner would result in the miscarriage of justice.[75]

In Anand Joshi, the management witness was not orally examined and his written disposition was admitted in evidence and the delinquent was asked to cross-examine him. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the inquiry was not conducted fairly and properly. [76] In Kalu Ram, the Supreme Court took the view that the tribunal had gone wrong in holding that the inquiry officer had conducted the inquiry unfairly in that the workman was not given an opportunity to cross-examine the expert of the employer with the help of an expert of his own. In the domestic inquiry, the expert of the employer produced by the workman was allowed to be cross-examined by the expert previously examined on behalf of the employer but the expert produced by the employer was only cross-examined by the workman himself. The court noted that the tribunal had not found that the workman had ever demanded that he should be permitted to cross-examine the expert produced on behalf of the employer with the help of an expert of his own and that there had been no refusal of any such request. The court observed that if the respondent did not ask for any opportunity to cross-examine the employer's expert with the help of an expert, that default on his part cannot mean that the inquiry officer violated the principles of natural justice nor the fact, that the cross-examination by the workman could not be of the same quality as the cross-examination with the aid of an expert, would mean that the inquiry officer was guilty of breach of the principles of natural justice.[77]

In Binny, on the question of affording opportunity of cross-examination to a delinquent workman, the Supreme Court appears to have gone to the extreme of technical limits. In this case, at the end of the examination-in-chief of each witness, the workman was asked whether he had any question to put to the witness. At the end of the examination of the witnesses for the management, the inquiry officer called one of them to further give the remarks about the workman's conduct and ability and any other relevant information in respect of the workman. When that witness stated that the workman had been absent without leave or permission on a number of occasions and that about a month back he had behaved in a manner similar to the one with which he was charged, but no disciplinary action was taken against him on account of the intercession of another workman, but when the witness was making this statement, the workman intervened and said that that was on account of a misunderstanding as it was his habit to speak in a loud voice. However, at this stage, the inquiry officer did not specifically ask the workman, whether he wanted to put any question to the witness on the further testimony given by him or whether he had any explanation to offer. Though the labour court accepted the finding of the domestic inquiry that the workman was guilty of the misconduct alleged against him and that the inquiry was fair and proper, it set aside the order of dismissal of the workman on the ground that he was not given an opportunity to challenge the further statement of the witness regarding his past record of service nor was he given any opportunity to say whether the witness's statement was true or false or reasonably explainable. In appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the award of the labour court holding that the record made by the inquiry officer amply demonstrated that the workman was not given a chance to cross-examine that witness on his further statement nor was he asked to state anything by way of explanation.[78] This appears to be a hyper-technical view of law applied to the simple facts of the case. At no stage, the workman appears to have been denied the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. Nor was he stopped from asking any question. Intervention by the workman on the face of it appears to be in the nature of cross-examination. The view of the court appears to be based on the mere fact that the inquiry officer did not ask the workman 'whether he had any question to put on the further evidence given and whether he had anything to show for himself in respect of what was alleged?' But when the workman had already explained the statement of the witness by his intervention, there hardly was any need of asking him to put any further question. The domestic inquiries are of a simple nature and the inquiry officers are not lawyers.[79] To import such highly technical refinements of law into domestic inquiries would perhaps lead to anomalous situations and rob them of all unconventional norms.

It is open to an inquiry officer to refuse to examine a particular witness, if he bona fide comes to the conclusion that such witness would be irrelevant or immaterial but if refusal to examine a witness or to allow other evidence to be led appears to be the result of the desire on the part of the inquiry officer to deprive the person charged, of an opportunity to establish his innocence, that of course, would be a very serious matter.[80] For instance, in Shyam SL Gupta, the charge against the workman was that he had taken leave on a false pretext of illness. In the course of the inquiry proceedings, the workman requested the inquiry officer to have the evidence of the doctor who treated him, recorded. The refusal of the inquiry officer was held to be a breach of rules of the natural justice vitiating the inquiry. It is open to an inquiry officer to disallow trivial, irrelevant or frivolous questions asked in cross-examination.[81] In Balmer Lawrie, the inquiry officer disallowed a few questions which were of a trivial nature and were not really germane to the main controversy. The Bombay High Court held that the inquiry was not vitiated, particularly so as no prejudice had been caused in any manner to the delinquent employee by disallowing such questions during the course of cross-examination. The court, took further note of the fact that the inquiry officer gave maximum latitude to the representative of the workman in cross examination of the management witnesses but if the workman was not allowed to properly cross-examine the officer whom he was alleged to have assaulted, and the witnesses were tutored, the inquiry would be vitiated and the order of dismissal based on that will be liable to be quashed.[82] In Phulbari Tea Estate, it was clear from the record that the witnesses had not been examined in the presence of the workman charged and even their statements previously recorded in his absence were not furnished or read over to him. All that happened at the inquiry was that the witnesses were present and the workman was asked to put questions to them to which the workman replied that he had not committed the alleged act of misconduct and that he had no questions to put to those witnesses. Thereupon, the inquiry officer brought the previously taken statements of witnesses on record and on the basis of those statements, the workman was found guilty of the charge. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the inquiry was vitiated as the basic principles of natural justice were not complied with.[83]

In IGN Rly, several witnesses had been examined in the absence of the chargesheeted workmen and thus they had been denied the opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses. Furthermore, even the statements of those witnesses recorded in the absence of the chargesheeted workmen had not been furnished to them, hence they did not know what had been deposed against them at the time when their own statements were called for. It was held that the inquiry was vitiated for violation of the rules of natural justice as it was not a fair and proper inquiry.[84] In Bharat Sugar Mills, the inquiry officer did not examine any witness of the inquiry but contented himself only by recording the statements of the workmen against whom the inquiry was held and placed on record the written reports made by officers of the employer company against the workmen without reading out their contents or explaining them to the workmen and without giving them an opportunity to cross-examine any of the officers who made the reports, for the purpose of testing the correctness of the allegations made against them in those reports. The inquiry officer took those reports into consideration in finding the workmen guilty of various acts of misconduct alleged against them. In these circumstances, it was held that the inquiry was not fair and proper.[85] In Associated Cement Cos, the inquiry officer started the inquiry with the examination of the workman himself and elaborately questioned him about the allegations contained in the report against him by the officers of the company. After the workman had been subjected to close cross-examination on the charges against him, five witnesses were examined in support of the charge. It was held that the procedure adopted in the inquiry constituted a grave violation of the rules of natural justice which vitiated the inquiry and rendered the order of dismissal based on the conclusions reached at the inquiry, illegal.[86] In Firestone, the court clarified that in the absence of any prejudice caused to the workman, the mere fact that he was cross-examined even before the evidence against him was recorded, the inquiry would not be vitiated. After analysing all the facts, the court found that no prejudice, had been in fact, caused to the delinquent workman by the procedure adopted by the inquiry officer, the inquiry, therefore, was not invalid.[87] In GAnandam, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the examination of delinquent in the first instance is only a procedural irregularity. If he does not object to such examination at the proper time, the inquiry will not be vitiated because the only requirement of the domestic inquiry is that it must be fair and the court is satisfied that the inquiry is fair on the whole. Minor defects need not be viewed seriously.[88] Similarly, in CI Poulose, at the very beginning of the inquiry the delinquent was cross examined by the inquiry officer and questions were asked with respect to admitted facts to find our whether there was any satisfactory explanation from him. Therefore, no prejudice was caused to the employee, hence the inquiry was not invalid.[89] In British Bank, the Bombay High Court held that non-examination of the handwriting expert, and placing reliance on an expert's opinion by the inquiry officer, does not constitute an infirmity in the disciplinary action.[90]

In Sur Enamel, the inquiry officer did not examine any witness in support of the charge framed against the delinquent workman and the reports previously made by the officers of the company were read out to him without keeping those officers present at the inquiry and without giving him any opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses. These reports of the company's officers were then taken on record and the workman was simply asked to explain why those reports should not be accepted. These reports were taken into account in finding the workman guilty of the alleged misconduct. It was held that the procedure adopted in the inquiry was in gross violation of the principles of natural justice and the inquiry was vitiated.[91] In Meenglas Tea Estate, not a single witness was examined by the inquiry officer in support of the charge, nor was any statement previously made by a witness tendered in evidence. The inquiry, in substance, consisted only of putting questions to each workman in turn about the charge against him after reading out the charge to him. It was held that the inquiry was vitiated as it was not held in accordance with the principles of natural justice.[92] In Kesoram Cotton, the employer dismissed some workmen after holding an inquiry into the charges of misconduct against them. In the inquiry copies of the statements of witnesses previously recorded which had not been supplied to the workmen concerned were read over to the witnesses when they were produced at the inquiry and after reading these statements over and explaining them to the workmen they were put on the record and the workmen were asked to cross-examine the witnesses. It was held that the workmen did not get a fair opportunity to defend themselves as the previously recorded statements were not given to them well within time. It was suggested that the minimum time for such purpose should be two days before the date when the inquiry is to begin. In the circumstances of the case, it was held that the principles of natural justice regarding an adequate opportunity being given to the workmen to defend themselves, were not duly complied with.[93] In Ananda Bazar Patrika, the workman pressed for the examination of only one witness, viz, the editor of the newspaper, which was rejected by the inquiry officer as he felt that the examination of the editor would not be of any assistance to the workman. Further, the inquiry officer disallowed certain questions put to witnesses in their cross-examination as he thought those questions to be irrelevant. The labour court held that the inquiry was not fair but the Supreme Court, while recognizing he right of inquiry officer to refuse to examine a witness or to disallow questions, which he considers irrelevant, observed that if such refusal on the part of the inquiry officer is found to be based on his desire to deprive the person charged of an opportunity to establish his innocence, that would be a very serious matter. In view of the fact that the inquiry had been conducted elaborately and the workman had been allowed fullest latitude for the cross-examination of the witnesses against him, it could not be said that refusal to allow the workman to examine the editor could not be held to be unjustified or unfair. On the second point also, the court observed that the disallowed questions were all recorded, and a look at the record showed that most of the questions which were disallowed had been properly disallowed. In these circumstances, it was held that the labour court was not justified in its finding that the enquiry was vitiated.[94]

In Firestone, the inquiry officer afforded every opportunity to the workman to controvert the case of the management and prove his case and he was informed of the charge very clearly. Witnesses were examined in his presence and he was allowed to cross-examine them fully. He was also given an opportunity to lead his evidence and the inquiry officer and the manager gave him a full chance to explain after appraising him in detail of the finding tentatively reached. A true record of the inquiry was kept. The inquiry was, therefore, held to be fair and proper.[95] In Karunamoy Banerjee, the workman had admitted the truth of the allegations made against him. Even when the inquiry proceedings began, in which he stated that he had nothing more to add in respect of the charges framed against him. The inquiry officer put the questions to the workman only for giving him an opportunity to explain his conduct or to refer to circumstances, if any, which could be taken into account in the extenuation of his conduct. The workman was also permitted to put questions to the witnesses examined in the inquiry in support of the charge. The tribunal held the inquiry to be violative of the principles of natural justice, inter alia, for the reasons:

(i) that the workman had been examined, even in the first instance and he was cross-examined to elicit points in support of the charges; and

(ii) he was not allowed to cross-examine the witness.

In appeal, the Supreme Court held that: (i) once the workman himself had admitted his guilt, there would be nothing more for the management to inquire into and the labour court was not justified in holding that it could still be stated that there was violation of the principles of natural justice merely because of the fact that the workman was examined in the first instance; and (ii) the workman was specifically asked by the inquiry officer as to whether he wanted to examine or cross-examine the witnesses, but the workman categorically stated that he did not want to examine or cross-examine any of those persons. On this view of matter, the Court held that the order passed by the labour court was erroneous, and upheld the dismissal.[96] In Langharajan Tea Estate, the previously recorded statements of the witnesses were read over to the delinquent in the presence of the said witnesses and he was asked for his comments. The enquiry officer thereafter took the statements on record as they were read out in the course of the enquiry and were affirmed by them. In the cross-examination, the workman himself admitted that those two witnesses had told the manager that they saw the facts deposed to by them from a particular place. The labour court held that the inquiry was not proper because the inquiry officer relied on the reports of these two witnesses but did not examine them in the presence of the charged workman and that he was not allowed to put questions to them by way of cross-examination. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed that if these two grounds found by the labour court really existed, it would have been fully justified in ignoring the findings recorded by the officer which were based on statements of the persons recorded behind the back of the charged workman.[97]

Occasionally, for seeking clarification, the inquiry officer may ask certain questions from the witnesses. That would not vitiate the inquiry if the opposite side has opportunity to test those by cross-examination. In Buckingham and Carnatic, the senior labour officer of the company held the inquiry into the misconduct of the delinquent worker. No other officer separately conducted the prosecution on the side of the management. He put questions to the witnesses to elicit answers and allowed the workman to cross-examine those witnesses. He also took down the statements of the concerned worker and asked for clarifications from him wherever necessary. In these circumstances, the inquiry was held to be fair and impartial. The criticism that the inquiry officer had acted both as a prosecutor and the judge was held to be unwarranted.[98] In Mulchandani, two witnesses who had signed the memorandum earlier, stated before the inquiry officer that they had not signed any such memorandum. No one represented the management at the inquiry. The inquiry officer made a note that those two witnesses 'turned hostile' and put a number of questions to those witnesses during which they admitted their writings as well as signatures on the memorandum. Those witnesses were cross-examined at length on behalf of the workman after the inquiry officer had put questions to them. The labour court held that the inquiry was vitiated because the inquiry officer 'had no business to treat the company's witnesses as hostile witnesses on his own' and 'to ask questions for proving the misconduct alleged against the delinquent employee'. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed that it was not only reasonable but also necessary to look for some explanation for the contradiction of statements made by the workmen in the memorandum and before the inquiry officer and if the inquiry officer had put certain questions to those witnesses by way of clarification, it could not be said that he had done something that was not fair and proper, particularly when the witnesses were allowed to be cross-examined by the union after they had answered the questions asked by the inquiry officer. The note made by the inquiry officer that the witnesses had 'turned hostile', in the opinion of the court, meant only that what they had stated before him was inconsistent with what appeared in the memorandum signed by them. It was, therefore, held that the mere fact that the inquiry officer had put some questions to the witnesses by way of clarification, in the circumstances of the case, would not vitiate the inquiry.[99]

In KL Tripathi, the delinquent employee had admitted the factual basis of allegations against him and had not questioned the veracity of the witnesses or the facts or the credibility of the witnesses or of the entries on record. The Supreme Court held that there was no violation of the principles of natural justice merely because the evidence was not recorded in his presence or that the materials gathered, the gist of which was communicated to him, were not gathered in his presence. In the premises, the absence of formal opportunity of cross-examination did not constitute infraction of any principle of natural justice. It was further observed that neither cross-examination nor opportunity to lead evidence by the delinquent was an integral part of quasi-judicial adjudication.[1] In Indian Explosives, it was held that the fact that the inquiry officer asked lengthy questions and recorded them in a detailed manner instead of recording the evidence in a summary manner, would not vitiate the inquiry because no prejudice was caused to the workmen in recording the evidence in a detailed manner though the converse might have prejudiced them. It was also observed that the fact that the inquiry officer had put a number of questions including some leading questions to elicit answers from the witness both for and against the employer, he cannot be said to have played the role of prosecutor or to have been biased against the workmen especially when he allowed such witnesses to be thoroughly cross-examined by the workmen and also exonerated some of the workmen. The inquiry officer can also accept the evidence of a witness in so far as it is correct and reject the other part of it which is untrue.[2]

Leading Questions:

On the question whether adducing evidence before the inquiry officer in a domestic inquiry by putting leading questions to a witness in the examination-in-chief would violate the principles of natural justice, the Madras High Court has taken the view that it would, and the inquiry would not be fair.[3] On the other hand, the Calcutta High Court[4]held that putting leading questions to a witness in the examination-in-chief would not vitiate the inquiry. As the technicalities and the strict rules of procedure under the Indian Evidence Act 1872 do not apply to domestic inquiries, the view of the Calcutta High Court appears to be preferable to the view of the Madras High Court. In Firestone, in which some leading questions were put to a witness, the Supreme Court observed that too much legalism could not be expected from a domestic inquiry of this character.[5]

Inquiry Pending Criminal Proceedings:

The criminal proceedings and disciplinary proceedings are altogether distinct and have different jurisdictional areas. In disciplinary proceedings, the question is whether the delinquent is guilty of such conduct as would merit his discharge or dismissal from service or a lesser punishment, as the case may be, whereas in criminal proceedings the question is whether any offence under criminal law such as Indian Penal Code, Prevention of Corruption Act or any other penal statute is established, and if established, what sentence should be imposed upon him.[6] The conviction in a criminal case requires a higher standard of proof than required in a disciplinary inquiry.[7] The charges levelled in the disciplinary proceedings have to be tested keeping in mind the enforcement of discipline and the level of integrity amongst the staff in the administration of the employer while that is not necessarily a relevant factor to be taken note of in criminal proceedings. Therefore, it is neither possible nor advisable to evolve a hard and fast straight-jacket formula that where disciplinary proceedings and criminal proceedings are based on the same set of facts, there should be an interdiction of the disciplinary proceedings awaiting the decision in the criminal proceedings.[8] Furthermore, in a criminal prosecution, the standard of proof is one of beyond all reasonable doubt while in a domestic inquiry, it is one of the preponderance of probabilities.[9] Therefore, even if there is an acquittal in criminal proceedings, the disciplinary proceedings will still not be barred because such proceedings have got an independent angle for testing the charges.[10] In Bimal Kanta Mukherjee, the labour appellate tribunal took the view that the principles of natural justice do not require that an employer must wait for the result of the criminal trial before taking action against an employee.[11] This view was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Kushal Bhan.[12] In Tata Oil Mills, Gajendragadkar CJI observed:

> ...it is desirable that if the incident giving rise to a charge framed against a workman in a domestic inquiry is being tried in a criminal court, the employer should stay the domestic inquiry pending the final disposal of the criminal case. It would be particularly appropriate to adopt such a course where the charge against the workman is of a grave character, because in such a case, it would be unfair to compel the workman to disclose the defence which he may take before the criminal court. But to say that domestic inquiries may be stayed pending criminal trial is very different from saying that if an employer proceeds with the domestic inquiry in spite of the fact that the criminal trial is pending, the inquiry for that reason alone is vitiated and the conclusion reached in such an inquiry is either bad in law or mala fide.[13]

However, in cases of a simple nature, the inquiry should continue, particularly if the inquiry has proceeded a long way, it would not be proper to stop the same for an indefinite period especially when the inquiry would not prejudice the criminal trial of the delinquents. In judging the gravity of the offence, the nature of the allegation has to be taken into account and not the person or persons who are actually involved in the offence.[14] In cases where the charges in both proceedings are the same and they are of a serious nature, the holding of domestic inquiry may compel the accused person to disclose his defence, causing serious prejudice to him, it is advisable to stay the domestic inquiry till the completion of the criminal trial.[15] In JK Cotton, the question was, whether the employer should withhold the inquiry pending the appeal of the workman in case he is convicted by the trial court in the criminal offence. The court observed that the principles of natural justice do not require that the employer must wait for the decision of a criminal case or an appeal before proceeding with a domestic inquiry.[16] In Anglo-American Direct Tea, a single judge of Madras High Court stated:

> If a domestic tribunal had concluded its inquiry and came to a conclusion even before the criminal court had passed judgment, the domestic tribunal's conclusion is not vitiated by the fact that, on the same facts, the criminal court has subsequently acquitted the worker either on a technical ground or on merits. Similarly, if after conviction by the criminal court, there is a finding of the domestic tribunal holding the employee guilty on evidence which is independently assessed by it, the fact that subsequently on appeal, the worker was acquitted does not mean that the domestic tribunal's conclusion is in any way vitiated but if the criminal court's judgment, either of a trial court or of an appellate court, is earlier than the domestic tribunal's inquiry, the domestic tribunal is bound to take the judgment of the original court into consideration. If after taking the judgment into consideration, the domestic tribunal takes a different view, the labour court cannot interfere if it is found that principles of natural justice have been complied with and there is evidence which could support the finding of the domestic tribunal. But, if the domestic tribunal does not apply its mind to the judgment of the criminal court, it may show mala fides and, therefore, its order may be liable to be struck down.[17]

In Jang Bahadur Singh, the Supreme Court rejected the contention of the employee that initiation of disciplinary proceedings during the pendency of criminal proceedings on the same facts amounts to contempt of court.[18] In Kusheshwar Dubey, the court observed:

> The view expressed in the three cases of this court seem to support the position that while there could be no legal bar for simultaneous proceedings being taken, yet, there may be cases where it would be appropriate to defer disciplinary proceedings awaiting disposal of the criminal case. In the latter class of cases, it would be open to the delinquent employee to seek such an order of stay or injunction from the court. Whether in the facts and circumstances of a particular case there should or should not be such simultaneity of the proceedings would then receive judicial consideration and the court will decide in the given circumstances of a particular case as to whether the disciplinary proceedings should be interdicted, pending criminal trial. As we have already stated, it is neither possible nor advisable to evolve a hard and fast straight-jacket formula valid for all cases and of general application without regard to the particularities of the individual situation. For the disposal of the present case, we do not intend to lay down any general guideline. [19]

In BK Meena, the facts disclosed that the Central Administrative Tribunal (CAT) stayed the disciplinary proceedings against the delinquent employee, pending criminal proceedings, in view of the fact that the charge-sheet in the criminal case and the memo of charges in the disciplinary proceedings were based on the same set of facts and allegations. In appeal, the court held that the tribunal was in error in staying the disciplinary proceedings against the delinquent employee pending the criminal proceedings against him. The court observed: 'Stay of disciplinary proceedings may not be, and should not be a matter of course. All relevant factors for and against should be weighed and a decision taken in view of the various principles laid down in the decisions referred to above'.[20] In Collegiate Education, the Supreme Court discountenanced the suggestion that after the employee has been convicted of a criminal charge the disciplinary authority should wait till the appeal, revision or other remedies are over because it would not be advisable as it would mean continuing in service of a person who has been convicted of a serious offence by a criminal court.[21] It is now well-established that the acquittal of a delinquent in criminal proceedings does not bar the disciplinary action against him. In Md. Moosa, the management dismissed a workman pending criminal proceedings against him after holding a fair and proper domestic inquiry and without reference to the criminal proceedings. Subsequently, the workman was acquitted by the criminal court. On a reference at the instance of the employee, the tribunal held that the domestic inquiry had been fair and proper but it set aside the order of dismissal, for the reason that the workman had been acquitted by the criminal court on coming to the conclusion that the charge levelled against him had not been made out. The tribunal relied on the criminal court's judgment. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to sit in appeal on the inquiry and it was not permissible for the tribunal to take into account the evidence in the criminal court which was not materially available at the domestic inquiry.[22]

In Ramachandra Modak, the question before the Supreme Court was whether the departmental inquiry pending against the employee involved in the criminal case could be continued even after his acquittal in the criminal case. The Supreme Court held that it was a matter which should be decided by the department after considering the nature of the findings given by the criminal court. The court further observed that normally where the accused was acquitted honourably and completely exonerated of the charges, it was not expedient to continue a departmental inquiry on the very same charges or grounds of evidence. However, merely because the accused was acquitted, the power or the authority to continue the departmental inquiry would not be taken away nor its discretion in any way fettered.[23] In Nelson Moris, the Supreme Court held that the nature and scope of a criminal case were very different from those of a departmental disciplinary proceedings and an order of acquittal, therefore, could not conclude the departmental proceedings.[24] In the absence of any prohibition in law or any order of a court of law staying the departmental inquiry, the employer was not justified in waiting for an unreasonably long period of 13 years, during which period the employee was kept under suspension, for the conclusion of the criminal trial. The disciplinary inquiry commenced against the employee is quashed.[25] In Mannalal, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the fact that a criminal trial under s s 353 and 292 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 was pending against the workman would not bar the holding of a domestic inquiry, which was initiated not only for the said offence of assaulting a superior officer but also for certain other offences. The criminal proceedings and departmental proceedings could not be said to be for identical offences and accordingly, the domestic inquiry was permissible. Acquittal by a criminal court did not mean automatic exoneration of the delinquent.[26] Even after acquittal of an accused from a criminal proceeding, domestic inquiry can be completed and punishment imposed. The dismissal of the workman for theft of mercury belonging to the company is not barred by his acquittal in the criminal case.[27] The factum of conviction by the criminal court is not washed out merely by the release of the offender on probation under the Probation of Offenders Act 1958. The stigma continues and the finding of the misconduct resulting in conviction has to be treated as the conclusive proof. The disciplinary authority can pass an appropriate order upon issue of show cause notice.[28]

In Bank of Baroda, the facts were, a clerk was dismissed by the bank for giving false statement while submitting his application for appointment about the pendency of a criminal case against him. The labour court directed the Bank to reinstate him with full backwages. The Supreme Court ordered that in view of the fact that the pending criminal proceedings did not relate to an offence involving cheating or misappropriation which would have had a direct impact on the decision of the appointing bank, the impugned award be maintained subject to the condition that the employee be treated as a fresh recruit from the date when he was exonerated by the High Court. The court further observed that the order was rendered on the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case and would not be treated as a precedent in future.[29] In Terrace Estate, the Madras High Court held that where the workmen were dismissed after holding the domestic inquiry into the charges of riotous and disorderly behaviour, their acquittal by the High Court for the offence punishable under s 302 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 would not vitiate the domestic inquiry as the criminal case and the domestic inquiry were on different charges.[30] Acquittal in a criminal trial on benefit of doubt is not a bar to impose penalty in the departmental proceedings.[31] Where the workman challenged the award of labour court confirming the dismissal of a workman who was dismissed for misappropriation of paddy on the ground that he was acquitted by the criminal court on the same charge, the Madras High Court, while dismissing the appeal held that there was neither a whisper before the labour court or before the single judge of the High Court, about the said acquittal nor were the findings of the inquiry officer challenged before the labour court as wrong.[32]

Where the workman was dismissed for throwing acid on the face of a co-worker, his acquittal in the criminal proceedings initiated against him is not a bar against departmental proceedings.[33] Where it was found that, in spite of the fact that the workman was honourably acquitted by the criminal court, the disciplinary authority has not considered the said fact and differed therefrom for sound reasons, nor has he issued a show-cause notice before imposing the punishment, the action of the management amounted to violation of principles of natural justice and hence deserves to be set aside.[34] A single judge of the Madras High Court quashed the order of reinstatement passed by the labour court in a case of dismissal for a misconduct involving shortage of goods entrusted to him and in the face of conviction by a criminal court for the same offence, and held that the labour court arrived at a conclusion contrary to the evidence on record.[35] Where a workman, whose services were terminated on conviction in a criminal case lodged by the management for demanding illegal gratification, was reinstated on being acquitted subsequently by the appellate court on benefit of doubt, the High Court held that he was not entitled to backwages as his acquittal could not be called a clean acquittal.[36] Where the workman charged for theft was acquitted by the criminal court on the same set of facts as in the domestic inquiry, the dismissal of the workman on the basis of a statement made by him in the criminal case, which was found to be more in the nature of an explanation and not confession, is illegal and the workman is entitled to reinstatement.[37] In Bharat Gold Mines, the Supreme Court deduced the following principles on the issue:

(i) Departmental proceedings and proceedings in a criminal case can proceed simultaneously as there is no bar in their being conducted simultaneously, though separately.

(ii) If the departmental proceedings and the criminal case are based on identical and similar set of facts and the charge in the criminal case against the delinquent employee is of a grave nature which involves complicated questions of law and fact, it would be desirable to stay the departmental proceedings till the conclusion of the criminal case.

(iii) Whether the nature of a charge in a criminal case is grave and whether complicated questions of fact and law are involved in that case, will depend upon the nature of offence, the nature of the case launched against the employee on the basis of evidence and material collected against him during investigation or as reflected in the charge sheet.

(iv) The factors mentioned in (ii) and (iii) above cannot be considered in isolation to stay the departmental proceedings but due regard has to be given to the fact that the departmental proceedings cannot be unduly delayed.

(v) If the criminal case does not proceed or its disposal is being unduly delayed, the departmental proceedings, even if they were stayed on account of the pendency of the criminal case, can be resumed and proceeded with, so as to conclude them at an early date, so that if the employee is found not guilty his honour may be vindicated and in case he is found guilty, the administration may get rid of him at the earliest[38].

In Dhanna Ram, the facts were: a workman was removed from service on being convicted by the trial court. Subsequently, he was acquitted by the appellate court. Despite this, the management opted for establishing the charges before the labour court, but eventually failed to prove the case against the workman, with the result that the labour court directed the reinstatement of the workman. The Rajasthan High Court, while upholding the order of the labour court, held that the employer was not entitled to a third opportunity to come to a different finding from what had been reached by two courts, where he had the fullest opportunity to lead evidence to sustain the allegation against the workman.[39] The labour court cannot interfere with the order of dismissal on the ground that when the criminal court has not relied upon the evidence of the eye-witnesses to prove negligence on the part of driver, the employer could not have come to the conclusion of negligence on the part of the driver.[40] Acquittal in a criminal trial on benefit of doubt is not a bar to impose penalty in the departmental proceedings.[41] Quashing the order of reinstatement passed by the labour court on the ground that the film stolen by the workman was only 70 feet and that he was acquitted by the criminal court, it was held that the value of property stolen was not the criterion, and that the labour court failed to analyse the gravity of offence.[42]Where the workman, who was charged for theft but acquitted in the criminal proceeding, did not report for duty thereafter and was absent unauthorisedly, yet filed a criminal complaint against the management for non-settlement of his terminal benefits, it was held that the criminal complaint was an abuse of the process of law and was not maintainable, and that the employee should approach the machinery provided under the ID Act.[43] In Uranium Corporation, the facts disclosed that a workman was charge-sheeted for assaulting the Chief Medical Officer, apart from filing a criminal case against him. While the criminal proceedings were pending, the management conducted the enquiry and dismissed the workman. Subsequently, he was acquitted by the criminal court. The Jharkhand High Court upheld the award passed by the tribunal directing reinstatement of the workman with a lesser punishment of stoppage of two increments, but without any back wages.[44] Mere acquittal in a criminal case does not have the effect of nullifying the decision taken in departmental proceedings.[45]

Adjournments

Even before the domestic tribunals, the parties have no right to go on asking for as many adjournments as they like.[46] To grant or refuse adjournment is in the discretion of the inquiry officer in the circumstances of a case. The mere fact that the inquiry officer refused to adjourn the case would not vitiate the inquiry.[47] The question whether by refusing adjournment, the inquiry officer denied a reasonable opportunity to a party would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.

The discretion is to be judicially exercised bearing in mind that a party is not denied reasonable opportunity to present his case in the inquiry. If it appears that by refusing to adjourn the hearing at the instance of the charge-sheeted workman, the inquiry officer failed to give the said workman a reasonable opportunity to lead evidence, that might, in a proper case, be considered to introduce an element of infirmity in the inquiry.[48] For instance in Tejvir Singh, the workman was given just a day's time to face the domestic inquiry. On the request of the workman to postpone the inquiry for two or three days to enable him to make arrangements for his representation in the inquiry and also to bring his witnesses was rejected. In the inquiry, the management examined as many as three witnesses the same day and also produced a number of documents with which the workman was not familiar at all and was not in a position to effectively cross-examine those witnesses. After completing the evidence of these three witnesses, the workman was immediately called upon to enter his defence. Even at this stage, his request for adjournment to enable him to produce his witnesses was rejected and he was given only one hour's time to get his evidence. The workman was able to get only one witness. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court deprecated the attitude adopted by the inquiry officer and held that the inquiry had been conducted in gross violation of the principles of natural justice without giving a real and fair opportunity to the workman to participate in the proceedings.[49] In Baldev Lal, in a different set of facts and circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the refusal of the inquiry officer to grant further adjournment of the inquiry proceedings was justified.[50]

Ex Parte Inquiry

Industrial adjudication, normally, discourages the practice of a workman refusing to participate in domestic inquiries or to withdraw from inquiries without any reasonable ground or taking unreasonable and undesirable attitude. In other words, when there is no valid reason for the delinquent employee not to appear before the inquiry officer, no complaint for want of opportunity is tenable.[51] In Northern Rly CCS, the workman refused to participate in the inquiry taking a very unreasonable and undesirable attitude in persistently demanding representation by a stranger which was not permissible. The Supreme Court observed that such attitude deserved to be condemned.[52] However, even in a case, where a workman refuses to participate in an inquiry or withdraws from the inquiry in the course of the proceedings, it is incumbent on the inquiry officer to complete the inquiry by taking all evidence ex parte to find out whether or not the charge has been proved. In the event he finds that the charge is proved he would submit his report to the disciplinary authority. The disciplinary authority, then should communicate a copy of the inquiry report to the delinquent and seek his explanation for the proposed action. If the workman submits any explanation, the same has to be taken into consideration and then an appropriate order should be passed in accordance with law.[53] In Imperial Tobacco, at a particular stage of the inquiry proceedings, the workman withdrew from the inquiry. The employer dismissed the workman without even completing the inquiry proceedings in the manner prescribed by the Standing Orders. Holding the order of dismissal to be invalid, the Supreme Court observed that even though the workman had withdrawn from the inquiry-whether rightly or wrongly—'the inquiry should have been completed and all evidence should have been taken ex parte'. The fact that the workman withdrew from the inquiry at an early stage 'did not absolve the inquiry officer from conducting the inquiry by taking evidence ex parte'. Furthermore, it also did not absolve the punishing authority from following the procedure prescribed in the relevant Standing Order in inflicting the punishment, but once the ex parte inquiry is completed on taking all evidence in compliance with the requirements of the relevant Standing Orders or the principles of natural justice, the action based on such inquiry normally will not be invalidated.[54] In Harinagar Sugar, the delinquent workman refused to participate in the domestic inquiry initiated against him, unless he was permitted to be represented by an office-bearer of the trade union of which he was a member. The inquiry officer, therefore, proceeded with the domestic inquiry ex parte. The further opportunity given to the workman to participate in the inquiry was also not availed of by him. On the basis of the evidence on record of the ex parte domestic inquiry, the workman was found guilty of the charges levelled against him and was dismissed from service. The Patna High Court held that the inquiry was not contrary to the principles of natural justice merely because the workman was not allowed to be represented by a member of his union. The court observed that 'the workman who was given an opportunity to take part in the domestic inquiry refused to avail himself of the same and deliberately absented himself, he could not be allowed to say that the action of the management in proceeding with the inquiry ex parte was not fair or proper. It is, therefore, not open to him to contend that the inquiry was not bona fide on that account.[55] In a somewhat similar situation, in Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills, Bhagwati J, observed:

> If full and free opportunity was given to the respondents to present themselves at the inquiry and defend themselves, it could not be said that the inquiry was anything but fair. No principles of natural justice were violated and the management was at liberty to come to its conclusions in regard to the culpability of the respondents and also to determine what punishment should be meted out to the respondents for the misconduct and insubordination proved against them.[56]

The principles of natural justice require that notice of the proposed inquiry should be given to the concerned person. They do not require that even after giving the notice, if the concerned workman remains absent, the inquiry should not be held in his absence.[57] Thus, where in the midst of a domestic inquiry, the workman withdrew from it for some reason or other and the inquiry officer thereafter concluded such inquiry ex parte, and held the workmen guilty of the charge levelled against them, the validity of the inquiry was upheld.[58] Likewise, where the workmen when asked to express their desire to state whether they would like to have an oral hearing, persisted that the management should negotiate with the union, and the management, in these circumstances, passed an order dismissing the workmen from service, on the basis of the material on record, it was held that, in such a situation, the rules of fair hearing or fair opportunity were not violated in any way.[59] Where the delinquent workman does not choose to participate in the domestic inquiry to substantiate his case and an adverse inference for not examining himself would be justified as he would be the best witness for his case and many features which are within his special and personal knowledge could be appropriately placed before the tribunal.[60] In Baldev Lal (supra), the workman appeared before the inquiry officer and after a shortwhile, he left the room under the pretext of consulting somebody outside and took more than an hour to return. On resuming the inquiry, when he was asked to sign the first page of the inquiry proceedings, he refused to do so and again left the inquiry saying that he was to consult his companions outside. As one of the witnesses of the management was about to give his evidence, the workman's brother entered the inquiry room and started interfering with the inquiry proceedings which resulted in a serious scuffle. In the circumstances, the inquiry was adjourned to another date and a telegram was sent to the workman apprising him of the date of the inquiry. On the date of the resumed inquiry, a telegram was received from the workman's wife saying that he was out of station and requested for postponement of the inquiry. The inquiry officer, however, proceeded with the inquiry ex parte as a result of which the workman was dismissed. The Supreme Court disagreed with the holding of the tribunal that the inquiry was in violation of the rules of natural justice, and observed that 'it would be difficult to say that if the inquiry officer took the view that the telegram sent by the respondent's wife was merely another incidence of unwillingness of the respondent to take part in the inquiry and was an attempt to avoid it and, therefore, the inquiry sought to be held even in the absence of the respondent, it is an unreasonable view.[61]

If the delinquent workman does not attend the inquiry on the fixed date and an order of ex parte proceedings is made, proceedings can be held on subsequent dates without giving any notice to him.[62] In case, a workman is prevented from participating in a domestic inquiry on account of the conduct of the management, there is no doubt that the inquiry if held ex parte will be vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice, but if the workman could not participate in the domestic inquiry for reasons for which the management cannot be held responsible, holding the ex parte inquiry against them may not necessarily be in violation of the principles of natural justice. In TELCO, the Patna High Court held that the ex parte inquiry against the delinquent workmen who were arrested by the police not at the instance of the management was not vitiated for violation of the principles of natural justice. It was further held that since these workmen were held under criminal charges, it could not be said that their absence was for reasons beyond their control.[63]

In Mohd Shahid, it was held that the delinquent employee having refused to participate in inquiry, could not turn around and complain that his dismissal was against principles of natural justice. However, withdrawal from inquiry by the delinquent would not absolve the inquiry officer from holding an ex parte inquiry according to law. To put it differently, it does not mean that a finding against the delinquent can be given by an inquiry officer without further investigation. It is still necessary for the inquiry officer to record the evidence although in the absence of the employee. It is of utmost necessity that the disciplinary authority examines the case with great care before any decision is taken about the guilt of the person. The person proceeded against has a right at different stages of proceedings and if he defaulted at one stage then it will not take away his right to defend himself altogether at a different stage.[64] Where the chargesheeted employee has not submitted his reply to the chargesheet despite repeated reminders nor has appeared before the inquiry officer, and did not inspect the relevant record, though he was asked to do so, it could not be said that the conclusion of the inquiry officer, on the basis of the material available, that the charges were proved, was a negation of the principles of natural justice.[65] Where the delinquent workman was served with notice and he filed his reply and also appeared before the enquiry officer, but remained absent thereafter despite notices, it could not be said that he was not given opportunity to participate in the enquiry. It was a case of not availing the opportunity given to him. If the enquiry officer proceeds with the enquiry ex parte in these circumstances, it could not be said that the enquiry was vitiated.[66] In CMD, VSP, the facts were: the workman, a habitual absentee, did not submit his explanation on the ground that his mother was ill, and he did not present himself before the enquiry officer, despite several opportunities given to him with the result the enquiry was held ex parte. And a subsequent explanation given to another authority of the company was not pleaded in the enquiry proceedings. It was held by the Supreme Court that the High Court, in exercise of its writ jurisdiction under Art 226, cannot overturn a legal order on the ground of sympathy and sentiment.[67]

In Hemant Kumar, the facts briefly were: the respondent-workman was employed in the appellant-Bank as a cashier-cum-clerk. In January, 1994 it was discovered that the respondent had been indulging in misappropriation of money by making fictitious entries and manipulations in the bank's ledgers. On his malfeasance coming to light, the respondent not only admitted his guilt in writing vide memo dated 3 March 1994 but also deposited the amount of Rs.14,000/- to make good the amount earlier defalcated by him. He was given a charge-sheet detailing his various acts of omission and commission to which he did not give any reply. Nevertheless, before the Enquiry Officer in course of the preliminary enquiry he expressed the intent to defend himself in the enquiry. The enquiry was first fixed on 15 November 1994 but on that date the respondent did not appear without giving any intimation to the Enquiry Officer. Due to his non-appearance the enquiry was adjourned to 28 November 1994. On that date, once again, he did not come to participate in the enquiry proceedings but sent a request for adjournment on the ground that his mother-in-law was seriously ill at Agra. The enquiry was once again adjourned and it was fixed for 14 December 1994. He was intimated about the next date fixed in the enquiry through registered post as well as hand delivery letters dated 15 November 1994 and 28 November 1994 respectively. On 14 December 1994 the respondent was once again absent and there was no intimation from him. In those circumstances and having regard to the fact that the witness intended to be examined by the management in support of the charge had come in connection with that enquiry from Delhi to Dehradun for the third time, the Enquiry Officer decided to proceed with the enquiry and examine him ex parte. The said witness happened to be the Branch Manager where the respondent was posted at the material time and where the misappropriation was committed by him. On the basis of the enquiry, the respondent was dismissed. The tribunal directed reinstatement on the ground that the enquiry was violative of principles of natural justice, which award was affirmed by the High Court of Uttarkhand. Quashing the orders of the tribunal and the High Court, Aftab Alam J (for self and Lodha J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> We are of the view that both the reasons assigned by the Tribunal for condemning the departmental enquiry as defective are completely untenable. The principles of natural justice cannot be stretched to a point where they would render the in-house proceedings unworkable. Admittedly, the respondent had not appeared for the enquiry on two earlier dates. On the third date too he was absent and there was no intimation from him before the Enquiry Officer, yet the Tribunal insists that it was the duty of the Enquiry Officer to find out from the concerned department of the bank whether any intimation or application was received from the respondent.. .. The Tribunal's observation that it was only the third date of hearing and hence, it could not be said that the respondent had adopted dilatory tactics can only be described as unfortunate. We completely reject the notion that three barren dates in an in-house proceeding do not amount to delay.. .. The second reason assigned by the Tribunal that the Enquiry Officer should have allowed the respondent the opportunity to lead evidence in rebuttal is also without substance in the overall facts of the case. The respondent had already tendered two admissions of guilt in writing. .. and there was hardly anything that could be said on his behalf to repel the charges.. .. the Tribunal's findings are wholly unreasonable and perverse and fit to be set aside. The High Court, unfortunately, did not consider the matter as it should have, in light of the discussions made above. The High Court's order is equally unsustainable.[68] (Paras 10-12).

(iii) Report of Inquiry Officer

(a) General Principles

The inquiry report is a document of vital importance in the course of disciplinary proceedings against a delinquent workman. If the inquiry officer finds that the charges levelled against the workman are proved it will result not only in the deprivation of the livelihood but also attaches a stigma to the character of the workman. The inquiry report, therefore, should reflect the application of mind by the inquiry officer to the pleadings and the evidence adduced before him by the parties. 'An inquiry report in a quasi-judicial inquiry must show the reasons for the conclusion. It cannot be an ipse dixit of the inquiry officer'.[69] In the words of Subba Rao J, 'Reasoned order is a desirable condition of judicial disposal ...A speaking order will at its best be a reasonable and at its worst be at least a plausible one'.[70] Satisfactory decision of a disputed claim may be reached only if it be supported by the most cogent reasons that appealed to the authority. Recording of reasons in support of a decision on a disputed claim by a quasi-judicial authority ensures that the decision is reached according to law and is not the result of caprice, whim or fancy or reached on grounds of policy or expediency.[71] The whole object of holding a domestic inquiry against a delinquent workman is to enable the inquiry officer to decide upon the merits of the dispute before him,[72] and such inquiries must conform to the basic requirements of natural justice and one of the essential requisites of a proceeding of this character is that when the inquiry is over, the officer must consider the evidence and record his conclusions and reasons therefore.[73] A mere form of inquiry would not satisfy the requirements of industrial law and protect the disciplinary action taken by the employer against challenge.[74] It would, therefore, be wholly misconceived to think that once evidence is recorded, all that the employer is expected to do is to pass an order of dismissal which impliedly indicates that the employer accepts the view that the charges framed against the employee have been proved.[75] In Kharda & Co., it was held that one of the tests which the industrial tribunal is entitled to apply in dealing with industrial disputes of this character is, whether the conclusions of the inquiry officer was perverse or whether there was any basic error in the approach adopted by him. In the absence of the findings or conclusions recorded by the inquiry officer, it would be impossible for the adjudicator to know as to how he approached the question and what conclusions he reached before taking the disciplinary action against the delinquent workman and it would, therefore, be difficult for the adjudicator to decide whether the approach adopted by the inquiry officer was basically erroneous or whether his conclusions were perverse. The failure of the inquiry officer to record his findings and conclusions at the end of the inquiry would, therefore, constitute a serious infirmity in the inquiry itself which would render the inquiry invalid and the tribunal would be justified in ignoring the inquiry. In this case, the inquiry was held to be vitiated by a serious infirmity for the reason that at the end of the inquiry, the manager who held the inquiry did not record any findings and straightaway passed the order of dismissal taking the view that it was not necessary to make a formal report because he himself was the punishing authority. Gajendragadkar J observed:

> If industrial adjudication attaches importance to domestic inquiries and the conclusions reached at the end of such inquiries, that necessarily postulates that the inquiry would be followed by a statement containing the conclusions of the inquiry officer.[76]

The inquiry officer, therefore, after taking the evidence adduced by the parties has to record his findings and conclusions as to whether the misconduct is proved or not which are of vital importance for the adjudication of the dispute arising out of the disciplinary action. It is, therefore, essential that the officer should makes a brief report indicating clearly his conclusions and reasons in support thereof. The fact that the inquiry officer himself is the ultimate punishing authority, cannot help to dispense with the making of the report recording the findings holding the charge-sheeted workman guilty of the charges levelled against him. It is, of course, not necessary that the report should be elaborate. Howsoever brief the report is, it should indicate in a broad way the conclusions of the officer and his reasons. The inquiry report is a document which will have to be closely examined by the Industrial Tribunal when a dispute pertaining to disciplinary action against the employee is brought before it for its adjudication. In other words, when the legality or propriety of the disciplinary action, which follows the inquiry report is put in issue before an industrial tribunal, it would be impossible for the tribunal to consider whether the conclusions reached by the inquiry officer were perverse or not.[77] A cryptic report, for instance, without stating any reasons will be of little value.[78]

The standard of proof required in a domestic inquiry is only preponderance of probabilities. It is not necessary that there should be direct evidence. Circumstantial evidence satisfying the test of preponderance of probabilities will be sufficient.[79] In Northern Dooars Tea, the inquiry officer did not record any proper finding for his conclusions at the end of his inquiry but merely drew some notes in that behalf. The Supreme Court did not treat such notes as a finding recorded in the inquiry and held the inquiry to be invalid.[80] In Samnuggur, the report of the inquiry officer was not produced before the tribunal and, in fact, there was no evidence to show that such a report had at all been made. The tribunal, therefore, took the view that either the report was not made or was not produced before it and therefore, held that the inquiry was invalid.[81] This holding was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Saran Motors, in which it was held that the mere failure on the part of the inquiry officer to make notes of his inspection of the spot of the incident could not invalidate the whole domestic inquiry, when there was other evidence before him to support his findings, his conclusion could not be rejected on that ground.[82] In Howrah Trading, the report of the inquiry officer was considered to be of 'little value' because he had failed to give reasons and submitted a cryptic report ending with the statement that 'all other relevant points from the proceedings will be explained personally.[83] In Anil Kumar, the evidence was annexed to the report and no correlation was established between the two, showing application of mind. The court held that there was no inquiry worth the name and the order of termination based on such proceeding disclosing non-application of mind, was unsustainable.[84] The findings of an inquiry officer must be supported by legal evidence.[85] If, after the scrutiny of the report of the inquiry officer, the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the findings are based on irrelevant and extraneous matters, the inquiry will be liable to be set aside, but the findings of an inquiry officer are not to be lightly brushed aside merely because an inquiry officer, while writing his report, has mentioned some facts which are not strictly borne out by the evidence before him.[86]

In SC Prasad, the inquiry officer had made certain remarks in his report which were not based on any evidence on record but were based on his personal knowledge. Since, from the inquiry report, it was clear that these remarks were made incidentally and had not been relied on in holding any of the workmen guilty of the charges, the inquiry was not invalid. Strictly speaking, an inquiry officer is not entitled to bring in those facts in his report which do not form part of the evidence. If, therefore, those remarks had been relied on in finding any of the workmen guilty, then undoubtedly, the inquiry would have been vitiated on the ground that it did not form part of the evidence, because 'if the inquiry officer were to transgress the rules of natural justice by relying on matters which the workman had no opportunity to meet, the validity of his findings would be effected'. The tribunal had held that the inquiry was vitiated on account of delay between the service of the chargesheet and the report of the inquiry officer but there was no allegation of any tampering of evidence of any of the witnesses and the delay between the service of the chargesheet and the report of the inquiry officer was not considerable by any measure and the lapse of time between the recording of the evidence and the taking of the signature thereon of the witnesses was explained by the inquiry officer. In these circumstances, the counsel for the workmen himself did not support the view taken by the tribunal but inordinate delay in submitting the inquiry report is likely to vitiate the findings of the inquiry. However, the question whether an inquiry is vitiated on account of delay in submitting the report will depend on the facts of each case.[87]

(b) Minor Discrepancies

No doubt, the report of the inquiry officer will be vitiated where the inquiry officer acts mala fide, ie, ignores or excludes from consideration, a vital and material piece of evidence or takes into consideration any irrelevant or extraneous materials, or where he transgresses the principles of natural justice by being biased against the workman or denies to him a reasonable opportunity to defend himself or where his report is perverse, ie, the findings are not supported by any evidence or are entirely opposed to the evidence on record. It has also to be borne in mind that it is not every factual inaccuracy, however slight or insignificant, that would justify the quashing of the report.[88] The fact that statements of certain witnesses were recorded in shorthand in the course of domestic inquiry but were signed later on, when they were transcribed in long hand and typed, would not make the inquiry mala fide, irregular or improper.[89] The fact that the record of the domestic inquiry was not signed by the inquiring officer but was signed only by the two witnesses and the concerned workman, would not lead to the conclusion that, in fact, no inquiry was held.[90] Likewise, the mere fact that the inquiry officer had failed to make notes of inspection of the site of the incident, would not be a sufficient ground to reject his findings when there was other evidence before him to support his findings.[91] In National Carbon, minor discrepancies regarding the signatures of the witnesses on their statements before the inquiry officer and the signature of the manager on the endorsement of the inquiry report, were not held to be vitiating the inquiry report, as the workmen could have got them cleared before the tribunal by cross-examination which was not done.[92] In Kalindi, the examination of the inquiry officer's report showed that a certain clerical error in the concluding portion of the report had crept in, ie, the name of one person was accidentally mentioned instead of another person's but in view of the fact that the actual allegation against the delinquent workman was found to have been proved by the inquiry officer, it was held that the conclusion and not the wrong statement weighed with the punishing authority in determining the punishment and the inquiry was, therefore, not vitiated.[93]

(c) Perversity

Perversity vitiates disciplinary proceedings. There is a two-fold test of perversity of a finding. The first test is that the finding is not supported by any legal evidence at all and the second is that on the basis of the material on the record, no reasonable person could have arrived at the finding complained of.[94] In each of these cases, the findings would be treated as perverse. A finding recorded in a domestic inquiry can be characterised as perverse only if it is shown that such a finding is not supported by any evidence at all or is entirely opposed to the whole evidence adduced before it or no reasonable person could have come to the finding on the basis of the evidence on the record.[95] In other words, an industrial tribunal would not be justified in characterising the finding recorded in the domestic inquiry as perverse unless it can be shown that such finding is not supported by any evidence or is entirely opposed to the whole body of evidence adduced before it. A broad dichotomy is always maintained between a decision which is perverse and the one which is not perverse. If the decision is arrived at on no evidence or evidence which is thoroughly unreliable and unacceptable and if a reasonable and well-instructed person would not act upon such evidence and decide, then it is to be characterised as a perverse order; but, if there is evidence on record, however, compendious it may be, if it is acceptable and if it could be relied upon, then a conclusion arrived at in such a situation cannot be termed as a perverse. If otherwise the conclusion of the inquiry officer is reasonable, then the labour court ought not normally interfere with such a decision on a mere abstruse and abstract basis.[1]

It is, therefore, essential to bear in mind the difference between a finding which is not supported by any legal evidence and a finding which may appear to be not supported by sufficient evidence or may be based on inadequate or unsatisfactory evidence.[2] A wrong finding is not necessarily a perverse finding, and a finding cannot be described to be perverse merely because it is possible to take a different view on the evidence.[3] Nor can a finding be called perverse, because in certain matters, the line of reasoning adopted by the inquiry officer is not very cogent or logical. When it appears to the tribunal that no person properly instructed in law and acting judicially could have reached the particular decision, it might proceed on the assumption that misconception of law has been responsible for the wrong decision.[4] However, the line of demarcation between a wrong finding and a perverse finding is hardly perceptible. In Ludh Budh Singh, the Supreme Court pointed out that a finding recorded by an inquiry officer ignoring the material admissions made by the party in favour of the workman is not a question of mere appreciation of the evidence, but really recording a finding contrary to the evidence adduced before him. Therefore, in a case where the findings of fact are based on no legal evidence and the conclusion is one to which no reasonable man would come, it would be a case of perversity and not of reappraisal of evidence.[5] In Rajinder Kindra, the Supreme Court held that where the findings are based on no legal evidence and are either ipse dixit or based on conjectures and surmises unrelated to evidence and they disclose non-application of the mind, such findings and conclusions, are perverse.[6] In Saudi Arabian Airlines, Srikrishna J of Bombay High Court observed that the perversity of findings could arise only if:

(a) there was no evidence whatsoever to support the finding, or

(b) the conclusions recorded were diametrically contrary to the evidence on record, or

(c) the conclusions were such that no reasonable person would have arrived at.[7]

In deciding the question as to whether a particular conclusion of fact was perverse or not, the industrial tribunal would not be justified in weighing the evidence for itself and determining the question of the perversity of the view arrived at by the inquiry officer in the light of his own findings on the question of fact.[8] The findings of the domestic tribunal cannot merely be brushed aside unless they are shown to be based on no evidence.[9] In a domestic inquiry, once a conclusion is deduced from the evidence, it is not permissible to assail that conclusion even though it is possible for some other authority to arrive at a different conclusion on the same evidence. This point is illustrated in the decision of the Supreme Court in Banaras Electric.[10]In spite of the finding that there was no mala fide intention on the part of the employer and that the inquiry was not defective, the labour court held that the finding of the inquiry officer was perverse and that there was victimisation as the inquiry officer should not have placed implicit reliance on the statement of a solitary witness but he must have subjected his statement to a careful scrutiny in the light of the defence evidence and the surrounding circumstances which could be of great help in ascertaining the truth, and in the circumstances it was difficult to arrive at the conclusion that the guilt had been brought home to the workman concerned, the finding of the inquiry officer was not justified from the evidence on record. This holding was not ultimately sustained in appeal by the Supreme Court as the evidence on record clearly justified the finding of the inquiry officer that the charged act of misconduct was proved against the workman, and the employer was justified in finding the workman guilty of disobedience of the order and the finding of victimisation was based on no evidence and was, therefore, wholly unwarranted in law.

In ASO, RPF, the employee was found guilty of the misconduct for consuming alcohol while on duty on the basis of medical report of district medical officer who was not examined in the domestic inquiry but the inquiry officer relied on the report of the Tamil Nadu forensic laboratory which was not marked in the inquiry proceedings. The finding that the employee was guilty was held to be perverse and unreasonable as it resulted in miscarriage of justice.[11] Similarly, in Anand Chandra Prusty, the burden of proof to establish the charge was on the management, but the inquiry officer instead of placing the burden of proof to establish the charge on the management, threw it on the delinquent being under the impression that it was for the workman to establish his denial of the charge and on his failure to do so, the charge should be taken to have been proved. This illegal casting of burden of proof on the workman resulted in arriving at a wrong conclusion that in the absence of evidence in support of the defence the charge was proved. The Orissa High Court quashed the finding of guilt against the employee as being perverse.[12] In Chandrakumar Deshmukh, out of two statements of witnesses, the inquiry officer accepted one in favour of the prosecution and rejected the other in favour of the delinquents without giving reasons and without examination of those witnesses. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the inquiry was perverse and in violation of the principles of natural justice. The question whether the finding of the inquiry officer in a domestic inquiry is vitiated or perverse is a pure question of law. Such a question can for the first time be raised before a writ court or the appellate court. The same principle will apply both to a suit and a writ proceeding.[13] Any action of discharge or dismissal based on the findings of the inquiry officer which are vitiated or perverse will not be sustainable.[14]

Show-Cause Notice

Neither the ordinary law of the land nor the industrial law requires an employer to give a show-cause notice to the workman before imposing disciplinary punishment on him. The only class of cases where such a notice is necessary are those arising under Art 311 of the Constitution and even that has now been removed by the amendment of that Article. Such requirement would unnecessarily prolong disciplinary inquiries which in the interest of industrial peace should be disposed of in as short a time as possible.[15] Rules of natural justice do not make it necessary for the employer to give an opportunity to meet the punishing authority before imposing the punishment and all that is necessary is that a fair inquiry should be held.[16] Nor is there any requirement to give a second show-cause notice to the workman after the employer forms a provisional opinion that punishment of dismissal or discharge should be awarded as under Art 311 of the Constitution.[17] In TC Srivastava, the court pointed out that no doubt that in industrial law it is not necessary to give second opportunity, to show cause to the workman against the proposed punishment, but this does not mean that the requirement of such opportunity cannot be provided in the service rules, regulations or Standing Orders of an undertaking but such requirement should be discernible from the express language or necessary implication of the Standing Order. In this case, the relevant Standing Order provided: 'All dismissal orders shall be passed by the manager...after giving the accused an opportunity to offer an explanation'. The court observed that these words were wholly inappropriate to convey the idea of a second hearing or opportunity on the question of punishment but they were appropriate only in the context of seeking an explanation in regard to the alleged misconduct charged against a worker. Therefore, it is the alleged misconduct that has to be explained by the workman and not the proposed punishment.[18] Likewise in Engine Valves, the relevant Standing Order provided that 'no order of dismissal shall be made unless the workman concerned is informed in writing of the alleged misconduct and is given an opportunity to explain the circumstances alleged against him', the Madras High Court held that this Standing Order did not contemplate the requirement of a second show-cause notice.[19]

If a provision for a show-cause notice has been made in the Standing Orders which have been certified under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, the requirement of show-cause notice against the punishment, in such a case, would be statutory and would not be a 'mere idle formality'. Non-compliance of such requirement of the notice would vitiate the punishment of dismissal. For instance, in Lakshmiratan Cotton, the relevant Standing Order required the employer to give notice, in writing, to the concerned workman to show-cause within a specified period of time as to why the proposed punishment be not awarded, where it proposed to inflict the punishment of dismissal for any misconduct. It further required that the copies of the findings of the inquiry officer and the charge or charges should also be furnished to the workman along with the show-cause notice. Evidently, this Standing Order was intended to provide an opportunity to the workman to show that the findings of the inquiry officer were not justified on the evidence on record and even if the findings were justified, the extreme penalty of dismissal was not justified, having regard to the nature or gravity of the misconduct and his past record and any other extenuating circumstances. This condition was thus a condition precedent before an order of dismissal could validly be passed by the employer. The order of dismissal made without complying with the requirements of the Standing Order was, therefore, held to be invalid. If an opportunity is not given to the workman to show-cause against the proposed punishment, it will constitute breach of the mandatory provisions of the Standing Order as it will amount to depriving him of a reasonable opportunity to defend himself by showing that the findings of the inquiry officer were not sustainable or at any rate, the proposed punishment was excessive.[20]

In cases, where a Standing Order, service rule or regulation provides for a show-cause notice, apart from the show-cause notice, the rules of natural justice require that the report of the inquiry officer along with the record of the inquiry proceedings and any other relevant material must be furnished to the workman. In the absence of such material, it may not be possible for the workman to show that the inquiry was not fair or valid and even if the inquiry was fair and valid, the punishment of dismissal was not commensurate with the gravity of the misconduct for various reasons such as that his past record should not have been taken into account or that the past record was not so bad as to merit the maximum punishment of dismissal. Thus, the requirements of Art 311 of the Constitution can be engrafted in the procedure of disciplinary action under the industrial law by making a provision, in the service rules or the Standing Order applicable to an undertaking, to that effect. Then, the judicial dicta dealing with the cases under Art 311 (2) of the Constitution would become relevant in connection with the requirement of show-cause notice for disciplinary action under the industrial law. In Bashyan, a two-judge bench of the court took the view that the non-supply of a copy of the report would constitute violation of the rules of natural justice as it will tantamount to denial of the reasonable opportunity as required by Art 311 (2) of the Constitution as well as the rules of natural justice. The court also pointed out that requirement of supplying a copy of the inquiry report to the delinquent to enable him to point out anomaly, if any, before the punishment of dismissal is imposed by the disciplinary authority, is different from serving a second show-cause notice against the penalty to be imposed which has been dispensed with by the forty-second amendment of the Constitution.[21] However, in Ramzan Khan, Mishra CJI held:

> Deletion of the second opportunity from the scheme of Art 311(2) of the Constitution has nothing to do with providing a copy of the report to the delinquent in the matter of making his representation. Even though, the second stage of the inquiry in Art 311(2) has been abolished by the amendment, the delinquent is still entitled to represent against the conclusion of the inquiry officer holding that the delinquent is guilty of the charge or charges alleged against him.[22]

He further stated that the delinquent was entitled to a copy of the report of the inquiry officer and will also be entitled to make a representation against it, if he so desires, and non-furnishing of the report would amount to the violation of the rules of natural justice and make the final order liable to challenge hereafter. In Karunakar, a Constitution Bench affirmed the earlier dicta to the extent that the right of the employee to receive the report of the inquiry officer is a part of the 'reasonable opportunity' of defending himself and if this is denied to him, he is in effect, denied the right to defend himself and to prove his innocence in the disciplinary proceedings. It further noted that upon receipt of the report, two further rights of the employee arose viz: (i) the right to show-cause against the findings in the report; and (ii) the right to show-cause against the proposed penalty, which are independent of one another. The former is the right to prove that the inquiry is unfair or invalid and the workman is not guilty of the alleged misconduct while the latter is the right to show that no penalty or lesser penalty should be imposed even if he is held to be guilty. If after considering the inquiry officer's report the disciplinary authority decides to drop the proceedings or imposes a penalty other than dismissal or discharge, there is no occasion to issue the notice to show-cause against the proposed penalty. The right to show-cause against the proposed penalty arises at the stage when the disciplinary authority after considering the findings in the inquiry report comes to the conclusion with regard to the guilt of the employee and proposes to award penalty on the basis of its conclusions. This right has now been dispensed with by the forty-second amendment of the Constitution. The right to receive the inquiry report is an essential part of the reasonable opportunity under Art 311(2) as well as the rules of natural justice as the findings recorded by the inquiry officer form an important material fact before the disciplinary authority which along with the evidence is taken into consideration by it to come to its conclusions. After the amendment of Art 311(2), the disciplinary authority has to consider the representation of the employee against the report before it arrives at the conclusion with regard to his guilt or innocence of the employee. Speaking for the court, Sawant J, said:

> The theory of reasonable opportunity and the principles of natural justice have been evolved to uphold the rule of law and to assist > the individual to vindicate his just rights. They are not incantations to be invoked nor rights to be performed on all and sundry occasions.[23]

The question, whether in fact, prejudice has been caused to the employee or not on account of the denial to him of the report has to be considered on the facts and circumstances of each case. Where, therefore, even after the furnishing of the report, no different consequence would have followed, it would be a perversion of justice to permit the employee to resume duty and to get all the consequential benefits. It amounts to rewarding the dishonest and the guilty and thus to stretching the concept of justice to illogical and exasperating limits. It amounts to an 'unnatural expansion of natural justice' which in itself is antithetical to justice.

Evaluation of Ramzan Khan and ECIL Cases

As a general rule, the Supreme Court had always viewed employment relationship in the industrial realm on a footing totally different from that of public service, in the light of the fact that the nature, objects and purpose of the two classes of service differ widely. While the procedure for termination of contract of employment in respect of industrial employees is prescribed by the ID Act read with the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946, that of public servants is laid down under Art 311 of the Constitution. Even the remedies and relief in case of wrongful dismissal are different for the public servants as compared to industrial employees. This distinction was clearly highlighted by the Supreme Court of India through Hidayatullah J, in the Firestone, wherein the learned judge observed, 'The tribunal equated the domestic inquiry to enquiries under Art 311 of the Constitution which was hardly proper.' (at p 718). Over years, this fundamental distinction between industrial employment and public employment suffered gradual erosion.[24] In Karunakar, a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court reviewed the law relating to dismissal for misconduct with special reference to the three judge Bench decision rendered in Ramzan Khan.[25] Article 311(2) as amended by the Forty-second Amendment came in for detailed interpretation. A few extracts of the majority decision of the Supreme Court delivered by Sawant J, for himself, Mohan, Jeevan Reddy JJ, and Venkatachaliah CJI, (Ramaswamy J dissenting) in Karunakar are reproduced hereunder:

> ... Article 311 (2), however, underwent change with the Constitution (15th Amendment) Act of 1963. It explained and expanded the scope of 'reasonable opportunity'. For the original expression 'until he has been given reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken in regard to him', the provision 'except after an inquiry in which he has been informed of the charges against him and given a reasonable opportunity of being heard in respect of those charges and were it is proposed after such inquiry, to impose on him any such penalty, until he has been given reasonable opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed, but only on the basis of the evidence adduced during such inquiry' was substituted...The Amendment also provided for a second opportunity to the employee to show-cause against the penalty if it was proposed as a result of the inquiry. The courts held that while exercising his second opportunity of showing cause against the penalty, against the findings on charges, as well. What is necessary to note for our present purpose is that in spite of this change, the stage at which the employee was held to be entitled to a copy of the report, was the stage at which the penalty was proposed, as was the case prior to the said Amendment. (para 4) ...The provisions of clause (2) of Art 311 were further amended by the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act of 1976. It came into force from January 1, 1977. It expressly stated that 'it shall not be necessary to give such person any opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed'. The words 'such person' of course meant the person who was to be dismissed or removed or reduced in rank. In other words, the 42nd Amendment of the Constitution while retaining the expanded scope of the reasonable opportunity at the first stage, viz, during the inquiry as introduced by the 15th Amendment of the Constitution, did away with the opportunity of making representation against the penalty proposed after the inquiry. It is this Amendment to Art 311 (2) which has given rise to the controversy as to whether when the inquiry officer is other than the disciplinary authority, the employer is entitled to a copy of the findings recorded by him, before the disciplinary authority applies its mind to the findings and the evidence recorded, or whether the employee is entitled to the copy of the findings of the inquiry officer only at the second stage, as its conclusions and proposed the penalty. Upon answer to this question depends the answer to the other questions flowing from it, viz, whether the employee was entitled to make representation against such finding before the penalty was proposed even when Art 311 (2) stood as it was prior to the 15th Amendment of the Constitution.[26] (para 5). (Italics supplied).

Sawant J, cited the following passage from the decision rendered in Khem Chand, in respect of the three stages of a departmental proceeding at which reasonable opportunity should be given under the original Art 311 (2) as follows:

> (a) an opportunity to deny his guilt and establish his innocence, which he can only do if he is told what the charges levelled against him are and the allegations on which such charges are based;

(b) an opportunity to defend himself by cross-examining the witnesses produced against him and by examining himself or any other witnesses in support of his defence; and, finally,

(c) an opportunity to make his representation as to why the proposed punishment should not be inflicted on him, which he can only do if the competent authority, after the inquiry is over and after applying his mind to the gravity or otherwise of the charges proved against the government servant, tentatively proposes to inflict one of the three punishments and communicates the same to the government servant.[27] (para 6).

Having cited the above passage, Sawant J proceeded to hold thus:

> While the right to represent against the findings in the report is part of the reasonable opportunity available during the first stage of the inquiry, viz, before the disciplinary authority takes into consideration the findings in the report, the right to show-cause against the penalty proposed belongs to the second stage when the disciplinary authority has considered the findings in the report and has come to the conclusion with regard to the guilt of the employee and proposed to award penalty on the basis of its conclusions. The first right is the right to prove innocence. The second right is to plead for either no penalty or a lesser penalty although the conclusion regarding the guilt is accepted. It is the second right, exercisable at the second stage, which was taken away by the 42nd Amendment. (para 25)...Where the Inquiry Officer is other than the disciplinary authority, the disciplinary proceedings break into two stages. The first stage ends when the disciplinary authority arrives at its conclusions on the basis of the evidence, inquiry officer's report and the delinquent employee's reply to it. The second stage begins when the disciplinary authority decides to impose penalty on the basis for its conclusions. If the disciplinary authority decides to drop the disciplinary proceedings, the second stage is not even reached. The employee's right to receive the report is thus, a part of the reasonable opportunity of defending himself in the first stage of the inquiry. If this right is denied to him, he is in effect denied the right to defend himself and to prove his innocence in the disciplinary proceedings. (para 27)

Admittedly, the Bench not only followed, rather blindly, the earlier decision rendered in Ramzan Khan,[28] without applying its mind to the glaring inconsistencies surfaced therein, but also proceeded to enlarge the scope of the said Article to pastures which manifestly fall outside the pale of Art 311. The over-emphasis laid by the learned judges in Ramzan Khan and ECIL on the scope and application of the principles of natural justice is clearly misconceived and wholly misplaced. It is a settled proposition that the principles of natural justice do not supplant the law of the land, but only supplement it,[29] and that they should be applied only in the unoccupied interstices of the statute unless there is a clear mandate to the contrary.[30] That being the settled position, to hold that the 42nd amendment did not take away the right of the employee to receive a copy of the findings, is repugnant to all canons of statutory construction. The Article, as amended, stipulates: 'it shall not be necessary to give such person any opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed'. For a complete understanding of the extent of misconstruction placed on amended Art 311, it is necessary to deal with both the cases in some detail. In Ramzan Khan, Misra CJI observed:

> Deletion of the second opportunity from the scheme of Article 311(2) of the Constitution has nothing to do with providing of a copy of the report to the delinquent in the matter of making his representation. Even though the second stage of the inquiry in Article 311(2) has been abolished by amendment, the delinquent is still entitled to represent against the conclusion of Inquiry Officer holding that the charges or some of the charges are established and holding the delinquent guilty of such charges. For doing away with the effect of the enquiry report or to meet the recommendations of the Inquiry Officer in the matter of imposition of punishment, furnishing a copy of the report becomes necessary and to have the proceeding completed by using some material behind the back of the delinquent is a position not countenanced by the procedure. (at p 34)

On the issue 'what would be position in a case where the disciplinary authority himself held the inquiry, and hence no separate report was made out by him', the learned Chief Justice held:

> ...where the disciplinary authority is the Inquiry Officer there is no report. He becomes the first assessing authority to consider the evidence directly for finding out whether the delinquent is guilty and liable to be punished. Even otherwise, the inquiries which are directly handled by the disciplinary authority and those which are allowed to be handled by the Inquiry Officer can easily be classified into two separate groups... That itself would be a reasonable classification keeping away of the application of Article 14 of the Constitution. (at p 34).

The above observations of Misra CJI give rise to the following questions:

(i) What was the legal effect sought to be achieved by the 42nd amendment by which the old phrase in the proviso, ie, '...until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed ...' was deleted and substituted it with the phrase, ie, '...it shall not be necessary to give such a person any opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed'? Did they mean the same thing or different things?

(ii) If the said constitutional amendment was held to be valid-and obviously so, since the court had not struck it down-then, what ostensible purpose would the furnishing of a copy of the inquiry report serve? Can the delinquent make a representation either on the findings of the inquiry or on the penalty proposed?

(iii) What would be the position, if, for instance, the disciplinary authority chooses to merely send a communication to the delinquent enclosing a copy of the inquiry report without disclosing the proposed punishment, in view of the fact that the court in Ramzan Khan upheld the 42nd amendment and confined its ruling to mere furnishing of a copy of the inquiry report, and nothing more? Would such a mechanical course pursued by the disciplinary authority, satisfy the requirements prescribed in Ramzan Khan?

(iv) Going by the observations of Misra CJI, to the effect—'where the disciplinary authority is the Inquiry Officer there is no report. He becomes the first assessing authority to consider the evidence directly for finding out whether the delinquent is guilty and liable to be punished (at p 34)'—what would be the position with regard to the right of delinquent to receive a copy of the report vis-`a-vis principles of natural justice, given the fact that there is no report at all in a situation where the disciplinary authority himself has conducted the inquiry?

(v) What quality of 'reasonability' can one look for in an invidious distinction drawn between an inquiry conducted by the disciplinary authority himself on the one hand, and the one conducted by someone other than the disciplinary authority on the other? How would it satisfy the requirement of 'equality' enshrined in Art 14, if two employees of the same department dismissed in two different modes—one by an inquiry officer-cum-disciplinary authority, and the other by a disciplinary authority who is not the inquiry officer—knock at the doors of the court for justice? How would the dynamics of the ratio propounded in Ramzan Khan operate to ensure the constitutional mandate of equality before law, in such an eventuality?

(vi) In the face of several authorities to the effect that the principles of natural justice do not supplant, but only supplement the law of the land, and that they could be applied only in the unoccupied interstices of law, what place could 'natural justice' possibly claim in the light of an express provision enshrined in Art. 311(2) ? Would the ratio of Ramzan Khan supplement Art 311 (2) or supplant it?

Answers to the above questions are too obvious to need a detailed discussion, which unfold the defective approach of Misra CJI. Once the right to 'show cause' is taken away, the supply of a copy, that too only, in cases where the enquiry was held by a person other than the disciplinary authority, renders the whole exercise otiose and reduces it to an 'empty and useless formality'. To say the least, the over-subtle distinction drawn by the learned Chief Justice, between an enquiry held by the disciplinary authority and the one held by someone else, is trite and obnoxious. If the intention of the legislature were not to effect a fundamental change in Art 311(2) (as observed by him at p 34), then why should it go through the complex process of amending the Constitution? It is wholly improper to presume that the Parliament was indulging in a futile and unproductive exercise while amending the Constitution in substantial terms by which, the requirement of issuing a show-cause notice was manifestly dispensed with. The line of reasoning adopted by Misra CJI, in support of his conclusion that the 'deletion of second opportunity from the scheme of Article 311(2) of the Constitution has nothing to do with providing of a copy of the report to the delinquent in the matter of making his representation' (at p 34) is unsound, perverse and without susbtance. What was the 'representation' that the learned Chief Justice was referring to, and against what? Is it against the proposed punishment!? Given the fact that the court limited its interpretation of the amended Article to the extent of furnishing a copy of the findings, and nothing more, how can delinquent show cause, if the employer merely supplies a copy of the report with a one-line covering letter, without disclosing the proposed punishment? That was the degree of absurdity that the learned Chief Justice had invented and imported into the decision-making process!

Turning to ECIL, the company, not being a statutory corporation, was not covered by the ratio of Sukhdev Singh,[31] notwithstanding the fact that the decision in Sukhdev Singh itself was replete with half-tones and lack of any judicial conviction on the part of Ray CJI and was wholly misconceived. Be that as it may, the facts of ECIL disclose that the respondent was working as a Senior Technical Officer, which prima facie implies that he was not a 'workman' u/s. 2(s) of IDA, and therefore the remedies provided under industrial law were not available to him. Secondly, assuming that he was a 'workman' for the sake of argument, whatever might be the view taken in Ramzan Khan, neither Art 311 nor the consequences of the said ruling could apply to it, for the reason that industrial employment is governed by a separate set of laws and regulations, which apply with as much vigour and force to industrial employees as do the Constitutional provisions to public servants. This implies that the employee was required to invoke the machinery provided in IDA only. On the contrary, if the respondent fell outside the pale of the definition of 'workman', the only remedy available to him was to file a suit in the civil court. Article 311 and IDA operate in different fields with different schemes and objects in view, and address different classes of employees. To draw a foundational distinction between the two classes of employment, if the workmen employed in an industry resort to strike, the employer can declare a lockout under s 24(3) of the ID Act in retaliation. While the public servants can also resort to a strike, can the Government even conceive of a 'lockout', not to speak of declaring it as a retaliatory measure? Any attempt to mix up one with the other produces an absurd result of rendering a particular set of laws nugatory and non est. In ECIL, Sawant J, went on to state:

> ...it is only appropriate that the law laid down in Mohd Ramzan Khan's case (supra) should apply to employees in all establishments whether Government or non-Government, public or private. This will be the case whether there are rules governing the disciplinary proceeding or not and whether they expressly prohibit the furnishing of the copy of the report or are silent on the subject. Whatever the nature of punishment, further, whenever the rules require an inquiry to be held, for inflicting the punishment in question, the delinquent employee should have the benefit of the report of the Inquiry Officer before the disciplinary authority records its findings on the charges levelled against him... (at p 178)

With great respect for the eminent judge, the exercise undertaken by him to extend Constitutional provisions meant for public servants to industrial employees is misplaced, uncalled for and is clearly wrong. In the first place, the interpretation placed on the amended Art 311(2) in Ramzan Khan is itself wholly misconceived, apart from disclosing an unnecessary trend on the part of the judiciary to undermine the constituent power of the Parliament, not to speak of the legislative power. Secondly, it is well settled that the principles of natural justice operate in areas not covered by law; and that they do not supplant the law of the land, but only supplement it;[32] that natural justice is not an unruly horse, no lurking landmine, not a judicial cure-all;[33] and that the principles of natural justice could only be applied in the unoccupied interstices of the statute unless there is a clear mandate to the contrary.[34] And, lastly, in the face of the above rulings coupled with an unambiguous phrase in the proviso to Art 311(2) to the effect: '...it shall not be necessary to give such person any opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed', to hold that the 42nd amendment did not take away the right to receive a copy of the findings, militates against judicial decorum and decency, apart from constituting a patent transgression of the legitimate boundaries within which the Apex Court is mandated to operate. It was time and again pointed out by the Supreme Court in a series of decisions that industrial adjudication does not adopt a doctrinaire approach while dealing with industrial matters and adopts a realistic and pragmatic approach;[35] it is one thing to settle a dispute by agreement, which affects only the interest of the parties to the agreement; it is quite a different thing to lay down a rule which will have a wider application.[36]It is difficult to comprehend as to what the provocation was for the learned judge to adopt a cast-iron approach in a matter that was sharply focused rather than broadly based and, in the second, for laying down inflexible rules of universal application. With great deference, it is submitted that industrial law has its own set of norms under IE(SO) Central Rules and ID Act, and provide for a different set of remedies and reliefs; and that Art 311 has no application, whatsoever, to industrial employment. Both the decisions in Ramzan Khan and ECIL require review by a larger Bench and the correct law has to be laid down consistent with settled legal principles.[37]

In SK Singh, though the copy of the inquiry report was not supplied to the employee, he was asked by the High Court as to what prejudice he suffered on account of non-supply of the report to which he did not give any satisfactory reply. It was, therefore, held that prejudice caused to the delinquent by non-supply of the inquiry report must be specified and the order of punishment cannot be interfered with merely for non-supply of copy of inquiry report if no prejudice is caused due to such non-supply. Having stated the law, the court provided procedural guidelines to the tribunals and the courts. In all cases, where the inquiry officer's report is not furnished to the delinquent employee in the disciplinary proceedings, the tribunals or courts should cause the copy of the report to be furnished to him if he has not already secured it before coming to the tribunal or the court and then, the opportunity should be given to him to show how his case was prejudiced for non-supply of the report. If, after hearing the parties, the tribunal or the court comes to the conclusion that the non-supply of the report would have made no difference to the ultimate findings and the punishment given, it should not interfere with the order of punishment and mechanically set aside the order of punishment merely because the report was not furnished to the employee. The tribunal or the court must apply their judicial mind to the question of quashing or upholding the order of punishment and state the reasons for its conclusion. If the court takes the view that furnishing of the report would have made a difference to the result in the case, then only should it set aside the order of punishment. The proper relief in such a case should be the direct reinstatement of the employee with liberty to the employer to proceed with the inquiry by placing the employee under suspension and continuing the inquiry from the stage of furnishing him with the report.[38] In VB Hiregowdar, a two-judge bench of the court reiterated the holding of the Constitution Bench in ECIL cases that the decision in Ramzan Khan's case is of prospective application. In this case, the order of the disciplinary authority punishing the delinquent was passed on 10 April 1990 much before the judgment in Ramzan Khan's case. The law laid down in Ramzan Khan's case, therefore, had no application in this case.[39] In Ram Kishan, the Supreme Court observed:

> The purpose of the show-cause notice, in case of disagreement with the findings of the inquiry officer, is to enable the delinquent to show that the disciplinary authority is persuaded not to disagree with the conclusions reached by the inquiry officer for the reasons given in the inquiry report or he may offer additional reasons in support of the findings by the inquiry officer. In that situation, unless the disciplinary authority gives specific reasons in the show-cause notice on the basis of which the findings of the inquiry officer in that behalf is based, it would be difficult for the delinquent to satisfactorily give reasons to persuade the disciplinary authority to agree with the conclusions reached by the inquiry officer. In the absence of any ground or reason in the show-cause notice it amounts to an empty formality which would cause grave prejudice to the delinquent officer and would result in injustice to him. The mere fact that in the final order some reasons have been given to disagree with the conclusions reached by the disciplinary authority cannot cure the defect. [40]

In PM Raju, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that second show-cause notice was not necessary if there is no such provision in the standing orders.[41] Where the High Court ordered reinstatement of an employee, who was dismissed for securing employment on the basis of a forged certificate on the ground of non-furnishing of inquiry report before passing of the final order, the Supreme Court quashed the order of High Court and restored the punishment and held that the non-furnishing of inquiry report did not prejudice the workman in any way.[42] Failure to supply a copy of inquiry report to the delinquent does not by itself render the dismissal invalid. The labour court / tribunal should not mechanically set aside the order of punishment on that sole ground. It should be pleaded and shown by the delinquent as to how the non-supply of the report has prejudiced his case.[43] In NTC (WBAB & O) Ltd., Dharmadhikari J (for self and Pasayat J) of the Supreme Court held:

> We fail to appreciate the reasoning of the High Court in the instant case that in addition to the procedural infirmity of non-supply of enquiry report, there being non-compliance of clause 14 (4) (c) of Standing Order requiring grant of opportunity of hearing against proposed penalty, the employee has to be granted relief of reinstatement with full back wages and the employer can be given liberty to hold a de novo enquiry. (para 9). .. As stated by the High Court, we do not find that the language of clause 14(4)(c) is mandatory. In any case, non-compliance thereof cannot be held to be a more vitiating factor than non-supply of enquiry report. If the Constitution Bench of this Court in cases of non-supply of enquiry report directs the procedure to be adopted by allowing the employer to re-start the enquiry from the stage of supply of enquiry report without reinstating the employee, why such a course should not be directed to be adopted where the other grievance of the employee is denial of opportunity to show cause against proposed penalty. When the Court can direct a fresh enquiry from the stage of supply of enquiry report the next step in the enquiry of giving opportunity against the proposed penalty can also be directed to be taken. After the fresh enquiry is over from the stage of supply of enquiry report, the employee can be granted opportunity against proposed penalty in terms of clause 14(4)(c) of the Model Standing Order Rules. Consequential order, if any passed, shall abide the final result of the proceedings. As held in the case of B. Karunakar and Ors. (supra), if the employee is cleared of the charges and is reinstated, the disciplinary authority would be at liberty to decide according to law how it will treat the period from the date of dismissal till the period of reinstatement and the consequential benefits.[44] (para 10)

In Plantation Division, the issue was whether the non-supply of the copy of the findings of the Enquiry Officer constituted a violation of the principles of natural justice. Turning to facts, this was not a case falling within the ambit of Art 309 and the employees engaged in the Plantation Division were not public servants. Rejecting the contention that there was violation of the principles of natural justice on that count, Sinha J (for self and Hegde J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> In law, the concerned workmen do not enjoy any status as they are not the employees of Union of India and furthermore, their conditions of service, were not governed by any rule made under Article 309 of the Constitution. Services of the workmen were also not protected under Article 311 thereof. It has been contended before us that in terms of the extant rules governing the conditions of service of the workmen, a departmental appeal was maintainable against an order of the Disciplinary Authority. Presumably, such a remedy was provided with a view to enable the workmen to prefer an effective departmental appeal and only in that view of the matter, a copy of the enquiry report was supplied by the Appellant along with the order of the dismissal. (para 15). .. The workmen evidently did not avail the benefit of filing any departmental appeal. In such an appeal they could have shown as to how and in what manner and to what extent they were prejudiced by non-supply of a copy of the enquiry report. Had the workmen filed such an appeal, they could have furthermore demonstrated before the Appellate Authority that in terms of the rules and regulations governing their conditions of service, they were, as a matter of right, entitled to a copy of the enquiry report before an order of punishment is imposed upon them. (para 16). .. The principles of natural justice cannot be put in a strait-jacket formula. It must be viewed with flexibility. In a given case, where a deviation takes place as regard compliance of the principles of natural justice, the Court may insist upon proof of prejudice before setting aside the order impugned before it.[45] (para 17)

The above decision is a master-piece in so far as it places the legal position in proper perspective. This judicial correction was long overdue in the wake of the legal confusion created by the expansive approach of Sawant J in Karunakar, not to speak of the bankrupt decision rendered by RN Mishra CJI in Ramzan Khan, both which had contributed their own share to the judicial mess and ruled the roost for more than two decades. As rightly pointed out by Sinha J, the second show-cause notice coupled with the supply of a copy of the enquiry report serves two purposes, i.e., first, to point out whether the report was in order or whether it is baseless or perverse; and, second, whether the punishment proposed by the disciplinary authority is disproportionate. The delinquent employee can, on receipt of the show-cause notice along with the enquiry report, organise his defence before making an appeal to the appellate authority. But that facility of an internal appellate authority is expressly provided in the Fundamental and Supplementary Rules and/or Classification, Control and Appeal Rules, applicable to government employees governed by Arts 309 - 311 of the Constitution. Even a few public sector undertakings and public sector banks have a similar provision for internal appeal, before the employee can raise a dispute. But, as a general rule, neither the Model Standing Orders nor the Certified Standing Orders applicable to industrial undertakings, in general, and those in private sector, in particular, contemplate an appeal to an internal authority. The second most important point of difference is that, in the case of a public servant, even "reduction in grade", i.e., reversion, is attracted by Art 311, whereas under the industrial law, the labour court or tribunal has no jurisdiction to entertain a dispute relating to any punishment short of dismissal. For example, s 11A clearly stipulates in terms "in the event of discharge or dismissal" and is silent on other punishments such as stoppage of increment, reversion to the next lower grade, etc. Viewed thus, Sawant J proceeded in a cavalier fashion in Karunakar and extended the scope of Art 311 so as to bring industrial undertakings, which are governed by the Standing Orders Act, into the fold of Art 311, though indirectly. Justice Sinha deserves full compliments for putting the record straight and clarifying the differential legal position as applicable to public servants versus industrial workmen.

In Haryana SFC, the issue of the non-supply of the report of the Enquiry Officer and its consequences had once again come up for the consideration of Supreme Court in the context of the Constitution Bench decision rendered in ECIL v B Karunakar (supra). Citing the observation made in that case to the effect that "Whether in fact, prejudice has been caused to the employee or not on account of the denial to him of the report, has to be considered on the facts and circumstances of each case", Thakkar J (for self and Jain J) of the Supreme Court, cited several cases - Indian and foreign - and observed:

> It is settled law that principles of natural justice have to be complied with. One of the principles of natural justice is audi alteram partem ("Hear the other side"). But it is equally well settled that the concept `natural justice' is not a fixed one. It has meant many things to many writers, lawyers, jurists and systems of law. It has many colours, shades, shapes and forms. Rules of natural justice are not embodied rules and they cannot be imprisoned within the strait-jacket of a rigid formula.. .. it is clear that though supply of report of Inquiry Officer is part and parcel of natural justice and must be furnished to the delinquent- employee, failure to do so would not automatically result in quashing or setting aside of the order or the order being declared null and void. For that, the delinquent employee has to show `prejudice'. Unless he is able to show that non-supply of report of the Inquiry Officer has resulted in prejudice or miscarriage of justice, an order of punishment cannot be held to be vitiated. And whether prejudice had been caused to the delinquent- employee depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case and no rule of universal application can be laid down.[46] (Paras 25 & 47)

In Ganga Yamuna Grameen Bank, it was held that the issuance of a second show-cause notice to the delinquent workman, before imposing the punishment, is not part of common law principles of natural justice. Such a provision could be laid down by reason of a statute.[47] In Sarva UP Gramin Bank, the facts briefly were: The employee was charge-sheeted for fraud, misappropriation and irregularities in maintaining the records, etc., and after enquiry followed by a personal hearing by the Chairman of the bank, imposed the punishment of reduction of his salary in six stages permanently. The employee challenged the action on the ground, inter alia, that the Bank committed a violation of the principles of natural justice in so far as he was not given the copy of the findings of the enquiry officer, which was upheld by the High Court. Quashing the order of the High Court, SS Nijjar J (for self and Sudershan Reddy J) of the Supreme Court cited the above passage from Haryana State Financial Corporation, and observed:

> We have examined the factual situation in this case elaborately to see as to whether any prejudice has been caused to the respondent. We are unable to accept the submissions of the learned counsel for the respondent that any prejudice has been actually caused. We are of the considered opinion that there has been no failure of justice in the facts and circumstances of this case by non-supply of the enquiry report to the respondent.[48]

Punishment and/or Final Disposal of the Case

Imposing punishment is the last stage in the disciplinary action proceedings against a delinquent workman. This stage commences after the disciplinary authority has received the report of the inquiry officer, issued a show-cause notice to the delinquent workman, if any, and has received his response to such notice. Upon considering the gravity of the misconduct and the extenuating circumstances, if any, and also any other factor that may be relevant in the facts and circumstances of the case, the disciplinary authority has to decide the quantum of punishment that may be imposed on the delinquent.

(i) Types of Punishment

Broadly, in the area of industrial law, the punishments which an employer can impose, as a measure of a disciplinary action for an act of misconduct, on a workman are:

(a) Warning

(b) Fine

(c) Stoppage of or Withholding increment

(d) Demotion

(e) Suspension

(f) Discharge

(g) Dismissal from service

(a) Warning

Warning is a minor punishment which is administered to a workman in writing by the employer for some blameworthy act or omission. Though not identical, warning is analogous to 'censure' as administered to civil servants.[49]Since warning is a punishment, it is to be administered to a workman after giving him an opportunity to explain the act or omission alleged against him and after considering his explanation. However, as this punishment is of a minor nature, the procedure to be adopted for administering a warning need not be as elaborate as in the case of major punishments of 'discharge' and 'dismissal'. Though the penalty of warning does not materially affect the concerned workman, it can be a material factor to be taken into consideration in future disciplinary action against him. The past record or the previous punishment suffered by the delinquent employee though would be irrelevant and ought not to be used for finding him guilty of the charges levelled against him.[50] Yet it may be taken into consideration for deciding the quantum of punishment to be inflicted upon him.[51] If, however, the past record of a delinquent workman is to be taken into consideration, he would be entitled to offer his explanation concerning it.[52]

(b) Fine

Fine is a pecuniary punishment that may be inflicted by the employer against the workman for some blameworthy act or omission. The Standing Orders of some establishments provide for the imposition of fines in case of certain acts of misconduct. This power under the Standing Orders, however, is subject to s 8 of the Payment of Wages Act 1936 which reads:

(1) No fines shall be imposed on any employed person save in respect of such acts and omissions on his part as the employer, with the previous approval of the appropriate government or of the prescribed authority, may have specified by notice under sub-section (2).

(2) A notice specifying such acts and omissions shall be exhibited in the prescribed manner on the premises in which the employment is carried on or in the case of persons employed upon a railway (otherwise than a factory), at the prescribed place or places.

(3) No fine shall be imposed on any employed person until he has been given an opportunity of showing cause against the fine, or otherwise than in accordance with such procedure as may be prescribed for imposition of fines.

(4) The total amount of fine which may be imposed in anyone wage-period on any employed person shall not exceed an amount equal to three per cent. of the wages payable to him.in respect of that wage-period.

(5) No fine shall be imposed on any employed person who is under the age of fifteen years.

(6) No fine imposed on any employed person shall be recovered from him by instalments or after the expiry of ninety days from the day on which it was imposed.

(7) Every fine shall be deemed to have been imposed on the day of the act or omission in respect of which it was imposed.

(8) All fines and all realizations thereof shall be recorded in the register to be kept by the person responsible for the payment of wages under section 3 in such form as may be prescribed; and all such realizations shall be applied only to such purposes beneficial to the persons employed in the factory or establishment as are approved by the prescribed authority.

Explanation—When the persons employed upon or in any railway, factory or industrial or other establishment are part only of a staff employed under the same management, all such realizations may be credited to a common fund maintained for the staff as a whole, provided that the fund shall be applied only to such purposes as are approved by the prescribed authority.

(c) Stoppage of, or Withholding, Increments

In case of graded scales, increments are automatic till the efficiency bar or the maximum of a scale is reached. Withholding increments in such a case is a punishment.[53] This punishment materially affects the workman concerned in his earning. Hence, this punishment can be inflicted only for proved inefficiency or acts of misconduct, such as insubordination or habitual negligence etc. after giving him a fair opportunity to explain his conduct. In State Bank of India, the Madras High Court held that in terms of the Shastra and Desai awards increment is earned by an employee as a matter of course. The punishment of stopping increment can only be inflicted after the workman has been found guilty of the act of misconduct alleged against him. Unless a workman is found guilty he cannot be said to be guilty of proved misconduct. Therefore, the increment can be stopped only when it falls due after the workman has been found guilty in a proper departmental inquiry.[54]

(d) Reversion / Demotion

Reversion or Demotion is the negative of promotion whereby not only the delinquent employee is not promoted to the next job, but he is also downgraded from the present job and is reduced to a lower cadre of service. This punishment is somewhat analogous to 'reduction in rank' as envisaged by Art 311 of the Constitution. It is severer in degree than the foregoing punishments. This punishment may be inflicted in accordance with the degree of gravity of the misconduct proved against the delinquent workman. The procedure to be followed for administering this punishment is the same as in the case of 'discharge' and 'dismissal'. In RN Kulkarni, the facts were: the employer terminated the services of an employee from the date of the order, but having regard to his prior career gave him an option of serving as a mechanic in the garage department on the same salary, provided he exercised the option by a particular date. The employee did not resume his duties. The labour court held that the order of termination, in fact, amounted to an order of demotion and not an order of discharge. The labour court ordered further inquiry into the question as to whether the order was mala fide. In the proceedings in a writ petition challenging the award of the labour court on the ground that the order was not an order of demotion as found by the labour court, the High Court observed that no doubt the impugned order contained an option that if the workman so desired he could be reappointed as a mechanic in the garage department provided the option was exercised by the specified date and if the option, in fact, had been exercised by the workman and had become effective, it could have been possible to argue that, from a practical point of view, it amounted to an order of demotion, but it was clear from the record that the workman did not report for accepting the re-appointment. It was, therefore, held that the actual effect of the order was that the services of the workman had been ended either because he did not avail himself of the option or he went after the appointed date and time and was not allowed to avail of the option. Hence, the order was not an order of demotion but was of the actual termination of service. Reverting an employee on probation to his original post, for unsatisfactory work will not constitute demotion because keeping an employee on probation is only to find out whether he is suitable for the post or not.[55] It is submitted that this case was rightly decided.

(e) Suspension

Suspension in industrial law is ordinarily of two kinds, via, (a) suspension as an interim measure pending a domestic inquiry; and (b) suspension as a substantive punishment. Suspension 'pending inquiry' has already been discussed under the head 'procedure of disciplinary action'. Suspension 'as a punishment' can be inflicted on a workman for a specified period as permissible under the contract of service or the Standing Orders after finding him guilty of the misconduct committed by him. Suspension by way of punishment under the relevant Standing Order would not alter the character of suspension as a temporary action as distinct from the permanent measure of termination of employment.[56]The punishment of suspension would not tantamount to lockout as defined in s 2(1) of the Act. The effect of the punishment of suspension is that the relationship of the master and servant is temporarily suspended with the consequence that the servant is not bound to render service and the master is not bound to pay.[57]In other words, the workman will not be entitled to wages for the period of suspension. The Madras High Court held that suspension amounts to non-employment of a worker and in relation to such non-employment when alleged to be devoid of valid reasons, an industrial dispute can be raised. However, before a dispute can be raised, it should not have remained an individual dispute; it should have acquired the character of an industrial dispute by being sponsored by a sufficient number of workmen, as suspension not being 'discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or otherwise termination of service' of the employee, would not fall within the purview of s 2A of Industrial Disputes Act.[58]

Retrospective suspension:

In the language of Chakravarti CJ of the Calcutta High Court, 'there can be no meaning in suspending a man from working during a period when the period has passed and he has already worked, or suspending a man from occupying a position or holding a privilege in the past when he has already occupied or held it'.[59] Nevertheless, where an order of suspension can be split into two periods of time, one retrospective and the other prospective, and the retrospective part can be severed from the prospective part, though the retrospective part would be invalid, the prospective part would be perfectly valid and shall operate upon its own strength.[60] The question, however, has to be decided on the facts of each case. Suspension, like the other punishments, i.e., dismissal or discharge from service with retrospective effect has always been condemned by courts as illegal and invalid.[61]

(f) Discharge

The punishments discussed earlier are inflicted as punishment for an act of misconduct while the workman continues in the employment of the employer. These punishments are generally known as 'minor punishments' in the parlance of industrial law. 'Discharge' and 'dismissal' of a workman from service as punishment are known as 'major punishments'. In these punishments, the contract of employment is determined and the employer-employee relationship ceases to exist. Discharge as punishment is milder than the extreme punishment of dismissal though like dismissal, it also puts the contract of service to an end. In case of dismissal, the employee loses a number of benefits whereas in case of discharge only the contract of service is terminated from a particular date and the employee is not deprived of the benefits accruing to him up to that date.[62] The expressions 'dismissal' and 'discharge' as measures of punishment for misconduct, in industrial law have acquired different connotations and one cannot be equated the one with the other,[63] though to a certain extent they overlap. (For further discussion see next topic ("Dismissal")

(g) Dismissal

The dictionary meaning of the word 'dismissal' is 'to let go; to relieve from duty'. In ordinary parlance, it means nothing more or less than termination of a person's office. Dismissal is the ultimate and most drastic disciplinary sanction which may be inflicted by an employer for an act of misconduct against an industrial workman. Hence, if there is no misconduct, there can be no punishment. Termination of service therefore, which is not by way of punishment would not tantamount to dismissal. In the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> Punishment is, therefore, correlated to misconduct, both in its positive and negative aspects. That is to say, punishment could be sustained if there was misconduct and could not be meted out if there was no misconduct.[64]

In London Chronicle, the facts disclosed that the employee obeyed her immediate departmental head instead of the managing director of the company. In view of the fact that there were conflicting orders, only one of which could be obeyed, the disobedience of the managing director's order in the circumstance of the case was held to be excusable and the dismissal of the employee was held to be unjustified.[65] The breach of an important term now-a-days will not, however, necessarily justify the action of dismissal if it occurs in such circumstances that the employee has a reasonable excuse or justification for his conduct. However, the breach of certain terms prima facie will justify the order of dismissal, eg, the obligation not to steal one's employer's property; the obligation not to deal with his property dishonestly; not to damage the property or the reputation of the employer deliberately; the obligation to obey reasonable and lawful orders etc but single and isolated acts of misconduct are somewhat less likely to justify dismissal of a workman than is a persistent pattern of misconduct.[66]In case of single or isolated act of misconduct a record of unsatisfactory behaviour may tip the balance justifying the dismissal,[67] but what is to be regarded as an important term will depend upon the nature of the business or nature and the position of the workman,[68] and the test to be applied, therefore, must vary with the nature of the business and the position held by the employee. Misconduct inside the premises of the establishment is likely to give rise to breach of an obligation entitling the employer to dismiss the workman than the misconduct outside the work-place or outside working hours; but dependent on the terms of the contract and sometimes on the position of the employee, misconduct outside the work-place or working hours may exceptionally justify the action of dismissal.[69]

Likewise, though a private quarrel between an employee and a stranger may not constitute a misconduct justifying the dismissal, it cannot be reasonably disputed that acts which are subversive of discipline amongst employees or misconduct or misbehaviour by an employee which is directed against another employee of the concern may, in certain circumstances, constitute misconduct so as to form the basis of an order of dismissal or discharge. It is not necessary that the victim employee and the delinquent workman should be engaged in the performance of their official duties when the act which is the subject matter of misconduct is stated to have been committed. It is sufficient that both are employees of the same concern and the misconduct is directed against the former while he is acting in the discharge of the duties imposed on him by virtue of his office.[70]The question whether an act of misconduct is sufficient to justify dismissal is not dependent upon the proof that such misconduct has in fact serious consequences; the test is the nature of the misconduct itself.[71] In deciding whether in a particular case, an act of misconduct is serious enough to justify dismissal, the matter needs to be examined in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.[72] The tribunal has to consider whether in the background of the circumstances that transpired, the misconduct committed by the concerned workman is so grave as to justify extreme penalty of discharge or dismissal if imposed on him.[73] It is usually only possible to guess the answer to the question, 'Does the misconduct in this case, justify dismissal?' The more serious the misconduct, the more likely it is that an adjudicator will regard it as justifying dismissal, the more trivial the misconduct, the less likely is an adjudicator to uphold the right of dismissal.[74]

The employer has a right recognised in law to dismiss his servant for an act of misconduct committed by him but he is not bound to dismiss him. That right to dismiss is recognised in law in order to protect the interests of the master. The master himself is the best judge of the circumstances under which he may choose or elect to exercise or refrain from exercising that power or right of dismissal. He can waive that right after condoning the misconduct but he cannot exercise that right after condoning the misconduct. The choice, election, condonation as well as the waiver may either be express or implied, depending upon the particular circumstances of each case but they must be unequivocal, unqualified and unconditional to be effective, operative and valid.[75] The mere acceptance of terminal benefits such as provident fund and gratuity cannot be considered as acquiescence on the part of a dismissed workman.[76] It is well settled that there can be no dismissal or discharge made with retrospective effect.[77] Such dismissal cannot be sustained in law, but this principle is subject to the condition that if such a dismissal be made according to the terms of service, either contractual or statutory; for instance, contained in the Standing Orders, such a dismissal is within the competence of the employer. Where the Standing Orders of a company provide that a workman found guilty of misconduct might be dismissed with effect from the date of suspension, an order of dismissal so made must be held to be valid.[78] However, whether the retrospective dismissal is justified or not would depend upon the peculiar circumstances of a case.[79] The Gujarat High Court in RM Parmar, has laid down the following guidelines in the matter of inflicting punishment particularly the punishment of discharge and dismissal:

1. In a disciplinary proceeding for an alleged fault of an employee, punishment is imposed not in order to seek retribution or to give vent to feelings of wrath.
2. The main purpose of a punishment is to correct the fault of the employee concerned by making him more alert in the future and to hold out of warning to the other employees to be careful in the discharge of their duties so that they do not expose themselves to similar punishment. And the approach to be made is the approach parents make towards an erring or misguided child.
3. It is not expedient in the interest of the administration to visit every employee against whom a fault is established with the penalty of dismissal and to get rid of him. It would be counter-productive to do so for it would be futile to expect to recruit employees who are so perfect that they would never commit any fault.
4. In order not to attract the charge of arbitrariness it has to be ensured that the penalty imposed is commensurate with the magnitude of the fault. Surely one cannot rationally or justly impose the same penalty for giving a slap as one would impose for homicide.
5. When different categories of penalties can be imposed in respect of the alleged fault, one of which is dismissal from service, the disciplinary authority perforce is required to consult himself for selecting the most appropriate penalty from out of the range of penalties available that can be imposed, having regard to the nature, content and gravity of the default. Unless the disciplinary authority reaches the conclusion that having regard to the nature, content and magnitude of the fault committed by the employee concerned, it would be absolutely unsafe to retain him in service, the maximum penalty of dismissal cannot be imposed. If a lesser penalty can be imposed without seriously jeopardising the interest of the employer the disciplinary authority cannot impose the maximum penalty of dismissal from service. He is bound to ask the inner voice and rational faculty why a lesser penalty cannot be imposed.
6. It cannot be overlooked that by and large it is because the maximum penalty is imposed and total ruination stares one in the eyes that the employee concerned is obliged to approach the court and avail of the costly and time-consuming machinery to challenge in desperation the order passed by the disciplinary authority. If a lesser penalty was imposed, he might not have been obliged to take recourse to costly legal proceedings which result in loss of public time and also result in considerable hardship and misery to the employee concerned.

7. When the disciplinary proceedings end in favour of the employee the employer has often to pay backwages say for about five years without being able to take work from the employee concerned. On the other hand, the employee concerned would have had to suffer economic misery and mental torture for all these years. Even the misery of being obliged to remain idle without work would constitute an unbearable burden. And when the curtain drops everyone is left with a bitter taste in the mouth. All because the extreme penalty of dismissal or removal is imposed instead of a lighter one.

8. Every harsh order or removal from service creates bitterness and arouses feeling of antagonism in the collective mind of the workers and gives rise to a feeling of class conflict. It does more harm than good to the employer as also to the society.

9. Taking of a petty article by a worker in a moment of weakness when he yields to a temptation does not call for an extreme penalty of dismissal from service. More particularly, when he does not hold a sensitive post of trust (pilferage by a cashier or by a store-keeper from the stores in his charge, for instance, may be viewed with seriousness). A worker brought up and living in an atmosphere of poverty and want when faced with temptation, ought not to, but may, yield to it in a moment of weakness. It cannot be approved, but it can certainly be understood particularly in an age when even the rich commit economic offences to get richer and do so by and large with impunity (and even tax evasion or possession of black money is not considered to be dishonourable by and large). A penalty of removal from service is therefore not called for when a poor worker yields to a momentary temptation and commits an offence which often passes under the name of kleptomania when committed by the rich.[80]

Later, in Jamnadas Becharbhai, the High Court has referred to the rider added by it in proposition no 9 to the effect that when an employee holding a sensitive post of trust has been dismissed from service, the matter may have to be viewed in a different light, for instance, pilferage by a cashier or a store-keeper from the stores in his charge. But the rider is not to be found in the report of the case. In this case, the court sought to elaborate that rider by adding a case of misappropriation by a bus conductor who has collected fare from passengers but has failed to issue tickets to them. In such a situation the adjudicator can direct that the offender should be absorbed in some other post which does not involve daily handling of money etc depending upon the facts and circumstances of the case. The adjudicator can exercise his jurisdiction in deciding the issue having regard to the facts and circumstances of each case and the demands of the situation in the context of each matter. In the facts and circumstances of this case, the court held that the reinstatement of the bus conductor who had collected fare from the passengers and pocketed the same, was not justified by the labour court to order the reinstatement of the workman and, remanded the case to the labour court for a fresh decision.[81] Another Division Bench of the same High Court in Hussainmiya Chandmiya, observed that in cases of gross misconduct, the most appropriate punishment would be termination of service and it would be a mockery of justice to brand such an order as not justified and substitute it by an order under s 11A. In this case, the workman who was a watchman working in the municipal corporation was convicted under s 420 of the Indian Penal Code for having swindled a substantial amount aggregating to about Rs 25,000 from poor and innocent citizens by duping them on the pretext that by virtue of his employment, he was in a position to secure for them residential accommodation belonging to the corporation at a subsidised rent. After his conviction, he was dismissed from service as a measure of disciplinary action. The court held that in this fact situation the order could not be said to be 'unjustified' and the order of the labour court reinstating him was set aside being arbitrary and whimsical.[82]

In T Seeralan, a store attender in the canteen of the employer company, who had put in 17 years of unblemished service, was dismissed from service for the proved misconduct of theft of canteen coupons of the value of Rs. 24.48/-. The labourcourt modified the punishment of dismissal to termination of service and further directed the management to pay one month's salary to the workman. In a writ petition against the award of the tribunal, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the plea for reinstatement of the workman was untenable and the punishment imposed was on the concessional side because instead of prosecuting the workman under the Indian Penal Code, the company contented itself only by taking disciplinary action by holding a domestic inquiry against him. In this situation, the court felt that there was little scope for generosity to be shown, or to bring into existence minor punishment for such derelictions. The learned judge observed that for the misconduct which is a penal offence, it would be against the interest of the other workmen and industrial development, if adequate punishment is not imposed when the offence is established. Furthermore, there is very little scope for any generosity to be shown or to bring into existence minor punishments for such derelictions. Committing theft had been considered as penal offence in the interest of society to maintain law and order in the country and to strike out standards, when they occur in industries, would be detrimental to the interests of the nation, if a different approach is made mainly because he is a workman under ID Act.[83]

61 Powari Tea Estate vMK Barkataki (1965) 2 LLJ 102 [LNIND 1964 SC 299] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

62 Rohtas Industries Ltd v Ali Hasan (1963) 1 LLJ 253 [LNIND 1962 SC 266] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

63 Anil Kumar v Presiding Officer, LC, Punjab (1986) 1 LLJ 101 [LNIND 1985 SC 191]-02 (SC), per Desai J.

64 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 457 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

65 Central Bank of India v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235], 744 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

66 Biosahabi Tea Estate v PO, LC, 1981 Lab IC 557, 566 (Gau) (DB), per Lahiri J.

67 Andhra Handloom WCS Ltd v LC 1976 Lab IC 932, 934 (AP), per Venkatarama Sastry J.

68 State Bank of Bikaner & Jaipur v JS Khadgawat 1987 Lab IC 112, 116-17 (Raj) (DB), per Lodha J.

69 Madikal Service Co-op Bank Ltd v LC (1988) 2 LLJ 49, 53 (Ker), per Bhat J.

70 Mangal Sen v State of Uttar Pradesh, (1992) 1 LLJ 179, 181 (All), per BN Misra J.

71 Sasa Musa Sugar Works Pvt Ltd v Shobrati Khan (1959) 2 LLJ 388 [LNIND 1959 SC 79], 393 (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 923 [LNIND 1959 SC 79], per Wanchoo J.

72 Workmen of Motipur Sugar Factory v Mgmt (1965) 2 LLJ 162 [LNIND 1965 SC 109] (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 1803 [LNIND 1965 SC 109]. per Wanchoo J.

73 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]. 613 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 136 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]: 1972 Lab IC 13 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] : (1972) 4 SCC 304 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], per Vaidialingam J.

74 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 194-96 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

75 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Ltd v Mgmt (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133] (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 430]: [1973] (26) FLR 359 : (1973) 1 SCC 813 [LNIND 1973 SC 430] per Vaidialingam J.

76 Makhan Singh v Narainpura CASS Ltd 1987 Lab IC 1631 [LNIND 1987 SC 497] (SC), per Venkatramiah J.

77 R Khichrolia v MPSCM Federation Ltd (2002) 4 LLN 705 (MP), per Mishra J.

78 Bharath Electronics Ltd v K Kasi (1987) 2 LLJ 203 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

79 Capstan Meters (India) Ltd v Judge, LC (1991) 2 LLJ 290 (Raj), per Sharma J.

80 Central Bank of India v C Bernard [1991] 78 FJR (BC), per Ahmadi J.

81 Associated Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 399 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Meenglas Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

83 DJ Warkari v KV Karanjkar (1980) 2 LLJ 270 (Bom) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

84 Philips India Ltd v Fifth IT 1978 Lab IC (NOC) 115 (Cal) (DB).

85 Manak Lal v Prem Chand AIR 1957 SC 425 [LNIND 1957 SC 154], per Gajendragadkar J.

86 Workmen of Madura Co Ltd v LC (1966) 1 LLJ 498 (Ker), per KK Mathew J.

87 PH Kalyani v Air France (1963) 1 LLJ 679 [LNIND 1963 SC 45] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1756 [LNIND 1963 SC 45], per Wanchoo J.

88 Golam Rasul v Public Service Commission (1963) 2 LLJ 174, 176 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

89 Superintendent, Kaliyar Estate v O Kuriakko (1971) 1 LLJ 83, 85 (Ker), per Issac J.

90 Workman of Madura Co Ltd v LC (1966) 1 LLJ 498, 501 (Ker), per Mathew J.

91 Ram Bilash Goel v Mgmt of Lakwa Tea Estate 1981 Lab IC 1640, 1644 (Gau), per Saikia J.

92 Workmen, Indian Airlines Corpn v Union of India 1984 Lab IC NOC 123 (Cal), per MN Roy J.

93 Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co Ltd v LC (1970) 1 LLJ 23 [LNIND 1969 SC 247],26 (SC), per Shah J.

94 Ajit Singh v Kirpal Singh 1973 Lab IC 376, 380 (Del), per VD Misra J.

95 Jessop & Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522,526 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

96 Sridharan Motor Service v IT (1959) 1 LLJ 380 (Mad), per Balakrishna Ayyar J.

97 Shankar S. Ambedkar v Shakti Insulated Wires Pvt Ltd (I 988) 2 LLJ 416-17 (Bom) (DB), per Vaze J.

98 Saran Motors Pvt Ltd v Vishwanath (1964) 2 LLJ 139 [LNIND 1964 SC 113] (SC), per Gajendragakar J.

99 N Rarichan v RK Venu Nair 1973 Lab IC 536, 538 (Ker), per Govindan Nair J.

1 Statesman Pvt Ltd v HR Deb (1962) 1 LLJ 733, 736 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

2 Mgmt. of Dhanalakshmi Mills Pvt Ltd v TV Balakrishnan 1977 Lab IC 1469 -70 (Mad), per Mohan J.

3 PM Raju v PO, Le (2001) 4 LLN 903 (Mad), per Raviraja Pandian J.

4 Workmen of Lambabari Tea Estate v Mgmt (1966) 2 LLJ 315 [LNIND 1965 SC 295], 317 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

5 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

6 Doomur Dullang Tea Estate v Workmen CA No 516 of 1966 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

7 SRangarajan v Srirangamjanopakara Bank Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 482 [LNIND 1962 MAD 142] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

8 Andhra Scientific Co Ltd v A Seshagiri Rao (1961) 2 LLJ 117 [LNIND 1960 SC 340] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

9 Meenglas Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1719 [LNIND 1963 SC 50], per Hidayatullah J.

10 Workmen of Lambabari Tea Estate v Mgmt, (1966) 2 LLJ 315 [LNIND 1965 SC 295], 317 (SC) : AIR 1987 SC 670 [LNIND 1987 SC 44]: [1987] (1) SCALE 53 : (1987) 1 SCC 542 [LNIND 1987 SC 44], per Hidayatullah J.

11 DJ Warkari v KV Karanjkar (1980) 2 LLJ 270 (Bom) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

12 Associated EIM Co P Ltd v Second LC 1969 Lab IC 1262 (Cal), per Acun K Mukherjea J.

13 Associated Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 400 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

14 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Employees (1963) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 147] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

15 Sheo Sampat Lal v State of UP 1983 Lab IC 324, 326 (All), per TS Misra J.

16 Workmen in Buckingham & Carnatic Mills v Mgmt (1970) 1 LLJ 26 [LNIND 1969 SC 238], 28 (SC) : 1969 (1) UJ 494, er Vaidialingam J.

17 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 809 (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 372 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], per Shelat J.

18 Pravin Rati Lal Dudhara v Municipal Corpn of Gtr. Bombay (1996) 2 LLJ 529 [LNIND 1995 SC 1115], 533 (Born), per Dhanuka J.

19 Shyam Bahadur Tripathi v UP Public Service Tribunal (1997) 2 LLJ 920 -21 (SC) : (1997) 2 SCC 251.

20 Woodbriar & Sussex Estates v Workers (1960) 2 LLJ 673 (Mad), per Ramachandra Ayyar J.

21 Tannery & Footwear Corpn of India Ltd v State of UP 1979 Lab IC 1434, 1436 (All), per BD Agrawala J.

22 Boisahabi Tea Estate v PO, LC 1981 Lab IC 557, 563 (Gau) (DB), per Lahiri J.

23 Powari Tea Estate v MK Barkataki (1965) 2 LLJ 102 [LNIND 1964 SC 299], 104 (SC), per Gajendragakar CJI.

24 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

25 Cf, State of Gujarat v Patel Ranghavnatha AIR 1969 SC 1297 [LNIND 1969 SC 177], 1301, per Sikri J.

26 GAnandam v Tamil Nadu Electricity Board (1996) 2 LLJ 1198 [LNIND 1996 MAD 623], 1200 (Mad), per Wahab J.

27 Jagdishmal Bhansali v UIL Co Ltd (1995) 2 LLJ 209, per Chopra J.

28 Uma Shankar Yadav v Registrar of Coop Societies (1993) 1 LLJ 424 [LNIND 1992 ALL 204]-25 (All), per Katju J.

29 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 400-01 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

30 Goodyear India Ltd v IT 1968 Lab IC 1599, 1603-04 (P&H), per Tek Chand J.

31 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 400-01 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

32 S Rangarajan v Srirangam Janopakara Bank Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 482 [LNIND 1962 MAD 142] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

33 Superintendent, Kaliyar Estate v O Kuriakko (1971) 1 LLJ 83, 85 (Ker), per Issac J.

34 Motor Industries Co Ltd v Shaikh Mohammed 1978 Lab I C 1335(Kant), per Rama Jois J.

35 GMcKenzie & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 285 [LNIND 1958 SC 131] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 389 [LNIND 1958 SC 131], per Kapur J.

36 Bata Shoe Co Pvt Ltd v DN Ganguly (1961) 1 LLJ 303 [LNIND 1960 SC 345] (SC) : AIR 1961 SC 1158 [LNIND 1960 SC 345], per Wanchoo J.

37 Royal Printing Works v IT (1959) 2 LLJ 619 (Mad), per Balakrishan Ayyar J.

38 Tandur and Navandgi SQ Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 737 [LNIND 1963 SC 249], 740 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

39 Tata Engineering & Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 809 (SC), per Shelat J.

40 Board of Trustees of Port of Bombay v Dilipkumar R Nadkarni (1983) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1982 SC 167], 4 (SC), per Desai J.

41 Standard Pottery Works v Standard PWE Union (1981) 2 LLJ 280 (Ker), per Vadakkal J.

42 N Kalindi v Tata Locomotive & Engineering Co. Ltd. (1960) 2 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1960 SC 95] (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 914 [LNIND 1960 SC 95], per Das Gupta J.

43 Brooke Bond (I) Ltd v Subba Raman (1961) 2 LLJ 417 [LNIND 1961 SC 419] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

44 Abdul Khader v LC 1988 Lab IC 785 -86 (AP), per PA Choudhury J.

45 Dunlop Rubber Co (I) Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 426 [LNIND 1964 SC 318], 430-31 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 1392 [LNIND 1964 SC 318], per Hidayatullah J.

46 Board of Trustees of Port of Bombay v Dilipkumar R Nadkarni (I983) 1 LLJ 1, 4 (SC), per Desai J.

47 Pett v Greyhound Racing Assn Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 545, 549 (CA), per Lord MR Denning.

48 Workmen of Madura Co Ltd v LC (1966) 1 LLJ 498, 501 (Ker), per Mathew J.

49 Kesoram Cotton Milts Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], 380 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

50 Cf Pett v Greyhound Racing Assn Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 545,549 (CA), per Lord MR Denning.

51 Board of Trustees of Port of Bombay v DR Nadkarni (1983) 1 LLJ 1 [LNIND 1982 SC 167],4-6 (SC) : AIR 1983 SC 109 [LNIND 1982 SC 167]: 1983 (2) Bom CR 334 : 1983 MPLJ 1 (SC) : 1982 (2) SCALE 1097 [LNIND 1982 SC 167] : (1983) 1 SCC 124 [LNIND 1982 SC 167] : [1983] 1 SCR 828 [LNIND 1982 SC 167], per Desai J.

52 Director General of Post & Telegraphs v NG Majumdar (1974) 2 LLJ 44 (Cal) (DB), per AK Sinha J.

53 India Photographic Co Ltd v Saumitra Mohan Kumar 1984 Lab IC 42,46 (Cal) (DB), per Anil K Sen J.

54 A Veeman v Paramakudi Coop Urban Bank Ltd (1990) 1 LLJ 395, 397 (Mad), per Nainar Sundaram J.

55 Harinarayan Srivastav v United Commercial Bank (1997) 3 LLN 56 (SC).

56 Bharat Petroleum Corpn Ltd v MGK Union (1999) 1 LLN 654 (SC).

57 BV Nagarajachar v PO, CGIT (2001) 1 LLN 583 (Kant), per Datta J.

58 SGnanasambandam v TN Cements Corpn Ltd (2001) 3 LLN 677 (Mad), per Murugesan J.

59 Bank of Baroda v VS Pradhan (2001) 3 LLN 960,965 (Born), per Rebello J.

60 Motor Industries Co Ltd v Shaikh Mohammed 1978 Lab IC 1335 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

61 NN Rao v Greaves Cotton & Co Ltd (1973) 1 LLJ 81, 85-86 (Born) (DB), per Kotval CJ.

62 N Kalindi v Tata Locomotive and Engineering Co Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1960 SC 95] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

63 Bharat Electronics Ltd v K Kasi (1987) 2 LLJ 203 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

64 GR Venkateswara Reddy v Karnataka SRTC (1995) 1 LLJ 1011 [LNIND 1994 KANT 135], 1017 (Kant), per Raveendran J.

65 M Babu v Bank of India (1999) 3 LLJ 1045 (Mad), per Padmanabhan J.

66 Ghanshyam Das v PO, LC (1999) 2 LLJ 28 (P&H) (DB), per Singhvi J.

67 Central Bank of India v Prakash Chand Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 382 (SC), per Bhargava J.

68 Union of India v TR Varma (1958) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1957 SC 91], 264 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

69 State of Haryana v Rattan Singh (1982) 1 LLJ 46 -47 (SC) : AIR 1977 SC 1512 : 1977 Lab IC 845 : (1977) 2 SCC 491, per Krishna Iyer J.

70 Manager. Boisahabi Tea Estate v PO, LC 1981 Lab IC 557, 563 (Gau) (DB), per Lahiri J.

71 Ashok Kumar Chowdhury v Calcutta Port Trust (1993) 1 LLJ 541 [LNIND 1992 CAL 97], 543 (Cal) : (1993) 1 Cal LT 52(HC) : 96 CWN 970, per Ajoy Nath Roy J.

72 Workmen of Motipur Sugar Factory v Mgmt (1965) 2 LLJ 162 [LNIND 1965 SC 109] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

73 Saxby and Farmer (India) Ltd v Third IT (1962) 2 LLJ 52, 56 (Cal), per Banerjee J.

74 PN Bahulayan v Plantation Corpn of Keala 1986 Lab IC 1707, 1710 (Ker), per Sivaraman Nair J.

75 Doomar Dullang Tea Estate v Workmen CA No 516 of 1966 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

76 JD Jain v Managnnmt of State Bank of India (1982) 1 LLJ 54 [LNIND 1981 SC 465], 58 (SC), per Baharul Islam J.

77 Associated Cement Co Ltd v PO, LC 1977 Lab IC 1463, 1468 (Mad), per Mohan J.

78 B Subbiah Choudary v States of Andhra Pradesh (1960) 2 LLJ 464 (AP) (DB), per Chandra Reddi CJ.

79 Bharath Electronics Ltd v K Kasi (1987) 2 LLJ 203, 209 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

80 JD Jain v Mgmt of State Bank of India (1982) 1 LLJ 54 [LNIND 1981 SC 465], 58 (SC), per Baharul Islam J.

81 Imperial Tobacco Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 414 [LNIND 1961 SC 116] (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1348 [LNIND 1961 SC 116], per Wanchoo J.

82 Central Bank of India Ltd v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

83 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1983) 2 LLJ 371 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

84 Union of India v TR Vttrma (1958) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1957 SC 91] (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

85 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

86 Meenglass Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

87 G Ravindran Nair v Chairman; Cochin Port Trust 1979 Lab IC 258 (Ker), per Khalid J.

88 Ram Bilash Goel v Mgmt of Lakwa Tea Estate 1981 Lab IC 1640, 1647 (Gau), per Saikia J.

89 Vijaya Mohini Mills v IT (1993) 1 LLJ 605 [LNIND 1991 KER 358], 607-08 (Ker), per Padmanabhan J.

90 Central Bank of India Ltd v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235], 743 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

91 Elgin Mills Co Ltd v First LC (1969) 1 LLJ 805 [LNIND 1969 ALL 26], 807 (All), per Satish Chandra J.

92 Mgmt. of Sarada Industries v M Elumalai 1973 Lab IC 1347, 1350 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

93 Fedco Pvt Ltd v SN Bilgrami AIR 1960, SC 415, 418-19, per Das Gupta J.

94 State of Mysore v Shivabasappa Shivappa (1964) 1 LLJ 24 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

95 Secretary, Assam Chah Mazdoor Sangha v PO, LC 1981 Lab IC 93, 97 (Gau), per Saikia J.

96 Delhi Cloth & Gen Mills Co Ltd v Thejvir Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 201 [LNIND 1972 SC 18], 204 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

1 Anglo American Direct Tea Trading Co Ltd v LC, (1971) 1 LLJ 147 (Mad), per Ismail J.

2 Ram Bilash Goel v Mgmt of Lakwa Tea Estate 1981 Lab IC 1640, 1643 (Gau), per Saikia J.

3 Union of India v TR Varma (1958) 2 LLJ 259 [LNIND 1957 SC 91], 264 (SC) : AIR 1957 SC 882 [LNIND 1957 SC 91], per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

4 Assodated Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J. .

5 S Rangarajan v Srirangam Janopakara Bank Ltd (1962) 2 LLJ 482 [LNIND 1962 MAD 142] (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

6 Mgmt of Municipal Corpn of Delhi v LC 1975 Lab IC 771, 775-76 (Dd) (DB), per Rangarajan J.

7 Phulbari Tea Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1959 SC 102] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

8 Meenglass Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1719 [LNIND 1963 SC 50], per Hidayatullah J. .

9 KL Tripathi v State Bank of India (1984) 1 LLJ 2 [LNIND 1983 SC 283], 11 (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 273 [LNIND 1983 SC 283]: [1984] (48) FLR 38 : 1983 Lab IC 1680 [LNIND 1983 SC 283] : 1983 (2) SCALE 587 [LNIND 1983 SC 283] : (1984) 1 SCC 43 [LNIND 1983 SC 283], per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

10 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 400 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

11 Central Bank of India Ltd v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235], 743 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

12 Jessop & Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

13 GR Venkateshwara Reddy v Karnataka SRTC (1995) 1 LLJ 1011 [LNIND 1994 KANT 135], 1020 (Kant) : 1995 (1) Kar LJ 298 [LNIND 1994 KANT 135], per Raveendran J.

14 Garfa Co-operative Stores Ltd v Isecond IT (2000) 2 LLJ 1236 [LNIND 1999 CAL 233] (Cal), per Sengupta J.

15 Committee of Mgmt. of Kisan Degree Collge v Shambhu Saran Pandey (1995) 2 LLJ 625 -27 (SC).

16 Azizul Haque v State of Uttar Pradesh (1971) 3 SCC 796, per Hegde J.

17 State of Mysore v Shivabasappa Shivappa (1964) 1 LLJ 24 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

18 Cmtral Bank of India Ltd v Prakash Chand Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 382 (SC), per Bhargava J.

19 PC Thomas v Mutholi Cooperative Society Ltd 1978 Lab IC 1428 (Ker) (DB), per Gopalan Nambiyar J.

20 Shiva Anand v Indian Airlines (2003) 4 LLJ 362 [LNIND 2002 CAL 334] (Cal), per Kalyan Jyoti Sengupta J.

21 Anant R Kulkarni v YP Education Society AIR 2013 SC 2098 [LNIND 2013 SC 447]: 2013 Lab IC 2341 [LNIND 2013 SC 447] : 2013 (6) SCALE 425 [LNIND 2013 SC 447] : (2013) 6 SCC 515 [LNIND 2013 SC 447], per BS Chauhan J.

22 Awadesh K Bhamagar v Gwalior RSMW Ltd (1972) 2 LLJ 143 [LNIND 1972 SC 231] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

23 SV Angappan v Tamil Nadu Electricity Board (1990) 2 LLJ 273, 279 (Mad), per Bakthavatsalam J.

24 Cf Collector of CE & LC v Sanwarmal Purohit CA Nos 1362-63 of 1967 (1968) (SC), per Shah J

25 Cf State of Assam v Mahendra Kumar Das AIR 1970 SC 1255 [LNIND 1970 SC 153], 1260, per Vaidialingam J.

26 Meenglass Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

27 Ashwani Kumar Suman v UPSTATE Agro Indl Corpn Ltd 1990 Lab IC 364, 367 (All) (DB), per Raza J.

28 Howrah Trading Co Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 282 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

29 Cf K Chindambaram v Govt of Tamil Nadu (1989) 1 LLJ 106, 108 (Mad), per Kader J.

30 State of Madhya Pradesh v Chintaman AIR 1961 SC 1623, 1629, per Gajendragadkar J.

31 UPSRTC v Musai Ram (1999) 2 LLJ 175 (SC).

32 HC Sarin v Union of India [1976] 2 SLR 248 [LNIND 1976 SC 176].

33 State of Maharashtra v MN Mardikar (1991) 1 LLJ 269, 273 (SC), per Ahmadi J.

34 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], 380 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

35 Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd v LC, Jamshedpur (1996) 2 LLJ 874, 878 (Pat), per Sahay J.

36 Sur Enamel & Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146] (SC), per Oas Gupta J.

37 Phulbari Tea Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1959 SC 102] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

38 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1962 SC 273] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

39 Jessop & Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi J.

40 Awadesh K Bhatnagar v Gwalior RS Mfg Wvg Ltd. (1972) 2 LLJ 143 [LNIND 1972 SC 231] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1431 [LNIND 1972 SC 231]: 1972 Lab IC 842 : (1973) 3 SCC 779 [LNIND 1972 SC 231], per Vaidialingam J.

41 Bharath Electronics Ltd v K Kasi (1987) 2 LLJ 203, 209 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

42 Uttar Pradesh SRTC v Musal Ram (1999) 3 LLN 433 (SC).

43 General Electric Co of India Ltd v BK Kedia (1968) 1 LLJ 731, 736 (Punj), per Gurdev Singh J.

44 Rashid Ahmad v UPSRTC 1987 Lab IC 323, 325-26 (All), per Sahai J.

45 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 811-12 (SC), per Shelat J.

46 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111] (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 155 [LNIND 1964 SC 111]: 1965 KLJ 90, per Gajendragadkar J.

47 Kameshwar Singh v Canara Bank 1993 Lab IC 692, 700 (Pat), per Aftab Alam J.

48 Golam Rasul v Public Service Commission (1963) 2 LLJ 174, 176 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

49 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 811-12 (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 372 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], per Shelat J.

50 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], 610-12 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 136 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]: 1972 Lab IC 13 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] : (1972) 4 SCC 304 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], per Vaidialingam J.

51 Ruston & Hornsby (I) Ltd v TB Kadam, (1975) 2 LLJ 352 [LNIND 1975 SC 231], 356 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2025 [LNIND 1975 SC 231]: (1976) 3 SCC 71 [LNIND 1975 SC 231], per Alagiriswami J.

52 Angshuman Das Gupta v Jute Corporation of India Ltd (1998) 1 LLJ 526 (531) (Gau), per Das J.

53 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

54 Central Bank of India Ltd v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235]. 745 (SC). per Vaidialingam J.

55 Sur Enameland Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146]. 369 (SC). per Das Gupta J.

56 M Muniswami v Superintending Engineer (1969) 1 LLJ 89 (Mad). per Ramakrishnan J.

57 CM Deshmukh v Board of Trustees, Port of Bombay 1995 Lab IC 1496 1502 (Born). per Bhairavia J.

58 Phulbari Tea Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1959 SC 102] (SC). per Wanchoo J.

59 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138]. 455 (SC). per Gajendragadkar J.

60 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], 380 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

61 State of Mysore v Shivabassapa Shivappa (1964) 1 LLJ 24, 26 (SC), per Venkatarama Ayyar J.

62 Sur Enamel and Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], 369 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

63 KN Baruah v Budla Beta Tea Estate CA 1017 of 1965 (1967) (SC), per Sikri J.

64 Municipal Corpn of Delhi v LC 1973 Lab IC 771,775 (Delhi), (DB), per Rangarajan J.

65 Chandrakumar M Deshmukh v B oT, Port of Bombay 1995 Lab IC 1496 (Born), per Bhairavia J.

66 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v N Narasimhaiah 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 112 (Kant), per CK Urs J.

67 Committee of Mgmt. of Kissan Degree College v Shambhu Saran Pandey (1995) 2 LLJ 625, 627 (SC).

68 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], 400 (SC) : [1964] 3 SCR 652 [LNIND 1963 SC 151], per Gajendragadkar J.

69 R Govindraj v GTTC (1992) 1 LLJ 597, 601-02 (Kant) (DB), per Rama Jois J.

70 Meenglas Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

71 Central Bank of India Ltd v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235] (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 266 [LNIND 1967 SC 234], per Vaidialingam J.

72 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243], 718 (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

73 Bharat Heavy Electricals Ltd v N Narasimhaiah 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 112 (Kant), per CK Urs J. .

74 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], 380 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

75 Sharda Prasad Vishwakarma v State of UP (1968) 1 LLJ 45, 48 (All), per BD Gupta J.

76 Anand G Joshi v Maharashtra SFC 1991 Lab IC 1666, 1678 (Born), per Sugla J.

77 Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co Ltd v Kalu Ram CA No 195 of 1964 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

78 Binny Ltd v Workmen (1972) 1 LLJ 478 [LNIND 1972 SC 117] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1975 [LNIND 1972 SC 117]: 1972 Lab IC 1141 [LNIND 1972 SC 117] : (1972) 3 SCC 806 [LNIND 1972 SC 117], per Mitter J.

79 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1964) 2 LLJ 799, 809 (SC), per Shelat J.

80 Ananda Bazar Patrika v Employees (1963) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 147], 433 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

81 Shyam SL Gupta v Mgmt of DCM Chemical Works 1987 Lab IC 1193 (Del), per Mahinder Narain J.

82 Balmer Lawrie Van Leer Ltd v BS Gholap (1996) 1 LLJ 312 [LNIND 1995 SC 8], 315 (Born), per Shah J.

83 Phulbari Tea Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 663 [LNIND 1959 SC 102] (SC) : AIR 1959 SC 1111 [LNIND 1959 SC 102], per Wanchoo J.

84 India Geneal Navigation and Rly Co Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 372 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

85 Bharat Sugar Mills Ltd v Jai Singh (1961) 2 LLJ 644 [LNIND 1961 SC 306] (SC) : [1962] 3 SCR 684 [LNIND 1961 SC 306], per Das Gupta J.

86 Associated Cement Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 396 [LNIND 1963 SC 151] (SC) : 1964] 3 SCR 652, per Gajendragadkar J.

87 Firestone TRCI. Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

88 GAnandam v Tamilnadu Electricity Board (1996) 2 LLJ 1198 [LNIND 1996 MAD 623], 1200 (Mad), per Wahab J.

89 CI Poulose v President, PSC Bank Ltd 1996 Lab IC 2029,2031-32 (DB) (Ker), per Koshy J.

90 British Bank of the Middle East v Marcus S. Lobo (1999) 2 LLJ 1299 [LNIND 1999 BOM 578] (Born) (DB), per Desai J.

91 Sur Enamel and Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1914 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], per Das Gupta J.

92 Meenglass Tea Estate v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 392 [LNIND 1963 SC 50] (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1719 [LNIND 1963 SC 50], per Hidayatullah J.

93 Kesoram Cotton Mills Ltd v Gangadhar (1963) 2 LLJ 371 [LNIND 1963 SC 95] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 708 [LNIND 1963 SC 95], per Wanchoo J.

94 Ananda Bazar Patrika Pvt Ltd v Employees (1963) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1963 SC 147] (SC) : AIR 1964 SC 339 [LNIND 1963 SC 147], per Gajendragadkar J.

95 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

96 Central Bank of India v Karunamoy Banerjee (1967) 2 LLJ 739 [LNIND 1967 SC 235], 745 (SC) : AIR 1968 SC 266 [LNIND 1967 SC 234], per Vaidialingam J.

97 Workmen of Langharajan Tea Estate v Mgmt CA No 720 of 1966 (13-9-1968) (SC), per Bhargava J.

98 Workmen in Buckingham and Carnatic Mills v Mgmt (1970) 1 LLJ 26 [LNIND 1969 SC 238], 31 (SC) : 1969 (1) UJ 494, per Vaidialingam J.

99 Mulchandani Electrical and Radio Industries Ltd v Workmen (1975) 1 LLJ 391 [LNIND 1975 SC 35] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 2125 [LNIND 1975 SC 35]: [1975] (30) FLR 169 : 1975 Lab IC 1508 : (1975) 4 SCC 731 [LNIND 1975 SC 35], per Gupta J.

1 KL Tripathi v State Bank of India (1984) 1 LLJ 2 [LNIND 1983 SC 283], 10 (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 273 [LNIND 1983 SC 283]: 1983 Lab IC 1680 [LNIND 1983 SC 283] : (1984) 1 SCC 43 [LNIND 1983 SC 283], per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

2 Indian Explosives Ltd v PO, LC 1975 Lab IC 641, 645 (Pat) (DB), per Agarwal J.

3 Peirce Leslie & Co Ltd v LC (1963) 1 LLJ 797 (Mad), per Veeraswami J.

4 Howrah Trading Co Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 282 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

5 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

6 State of Rajasthan v BK Meena (1997) 1 LLJ 746 [LNIND 1996 SC 1572], 752 (SC), per Jeevan Reddy J.

7 PJ Sunder Rajan v Unit Trust of India (1991) 2 LLJ 247 [LNIND 1990 MAD 150], 249 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

8 Kusheshwar Dubey v Bharat Coking Coal Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 470 [LNIND 1988 SC 438], 473 (SC).

9 Union of India vSARDAR Bahadur 1972 Lab IC 627, 630 (SC), per Mathew J. .

10 MM Rubber Co Ltd v S Natarajan (1985) 2 LLJ 364 [LNIND 1985 MAD 269] (DB), per Venkataswami J.

11 Bimal Kanta Mukherjee v Newman's Printing Works (1956) 1 LLJ 453 (LAT).

12 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Ltd v Kushal Bhan (1960) 1 LLJ 520 [LNIND 1959 SC 30], 521 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 806 [LNIND 1959 SC 30]. per Wanchoo J.

13 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], 119 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 155 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], per Gajendragadkar CJI.

14 Udneshwar Prasad v Hindustan SWC Ltd 1983 Lab IC (NOC) 102 (Pat), per PS Sahay J.

15 Vinod Behari Dixit v United Commercial Bank 1979 Lab IC 1239, 1244 (Cal), per Salil Kumar Dana J.

16 JK Cotton Spg and Wvg Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 153 [LNIND 1965 SC 153] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

17 Anglo-American DTTRADING Co Ltd v LC (1970) 1 LLJ 481, 484-85 (Mad), per Alagiriswami J.

18 Jang Bahadur Singh v Baijnath Tewari (1969) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1968 SC 132], 570 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 30 [LNIND 1968 SC 132]: 1968 (2) ALT 280 (SC) : (1968) 38 AWR 580 : 1968 (16) BLJR 939 : 1969 Cr LJ 267, per Bachawat J.

19 Kusheshwar Dubey v Bharat Coking Coal Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 470 [LNIND 1988 SC 438], 472-73 (SC) : AIR 1988 SC 2118 [LNIND 1988 SC 606]: 1988 (2) SCALE 641 : (1988) 4 SCC 319 [LNIND 1988 SC 606].

20 State of Rajasthan v BK Meena (1997) 1 LLJ 746 [LNIND 1996 SC 1572],752 (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 13 [LNIND 1996 SC 1572]: 1996 Lab IC 2750 : 1996 (7) SCALE 363 [LNIND 1996 SC 1572] : (1996) 6 SCC 417 [LNIND 1996 SC 1572], per Jeevan Reddy J.

21 Dy Director of Collegiate Education v SN Meera 1995 Lab IC 1615, 1618 (SC), per Jeevan Reddy J.

22 Mgmt of WS Insulator of India Ltd v Md Moosa 1979 Lab IC 102 (Mad), per Ramanujam J.

23 Corporation of Nagpur v Ramachandra G Modak (1981) 2 LLJ 6 [LNIND 1981 SC 119] (8) (SC), per Fazal Ali J.

24 Nelson Moris v Union of India (1999) 2 LLN 1059, 1061 (SC).

25 NK Soloman v Food Corporation of India (1998) 1 LLN 255 (MP), per Dharmadhikari J.

26 Mannalal v Second LC (1998) 1 LLN 862, 866 (Born), per Sirpurkar J.

27 Durgapur Chemicals Ltd v Ninth IT (2001) 4 LLN 1052 (Cal), per Ray J.

28 Kedar Das v LIC of India (1999) I LLJ 464(Orr) (DB), per Patra J.

29 Regional Manager, Bank of Baroda v PO, CGIT (1999) 1 LLJ 656 [LNIND 1999 SC 73] (SC), per Majmudar J.

30 M Krishnan v Mgmt of Terrace Estate (2000) 1 LLN 396 (Mad).

31 Senior Supdt of Post Offices v A Gopalan (2000) 1 LLN 92 (SC).

32 R Shankaranarayanan v MDCCB Ltd (2000) 4632 (Mad) (DB), per Sirpurkar J.

33 P Elango v LC (2001) 2 LLN 449 (Mad), per Dinakaran J.

34 Sumangal V Rana v State of Maharashtra (2000) 1 LLJ 896 (Born) (DB), per Mane J.

35 S Rangasami v PO, LC (2001) 3 LLN 671 (Mad), per Kalifulla J.

36 Ram KP Mahato v Steel Authority of India Ltd (2001) 4 LLN 1080 Ghar), per Eqbal J.

37 M Ravindran v Mgmt of Bharat Electronics Ltd (2002) 3 LLN 1009 (Kant), per Gururajan J.

38 M Paul Anthony v Bharat Gold Mines Ltd (1999) 1 LLJ 1094 [LNIND 1999 SC 319] (SC) : AIR 1999 SC 1416 : 1999 (2) CTC 579 : 1999 (2) SCALE 363 : (1999) 3 SCC 679, per Saghir Ahmed J.

39 Dhanna Rilm v Rajasthan SRTC (2002) 4 LLN 629 (Raj) (DB), per Balia J.

40 Div Controller, Gujarat SRTC v CJ Rana (1998) 4 LLN 666 (Guj), per Mehta J.

41 Senior Supdt of Post Offices v A Gopalan (2000) 1 LLN 92 (SC).

42 Prasad Film Laboratories v Principal LC (2001) 1 LLN 985 (Mad), per Karpagavinayagam J.

43 GM, Empee Distilleries Ltd v State (2002) 2 LLN 746 (Mad), per Ramamurthi J.

44 Uranium Corpn of India Ltd v PO, CGIT, (2003) 4 LLJ 238 (Jhrk), per M Y Iqbal J.

45 Divl. Controller, GSRTC v Kadarbhai J Suthar, AIR 2007 SC (supp) 660, per Pasayat J.

46 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], 117 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

47 JK Cotton Spg Weaving Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 153, 155 (SC), per Mudholkar J.

48 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111], 117 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

49 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Tejvir Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 201 [LNIND 1972 SC 18], 204 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

50 Mgmt of Eastern Electric and Trading Co v Baldev Lal (1975) 3 LLJ 367, 370 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1892 [LNIND 1975 SC 266]: (1975) 4 SCC 684 [LNIND 1975 SC 266], per Alagiriswami J.

51 S Visweswariah v New India Assurance Co Ltd (1988) 2 LLJ 233, 237 (Kant) (DB), per PC Jain CJ.

52 Northern Rly Co-operative Credit Society Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 46 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 1182 [LNIND 1967 SC 419], per Bhargava J.

53 State of Uttar Pradesh v TP Lal Srivastava (1997) 1 LLJ 831 [LNIND 1996 SC 1506]-32 (SC) : (1996) 10 SCC 702 [LNINDORD 1996 SC 97] : [1996] Supp 6 SCR 623.

54 Imperial Tobacco Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 414 [LNIND 1961 SC 116] (SC) : AIR 1962 SC 1348 [LNIND 1961 SC 116], per Wanchoo J.

55 Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd v Siv Saran Sinha (1961) 2 LLJ 511 (Pat) (DB), per Choudhary J.

56 Lakshmi Devi Sugar Mills Ltd v Ram Sarup (1957) 1 LLJ 17 [LNIND 1956 SC 85],24 (SC), per Bhagwati J.

57 Motor Industries Co Ltd v Shaikh Mohd 1978 Lab IC 1335 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

58 Brooke Bond India Pvt Ltd v Subha Raman (1961) 2 LLJ 417 [LNIND 1961 SC 419] (SC), per Wanchoo J.

59 Sarada Industries, Ambattur v M Elumalai 1973 Lab IC 1347, 1350 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

60 Gokulananda Tripathy v Mgmt. of SD Hamraj (1975) 1 LLJ 133, 135 (Orissa) (DB), per RN Misra J.

61 Mgmt of Eastern Electric and Trading Co v Baldev Lal (1975) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1975 SC 266] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1892 [LNIND 1975 SC 266]: (1975) 4 SCC 684 [LNIND 1975 SC 266], per Alagiriswami J.

62 Sheo Sampat Lal v State of Uttar Pradesh 1983 Lab IC 324, 327 (All), per TS Misra J.

63 Tata Engineering Locomotive Co Ltd v State of Bihar 1984 Lab IC 206 -07 (Pat) (DB).

64 Mohd Shahid v Aligarh Muslim University (1998) 1 LLN 430 (All), per Gulati J.

65 Nagar Palika Nataur v UP Public Service Tribunal (1998) 3 LLN 900 (SC).

66 Pepsu Road Transport Corpn v Rawel Singh, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1591, per CK Thakker J.

67 CMD, VSP v GSP Haribabu, AIR 2008 SC (supp) 1694, per Sinha J.

68 SBI v Hemant Kumar AIR 2011 SC 1890 [LNIND 2011 SC 375]: (2011) 2 LLJ 517 [LNIND 2011 SC 375] : 2011 (4) SCALE 302 [LNIND 2011 SC 375] : (2011) 11 SCC 355 [LNIND 2011 SC 375], per Aftab Alam J.

69 Anil Kumar v PO, LC (1986) 1 LLJ 101 [LNIND 1985 SC 191], 103 (SC), per Desai J.

70 Madhya Pradesh Industries Ltd v Union of India [1966] 1 SCR 412,466, per Subba Rao J.

71 Mahabir Prasad v State of UP [1971] 1 SCR 201 [LNIND 1970 SC 188], 205, per Shah J.

72 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 456 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

73 Powari Tea Estate v MK Barkataki (1965) 2 LLJ 102 [LNIND 1964 SC 299], 105 (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

74 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 456 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

75 Sur Enamel and Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146], 369 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

76 Khardah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 456-57 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

77 Powari Tea Estate v MK Barkataki (1965) 2 LLJ 102 [LNIND 1964 SC 299] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

78 Howrah Trading Co Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 282, 288-89 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

79 Vijaya Mohini Mills v IT (1993) 1 LLJ 605 [LNIND 1991 KER 358], 607-08 (Ker), per Padmanabhan J.

80 Northern Dooars Tea Co Ltd v Workmen of DDTE (1964) 1 LLJ 436 [LNIND 1963 SC 184], 440-41 (SC) : AIR 1967 SC 560 [LNIND 1963 SC 184], per Gajendragadkar J.

81 Samnuggur Jute Factory Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 1 LLJ 634 [LNIND 1963 SC 247], 636 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

82 Saran Motors Pvt Ltd v Vishwanath (1964) 2 LLJ 139 [LNIND 1964 SC 113] (SC), per Gajendragadkar CJI.

83 Howrah Trading Co Pvt Ltd v Fourth IT (1966) 2 LLJ 282 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

84 Anil Kumar v LC (1986) 1 LLJ 101 [LNIND 1985 SC 191] (SC) : AIR 1985 SC 1121 [LNIND 1985 SC 191]: 1985 Lab IC 1219 [LNIND 1985 SC 191] : 1985 (2) SCALE 1365 [LNIND 1985 SC 191] : (1985) 3 SCC 378 [LNIND 1985 SC 191], per Desai J.

85 Central Bank of India Ltd v PC Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 384 (SC), per Bhargava J.

86 Profulla Mohan Mukherjee v IG of Police (1958) 2 LLJ 705 [LNIND 1958 CAL 186] (Cal) (DB), per Chakravarti CJ.

87 Tata Engineering and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], 809 (SC) : (1969) 3 SCC 372 [LNIND 1969 SC 114], per Shelat J.

88 Mgmt. of Imperial Book Depot v VP Aggarwal 1969 Lab IC 120, 122 (Del), per HR Khanna J.

89 Pure Drinks Pvt Ltd v Kirat Singh Maungatt (1961) 2 LLJ 99 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

90 Provincial Transport Service v State IC (1962) 2 LLJ 360 [LNIND 1962 SC 272] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

91 Saran Motors Pvt Ltd v Vishwanath (1964) 2 LLJ 139 [LNIND 1964 SC 113], 142 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

92 Nirmal Sen Gupta v National Carbon Co Ltd CA No 155 of 1959 (SC), per Wanchoo J. .

93 N Kalindi v Tata Engg & Locomotive Co Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1960 SC 95], 232 (SC) : AIR 1960 SC 914 [LNIND 1960 SC 95], per Das Gupta J.

94 Central Bank of India Ltd v PC Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 380 (SC), per Bhargava J.

95 Parry & Co Ltd v PC Pal (1970) 2 LLJ 429 [LNIND 1968 SC 358], 436 (SC), per Shelat J.

1 Sri Sivasakthi Bus Service v P Gopal 1971 Lab IC 1388 -89 (Mad), per Ramaprasada Rao J.

2 Lord Krishna Textile Mills v Workmen (1961) 1 LLJ 211 [LNIND 1960 SC 332], 219 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

3 Parry's Employees' Union v Parry & Co (1966) 1 LLJ 535 (Cal) (DB), per Bose CJ.

4 Cf, Provincial Transport Service v State Industrial Court (1962) 2 LLJ 360 [LNIND 1962 SC 272] (SC), per Das Guptaj.

5 Delhi Cloth & General Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 189 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

6 Rajinder Kumar Kindra v Delhi Administration (1984) 2 LLJ 517 [LNIND 1984 SC 267], 524 (SC), per Desai J.

7 Saudi Arabian Airlines v Shehnaz Mudbhatkal (1999) 1 LLN 708, 721 (Born), per Srikrishna J.

8 Hamdard Dawakhana Wakf v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 772 [LNIND 1962 SC 336] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

9 Tata Oil Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1964) 2 LLJ 113 [LNIND 1964 SC 111] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

10 Banaras Electric Light and Power Co Ltd v LC (1972) 2 LLJ 328 [LNIND 1972 SC 252] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 2182 [LNIND 1972 SC 252]: 1972 Labic 939 : (1974) 3 SCC 103 [LNIND 1972 SC 252], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

11 Asst Security Officer, RPF v S Sivagnanam (1996) 2 LLJ 597 [LNIND 1996 MAD 503],605 (Mad) (DB) : 1996-2-LW 119, per Lakshmanan J.

12 Anand Chandra Prusty v Orissa Mining Corpn Ltd 1996 Lab IC 2595, 2597 (Ori).

13 Chandrakumar M Deshmukh v Bot of Port of Bombay 1995 Lab IC 1496,1502 (Bom), per Bhairavia J.

14 Anandram J Vasvani v Union of India (1983) 2 LLJ 122, 127 (Cal) (DB), per Pyne J.

15 Shahdara-Saharanpur Light Rly Co Ltd v SSRW Union (1969) 1 LLJ 734 [LNIND 1968 SC 281], 744 (SC) : AIR 1969 SC 513 [LNIND 1968 SC 281], per Shelat J.

16 Hamdard Dawakhana Wakf v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 772 [LNIND 1962 SC 336], 777 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

17 Northern Rly CCS Ltd v IT (1967) 2 LLJ 46, 52 (SC), per Bhargava J. .

18 Associated Cement Companies Ltd v TC Srivastava (1984) 2 LLJ 105 [LNIND 1984 SC 98], 109 (SC) : AIR 1984 SC 1227 [LNIND 1984 SC 98]: 1984 Supp scc 87, per Tulzapurkar J.

19 Engine Valves Ltd v LC (1991) 1 LLJ 372 [LNIND 1990 MAD 517], 379 (Mad) (DB), per Raju J.

20 Lakshmiratan Cotton Mills Co Ltd v Workmen (1975) 2 LLJ 174 [LNIND 1975 SC 197] (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1689 [LNIND 1975 SC 197], per Bhagwati J.

21 Union of India v E Bashyan 1988 Lab IC 1702 (SC), per Thakkar J.

22 Union of India v Mohd Ramzan Khan (1991) 1 LLJ 29 [LNIND 1990 SC 726] (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 471 [LNIND 1990 SC 726], per Ranganath Misra CJI.

23 MD, ECIL v B Karunakar (1994) 1 LLJ 210 (SC), per Sawant J.

24 Firestone TRCI Ltd, v Workmen (1967) 2 LLJ 715 [LNIND 1967 SC 243] (SC), per Hidayatullah (SC).

25 Union of India v Mohd Ramzan Khan (1991) 1 LLJ 29 [LNIND 1990 SC 726] (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 471 [LNIND 1990 SC 726], per Misra CJI.

26 MD, ECIL, v B Karunakar (1994) 1 LLJ 162 [LNIND 1993 SC 1059] (SC) : (1993) 4 SCC 727 [LNIND 1993 SC 1059], per Sawant J. .

27 Khem Chand v Union of India (1959) 1 LLJ 167 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

28 Union of India v Md Ramzan Khan, (1991) I LLJ 29 (SC) : AIR 1991 SC 471 [LNIND 1990 SC 726], per Misra CJI.

29 AK Kraipak v Union of India, [1970] 1 SCR 457 [LNIND 1969 SC 197], per Hegde J.

30 Charan Lal Sahu v Union of India, (1990) 1 SCC 613 [LNIND 1989 SC 639], per Sabyasachi Mukherji J.

31 Sukhdev Singh v Bhagatram SS Raghuvanshi, AIR 1975 SC 1331 [LNIND 1975 SC 79]: (1975) 1 SCC 421 [LNIND 1975 SC 79], per Ray CJI.

32 A K Kraipak v Union of India [1970] 1 SCR 457 [LNIND 1969 SC 197], per Hegde J.

33 Chairman, Board of Mining Examination v Ramjee AIR 1977 SC 965 [LNIND 1977 SC 67], 969, per Iyer J.

34 Charan Lal Sahu v Union of India (1990) 1 SCC 613 [LNIND 1989 SC 639].

35 JK Cotton Spinning & WeavingMills Co Ltd v LAT (1963) 2 LLJ 36 (SC). per Gajendragadkar J.

36 Burmah Shell India Ltd v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 363 (SC). per Hegde J.

37 Rao, EM (2015), Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary, 2nd ed., Lexis Nexis, pp. 222-5

38 SK Singh v Central Bank of India (1997) 2 LLJ 537 (SC) : AIR 1997 SC 2686 : 1996 (7) SCALE 628 : (1996) 10 SCC 694.

39 State of Karnataka v VB Hiregowdar (1997) 2 LLJ 921, 923 (SC) : 1996 (5) SCALE 673 [LNIND 1996 SC 1075] : (1996) 10 SCC 505 [LNIND 1996 SC 1075].

40 Ram Kishan v Union of India, (1996) 1 LLJ 982, 985 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 255 [LNIND 1995 SC 858]: 1995 (5) SCALE 431 : (1995) 6 SCC 157 [LNIND 1995 SC 858].

41 PM Raju v PO LC (2001) 4 LLN 903 (Mad), per Raviraja Pandian J.

42 Orientallmurance Co Ltd v S Balakrishnan (2001) 3 LLN 727 (SC).

43 Binny Ltd v S Sankaran (2001) 1 LLN 490 (Mad) (DB), per Sirpurkar J.

44 NTC (WBAB&O) Ltd v. Anjan K Saha, AIR 2004 SC 4255 : (2004) 3 LLJ 757 SC : 2004 (7) SCALE 128 : (2004) 7 SCC 581, per Dharmadhikari J.

45 Div. Mgr, Plantation, A & N Islands v Munnu Barrick, AIR 2005 SC 1158 [LNIND 2004 SC 1258]: (2005) 1 LLJ 557 [LNIND 2004 SC 1258] SC : 2004 (10) SCALE 513 [LNIND 2004 SC 1258] : (2005) 2 SCC 237, per Sinha J.

46 Haryana State Financial Corporation v KC Ahuja AIR 2009 SC (Supp) 909, per CK Thakker J.

47 Chairman, Ganga Yamuna Grameen Bank v Devi Sahai, AIR 2009 SC 2126 [LNIND 2009 SC 317]: (2009) 2 LLJ 508 [LNIND 2009 SC 317] SC : 2009 (3) SCALE 80 [LNIND 2009 SC 317] : (2009) 11 SCC 266 [LNIND 2009 SC 317], per SB Sinha J.

48 Sarva UP Gramin Bank v Manoj Kumar Sinha AIR 2010 SC 2491 [LNIND 2010 SC 161]: (2010) 2 LLJ 641 [LNIND 2010 SC 161] SC : 2010 (2) SCALE 255 [LNIND 2010 SC 161] : (2010) 3 SCC 556 [LNIND 2010 SC 161], per SS Nijjar J.

49 For the details of 'censure', GIM affairs memo no 39/21/56-Ests (A) dated 13 December 1996.

50 Shankara Pillai v Kerala State (1960) 1 LLJ 621 (Ker), per Vellu Pillai J.

51 India Marine Service Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 122 [LNIND 1962 SC 260] (SC), per Mudholkar J.

52 Shri Gopal Paper Mills Ltd v IT (1963) 1 LLJ 226 (Punj) (DB), per Grover J.

53 Rasiklal Nanalal Joshi v Bank of Baroda (1956) 1 LLJ 103 (LAT).

54 Workmen of SBI v State Bank of India (1984) 2 LLJ 239 -40 (Mad) (DB), per KBN Singh CJ.

55 National Engineering Employees' Union v RN Kulkarni (1968) 2 LLJ 82 (Born) (DB), per Patel J.

56 Ram Naresh Kumar v State of West Bengal (1958) 1 LLJ 567 [LNIND 1957 CAL 138], 571 (Cal) (DB), per Guha Ray J.

57 Balvantrai Ratilal Patel v State of Maharashtra (1968) 2 LLJ 700 [LNIND 1967 SC 369], 703 (SC), per Ramaswami J.

58 B Kalyanasundaram v LC (1966) 2 LLJ 430 [LNIND 1965 MAD 89] (Mad) : AIR 1966 Mad 87 [LNIND 1965 MAD 89], per Srinivasan J.

59 Hemant Kumar Bhattacharjee v SN Mukherjee AIR 1954 Cal 340 [LNIND 1953 CAL 153] (DB), per Chakravartti CJ.

60 Sudhir Rajan Haldar v State of West Bengal (1961) 2 LLJ 283 [LNIND 1961 CAL 46] (Cal) (DB), per Banerjee J.

61 Nepal Chandra Guchait v District Magistrate (1966) 2 LLJ 71 [LNIND 1965 CAL 199] (Cal) : AIR 1966 Cal 485 [LNIND 1965 CAL 199], per BN Banerjee J.

62 Calcutta Chemical Co Ltd v DK Barman 1969 Lab IC 1498, 1506 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

63 Swaransing Laxmansing v Bombay Garage (Ahmedabad) Ltd (1961) 2 LLJ 40 (Guj) (DB), per Desai CJ.

64 Moti Ram Deka v GM, North East Frontier Rly (1964) 2 LLJ 467 [LNIND 1963 SC 282], 493 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

65 Laws v London Chronicle Ltd [1959] 1 WLR 698,701, per Lord MR Evershed.

66 Jupiter General Insurance Co Ltd v Shroff [1973] 3 All ER 67, 73 (PC), per Lord Maugham

67 Pepper v Webb [1969] 1 WLR 514, per Harman LJ.

68 Jupiter General Insurance Co Ltd v Shroff [1973] 3 All ER 67, 73 (PC), per Lord Maugham.

69 WM Agnani v Badri Das (1963) 1 LLJ 684 [LNIND 1963 SC 74] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

70 Lalla Ram v Mgmt of DCM Chemical Works 1978 Lab IC 716, 720 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

71 Savage v British India Steam Navigation Co [1930] 46 TLR 294.

72 Laws v London Chronicle Ltd [1959] 1 WLR 698, per Lord Evershed MR.

73 Vasanti M Shah v All India HFMC Society Ltd (1986) 1 LLJ 69, 76 (Guj) (DB), per Majmudar J.

74 Individual Employment Law—An Introduction—by BA Hepple and Paul O'Higgins [1971], P 119-21.

75 Co-op Central Bank Ltd v LC 1978 Lab IC 1699, 1702 (AP) (DB), per Lakshmaiah J. J.

76 Mgmt of Mysore Elec. Industries Ltd v Kadiah 1979 Lab IC (NOC) 31 (Kant), per Rarna Jois J.

77 Workmen of Containers and Closures Ltd v First LC (1962) 1 LLJ 471 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

78 Harbanslal Malhotra and Sons Pvt Ltd v State of West Bengal (1964) 2 LLJ 342 (Cal), per BN Banerjee J.

79 Calcutta Chemical Co Ltd v DK Barman 1969 Lab IC 1498, 1511 (Pat) (DB), per Untwalia J.

80 RM Parmar v Gujarat Electricity Board 1982 Lab IC 1031 [LNIND 1981 GUJ 125], 1034-35 (Guj) (DB), per Thakkar CJ.

81 Gujarat SRTC v Jamnadas Becharbhai 1983 Lab IC 1349 [LNIND 1982 GUJ 102], 1352 (Guj) (DB), per Thakkar CJ.

82 Municipal Corpn of Ahmedabad v Hussainmiya Chandmiya 1987 Lab IC 1564 [LNIND 1986 GUJ 40] (Guj) (DB), per Ahmadi J.

83 T Seeralan v Presiding Officer, Second Addl LC (1986) 2 LLJ 85, 86 (Mad), per Sathiadev J.

End of Document

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[S. 11A. Power of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals to give Appropriate Relief in case of Discharge or Dismissal of Workmen.(

(ii) Disciplinary Authority

The power to discharge or dismiss a workman from service, vests in the person who has the power to appoint workmen as a measure of disciplinary punishment. In other words, such person is the competent disciplinary authority in that behalf but the general principle that the service of a workman can be terminated only by the person who is the appointing authority does not mean that the same person should have been in existence on the date of termination of service. What has to be seen is as to who is the appointing authority for the particular post in question at the relevant time.[84] An order passed by an authority superior to the appointing authority, in view of the fact that the person who was the appointing authority was a witness in the inquiry proceedings, would be perfectly valid.[85] For instance, in Balbir Chand, the Supreme Court rejected the contention of the employee that the order of dismissal passed against him by the managing director who was the highest authority in the hierarchy of the corporation was invalid because such order could only be passed by the zonal manager, who was the appointing and disciplinary authority. The court observed: 'It is now a well-settled legal position that an authority lower than the appointing authority cannot take any decision in the matter of disciplinary action. But there is no prohibition in law that the higher authority should not take decision or impose the penalty as the primary authority in the matter of disciplinary action.' It is relevant to note that though an inquiry officer need not necessarily be an officer of the company and it is permissible even to appoint an outsider to act as an inquiry officer, disciplinary authority can only be vested in an officer of the employer company or corporation. The disciplinary authority to impose punishment on a delinquent workman cannot be conferred on an outsider because an outsider cannot be vested with the power to appoint employees of the company.[86] In Heckett Engg, Jaswant Singh J observed:

> ...It is now firmly established that power to terminate service is a necessary adjunct of the power of appointment and is exercised as an incident to or consequence of that power...The power to terminate flows naturally and as a necessary consequence from the power to create. In other words, it is a necessary adjunct of the power of appointment and is exercised as incident to or consequence of that power; the authority to call such officer into being necessarily implies the authority to terminate his functions.[87]

In PS Malavenkar, the draft order terminating the services of the workman was duly approved and initialed by the competent authority, viz, the general manager, but the order was communicated to the workman by his executive assistant. The court held that the order was, in fact and in reality, made by the general manager and that the fact that a written document bears initials only instead of full signatures of the competent authority does not make any significant difference'. Nor does affixing signature by initialing a document or order detract from its authority unless the law or the rule specifically require full signatures to be affixed there to make it authentic.[88] In Awadesh Kumar, the order of discharge of a workman was not signed by the manager who was the competent authority under the Standing Orders of the company but it was signed by two persons one of whom was authorised by the manager while the other was the secretary of the company. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the order as the former was competent to sign under the Standing

Orders white the latter was superior to the manager who was the competent authority under the Standing Orders. The exigencies of complex modern industrial organisation of large scale undertakings, particularly where the units of such undertakings are spread over different locations, make it necessary to delegate the powers to terminate the service of a workman by officers other than the appointing authority as well.[89] The officers to whom such power is delegated will be competent to impose the punishment of discharge or dismissal on a delinquent workman, provided that such delegation is not ultra vires of the articles of association and is properly and validly made but the person to whom the power has been delegated, must himself, exercise the power and he cannot sub-delegate such power unless sub-delegation is authorised by express words or necessary implication as delegatus potest non delegare.[90]

In Sambhu Prasad Srivastava, the court upheld the dismissal of the workman by the resident engineer to whom the power to dismiss any employee from service was delegated by a special power of attorney. On the other hand, a person or authority to whom the power has not been validly delegated will not be competent to dismiss a workman.[91] For instance, in Rashid Ahmad, the power to appoint employees vested in the directors or 'an officer authorised by the board of directors'. Therefore, such persons alone had the power to terminate the services of the employees. In this case, the services of an employee were terminated by the regional manager who was not so authorised by the board. Hence, termination of service of the employee was held to be invalid.[92] In Hindustan Brown Boveri, the dismissal of the workman, by the works manager in the absence of proof of delegation of power to him to impose the punishment, was held to be invalid.[93] Likewise, in South Central Rly ECCS, an order of dismissal passed by the secretary of a co-operative society in whose favour there was no delegation by the managing committee of the society who was the punishing authority, was held to be invalid.[94] There is a marked distinction between initiating the disciplinary proceedings and imposing the disciplinary punishment It is a well settled legal position that it is not necessary that disciplinary proceedings must only be initiated by the authority competent to impose the punishment. The proceedings can be initiated even by any authority superior to the appointing authority.[1] In Steel Authority of India, the personnel manager was appointed the disciplinary authority as required by the discipline and appeal rules of the steel authority but the charges were framed by the chief medical officer who was not authorised by the rules to frame the charges or to constitute the inquiry committee. The disciplinary proceedings were held to be invalid.[2] However, in Nagiah, the chargesheet was signed by a person who was not authorised to sign. The Karnataka High Court held that the inquiry based on the chargesheet which resulted in the dismissal of the workman was not vitiated because the workman had participated in the inquiry proceedings and he had not suffered any prejudice in any manner.[3] The fact that the order is not made by the competent authority must be pleaded and proved before the tribunal. Even if the point has been taken in the pleadings, if it is not proved by adducing relevant evidence, the impugned order inflicting the punishment of dismissal will be vulnerable. Such a point cannot be raised later before the writ court.[4] A person who is the disciplinary authority for imposing punishment can himself hold the domestic inquiry and then impose the punishment. There is no bar against that in the industrial law. Nor will the order of punishment inflicted upon an employee by the competent officer become vitiated by the mere fact that he subsequently appeared before the industrial tribunal to substantiate the action taken by him on the basis of the report of the inquiry committee of which he was a member.[5]

(iii) Order of Punishment

The disciplinary action commences with the chargesheet and culminates in the order of punishment. The findings of the inquiry officer are not binding on the punishing authority which has to finally decide whether the materials at the inquiry have established the charges and if so, what punishment should be awarded.[6] It is open to the tribunal to come to the different conclusion from the conclusion arrived at by the inquiry officer. If it comes to the conclusion that the charges are not proved, the foundation for the punishment is knocked off but if after taking the materials into account before it, the punishing authority comes to the conclusion that the charge against the delinquent is proved before the inquiry officer, that will be the foundation for the punishment.[7] The order of discharge or dismissal must clearly state the grounds for dismissal of the workman and it would not be proper to apply the common law principle that the ground for dismissal need not be stated in the order whereby the workman is dismissed from service.[8] The requirement of a fair and valid order imposing the punishment are discussed under the following sub-heads:

(a) Bona Fides

In industrial jurisprudence, the requirement of acting bona fide permeates the entire process of disciplinary proceedings. In other words, in all stages right from initiation of the disciplinary proceedings by serving the chargesheet on the delinquent workman through disciplinary inquiry to making the order imposing the punishment, the action of the management must be fair and bona fide. Particularly, the requirement of acting fairly and bona fide while imposing the punishment is accentuated. Lack of bona fide vitiates most solemn transactions.[9] It is unmistakably clear from the judicial dicta that if the disciplinary action is commenced mala fide or is a measure of victimisation or unfair labour practice, it will be liable to be interfered with by industrial adjudication. Violation of the rules of natural justice in conducting the inquiry proceedings and perversity in recording the findings are other variants of mala fides. 'In determining the misconduct, the management must have facts to base its conclusion on and it must act in good faith without caprice or discrimination and without motive or vindictiveness, intimidation or resorting to unfair labour practice and there must be no infraction of the accepted rules of natural justice'.[10] In order to avoid the charge of vindictiveness, justice, equity and fair play demand that the punishment must always be commensurate with the gravity of the offence charged.[11] An action of the management of which the ostensible purpose is not the real purpose and which, though purporting to carry out one object is, in fact, intended to achieve another, would be lacking in bona fides and would be treated malafide.[12] The action of the management has to be viewed in the context of the entire background in which the action was taken, the circumstances preceding it, attending on it and those that follow it. For instance, where by a seemingly innocuous order made by the management, a workman is sought to be punished for the charges of misconduct, it would be open to the tribunal, as indeed necessary for it, to examine not only the foundation of the order but the real motivation of it. If the action is found to have been conceived with the intention to victimise the workman on account of his trade union activities or otherwise by way of unfair labour practice, such action would be mala fide and shall be liable to be struck down even though it could otherwise be justified on the basis of the contract of service and the rules of service or by any other material in support of the charge.[13]Likewise, where an employer discriminates in the matter of awarding the punishment to persons who have been charged and found guilty of the same act of misconduct, it would lead to an inference of mala fides.[14] An inference of mala fides is also permissible where, it appears that the management had already made up its mind to punish the workman before holding the inquiry, and the matter stood prejudged.[15] A mala fide action cannot be validated merely because it may be justified either with reference to the contract of service or on the basis of the material relevant to the charge of misconduct.[16]

In every case, after ascertaining that the principles of natural justice have not been violated, it would be proper for the tribunal to address itself to the question 'whether on the materials on which the inquiry officer has reached the conclusion adverse to the workmen, a reasonable person could have reached such a conclusion'.[17] The inference of lack of bona fides cannot, however, be drawn from irrelevant and extraneous considerations.[18] Inference of mala fide may, be drawn even from the factum of unduly severe and harsh punishment in certain cases. For instance, where the punishment is shockingly disproportionate to the misconduct or is such as no reasonable employer would impose under the circumstances, an inference of mala fides may be permissible.[19] The mere fact that some of the witnesses, who gave evidence at the domestic inquiry were promoted subsequent to the inquiry, will not affect the bona fides of the inquiry as they might have been promoted in the normal course at the relevant time even if no inquiry had been held.[20] Thus, the initiation of the disciplinary action, inquiry proceedings, report of the inquiry officer and the order of punishment, can all be challenged on the grounds of perversity, mala fides, victimisation and unfair labour practice. However, these are all questions of fact. The burden of establishing them is on the workman who makes these allegations, by adducing relevant evidence before the tribunal as it may not always be possible to decide these questions by merely looking into the records of the inquiry.[21] If there is no such pleading, no evidence to prove it is permissible. Even if there is evidence in support of it, it cannot be examined.[22] An allegation of mala fide, such as unfair labour practice, victimisation or discrimination etc have, therefore, to be specifically pleaded and proved. Hence, a finding of mala fide, victimisation, unfair labour practice or discrimination in the absence of pleadings or proof shall be perverse or beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal.[23] The question whether a proper inquiry has been held or not involves a further inquiry into the questions such as: whether the workman has been duly notified of the charges; whether he has been given opportunity to submit his explanation; whether he had opportunity to cross-examine witnesses examined on behalf of the management and whether he could lead evidence in his defence. Though these questions may properly be considered by examining the record of the inquiry relied on by the management, it may not always be possible to decide the question whether the inquiry has been vitiated on account of mala fides, unfair labour practice or victimisation by merely looking into the records of the inquiry. In order to establish these facts, therefore, a workman has to lead evidence before the tribunal for satisfying it that existence of the vitiating circumstances was not known to him at the time of the inquiry or even if he knew he was not able to establish them at the inquiry for sufficient reasons.[24]

Inference of mala fides, however, cannot be lightly drawn. The mere fact that the workman takes part in the union activities or is an active office bearer thereof, would, per se, not lead to the inference of mala fides or victimisation.[25] If the action is a measure of victimisation or unfair labour practice, passed with an ulterior motive or is capricious and unreasonable, inference of mala fides will be permissible. In certain cases, a single allegation, if established will be so serious as to lead to the inference of mala fides but in certain cases, each individual allegation treated separately may not lead to the inference of mala fide. When all allegations are taken together, the inference drawn from established facts may lead to the conclusion that the impugned order is passed mala fide, out of personal ill-will or malice.[26] However, to find the plea of mala fides, the tribunal must be in a position to hold positively that the impugned order could have only been made with dishonest motive and it is not sufficient to find that it was probably so.[27] For instance, where the charges of misconduct are based on objective facts and will have to be established by evidence mainly documentary and there is little scope of any personal relationship among the concerned workmen and officials as affecting the establishment of such charges, and the case of malafides is not based on any specific facts or circumstances worth consideration, it would not be possible to hold that the personal relationship of the superior officials with the workmen can have any bearing on initiation and conduct of the domestic inquiry.[28] Likewise, where an employer terminates the service of a workman who shows consistent indifference to work and discipline and gets annoyed when he is asked to give an explanation, the termination of service cannot be said to be mala fide. The fact that he happens to be an office-bearer of the union will make no difference.[29]

(b) Quasi-judicial Nature

The disciplinary proceedings against a workman are quasi-judicial in nature. It is, therefore essential that before imposing the penalty on the delinquent workman, the disciplinary authority must apply its mind to the record of the proceedings including the report of the inquiry officer and then modulate the quantum of punishment. The punishment must be commensurate with the nature and gravity of the misconduct proved against him. Failure to take these materials into account before awarding the punishment may be fatal to the order of punishment. The order of punishment may be vulnerable to judicial review, if it appears that the order has been made by the punishing authority without applying its mind or has been made at the dictates of somebody else but the mere fact that before imposing the punishment, the punishing authority consults the inquiry officer would not vitiate the order of punishment.[30] For instance, in Murari Lal, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the order of dismissal by the works manager (punishing authority) which was set aside by the tribunal on the ground that he had not applied his mind to the facts before ordering the dismissal and he was simply following the suggestions of the director. The Supreme Court found that, the order was passed by the works manager. The mere fact that he had referred to the opinion of the director which was the same as his own opinion, did not mean that he had not formed his own opinion. No exception could be taken to the reference to the opinion of the director.[31]

In Kalindi, the workmen concerned were chargesheeted for four different acts of misconduct. Each one of them was found guilty of the first three charges. The inquiry officer did not record any findings as regards the fourth charge but instead found the workmen guilty of a further misconduct not mentioned in the chargesheet, viz, 'behaving in a riotous and disorderly manner by shouting slogans on the shop-floor'. From the record, however, it was dear that the order of dismissal was based only on the finding that they were guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged in the first three charges. It was, therefore, held that the act of misconduct not mentioned in the chargesheet, was mentioned as one of the items on which the order of dismissal was based. This did not affect the validity of the order because the manager would have made the order of dismissal even leaving the act of misconduct not mentioned in the charge-sheet. In other words, when there is evidence to show that the punishing authority considered charges proved against the concerned workman as serious enough to merit the punishment of dismissal, mere mention of the fourth charge, which was not proved in the formal order of dismissal, would not affect the validity of the dismissal. There was no lack of application of mind.[32]

In Calcutta Jute, the court observed that an order of dismissal may be rightly sustained if it is based on a finding of a charge which the workmen concerned had the opportunity of meeting, even though in the course of inquiry other incidental matters had crept in. Too legalistic a view of minor matters cannot vitiate the order of punishment.[33] On the other hand, in Sur Enamel, the charge against the workman concerned was that he had deliberately caused damage to raw materials in the course of his work. But the order of dismissal, referred entirely to a different misconduct with respect to which no charge had been framed, namely, 'insubordination and disobedience of orders'. The said order was held to be invalid for want of application of mind to the record.[34] In Rashid Ahmad, a conductor was dismissed from service on the basis of two charges, i.e., (i) charging excess fare from the passengers and tearing of the allotment chart; and (ii) misbehaviour with a co-worker. The former was the major charge which was not proved while the latter which was the minor one, was proved. The tribunal passed an order directing reinstament of the workman. In appeal, the Allahabad High Court upheld the order of the tribunal.[35]

In a case, where the employer withdraws the order of dismissal on account of a technical defect, which vitiated only the final order and not the earlier proceedings, then the earlier proceedings upto the stage immediately before the order of dismissal will not be invalid. In other words, the proceedings upto the stage at which the employer reaches the conclusion that the workman should be dismissed, will be thoroughly competent and there will be no infirmity in the proceedings. The withdrawal or the cancellation of the order of dismissal will not mean withdrawal or cancellation of the charges.[36] It is in the sole discretion of the employer to accept an apology from a dismissed workman and reinstate him, for that reason any discrimination or unfair labour practice cannot be presumed.[37] In Dattatray Trimbak Kulkarni, a certain amount of cash was found missing which the cashier reimbursed but the management proceeded departmentally for misappropriation against the cashier and the branch manager, and after holding an inquiry, dismissed the cashier while allowing the branch manager to retire. In a writ petition filed by the cashier on the ground of discrimination, the Bombay High Court held that the fact of reimbursement cannot oust the right of the bank to take disciplinary action against the delinquent. It may be that because of reimbursement, the bank did not criminally prosecute him. The action of the bank in dismissing the cashier while allowing the manager to retire was justified because the past record of the cashier was not without blemish while there was no such blemish on the conduct of the manager.[38]

(c) Reasons

The order imposing the punishment of discharge or dismissal must clearly state the reasons for imposing the punishment because this order has to undergo the scrutiny of the adjudicatory tribunals and the higher courts in judicial review.[39] In Siemens Engg, speaking for the Supreme Court, Bhagwati J said: 'The rules requiring reasons to be given in support of an order is like the principle of audi alteram partem, a basic principle of natural justice which must inform every quasi-judicial process and this rule must be observed in its proper spirit and mere pretence of compliance with it would not satisfy the requirement of law.'[40] In this case, the court was dealing with imposition of custom duty on certain goods under the Indian Customs Act. It was not a case of dismissal. However, in KL Tripathi, dealing with a case of dismissal of an industrial employee, the court distinguished Siemens on facts. The court noticed that though the reasons for the order had not been stated expressly, in the nature of the charges, and in the explanation offered in the response of the employee to the show-cause notice, the reasons appeared to be implicit. In the absence of any denial by the employee of the charges levelled against him, and the admission on the factual basis of the charges by him, the court found that the disciplinary authority had considered the explanation offered by him, in imposing the penalty of dismissal, and held that the conclusion of the disciplinary authority was not unreasonable or one which no reasonable man could make.[41]

In Ram Kumar, the court further pointed out that where the punishing authority agrees with the findings of the inquiry officer and accepts the reasons given by him in respect of such findings, it is not necessary for it again to discuss the evidence for coming to the same conclusion as arrived at by the inquiry officer and give its own reasons for coming to the same conclusion. When the punishing authority accepts the findings of the inquiry officer and the reasons giver, by him in his order, the question of non-compliance with the principles of natural justice would not arise and it would not also be correct to say that the order was not a speaking order.[42] In SSKoshal, the inquiry officer found that out of the six charges levelled against the delinquent employee, charge nos 1 and 5 were proved while charge nos 2, 3 and 6 were not proved. But the disciplinary authority in its final order imposing the punishment, agreed that the finding of the inquiry officer in respect of charge nos 1 and 5 was proved and charge nos 3 and 4 not proved though he disagreed with the finding with respect to charges nos 2 and 6 and held that charge no 2 was fully proved while charge no 6 was partly proved. The Madhya Pradesh High Court held that since the disciplinary authority disagreed with the findings of the inquiry officer in respect of certain charges, it ought to have recorded and communicated the reasons for such disagreement to the delinquent employee. That, having not been done, the order of punishment was vitiated for violation of principles of natural justice.[43]

In K Ashoka, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that if the disciplinary authority disagreed with the findings of the enquiry officer that the delinquent was not found guilty, it would be incumbent upon him to serve a show-cause notice to the delinquent and give him an opportunity of being heard, before imposing any punishment or instituting a fresh enquiry.[44] In Kunj Bihari Misra, the Supreme Court held that where the disciplinary authority disagreed with the findings of the enquiry officer, he should record his tentative reasons for such disagreement and convey the same to the delinquent employee, afford an opportunity to represent before him and then record its findings.[45] In M Raja Rao, the Supreme Court held that it was not necessary for the disciplinary authority to give reasons for agreeing with the conclusions of the enquiry officer. The mere expression 'other relevant factors' used in the order of the disciplinary authority would not necessarily indicate that he had considered other materials than those produced before the enquiry officer, which might require notice thereof being given to the delinquent.[46] In Anil Gilurker, the facts were: the employee who was a Branch Manager of a Grammen Bank was charge-sheeted and suspended pending enquiry for sanctioning loans to a large number of brick-manufacturing units but not disbursing the entire loan amount to the borrowers, and for misappropriating part of the loan amount. The enquiry officer submitted his report holding that the charge of financial corruption against him was not proved. The disciplinary authority disagreed with the findings of the enquiry officer, and proposed to impose the punishment of removal of the appellant along with forfeiture of the contribution of the Bank to the Provident Fund of the appellant under the Staff Regulations. A notice was issued to him to show cause against the proposed punishment of dismissal to which the Manager submitted his reply. Eventually he was dismissed by the disciplinary authority. A single judge of the High Court had set aside the dismissal on the ground that the disciplinary authority did not communicate his disagreement with the report of enquiry officer to the charge-sheeted employee and directed the Bank to reinstate the employee with continuity of service and also pay Rs. 1.5 lakhs to him in lieu of arrears of salary. The said order was quashed by a Division Bench. In appeal, the Supreme Court, speaking through Patnaik J, while setting aside the order of the Division Bench and restoring the order passed by the single judge, observed that an enquiry should be conducted in strict adherence to the statutory provisions and principles of natural justice and the charges should be specific, definite and giving details of the incident which formed the basis of charges and that no enquiry could be sustained on vague charges.[47] In Avinash Bhosale, the brief facts were: some 12 crores fraudulent transactions came to light in the branch of which the employee was the Branch Manager, with the result he was relieved from the branch presumably for his involvement in the said transactions. The employee, on his own, filed a complaint with police requesting them to identify the culprits. The AGM contended that the Branch Manager was not authorised to make a complaint to police, when he himself was involved in the questionable transactions. He was suspended, charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed. In a criminal case filed against him, he was acquitted of criminal conspiracy u/s. 120B thereof and also of culpability. The case took several complex turns and twists before reaching Supreme Court. Dismissing the petition, Nijjar J (for self and Gokhale J) held:

> .. . the failure of the prosecution in producing the necessary evidence before the trial court cannot have any adverse impact on the evidentiary value of the material produced by the Bank before the Inquiry Officer in the departmental proceedings.. .. It is a settled proposition of law that the findings of Inquiry Officer cannot be nullified so long as there is some relevant evidence in support of the conclusions recorded by the Inquiry Officer. In the present case, all the relevant documents were produced in the Inquiry to establish the charges levelled against the appellant. It is a matter of record that the appellant did not doubt the authenticity of the documents produced by the Bank. (para 46). .. The findings recorded by the Enquiry Officer cannot be said to be based on no evidence. In such circumstances, the appellant cannot take any advantage of the findings of innocence recorded by the criminal court. The 'clean chit' given by the learned Magistrate was influenced by the failure of the prosecution to lead the necessary evidence. No advantage of the same can be taken by the appellant in the departmental proceedings. (para 47). .. The extracts reproduced above would clearly indicate that the Disciplinary Authority was alive to all the submissions made by the appellant. The Disciplinary Authority had taken into consideration all the relevant material and only then concluded that the charges have been duly proved against the appellant. Furthermore, it is a matter of record that the appellant was duly supplied a copy of the Inquiry Report and he had submitted detailed objections to the same. These objections were placed before the Disciplinary Authority together with the Inquiry Report. Therefore, the appellant cannot possibly claim that there has been a breach of rule of natural justice. (para 48). .. we find no merit in this appeal and the same is hereby dismissed.[48] (para 50).

In SP Malhotra, the facts were more or less similar to those of Anil Gilurkar (supra), which briefly were: the employee was charge-sheeted for certain acts of misconduct, which included tampering with records, doing unauthorised business against the interests of the bank, misutilising his official position etc. An enquiry was conducted into the charges. The enquiry officer exonerated the delinquent employee of all the charges duly supported by sufficient reasons on every charge. The disciplinary authority partly agreed with the findings on two of the charges, while disagreeing therewith in respect of the other two charges, and imposed the punishment of dismissal. The Appellate Authority, while concurring with the enquiry officer on two of the four charges, dismissed the appeal. A single judge of Punjab and Haryana High Court had set aside the dismissal on the ground that the disciplinary authority, having disagreed with the enquiry officer, did not communicate the reasons for the said disagreement to the employee. However, a Division Bench held that the question of communicating the reasons for disagreement did not arise as, in the wake of the decision in Karunakar, there was no need to issue a show-cause notice before imposing the punishment of dismissal and, in this view of the matter, the dismissal was valid. Setting aside the order of the Division Bench and restoring the order passed by the learned single judge, the Supreme Court, comprising BS Chauhan and SA Bobde JJ, held:

> In fact, not furnishing the copy of the recorded reasons for disagreement from the enquiry report itself causes the prejudice to the delinquent. .. The learned single Judge has concluded the case observing as under:
>
> > The whole process that resulted in dismissal of the petitioner is flawed from his inception and the order of dismissal cannot be sustained. I am examining this case after nearly 23 years after its institution and the petitioner has also attained the age of superannuation. The issue of reinstatement or giving him the benefit of his wages for during the time when he did not serve will not be appropriate. The impugned orders of dismissal are set aside and the petitioner shall be taken to have retired on the date when he would have superannuated and all the terminal benefits shall be worked out and paid to him in 12 weeks on such basis. There shall be, however, no direction for payment of any salary for the period when he did not work.
>
> We do not see any reason to approve the impugned judgment rendered by the Division Bench. Thus, in view of the above, the appeal is allowed. The judgment and order of the Division Bench is set aside and that of the learned single Judge is restored.[49]

(d) Past Record

The Service Rules, Standing Orders or the Shops and Establishments Act applicable to various establishments and undertakings provide guidelines as to what factors should be taken into consideration by the punishing authority before imposing the punishment. Such statutory provisions generally provide that while considering the question of imposing punishment on the delinquent, the employer shall take into account the gravity of the misconduct, the previous record of the employee, if any, and any other extenuating or aggravating circumstances that may exist.[50] In imposing the punishment, such requirements have necessarily to be complied with. In Rama Krishna Steel, the relevant Standing Order provided: 'In awarding punishment under the Standing Order, the employer shall take into account the gravity of the misconduct, the previous record, if any, of the workmen and any other extenuating or aggravating circumstances that may exist'. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that this does not mean that the term 'previous record' in this rule would mean only punishment awarded to the delinquent previously.[51] In other words, apart from any earlier punishment awarded to the delinquent, the past record may indicate his conduct or any other facts or circumstances which may have an extenuating or aggravating effect on the question of punishment. If the order of dismissal based on the charges proved against the delinquent in the domestic inquiry are sufficiently grave to warrant the punishment of dismissal or discharge, the fact that the past record of the workman was clean would be of no consequence, but, on the other hand, if the punishing authority relies on the past record of the delinquent, for imposing punishment, it is incumbent on it to give him an opportunity to offer his explanation regarding such record. Failure to offer such opportunity will vitiate the resulting action.[52] In Madras Fertilizers, the past record of the service of the workman had seriously influenced the mind of the punishing authority on the question of punishment but he was denied opportunity to offer his explanation. The Madras High Court held that the order was vitiated. Speaking for the court, Nainar Sundaram J said:

> ...the vitiating factor was denial of opportunity to the employee to explain the past record of service at the appropriate time. That has nullified the resultant action. Thereafter, the matter has to be viewed untainted by the past record of service. This vitiating factor will not stand mollified by affording an opportunity at the subsequent stage.[53]

In India Marine Service, the workman was charge-sheeted for 'insubordination' which was proved at the domestic inquiry held for the purpose but the order of dismissal recited some other charges also which were not inquired into, and it also recited that the past record of service of the workman was against him. Though the order of dismissal referred to these extraneous matters, from its text, as a whole, it was abundantly clear that the decision of the managing director (punishing authority) to dismiss the workman was based only on the charge of 'insubordination'. It was, therefore, held that from a reference to the past record of the workman in the order of dismissal, it did not follow that it was the effective reason for dismissing him. The managing director came to the conclusion that the service of the workman must be terminated on the basis of the charge proved against him and the one sentence referring to the past record was meant only to give additional weight to the decision already arrived at.[54] In N Chinnaiah, the past conduct of the workman was not put in issue either before the disciplinary authority or the labour court. It was only put into service as an ancillary issue to enable the labour court to weigh the probabilities of the case while evaluating the quantum of punishment. However, the tribunal was solely influenced by the past record of the delinquent and refused to grant any relief to him. A single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the tribunal failed to exercise its jurisdiction vested in it under s 11A.[55]

(e) Quantum of Punishment

It is established law, that imposing punishment for a proved act of misconduct is a matter for the punishing authority to decide and normally it should not be interfered with by industrial tribunals. The tribunal is not required to consider the propriety or adequacy of the punishment. In Hind Construction, Hidayatullah J held:

> But where the punishment is shockingly disproportionate, regard being had to the particular conduct and the past record, or is such as no reasonable employer would ever impose in like circumstances, the tribunal may treat the imposition of such punishment as itself showing victimization or unfair labour practice.[56]

In FICCI, the employer made a mountain out of a mole-hill and had blown a trivial matter into one involving loss of prestige and reputation. In this situation, the punishment was held to be unwarranted.[57] But in Prabhakar Chaturvedi, the court held that the punishment of dismissal for the misconduct of misappropriation of an amount of about Rs 21,000 for a couple of months was not unjustified or grossly disproportionate to the misconduct proved against the delinquent.[58] In Ram Kishan, the delinquent employee was dismissed from service for using abusive language against a superior officer. On the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the court held that the punishment was harsh and disproportionate to the gravity of the charge imputed to the delinquent. Speaking for the court, K Ramaswamy J, observed:

> When abusive language is used by anybody against a superior, it must be understood in the environment in which that person is situated and the circumstances surrounding the event that led to the use of abusive language. No straight-jacket formula could be evolved in adjudging whether the abusive language in the given circumstances would warrant dismissal from service. Each case has to be considered on its own facts.[59]

In the same strain, in BM Patil, a single-judge of the Karnataka High Court observed that in the exercise of discretion, the disciplinary authority should not act like a robot and justice should be moulded with humanism and understanding. It should assess each case on its own merit and each set of facts should be decided with reference to the evidence regarding the allegations which should be the basis of the decision. The past conduct of the worker may be a ground for assuming that he might have a propensity to commit the misconduct and to assess the quantum of punishment to be imposed. The fact that the delinquent had acted in a particular manner on a past occasion does not mean that in the present case also he has acted in the like manner. In this case, a conductor of a bus was dismissed from service for causing a revenue loss of 50 paise to the employer by the irregular sale of tickets. It was held that the punishment was too harsh and disproportionate to the act of misconduct.[60]An industrial tribunal has the discretion to consider the question as to whether the punishment imposed by the employer is shockingly disproportionate to the act of misconduct proved against the delinquent. In the circumstances of this case, the labour court was justified in taking a lenient view and setting aside the order of dismissal and giving direction for reinstatement of the workman with a cut of 75 per cent of the wages upto the date of the award.[61] It is needless to say that the discretion has to be judicially exercised and the tribunal can interfere only when it is satisfied that the punishment imposed by the management is highly disproportionate to the degree of the guilt of the workman.[62] In SBI, an employee of the bank was dismissed from service for misappropriating five rupees without taking into account his blameless service for 17 years. A single judge of the Bombay High Court upheld the award of the tribunal substituting the order of dismissal by an order of reversion of the employee to a lower post without backwages.[63] On the other hand, in Lakshmi Machine Works, the workman engaged in production of textiles spinning machinery was found sleeping behind the cardboard-sheet spread on the floor. In the course of inquiry, his attitude was recalcitrant. The Madras High Court held that sleeping during duty hours by itself might look like a minor misconduct but when viewed in association with a series of other acts of misconduct committed by him in the past, the punishment of dismissal was not unjustified.[64]

(f) Communication of the Decision

The relationship of employer and employee can be effectively terminated 'not merely by the decision of the employer to terminate the employee's service but by the communication of the said decision to the employee',[65] because the punishment becomes effective only from the date when the order is received by the delinquent workman.[66] Therefore, the communication of the order is a necessity for effective termination of the service of a workman. In Kalyani, the order of dismissal of the workman was made on 28 May 1960 and was communicated to him on 30 May 1960 which was taken to be the date of dismissal.[67] A single judge of the Kerala High Court in Kottayam DCMSU, held that the order of discharge or dismissal does not take effect on the day it is prepared or the day on which it is signed. It takes effect when it leaves the hands of the employer on its journey destined towards the employee and cannot be recalled by the employer.[68]

ADJUDICATION

Adjudicatory Jurisdiction

The labour appellate tribunal, in Buckingham and Carnatic,[69] delineated the parameters of the tribunal's jurisdiction to interfere with the hitherto exclusive managerial right of taking disciplinary action against an industrial workman for the first time. It set out four circumstances which would render the managerial action vulnerable, namely:

(i) where there is want of bona fides, or

(ii) when it is a case of victimisation or unfair labour practice or violation of the principles of natural justice, or

(iii) when there is a basic error of facts, or

(iv) when there has been a perverse finding on the materials.

This delineation was adopted by the Supreme Court, with slight modifications, in IISCO, where it authoritatively pronounced that the power of the management to direct its own internal administration and discipline was not unlimited and it was liable to be interfered with by industrial adjudication when a dispute arises 'to see whether the termination of service of a workman is justified and to give appropriate relief. Reverberating the voice of the labour appellate tribunal, the Supreme Court said that industrial adjudication can interfere with the disciplinary action taken by the employer only:

(i) when there was want of good faith;

(ii) when there was victimisation or unfair labour practice;

(iii) when the management had been guilty of a basic error or violation of the principles of natural justice; or

(iv) when on the materials, the finding was completely baseless or perverse. This decision became classic for the justification of tribunal interference with the disciplinary sanctions of discharge or dismissal imposed by industrial employers on delinquent workmen. [70]

The postulates (i) and (ii) of Indian Iron & Steel Co, are addressed to the bona fides of the employer in initiating the action and inflicting the punishment. In other words, the employer is required to act bona fide in initiating the disciplinary action as well in inflicting the punishment. In initiating the action, the alleged act of misconduct should not be a ruse for something else, such as the trade union activities of the workman or the employer's dislike of the workman for some personal reasons etc. Furthermore, the action should not be motivated by vindictiveness or ulterior purposes, so as to smack of victimisation or unfair labour practice. Likewise, in the matter of inflicting punishment also the employer should act fairly. If the punishment is so shockingly disproportionate to the act of misconduct as no reasonable man would ever impose, that itself may lead to an inference of mala fides, victimisation or unfair labour practice. The postulates (iii) and (iv) are addressed to domestic inquiry. In holding the inquiry, the inquiry officer must comply with the rules of natural justice which means, the inquiry officer must be an unbiased person and he must give reasonable opportunity to both sides of being heard. Furthermore, his findings should not be baseless or perverse, ie, such as a reasonable man, from the materials on record, could never arrive at. Subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court,[71] and High Courts,[72] have only elaborated and clarified some of the implications of this decision, without however, working out the details of its scope with precision. In some cases, the Supreme Court observed that the question of victimisation or the management being biased against a workman would not arise once it is held that the finding of misconduct alleged against the employee was properly arrived at and the domestic inquiry was in no way vitiated.[73] This is an over simplification of the matter. These cases cannot be read to mean that when the inquiry has been held to be valid, the tribunal is barred from going into the complaint of mala fides of the employer in the matter of initiating the disciplinary action and inflicting the punishment. in Hind Construction, Hidayatullah J held that even if the inquiry is proper and valid, if the punishment is shockingly disproportionate, the tribunal may treat the imposition of such punishment as itself showing victimisation or unfair labour practice.[74]

In Ved Prakash Gupta, the court set aside the order of dismissal of the workman who was dismissed on the charge of abusing a worker and an officer of the employer, with the observation that the punishment was shockingly disproportionate, regard being had to the charge framed against him.[75] The Andhra Pradesh High Court in Radhakrishna Murthy, held that the punishment of dismissal for the misconduct of cheating the company by claiming medical benefit on a false medical certificate for the treatment of his wife was not shockingly disproportionate to the misconduct. Furthermore, the punishment neither amounted to victimisation nor unfair labour practice. Nor was it such as no responsible employer would ever impose in the circumstances of the case.[76] On the other hand, a single judge of the same High Court in VK Durga, held that the punishment of removal of the workman from service for manipulating the entries in the weighing register from where he did not gain any money, was unreasonable and disproportionately harsh.[77] In Nagendrappa, a bus conductor of the state road transport corporation was dismissed for failure to issue tickets to some passengers resulting in a loss of Rs 35.10 to the corporation. On the facts and in the circumstances of the case, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that the punishment was not proportionate to the act of misconduct and the labour court was justified to direct reinstatement.[78]

The adjudicatory jurisdiction dealing with the disciplinary cases was confined merely to see whether the employer did not act mala fide in the manner of initiating the action and inflicting the punishment, and the inquiry officer had not violated the rules of natural justice and his findings were not baseless or perverse. In the absence of these infirmities, it was beyond the reach of the tribunal to interfere with the managerial action. The questions, whether the material before the inquiry officer was adequate or not or whether a particular witness, upon whom reliance was placed by the inquiry officer, should have been believed or not, were for the consideration of the inquiry officer.[79] In Ram Swarath Sinha, the labour appellate tribunal recognised the right of the management to ask for permission to adduce evidence for the first time before the tribunal to justify its action in a 'no-inquiry' case.[80] Following this decision, the right of the employer to defend the action not only on the basis of the domestic inquiry but also to justify the punishment of discharge or dismissal on merits by adducing relevant evidence before the tribunal has been recognised by the Supreme Court as well. Consequently, the right of the workman to plead all infirmities in the domestic inquiry, if one has been held to attack the order of dismissal on all grounds available to him in law and on facts, has also been recognised.[81] In Motipur Sugar, it was held that a case of 'defective-inquiry' stands on the same footing as 'no inquiry' and, in either case, the tribunal will have jurisdiction to go into the merits of the case on the basis of the evidence adduced before it by the parties, but in such cases, the employer would not have the benefit which he has in case of a valid domestic inquiry. Wanchoo J observed:

> The entire matter would be open before the tribunal which will have jurisdiction, 'to satisfy itself on the facts adduced before it by the employer whether the discharge or dismissal was justified...if the inquiry is defective or no inquiry has been held...the entire case would be open before the tribunal. The employer would have to justify on the facts as well that its order of discharge or dismissal was proper ...and in either case the tribunal would have jurisdiction to go into the facts and the employer would have to satisfy the tribunal that in fact, the order of discharge or dismissal was proper'.[82]

In such cases, it is open to the tribunal to consider the merits of the dispute and come to its own conclusion on appreciation of the evidence before it without having any regard for the view taken by the management in dismissing the workman.[83] It is irrelevant whether the workman withdrew from the inquiry or participated in it, the decision has to be on the appraisal of evidence, and if it is found that the inquiry was not proper, the whole case would be open before the tribunal to decide for itself, whether the charge of misconduct was proved and what punishment should be awarded.[84] It is open to the employer to rely upon the domestic inquiry conducted by him and satisfy the tribunal that there is no infirmity attached to the same and he has also the further right to justify, on facts as well, that the order of dismissal or discharge was proper.[85] However, when the employer chooses to adduce evidence before the tribunal to justify his action, the workman will have the opportunity to rebut such evidence. If the employer fails to avail himself of such an opportunity, it will be open to the tribunal to make an appropriate award and the employer will, therefore, not be able to make the grievance on that score.[86] In Bharat Sugar Mills, after holding that the domestic inquiry was invalid, the tribunal allowed the employer to adduce evidence to justify its action. In appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the contention of the workman that once the tribunal had held the domestic inquiry to be defective, it had no option but to set aside the order of dismissal and it could not allow the employer to adduce evidence before it to justify his action. It would neither be just to the management nor fair to the workman himself that the tribunal should refuse to take evidence and thereby drive the management to pass through the gamut of holding an inquiry all over again and deprive the workman of the benefit of the tribunal itself being satisfied on the evidence adduced before it that he was not guilty of the alleged misconduct.[87] In Ritz Theatre, apart from defending its action on the basis of the domestic inquiry, the management further adduced evidence to justify its action on merits as well but without looking into the validity of the inquiry, the tribunal set aside the action of the management on the basis of the evidence adduced before it. In appeal, the Supreme Court accepted the plea of the employer that the tribunal should have first considered the validity of the domestic inquiry and only in case it came to the conclusion that the inquiry was improper or invalid that it could have gone into the merits of the case on the basis of the evidence adduced before it.[88]

In RK Jain, it was held that, if the management defends its action solely on the basis that the domestic inquiry held by it is proper and valid and if the tribunal holds against the management on that point, the management will fail. On the other hand, if the management relies not only on the validity of the domestic inquiry, but also adduces evidence before the tribunal justifying its action, it is open to the tribunal to accept the evidence adduced by the management. It is essentially a matter for the management to decide about the stand that it proposes to take before the tribunal. It is the right of the management to sustain its order by adducing independent evidence before the tribunal' and it was 'a right given to the management and it is for the management to avail itself of the said opportunity.[89] In Ludh Budh Singh, the court emphasised that when no inquiry has been held by an employer or when the inquiry has been found to be defective, the employer has got the right to adduce evidence before the tribunal justifying his action.[90] In AVP(C) Ltd, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that where the workman contended that the conclusion reached by the inquiry officer was perverse, it would not be open either for the management to ask for or for the tribunal to grant, opportunity to the employer to supplement or improve the evidence adduced by him at the domestic inquiry.[91] On the other hand, a single judge of the Madras High Court in India FDS, took the view that the right of the management to adduce additional evidence is not restricted to cases of no inquiry or defective inquiry alone but can as well be exercised even where the findings of the inquiry officer are perverse.[92] Between the two, the Madras High Court was right and Kerala High Court is clearly wrong. The conclusions of domestic inquiry may be vitiated either for non-compliance of rules of natural justice or for perversity. In any case, the inquiry will be vitiated. It is well settled that a vitiated inquiry is equated with no inquiry. The right of the employer to adduce evidence in such a situation is well-recognised. The decision of the Kerala High Court, therefore, runs counter to the ratio of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the undernoted cases.[93]

A question of procedural relevance which engaged the attention of the courts is "whether the tribunal could suo motu call for the evidence of the employer on merits to justify the disciplinary action where the validity of the domestic inquiry is in question or is it for the employer to ask for an opportunity to lead evidence? A further corollary to this question is if it is for the employer to ask for such opportunity, at what stage of the proceedings before the tribunal is he to make the request? A single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court, took the view that if the management or workman do not seek to adduce any evidence or do not request the tribunal for an opportunity to lead evidence, the tribunal cannot compel the parties to lead evidence. It is not the duty of the tribunal to compel the parties before it to adduce evidence. The only duty that it has, is to receive evidence when it is offered by the parties. As it was not the grievance of either party that they had attempted to adduce some evidence before the tribunal, which it refused to receive, no fault could be found with the order of the tribunal.[94] A similar view was taken by the Orissa High Court, holding that there was no obligation in law on the part of the tribunal to indicate its mind about the infirmity of the inquiry at any stage before it gave its findings in the award.[95] In Premnath Motors, a preliminary issue with respect to the validity of inquiry had, in fact, been raised by the employer by making an application. After holding the inquiry to be invalid, the tribunal refused to go into the merits of the case. By an elaborate and logical process of reasoning, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that after coming to the conclusion that the domestic inquiry was invalid, the tribunal must give an opportunity to the employer as well as to the workman to adduce additional evidence, pro and con the order of dismissal. In such cases, the tribunal is not to content itself by merely quashing the inquiry, but it must proceed to consider the merits of the charge against the workman on the basis of the documentary and oral evidence adduced before it. He, therefore, took the view that it is for the tribunal to direct the employer to adduce evidence after finding an inquiry to be invalid rather than for the employer to ask for an opportunity to lead evidence.[1]

Where the labour court proceeded to decide the case on merits without first deciding the preliminary issue of 'validity of enquiry' and passed a two-in-one order, i.e., hearing both the preliminary issue and merits, the Madras High Court, had set the order aside and remanded the matter back to the labour court to decide the preliminary issue first.[2] In Madhya Pradesh SRTC, it was held that, after coming to the conclusion that the inquiry was invalid, the tribunal suo motu should give an opportunity to the employer to prove the merits of the charge by adducing relevant evidence.[3] A similar view was also taken by the Calcutta High Court in Fort William.[4] However, the Madhya Pradesh and the Calcutta High Courts did not support their holding by any reasoning but contented themselves by making a general statement. The dicta of the Orissa, the Madhya Pradesh and the Delhi High Courts were cursorily touched upon by the Supreme Court in RK Jain, where it disagreed with the view of the Madhya Pradesh and Delhi High Courts and agreed with the view of the Orissa High Court, without however attempting to reconcile the apparent conflict in their observations.[5] In other words, it was for the employer to ask for an opportunity to adduce evidence in support of his action and there was no obligatory duty, in law, on the tribunal to offer an opportunity to the employer, irrespective of whether he asked for it or not. Commenting on this holding, the court observed that in that case, there was no question of an opportunity to adduce evidence having been denied by the tribunal as the employer had made no such request and the contention that the tribunal suo motu should have given an opportunity to the employer to adduce evidence was not accepted in such cirumstances.[6] In PP Mundhe, after holding the inquiry to be invalid, the labour court had set aside the order of dismissal because the employer had not led evidence before it on the merits of the action. In appeal, the Supreme Court had to consider the question whether any duty is cast upon the tribunal to give an opportunity to the employer after holding the domestic inquiry to be invalid and whether failure to do so would vitiate the award but instead of addressing itself to this question, the court indicated the appropriate stage at which the opportunity has to be given to the employer to adduce additional evidence.[7]

Glossing on this decision, in Shankar Chakravarti, Desai J observed that it was not an authority for the proposition that the tribunal, as a matter of law, must first frame preliminary issue and proceed to decide the validity or otherwise of the inquiry and then serve a fresh notice on the employer by calling upon him to adduce further evidence to sustain the charges ifhe so chooses to do.[8] He further observed that PP Mundhe does not, in any way, overrule the decisions in RK Jain and Ludh Budh Singh cases. In this case, relying on the observations in Cooper Engineering, an argument was built before the court that there was an obligatory duty on the tribunal, irrespective of the fact whether there is any such request to that effect or not, to raise a preliminary issue as to whether the domestic inquiry alleged to have been held by the employer is proper or defective and then record a formal finding on it and if the finding is in favour of the workman, the employer should be called upon which he must demonstrate on record, without waiting for such request or demand or pleading from the employer, to adduce further evidence to sustain the charge of misconduct, if he so chooses. The court rejected the contention and held that the right to adduce additional evidence to sustain the action before the tribunal, must be.availed of by the employer by making a request in the pleadings or before the proceedings are concluded. If such a request is made in the pleadings, the tribunal must give such opportunity. Even if the request is made before the proceedings are concluded, the tribunal should, ordinarily, grant the opportunity but if no such request is made by the employer, to substantiate the charges to sustain the action of dismissal in the pleadings or in the course of proceedings, no duty is cast on the tribunal to suo motu call upon the employer to adduce such evidence. The request to adduce evidence in support of reasons to sustain the disciplinary action has to be specific and mere filing of documents will not constitute such reasons.[9] In Ludh Budh Singh, Vaidialingam J held:

> ...the management should avail itself of the said opportunity by making a suitable request to the tribunal before proceedings are closed. If no such opportunity has been availed of, or asked for by the management, before the proceedings are closed, the employer can make no grievance that the tribunal did not provide such an opportunity.[10]

The above observation is based on his earlier decision in RK Jain, to the effect:

> It should be remembered that when an order of punishment by way of dismissal or termination of service is affected by the management, the issue that is referred is whether the management was justified in discharging and terminating the service of the workman concerned and whether the workman is entitled to any relief ...There may be cases where an inquiry has been held preceding the order of termination or there may have been no inquiry at all. But the dispute that will be referred is not whether the domestic inquiry has been conducted properly or not by the management, but the larger question whether the order of termination, dismissal or the order imposing punishment on the workman concerned is justified...The point to be noted is that the inquiry that is conducted by the tribunal is a composite inquiry regarding the order which is under challenge. [11]

In PP Mundhe (supra), the court posed the question: 'what is the appropriate stage which was specifically adverted to in Ludh Budh Singh, which we are now required to seriously consider whether this conclusion is correct and ensures justice to all concerned in an industrial adjudication?' Answering the question, the court observed:

> In our considered opinion, it will be most unnatural and unpractical to expect a party to take a definite stand when a decision of jurisdictional fact has first to be reached by the labour court prior to embarking upon an inquiry to decide the dispute on its merits. The reference involves determination of the larger issue of discharge or dismissal and not merely whether a correct procedure had been followed by the management before passing the order of dismissal...We are, therefore, clearly of opinion that when a case of dismissal or discharge of an employee is referred for industrial adjudication, the labour court should first decide as preliminary issue; whether the domestic inquiry has violated the principles of natural justice. When there is no domestic inquiry or defective inquiry is admitted by the employer, there will be no difficulty but when the matter is in controversy between the parties, that question must be decided as a preliminary issue. On that decision being pronounced, it will be for the management to decide whether it will adduce any evidence before the labour court. If it chooses not to adduce any evidence, it will not be thereafter permissible in any proceeding to raise the issue.[12]

The guidelines provided by the dicta of the Supreme Court lay down that the employer must seek the opportunity to sustain his action diligently by leading evidence without undue delay. Such a request must be bona fide and should not be filed at the belated stage so as to prejudice the interest of the worker. It should not also be calculated to break the morale of the worker through financial stress by adopting dilatory tactics. It should also not have the effect of further delaying the proceedings, If it is shown that the request of the employer is tainted with any of these defects or some such similar defects, the tribunal may decline to grant permission,[13] but if the request does not suffer from any such vice it is the duty of the tribunal to permit the employer to lead such evidence if a request is made at the proper stage. When such an opportunity is asked for, the tribunal has no power to refuse. Giving of an opportunity to an employer to adduce evidence for the first time before the tribunal is, in the interest both of the management, and the employee, to enable the tribunal to be satisfied about the alleged misconduct.[14] Failure to do that will be violative of the rules of natural justice. However, when such an opportunity is given to the employer to exercise his right to sustain his action by adducing evidence before the tribunal, it is equally the right of the workman to plead all infirmities in the order of dismissal and also to attack it in on all other grounds available to him in law and on facts.[15] Once the workman is given full opportunity to rebut and demolish the employer's case, there would be no question of any prejudice being caused to him. Nor would there be any prejudice, resulting in injustice caused to him. The pertinent question is whether any injustice has been done to any party. In the absence of any injustice, a mere technical error in the procedure will not vitiate the findings of the tribunal.[16] It is not possible to appreciate the observations of Varadarajan J that if the request of the employer is not incorporated in the initial pleadings, it may 'result in delay which will lead to wrecking the morale of the workman and compel him to surrender which may not otherwise do'. This is seeing a ghost in every mulberry bush.

In Rajendra Jha, a three judge Bench of the court did not follow the norms laid down in Shankar Chakravarty and Shambhu Nath Goyal cases. In this case, the employer had filed an application under s 33(2)(b) for 'approval' of the action of dismissal of the workman but in that application, the employer had not asked, alternatively, for an opportunity to lead evidence to justify the order of dismissal in case the inquiry was found to be defective. Nor had it asked for such opportunity in its rejoinder to the written statement of the workman putting the validity of the domestic inquiry in issue. However, by about the time the hearing of the employer was coming to a close, it requested the labour court orally for permission to adduce evidence in support of the action of dismissal of the workman. By a composite order, the labour court held that the domestic inquiry was invalid and also granted permission to the employer to adduce evidence to justify the dismissal of the workman. The Supreme Court discountenanced the contention of the workman that the labour court had acted on its own initiative in allowing the employer to lead evidence and held that the labour court had, in fact, granted an oral request of the employer in allowing him the opportunity to adduce evidence to justify the action of dismissal. This holding puts the law in its proper perspective. Neither the court insisted that the request of the employer must be in writing nor that it must be incorporated in the pleadings. The permission granted by the labour court to the employer to adduce evidence to sustain its action, on its oral request about the time the hearing of the application was coming to a close, was held to be justified.[17]

In Basu Deba Das, the employer had not filed the application for grant of permission to lead evidence for justifying the order of dismissal but he had made the application for adducing the evidence to which the other side did not raise any objection. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the labour court was justified in granting permission.[18] A single judge of the Patna High Court in Lalu Mahto, has observed that it is not necessary for the labour court to record a finding that a prayer was made by the employer that he should be given an opportunity to justify his action by adducing evidence, because it is a matter of procedure and no finding is specifically required to be recorded. The court also put the burden on the workmen to show by pleading or an affidavit that the employer had not made any prayer.[19] In Desh Raj Gupta, the Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the Allahabad High Court to the effect that the employer factually had made a request to the tribunal to permit it to justify its order of punishment. In these circumstances, the court held that the tribunal neither committed any illegality nor any impropriety in directing the employer to justify its action. The tribunal also gave a chance to the workman of impugning the action of the employer. The tribunal therefore acted in the interest of the workman and not to his detriment, and further held that the workman could not have made any grievance of the conduct of the tribunal.[20]

In Chhatia Weaving Mills, the Orissa High Court held that it is not obligatory on the tribunal to frame preliminary issue on the question whether the inquiry was fair and proper, because the law does not enjoin on it to decide whether the inquiry was fair and proper, and then to grant opportunity to the management to adduce evidence if the finding on inquiry went against it. There is no obligation on the tribunal to decide the dispute under reference piece-meal. If anything, the courts have deprecated such delaying tactics on the part of the employers.[21] The Mysore High Court had to deal with a converse case where the workman contested the order of dismissal on the grounds of mala fides, victimisation and unfair labour practice and sought the permission of the tribunal to substantiate these pleas by leading evidence. The tribunal permitted the workman to lead evidence only in support of his plea of victimisation. This order of the tribunal was challenged in a writ petition before the High Court by the employer on the ground that by permitting the workman to lead evidence on the question of victimisation, the tribunal had exceeded the jurisdiction conferred on it by law as he could not be permitted to lead evidence touching the validity of the domestic inquiry. Though the High Court recognised the right of the workman to establish the pleas of mala fides, bias, victimisation or unfair labour practice, by leading independent evidence before the tribunal, it held that such right is not an unqualified one and stated:

> In such cases, the workman can lead evidence in support of the aforesaid allegations if he satisfies the tribunal that either he did not know the facts on which he relies or that he was prevented by sufficient reason to lead evidence when the domestic inquiry was pending. To hold otherwise would amount to a denial of the right given to the workman to demonstrate that the inquiry is vitiated for one or the other reasons...[22]

After holding that the domestic inquiry is invalid, the tribunal will have to give the employer an opportunity to adduce additional evidence if the request is made at the proper time. The tribunal will also give a similar opportunity to the employee to lead evidence,[23] but the tribunal cannot rely on the evidence in favour of any party which was adduced in the very domestic inquiry which is held invalid. If the tribunal relies on such evidence; it is procedural irregularity and the tribunal is deprived of the opportunity of observing demeanour of the witnesses and the opposite party is deprived of the opportunity to cross examine the witnesses before the tribunal.[24] After taking the evidence of both the parties, if the adjudicator finds that the act of misconduct is not proved, the question of punishment will not arise because the punishment can only be for an act of misconduct. It is not open to him to sustain the punishment on new grounds,[25] but if he finds that the act of misconduct alleged against the workman is proved, he will proceed to consider the question of punishment. In Surat Singh, a single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that the power to alter the punishment is to be exercised only in a case where the punishment is so harsh as to suggest victimisation. In this case, the labour court had not recorded any finding of victimisation, and the award was singularly silent, not only on this aspect but also on the broader aspect whether it would be prudent to reinstate the workman.[26]

(a) Scope of Jurisdiction of Labour Courts under Section 11A

In Firestone, the Supreme Court interpreted the provisions of s 11A in the light of the law emerging out of its earlier dicta prior to its insertion, though without making an attempt to reconcile or even showing awareness of the conflicting statements in them. Summing up the law, the court adumbrated the following guidelines:

(1) The right to take disciplinary action and to decide upon the quantum of punishment are mainly managerial functions, but if a dispute is referred to a tribunal, the latter has power to see if the action of the employer is justified.

(2) Before imposing the punishment, an employer is expected to conduct a proper inquiry in accordance with the provisions of the Standing Orders, if applicable, and principles of natural justice. The inquiry should not be an empty formality.

(3) When a proper inquiry has been held by an employer, and the finding of misconduct is a plausible conclusion flowing from the evidence adduced at the said inquiry, the tribunal has no jurisdiction to sit in judgment over the decision of the employer as an appellate body. The interference with the decision of the employer will be justified only when the findings arrived at in the inquiry are perverse or the management is guilty of victimisation, unfair labour practice or mala fides.

(4) Even if no inquiry has been held by an employer or if the inquiry held by him is found to be defective, the tribunal in order to satisfy itself about the legality and validity of the order, has to give an opportunity to the employer and the employee to adduce evidence before it. It is open to the employer to adduce evidence for the first time justifying his action; and it is open to the employee to adduce evidence contra.[27]

(5) The effect of an employer not holding an inquiry is that the tribunal would not have to consider only whether there was a prima facie case. On the other hand, the issue about the merits of the impugned order of dismissal or discharge is at large before the tribunal, and the latter, on the evidence adduced before it, has to decide for itself whether the misconduct alleged is proved. In such cases, the point about the exercise of managerial functions does not arise at all. A case of defective inquiry stands on the same footing as no inquiry.

(6) The tribunal gets jurisdiction to consider the evidence placed before it for the first time in justification of the action taken only if no inquiry has been held or after the inquiry conducted by an employer is found to be defective.

(7) It has never been recognised that the tribunal should straightaway, without anything more, direct reinstatement of a dismissed or discharged employee, once it is found that no domestic inquiry has been held or the said inquiry is found to be defective.

(8) An employer, who wants to avail himself of the opportunity of adducing evidence for the first time before the tribunal to justify his action, should ask for it at the appropriate stage. If such an opportunity is asked for, the tribunal has no power to refuse. The giving of an opportunity to an employer to adduce evidence for the first time before the tribunal is in the interest of both the management and the employee and to enable the tribunal itself to be satisfied about the alleged misconduct.

(9) Once the misconduct is proved either in the inquiry conducted by an employer or by the evidence placed before a tribunal for the first time, punishment imposed cannot be interfered with by the tribunal except in cases where the punishment is so harsh as to suggest victimisation.

(10) In a particular case, after setting aside the order of dismissal, whether a workman should be reinstated or paid compensation is, as held by this court in Management of Panitole Tea Estate v Workmen (supra), within the judicial discretion of a labour court or tribunal. The above was the law as laid down by this court as on 15 December 1971 applicable to all industrial adjudication arising out of orders of dismissal or discharge.[28]

These guidelines have ever since been followed by the Supreme Court,[29] and the High Courts,[30] in subsequent cases. In the following paragraphs, effort has been made to present the up-to-date evolution of the law by discussing the leading cases, applying these guidelines to various fact situations and explaining and elaborating their implications. The limitations on tribunal jurisdiction, as delineated in Indian Iron and Steel Co case, have now been removed by the legislature. Previously, where the employer had held a proper and valid domestic inquiry before passing the order of punishment, the tribunal had no power to interfere with its findings on the misconduct recorded in the domestic inquiry unless it was vitiated by one or other infirmities pointed out in Indian Iron & Steel Co. The conduct of the disciplinary proceedings and imposition of the punishment were all considered to be managerial functions with which the tribunal had no power to interfere unless the findings were perverse or the punishment was so harsh as to lead to an inference of victimisation or unfair labour practice. Now this position no longer holds the field. The words, 'in the course of adjudication proceedings, the labour court, tribunal or national tribunal...is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal was not justified' clearly indicate that the tribunal now is clothed with the power to reappraise the evidence adduced in the domestic inquiry and satisfy itself whether the evidence relied on by the employer establishes the misconduct alleged against a workman. It is however relevant to note that the 'basic rule of appreciation of evidence is that anything, which ought to have been stated at the earliest opportunity, if not stated, should be treated as an after-thought' and 'courts are slow to accept after-thoughts as genuine or believable'.[31] Therefore, what was originally a plausible conclusion that could be drawn by an inquiry officer from the evidence, has now given place to the satisfaction being arrived at by the tribunal that the finding on the misconduct is correct. The tribunal now is at liberty to consider not only whether the finding on the misconduct recorded by an employer in the domestic inquiry is correct, but also to differ from that finding if a proper case is made out. Therefore, what was in the realm of satisfaction of the employer, has ceased to be so and now it is the satisfaction of the tribunal that finally decides the matter.[32]

Even in cases, where an inquiry has been held by the employer and a finding on the misconduct is arrived at, the tribunal can differ with the findings in a proper case to hold that no misconduct is proved. To come to the conclusion either way, the tribunal will have to reappraise the evidence for itself the tribunal may hold that the misconduct itself is not proved or that the misconduct proved does not warrant the punishment of dismissal or discharge. The jurisdiction to interfere with the punishment is also not confined only to the cases where the punishment is shockingly disproportionate to the act of misconduct. Now the tribunal has to see whether the punishment imposed by the employer is commensurate with the gravity of the act of misconduct committed by the delinquent workman. In either case, where necessary, the tribunal may set aside the order of discharge or dismissal and direct reinstatement with or without any terms or conditions as it may think fit or give any other relief including award of lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal, as the circumstances of the case may warrant.[33] Now the tribunal has the jurisdiction and power of substituting its own measure of punishment in place of the managerial wisdom, once it is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal is not justified on facts and in the circumstances of the case.[34]

In General Employees Union, a single judge of the Bombay High Court said that s 11A specifically gives two-fold power to the industrial adjudicator. 'First is virtually the power of appeal against findings of facts made by the inquiry officer in his report with regard to the adequacy of the evidence and the conclusion on facts. The second and the far more important, is the power of reappraisal of the quantum of punishment'. In this case, the court set aside the order of the discharge of the workman from service for the act of preaching gospel of 'go-slow' and held that reinstatement with one-third backwages from the date of discharge order till the date of reinstatement should be condign in the circumstances.[35] Likewise, in Mohan Sugan Naik, a Division Bench of the same court interfered with the quantum of punishment by substituting the order of dismissal with an order of reinstatement without backwages. In this case, the workman had been dismissed for the misconduct of threatening the inquiry officer that he would be stabbed in case he proceeded with the inquiry. Though the Bench noted that the material on record established that the workman had, in fact, given the threat and also observed that such threat is quite a serious misconduct, yet it held that the misconduct did not warrant maximum punishment of dismissal from service.[36] It is submitted, that the rationale of this decision that the threat of stabbing the inquiry officer did not warrant the punishment of dismissal, is wholly misconceived. Does the Bench suggest that the actual act of stabbing would be necessary in order to sustain an action of dismissal? It is, however, relevant to note that this section was not intended to cause embarrassment to the management by interfering with the punishment imposed by it, even in cases of grave nature.[37]

The decision of the tribunal on the preliminary issue that the domestic inquiry was properly held and was valid does not mean that the order of dismissal or discharge is justified. Such finding does not bar the tribunal from going into the merits of the case.[38] It is, therefore, open to the tribunal to go into the questions that the findings recorded by the inquiry officer are perverse or the imposition of the punishment is not warranted.[39] The onus of proof to establish that the action taken by the employer is bad in law in the absence of an inquiry or due to defective inquiry, if any, is on the workman. Therefore, it is for the workman to adduce evidence, and the employer then, may controvert the same, if necessary. The tribunal must hear and decide the preliminary issue regarding the validity or invalidity of the domestic inquiry first.[40] In Firestone, the court rejected the contention on behalf of the workmen that if the employer has not held a valid domestic inquiry or held no inquiry at all before imposing the punishment, the tribunal must order reinstatement of the workman on that ground alone. In other words, the employer had no right to adduce evidence to sustain the disciplinary action before the tribunal once the inquiry held by him was found to be invalid or he had held no inquiry at all. Therefore, reinstatement as a sequitur, must follow. The court observed that there was no indication in the section that the right of the employer to sustain his disciplinary action by adducing evidence before the tribunal was abrogated. If that was the intention of the legislature, to do away with this right, the section would have been differently worded. Neither are there express words to that effect nor is there any indication that the section has impliedly changed the law in that respect. Therefore, the position even now is that the employer is entitled to adduce evidence for the first time before the tribunal, even if he had held no inquiry or the inquiry held by him is found to be defective; of course an opportunity will have to be given to the workman to lead evidence contra. If no domestic inquiry has been held by the management or if the management makes it clear that it does not rely upon the domestic inquiry, it is entitled to straightaway lead evidence before the tribunal and the tribunal is bound to consider the evidence as adduced before it on merits and give a decision thereon. In other words, it is open to the management to rely on the inquiry and alternatively to advance a contention that if the inquiry is found not proper, it should be given an opportunity to lead additional evidence but merely because the employer has taken such a stand, the labour court cannot jump to the conclusion that the inquiry was not held properly and in a fair manner. In a case where the employer has sought an opportunity to adduce evidence, it cannot just be ignored on the ground that it will be a sheer exercise in futility.[41]

It is then open to the tribunal to deal with the validity of the domestic inquiry if one has been held as a preliminary issue. If its finding on the subject is in favour of the management, then there will be no occasion for additional evidence being cited by the management. A priori where the domestic inquiry is found to have been properly held, neither the employer nor the employee shall have the right to produce further evidence before the tribunal to support or demolish the finding of guilt recorded nor to sustain the quantum of punishment imposed as a result of the domestic inquiry. It is relevant to note that in the absence of a clear cut finding to the effect that the order of dismissal or discharge is not justified being unsustainable or perverse, it would not be permissible for the tribunal to permit the employer to adduce evidence before it to sustain the action of dismissal or discharge.[42] In all such cases, the tribunal shall be competent to reappraise evidence recorded in the domestic inquiry, not only for upholding or upsetting the finding of guilt recorded by the inquiry officer but also with a view to determine whether or not the punishment was commensurate with the gravity of the charge made against the delinquent workman. In extreme cases, additional evidence has been accepted in addition to the evidence already on record by the management even when the domestic inquiry was found valid. It is a matter of the discretion of the tribunal just like an appellate court, which if satisfied that such evidence is to be laid to advance justice, there is no bar for the same even though a party has no right to adduce evidence to support or demolish the findings but if the finding is against the management, the tribunal will have to give it an opportunity to cite additional evidence justifying its action. This right of the employer to sustain its action by adducing independent evidence before the tribunal in a no inquiry or invalid inquiry case has been given judicial recognition over a long period of years.[43]

If the preliminary issue is decided against the employer, then the burden shifts and squarely lies on the employer to show by adducing evidence on merits that the action taken against the workman is justified. He has to lead evidence first to establish the case on merits and the workman will then lead evidence, if necessary, to controvert the same. But for adducing evidence on merits, after the preliminary issue is decided against the employer, the employer must have made-a prayer for adducing such evidence at the appropriate stage. Once the domestic inquiry is set aside by the labour court, no fresh inquiry can be started by the employer unless it has been set aside purely for legal lacuna.[44] When such evidence is adduced for the first time, it is the tribunal which has to be satisfied on such evidence about the guilt or otherwise of the delinquent workman. The law, that under such circumstances, the issue about the merits of the impugned order of dismissal or discharge is before the tribunal at large and that it has to decide for itself whether the misconduct alleged is proved, continues to have full effect. It is well-settled that when no domestic inquiry is held or the domestic inquiry has been found to be defective, the tribunal has complete jurisdiction to deal with the entire gamut of the controversy between the parties. In other words in such a situation, the tribunal itself has to hold a full scale inquiry in which the employer has not only to prove the alleged misconduct against the workman but also has to satisfy that on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the imposition of the punishment was justified.[45] In such a situation, the exercise of managerial functions does not arise at all. In Mgmt. of TUCS, a single judge of Madras High Court held that if the management fails to make the plea before the labour court that the validity of the domestic inquiry be tried as a preliminary issue, it cannot raise the plea before the High Court in a writ petition, and, in the absence of an application, there is no duty cast on the labour court to adopt an advisory role by informing the petitioner of his rights.[46] Reproduced below is the observation of Shaman Kumar Sen J of Calcutta High Court in SMukherjee on the true import of s 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act. The learned judge observed:

> The judgment and decision in Workmen of Firestone's case (supra) only lays down the principle that under section 11-A if the inquiry was not properly conducted by the employer, it will be open to the employee to lead further evidence before the Tribunal to establish that the domestic inquiry is invalid. Since in the instant case, the Tribunal itself came to the finding that the domestic inquiry was not properly conducted, there is no question of taking further evidence by the Tribunal itself. The Tribunal was therefore not justified in allowing fresh evidence to be adduced by the employer when there is already a finding by the Tribunal after consideration of evidence that the domestic inquiry was invalid. If the domestic inquiry is found to be invalid by the Tribunal then the dismissal also becomes bad on the basis of the said finding of the domestic inquiry.[47] (emphasis added).

The above observations merit detailed analysis in the context of the law laid down by the Supreme Court in Firestone case. In the first place, if the domestic inquiry conducted by the employer was round to be improper, then applying the Firestone ratio, the onus to adduce additional evidence in support of dismissal lies on the employer, and not on the employee. In other words, by leading additional evidence to the satisfaction of the tribunal, the employer can still sustain the action of dismissal, but to say that, in the event of an improperly held domestic inquiry, 'the employee can lead further evidence before the tribunal to prove that the inquiry is invalid' is like putting the cart before the horse. Why should the onus be on the employee to lead additional evidence to establish the invalidity of the inquiry, which in any case is a finding of fact recorded in his favour by the tribunal? After all, by adducing additional evidence, the employee is not going to prove that the inquiry held by his employer is exponentially invalid. Secondly, the question of taking further evidence would arise only after the tribunal has recorded a preliminary finding that the domestic inquiry was not properly held. If the domestic inquiry is found unassailable in every respect, where is the need for the employer to adduce any further evidence, and for what purpose? It is a facility granted to the employer to justify his action, that too, when the domestic inquiry was found defective. The question of the workman leading evidence contra arises only after the management adduces additional evidence, and not before. Thus, the right of the employer to adduce additional evidence is founded on the satisfaction of the following two conditions:

(a) the tribunal has recorded a preliminary finding that the domestic inquiry was not properly held; and

(b) that, in such an event, the employer makes a request to the tribunal seeking permission to lead additional evidence to justify the action of dismissal.

In the absence of these two pre-requisites, no question of the employer adducing additional evidence could obviously arise. Conversely, if these two conditions are fulfilled, it is not within the power of the tribunal to refuse permission to the employer to adduce further evidence. Lastly, it is not in dispute that a dismissal founded on an improperly held domestic inquiry is bad, but at the same time the defect is not conclusive or fatal per se. Such a dismissal could be termed 'bad in law finally' only when:

(a) the employer has been permitted, on a request made by him, to adduce additional evidence in support of the action;

(b) the workman is afforded an opportunity to lead evidence contra; and

(c) the tribunal after appreciating the sum-total of

(i) the evidence adduced at the domestic inquiry;

(ii) the evidence and additional evidence adduced by the employer before the tribunal; and

(iii) the evidence adduced by the workman contra comes to the final conclusion that the employer has still failed to make out a valid case for dismissal.

Paraphrasing, the employer can cure such defects by adducing additional evidence to the satisfaction of the tribunal. This much is clear from the ratio of Firestone and other cases decided by the Supreme Court for well over 25 years. In fact, Firestone goes a step further. Where the circumstances were so compelling that the employer has no option than to dismiss a workman without conducting an inquiry, he is nevertheless entitled to make a request before the tribunal for adducing evidence for the first time in support of the action taken and, if a request to that effect is made, it is incumbent upon the tribunal to grant the same. With great respect, it is submitted that this decision is questionable and needs review by a larger bench. The law relating to the stage at which the employer must seek permission of the tribunal to adduce evidence before it to sustain the disciplinary action taken by him against the delinquent employee has remained unaltered by s 11A. Even now the law remains the same as evolved by the judicial dicta prior to promulgation of s 11A. In AB Zodge, before the closure of the proceedings before the tribunal, the employer sought permission to lead evidence in support of the order of dismissal but the tribunal refused permission and the Bombay High Court upheld the decision of the tribunal. The Supreme Court held that denial of the opportunity to the employer to lead evidence before the tribunal in support of the order of dismissal cannot be justified. Therefore, in view of the law laid down by it in the earlier decision, the court set aside the order and judgment of the High Court as unsustainable. It further observed that it will be open to the parties to lead such evidence as they may deem proper before the Industrial tribunal where the matter is to be reheard.[48]

In Raveendra Kamath, the Kerala High Court said that permission can be granted by the labour court to the employer to adduce evidence to sustain his action even on an oral request made before the proceeding comes to a close.[49] Following this holding, in KK Bharathan, a single judge of that High Court held that, in the circumstances of the case, the labour court should have given an opportunity to the management to adduce evidence before it, for sustaining its action, because such an opportunity can be given even on an oral request. In this case, as a matter off act, the request for permission to adduce evidence was made in the 'written statement' itself.[50] In Adichanalloor FSC Bank, another Bench of the same High Court observed that s 11A does not 'confer an absolute right on the employer to make an application at any time of the proceedings and it has to be made at the earliest opportunity'. When such an application is filed, it is for the labour court to decide whether it is raised at the earliest opportunity or whether delay is explained or whether such application is filed only to delay the proceedings.[51]. In Rajendra Jha, the Supreme Court, from the facts on record inferred, that the employer had made an oral request to the labour court for being given an opportunity to lead evidence to justify its action and held that the contention of the workmen that the employer had not at all, asked for an opportunity to lead evidence and the court acted gratuitously in giving an opportunity to the employer of its own accord, was unfounded.[52] The right of the employer to lead additional evidence before the labour court in a case of dismissal does not include leading of fresh evidence in respect of charges which were not levelled against the workman either in the charge-sheet or in the order of termination.[53] In GA Salimani, the facts were: The tribunal passed an order on 2 July 1990 holding that the inquiry held was not proper, and directed the management to lead evidence in support of the charges but on a request made by the workman against the direction, the tribunal recalled the said order by passing another order dated 18 October 1990 to the extent it related to giving liberty to the management to lead evidence. The Karnataka High Court held that such recall of the earlier direction was not merely procedural but a substantive review on the part of the tribunal and was not permisslble.[54] In Lakshmidevamma, the issue was 'at what stage should the employer make a request to the labour court in order to be permitted to adduce additional evidence to justify the action of dismissal, be it a case of regular adjudication under s 10 or an application rued under s 33(2) (b) '. Santosh Hegde J (for self and Bharucha J with Patil and Khare JJ concurring, and Sabharwal J dissenting) affirmed the ratio of Shambhu Nath Goyal in the following words:

Keeping in mind the object of providing an opportunity to the management to adduce evidence before the Tribunal/Labour Court, > we are of the opinion that the directions issued by this Court in Shambhu Nath Goyal's case[55]…need not be varied, being just and fair. There can be no complaint from the .management side for this procedure because this opportunity of leading evidence is being sought by the management only as an alternative plea and not as an admission of illegality in its domestic inquiry. At the same time, it is also of advantage to the workman inasmuch as they will be put to notice of the fact that management is likely to adduce fresh evidence, hence, they can keep their rebuttal or other evidence ready. This procedure also eliminates the likely delay in permitting the management to make belated application whereby the proceedings before the Labour court tribunal could get prolonged. In our opinion, the procedure laid down in Shambhu Nath Goyal's case (vide supra), is just and fair.[56] (para 17, at p 110).

Sabharwal J, in his dissenting judgment cited inter alia the decisions rendered in Bharat Sugar, Ritz Theatre, Motipur Sugar, Delhi Cloth Mills, PP Mundhe, and other cases and observed:

> Such an interpretation [as placed by the majority judges], of procedure takes away the discretion of the labour court/industrial tribunal. To allow or not to allow the prayer of the management to adduce evidence in such a matter should essentially lie within the discretion of labour court/industrial tribunal to be exercised on well-settled judicial principles. (para 26, at p 112)...It has been consistently held that, in principle, there is no difference whether the matter comes before the labour court/industrial tribunal under section 33 or on a reference under section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. In either case, the employer would have to justify that the order of dismissal or discharge was proper. In either case, the employer would have right to adduce evidence where the employer dismisses an employee without holding an inquiry or inquiry is found to be defective. (para 28, at p 112)...In the present case, we are not called upon to decide a case where no request to adduce evidence is made by the employer. (para 34, at p 115)...The departure came up only in Shambhu Nath Goyal's case. (,)...Except the main judgment of Shambhu Nath Goyal's case, no other decision of the court was cited before us wherein it may have been held that the prayer of the management to adduce evidence is to be rejected if not made either in the written statement filed to the statement of claim in a reference under section 10 or at the initial stage of proceedings under section 33(2)(b) of the Industrial Disputes Act ...(para 17, at p 211).

The dissenting judgment of Sabharwal J is consistent with the long line of cases decided on this issue and is right. An employer is under no obligation to make a request to the labour court in the absence of a finding against the validity of the domestic inquiry being recorded. If the employer makes a request immediately after the labour court records such a finding, no inference of the employer attempting to delay the adjudication process could be drawn. Even where the employer makes a request in the written statement or in the application under s 33, he gets permission to lead further evidence only after, and not before, the labour court has recorded a finding against the validity of domestic inquiry. That being the position, what difference would it make whether the request is made at the commencement of the proceeding or immediately after the recording of the finding. It is one thing to say that it would be desirable for the employer to make a request for adducing evidence in the written statement or in the application filed under s 33, as the case may be, and quite another to suggest that if he does not make a request at the very commencement of the adjudication proceeding, he would be barred from making the request at a later stage. The fact that Motipur Sugar, decided by a four judge Bench in 1965 was no less a long-standing decision, holding the field for as many years, exposes the congenital weakness of the other consideration, namely, stare decisis. The ratio of Motipur Sugar is binding on all subsequent benches of tour judges or less. A fortiori, the said ratio was binding on the Bench that decided Shambhu Nath Goyal, which brings to surface the harsh reality that the smaller bench in Shambhu Nath Goyal struck out in a new direction of its own.

In SJ Mehta, the facts disclosed that the employer contended that it was a case of termination simpliciter after paying compensation as required under s 25F, which was accepted by the workmen, and further offered to lead evidence justifying termination before the labour court and the labour court refused to grant permission on the ground that the management was adopting delay tactics, a single judge of Gujarat High Court quashed the order of the labour court and remanded the matter to the labour court with a direction to give opportunity to the employer to lead evidence.[57]Both the labour court and the single judge were questionable on different counts. Once it is admitted by the employer and accepted by the tribunal that it was a case of termination simpliciter, where is the question of leading evidence in support of such termination validly effected after paying compensation under s 25F? What purpose would be served by remanding the case to the labour court with a direction to give an opportunity to the employer to lead evidence; if so, for or against what? The right course for the High Court would have been to quash the proceedings before the labour court and uphold the action of employer in view of the admitted fact that it was not a case of dismissal for an act of misconduct, but one of termination simpliciter after complying with the requirements under s 25F and, more so, that the workmen had accepted the same without a whisper of protest. In United Planters Assn, the Supreme Court reiterated the law to the effect:

> ...it has always been the philosophy of industrial jurisprudence that if the domestic inquiry held by the employer was defective, deficient, incomplete or not held at all, the tribunal instead of remanding the case to the inquiry officer for holding the inquiry de > novo, would itself require the parties to produce their evidence so as to decide whether the charges, for which disciplinary action was taken against the employee, were established or not. The pending proceedings keep the employer and the employee in a state of confrontation generating further misgivings and bitterness. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that such proceedings should come to an end at the earliest so as to maintain industrial peace and cordial relations between the management and the labour.[58]

Then summed up the ratio of Firestone's case:

> ...as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal to take evidence to decide the merits of the charges and it was laid down that in spite of the prohibition contained in the proviso to s 11A, the tribunal, in order to satisfy itself as to the guilt of the person charged,. had the jurisdiction to take the evidence and that the law in that regard had not undergone any change. It was pointed out that if the domestic inquiry had been held by the employer, the tribunal will examine the merits of that inquiry and would confine itself to the evidence already on record but where the inquiry was defective, the tribunal could still take fresh evidence to decide the merits of the charges. (ibid).

In cases, where the tribunal decides to consider the matter on the evidence adduced before it for the first time, it must confine itself to the charges framed against the workman on the basis of which the punishment was imposed. It is not open to the management to level new charges before the tribunal which had not figured in the domestic inquiry or which had not formed the basis of the order of punishment. Hence, the employer cannot be permitted to adduce evidence in support of such new charges. Nor can the tribunal have jurisdiction to record findings on such new charges and justify the order of Eunishment on the basis of such charges as had not preceded the order of punishment.[59] It is well-settled that when no domestic inquiry is held, the matter is at large before the adjudicator on the basis of full scale inquiry and the employer has not only to prove the misconduct alleged, against the workman but also to satisfy the adjudicator that on the facts and in the circumstances, infliction of certain kind of punishment was justified.[60] In other words, the tribunal has complete jurisdiction to deal with the entire gamut of the controversy between the parties. It is open to the management to rely on the inquiry and alternatively advance a contention that if the inquiry is found not proper, it should be given an opportunity to lead additional evidence but merely because the employer has taken such a stand, the labour court cannot jump to the conclusion that the inquiry was not held properly in a fair manner. In a case where the employer has sought an opportunity to adduce evidence, it cannot be just ignored on the ground that it will be a sheer exercise in futility.[61] In Firestone, the court observed that it should not be understood as laying down that there is no obligation on the part of the employer to hold an inquiry or the inquiry held by him should be an empty formality. If a proper inquiry is conducted by the employer and a correct finding is arrived at regarding the misconduct, the tribunal will have to give very cogent reasons for not accepting the view of the inquiry officer. Furthermore, by holding a proper inquiry, the employer will also escape the charge of arbitrariness or mala fides. A proper and valid inquiry by an employer will also be conducive to harmonious and healthy relationship between the management and the workman and it will serve the cause of industrial peace. It will also enable the employer to persuade the tribunal to accept the inquiry as proper and also the findings as correct.[62]

In Super Silk, the facts were, a workman was dismissed for issuing a false bill to a purchaser. The management could not produce the original bill before the labour court, but produced the carbon copy of the said bill, which was not admitted by the labour court as a valid piece of evidence. A single judge of Madras High Court directed the labour court to permit the management to mark the photocopy of the relevant bill as an exhibit and dispose of the case on merits. The learned judge further observed that the technicality of strict and sophisticated rules of evidence contemplated under the Indian Evidence Act need not be applied in the case of a domestic inquiry.[63] In BS Kamble, the facts were: A workman was dismissed for a misconduct involving the bringing of call girls into the hotel premises to be provided to the passengers. The labour court directed reinstatement of the workman on the ground that the evidence was insufficient. In writ petition, a single judge of Bombay High Court quashed the order of labour court and upheld the punishment imposed by the management.[64] A single judge of Punjab and Haryana High Court held that where a dismissed workman failed to adduce any evidence despite the grant of four opportunities, the labour court would be justified in closing the workman's evidence, and dismissing the case for non-prosecution.[65] In Municipal Committee, Taum, the Supreme Court held that the evidence tendered in the court should be based on the claim statement, and the courts should be alert on this. In case of inconsistent statement with regard to the claim by the workman, the labour court would not be justified in granting any relief ignoring the inconsistency in the claim on the ground of substantial justice.[66] Where the workman, whose services were terminated, raised an industrial dispute claiming to be a permanent employee, and the employer contended that the workman was only a daily-wager whose services were terminated for being absent without permission, the relief of reinstatement, continuity of service and backwages granted by the labour court is not justified and the award deserves to be quashed.[67]

The expression 'evidence' is not to be understood in a narrow and technical sense as to mean only such evidence as adduced in a court of law as required by the Evidence Act when a person is examined as a witness by administering the oath. In domestic inquiries, hearsay evidence is not impermissible provided it has reasonable nexus and credibility. The power given to the tribunal to reassess the evidence before the inquiry officer has to be judicially and judiciously exercised. It should be exercised in cases where the findings of the inquiry officer are based on 'no evidence' or are 'so unreasonable' that 'no reasonable man could have ever come to it' or the decision is 'so outrageous' in its defiance of logic or of accepted moral standards that no sensible person could have arrived at it 'or that it is so absurd that' one is satisfied that the decision maker must have taken leave of his senses.' Then, it would call for interference by the tribunal.[68] The wide discretionary power vested in the tribunal by this section are to be exercised in a judicial and judicious manner before interfering with the findings of the inquiry officer and the order of punishment. While exercising this jurisdiction, the tribunal also must act in good faith and must have regard to all the relevant considerations. It should not seek to promote purposes alien to the letter or spirit of the legislation that has given it the power to act and must not act arbitrarily and capriciously.[69] If the tribunal exercises its jurisdiction mechanically and without weighing the circumstances of the case or in disregard to the judicial principles, it would be no exercise of a discretion. If the tribunal exceeds its jurisdiction, or its decision is not reasonably founded on the evidence or it has failed to take into account the matters which it ought to have taken into account or has taken into account irrelevant or extraneous matters or has acted in violation of the rules of natural justice or has misinterpreted or misapplied the law, its order or award will be amenable to judicial review.[70]

The power to set aside the order of discharge or dismissal and grant the relief of reinstatement or lesser punishment does not mean that in each and every case the tribunal has got untrammeled power to interfere with the punishment. The power has to be exercised only when the tribunal is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal was not justified. The satisfaction of the tribunal is objective satisfaction and not subjective satisfaction. It involves application of mind by the tribunal to various relevant circumstances, like the nature of delinquency committed by the workman, his past conduct, the impact of delinquency on the employer's business as also the total length of service rendered by him. Furthermore, the tribunal has to consider whether the decision taken by the employer is just or not. It is only after taking all these factors into consideration, can the tribunal upset the punishment imposed by the employer. The quantum of punishment cannot be interfered with without recording specific finding on the point. No indulgence should be granted to a person found guilty of grave misconduct like cheating, fraud, misappropriation of employer's fund, theft of public property.[71] The tribunal has no power to convert a penalty into a reward purporting to exercise the discretion under this section.[72] In Jai Bhagwan, the award of the tribunal was quashed by the Supreme Court on the ground that it had utterly failed to apply its mind to the facts of the case and had not even perused the records. As a matter of fact, without even reading the report of the inquiry officer, on the basis of its own imagination, it went far beyond the findings of the inquiry report in holding that the workman was guilty of the misconduct and justified his dismissal from service. Speaking for the court, Chinappa Reddy J observed that such exercise of a tribunal's jurisdiction would be a case either of no exercise of jurisdiction or one not legally exercised. In either case, the writ court can interfere and cannot be content by simply saying that since the tribunal has exercised its discretion, it will not examine the circumstances of the case to ascertain whether or not such power was exercised in accordance with the well-settled principles. If the writ court was not to do so, it would be a refusal on its part to exercise its jurisdiction.[73] In Gujarat Steel Tubes, the court said that the writ court can itself reassess the evidence on record and can come to a conclusion which the tribunal was empowered to arrive at in exercise of its powers under s 11A of the Act, where the award suffers from a fundamental flaw.[74]

In EV Raju, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the High Court itself examined the evidence on record for ascertaining whether the management had proved the act of misconduct alleged against the workman and came to the conclusion that the management was justified in dismissing him.[75]But once the act of misconduct is proved either in the inquiry conducted by the employer or by evidence placed before the tribunal for the first time, the punishment imposed on the delinquent cannot be interfered with by the writ court except where the punishment is so harsh as to suggest victimisation.[76] In Food Corpn of India, a peculiar situation arose before a single judge of the Calcutta High Court. The tribunal found that the domestic inquiry held on the charges against the delinquent workman was illegal for non-observance of the principles of natural justice and itself called upon the management to adduce evidence before it to sustain the action of dismissal. Despite this, the management did not adduce any evidence and yet the tribunal upheld the order of dismissal. In a writ against the award of the tribunal, the High Court quashed the order of dismissal and ordered reinstatement of the workman with continuity of service but without backwages.[77] In this case, there is no justification for denying backwages to the workman, because denial of backwages itself is punishment for an act of misconduct. In the peculiar circumstances of this case, there was no warrant for imposing any punishment.[78] In Godrej, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that where the workman was found guilty of misappropriation and cheating, which are charges of grave nature, the labour court should not direct reinstatement, though without backwages, on the ground that he was a married man and he should be reinstated to avoid suffering to his family.[79] Once it is found that the charge of theft levelled against the workman was proved, the tribunal cannot order reinstatement on the ground that the punishment of dismissal was aggressive and unjustified.[80] In Tarun Kr Banerjee, the Supreme Court held that under s 11A, if the tribunal finds the order of discharge or dismissal of the workman unjustified, it could reappraise evidence adduced in the domestic inquiry and decide the question of misconduct alleged against the workman. Where, on evidence, the charge of misconduct of the workman has been proved, the award of the tribunal contra is not sustainable.[81] In Hindustan Motors, the Supreme Court held that s 11A confers wide discretion on the tribunal in the matter of awarding proper punishment and also in the matter of the terms and conditions on which reinstatement should be ordered. It necessarily follows that the tribunal is duty bound to consider whether in the circumstances of the case, backwages have to be awarded and if so, to what extent.[82]

In Subhash Chandra Sharma, the Supreme Court held that once it was found that the conductor was guilty of drunkenness and intimidation of the cashier and that the inquiry was properly held, it is not open to the labour court to interfere with the punishment of dismissal, and that the order passed by the labour court directing reinstatement with 50 per cent of backwages was arbitrary, capricious and unjustified.[83] In a case, where the wife and husband were employees of the same estate, the wife continued to occupy the quarter allotted to her husband even after his demise and refused to vacate the premises despite repeated requests from the management and was dismissed for the said misconduct, it was held that the tribunal was justified in upholding her dismissal on the ground that her action amounted to continued misconduct.[84] In Anna Transport Corpn, Jayasimha Babu J, while setting aside the order of the labour court directing a workman dismissed for unauthorised absence, held that the discretion vested in the labour court under s 11A was not meant to be equated to charity. Interference by the High Court would be called for in cases where the reasons given by the labour court were not germane to a decision relating to the appropriate penalty. The fact that the workman had a family could not be a justification for condoning all the misconducts or declining to impose any penalty. The learned judge peremptorily observed that the employer was not required to function as a charity organisation; that any organisation was established to render efficient service and fulfill the object for which it had been set up; and that if its personnel stay away from work frequently and for long periods, no organisation could retain them in employment.[85]

When an employee remains absent from duty without sanctioned leave, the authority can, on the basis of the record, come to a conclusion about the employee being habitually negligent in duties and an exhibited lack of interest in the employer's work. Habitual absence is a factor which establishes lack of interest in work. There cannot be any sweeping generalization. But at the same time some telltale features can be noticed and pressed into service to arrive at conclusions in the departmental proceedings. The charge in the instant case was absence without obtaining leave in advance. The conduct of the employees in this case is nothing but irresponsible in extreme and can hardly be justified. The charge in this case was misconduct by absence. In view of the Governing Standing Orders unauthorized leave can be treated as misconduct. Thus the order of the Tribunal refusing to accord approval primarily on the ground that in most cases the leave was treated as leave without pay and that being the position it cannot be said that the absence was unauthorized, would be liable to be set aside.[86] In Ashok Leyland, where the workman was dismissed for assaulting his departmental head, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the award of the labour court directing his reinstatement on the basis of sympathetic consideration was undoubtedly perverse and could not be sustained.[87] Once the misappropriation of funds is proved, maybe for a small or large amount, there is no question of showing uncalled for sympathy and reinstating the employee into service. The labour court is bound to respect the punishment imposed by the management.[88] Where the labour court had found that the inquiry held by the employer was fair and proper, there is no substance in the contention of the employer that the labour court had committed an error in not trying the validity of domestic inquiry as a preliminary issue, and no prejudice was caused thereby to the employer in any manner.[89]

In Vikramaditya Pandey, the Supreme Court held that ordinarily, once the termination of service of an employee was held to be wrongful or illegal, normally the relief of reinstatement with full backwages would be available to the employee. However, it would be open to the employer to specifically plead and establish that there were special circumstances, which warranted either non-reinstatement or non-payment of backwages.[90] In Krishan Kumar, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that where the termination of a workman was held illegal and the employee was ordered to be reinstated with full backwages and service benefits, such employee would be deemed to have worked during the period he remained a dismissed employee, and would be entitled to be considered for retrospective promotion, if during that period the management had promoted his juniors to a higher grade post.[91] The consequences of reinstatement means restoration of contract of service and entitlement to backwages, even where the award of the tribunal was silent on the payment of 'backwages'. Backwages is an implicit, integral part and a necessary inseparable concomitant of an order of reinstatement, unless proved that the workman engaged himself in some gainful employment or there existed any other circumstance which deprive him of the said benefit.[92] In Ganayutham, the Supreme Court held that the doctrine of proportionality was at par with the doctrine of Wednesbury's unreasonableness and unless it was held that the punishment imposed upon the delinquent was so irrational as to shock one's conscience and that no reasonable man while reasonably exercising his power would impose the same, the High Court could not interfere with the punishment.[93] In H Nagaraj, the Supreme Court observed: 'We fail to see how the Tribunal, when it upheld the inquiry, could have interfered with the quantum of punishment in this fashion.'[94] Fraud and forgery committed by the employee of a bank are serious acts of misconduct causing substantial loss to the bank and hence his dismissal from service cannot be said to be disproportionate. The finding of the tribunal that the charge against the employee was not proved cannot be sustained.[95] It is difficult to accept that the labour court in each and every case has a duty under s 11A to reappraise the whole evidence and to give the findings thereupon.[96] In Parma Nanda, the Apex Court held:

> The jurisdiction of the tribunal to interfere with disciplinary matters and punishment cannot be equated with appellate jurisdiction. The tribunal cannot interfere with the findings of the inquiry officer or the competent authority where they are not arbitrary or utterly perverse...It is appropriate to remember that the power to impose penalty on a delinquent officer is conferred on the competent authority either by an Act of Legislature or rules made under the proviso to Art 309 of the Constitution. If there has been an inquiry consistent with the rules and in accordance with the principles of natural justice what punishment would meet the ends of justice is matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the competent authority ...[97]

Where the tribunal directed that a bank employee, who was dismissed for fraud, misappropriation and unauthorised absence, be reinstated, quashing the award of tribunal and restoring the punishment of dismissal, it was held that it would amount to rewarding fraudulent and dishonest conduct.[1] Where the labour court, after recording a finding that the inquiry held was proper, granted relief of reinstatement with 50 per cent backwages, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court quashed the award and observed that the said workman not only struck work but also prevented other workers from attending to their duties.[2] Where the employee of a bank was dismissed for a grave misconduct of forging the signature of an account-holder in a withdrawal slip and obtaining payment, consideration of past record of service or of the question whether the bank sustained loss were not relevant, and that the order of the tribunal confirming the dismissal did not warrant interference.[3] The discretion available to the tribunal under s 11A to set aside an order of dismissal or discharge or to direct reinstatement should be exercised in a judicial and judicious manner. If the discretion is exercised on humanitarian grounds, the order of the tribunal is not sustainable.[4] Once the labour court came to the conclusion that the services of a driver of state road transport corporation were terminated for want of control over steering and lack of self-confidence, it is not open to it to direct the corporation to engage him in some other post on 'humanitarian grounds'. The labour court has no jurisdiction to substitute the punishment with something less.[5] Poverty of a workman is not a ground on which the labour court can condone misconduct and direct reinstatement.[6] In ICRI, the Supreme Court held that where the tribunal agrees with the inquiry officer, there is no necessity for repeating the evidence and conclusion by the tribunal, even though the tribunal can differ from the findings of the inquiry officer in a properly conducted inquiry on cogent reasons.[7] In TG Marathe, a single judge of Bombay High Court held that the imposition of punishment was truly to be left to the disciplinary authority, who, on the one hand, was required to maintain discipline among the employees and to see that the morale of the other employees is kept up and, on the other, while taking disciplinary action, signals should not be sent out to the effect that any unruly behaviour having wider impact would be dealt with leniently. The tribunal should interfere only in a case where the punishment is shockingly disproportionate. The conclusion of the tribunal that the charge was established was correct, but not its order directing reinstatement with 50 per cent backwages.[8] In Chandra Sekharachari, the Supreme Court observed:

> ...Once the tribunal had found that the charges against the appellant were not established, it was not open to the learned Single Judge, who had rightly refused to re-appraise the evidence to say that with better proof the charges could have been established. The learned single judge had no jurisdiction, not even under s 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 to enter into the question whether the charges could have been established by better or further evidence. That is not the function of the court or any quasi-judicial authority. If it is found as a fact that the charges are not established, then the necessary consequences have to follow and,-as a corollary thereto, appropriate orders are to be passed. There may be circumstances justifying non-payment of full backwages but they cannot be denied for the reason that the charges could have been established with better proof. If 'better proof' was available with the management, and it was not furnished or produced before the court, a presumption would arise that such proof, if furnished, would have gone against the management. We are surprised that the view propounded by the learned Single Judge, which falls in the realm of speculation, has been upheld by the Division Bench."[9]

An employer, who wants to avail himself of the opportunity of adducing evidence for the first time before the Tribunal to justify his action, should ask for it at the appropriate stage. If such an opportunity is asked for, the Tribunal has no power to refuse. The giving of an opportunity to an employer to adduce evidence for the first time before the Tribunal is in the interest of both the management and the employee and to enable the Tribunal itself to be satisfied about the alleged misconduct. Once the misconduct is proved either in the enquiry conducted by an employer or by the evidence placed before a Tribunal for the first time, punishment imposed cannot be interfered with by the Tribunal except in cases where the punishment is so harsh as to suggest victimization.[10] In SA Kasundra, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court held that once it was found in the course of adjudication that the delinquent committed several acts of misappropriation, the conclusion must be that the delinquent acted dishonestly and the dismissal of the workmen from service could not be said to be illegal. Under s 11A, the tribunal or the labour court does not have unguided power to set aside the order of dismissal passed by the employer.[11] In Pochaiah, the facts were that the High Court having upheld the order of the labour court to the effect that the order of dismissal passed by the employer was legal and valid, directed the employer to re-employ the delinquent workman in a lower category as a new entrant. The Supreme Court, while quashing the order of the High Court, held that there was no jurisdiction vested in the High Court to direct the employer to re-employ the delinquent employee, after upholding the punishment.[12] In Laxmi Kant, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that if there was no order of termination there was no question of holding an inquiry and the workman had himself abandoned the job, and the finding recorded by the labour court to the effect that there was no termination of his services was correct. It was further held that the workman was wanting to take advantage of his own wrong, and there was neither equity nor law in his favour.[13] In SC Sharma, the Supreme Court held that even a threat to assault a co-employee amounts to a serious misconduct and the punishment of removal could not therefore be construed as shockingly disproportionate to the charges held proved.[14]

In Ghanshyam Sharma, Arun Madan J (for himself and Laksmanan, CJ) of the Rajasthan High Court set aside the order passed by a single judge quashing the labour court's order directing reinstatement of a workman. Briefly, the facts of the case were: A bus conductor was dismissed from service on being found guilty of not issuing tickets to passengers, and the conductor himself admitted his guilt. The labour court found that the inquiry was perfectly in order, but ordered reinstatement. A single judge of the High Court rightly quashed the order of the labour court on the well-settled ground that once the charges of misappropriation, etc, were proved and the domestic inquiry did not suffer from any infirmity, the labour court in exercise of its jurisdiction under s 11A cannot substitute dismissal with a lesser punishment on considerations of private benevolence or uncalled for generosity. Viewed in this perspective, the decision given by the learned single judge of the Rajasthan High Court was right.[15] Where a single judge of the Delhi High Court directed the management of the bank to reconsider the decision of dismissal of a workman, a Division Bench quashed the order and held that the single judge was not justified in disturbing an administrative order unless it is found to be illegal, arbitrary or procedurally wrong, and that the bank's decision did not suffer from any malady which could warrant interference by the court.[16] Where the services of a workman were terminated on the ground that the workman had not reported for duty after the expiry of leave, it was held that the principles of natural justice must be read into the certified Standing Orders relating to leave and, so read, it was obvious that the termination of the workman without a show-cause notice and without an opportunity to the workman to explain his stand, and without any inquiry had to be treated as non est.[17] In the garb of exercising powers under s 11A, the labour court cannot grant relief of reinstatement to casual workers amounting to regularisation, when there are no sanctioned posts in statutory bodies and Governmental organisations.[18] In a case where the services of a conductor, who was appointed as a probationer for two years on daily wages, were terminated on being found that he had not issued tickets to twelve passengers of whom two had paid fares to him, the labour court, in exercise of the powers conferred on it under s 11A, cannot order reinstatement on the ground that such termination amounts to retrenchment; more so, it being a case of 'loss of confidence', no inquiry was required to be held.[19] Where a driver of state transport corporation was dismissed for having reported for duty in the night shift in a drunken state, there could be no other punishment except dismissal and the labour court committed a grave error of law in directing reinstatement of such a driver.[20]

In Precipenium Valve, the labour court, having held that the misconduct committed by the workman was serious, cannot direct payment of four years of wages by way of compensation in lieu of reinstatement and such an award is liable to be set aside.[21] Where the labour court upheld the order of dismissal for proved misconduct of slapping a co-worker while on duty and awarded monetary compensation of Rs 5,000/- in lieu of reinstatement, the High Court held that the award of labour court did not warrant interference.[22] Where the charges of forgery and misappropriation of bank's fund were proved in the inquiry and the tribunal directed reinstatement of the workman without backwages holding that the charges were not proved, the High Court, quashing the award, held that the findings of the tribunal were perverse on facts.[23] In BS Hullikatti, the Supreme Court quashed the order of the labour court reducing the punishment of dismissal to one of reinstatement with 50 per cent backwages even after the finding recorded by the labour court that one of the allegations against the conductor that he had issued tickets of lesser denomination as against the correct denomination was proved in the domestic inquiry, which award was confirmed by the single judge and the Division Bench of the High Court. The Supreme Court further held that once the allegation of such a nature had been proved, interfering with the order of dismissal only amounted to showing uncalled for sympathy in favour of the workman.[24] Where the labour court directed the reinstatement of a conductor dismissed for non-issue of tickets to passengers holding that the charge was not proved, the High Court quashed the order of the labour court and upheld the dismissal holding that strict and sophisticated rules of evidence do not apply to a domestic inquiry.[25] The dismissal of a workman employed in a watch factory for a misconduct involving the acceptance of a watch from a third party for repair without the company's permission is a serious misconduct and dishonesty and the punishment of dismissal cannot be termed disproportionate or excessive to the gravity of the proved misconduct.[26] Where a workman was dismissed after proper inquiry for a misconduct involving misappropriation, it is neither proper nor fair on the part of the labour court to substitute the finding and confidence of the employer with that of its own by ordering reinstatement. In such a case, the labour court cannot exercise its discretion and alter the punishment.[27] In VP Ramulu, the facts were that the labour court directed reinstatement of a conductor on the ground that the punishment of dismissal was disproportionate as the amount misappropriated was a paltry sum of Rs 2. A single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court quashed the said order and restored the punishment of dismissal. In appeal, Sinha CJ of the AP High Court upheld the order of the single judge and observed that the decision of the employer did not warrant interference by the labour court in exercise of its jurisdiction under s 11A.[28]

Where the workman, who secured employment on a fraudulent representation and by furnishing forged educational and academic documents, was dismissed from service, it was held that such employment was liable to be recalled at the option of the employer. The fact that the workman had continued in service for a long period does not create equity in his favour or estoppel against the employer. The fact that the employer has not prescribed any minimum qualifications for appointment to the post in question is immaterial.[29] In a case of dismissal for a misconduct involving assault of a co-workman, the labour court cannot interfere with the punishment in exercise of its jurisdiction under s 11A. Interference is called for, only in cases where the punishment is shockingly disproportionate.[30] A bank employee, who was dismissed after holding an inquiry for acts of misconduct inter alia involving the floating of a cooperative society, cheating and misappropriation of funds, and acting in a manner prejudicial to the interest of the bank, is not entitled to any relief and the decision of the tribunal not to grant any relief to him does not call for interference.[31] Where it is found that the workman was dismissed for putting up an unauthorised construction in the land belonging to the employer, it is wrong for the labour court to have passed an award directing reinstatement. The award was set aside and the dismissal upheld.[32] The mere fact that the same labour court took a sympathetic view in one case of dismissal for unauthorised absence and ordered reinstatement on the ground that the misconduct was not so grave as to warrant dismissal, does not mean that in all subsequent cases also, the same view should be taken.[33] Where a driver was dismissed for being found in a drunken state in the driver's rest seat after his turn of driving the bus was over and after completing his journey, the punishment of dismissal was disproportionate to the gravity of the misconduct, hence, ordered reinstatement but without backwages.[34] Where the tribunal held that the finding of the inquiry officer was not perverse, despite the fact that the said finding was based on the testimony of only one witness who had not seen the accident and no other eye witness was examined, the High Court held that the order of the tribunal itself requires to be interfered with and set aside.[35]

In Maharashtra GK Union, a single judge of the Bombay High Court quashed the order of the labour court upholding the dismissal, disclosed the facts that the employer failed to sustain the charge of misconduct even after adducing additional evidence before the labour court.[36] In V Velayudham,[37] where the dismissal of a conductor was upheld by the labour court but was modified by the High Court directing the employer to appoint him as a 'cleaner' on compassionate grounds, the Supreme Court, while setting aside that part of the order of the High Court, held that there was no reason for the High Court to have substituted its discretion for that of the labour court. In Gajanan Vibhute, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that where the workman was dismissed on the basis of proved misconduct, and the dismissal was also upheld by the labour court, minor contradictions could not disturb the findings of fact based on record and the High Court in its writ jurisdiction would not reappreciate the evidence.[38] Where the workman was dismissed after due inquiry for misbehaving with his superior lady officer, the punishment of dismissal was justified.[39] In Dev Singh, the facts were: a senior assistant was charge-sheeted for misplacing a file which was entrusted to him, and after holding enquiry, he was dismissed from service. The writ petition filed by the workman in the Punjab and Haryana High Court was dismissed. In appeal, it was contended before the Supreme Court that it was a charge of misplacement of the file and no motive was attached to it and that the punishment imposed was shockingly disproportionate. Counsel for the workman further contended that it was open to the Supreme Court to interfere with the punishment in the facts and circumstances of the case and relied upon the decisions of the court in Bhagat Ram,[40] Ranjit Thakur,[41] Mahesh Kumar,[42] in support of the said contention. Setting aside the dismissal order, Hegde J (for himself and Singh J) of the Supreme Court held:

> Applying the said principle laid down by this Court in the cases noted hereinabove, we see that in this case the appellant has been serving the respondent-Corporation for nearly 20 years with unblemished service. .. A reading of the charge sheet shows that the misplacement alleged was not motivated by any ulterior consideration and at the most could be an act of negligence, consequent to which the appellant was unable to trace the file again.. .. We think the punishment of dismissal for mere misplacement of a file without any ulterior motive is too harsh a punishment which is totally disproportionate to the misconduct alleged and the same certainly shocks our judicial conscience.. .. while upholding the finding of mis-conduct against the appellant, we think it appropriate that the appellant be imposed a punishment of withholding of one increment including stoppage at the efficiency bar in substitution of the punishment of dismissal awarded by the disciplinary authority. We further direct that the appellant will not be entitled to any backwages for the period of suspension. However, he will be entitled to the subsistence allowance payable up to the date of the dismissal order.[43]

In Lalit Popli, the employee working in Canara Bank was dismissed after holding an enquiry. The brief facts were: on a complaint made by one Mr. SV Deshpande, a customer of the Bank, to the police that an amount of Rs. 1.07 lakhs from his account in five instalments during the year 1991. After conducting preliminary investigation, the employee was charge-sheeted alleging that he issued a cheque book to one Mr. Mohinder Kumar on the basis of an authorization letter purported to have been issued by Mr. Deshpande, resulting in the former withdrawing money by forging the signature of Mr. Deshpande; and that the employee did not verify the signature either at the time of issuing the cheque book or at the time of withdrawal of the amount; and that the forensic examination revealed that the signature was forged on all the aforesaid occasions. In the course of investigation, it was further observed that the authorization letter purported to have been signed and issued by Mr. Deshpande was not found in the records. The appellate authority rejected the appeal made by the employee. Accepting the contention of the employee that the enquiry officer should not have come to the conclusion of establishment of the charges on the basis of the report of the handwriting expert, a single judge of the High Court had set aside the order of dismissal. In appeal, the division bench quashed the order of the single judge on the ground that while exercising jurisdiction under Art 226, the High Court could not act as an appellate court. Dismissing the appeal filed by the employee, Pasayat J (for himself and Patil J) of the Supreme Court held:

> .. . the employee accepted that there was some lapse on his part but he pleaded lack of criminal intent. A bank employee deals with public money. The nature of his work demands vigilance with the inbuilt requirement to act carefully. Any carelessness invites action.. .. even to the naked eye the mistakes in spelling of 'signature' are visible and should not have escaped the eyes of a bank employee who is supposed to be trained and equipped to notice such glaring mistakes. The Enquiry Officer has noticed the similarities highlighted by the Handwriting expert in the disputed document and the admitted signatures of the employee to show how the similarity is visible and even any layman can notice the similarity. These were factual conclusions.. .. Considering the limited scope of judicial review, the Division Bench was right in upholding the order of dismissal by setting aside the learned single Judge's order by which interference was made with it. We find no reason to differ from the conclusions of the Division Bench. The appeal is without merit and is dismissed accordingly.[44] (paras 20-22)

In Kailash Nath Gupta, the Supreme Court held that the power of interference with the quantum of punishment is extremely limited, but when the relevant factors are not taken note of, which have some bearing on the quantum of punishment, certainly the Court can direct re-reconsideration or in an appropriate case to shorten litigation, indicate the punishment to be awarded. Applying the said principles to the instant case, it was found that the appellant-employee, while working as a Manager in a Public Sector Bank had (i) allowed an advance to a borrower under the SEEUT scheme, (ii) granted vehical loan to a borrower without adjusting the outstanding loan amount, and (iii) allowed advances to certain borrowers with a view to extend him the benefit of subsidy money, etc. An enquiry was held into the charges and he was dismissed. Remitting the matter to the High Court for fresh disposal, Patil J (for himself and Pasayat J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> .. . there was no occasion in the long past service indicating either irregularity or misconduct of the appellant except the charges which were the subject matter of his removal from service. The stand of the appellant as indicated above is that though small advances may have become irrecoverable, there is nothing to indicate that the appellant had misappropriated any money or had committed any act of fraud. If any loss has been caused to the bank (which he quantifies at about Rs. 46,000/-) that can be recovered from the appellant. As the reading of the various articles of charges go to show, at the most there is some procedural irregularity which cannot be termed to be negligence to warrant the extreme punishment of dismissal from service.. .. These aspects do not appear to have been considered by the High Court in the proper perspective. In the fitness of things, therefore, the High Court should examine these aspects afresh. The consideration shall be limited only to the quantum of punishment and not to any other question. As the appellant would have superannuated in the normal course in the year 1994, and the matter is pending for a long time, the High Court is requested to dispose of the matter within six months from the date of receipt of this order.[45] (paras 11 & 12).

(b) Judicial Anarchy at the level of Labour Courts and High Courts

The most disturbing tendency is discernible on the part of the labour courts, industrial tribunals and even High Courts, while handling dismissals for grave acts of misconduct involving dishonesty, fraud, riotous, violent and disorderly behaviour on the part of the workmen, admittedly drawing inspiration from a few Supreme Court Judges of yester-years. In this section, quite a few of these decisions are short-listed for discussion and analysis. In HH Pujar, the Supreme Court, while quashing the orders of the courts below, held that in view of the fact that the conductor himself admitted that he did not issue tickets to some 20 out of 136 passengers and further conceded that the enquiry was fairly conducted, the labour court could not have interfered with the punishment on the ground that the ticket-less passengers were not examined during the departmental enquiry.[46] In TK Raju, the facts were: A sales officer, dealing with LPG cylinders took loans totalling several thousands from different distributors using or abusing his pivotal position in Bharat Petroleum Corporation and was found to have committed several other irregularities. He was charge-sheeted and dismissed after holding an enquiry. While exercising writ jurisdiction, the Kerala High Court, relying on AL Kalra,[47] and Glaxo,[48] took an ultra-generous view coupled with sympathy for the delinquent officer, and ordered reinstatement on flimsy and untenable grounds. Quashing the said order, Sinha J (for himself and Naolekar J) of the Supreme Court, observed:

> More than one occasion, different courts have taken pains to explain that Kalra (supra) does not lay down any inflexible rule. In > the aforementioned situation, the High Court in our opinion committed a manifest error in relying upon Kalra (supra) and Glaxo (supra), as we have noticed hereinbefore, that the Respondent was not charged in terms of the Rules alone. He was charged for violation of several other clauses of the Rules. The High Court, therefore, was not correct in coming to the conclusion that as some of the charges were vague and indefinite, thus, no punishment could have been imposed on the basis thereof.. .. The charges levelled against the Respondent must be considered on a holistic basis. By reason of such an action, the Respondent had put the company in embarrassment. It might have lost its image. It received complaints from the Federation. There was reason for the Appellant to believe that by such an action on the part of the Respondent, the Appellant's image has been tarnished. In any event, neither the learned single Judge nor the Division Bench came to any finding that none of the charges had been proved.. .. The power of judicial review in such matters is limited. This Court times without number had laid down that interference with the quantum of punishment should not be done in a routine manner.. . .[49]

Justice Sinha made no secret of his displeasure, and very aptly so, at the way the High Court proceeded to blindly follow the outrageous decisions rendered by Desai J in the above two cases, which stand as monumental illustrations of the colossal degeneration that beset judicial disposition and judicial standards. The learned judge was by all standards very mild in his reproach, even though the learned judges of the Kerala High Court deserved nothing short of an outright condemnation in the strongest terms for following the unruly decisions of Desai J, in preference over Tata Oil Mills,[50]Mulchandani,[51] and MS Dhantwal.[52] All the said three cases were decided by three-judge benches, which laid down the law relating to disciplinary action and dismissal on firm grounds, and are binding on the benches that decided AL Kalra, Glaxo, etc. Apart from displaying lawlessness and disorder both in the reasoning and conclusions, Desai J was further guilty of judicial indiscipline of grave magnitude in so far as he struck out in a weird and chaotic direction. In the light of the fact that a few judges of High Courts, and even of the Supreme Court, continue to be inspired by the judicial anarchy infused by Desai J in the decision-making process, it is considered expedient to devote some space to the quality of the decisions rendered by Desai J, not only in AL Kalra and Glaxo, but also in Rajender Kindra,[53] and Rasiklal Patel,[54] all of which were decided by him more or less in the same year. The following passages from the book "Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary" on the disgusting judicial approaches, not only of Desai J, but also of his two brother judges, i.e., Krishna Iyer and Chinnappa Reddy JJ, and their dysfunctional consequences for the industry, economy and society, deserve mention:

> The sudden and steep deterioration in the judicial process began during mid-70s, strangely coinciding with National Emergency. The three learned judges, namely, Krishna Iyer, Desai and Chinnappa Reddy, can be aptly described as the 'founding fathers of judicial chaos'. A few decisions rendered by the trio have been analysed in the preceding paragraphs, and a few more in the following pages. In this connection, it is important to note that a judicial decision is not only a source of rights as regards the disputing parties, but is also a source of law as regards the world at large. As the former, it is 'Judgment' and as the latter, it is the 'Precedent'. What the three learned judges ignored with impunity was that their decisions together with the ratio decidendi were likely to set a Precedent—and a bad Precedent indeed— for the courts of inferior jurisdiction. It was like a shot-in-the-arm for the Presiding Officers of the Labour Courts and Tribunals, who, while exercising jurisdiction u/s. 11A of the IDA, began looking at themselves more in the role of "para-union leaders" and "champions of working class", than as judicial officers. The staggering number of obnoxious awards passed by labour courts and tribunals - ordering reinstatement with full back wages, even in cases involving grave acts of misconduct - amply testifies the contagious influence of the three judges on them.
>
> The three judges had literally flashed a green signal to unruly workers and militant trade union leaders like Datta Samant, Suryanarayana Rao, et al, together with an assurance of the kind: "Don't worry! Continue with your good work!! We are here to protect your interests!!!" While it does not take more than a stroke of pen for an irresponsible judge to destroy law and order, it would certainly take ages for his successors to restore them. That is what exactly has been happening during the past couple of decades with a few right-thinking judges of 1990s and thereafter swimming across the current to restore 'justice' in the Seat of Justice! The seal of judicial approval put on serious acts of misconduct, and in some cases with criminal overtones, had only fuelled the fire of inter-union and intra-union violence, physical assaults of managerial and supervisory personnel, and the like, during the late 1970s and the whole of 1980s in several industrial belts, prominent among them being the Whole of West Bengal, Bombay-Thane-Belapur, Bangalore-Whitefield-Hosur and Hyderabad-Sanatnagar-Patancheru.
>
> Even though it would be unfair to place the entire blame at the door of the Supreme Court, notwithstanding a few extremist-anarchist judges like Desai J, yet the Labour Courts and Tribunals cannot escape the charge of actively supporting violence, riotous and disorderly behaviour by their generous orders of reinstatement of workmen, who were dismissed for acts of misconduct of grave magnitude. And, strangely and sadly, that is the extent to which judicial standards of labour courts have nose-dived during the past 25-30 years! It is not as if all the employers have the means to fight cases up to the level of Supreme Court. In such a situation, the decision of the Labour Court or Tribunal, and in some cases that of the High Court, becomes final. If a confirmed goon or criminal is directed to be reinstated and the court order acquires finality, what is the fate of the employer, the industrial establishment and the people-at-work therein? Secondly, what kind of message is being sent by labour courts to employees/workers? Is it necessary to answer these questions elaborately!? It is not in doubt that, in the recent past, the learned Judges of Supreme Court and (a few) of High Courts appear to have firmly resolved not to allow this industrial hooliganism to thrive, as is manifested in their outright condemnation of such acts as well as the indifference and leniency displayed by inferior tribunals. Even so, here is the factual material extracted from a monograph published by the All India Organisation of Employers (AIOE) on 'industrial violence' involving not only assaults, but also homicide of supervisory and managerial personnel by militant workers, which should be an eye-opener to the over-generous Presiding Officers of Labour Courts and Tribunals.[55]

(Note: The text has been divided into paragraphs and arranged serially numbered by the author to facilitate convenience of reading).

(i) .. . following 2008, there is sudden increase in labour unrest in certain industry pockets which came at a time when strikes have actually been on the decline in the country. While strikes and protests are common global phenomena, in the recent years India is facing an alarming situation with the increase in number of unrest, leading to violence and killings which reminds us of the trade union militancy period of 1970s and 80s. This surge in industrial unrest has become a concerning situation for all.

(ii) On September 22, 2008 the CEO of Grazianotransmissioni India, the Indian unit of an Italian auto component maker, was clubbed to death by a group of 200 workers.

(iii) In another incident, in March 2011, a Deputy General Manager (Operations) of Powmex Steel, a unit of Graphite India Ltd. was killed after his vehicle was set afire by irate workers

(iv) In November 2010, an Assistant General Manager of Allied Nippon, an auto parts maker, was stoned to death by angry workers.

(v) In September 2009, the Vice-President (HR) of Pricol was beaten to death by agitating workers.

(v-a)* On July 19, 2012, Mr. Avanish Kumar Dev, General Manager - HR of Maruti Suzuki, Manesar, was burnt alive in the administration building of the factory, in the course of a major rioting on the part of workers

*__Note__: The above incident, which took place subsequent to the publication of the AIOE monograph, has been added by the author.

(vi) These surging incidents of industrial unrests are for sure denting investor's confidence in the country being a safe investment destination and a preferred global investment hub. It has also led to production and financial losses to companies operating in the country. If left unchecked, this ongoing turmoil will surely send wrong signals to foreign and domestic investors, which will directly affect the country's economy and employment generation targets. Today, industrial relation needs more detailed understanding of the needs and mindsets of workers and management, to foster harmonious functioning of enterprises to promote growth.

Recent Unrest

(vii) Most of the adverse unrests were witnessed in the manufacturing, textile and automobile and auto auxiliary industries during 2008-11 and names involved — Hyundai, Honda, Nokia, Bosch, Pricol, Maruti Suzuki to name a few - most of which represent the best across industries.

(viii) Here worth mentioning is the calamitous case of Maruti Suzuki India Ltd., Manesar Plant the largest automobile manufacturing company in India. The strike at Maruti's Manesar Plant started on 4th June, 2011 and continued throughout the year in three phases, adversely affecting the company's production and also the State Revenues. The Haryana State Government declared the strike as illegal and imposed ban by passing prohibitory orders and referred the matter to the local labour court. But even this could not stop the workers from striking. As per estimation, Maruti Suzuki made a loss of Rs. 400 million or roughly $9 million a day in revenue because of the strike, with 1,200 vehicles a day in lost output. The striking workers were demanding the registration and recognition of a new union at the Manesar plant, besides retaining contract labourers for the two upcoming new units inside the complex and withdrawing disciplinary action against the 11 office bearers of the new union. The strike not only affected Maruti Suzuki but also directly affected the supply chain of vendors supplying auto-parts directly to Maruti. Over 100 units suffered a virtual shut-down, while 300-odd manufacturers, which were indirect vendors were reported a daily loss to the tune of 15-20%. Moreover, there were numbers of strikes that took place throughout the country during 2011.

(ix) About 900 workers launched a wildcat strike on 16 March that continued for more than a month at General Motor's India Ltd., Halol plant at Gujarat, opposing the working conditions in the factory and demanding wage hikes, making the company suffer a production loss of above 1,500 units. This was the second such incident at Halol in five months.

(x) The leading tyre manufacturer MRF was compelled to declare lockout at its Kottayam plant in Kerala following labour unrest due to suspension of a worker on disciplinary ground.

(xi) The management of the Hindustan National Glass Industries Limited had to issue suspension of worker for an indefinite period after violence erupted in July at Rishra factory premises in West Bengal over a wage revision demand, leading to the closure of the factory.

(xii) Tata Group firm Voltas also faced a similar issue with its workers protesting against the company's recruitment policy and wages.

(xiii) The Hindalco Industries, Kochi had to declare lock-out of its plant for about 10 months, for an odd number of 200 employees went on strike demanding an upward revision in monthly wages.

(xiv) Workers at Moser Baer's Noida facility workers struck a weeklong strike in October demanding a revision in wages and bonuses.

(xv) Over all, in 2008-11, an increased number of strikes were witnessed in India. To name a few - Satari based Automobile Corporation of Goa Ltd., Nestle, Mahindra & Mahindra, Hyundai India's Chennai plant, Rico Auto Limited, Honda Motorcycle and Scooter India (HMSI), Honda Siel Cars, Haldia Dock Complex of Kolkata Port Trust, Bosch, Toyota Kirloskar Motors, Pepsico etc.

(xvi) Looking into the adverse industrial unrests scenario in the country, some enterprises were even planning to shift their base out of the country or to restructure their business operation. As for instance, the Rs. 743 crore automotive instruments maker Prical, which was recovering from a labour strife that claimed the life of a senior executive at its Periyanaickanpalayam unit in Coimbatore, Tamil Nadu in September, 2009 was working on a restructuring plan from automotive business.

(xvii) In another case, frustrated with the continues recurring of labour unrest, Japanese auto major HMSI had threatened to shut operations at its wholly-owned two-wheeler plant in Haryana and has petitioned the Punjab and Haryana High Court for relief or else it may shut operations in India if the situation persists. Earlier the Honda power had moved out from Uttrakhand and shifted its base to Noida following serious labour problem.

(xviii) Even, Toyota Motors, Bangalore in 2006, following a strike, went on to say that it will stall its future investment plans in the state.

(xix) It is very often noticed that some of the industrial belts are quoted as strike prone zones, due to frequent re-occurrence of industrial unrest which can be evaluated from the disputes recorded during the last few years. The Gurgaon-Manesar belt of Haryana is often referred to as notorious belt because of the number of recurring continues labour disputes during the last five years impacting the industrial environment in the state.

(xx) Though there are no concrete figures on the estimated losses due to the unrest, it is believed that they are to the tune of Rs 800-1000 crore, the biggest brunt being borne by Maruti Suzuki India Ltd. and Honda Motorcycle and Scooter India (HMSI), which has seen production falling by above 65% and non-operation of a new third production line.

(xxi) A leading newspaper in 2011 stated that an economic survey has quoted Gujarat at the top of labour unrest chart due to highest number of strikes and other forms of labour unrest on accounts of various financial and disciplinary issues despite of favorable industrialization policy.[56] (Italics supplied).

Supplementary up-date: On January 27, 2012, the workers of Regency Ceramics, Yanam (near Kakinada) went on a rampage and attacked Mr. KC Chandrasekhar, Vice-President of the Company, who succumbed to the injuries in a hospital in Kakinada. The factory was thereafter closed.

Note by the Editor: It is not out of place to mention that the editor of this book was himself an Industrial Relations Manager for nearly 25 years (from the 1970s to 1990s) in different reputed manufacturing organizations and was a witness to the trade union militancy and worker violence of grave magnitude in various states and parts of the country. Almost all the companies listed in (xv) above are progressive organizations and best paymasters, not only by Indian standards, but by international standards even.

It is hoped that the Presiding Officers of Labour Courts and Tribunals read this before showering uncalled for sympathy on goons, and mercy on hooligans - not at their own expense - but of employers! Apart from strikes, go-slow and other kinds of work-stoppages, it is startling that five senior executives of industrial organizations were killed by militant workers at different places within a span of four years! Those many Personnel & Industrial Relations Managers had not lost their lives at the hands of militant workers in some 30 years of worst and turbulent IR history of the country during the period from 1960s to 1990s! Is it civilized for adjudicators, particularly at the trial court level, to remain blind to the ground realities and proceed to decide cases in a callous and irresponsible manner?[57]

(c) Restoration of Sanity in Judicial Disposition and Judicial Process

The following analysis is again drafted from the aforesaid book on Industrial Jurisprudence for the benefit of the civilised citizens, lawyers, academics, students of law and, most importantly, for the judges of labour courts and tribunals, in the fond hope that they would do some soul-searching with special reference to the kind and quality of judgments that are being rendered by them in this branch of law, to the absolute detriment of equity, fair play, good conscience and the very sense of justice.[58] The reasoning and conclusions of Desai J, with all the misstatements of law and judicial abnormalities, did not obviously find favour with several right-thinking judges during the 1990s, as can be seen from the following decisions of Kerala and Bombay High Courts. The first in this chain is Bhavani Metal, in which Dhanuka J, of Bombay HC, while upholding the dismissal of the workman, observed that Mulchandani had been merely distinguished in Glaxo, but had not been overruled, as both were judgments of co-ordinate Benches; that both the judgments were operative and binding, each in its own sphere.[59]

The second one is that of Sukumaran J, of the Kerala High Court in BPL India, which is in a class by itself in so far as the learned judge adopted a down-to-earth approach, unembellished by platform rhetoric or ultra-radical ideological overtones. The facts of the case, in short, were: The workmen resorted to a strike on certain issues. Five workmen, who assaulted management staff outside the main gate of the factory, were charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed. The relevant standing order reads: 'Riotous and disorderly behaviour during working hours within the premises of the company or any act subversive of discipline either within or outside the premises of the company'. The Labour Court, while observing that the enquiry was in order, nevertheless ordered reinstatement on the ground that the misconduct took place outside the factory. Quashing the order of the Labour Court, Sukumaran J, observed:

Till the Glaxo Laboratories case, no decision of any court had referred to Standing Orders as a Penal Statute. The Supreme Court has in Glaxo Laboratories case (supra), no doubt, now made such an observation. That has to be noted by the courts. ...Glaxo Laboratories case has not given any interpretation which would render the Standing Order a dead letter. …A question of interpretation and the invocation of the principles of interpretation would arise only if there be ambiguity in the provisions. Absent ambiguity, interpretational exercises are irrelevant. …The assault and attack took place just before the factory gate. It was referable to a strike situation of the factory concerned. Those assaulted and attacked were officers of the management. They were proceeding to attend the work, though the strike was on. The striking workers had their agitation and shed at the factory gate itself. It is then abundantly clear that the provocation for the assault and attack was not a private feud, or an individual conflict. ...The decision is fully covered by the Tata Oil Mills case. ...Tribunal committed an error of law when it thought that no misconduct could be posited. ...It has, therefore, to be, and is, hereby quashed.[60]

While making a general observation on the pressing need to eschew industrial violence and preserve order and discipline, the learned judge observed:

Discipline in an establishment has to be preserved at all costs; almost like the apple of the eye. Violence, crude violence, directed against the top managerial personnel, would be the swan song of industrial peace. No worker can embrace violence as a motto of grievance redressal. The tragedy gets aggravated when viewed in the background of a nation where non-violence was a well-canvassed creed. ...Industrial Tribunals should not develop cold feet, when they have to deal with hard cases, where the very structure, the morale and discipline of an industrial establishment are imperilled. I have no hesitation in holding that the seriousness and gravity of the misconduct attracts serious and grave punishment. If the management thought that dismissal was the proper punishment, that cannot be characterised as viciously unreasonable, justifying interference in writ jurisdiction. The court has only to uphold and declare the validity of the managerial action in such circumstances. (ibid.) (Italics supplied).

It is a great relief to find that 'sanity' and 'good sense' have not vanished from higher judiciary, despite a few judges of the hue and shade of Desai and Reddy JJ, who condoned with impunity grave acts of misconduct involving militancy, violence, fraud and misappropriation, with absolutely no concern for the larger interests of the industry and industrial community. The decision of Sukumaran J, came as the much-awaited shower to the parched land. The highly irresponsible decisions by the likes of Desai, Iyer and Reddy JJ, during the 1970s and 1980s, graduated themselves to the level of judicial rewards to criminals and incentives for resorting to violence. Justice Sukumaran manifestly rejected the line of reasoning of Desai J, and rightly followed Tata Oil, MS Dhantwal and Mulchandani.

The third case, which deserves a mention is that of Srikrishna J, of Bombay High Court (as he then was), in Mather Platt. In a somewhat similar set of facts as BPL, the learned judge rejected Glaxo Laboratories and followed MS Dhantwal and Mulchandani. The extract from his decision, which has a refreshing impact on an otherwise chaotic Industrial relations scene, is reproduced below:

> The proposition of law deducible from a conspectus of authorities, during the period 1953 to 1975, appears too firmly settled and could not have been intended to be dislodged, by a side wind, by the pronouncement in Glaxo Laboratories case. It is difficult to accede to the contention advanced on behalf of the petitioner that the judgment in Glaxo Laboratories' case is a radical departure from the law laid down in Mulchandani's case. Both Mulchandani and Glaxo Laboratories were judgments of Benches of the Supreme Court consisting of three Judges. There is no evidence in the Glaxo Laboratories' case (supra) that the law laid down in Mulchandani's case (supra), was departed from or, much less, intended to be over-ruled. ...In my view, there is no difficulty in holding that it is the law laid down in Mulchandani's case which must apply to the petitioner's case. ...As I read them, with great respect, the observations in the Glaxo's judgment must be taken to be confined to and arising out of the peculiar phraseology of the Standing Order which was before the Supreme Court. I am in respectful agreement with the observations of the Supreme Court in Glaxo.. . In my judgment, interpreting the Standing Order applicable to the petitioner's case, in the manner suggested by the petitioner's counsel, would make it operate as a 'rogue's charter'.[61] (Italics supplied).

On the facts of the case, Srikrishna J, went on to observe:

> Unfortunately, the section of workmen led by the present petitioner...to the residence of Moses in the dead of the night, not for beseeching him to give up his thinking nor for preaching the benefits of unison in thoughts or deeds, but to overawe and silence him by sheer muscle-power. They call upon him to open up the doors of his house, and upon his declining to do so, break open the front and rear doors. They march into his house, like a band of maraudering goons; they assault the lady of the house, the son and daughter-in-law of Moses and also Moses. ...If this be the conduct of the workmen...can it be said that this was an assault for a purely and personal and private matter unconnected with the industrial relations...? Looked at from the point of view of law or common sense which are not sworn enemies - I think that the answer can but be negative. (Italics supplied)

The mild tone and tenor of Sukumaran and Srikrishna JJ, are understandable, in the light of the fact that they were delivering judgments qua judges of High Courts. That the ratio of Glaxo Laboratories had ruffled the judicial conscience of many right thinking judges is not in doubt. It goes to the credit of Sukumaran and Srikrishna JJ, that they rendered yeomen service to the cause of justice and set the tone for a saner judicial approach to cases involving violence and hooliganism among workers.

The fourth one is BPL Systems, in which MJ Rao CJ, of the Kerala High Court (as he then was) held:

> The case in Mulchandani... is directly in point. ...The present case fits squarely into the above case (supra). Likewise in Lala Ram (supra) the Supreme Court held that if there was 'nexus' between the misconduct and the employment, it was sufficient. In the light of the above dicta, the present case of dismissal was rightly upheld by the Industrial Tribunal. In our view, in Glaxo Laboratories...Supreme Court, on facts, held that there was no misconduct within the scope of the Standing Orders. ...Glaxo Laboratories' case cannot therefore be said to have deviated in principle from the ratio of earlier cases decided by Benches of three Judges.[62]

Again, the softer observations made by the learned Chief Justice, like those of Srikrishna and Sukumaran JJ, are understandable, notwithstanding the fact that the gross abuse of judicial power by Desai J, does not call for anything short of an outright condemnation in the strongest possible terms and language.

The fifth case is that of Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay, in which the facts were: a clash among three rival unions (led by M/s. George Fernandez, Datta Samant and Baburao Patil) snowballed into violence involving pelting of stones on the BEST vehicles, damage to the property of undertaking, and injuries to police personnel. The police rounded up several workers and registered cases under various sections of the IPC. The workmen were charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed. The Labour Court set aside the dismissal on the ground inter alia that the incident took place outside the premises of the establishment. Quashing the order of the Labour Court, Pendse J, held:

> The Supreme Court in Glaxo's case specifically observed that the question as to whether there is a causal connection or a nexus with the place of work will have to be determined. ...it is futile to suggest that even if stones are pelted and damage is done to BEST buses, the action will not amount to misconduct because the buses were not on the premises of the undertaking. ...the conduct clearly amounts to misconduct which attracts the Standing Orders. It is necessary to take a pragmatic approach in such matters and not a technical approach which would defeat the cause of justice and would cause untold hardship to the Undertaking which is rendering public service. The contention urged on behalf of respondent...would give charter to the employees to misbehave in the running buses and avoid the consequences.[63] (Italics supplied).

Five decisions in a row involving similar facts as of Glaxo bear ample testimony to the fact that the learned judges of High Courts had to swim against the current and perform an unenviable task to undo the damage done to the cause and sense of justice by Desai J. It is not in dispute that Glaxo infused a score of obnoxious elements into the realm of industrial jurisprudence. All the five learned judges, i.e..., Dhanuka, Sukumaran, Srikrishna, MJ Rao and Pendse, JJ, deserve to be complimented by every sane and right-thinking citizen, and the gratitude of every member of the industrial community for squarely rejecting the intellectual insolvency of Desai J, as reflected in Glaxo, which bore on its forehead the brand of 'irrationality' as picturesquely described by Lord Diplock in CCSU thus: 'By irrationality, I mean what can now be succinctly referred to as 'Wednesbury unreasonableness'. It applies to a decision which is so outrageous in its defiance of logic or of accepted moral standards that no sensible person who had applied his mind to the question to be decided could have arrived at.'[64] In Bharat Fritz, in which a few workmen were dismissed, the findings recorded by the High Court showed that:

(i) the workmen had gone into chamber of the Company's President in an aggressive mood;

(ii) they threatened him with dire consequences if the notice was not removed;

(iii) they confined him to his room and came very close to him with gesticulations and fisted hands;

(iv) they did not go out in spite of request and shouted slogans stating that the President should not go out; and

(v) they stayed there till the President gave instructions to his staff to remove the notice.

Despite all this, the High Court took a very liberal and generous view of the matter and held that the said acts were not that grave as to deserve the punishment of dismissal. Quashing the order of HC, Justice Agarwal observed that the said acts were subversive of discipline and that, taking the facts and circumstances of the case as also the interests of the industry into consideration, it would not be desirable and expedient to direct reinstatement of these workmen. On this view, the learned judge ordered payment of compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[65] In TELCO, the facts disclosed that the workman was in unauthorised occupation of a company's quarter. The suit filed against the workman for vacation was decreed in favour of the company. When the Town Warden went to execute the decree along with the Nazir of the Civil Court, the workman assaulted him causing serious injuries. The Labour Court and High Court held that the punishment of dismissal was disproportionate and ordered reinstatement. Quashing the orders of the courts below, and very rightly so, Pasayat J, of the Supreme Court, held:

> We find that the Labour Court has found the inquiry to be fair and proper. The conduct highlighted by the management and established in inquiry was certainly of very grave nature. The Labour Court and the High Court have not found that the misconduct was of any minor nature. On the contrary, the finding on facts that the acts complained of were established has not been disturbed. That being so, the leniency shown by the Labour Court is clearly unwarranted and would in fact encourage indiscipline. Without indicating any reason as to why it was felt that the punishment was disproportionate, the Labour Court should not have passed the order in the manner done.[66]

At this point, it is essential to mention Kerala Solvent Extractions, one of the greatest decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in the 'post-Desai phase', which can be rightly described as the fore-runner of several decisions, which restored sanity in the reasoning process. The very fact that several right thinking Judges of the High Courts and the Supreme Court have heavily relied upon the observations made in the said case bears eloquent testimony to this assertion. Reverting to Kerala Solvent Extractions, the facts of the case disclosed that the workmen concerned were employed by the company as badli headload workers in godowns. A notice was issued stating that only those persons who had studied upto VIII standard or below should apply. The workmen, who applied for employment stating that they had passed VII standard, did not specifically mention that they had passed SSLC. It was only after their appointment that the appellant came to know that they had passed SSLC and that there was a violation of the notification. The appointments were made in the year 1988, and the services of the workmen were terminated by the management in 1989. The labour court ordered their reinstatement with continuity of service but without back wages. Both the single judge and Division Bench of the Kerala High Court upheld the order of labour court. Quashing the orders of all the courts below, a Bench comprising Venkatachaliah CJI, Mohan and Jeevan Reddy JJ of the Supreme Court, made some enlightened observations, which deserve special mention:

> Sri Vaidyanathan, learned senior Counsel for the appellant, submitted, in our opinion not without justification, that the Labour Court's reasoning bordered on perversity and such unreasoned, undue liberalism and misplaced sympathy would subvert all discipline in administration. ...He further submitted that this laxity of judicial reasoning will imperceptibly introduce slackness and unpredictability in the legal process and, in the final analysis, corrode legitimacy of the judicial process. ...We are inclined to agree with these submissions. In recent times, there is an increasing evidence of this, perhaps well-meant but wholly unsustainable, tendency towards a denudation of the legitimacy of judicial reasoning and process. The reliefs granted by the Courts must be seen to be logical and tenable within the framework of the law and should not incur and justify the criticism that the jurisdiction of Courts tends to degenerate into misplaced sympathy, generosity and private benevolence. It is essential to maintain the integrity of legal reasoning and the legitimacy of the conclusions. They must emanate logically from the legal findings and the judicial results must be seen to be principled and supportable on those findings. Expansive judicial mood of mistaken and misplaced compassion at the expense of the legitimacy of the process will eventually lead to mutually irreconcilable situations and denude the judicial process of its dignity, authority, predictability and respectability. ...In this case, we have no hesitation to hold that both the Labour Court and the High Court have erred... [67](Italics supplied)

The above observation puts the norms of judicial decorum and decency in proper perspective, while chastising the imperialist tendencies of later phase, which, if heeded to by the higher judiciary, can salvage the prestige and honour of Supreme Court. When the decisions rendered and judicial disposition displayed by a few judges of the 70s and 80s are tested on the anvil of Kerala Solvent Extractions, the conclusion, that they did indeed subvert the legislative intent as well as the Constitution, is irresistible. Five decades ago, Vivian Bose J, administered a similar note of caution in JK Iron, to the effect: 'under the guise of doing social justice, the Tribunal must not adopt the attitude of a benevolent despot, ignoring the real questions at issue and basing its decision on irrelevant considerations'.[68] The said observation, directed to the Labour Courts and Tribunals, did not carve out an oasis for higher judiciary. The only difference between JK Iron and Kerala Solvent lies in that the former was pronounced at a time when judicial standards were at the zenith of their glory, whereas latter came when they nose-dived to the rock-bottom level. Even so, it is futile for the Supreme Court to pass strictures on courts of inferior jurisdiction, when the judges of the apex court themselves fail to demonstrate self-discipline and restraint. If a lower court is found to be irresponsible in giving a clean chit to cases involving grave acts of misconduct or exhibiting ultra-generous demeanour far beyond the known legal principles, the blame for such transgression should be squarely placed at the door of the Supreme Court.[69] In Suresh Pal, the labour court upheld the punishment of dismissal inflicted upon a conductor, who was dismissed for not issuing tickets to twenty passengers thereby causing financial loss to the corporation. The High Court, while exercising its writ jurisdiction, reduced the punishment to one of censure entry and stoppage of two increments, on the ground that the punishment of dismissal was shockingly disproportionate. Quashing the order of the High Court, the Supreme Court observed that the said act on the part of the conductor amounted to serious misconduct, which should be dealt with an iron hand and not leniently.[70]

Here is a recent decision rendered by Banumati J, of the Supreme Court (for herself and Thakur J) in Collector Singh, which pathetically reminds of the dark days of Glaxo, AL Kalra, Gujarat Steel Tubes, Rama Kant Mishra, Ved Prakash Gupta, etc., which were decided in a dismal fashion by anarchist judges of the hue and shade of Desai, Reddy and Iyer JJ. Before analysing the mediocre reasoning adopted and the misplaced sympathy showered by Banumathi J, in a case which disclosed riotous and disorderly behaviour, disobedience, insubordination and the threatening of his superior with dire consequences outside the factory on the part of a workman, and whose dismissal was upheld by all the courts below, ie, the labour court, single judge and the division bench of the High Court, it is necessary to state, briefly, the facts of the case: the workman was charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed, after enquiry on charges of throwing jute / cotton waste balls hitting the face of the foreman of the company and, when objected, abusing the foreman in filthy language and threatening him with dire consequences outside the premises of the factory. On a reference, the labour court upheld the dismissal. The High Court dismissed the writ petition filed by the workman. A few observartions made by Banumathi J, have been identified, para-wise, for analysis below, duly italicising the relevant portions:

> 6... . Learned counsel for the respondent then contended that the appellant is a habitual offender and on a previous occasion, on 18.7.1988 the appellant had misbehaved with a co-worker whereby a warning notice had been issued to the appellant and the appellant assured never to repeat such an act. It was submitted that inspite of such warning the appellant was again defiant and having regard to the gravity of charges, the Management imposed punishment of dismissal from service and Labour Court rightly held that such punishment was justified.

The above facts disclose that it was not a case of momentary, emotional outburst and the workman was having an inherent tendency to be unruly and violent toward his fellow-workmen, which finally graduated to the level of throwing cotton and jute balls on his immediate superior coupled with threatening him of dire consequences outside the factory. What does this threat mean? Could the learned judge, at the level of the Court of Last Resort, afford to allow such a misconduct to pass muster in convenient silence? The labour court had, after recording evidence on either side and a finding as to the commission or otherwise of the misconduct, rightly held that dismissal was justified. This decision was upheld by both the tiers of the High Court.

> 7... Yet another argument advanced on behalf of the respondent was that use of abusive language against the Foreman is a serious misconduct and punishment of dismissal from service cannot be said to be harsh or disproportionate. It was submitted that any leniency towards such misconduct would have serious impact on the discipline amongst the workmen in the factory and keeping in view the gravity of the charges proved, the courts below have rightly declined to interfere with the quantum of punishment. To substantiate his contention, learned counsel placed reliance upon a number of judgments.

The arguments advanced by counsel for respondent were sane and right in so far as any lenience in matters of indiscipline involving riotous or disorderly behaviour, sabotage, dishonesty and fraud will have serious consequences for the whole organisation by sending wrong signals to the employees at large. Perhaps the learned judge is not aware of what is happening on the industrial front, particularly, during the past 6-7 years. It will do well for her Lordship to note that some 7 (seven) managerial personnel had lost their lives in four years in union militancy and worker violence. These facts have been presented in some detail in the preceding paragraphs. It would be better for the learned judges, not only of the Supreme Court, but at all levels including High Courts and Labour Courts, to go through the terrible incidents narrated therein.

> 13. Coming to the case at hand, we are of the view that the punishment of dismissal from service for the misconduct proved against the appellant is disproportionate to the charges.. .. . Reference may also be made to the decisions of this Court in Rama Kant Misra,[71]. .. and Ved Prakash Gupta.[72]

With great respect, it has to be said that the learned judge had chosen to rely on wrong cases, which represent - not judicial sanity - but judicial anarchy of the mid-1970s and 1980s infused and fostered by a few unruly judges like Desai J, who went about condoning grave acts of violence, assaults on fellow-employees, supervisors and managerial personnel. For instance, Rama Kant Mishra was decided by Desai J (for himself and Eradi J) and Ved Prakash Gupta was decided by Varadarajan J (for himself, Desai and Reddy JJ). What enlightenment can any one expect to derive from the outrageous decisions handed down, inter alia, in the above cases? It is surprising why the learned judge left out Glaxo Laboratories,[73] from the matrix of cases relied on by her. As a matter of fact, the above two cases cited by her pale into insignificance before Glaxo - a landmark case, though for all the wrong reasons - which would have greatly strengthened her conclusion, howsoever frightening it might be, on the issue of proportionality.

> 14. The High Court has relied on the judgment in Mahindra and Mahindra Ltd.,[74]wherein it was held that the penalty of dismissal on the alleged use of filthy language is not disproportionate to the charge as it disturbs the discipline in the factory. We are of the view that in the facts and circumstances of the present case, the above decision may not be applicable. Considering the totality of the circumstances, in our view, the punishment of dismissal from service is harsh and disproportionate and the same has to be set aside.

The High Court had, in its infinite wisdom, relied on Mahindra & Mahindra, and very rightly so, instead of the bankrupt decisions of Desai and Varadarajan JJ. The High Court deserves whole-hearted compliments for displaying a phenomenal sense of proportion and civilised approach while handling a critical case of grave indiscipline, which approach was so conspicuous by its absence in the decision claimed to be emanating from the Highest Court of the land. Secondly, what is meant by the observation, "in the facts and circumstances of the present case, the above decision may not be applicable", when the facts of the two cases are not only identical, but the present case goes a step further and presents an even more grave picture? With great deference, was the learned judge visualising a situation in which the delinquent workman travels a few yards further and physically assaults the Foreman, before the Court could draw a conclusion that the punishment of dismissal was proportionate to the misconduct? To say the least, this decision is a standing illustration of the falling standards of decision-making process at the highest level. Thirdly, the last observation (in para 14 above), "considering the totality of the circumstances, in our view, the punishment of dismissal from service is harsh and disproportionate and the same has to be set aside", betrays the half-tones and the absolute lack of judicial conviction on the part of the learned judge. What is that 'totality of circumstances', when the case itself consisted of a simple set of facts, i.e..., insubordination, riotous and disorderly behaviour and threatening the superior officer, and was proved beyond doubt? What else is there in this short and simple case, in order to justify the so-called 'totality'? If it were so, what prevented the learned judge from highlighting those circumstances before reaching an atrocious conclusion that the punishment was disproportionate. Viewed from any standard, could any learned judge afford the expensive luxury of adopting Desai J, as a role model in so far as the analysis of facts, line of reasoning, application of law or final conclusions are concerned? Reverting to the decision proper, the final conclusion of the learned judge runs thus:

> Having said that the punishment of dismissal from service is harsh and disproportionate, this Court in ordinary course would either order reinstatement modifying the punishment or remit the matter back to the disciplinary authority for passing fresh order of punishment. But we are deliberately avoiding the ordinary course. We are doing so because nearly two decades have passed since his termination and over these years the appellant must have been gainfully employed elsewhere. Further, the appellant was born in the year 1955 and has almost reached the age of superannuation. In such circumstances, there cannot be any order of reinstatement and award of lump sum compensation would meet the ends of justice. Considering the length of service of the appellant in the establishment and his deprivation of the job over the years and his gainful employment over the years elsewhere, in our view, lump sum amount of compensation of Rs.5,00,000/- would meet the ends of justicein lieu of reinstatement, back wages, gratuity and in full quit (sic) of any other amount payable to the appellant.[75] (para 15).

If the reasoning of the learned judge analysed in the above paragraphs is just bad, the final decision granting Rs 5,00,000/- as compensation is worse. This becomes even more conspicuous in the face of the fact that the learned judge admitted that the appellant would have been working elsewhere and was gainfully employed. What kind of message was the Apex Court seeking to send to the civilised citizens at large? At this point, it is considered expedient, even at the cost of repetition, to cite the following passage from "Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary", which directly refers to the three learned judges, and which pre-eminently applies to the outrageous decision rendered in collector singh too:

> The three judges had literally flashed a green signal to unruly workers and militant trade union leaders like Datta Samant, Suryanarayana Rao, et al, together with an assurance of the kind: "Don't worry! Continue with your good work!! We are here to protect your interests!!!" While it does not take more than a stroke of pen for an irresponsible judge to destroy law and order, it would certainly take ages for his successors to restore them. That is what exactly has been happening during the past couple of decades with a few right-thinking judges of 1990s and thereafter swimming across the current to restore 'justice' in the Seat of Justice! The seal of judicial approval put on serious acts of misconduct, and in some cases with criminal overtones, had only fuelled the fire of inter-union and intra-union violence, physical assaults of managerial and supervisory personnel, and the like, during the late 1970s and the whole of 1980s in several industrial belts, prominent among them being the Whole of West Bengal, Bombay-Thane-Belapur, Bangalore-Whitefield-Hosur and Hyderabad-Sanatnagar-Patancheru.[76]

Could it be said that the decision rendered by Banumati J is any worse? This decision doesn't deserve any further analysis, notwithstanding the fact that the learned judge made certain amusing observations - one such observation is, "compensation. .. in lieu of 'gratuity', etc.," (), which itself is absolutely misconceived in the face of s 4(6) of the Payment of Gratuity Act in terms whereof an employee, who has been dismissed for certain acts of misconduct including riotous, violent or disorderly behaviour, is disqualified from receiving gratuity in its entirety! With great deference, it is submitted that Collector Singh is a standing example of the abuse of judicial power at its peak, punctuated by misplaced reliance, perverse reasoning, misconceived conclusion and uncalled for generosity, and deserves to be condemned outright and rejected lock, stock and barrel without a second look.

In Jayaram Reddy, the facts briefly were: the employee, who was engaged on a casual basis as a conductor, was removed from service for a misconduct related to ticketing. Sometime later, the Corporation notified some 300 vacancies of conductor. The employee applied for the post without, however, disclosing the fact that he was earlier removed from service. He was selected, appointed and was also regularised in due course. Later, the corporation came to know that, while working on a casual basis earlier, he was removed from service for a misconduct, which fact was concealed by him while applying for a regular post. He was charge-sheeted and dismissed after enquiry. The labour court directed reinstatement but without back wages. In a writ petition filed by the workman, a single judge of the AP High Court directed payment of full back wages, which was confirmed by the Division Bench. However, the employee did not join the company despite the order of reinstatement as he secured an alternative employment. Quashing the orders of the High Court, Sinha J (for himself and Joseph J), of the Supreme Court ordered that the amount of Rs. 83,954/- paid to the workman as back wages should not be recovered.[77] Where the bus conductor was found carrying passengers without ticket and was dismissed after holding an enquiry, the Supreme Court held that interference by the labour court with the quantum of punishment was improper.[78] In Tamilnadu STC, the High Court upheld the order of labour court directing reinstatement of a driver on the ground that there was no eye witness to the accident and that it was further found that he made sincere attempt to avoid collision with the oncoming vehicle, and its interference with the quantum of punishment could not be found fault with. The High Court further observed that it was well established that the accident did not occur due to the rash and negligent driving on the part of the driver, and that the discretionary power available to the labour court under s 11A could not be said to have been exercised arbitrarily.[79] In Usha Breco, SB Sinha J (for himself and Sirpurkar J), of the Supreme Court culled out the principles governing the disciplinary process as well as the limitations on exercise of discretion by the labour court while interfering with the disciplinary action and/or the punishment imposed by the management thus:

> The Management is not only required to scrupulously follow the procedures laid down therein but was otherwise bound to comply with the principles of natural justice. If a misconduct has been committed within the purview of the provisions of the Standing Order, whether certified or Model, the workmen should be punished. The gravity of the offence, the impact the same would have on the other workmen as also the fact as to whether the same will have an adverse effect over the functioning of the industry are relevant considerations.. .. Section 11-A of the Act as interpreted by Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. (supra) must be applied at different stages. Firstly, when the validity or legality of the domestic enquiries is in question; secondly, in the event, the issue is determined in favour of the Management, no fresh evidence is required to be adduced by it whereas in the event it is determined in favour of the workmen, subject to the request which may be made by the Management in an appropriate stage, it will be permitted to adduce fresh evidence before the Labour Court. .. Indisputably, in the event, fresh evidence is adduced before the Labour Court by the Management, the Labour Court will have the jurisdiction to appreciate the evidence. But, in a case where the materials brought on record by the Enquiry Officer fall for re-appreciation by the Labour Court, it should be slow to interfere therewith. It must come to a conclusion that the case was a "proper" one therefor. The Labour Court shall not interfere with the findings of the Enquiry Officer only because it is lawful to do so. It would not take recourse thereto only because another view is possible. Even assuming that, for all intent and purport, the Labour Court acts as an appellate authority over the judgment of the Enquiry Officer, it would exercise appropriate restraint. It must bear in mind that the Enquiry Officer also acts as a quasi-judicial body. Before it, parties are not only entitled to examine their respective witnesses, they can cross-examine the witnesses examined on behalf of the other side. They are free to adduce documentary evidence. The parties as also the Enquiry Officer can also summon witnesses to determine the truth. The Enquiry Officer can call for even other records. It must indisputably comply with the basic principles of natural justice.. .. It is one thing to say that the finding of an Enquiry Officer is perverse or betrays the well-known doctrine of proportionality but it is another thing to say that only because two views are possible, the Labour Court shall interfere therewith. In other words, it is one thing to say that on the basis of the materials on record, the Labour Court comes to a conclusion that a verdict of guilt has been arrived at by the Enquiry Officer where the materials suggested otherwise but it is another thing to say that such a verdict was also a possible view.[80] (Paras 25, 26 & 28)

In Swapan Kumar Mitra, the facts, in short, were: The workman, who was working as a driver in South Bengal STC, was charge-sheeted for negligent driving resulting in the death of 15 passengers and was removed after holding an enquiry. In a writ petition, the workman challenged the said dismissal on the ground that certain documents such as the report of the district magistrate, etc., which the management relied upon as well as the report of the enquiry officer was not furnished to him. Secondly, the criminal case instituted against the driver at the instance of one of the injured passengers ended in an acquittal on the ground of insufficient evidence. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court, while setting aside the removal, directed the management to supply copies of the said documents to the workman for filing his comments thereon and reach a fresh conclusion after affording reasonable opportunity to him. In appeal, the Division Bench had set aside the order of the single judge and ordered reinstatement of the workman with back wages and continuity of service, etc. Addressing the second issue first, i.e..., the legality of dismissal subsequent to his acquittal in the criminal case, Pasayat J (for himself and Chatterjee J) of the Supreme Court surveyed the case law on the subject exhaustively and held:

> .. . the nature and scope of proof in a criminal case is very different from that of a departmental disciplinary proceeding and order of acquittal in the former, cannot conclude the departmental proceedings. This Court has further held that in a criminal case charge has to be proved by proof beyond reasonable doubt while in departmental proceeding the standard of proof for proving the charge is mere preponderance of probabilities. Such being the position of law now settled by various decisions of this Court, two of which > have already been referred to earlier, we need not deal in detail with the question whether acquittal in a criminal case will lead to holding that the departmental proceedings should also be discontinued.That being the position, an order of removal from service emanating from a departmental proceeding can very well be passed even after acquittal of the delinquent employee in a criminal case. In any case, the learned Single Judge as well as the Division Bench did not base their decisions relying on the proposition that after acquittal in the criminal case departmental proceedings could not be continued and order of removal could not be passed. ()

On the first issue of non-supply of certain documents, while quashing the order of the Division Bench, the learned judge held:

> We have already indicated that the learned Single Judge was fully justified in directing the disciplinary authority to proceed from the stage supplying the Inquiry Report and other documents to the respondent. .. As directed by the learned Single Judge, it would be open to the respondent No. 1 to file comments or representation against the findings made in the Inquiry Report including the report of the District Magistrate. After considering these comments, the disciplinary authority is directed to reach a fresh and final conclusion, on the question whether an order of removal from service of the respondent No. 1 can be passed. It is needless to say that it would be open to the respondent No. 1 or his authorised representative to cross-examine the witnesses, and also to raise the question of admissibility of the zerox copy of the report of the District Magistrate before the disciplinary authority. Accordingly, the judgment of the Division Bench of the High Court is set aside and the order of the learned Single Judge is restored subject to modifications made herein above. It is also directed that the respondent No.1 during the pendency of the departmental proceeding shall be paid subsistence allowance in accordance with the rules of the Corporation. The appeal is allowed to the extent indicated above.[81] ()

In LIC of India, one of the issues was the jurisdiction of industrial courts in disputes between the Corporation and its employees in view of the settled law that LIC of India is 'State' within the meaning of Art 12 of the Constitution. Yet another question was the legal status of Development Officer of the Corporation vis-à-vis the relative jurisdiction of civil courts versus industrial courts, in view of the fact that 'Development Officer' of LIC was held to be a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s) of the ID Act. Justice Sinha (for himself and Sirpurkar J) held:

> LIC is a "State" within the meaning of Article 12 of the Constitution of India. Its duties and functions are provided for under the 1956 Act. The same by itself, however, having regard to the definition of "Industry" as contained in Section 2(j) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 cannot take within its umbrage the functions of the Life Insurance Corporation outside its purview. (para 11).. . Under the industrial law, and in particular the 1947 Act, the authorities specified therein, the appropriate governments and the industrial courts have various functions to perform. Terms and conditions can be laid down thereunder. Violations of the terms and conditions of service are also justiciable. Safeguards have been provided under the Act to see that services of a workman are not unjustly terminated.The 1947 Act provides for a wider definition of termination of service. Conditions precedent for termination of service have been provided for thereunder. A decision taken by the Disciplinary Authority under the 1956 Act ordinarily could have been a subject matter of suit. The Civil Court, however, exercises a limited jurisdiction. If however, the concerned employee is a 'workman' within the meaning of the provisions of the 1947 Act, his remedy apart from the common law remedies may also lie before an industrial court. When a right accrues under two statutes vis-a-vis the common law right, the concerned employee will have an option to choose his forum. (para 12).. . The jurisdiction of the Industrial Court being wide and it having been conferred with the power to interfere with the quantum of punishment, it could go into the nature of charges, so as to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the respondent had misused his position or his acts are in breach of trust conferred upon him by his employer.[82] (para 17)

In JK Synthetics, the reference made to the labour court was in two parts: (i) whether the termination of service of the workmen was proper and legal; and (ii) if not, to what benefits and compensation was the workmen entitled. When the labour court made the original award, it answered the first part and did not answer theconsequential second part of the reference. On an application having been made under s 6(6) of the UP Industrial Disputes Act, the labour court recorded that it accidentally omitted the answer to the second part of the reference and rectified the omission by adding a paragraph therein. A Bench of the Supreme Court comprising BP Singh and Raveendran JJ, held that the case squarely fell within the ratio of Tulsipur Sugar (supra),[83] and hence the labour court was within its powers to rectify such an error or accidental omission.[84] It is well settled legal position that misplaced sympathy, generosity and private benevolence cannot be a ground to interfere with the punishment imposed by the Appellate Authority. Even according to the Tribunal, the enquiry was conducted in just and proper manner. When the enquiry was conducted in just and proper manner, the Tribunal cannot interfere with the punishment imposed by the Appellate Authority. Only if the findings of the disciplinary authority/appellate authority are perverse or the Management is guilty of vitimisation, unfair labour practice or mala fide, then only the Tribunal can make an interference with the punishment imposed on the workman. Therefore, the reason assigned by the Tribunal for making interference in the punishment imposed by the Management is not sustainable in law and as such, the interference made by the Tribunal by invoking the provisions under s 11A is not legally sustainable, hence the impugned award is liable to be set aside.[85] It is settled proposition of law that while considering the management's decision to dismiss or terminate the services of a workman, the Labour Court can interfere with the decision of the management only when it is satisfied that the punishment imposed by the management is highly disproportionate to the degree of guilt of the workman concerned. Considering the delay in completing the enquiry and the age of the appellant and the fact that similarly situated workmen were reinstated with lesser punishment, the Labour Court ordered reinstatement, in exercise of its discretion under s 11A. Once the Labour Court has exercised the discretion judicially, the High Court can interfere with the award, only if it is satisfied that the award of the Labour Court is vitiated by any fundamental flaws.[86]

(d) Punishment other than Dismissal: Interference - Whether Justified

Where the management, after conducting an inquiry, imposed the punishment of stoppage of three increments with cumulative effect on a bus conductor for non-issue of tickets and the workman raised an industrial dispute, and the tribunal reduced the punishment to stoppage of three increments without cumulative effect, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court quashed the order of the tribunal holding that the punishment imposed by the management did not call for interference.[87] The facts of this case and the decisions rendered therein require analysis. In the first place, it is not a case of discharge, dismissal or retrenchment or termination otherwise in order to permit an individual workman to raise an industrial dispute by himself as provided under s 2A. Secondly, the facts of the case disclose that neither the union nor a group of workmen had espoused the cause of the individual workman. Thirdly, the powers conferred on labour courts and tribunals under s 11A can only be exercised in the case of discharge or dismissal, which clearly excludes any other punishment short of dismissal from the purview of the adjudicatory jurisdiction of labour courts under s 11A. As a matter of fact, the scope of power vested in the labour court or tribunal under s 11A is so limited that it cannot adjudicate even a case of retrenchment or termination otherwise, even though both involve severance of employer-employee relationship. In the face of this legal position, the reference made by the Government of Gujarat, in a case involving stoppage of increment was itself incompetent. Secondly, the industrial tribunal should have promptly rejected the reference as being outside the scope of its jurisdiction. Instead, it proceeded to exercise its jurisdiction wrongfully. In DDA,[88] the facts were that the management refused to allow a workman, who was arrested on a charge of murder and later acquitted by the court, to report for duty. The management did not issue any charge-sheet, did not hold any inquiry, did not issue any termination order, but merely refused the workman to resume duties. Further, when the dispute raised by the workman was taken up for adjudication, the management did not appear before the authority. The labour court passed an ex parte award against the management directing that the workman should be reinstated with full backwages. A single judge of the Delhi High Court held that the ex parte order passed by the labour court was justified and it did not call for interference.

2. Proviso

For restoring the balance disturbed by the bewildering maze of conflicting dicta, on the scope of tribunal jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the validity and justifiability of punishment of 'discharge' or 'dismissal' imposed upon an industrial workman by his employer, the Parliament enacted s 11A. The main section enlarges the scope of adjudication while the proviso enjoins on the tribunal 'in any proceeding under this section' to rely only on the 'materials on record' and not to take 'fresh evidence' in relation to the 'matter'. The proviso is a typical illustration of obscurity in drafting. Simple and perhaps reasonable though the postulates of this proviso appear, they camouflage a pandora's box of questions to be resolved; what is the scope of the expression 'any proceedings under this section'? What is the 'record'? Is it the record of the inquiry officer, or of the punishing authority or of the tribunal? What is the connotation of the expressions 'material on record', 'fresh evidence' and 'in relation to the matter'? The answer to these questions would depend upon the construction of the proviso. It is well settled that the language of a proviso, even if general, is normally to be construed limiting its operation to the field covered by the section to which the proviso is appended.[89] In Dwarka Prasad, speaking for the Supreme Court, Krishna Iyer J, stated the law in connection with construction of a proviso:

> A proviso must be limited to the subject-matter of the enacting clause. It is a settled rule of construction that a proviso must prima facie be read and considered in relation to the principal matter to which it is a proviso. It is not a separate or independent enactment. 'Words are dependent on the principal enacting words, to which they are tacked as a proviso. They cannot be read as divorced from their context' ... If the rule of construction is that prima facie a proviso should be limited in its operation to the subject-matter of the enacting clause, the stand we have taken is sound. To expand the enacting clause, inflated by the proviso, sins against the fundamental rule of construction that a proviso must be considered in relation to the principal matter to which it stands as a proviso. A proviso ordinarily is but a proviso, although the golden rule is to read the whole section, inclusive of the proviso, in such manner that they mutually throw light on each other and result in a harmonious construction.[90]

In S Sundaram Pillai, the court summed up the purport and parameters of a proviso thus:

(1) qualifying or excepting certain provisions from the main enactment;

(2) it may entirely change the very concept of the intendment of the enactment by insisting on certain mandatory conditions to be fulfilled in order to make the enactment workable;

(3) it may be so embedded in the Act itself as to become an integral part of the enactment and thus acquire the tenor and colour of the substantive enactment itself; and

(4) it may be used merely to act as an optional addenda to the enactment with the sole object of explaining the real intendment of the statutory provision.[91]

In Kerala State Cashew Corporation, the facts briefly were: A workman was charge-sheeted for an act of misconduct. Even though the charges proved were serious, the management took a lenient view and, instead of dismissing, reverted him to the next lower grade. The union took up the case and the labour court, inter alia, held that the enquiry was proper, but the enquiry officer was biased. On this view of the matter, it set set the enquiry proceedings and posted the case for fresh evidence. In a writ petition, a single judge of Kerala High Court upheld the order of the labour court, which was set aside by the the Division Bench. While dismissing the appeal filed by the union, Pasayat J (for himself and Chatterjee J) of the Supreme Court upheld the view of the Division Bench, and peremptorily circumscribed the powers of the labour courts while handing any punishment, which is short of dismissal thus:

> The Labour Court had earlier held that the enquiry was properly held and there was no violation of the principles of natural justice and that the findings were not perverse. The vitiating facts found by the Labour Court against the enquiry are erroneous and are liable to be set aside. If enquiry is fair and proper, in the absence of any allegations of victimization or unfair labour practice, the Labour Court has no power to interfere with the punishment imposed. Section 11A of the Act gives ample power to the Labour Court to re-appraise the evidence adduced in the enquiry and also sit in appeal over the decision of the employer in imposing punishment. Section 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act is only applicable in the case of dismissal or discharge of a workman as clearly mentioned in the Section itself.. .. When enquiry was conducted fairly and properly, in the absence of any of the allegations of victimisation or malafides or unfair labour practice, Labour Court has no power to interfere with the punishment imposed by the management. Since Section 11A is not applicable, Labour Court has no power to reappraise the evidence to find out whether the findings of the enquiry officer are correct or not or whether the punishment imposed is adequate or not. Of course, Labour Court can interfere with the findings if the findings are perverse. But, here there is a clear finding that the findings are not perverse and principles of natural justice were complied with while conducting enquiry.. .. Above being the position the impugned judgment of the High Court does not suffer from any infirmity to warrant interference.[92] (emphasis added)

The above ruling is right and places the powers conferred on labour courts u/s 11A in the correct perspective. In the face of clear and unambiguous language used both in the heading which runs thus: "Power of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals to give Appropriate Relief in case of Discharge or Dismissal of Workmen" and in the opening part of the section, i.e..., "Where an industrial dispute relating to the discharge or dismissal of a workman has been referred to a Labour Court. . .", it is too far-fetched for the trial courts to assume jurisdiction in respect of any punishment short of dismissal, by relying on flimsy notions and untenable arguments. This over-reaching tendency of labour courts and tribunals deserves to be condemned outright in the strongest possible language. The interpretation of the provision by the learned single judge of Kerala High Court is equally misconceived. If this could be the level of construing the plain language of law and the line of reasoning at the level of the High Court, what to speak about a Presiding Officer of the Labour Court?

(i) 'In any Proceeding under this Section'

The section opens with the words 'where an industrial dispute relating to discharge or dismissal of a workman has been referred to a labour court, tribunal or a national tribunal for adjudication'. The expression 'any proceeding under this section' can, therefore mean only the adjudication proceedings relating to the validity and justifiability of the action of 'discharge or dismissal' of the workman but this expression will not comprehend the proceedings under s 33, if during the pendency of the adjudication of a dispute under this section, an application is made to it for 'permission' or 'approval' of the action taken or proposed to be taken against another workman. Taking of 'fresh evidence' by an adjudicator has been prohibited only 'in any proceedings under this section' but as already discussed, the courts have recognised the right of an employer to sustain the action of 'discharging' or 'dismissing' a workman by adducing evidence before an adjudicator in case he held no inquiry or the inquiry held by him is found to be invalid. In such cases, it goes beyond the scope of s 11A and the whole matter will be at large before the tribunal. The jurisdiction is in such situations much wider than under s 11A.

(ii) 'Materials on Record'

In Firestone, the Supreme Court declined to confine the expression 'materials on record' only to the 'materials which were available at the domestic inquiry', but, on the other hand, held that the expression refers to 'materials on record before the tribunal' which will take in:

(1) the evidence taken by the management at the inquiry and the proceedings of the inquiry, or

(2) the above evidence, and in addition any further evidence led before the tribunal, or

(3) evidence placed before the tribunal for the first time in support of the action taken by an employer as well as the evidence adduced by the workmen contra.

The record of the tribunal begins with the order of reference made by the appropriate Government to it for adjudication of an industrial dispute. The charge-sheet, explanation of the workman, the proceedings of the domestic inquiry, viz, pleadings, the oral and documentary evidence of witnesses before the inquiry officer, the record of the inquiry proceedings, the report of the inquiry officer, the show-cause notice, if any, given by the employer to the workman before imposing the punishment and the reply of the workman thereto and the final order of punishment, come 'on the record' before the tribunal only by way of evidence adduced in the course of adjudication proceeding. Item no. 1 above comprehends these materials. Item no. 2 above would, in addition to the materials comprehended in item no 1, comprehend the order of reference, the pleadings of the parties and any further evidence led before the tribunal in connection with the validity of the inquiry and the bona fides of the employer in initiating the action and inflicting the punishment and the record of the proceedings before the tribunal. Item no. 3 above refers to 'invalid-inquiry' and 'no-inquiry' cases where the evidence is adduced before the tribunal, for the first time, in support of the validity and justifiability of action of dismissal taken by the employer and the evidence adduced by the workman contra. This item comprises of the order of reference, pleadings of the parties and the evidence adduced by the parties along with the record of the proceedings before the tribunal. Speaking for himself, Dua and Vaidialingam JJ of the Supreme Court observed:

> The above items by and large should be considered to be the 'materials on record' as specified in the Proviso. We are not inclined to limit that expression as meaning only that material that has been placed in a domestic enquiry. The Proviso only confines the Tribunal to the materials on record before it as specified above, when considering the justification or otherwise of the order of discharge or dismissal. It is only on the basis of those materials that the Tribunal is obliged to consider whether the misconduct is proved and the further question whether the proved mis- conduct justifies the punishment of dismissal or discharge. [93]

If one of the material pieces of evidence on record is not considered by the tribunal, the award will be amenable to judicial review. In such a case, the writ court has to see as to what is the impact of non-consideration of such a material. If it materially affects the ultimate decision taken by the tribunal, then the writ court will review the award.[94] In Rohtas, after holding that the domestic inquiry was fair which position was accepted by the workman, the tribunal directed the parties to adduce fresh evidence with regard to the charges framed against the workman. In these circumstances, the Patna High Court held that it was not permissible for the tribunal to take fresh evidence with regard to the charge framed against the workman. The proviso not only prohibits any 'fresh evidence' in relation to the matter being taken by the tribunal, it also confines the jurisdiction of the tribunal to rely only on the 'materials on record'.[95] In AV Swami, the labour court considered the past record of the workman in a detailed manner which was neither considered nor referred to by either the workman or the employer during the domestic inquiry. In view of the clear mandate of the proviso, a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the labour court was not justified in taking into consideration the past record of the workman. Hence, the award upholding the removal of the employee from service was quashed.[96] In Bhaik Nath, the facts disclosed that, on the consent of both the management and the workman, the labour court considered the materials available on record, and by a reasoned order directed the reinstatement of the workman. The management challenged the award. Upholding the award passed by the labour court, Hegde J (for himself and Sinha J) of the Supreme Court, observed:

> In the background of this concession and in the absence of seeking permission for leading evidence in support of its charge by the appellant it cannot be now permitted to question the procedure adopted by the Labour Court based on consent of the parties. Even the learned single Judge erred in wrongly recording a finding that the appellant was not given an opportunity to lead evidence. As a matter of fact a perusal of the award clearly shows that both the parties addressed arguments on merits and demerits on the basis of evidence on record and after considering the same Labour Court by a reasoned order agreed with the Inquiry Officer that though in the two cases in regard to which an inquiry was conducted the respondent workman has not issued tickets to 3 and 2 passengers respectively, the material on record and explanation given by the respondent sufficiently proved that had good reasons for not having issued the tickets when the checking staff came for checking and the respondent workman had no intention of defrauding the Corporation. This is a finding of fact based on material on record accepted by the Inquiry Officer, the Labour Court and the Division Bench and we find no reason whatsoever to differ from this finding. We are also of the opinion that since the Labour Court had formed an opinion that Disciplinary Authority had not properly considered the evidence on record while coming to a contrary conclusion, Labour Court was justified in going into the question of fact that too as consented by the parties and giving a finding.[1]

(iii) 'Fresh Evidence in Relation to the Matter'

The proviso prohibits any 'fresh evidence' being taken in any proceeding under the section, in relation to the matter but what is the connotation of the expressions 'fresh evidence', and 'the matter' has not been indicated. The expression, 'fresh evidence' therefore, has to be read in the context in which it appears in contradistinction to the expression 'materials on record'. The proviso to this section was inserted by the legislature to place limitation on the power of a tribunal as an appellate authority hearing appeal against the decision in the domestic inquiry. It lays down that the tribunal for the purpose of exercising the power conferred by the main provision cannot call for further 'fresh evidence', as an appellate authority may normally do under a particular statute, when considering the correctness or otherwise of an order passed by the subordinate body. The power to receive 'fresh evidence' contemplated by this proviso would apply only against receiving 'fresh evidence', while reappraising the evidence recorded in the domestic inquiry. For the purposes of any proceeding under this section, the tribunal cannot call for 'further or fresh evidence' as an appellate authority may normally do under a particular statute, when considering the correctness or otherwise of an order passed by a subordinate body.[2]

In cases, where no inquiry at all has been held, the employer has the right to satisfy the tribunal with respect to the validity and justifiability of the action of discharge or dismissal. But where a domestic inquiry has been held, it is open to the workman to contend that the inquiry was not valid or proper. It is equally open for the employer to rely upon the inquiry. The employer may entirely rely upon the inquiry or alternatively offer to adduce evidence before the tribunal to justify the validity of the action in case the inquiry is held to be invalid. In the former case the action of discharge or dismissal will depend upon the validity of the inquiry whereas in the latter case even if the inquiry is held to be invalid, the justifiability of the punishment of the action of discharge or dismissal will depend upon the evidence adduced before the tribunal by the employer in support of the action. In such a case, the tribunal will have to try the validity of the inquiry as a preliminary issue,[3] but the tribunal will get jurisdiction to go into the evidence led by the employer only after deciding the question of the validity of the inquiry.[4] If evidence becomes necessary for a decision on this preliminary issue, the workman who impugns the validity of the inquiry will have to lead evidence. The opportunity to lead evidence cannot be denied to the workman on the ground that the management does not want to adduce any 'fresh evidence'. Even if the validity of the inquiry is not tried as a preliminary issue, the position will not be different. In either case, the workman should get the opportunity to lead evidence in the first instance as it is his contention that no legal and proper inquiry was held. Then, it will be for the management to lead evidence contra to show that the inquiry held was legal and valid. The mere fact that the management does not examine the inquiry officer would not lead to unavoidable inference that no inquiry was held. It is only when the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the authenticity of the document is proved, then it may draw inference that no inquiry was held if the inquiry officer has not been examined.[5]

Since the management has the right to adduce evidence before the tribunal justifying the order of dismissal or discharge, it arises only after the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the domestic inquiry was defective. The right of the workman to adduce evidence contra cannot depend upon the fact whether the management wants to lead any fresh evidence or not. In cases, where the inquiry held by the employer is found to be invalid or no inquiry at all has been held, the tribunal has to give an opportunity to the employer to adduce evidence for the first time to justify the action and then to give an opportunity to the workman to rebut such evidence of the employer. In such a situation, it is the duty of the tribunal to go into that evidence and see whether the action taken by the management was correct or not.[6] In Neeta Kaplish,[7] Saghir Ahmed J observed that, if the labour court found that the domestic inquiry held by the employer was defective, the record pertaining to the said domestic inquiry would not constitute 'fresh evidence'. Such record would also not constitute 'materials on record' within the meaning of s 11A, as the inquiry proceedings had to be ignored altogether. The only way open to the management was to justify its action by leading fresh evidence as required by the labour court. If such evidence had not been led, the management had to suffer the consequences. By permitting the management to adduce evidence, after recording a finding that the inquiry held was not proper, the tribunal does not commit any error. After the incorporation of s 11A, the tribunal is now entitled to hold that even if the misconduct is proved, the punishment of discharge and dismissal is not justified. Therefore, the tribunal is given the power to substitute the view taken by the management.[8]

3. Relief

After the insertion of s 11A, an industrial adjudicator has not only the jurisdiction to set aside the order of dishcarge or dismissal of a workman and direct his reinstatement but it also has the discretion to mould that relief including the award of lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal as may be warranted by the circumstances of the case.[9] In Engine Valves, the Madras High Court summed up the law thus:

> The court exercising powers under s 11A of the Act after finding the misconduct to have been proved is first obliged to advert itself to the question of necessity or desirability to interfere with the punishment imposed by the management and, if the management could not justify the punishment imposed thereafter it must consider the question as to the relief that is to be granted to the employee. In so considering the relief to be granted, the court has an obligation to consider whether the punishment imposed is disproportionate or shockingly severe to the charges held proved and if so whether a reinstatement has to be ordered or whether any other lesser punishment has to be imposed. A specific finding must be recorded whether it was expedient and proper to reinstate the employee or whether award of compensation in lieu of reinstatement will meet the requirements and ends of justice of the case concerned. Absence of reasons to invoke the power and interfere under provisions of s 11A in a particular case would render the very exercise of powers rbitrary and perverse and the order consequently would stand vitiated.[10]

Even if the charges are proved, the tribunal is not bound to uphold the order of discharge or dismissal. It has the discretion to direct reinstatement with or without any conditions. Nor is the tribunal bound to direct reinstatement merely because the order of dismissal or discharge is found to be invalid. These are now the matters in the discretion of the tribunal. The discretion of the tribunal properly exercised is not amenable to judicial review.[11] But it is relevant to remember that before granting relief under this section, the triibunal must record a finding that the discharge or dismissal is illegal or unjustified. In the absence of such finding, it has absolutely no power to grant any relief or lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal as the circumstances of the case may require or any other relief such as compensation.[12] The question of relief arises only where the termination, discharge or dismissal of the service of a workman is unjustified and illegal but once the adjudicator comes to the conclusion from the 'material on record', that the order of dismissal or discharge is not unjustified, he is not competent to grant any relief and the only option left to him is to reject the reference, but where the order of discharge or dismissal of a workman is found to be illegal and unjustified, the powers of the adjudicator are wide enough to grant the relief to the aggrieved workman.[13] The relief can be reinstatement with backwages or it may even be of a part of back wages in case the workman was not wholly blameless. Lump sum compensation in lieu of reinstatement or backwages is also awarded. The question of granting relief is in the discretion of the adjudicator. The reliefs generally awarded by the industrial adjudication are discussed under the following three heads:

(i) reinstatement;

(ii) any lesser punishment;

(iii) compensation in lieu of reinstatement; and

(iv) award passed under S 11A - whether amenable to judicial review

In this jurisdiction, it is in the discretion of the tribunal in an appropriate case to award interest on the amount determined by way of compensation and the rate of such interest is also in the discretion of the tribunal.[14] The labour court, while exercising its jurisdiction under s 11A can modify the punishment of dismissal, if found disproportionate, to that of reinstatement as a fresh candidate after assigning reasons therefor.[15] Once the labour court came to the conclusion that the termination of service of workman was not justified, the necessary corollary is that the workman is entitled to be reinstated with full backwages, and not merely by payment of compensation under s 25F sans reinstatement.[16] It is well-settled that in cases where an industrial adjudicator finds the termination of service of an industrial workman by his employer to be wrongful and invalid, the normal relief is reinstatement with backwages. In cases of wrongful 'discharge' or 'dismissal' of a workman by his employer as punishment, s 11A confers jurisdiction on an industrial adjudicator to set aside the order of, discharge' or 'dismissal' and to give the relief of reinstatement of the workman with or without any conditions or give such other relief to the workman including the award of any lesser punishment in lieu of 'discharge' or 'dismissal' in the circumstances of the case. The power to give these reliefs is inherent in industrial adjudication. Such reliefs were being given by industrial adjudicators even before the enactment of this section. This section only makes inherent power of the adjudicators explicit only in cases of termination of service by way of punishment of 'discharge' or 'dismissal'. The relief of 'reinstatement' with or without backwages or of compensation in lieu of reinstatement in cases of termination of service as discharge simpliciter or as a measure of retrenchment, would not fall within the purview of this section as such termination is not by way of punishment but in such cases, the relief is granted by industrial adjudicator in its inherent power of industrial adjudication.

In Western India Automobile Assn, the federal court held that industrial adjudication does not mean adjudication according to strict law of master and servant. Hence, if 'non-employment' arises by reason of termination of employment by the employer, it will be within the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal to determine whether the termination was justified and will also have the jurisdiction to give relief of reinstatement if, having regard to all circumstances, it thinks that it is necessary in the interest of industrial peace, but the principles of law governing reinstatement or compensation in lieu of reinstatement as evolved by industrial adjudication are the same in all the three situations.[17] Therefore, the discussion on these topics will govern the award of these reliefs not only in cases of termination of service by way of disciplinary punishment of 'discharge' or 'dismissal' but also will govern the cases of contractual termination of service-discharge simpliciter and termination of service as a measure of retrenchment. In a case where a driver, was dismissed for remaining absent without leave, was directed to be reinstated with 75 per cent back wages by the labour court, the High Court took notice of the fact that the medical reasons given by the workman were found to be genuine and his past record was also clearn. However, the court felt that the award of 75% back wages was on the high side and reduced it to 40 per cent.[18]

(i) Reinstatement

The benefit of reinstatement which is awarded to a workman under the terms of an award does not become a term or condition of the contract between him and the employer as there is no statutory provision in that behalf in the Act.[19] There are, no doubt, other reliefs by way of changes in the terms and conditions of employment which when awarded by the appropriate tribunal might be treated as implied terms of the contract between the employer and the workers to whom the award applies and would ensure for the benefit of the workers until varied by appropriate legal proceedings.[20] The effect of an award of reinstatement is merely to set at naught the order of wrongful dismissal of a workman by the employer and to reinstate him in the service of the employer and to restore him to his former position and status as if the contract of employment originally entered into has been continuing.[21] The terms and conditions of the contract which obtained when the workman was in the employment of the employer prior to his wrongful dismissal continue on reinstatement to govern him as before. No variation is affected in the original terms and conditions of the contract. The only thing which happens is that the workman is reinstated in his old service as before. In Punabhai Govindbhai, the Gujarat High Court held that reinstatement of a daily wager would mean maintaining his position in the seniority with continuity of service as per his ranking in his seniority list. After reinstatement such a workman will become entitled to work only as a daily wager. In such a case, the continuity of service would mean continuity on the same terms and conditions on which he was working prior to his reinstatement.[22]

If a workman has to be reinstated under an award of an industrial adjudicator, he should report himself for duty within a reasonable time from the date of such award. It is not the duty of the employer to take steps to invite the employee in pursuance of the order of the tribunal setting aside the termination or dismissal order passed by the employer, but it is the duty of the employee concerned either to claim or inform in writing that he is ready and willing to join the service within a reasonable time, to give a notice that he should be reinstated, failing which, he would be taking legal proceedings against the employer. In the absence of any of these things, the employer is under no legal obligation to take steps to reinstate the employee whose service was terminated by him but subsequently restored to his job under the award of an adjudicator. The workman should also express his readiness to join service under the employer within a reasonable time. He cannot keep quiet for months without expressing any desire on his part to take up the employment, in pursuance of the order of reinstatement or settlement but what is a reasonable time would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[23] Where the service of a daily wager engaged against a permanent post was terminated orally, the labour court ordered reinstatement with 50% back wages, on the ground that the said workman had worked for 267 days and that his service was terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F. The said award was reversed by the High Court. In appeal, the Supreme Court quashed the order of the High Court and restored the award of the labour court.[24] In Dattatreya Birajdar, a daily wager challenged his termination after a lapse of 8 years, whereas the evidence produced before the labour court disclosed that he had voluntarily left PWD department and joined another department. Despite this factual position, the labour court directed reinstatement with 25% back wages, which was affirmed by the Bombay High Court. In addition, the labour court placed the burden to prove that the workman had not worked for 240 days on the employer. Both the award of the labour court and the order of the High Court were quashed by Supreme Court.[25] Where the labour court directed the reinstatement of a workman who was employed in the agricultural department of the Government, quashing the orders of the courts below, the Supreme Court held:

> We find that neither the Labour Court nor the High Court considered the relevant aspects like whether the Agricultural Department of the Government of Orissa is an 'Industry' and that whether there was any scope for being regularised when admittedly the Labour Court found that the respondent was engaged on casual basis. The other question was whether there was any termination or whether the respondent had abandoned the work. These factors apparently have not been considered. Further the question whether the respondent had worked for more than 240 days in a calendar year has also not been considered in the proper perspective. That being so, the impugned order cannot be maintained and is set aside. The matter is remitted to the High Court to consider the relevant aspects afresh.[26]

(a) Principles of Adjudication:

General:

In common law, the court will not ordinarily force an employer to retain the service of an employee whom he no longer wishes to employ,[27] on the well recognised principle that the contract of personal employment cannot be specifically enforced, but in the area of industrial jurisprudence, it is no more open to debate that 'declaration can be given that the termination of service is bad and the workman continues to be in service. The specter of common law doctrine that the contract of personal service cannot be specifically enforced or the doctrine of mitigation of damages does not haunt this branch of law. The relief of reinstatement with continuity of service can be granted where the termination of service is found to be invalid.[28] Industrial adjudicator can compel the employer to employ a worker whom he does not desire to employ. In other words, industrial adjudicator has jurisdiction to award reinstatement of a discharged or dismissed workman.[29] If the misconduct for which the workman has been dismissed, has not been proved in the domestic inquiry or the tribunal, the order of punishment will not stand and the tribunal is bound to award reinstatement of the workman.[30] Even to deny a part of the backwages to such a workman would be to inflict punishment on him.[31]

Relief of reinstatement is on the same footing as relief of restitution.[32] Reinstatement means restoration of a dismissed or discharged workman to his original post. Upon an order of reinstatement, the employee concerned is entitled to be put back in the same position as if he had never been dismissed or discharged, together with all the back pay, allowances and other privileges.[33] In other words, the effect of an award of reinstatement is to restore the employee to his former position and status setting aside the order of termination of service, as if it had never been passed and the employee gets the benefit of continuity of service.[34] Reinstatement, therefore, requires that the ex-employee should be restored to his previous position so far as his capacity, status and emoluments are concerned.[35] Hence, an employee would be entitled to notional promotion on being reinstated which he could have got, if his service had not been terminated, but the benefit of leave travel concession will be available to the employee only if he has undertaken the travel.[36] In industrial adjudication, this is the same thing as making a contract of employment when the employer is unwilling to enter into such a contract with a particular person, an industrial adjudicator can direct that an employer shall have the relation of employment with the employee although he may be unwilling to have such relation.[37] If the employee is not put back to his employment, then it is not reinstatement at all.[38] In G Rajendra, the Supreme Court held that whether to grant continuity of service or not while making the award depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and set aside the order of the High Court which modified the award of labour court from reinstatement with continuity of service to reinstatement without continuity of service.[39] Where the labour court directed reinstatement without backwages, the workman will be entitled to notional increments at the time of his pay-fixation.[40]

'Reinstatement' differs from 're-employment' in as much as in case of reinstatement, an employee is deemed to have been in service in spite of the termination of service, whereas in case of re-employment, the workman's services are lawfully terminated and he gets back into service afresh on re-employment. In case of reinstatement, the tribunal can award backwages to a dismissed workman while in case of re-employment such a workman would be entitled to wages only from the date of his actual re-employment. The order of termination of service, discharge or dismissal of a workman even if illegal or wrongful is not a nullity and it continues to be operative until set aside by a competent tribunal or court of law.[41] Therefore, after setting aside the illegal and invalid order of discharge or dismissal of a workman, the tribunal has to make a specific order of reinstatement of the workman. The problem confronting industrial adjudication is to promote its two objectives, the security of employment and protection against wrongful discharge or dismissal on the one hand and industrial peace and harmony on the other; both leading ultimately to the goal of maximum possible production.[42] No hard and fast rule can be laid down in dealing with this problem. Each case has to be considered on its own merits and in reaching final decision an attempt must be made to reconcile the conflicting claims made by the workman and the employer. The workman is entitled to security of service and should be protected against wrongful dismissal, and so the normal rule would be reinstatement such cases. Nevertheless, in unusual or exceptional cases, the tribunal may have to consider whether in the interest of the industry itself it would be desirable or expedient not to direct reinstatement. The industrial adjudication, therefore has to balance the relevant factors without adopting legalistic and doctrinaire approach.[43] The tribunal has to examine, therefore, the circumstances of each case to see whether reinstatement of the dismissed employee is not inexpedient or improper.[44] It has to take a decision in a spirit of fairness and justice, following rules of justice and reason and after carefully examining all the facts and circumstances of the case.[45] Past record of the employee, the nature of his alleged present lapse and the ground on which the order of the management is set aside are also relevant factors for consideration.[46] Normally, where the worker cannot be said to be of a type whose presence as an employee is undesirable and is not conducive to maintenance of industrial peace, it will not be a fit case for depriving the workman the normal relief of reinstatement and grant him compensation in lieu thereof.[47]

In Western India Automobile Assn, the federal court emphasised the discretion of the tribunal in the matter of awarding reinstatement when it observed that 'the tribunal has jurisdiction to adjudicate on the dispute and it can be trusted to do its duty and it cannot be said that it will give reinstatement relief unless it thinks it necessary to do so'.[48] This was reverberated by the Supreme Court in United Commercial Bank, where it said that 'whether a discharged employee is to be reinstated in service or whether compensation would be an adequate relief, is a matter of discretion'. Thus, the discretion of the tribunal rather than laying down any rule of universal application was accentuated, as to lay down the general rule of reinstatement being the only remedy would itself fetter the discretion of the tribunal; particularly so when the tribunal is to act in the interest of industrial harmony and peace. The court further observed that it might well be that, in some cases imposition of service of a workman on an unwilling employer might not be conducive to such harmony and peace.[49] Though the federal court and the Supreme Court emphasised the discretion of the tribunal in awarding the relief of reinstatement, the labour appellate tribunal emphasised reinstatement as a normal rule in cases of wrongful and unjustified discharge or dismissal.[50] In Buckingham Carnatic, the LAT said that in cases of wrongful dismissal, reinstatement is the normal relief, though it recognised certain exceptions where reinstatement would not be proper relief.[51] In Steel Bros, the court reiterated that where the termination of service is unjustified and is not bona fide, the normal relief is reinstatement unless there are exceptional circumstances warranting a departure from the rule.[52] In Jitendra Singh Rathor, the Supreme Court affirmed the award of reinstatement of the workman with half backwages keeping in view the proved misconduct of the employee as it could not be said that the relief of reinstatement was being granted in terms of withholding of the half of the backwages and therefore did not constitute penalty.[53]

The doctrine that reinstatement is a normal rule in cases of wrongful and illegal discharge and dismissal is not inexorable or absolutely rigid in application. Pragmatic approach has tampered the rule to mean that in unusual or exceptional cases, where it is not proper or expedient to grant the normal relief of reinstatement the relief of compensation would meet the ends of justice, because the problem confronting the industrial adjudication is to promote its two objectives, viz, the security of employment and protection against wrongful discharge and dismissal on the one hand and industrial peace on the other—both leading to the goal of maximum possible production. In Buckingham Carnatic, the labour appellate tribunal itself observed that in considering the question of reinstatement 'the tribunal is expected to be inspired by a sense of fair play towards the employee on the one hand and consideration of discipline in the concern on the other'. In the same strain, the Supreme Court in Punjab National Bank, held that no hard and fast rule can he laid down in dealing with this problem and that each case must be considered on its own merits, and in reaching the final decision, an attempt must be made to reconcile the conflicting claims made by the employee and the employer. An employee is entitled to security of service and should be protected against wrongful dismissal and so the normal rule would be reinstatement in such cases. Nevertheless, in unusual or exceptional cases, the tribunal may have to consider whether in the interests of industry itself, it would be desirable or expedient not to direct reinstatement.[54] The question whether reinstatement should be awarded or not, has to be decided after balancing the relevant factors and without adopting legalistic or doctrinaire approach. This approach has been adopted by the courts in subsequent cases.[55]

There is no doubt that the normal rule in the absence of circumstances which would show that the workman had disentitled himself from claiming reinstatement, would be to grant reinstatement.[56] 'Plain common sense dictates that the removal of an order terminating the services of workmen must ordinarily lead to the reinstatement of the services of the workman. It is as if the order had never been made and so it must ordinarily lead to backwages'.[57] In OP Bhandari, speaking for the Supreme Court, Thakkar J, held that 'it cannot be posited that reinstatement must invariably follow as a consequence of holding that the order of termination of service of an employee is void. No doubt in regard to blue collar workman and white-collar, ie, employees other than those belonging to the managerial or similar high level cadre, reinstatement would be a rule and compensation in lieu thereof a rare exception'.[58] In MK Agarwal, on consideration of the entire matter, the court held that it should not refuse reinstatement. However, in the circumstances of the case it restricted the salary to 50 percent of what would otherwise be payable to the employee.[59] But there can be cases where it would not be expedient to follow this normal rule and direct reinstatement.[60] There may be exceptional circumstances which make it impossible or wholly inequitable vis-a-vis the employer and workman to direct reinstatement with full backwages. For instance, the industry might have closed down or might be in severe financial doldrums, the workman concerned might have secured better or other employment elsewhere and so on. Reinstatement might also be avoided in extraordinary cases where the post is abolished or there is bitterness between the parties.[61] Likewise, the relief of reinstatement may be refused in exceptional cases like the employer losing confidence in the workman or the retention of the workman leading to apprehension of breach of security.[62] In such situations, there is a vestige of discretion left in the courts to make appropriate consequential orders. The court may deny the relief of reinstatement where reinstatement is impossible because the industry has been closed down. And it may deny relief of award of full backwages where that would place an impossible burden on the employer. In such and other exceptional cases, the court may mould the relief.[63]

In Hindustan Apparel, the labour court directed reinstatement of the workmen. But while passing the order of reinstatement, the labour court recorded a finding that the three workers were gainfully employed. Within two months of the award, the employer closed down its business and started another business on somewhat similar lines. In appeal against the award, while granting interim order, the Supreme Court directed payment of Rs. 24000/- to each of the workers and also expressly recognised the right of the three workers to continue in work in another establishment during the pendency of the appeals.[64] In the absence of any impediments or exceptional circumstances, the relief of reinstatement with backwages must be awarded. It is, therefore, for the employer to clearly establish the existence of exceptional circumstances. In other words, the onus to establish the case of departure from the normal rule or practice is on the employer. The employer, therefore, has not only to raise a specific plea but has also to tender all relevant evidence showing that his case falls in one of the exceptions.[65] Generally, reinstatement is not granted where the workman has indulged in activities highly prejudicial to the company or there is loss of confidence of the employer in him or dislocation of work or likelihood of dislocation of work but where the management has not pleaded any of such circumstances, the normal rule of reinstatement with full backwages and other benefits will follow.[66] The tribunal can refuse to order reinstatement where such a course in the circumstances of the case, is not fair and proper. For deciding the question of relief, the tribunal, therefore, has to examine the circumstances of each case to see whether reinstatement of the dismissed employee is not inexpedient or is not improper.[67] If the case presents certain unusual or exceptional features so as to make reinstatement inexpedient or improper, to meet the ends of justice, the tribunal has the discretion to award adequate monetary compensation instead of reinstatement.[68] The power of reinstatement can be exercised by the tribunal where on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, it finds that the discharge or dismissal of the workman was not justified, but in case of gross misconduct, the most appropriate punishment would be discharge or dismissal of the workman and 'it would be a mockery of justice to brand such an order as 'unjustified' and substitute it by an order of reinstatement under s 11A. In cases, where no order other than the order of dismissal of the workman could be made on the proved facts, the arbitrary exercise of power of reinstatement, will be reviewable on certiorari.[69] In Jaslok Hospital, the Bombay High Court set aside the order of reinstatement of a workman working in hospital and ordered that his dismissal should be deemed as retrenchment with accompanying benefits. Speaking for the court, Pendse J, observed:

> .. . the hospital and the medical research centre are sensitive institutions and are engaged in saving human lives and the success of such institutions depends much upon the confidence generated by the staff working there ... the cure of patients depends more on care and attention lavished than on the medicines administered.[70]

The success of the institution depends not only on the attitude of the employer but equally in the manner in which the employees approach their work. On the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the award of reinstatement was held to be inappropriate. Such relief can also be refused where the workman is virtually on the verge of retirement or is so old and infirm as to be incapable of discharging his duties.[71] In Metal Box, the court modified the order of reinstatement in view of the superannuation of the workman and directed the payment of backwages and other benefits up to the date of retirement of the workman.[72] No hard and fast rule can, however, be laid down for the exercise of the discretion of the tribunal, as in each case, it must, in a spirit of fairness and justice in keeping with the objective of industrial adjudication, decide whether it should, in the interest of justice, depart from the general rule.[73] Fair play towards the employee on the one hand and interest of the employer including the consideration of discipling in the establishment on the other, require to be duly safeguarded.[74] This is necessary in the interest of both security of tenure of the employee and smooth and harmonious working of the establishment. Legitimate interest of both of them have to be kept in view, if the order is expected to promote the desired objectives of industrial peace and maximum possible production. Proper balance has to be maintained between the conflicting claims of the employer and the employee without jeopardising the larger interests of industrial peace and progress.[75] 'Reinstatement' is not considered desirable in cases of strained relations between the employer and the employee or where the post held by the employee had been one of trust and confidence or where the employee was found to have been guilty of activity subversive or prejudicial to the interest of the industry. In such a case, suitable compensation could be ordered in lieu of reinstatement.[76] A single judge of the Calcutta High Court observed:

> Supposing the tribunal comes to the conclusion that the employee is a rogue or a blackguard or a thoroughly incompetent one, unable to perform his job, it is ridiculous to suggest that such matters are irrelevant and the tribunals must still reinstate the worker and shut their eyes to the real state of things. Trustworthiness of the worker is one of the important factors to be taken into account.[77]

The nature of the relations between the employer and the employee is also a relevant factor to be taken into consideration.[78] The tribunal is also to safeguard the interests of the employer including the consideration of discipline in the establishment. The nature of the duties performed by the employee and the nature of the industrial establishment employing him, is also a relevant consideration.[79] These cases are merely illustrative where an exception to the general rule of reinstatement is to be made.[80] No comprehensive rule, as to which circumstances would in a given case constitute an exception to the general rule, can possibly be laid down. In each case, keeping the objectives of the industrial adjudication in mind, and in a spirit of fairness and justice, the tribunal has to deal with the question, whether the circumstances of the case require that an exception should be made and compensation would meet the ends of justice.[81] If, on taking these principles and the relevant factors into consideration, the tribunal comes to the conclusion that reinstatement would not be desirable or expedient in the circumstances of the case, it may award compensation instead of reinstatement to the workman in spite of the fact that his discharge or dismissal was invalid owing to some infirmity in the impugned order. In Sunit Kumar Roy, the Patna High Court had set aside the order of reinstatement with backwages passed by the tribunal, even though the termination of the service of the workman was held not to be legal and valid, in view of the fact that the workman had been permanently employed in another concern where he was getting more remuneration than he was getting with the previous employer.[82] The power of an industrial adjudicator under s 11A, to give any relief to the workman including reinstatement or to subject the order of reinstatement to any terms and conditions, can be exercised only when the order of dismissal or discharge is found to be unjustified or illegal and not when it affirms the order of discharge.[83] In either case, the decision of the tribunal will be amenable to judicial review and the reviewing court cannot content itself by simply saying that since the tribunal exercised its jurisdiction, it will not examine the circumstances of the case to ascertain whether or not such exercise has been made in accordance with the well-established principles. If it were to do so, it would be a refusal on its part to exercise its own jurisdiction,[84] but where the tribunal has objectively assessed the over-all position on a fair consideration of the material placed before it and came to the conclusion that the reinstatement of the aggrieved employee was to follow, the reviewing court would not interfere with the discretion of the tribunal when no exceptional circumstance warranting the denial of benefit was made out.[85]

In Assam Oil, the facts were: the work of the employee, who was holding a confidential postion as a secretary to the Branch Manager, was thoroughly unsatisfactory coupled with failure on his part to carry out orders, insolence, untruthfulness, and disobedience. The services of the employee were terminated purporting to be in terms of the contract of employment but holding the discharge of the employee to be of a punitive character, the tribunal set aside the termination of service and directed the reinstatement. In appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the decision of the tribunal, but in view of the fact that he was holding a position of trust and confidence and the manager had lost confidence in him, the court held that 'it would not be fair either to the employer or to the employee to direct reinstatement' and substituted reinstatement with an order of suitable compensation.[86] In Charottar GSM, the contention of the workman was that once the tribunal had set aside the order of dismissal on the ground that the domestic inquiry was invalid, the direction of reinstatement should automatically have followed. The Supreme Court refused to interfere with the order of the tribunal declining reinstatement for the reason that the workman had resorted to illegal strike, and ordered adequate monetary compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[87]

In Doomur DT Estate, the court set aside the order of reinstatement on the ground that some of the workmen had, in fact, been found guilty of and convicted for violent misconduct by a criminal court and with respect to some others, there was evidence that they had participated in the violent misconduct. Taking into consideration such a conduct on the part of the employees, the court held that the relief of reinstatement was not justified.[88] In PP Chopra, the court again substituted the order of reinstatement with an order of appropriate compensation holding that reinstatement would not be expedient in the circumstances of the case in view of the fact that the employee, who was holding a position of trust and confidence as a stenographer, had retained the copies of confidential letters dictated to him in regard to other concerns in which the employer company was interested for the purpose of using them for his own purpose without the consent of the company.[89] In AK Roy, taking into account the fact that the workman was employed in the blast furnace which was a crucial part of the work, it was held to be a case of an exceptional nature and the relief of reinstatement was not justified and expedient in view of the adverse police report against the workman.[90] Similarly in Francis Klein, in view of the fact that the workman, who was a durban, had refused to assist another durban in apprehending a thief who was trying to get away with certain materials of the employer company, the court substituted the relief of reinstatement awarded by the tribunal with adequate monetary compensation.[91] Likewise, in ITC, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the court held that the order of reinstatement was not sustainable. In this case, the workman was dismissed from service having been found guilty of neglect of duty. Furthermore, his record of service was also not clean in that he had committed several acts of faults in the past and was sometimes warned and sometimes suspended and sometimes reprimanded for all his acts of omission and commission. Untwalia J, observed that the labour court had awarded reinstatement without applying its mind to the question as to whether it was a fit case for reinstatement or for compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[92]

The burden to establish that one or more of exceptional or unusual circumstances, militating against the award of reinstatement exist, is however, on the employer and unless that is done, the normal relief of reinstatement is to be granted.[93] In Tulsidas Paul, the employer declined to give work to eight seasonal workers at the instance of the rest of the workers. The labour court held that the said refusal amounted to unjustified dismissal and directed their reinstatement. The Calcutta High Court held that, in view of the fact that the employer had not put the question of reinstatement in issue nor had it raised any specific objection against the normal rule of reinstatement, there was no case for interference with the award of reinstatement. The decision of the High Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court.[94] Likewise in Panitole Tea Estate, the court declined to interfere with the award of reinstatement because the plea of loss of confidence against the reinstatement which required determination on facts, was not raised before the labour court.[95] In Assam Match Co, the court held that the fact that a domestic inquiry was held against the employee on such a charge resulting in loss of confidence, the employee should not be reinstated.[96] In NM Desai, the workmen found guilty of misappropriation in a domestic inquiry, withdrew all their contentions including the illegality of the order of the punishment of dismissal and admitted their guilt before the labour court and prayed for mercy but the labour court still ordered their reinstatement with back-wages on the ground that the punishment was too cruel and disproportionate to the act of misconduct, in the circumstances of the case. The Gujarat High Court held that the order of the labour court was unjustified and remanded the matter for examining the cases afresh. Though the court noted that it is hard for the people to find jobs these days and the delinquent workmen were with dependent families, it held that such considerations are not relevant for deciding the case. It had further observed:

> After all, services with such public corporations are not pasture grounds always open for the people or they are not brought about for the purpose of furnishing employment to the unemployed in the society. We would, therefore, say that all cases are required to be examined on their own merits and interests not only of the certain persons likely to be adversely affected are to be seen, but also interests of such public administrations require to be closely examined and given a due thought.[97]

In Manoj Mishra, the facts briefly were: the employee who studied up to 12th standard and was working as Tradesman in Kakrapar Atomic Project (KAAP) was charge-sheeted for the misconduct for unauthorizedly communicating with press and misleading information causing embarrassment to and damaging the reputation of the project. In the course of the enquiry, the employee admitted the charges voluntarily and categorically. Acting on enquiry report, the disciplinary authority ordered the removal of the appellant from the service of KAPP w.e.f. 30 March 1996. The issue before the Supreme Court was whether the said acts proved against the employee could be termed as bonafide 'whistle blowing' meant for cleansing the organisation and whether the punishment was disproportionate to the act of misconduct. Dismissing the appeal filed by the workman, Nijjar J (for himself and Iqbal J), of the Supreme Court held:

> In our opinion, the appellant without any justification assumed the role of vigilante.. .. The newspaper reports as well as the other publicity undoubtedly created a great deal of panic among the local population as well as throughout the State of Gujarat. Every informer cannot automatically be said to be a bona fide "whistle blower". A "whistle blower" would be a person who possesses the qualities of a crusader. His honesty, integrity and motivation should leave little or no room for doubt. It is not enough that such person is from the same organization and privy to some information, not available to the general public. The primary motivation for the action of a person to be called a "whistle blower" should be to cleanse an organization. It should not be incidental or byproduct for an action taken for some ulterior or selfish motive.. .. the action of the appellant herein was not merely to highlight the shortcomings in the organization. The appellant had indulged in making scandalous remarks by alleging that there was widespread corruption within the organization. Such allegations would clearly have a deleterious effect throughout the organization apart from casting shadows of doubts on the integrity of the entire project. It is for this reason that employees working within the highly sensitive atomic organization are sworn to secrecy and have to enter into a confidentiality agreement. In our opinion, the appellant had failed to maintain the standard of confidentiality and discretion which was required to be maintained.. .. We are not satisfied that this is a case of 'glaring injustice'.. .. In our opinion, the punishment imposed on the appellant is not 'so disproportionate to the offence as to shock the conscience' of this Court.[98]

---

84 Divisional Manager, APRTC v LC 1979 Lab IC 1141, 1145 (AP) (DB), per Madhava Reddy J.

85 Sheo Sampat Lal v State of Uttar Pradesh 1983 Lab IC 324,327 (All), per TS Misra J.

86 Balbir Chand v Food Corpn of India Ltd (1997) 2 LLJ 879 [LNIND 1996 SC 2148]-80 (SC).

87 Heckett Engineering Co v Workman 1977 Lab IC 1843 [LNIND 1977 SC 289], 1846-47 (SC), per Jaswant Singh J.

88 Municipal Corpn Greater Bombay v PS Malavenkar (1978) 2 LLJ 168 [LNIND 1978 SC 157], 171 (SC) : AIR 1978 SC 1380 [LNIND 1978 SC 157]: 1978 Lab IC 1096 : (1978) 3 SCC 78 [LNIND 1978 SC 157], per Jaswant Singh J.

89 Awadesh Kumar Bhatnagar v Gwalior Rayon Silk Mig 'Weaving Ltd (1972) 2 LLJ 143 [LNIND 1972 SC 231] (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

90 Director General ESI v T Abdul Razak (1996) 2 LLJ 765, 771 (SC), per Agrawal J.

91 Jabalpur Electricity Supply Co v Sambhu Prasad Srivastava (1962) 2 LLJ 216 [LNIND 1962 SC 246] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1431 [LNIND 1972 SC 231]: 1972 Lab IC 842 : (1973) 3 SCC 779 [LNIND 1972 SC 231], per Dasgupta J.

92 Rashid Ahmad v Uttar Pradesh State Road Transport Corpn, Lucknow 1987 Lab IC 323 -24 (All), per Sahai J.

93 Hindustan Brown Boveri Ltd v Workmen (1968) 1 LLJ 571 [LNIND 1967 SC 218] (SC), per Shelat J.

94 South Central Rly ECC Society v LC (1983) 1 LLJ 469 (AP) : 1982 (1) ALT 353 : 1988 (33) ELT 351 b (A.P.), per Seetharam Reddy J.

1 Director General, ESI v T Abdul Razak (1996) 2 LLJ 765, 771 (SC), per Agrawal J.

2 Steel Authority of India v LC (1980) 2 LLJ 456 [LNIND 1980 SC 275], 458-59 (SC) : AIR 1980 SC 2054 [LNIND 1980 SC 275]: [1980] (41) FLR 283 : 1980 Lab IC 1088 [LNIND 1980 SC 275] : (1980) 3 SCC 734 [LNIND 1980 SC 275], per Gupta J.

3 S Nagiah v Indian Aluminium Co (1991) 1 LLJ 554 (Kant) (DB), per Mohan CJ.

4 Santak Singh v Ninth IT 1984 Lab IC 817, 821 (Cal), per Amitabha Dutta J.

5 Mgmt of Orissa Industries v State of Orissa (1974) 1 LLJ 54 (Ori) (DB). per RN Misra J.

6 Superintendent, Kaliyar Estate v O Kuriakko (1971) 1 LLJ 83 (Ker), per Isaac J.

7 Vinayak Bhagwan Shetye v Kismet Pvt Ltd (1984) 1 LLJ 203. 206 (Born) (DB). per Chandurkar J.

8 Shalimar Paints Ltd v Eighth IT 1977 Lab IC 213. 227-228 (Cal). per RM Datta J.

9 General Assembly of Free Church of Scotland v Overtoun [1904] AC 515.

10 G Mckenzie & Co Ltd v Workmen (1959) 1 LLJ 285 [LNIND 1958 SC 131]. 289 (SC). per Kapur J.

11 Rama Kant Misra v State of Uttar Pradesh 1982 Lab IC 1790 [LNIND 1982 SC 149], 1792 (SC).

12 Blue Star Ltd v NR Sharma 1977 Lab IC 328, 332 (Del), per HL Anand J.

13 Manager, SRT Works v Gen,.Secy, OMCTU 1979 Lab IC 1352, 1354 (Ker), per Gopalan Nambiyar CJ.

14 Uttar Pradesh SRTC v State of UP 1978 Lab IC 355, 357 (All) (DB), per SD Agarwala J.

15 Pepsu RTC v PO, IT 1982 Lab IC 1479 (P&H), per Punchhi J.

16 Blue Star Ltd v NR Sharma 1977 Lab IC 328, 332 (Del), per HL Anand J.

17 Central Bank of India Ltd v PC Jain (1969) 2 LLJ 377 [LNIND 1968 SC 221], 379-80 (SC), per Bhargava J.

18 GM, Parry's Confectionary Ltd v ITL (1974) 1 LLJ 422 (Mad), per Ismail J.

19 Hind Constn. & Engg Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 462 [LNIND 1964 SC 313] (SC), per Hidayatullah J.

20 Pure Drinks Pvt Ltd v Kirat Singh Maungati (1961) 2 LLJ 99, 101-102 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

21 Orissa Cement Ltd v Workmen (1960) 2 LLJ 91 [LNIND 1960 SC 86], 94 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

22 Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co Ltd 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], 1205 (SC), per Desai J.

23 Firestone TRCI Ltd v Workmen (1981), 2 LLJ 218, 220 (SC), per Gupta J.

24 Ideal Jawa (India) Pvt Ltd v C Madan Mohan (1972) 1 LLJ 316 [LNIND 1971 KANT 217] : (1971) 2 Mys LJ 472 (Mys) (DB), per Venkataramiah J.

25 Bharat Iron Works v Bhagubhai Balubhai Patel 1976 Lab IC 4 [LNIND 1975 SC 406], 7 (SC), per Goswami J.

26 State of Haryana v Rajindra Sareen (1972) 1 LLJ 205 [LNIND 1971 SC 585], 218 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

27 KK Ramankutty v State of Kerala 1973 Lab IC 496,506 (Ker), per Subramonian Potni J.

28 Vinod Behari Dixit v United Commercial Bank 1979 Lab IC 1239, 1244 (Cal), per Salil Kumar Datta J.

29 Tata Engg and Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114]-808 (SC), per Shelat J.

30 Jessop & Co Ltd v Fifth IT 1974 Lab IC 522 (Cal) (DB), per Sabyasachi Mukherji J.

31 Dalmia Dadri Cement Ltd v Murari Lal Bikaneria (1970) 2 LLJ 416 [LNIND 1970 SC 323], 423 (SC) : AIR 1971 SC 22 [LNIND 1970 SC 323], per Mitter J.

32 N Kalindi v Tata Locomotive & Engineering Co Ltd (1960) 2 LLJ 228 [LNIND 1960 SC 95], 233 (SC), per Das Gupta J.

33 Calcutta Jute Manufacturing Co Ltd v CJM Union (1961) 2 LLJ 686 [LNIND 1961 SC 354] (SC) : AIR 1966 SC 1731 [LNIND 1961 SC 354], per Sarkar J.

34 Sur Enamel Stamping Works Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 367 [LNIND 1963 SC 146] (SC), per Das Gupta J.

35 Rashid Ahmad v UPSRTC 1987 Lab IC 323, 325 (All), per Sahai J.

36 Maharashtra SRTC v AN Jadhav (1981) 1 LLJ 186, 188 (Born) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

37 Oil India Ltd v CGIT 1980 Lab IC (NOC) 93 (Cal) (DB), per Amiya Kumar Mookerji J.

38 Dattatray Trimbak Kulkarni v State Bank of India (1993) 1 LLJ 547 [LNIND 1992 BOM 174] (Born) (DB), per Pemise J.

39 Shalimar Paints Ltd v Eighth IT 1977 Lab IC 213, 227-228 (Cal), per RM Datta J.

40 Siemens Engineering & Mfg Co of India v Union of India [1976] Supp SCR 468, per Bhagwati J.

41 KL Tripathi v State Bank of India (1984) 1 LLJ 2 [LNIND 1983 SC 283],14 (SC), per Sabyasachi Mukharji J.

42 Ram Kumar v State of Haryana 1987 Lab IC 1890 [LNIND 1987 SC 604] (SC), per Dutt J.

43 SSKoshal v State Bank of India 1992 Lab IC 2013, 2019 (MP) (DB), per Dhararnadhikari J.

44 K Ashoka v Vijaya Bank, Bangalore (1998) 2 LLN 273 (Kant), per Shetty J.

45 Gopalkrishna Vaman Kamath v Corporation Bank (2002) 2 LLN 987 (Born), per Bhosale J.

46 GM, Canara Bank v M Raja Rao (2001) 2 LLJ 819 [LNIND 2001 SC 772] (SC) : 2003 (5) SCALE 66 [LNIND 2001 SC 772].

47 Anil Gilurker v Bilaspur-Raipur KG Bank Ltd, AIR 2012 SC (supp) 181, per AK Patnaik J.

48 Avinash S Bhosale (Thro' LRS) v Union of India AIR 2012 SC (supp) 755.

49 SP Malhotra v Punjab National Bank AIR 2013 SC 3739 [LNIND 2013 SC 629]: (2013) 7 SCC 251 [LNIND 2013 SC 629].

50 B Subbiah v Andhra Handloom WCS Ltd (1978) 1 LLJ 37 (AP) (DB), per Sheth J.

51 Mgmt of SRK Steel Industries v LC (1996) 2 LLJ 619 [LNIND 1995 MAD 595], 621-22 (Mad), per Abdul Hadi J.

52 Sheo Sampat Lal v State of UP 1983 Lab IC 324, 329 (All), per TS Misra J.

53 Mgmtt of Madras Fertilizers Ltd v First Addl LC (1990) 1 LLJ 298 [LNIND 1989 MAD 359], 301 (Mad) (DB), per Nainar Sundaram J.

54 India Marine Services Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1963) 1 LLJ 122 [LNIND 1962 SC 260], 124 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 528 [LNIND 1962 SC 260], per Mudholkar J.

55 N Chinnaiah v Depot Manager, APSRTC (1997) 2 LLJ 512, 514 (AP) : 1998 (1) An WR 779 : 1996 (1) APLJ 178, per Bikshapathy J.

56 Hind Construction and Engg Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 462 [LNIND 1964 SC 313], 465 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 917 [LNIND 1964 SC 313], per Hidayatullah J.

57 Mgmt of FICCI v Workmen (1971) 2 LLJ 630 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], 647 (SC) ; AIR 1972 SC 763 [LNIND 1971 SC 573]: [1972] (24) FLR 103 : 1972 Lab IC 413 [LNIND 1971 SC 573] : (1972) 1 SCC 40 [LNIND 1971 SC 573], per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

58 Addl District Magistrate v JP Chaturvedi (1996) 1 LLJ 811 [LNIND 1996 SC 40], 813 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 2359 [LNIND 1996 SC 40]: 1996 (1) SCALE 202 [LNIND 1996 SC 40] : (1996) 2 SCC 12 [LNIND 1996 SC 40], per Majmudar J.

59 Ram Kishan v Union of India (1996) 1 LLJ 982, 985 (SC) : AIR 1996 SC 255 [LNIND 1995 SC 858]: 1995 (5) SCALE 431 : (1995) 6 SCC 157 [LNIND 1995 SC 858], per Ramaswamy J.

60 Karnataka SRTC v BM Patil (1996) 2 LLJ 536, 538 (Kant) : 1995 (5) Kar LJ 665 [LNIND 1995 KANT 300], per Mohan Kumar J.

61 Palghat BPL & PSP Thozhilali Union v BPL India Ltd (1996) 2 LLJ 335 [LNIND 1995 SC 886] : (1995) 6 SCC 237 [LNIND 1995 SC 886].

62 Gujarat RTC v Kachraji Motiji Parmar (1994) 2 LLJ 332, 335 (Guj), per Shah J.

63 State Bank of India v CGIT (1997) 2 LLJ 573 [LNIND 1996 BOM 751] (Born), per Sri Krishna J.

64 Lakshmi Machine Works Ltd v LC (1997) 2 LLJ 1012 [LNIND 1997 MAD 602], 1019 (AP), per Lakshmanan J.

65 Ritz Theatre Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 498 [LNIND 1961 SC 241],505 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

66 J Gopinathan v Dy Labour Commr 1991 Lab IC 1003, 1007 (Ker), per DJJ Raju J.

67 PH Kalyani v Air France (1963) 1 LLJ 679 [LNIND 1963 SC 45], 682 (SC) : AIR 1963 SC 1756 [LNIND 1963 SC 45], per Wanchoo J.

68 Secretary, Kottayam DCMSU Ltd v IT (1983) 2 LLJ 225. 227 (Ker) : 1982 KLJ 686 . per UL Bhat J.

69 Buckingham and Carnatic Co Ltd v Workers [1952] LAC 490.

70 Indian Iron and Steel Co Ltd v Workmen (1958) 1 LLJ 260 [LNIND 1957 SC 105] (SC) : AIR 1958 SC 130 [LNIND 1957 SC 105], per SK Das J.

71 Balipara Tea Estate v Workmen (1959) 2 LLJ 245 [LNIND 1959 SC 80], 249 (SC), per Sinha J.

72 Mgmt. of Hyderabad Usha Works v IT (1970) 2 LLJ 315 (AP) (DB).

73 Tata Engineering & Locomotive Co Ltd v SC Prasad (1969) 2 LLJ 799 [LNIND 1969 SC 114],812 (SC), per Shelat J.

74 Hind Construction and Engineering Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 1 LLJ 462 [LNIND 1964 SC 313], 465 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 917 [LNIND 1964 SC 313], per Hidayatullah J.

75 Ved Prakash Gupta v Delton Cable India Pvt Ltd, 1984 Lab IC 658 [LNIND 1984 SC 380],662 (SC), per Vardarajan J.

76 Divl Mgr., United Insurance Co Ltd v T Radhakrishna Murthy 1986 Lab IC 1954 (AP) (DB), per Jeevan Reddy J.

77 MPF, APDDC v VK Durga 1988 Lab IC 833, 835 (AP), per MN Rao J.

78 Karnataka SRTC v N Nagendrappa 1991 Lab IC 2470, 2472-73 (Kant), per Shyarn Sundar J.

79 JK Cotton Spg and Weaving Co Ltd v Workmen (1965) 2 LLJ 153 [LNIND 1965 SC 153], 156 (SC), per Mudholkar J.

80 Ram Swarath Sinha v Mgmt of Balsund Sugar Co Ltd [1954] LAC 697(LAT).

81 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481],613 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

82 Workmen of Motipur Sugar Factory v Mgmt. (1965) 2 LLJ 162 [LNIND 1965 SC 109], 170 (SC) : AIR 1965 SC 1803 [LNIND 1965 SC 109], per Wanchoo J.

83 Kharadah & Co Ltd v Workmen (1963) 2 LLJ 452 [LNIND 1963 SC 138], 457 (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

84 Imperial Tobacco Co of India Ltd v Workmen (1961) 2 LLJ 414 [LNIND 1961 SC 116], 416 (SC), per Wanchoo J.

85 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], 604 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

86 Cooper Engineering Ltd v PP Mundhe (1975) 2 LLJ 379 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], 384 (SC), per Goswami J.

87 Bharat Sugar Mills Ltd v Jai Singh (1961) 2 LLJ 644 [LNIND 1961 SC 306], 649 (SC) : [1962] 3 SCR 684 [LNIND 1961 SC 306], per KC Das Gupta J.

88 Ritz Theatre Pvt Ltd v Workmen (1962) 2 LLJ 498 [LNIND 1961 SC 241] (SC), per Gajendragadkar J.

89 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 136 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]: 1972 Lab IC 13 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] : (1972) 4 SCC 304 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] per Vaidialingam J.

90 Delhi Cloth & Gen Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 198-99 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1031 [LNIND 1972 SC 17]: (1972) 1 SCC 595 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], per Vaidialingam J.

91 Mgmt of AVP(C) Ltd v Secretary, AVPE Union 1982 Lab IC 261 -62 (Ker), per Bhaskaran J.

92 India FDS Ltd v LC 1996 Lab IC 725 (Mad) (DB), per Ramanujan J.

93 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Ltd v Mgmt. (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133], 296 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 430]: [1973] (26) FLR 359 : (1973) 1 SCC 813 [LNIND 1973 SC 430], per Vaidialingam J.

94 Andhra Pradesh SRTC v IT 1971 Lab IC 594, 597-98, per Sambasiva Rao J.

95 Hindustan Steel Ltd v Workmen (1970) 1 LLJ 337 (Ori) (DB), per Barman J.

1 Premnath Motors Workshop Pvt Ltd v IT (1971) 1 LLJ 167 (Del), per Deshpande J.

2 Supdg. Engr., Kancheepuram ED Circle v MK Vasu, (2010) 4 LLJ 55 (Mad .)

3 Madhya Pradesh SRTC v IC 1970 Lab IC 510 (MP) (DB), per Bishambhar Dayal CJ.

4 Fort William Co Ltd v Ram Deo Ram 1978 Lab IC 891 (Cal) (DB), per Anil K Sen J.

5 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], 614 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 136 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]: 1972 Lab IC 13 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] : (1972) 4 SCC 304 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], pervaidialingam J.

6 Delhi Cloth and General Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 198 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1031 [LNIND 1972 SC 17]: (1972) 1 SCC 595 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], per Vaidialingam J.

7 Cooper Engineering Ltd v PP Mundhe (1975) 2 LLJ 379 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], 385 (SC), per Goswami J.

8 Shankar Chakravarti v Britannia Biscuit Co (1979) 2 LLJ 194 [LNIND 1979 SC 276],205,207-08 (SC) : AIR 1979 SC 1652 [LNIND 1979 SC 276]: [1979] (39) FLR 70 : 1979 Lab IC 1192 [LNIND 1979 SC 276] : (1979) 3 SCC 371 [LNIND 1979 SC 276], per Desai J.

9 Mgmt of NDTC v Lieutenant Governor of Delhi 1993 Lab IC 913, 915-16 (Del), per Sabharwal J.

10 Delhi Cloth &Gen Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 190-200 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 1031 [LNIND 1972 SC 17]: (1972) 1 SCC 595 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], per Vaidialingam J.

11 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], 614 (SC) : AIR 1972 SC 136 [LNIND 1971 SC 481]: 1972 Lab IC 13 [LNIND 1971 SC 481] : (1972) 4 SCC 304 [LNIND 1971 SC 481], per Vaidialingam J.

12 Cooper Engineering Limited vs. Shri P.P. Mundhe (1975) 2 LLJ 379 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], 385-86 (SC) : AIR 1975 SC 1900 [LNIND 1975 SC 284]: [1975] (31) FLR 188 : 1975 Lab IC 1441 [LNIND 1975 SC 284] : (1975) 2 SCC 661 [LNIND 1975 SC 284], per Goswami J.

13 Basu Deba Das v MR Bhope (1993) 2 LLJ 1022, 1033 (Born), per Ashok Agarwal J.

14 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Pvt Ltd v Mgmt. (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133],296 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

15 State Bank of India v RK Jain (1971) 2 LLJ 599 [LNIND 1971 SC 481],614 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

16 Cheupu Service Co-op Bank Ltd v IT 1980 Lab IC 911, 914 (Ker), per Thommen J.

17 Rajendra Jha v PO, LC 1984 Lab IC 1583 [LNIND 1984 SC 218], 1585-86 (SC), per Chandrachud CJI.

18 Basu Deba Das v MR Bhope 1993 Lab IC 1677, 1689 (Bom), per Agarwal J.

19 Lalu Mahto v CGIT 1987 Lab IC 416 (Pat), per SB Sanyal J.

20 Desh Raj Gupta v IT 1991 Lab IC 1892 (SC), per Sharma J.

21 Chhatia Weaving Mills v IT 1990 Lab IC 1399, 1402 (Ori) (DB), per Patnaik J.

22 Ideal Jawa (India) Pvt Ltd v Madan Mohan (1972) 1 LLJ 316 [LNIND 1971 KANT 217], 324 : (1971) 2 Mys 472(Mys) (DB), per Venkataramiah J.

23 Delhi Cloth and Genl Mills Co Ltd v Ludh Budh Singh (1972) 1 LLJ 180 [LNIND 1972 SC 17], 198 (SC), per Vaidialingam J.

24 Radio and Elec. Mfg Co Ltd v IT (1978) 2 LLJ 131 (Kant), per Rama Jois J.

25 Vinayak Bhagwan Shetya v Kismet Pvt Ltd (1984) 1 LLJ 203, 206 (Born) (DB), per Chandurkar J.

26 State of Punjab v Surat Singh 1985 Lab IC 10, 12 (P&H), per Punchhi J.

27 Hindustan Machine Tools Ltd v LC 1982 Lab IC 1278 (P&H) (DB), per RN Mittal J.

28 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Ltd v Mgmt (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133], 293-94 (SC) : AIR 1973 SC 1227 [LNIND 1973 SC 430]: [1973] (26) FLR 359 : (1973) 1 SCC 813 [LNIND 1973 SC 430] per Vaidialingam J.

29 East India Hotels v Workmen (1974) 1 LLJ 282 [LNIND 1973 SC 396], 285-86 (SC). per Jaganmohan Reddy J.

30 Rajasthan SRTC v Lal Chand (1994) 2 LLJ 628. 630 (Raj) (DB). per MC Jain J.

31 General Employees' Union v Ambassador Sky Chef 1996 Lab IC 299, 303-04 (Born), per Srikrishna J.

32 Workmen of Firestone TRCI Pvt Ltd v Mgmt (1973) 1 LLJ 278 [LNIND 1972 SC 133], 295, per Vaidialingam J.

33 Santak Singh v 9th IT 1984 Lab IC 817, 822 (Cal), per Amitabha Dutta J.

34 Rama Kant Misra v State of Uttar Pradesh 1982 Lab IC 1790 [LNIND 1982 SC 149], 1792 (SC).

35 1996 Lab IC 299, 303-04 (Born), per Srikrishna J.

36 Mohan Sugan Naik v NTC Ltd (1995) 1 LLJ 110, 112 (Born) (DB), per Pendse J.

37 Dharmapuri Distt Co-op Sugar Mills v LC (1997) 2 LLJ 833 [LNIND 1997 MAD 31], 838 (Mad) (DB), per Kanakaraj J.

38 Harpal Singh v LC, Ambala 1994 Lab IC 1367, 1369 (P&H), per JL Gupta J.

39 Tata Iron & Steel Co Ltd v LC, Jamshedpur (1996) 2 LLJ 874, 879, per Sahay J.

40 Ganges Mfg Co Ltd v State of West Bengal (1996) 2 LLJ 904 [LNIND 1995 CAL 143], 912 (Cal), per GK Bhattacharjee J.

41 Bharat Hotel v Workmen 1994 Lab IC 380, 383-84 (Ker), per Pillay J.

42 KSRTC v John D'Souza 1995 Lab IC 1119, 1122 (Kant), per Saldanha J.

43 Balasore DCCB Ltd v Karunakar Das (1995) 2 LLJ 196, 201 (Orr) (DB), per Jagadeb Roy J.

44 MSRT Corpn v TA Gavandee (1994) 1 LLJ 78 [LNIND 1993 BOM 500], 79 (Bom), per Puranik J.

45 Ganesh Rajan Servai v Bannett Coleman & Co Ltd 1989 Lab IC 534, 540 (Bom), per Kantharia J.

46 Mgmt of TUCS Ltd v PO, Principal LC (2000) 4 LLN 276 (Mad), per Meenakumari J.

47 SMukherjee v Third IT (1997) 3 LLJ (Supp) 847, 853 (Cal), per Sen J.

