CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[S. 11A. Power of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals to give Appropriate Relief in case of Discharge or Dismissal of Workmen.(

Loss of Confidence:

One of the important factors militating against the reinstatement which a good bit of decisional grist has accumulated, is the 'loss of confidence' in the workman by the employer. The plea of the employer of his 'loss of confidence', particularly, where holding a position of trust and confidence, the concerned employees misused that position rendering it insecure and undesirable to retain him in service, despite his discharge or dismissal having been held to be invalid, will militate against the award of reinstatement as it is not a light matter to force an employee upon an unwilling employer in such a case.[1] Though the employer's plea that he has lost confidence in the dismissed employee cannot ordinarily be exaggerated, yet in the special circumstances of a case, it may not be fair to the employer or to the employee to direct reinstatement.[2] Likewise, in PP Chopra, the court accepted the employer's plea of loss of confidence in the workman who was a stenographer and was in a position of confidence and trust as he was taking down dictation and typing out all kinds of matters and even secret matters and particularly when he had, in fact, surreptitiously retained with him the copies of some communications. As the employer could legitimately entertain the feeling, that, if reinstated, he would again retain with him copies of documents of a confidential nature whenever he felt that such retention would be of use or advantageous to him. In these circumstances, the feeling on the part of the employer that he could no longer trust the workman for any confidential matter, could not be regarded as unjustified as it was not unlikely that, in future, the workman might collect evidence of even more dangerous and harmful nature. Obviously, if the employer could not repose confidence in the workman if reinstated, he could not make any use of his service as a stenographer.[3]

AK Roy, is another case where the plea of the employer of loss of confidence in the workman prevailed with the Supreme Court in view of the recommendations of the senior security officer, based on the verification report from the police, that it would not be desirable to retain him in service, particularly when the workman was employed in a blast furnace-a crucial part of the work-with respect to which the employer could not hazard any risk. It was, therefore, not possible to retain the workman in service on the ground of security and consequently the employer could not place confidence in him any longer. The court observed that if the management truly felt that it was not possible to retain the workman in the company's service on the ground of security, the case would be one of those exceptions where the general rule of reinstatement could not be applied properly.[4] In Francis Klein, the court held the direction of reinstatement of the workman who held the post of a durban in the employer's concern, and to allot him some other suitable job, to be unjustified for the reason that the employer had lost confidence in him on account of his refusal to co-operate when a colleague of his asked him for assistance to apprehend a thief. Since the job of the workman involved security of valuable property, both of manufactured goods and other assets, which required to be guarded, the plea of the employer of loss of confidence was held to be justified and the order of reinstatement was replaced with an order of compensation in lieu of reinstatement. Speaking for the Court, Jaganmohan Reddy J, observed:

> .. . when an employer loses confidence in his employee particularly in respect of a person who is discharging an office of trust and confidence, there can be no justification for directing his reinstatement.[5]

In Sudder Office, in view of the fact that the workman was holding a very responsible post where integrity and honesty were quite essential, the termination of his service on the ground of loss of confidence was held to be justified.[6] But in Binny, though the tribunal had upheld the validity of the domestic inquiry holding the workman guilty of an aggravated act of misconduct, it ordered his reinstatement. In appeal, dealing with the plea of loss of confidence, the Supreme Court observed:

> It has become almost a settled principle that reinstatement should not be awarded where the management justifiably alleges that they have ceased to have confidence in the dismissed employee. In other cases, the tribunal must consider carefully the circumstances of the case to come to the finding that justice and fair play require that reinstatement should be awarded.[7]

In Binny, the workman had taken leave on the false pretext of going to his village for settling a land dispute whereas actually, during that period, he participated in a hunger-strike in front of the Government secretariat as a member of a trade union. The employer company, therefore, cancelled his leave and directed him to resume duty forthwith. On his failure to comply with that direction, the company terminated his services under the relevant Standing Order for 'absenting himself without leave for eight consecutive working days'. The labour court set aside the order of termination and directed his reinstatement, with backwages as it took the view that the employer company had no right to revoke the leave already granted to the workman, but in appeal, by special leave, the Supreme Court held that neither reinstatement nor backwages could have been awarded as the employer had lost confidence in the workman on account of his having obtained leave on a false pretext.[8] In MK Chhatre, the labout court had awarded reinstatement of the workman after holding that none of the charges against him were proved. However, in appeal, the Supreme Court observed that reinstatement would not be justified in view of the facts relating to one of the charges levelled against him. Accordingly, the award of reinstatement was substituted by a suitable compensation.[9] In L Michael, the workman, who was employed as a receipt and despatch clerk in the office of the employer company, was discharged from service and his discharge was sought to be sustained as discharge simpliciter on the ground of loss of confidence in view of his having misused his position by passing on 'very important and secret information about the affairs of the company to certain outsiders'. The labour court held the discharge of the workman from service was justified for the reason of 'loss of confidence' by the employer in him but in appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held that the labour court in sustaining the order of discharge on the ground of loss of confidence had misread the material evidence, and therefore, itself went into the evidence and found that the plea of loss of confidence was not made out by the employer. In the circumstances, the Supreme Court itself ordered the reinstatement of the workman but an objective perusal of the case discernible from the paper book of the appeal does not warrant this approach and conclusion of the court. Even as a question of law, the following observations are rather off the mark and would require elucidation:

> Loss of confidence is no new armour for the management; otherwise security of tenure, ensured by the new industrial jurisdiction and authenticated by a catena of cases of this court, can be subverted by this neo formula. Loss of confidence in the law will be the consequence of the loss of confidence doctrine. In the light of what we have indicated, it is clear that loss of confidence is often a subjective feeling or individual reaction to an objective set of facts and motivations. The court is concerned with the latter and not with the former, although circumstances may exist which justify a genuine exercise of the power of simple termination. In a reasonable case of a confidential or responsible post being misused or a sensitive or strategic position being abused, it may be a high risk to keep the employee, once suspicion has started and a disciplinary inquiry cannot be forced on the matter. There, a termination simpliciter may be bona fide, not colourable, and loss of confidence may be evidentiary of good faith of the employer.[10]

However, the plea of 'loss of confidence' by the employer cannot be accepted as a matter of routine. It does not mean that in every case, where the employer says that since he terminated the service of the workman for loss of confidence in him, reinstatement should not be awarded, should be accepted. Loss of confidence cannot merely be subjective based upon the statement of the mind of the management. Objective facts, which would induce a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the management regarding the trustworthiness of the employee must be alleged and proved. Otherwise, the right of reinstatement to which an employee is ordinarily entitled to, on a finding that he is not guilty of any misconduct, will be irretrievably lost to the employee.[11] The tribunal has to carefully examine all the circumstances of the case before coming to the conclusion that the apprehensions of the employer are genuine and he truly feels that it would be hazardous or prejudicial to the interests of the industry to retain the workman in his service on the ground of security or discipline before deciding that instead of reinstatement, compensation would meet the ends of justice.[12] The mere fact that the relations between the employer and the concerned workman were not cordial or were strained, would not by itself establish the case of loss of confidence and defeat the relief of reinstatement.[13]

The plea of loss of confidence must have some rational relation to the fact that the employee had misused his position of trust and rendered it undesirable to retain him in service. Loss of confidence in the intergrity of an employee should be substantiated by cogent evidence before the industrial adjudicator. If a workman is entitled, as a general rule, to be reinstated after his wrongful dismissal is set aside and on the facts it is not possible to find cogent material on which the establishment can generally be considered to have 'lost confidence' in the integrity of the workman, he is entitled to be reinstated.[14] In other words the plea of loss of confidence has to be substantiated specifically by the employer by pleading and proving it before the tribunal by adducing the relevant evidence. The plea of loss of confidence is only to be entertained if it is founded on material facts and particulars specifically pleaded and proved. The material facts and particulars in this regard will, inter alia, include the rule of confidence in the business of the employer, nature of the job performed by the workman and the specification of the confidentiality involved therein.[15] The failure of the employer to do so will disentitle him to impugn the order of reinstatement. In a case, where the employer states that he has lost confidence in the employee, the matter has to be weighed properly. The mere assertion of the employer that he has lost confidence cannot compel the tribunal to refrain from passing an order of reinstatement. The tribunal will have to consider whether the employer genuinely feels that it is risky to retain an employee in future or that it is hazardous or prejudicial to the interest of the industry to do so or it is a mere allegation made to send the employee our of employment.[16]Mere surmises or suspicion are no proof of the commission of the act justifying loss of confidence.[17] In Panitole Tea Estate, the Supreme Court observed that this aspect requires determination on facts which should be properly placed before the tribunal and a finding secured after appropriate trial. In other words, the employer must plead and prove before the tribunal all the facts relevant to the plea of loss of confidence and obtain a finding on that from it.[18] The first and foremost requirement to be proved is that the workman, in fact, held a place of trust and confidence and while holding such a position, he did something to forefeit the confidence of the employer and to continue him further in the service would be embarrassing and inconvenient to the employer or would be deterimental to the interest of discipline or security in the establishment.[19] In Cox & Kings, the court repelled the contention, that since the employer had lost confidence in the concerned workman, compensation without reinstatement would have been adequate relief, because there was no factual basis for the belated contention.[20]

In MK Chhatre (supra), in spite of the fact that the plea of loss of confidence was not even raised before the labour court, the Supreme Court substituted the order of reinstatement by an order of compensation in lieu of reinstatement, in view of the facts relating to one of the charges. The plea of loss of confidence before the Supreme Court related to a charge which had not been proved before the labout court. If the charge had not been proved, as held by the Supreme Court itself, the question of loss of confidence on account of the facts relating to that charge could not arise. In PP Chopra (supra), the plea of loss of confidence was not raised before the tribunal but this plea was raised for the first time before the Supreme Court in support of the contention that the tribunal ought not to have directed the workman's reinstatement. The court accepted the plea in view of the fact that the workman being a stenographer in the establishment was in a position of confidence and trust. Since he abused that position by surreptitiously retaining the copies of certain correspondence, the management could not repose confidence in him, and if reinstated, they would not be able to make use of his services as a stenographer. In the circumstances, the court held that the tribunal ought not to have directed reinstatement but ought to have awarded suitable compensation instead. In Anil Kumar Chakraborty, where the workman held the position of trust and confidence as a compounder, in which capacity he was entrusted with drugs and medicines for being supplied and distributed to the needy and ailing workers, free of cost, but by abusing his position of trust, he indulged in trafficking in those drugs and medicines to the deteriment of the health and well-being of the workers.[21] A single judge of the AP High Court, in South Central Rly ECC Society, has deduced the following principles of a plea of loss of confidence:

(i) in order to arrive at a conclusion whether the employer has lost confidence in the employee, there cannot be any strait-jacket principles as each case has to be assessed on its peculiar facts and circumstances;

(ii) the derelict observance of any act by the employee giving rise to the complaint of losing confidence in him must be a deliberate one; an innocuous and inadvertent act which causes detriment will not be a circumstance for losing confidence in the employee;

(iii) the normal rule is that in cases of invalid orders of dismissal, the direction is for reinstatement of the dismissed employee and the exception is expedience, where, say the employee held a position of confidence and trust and the employer lost confidence, reinstatement will not be fair. [22]

In M Arunagiri, the employer lost confidence in the workman on account of his habitual frequent absence, irregular attendance and absence of sincerity. The Madras High Court held that the order of reinstatement would not be proper and only compensation should be awarded.[23] In D Seeralan, another Division Bench of that High Court set aside the award of the labour court and held that the termination of service of the employee for loss of confidence was invalid for non-compliance with the relevant Standing Orders inflicting the disciplinary punishment, but in view of the fact that the termination of service was not mala fide, the court awarded compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[24] In Kanhaiyalal Agrawal, the Supreme Court held that in a case of termination for loss of confidence, proof based on objective facts was necessary. Where the employees were charged for making payments for sugarcane not actually brought into mills, the evidence shows that the workmen did not follow the prescribed procedure and were negligent, but there was no evidence to show that the workmen had misappropriated the money, and hence a conclusion of loss of confidence could not be drawn.[25] In NC Nalwaya, the facts were: an unknown person visited the bank claiming to be the account holder of a dormant account, and the bank employee disclosed the amount lying in the credit of the account holder without verifying the identity of the person, resulting in the said stranger withdrawing Rs. 6000/- from the account. The employee was charge-sheeted and eventually dismissed. In the meantime, the criminal court acquitted him in respect of the same case on the ground that the charges were not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The Appellate authority dismissed the appeal filed by the employee on ground of delay. The High Court observed that the delay in approaching appellate authority was genuine in the light of the pendency of criminal proceedings and that, the question of loss of confidence would not arise. On this view of the matter, the Court set aside the dismissal. Quashing the order of the High Court and converting the dismissal into compulsory retirement in the special circumstances of the case, Raveendran J (for himself and AK Patnaik J), held:

> It is now well settled that the courts will not act as an appellate court and re-assess the evidence led in the domestic enquiry, nor interfere on the ground that another view is possible on the material on record. If the enquiry has been fairly and properly held and the findings are based on evidence, the question of adequacy of the evidence or the reliable nature of the evidence will not be grounds for interfering with the findings in departmental enquiries. Therefore, courts will not interfere with findings of fact recorded in departmental enquiries, except where such findings are based on no evidence or where they are clearly perverse. The test to find out perversity is to see whether a tribunal acting reasonably could have arrived at such conclusion or finding, on the material on record.Courts will, however, interfere with the findings in disciplinary matters, if principles of natural justice or statutory regulations have been violated or if the order is found to be arbitrary, capricious, mala fide or based on extraneous considerations.[26]

Delay and Employment of New Persons:

Another circumstance, which is relevant in deciding the question, whether departure from the normal rule of reinstatement should be made or not, is long delay. Delay can be of two types, namely,

(1) delay between the occasion for the industrial dispute and the agitation or complaint by labour which leads to the reference; and

(2) delay from the time of reference to the date of final order of reinstatement.

As far as the delay of the second type is concerned, ie, the time that lapses subsequent to the reference of an industrial dispute would be quite irrelevant in consideration of the relief but the delay of the first type, ie, the time between-the occasion for the dispute and the agitation or complaint by labour which leads to the reference might be a relevant circumstance in shaping the relief. Everything will depend on the period of delay, the facts which occasioned the delay, and the degree of negligence with which the organised labour could be rightly taxed.[27] Even the delay of the first type, though relevant, is not always per se adequate ground for declining the relief of reinstatement, particularly where the dismissal or termination of service is illegal or amounts to an 'unfair trade practice'.[28] In Shalimar Works, a large number of workmen were discharged in April 1948. Two references with respect to the reinstatement of 250 workmen were made. A list of 250 workmen was sent to the tribunal when practically the whole of the adjudicatory proceedings were over and the tribunal was to consider the question of reinstatement. The tribunal ordered the employer to reinstate 250 workmen with the direction that it should give notice to the discharged workmen to ask for employment. In appeal, the labour appellate tribunal awarded reinstatement of 15 workmen, who did not withdraw their provident fund. The Supreme Court held that even the 15 workmen should not have been ordered to be reinstated by the labour appellate tribunal as there was no reason for ordering the reinstatement of anyone on such vague references after such an unreasonable length of time. The court observed that even though there is no limitation prescribed for reference of disputes to an industrial tribunal, it is only reasonable that disputes should be referred as soon as possible after they have arisen and after conciliation proceedings have failed, particularly so, when the dispute relates to discharge of a large number of workmen.[29] In Punjab National Bank, the court affirmed the order of reinstatement made by the tribunal and rejected the plea of the employer that the labour appellate tribunal had not taken into consideration the fact that a long time had elapsed between the date of dismissal and the award and in the meanwhile it had employed additional hands and the reinstatement would be unfair as it would cause hardship to the employer but in the absence of the relevant facts, as to how many employees had been appointed and on what terms, which were within the special knowledge of the employer, the court found it difficult to deal with the plea on merits. The court said that since the bank had failed to establish its specific case against any of the employees, there was no reason why the normal rule of reinstatement should not prevail and the employees should not get the relief of reinstatement. The mere fact that the bank might have employed some other persons in the meanwhile, would not necessarily defeat such a claim for reinstatement. Gajendragadkar J, of the Supreme Court observed:

> ...however much the court may sympathise with the employer's difficulty caused by the fact that after the wrongful dismissal in question, he had engaged fresh hands, the court cannot overlook the claims of the employees who, on the findings of the tribunals below, had been wrongfully dismissed. In the case of such wrongful dismissal, the normal rule would be that the employees thus wrongfully dismissed must be reinstated.[30]

The further plea of the employer that a large number of workmen clamouring for reinstatement had already secured employment elsewhere on permanent basis and so, it was unnecessary to force them on the bank, was also discountenanced for want of relevant material as it had not been raised before the labour appellate tribunal. In Swadesamitran, the court further observed that once it has been found that the termination of service of a workman is unjustified and improper, it is for the tribunal to consider as to what relief the workman is entitled to. The fact that the protracted litigation in regard to the dispute has inevitably meant delay and in the meanwhile the employer has engaged other workmen, would not necessarily defeat the claim of the workman for reinstatement.[31] In Bombay Steel Rolling, under the terms of a settlement, the employer had agreed to take back in service, certain workmen on their acquittal in criminal proceedings. Some of the workmen were acquitted in the criminal proceedings but they did not report for work nor did they ask for reinstatement within a reasonable time on their acquittal. They applied for being taken back after a long time, which the employer refused. The tribunal directed their reinstatement. The Supreme Court itself considered the evidence and held that the concerned workmen had, in fact, not reported for work within a reasonable time after their acquittal and observed that it would be neither fair nor reasonable to ask the management to comply with the demand for reinstatement made months and months after such acquittal, particularly, when during this long period, the employer had naturally employed new hands and in the special circumstances of the case that fact could not altogether be ignored.[32] In Binny, the court rejected the plea of the employer that reinstatement should not be ordered four years after the dismissal of the employee as the management had already made other arrangements for the work which was formerly being done by the dismissed workman. The court distinguished its earlier decision in Shalimar Works on the ground that in that case there were a very large number of workmen, who were to be reinstated while in this case only one workman had to be reinstated and there would be no serious dislocation of work by the order of reinstatement of one workman. Speaking for the Supreme Court, Mitter J held:

> Normally it will be months before an order of reference is made by the government and one or two years elapsed in almost all cases before the adjudication by an industrial tribunal is complete. If mere lapse of time be enough to lead the industrial tribunal to hold that there should be no reinstatement of service, the power of reinstatement will become obsolete. In any case, the management must try to show that reinstatement will cause dislocation of work and the tribunal must take that into consideration. In this case, we find no such compelling circumstances.[33]

An employer who claims a departure from the normal rule must satisfy the adjudicator that the employee is disentitled to the relief by producing before him necessary evidence. If he fails to raise necessary points for decision, he cannot be permitted to make a grievance against the relief of reinstatement.[34]

Accepting Notice and Wages:

Considering the unequal position between an employer and a needy employee, the acceptance of notice-wages and wages due up to the date of dismissal cannot be a bar to relief or reinstatement of compensation in lieu of reinstatement, unless it is proved that the acceptance was voluntary and made with full knowledge of its consequences upon the dispute.[35] It would be wrong to draw the inference from the mere fact of receipt of wages for the notice period that the workman voluntarily gave up his service and was estopped from claiming reinstatement.[36] The receipt granted by the employee in such a case for the notice-wages received does not bar his claim to the relief of reinstatement, if an industrial dispute is raised over his dismissal.[37] In industrial adjudication, technical pleas of estoppel and waiver are generally not entertained. Estoppel is a rule of evidence and it may have the effect of creating substantive rights as against the person estopped. Besides, the ingredients of estoppel have to be factually and legally satisfied before the principles of estoppel can be pressed into service. Acquiescence denotes conduct which is evidence of an intention by a party to abandon a right legitimately due to him. It may also denote a conduct from which the opposite party could be justified in inferring such an intention. Acquiescence is only a form of estoppel, and it is of the essence of acquiescence that the party acquiescing should be aware of, and by words or conduct should represent that he assents to what is a violation of his rights and the other party should have been deluded by the representation into thinking that this wrongful action was assented to by the first party. The question of estoppel or acquiescence is essentially a question of fact, which has to be decided on proper materials before the court. Once facts are established, acquiescence is a matter of legal inference. Waiver is an intentional relinquishment of a known right. There could be no waiver unless the person against whom waiver is claimed had full knowledge of his rights and all facts enabling him to take effectual action for the enforcement of such rights.[38] Waiver is contractual and would constitute an agreement to release or not to assert a right. The pleas of acquiescence or waiver have to be specifically taken by the opposite party and there should be an issue on that point. They cannot be a matter of bare presumptions and assumptions. They are questions of fact which have got to be pleaded and proved by adducing relevant evidence. The burden of proof of the ingredients of acquiescence or waiver is on the person who relies on the same.[39] In Palaniswami, the labour court granted the relief of compensation in lieu of reinstatement on refusal of the management to reinstate the workmen and the workmen accepted the awarded amount under protest expressly stating that this was without prejudice to challenge the award in a writ petition. The Madras High Court held that the workman was not disentitled to claim the relief of reinstatement in the writ petition as the doctrine of 'approbation and reapprobation' would not apply; nor would the doctrine of'accord and satisfaction' apply to a case of industrial adjudication.[40]

In Seema Ghosh, the facts were: the workman was taken in service in 1947; the workman was examined by the Medical Board and his age was assessed; in 1960 a service card was issued by the Management wherein the age of the workman was recorded as 24 years and the same was duly accepted by the workman by putting his signature; only in 1972, for the first time, the workman produced a transfer certificate issued from the school and disputed his age; the said transfer certificate was sent to the District Education Officer who informed the Management that the transfer certificate was not genuine; it is also not disputed that after the age rectification committee took a decision the workman was examined by a specially constituted Medical Board in 1984 and his age was assessed as 13-9-1926; the service record was again corrected and it was made in 1926. In this way, the service of the workman was increased by two years; the workman accepted the age assessed by the Medical Board in 1984 and according to the age so assessed by the Medical Board workman the same was increased by two years. In 1986, the workman was given one year's extension in service and he accepted the said extension without raising any objection and retired on 13 September 1987. After his superannuation the workman raised the industrial dispute regarding actual date of superannuation. The Labour Court passed the award holding that the workman is entitled to full back wages including admissible allowances and other benefits for the period from 13 September 1987 i.e... his date of illegal superannuation to 11 August 1990 i.e... the actual date of retirement. Quashing the appeal filed by the workman, Lakshmanan J (for Himself and Chattejee J) of the Supreme Court held:

> .. . The workman did not challenge the opinion of the Medical Board constituted by the Management for determining the age of the workman and permitted the workman to work till his attaining the age of retirement. Therefore, the workman in the present case is estopped from challenging the correctness of the opinion of the Medical Board after his retirement.. .. The workman was to superannuate in the year 1986 but on the basis of the assessment of age made by the Apex Medical Board, he was allowed to continue till 13.09.1987. At that stage, the workman did not challenge the decision of the Medical Board. It is only after enjoying the benefits given to the workman and after availing the benefits, the workman raised a dispute after his retirement in pursuance of which the Labour Court has passed the Award.. .. the findings arrived at by the Labour Court is nothing but perverse against the facts and passed the award in favour of the workman on totally misplaced sympathy. In our opinion, both the learned Single Judge and of the Division Bench are right and within their jurisdiction in re-assessing and re-valuing the weight of the evidence in the case recorded by the Labour Court by which the High Court came to the conclusion that the workman was not entitled to any relief.. . .[41] (para 31) (Italics supplied)

Discrimination:

Where an employer dismisses a number of workmen on finding them guilty of an act of misconduct but subsequently takes some of them back in service while leaving others out, it would be open to those workmen who have not been taken back, to claim reinstatement on the ground of discrimination but whether such an act is an act of discrimination or not, would be a question of fact depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case. If the employer while taking some workmen back has left others out for their trade union activities or other ulterior purpose, this may be an act of unfair labour practice of victimisation and would tantamount to unwarranted discrimination. The aggrieved workmen would, therefore have a valid ground for reinstatement. But if on the other hand, the employer has not been able to take in service all the workmen and left some of them out for genuine, valid and justifiable reasons, his action would not be assailable. In Lakshmiratan Cotton, the employer had to reinstate 31 workmen out of 53 workmen who were dismissed as decided by the Chief Minister. It was agreed by way of a settlement, that the said decision would be binding on both the sides. It was held that it could not be a ground for reinstatement of the remaining workmen with respect to whom the reference of an industrial dispute was made for adjudication.[42]

Nature of Employment:

In Sundaramoney, the workman was employed as a cashier off and on with an intermittent break. His appointment used to be treated purely as a temporary one for a period of nine days at a time which could be terminated without assigning any reason thereof at the employer's discretion but this nine days employment tacked on, had ripened to a continuous service for a year under s 25B(2) of the Act. The termination of the services of the workman after the expiry of his last term was held to be retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo). Accordingly, the Supreme Court directed his reinstatement with continuity of service though, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case did not award backwage. Thus, irrespective of the device adopted by the employer to keep the employee permanently in temporary employment, the relief of reinstatement was considered to be the logical conclusion of its decision to set aside the termination of the services of the workman.[43] A single judge of the Madras High Court in Crompton Engg, held that where employment of a particular individual is for a specific period or for specific work, the employment automatically comes to an end on the expiry of such period or after the work was over and consequently, there was no termination and there was no question of reinstatement.[44] In JS Khadgawat, the Rajasthan High Court held that acceptance of the payment of wages for termination of service in terms of the contract of employment would neither constitute waiver nor estoppel.[45] Waiver means abandonment of right and it may be either express or implicit from the conduct but its basic requirement is that it must be an intentional act with knowledge. Furthermore, there could be no waiver unless the person who is said to have waived is fully informed of his right and with full knowledge of such right, he intentionally abandons it.[46]Estoppel as envisaged by s 115 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 can arise only if a party to a proceeding has altered his position on the faith of a representation or promise made by another.[47] In the fact situation of some cases, the courts have held the order of reinstatement to be justified,[48] and in other cases, they have held the reinstatement to be unjustified,[49] depending upon various facts and circumstances of each case. Where the employee of a Land Development Bank did not raise the dispute about her termination within a reasonable time and further averred in her application filed before the labour court to the effect that she was gainfully employed in Haryana Urban Development Authority and that her service was in fact regularised therein, allowing the appeal of the Bank, Sinha J (for himself and Hegde J), of the Supreme Court held:

> It is trite that the courts and tribunals having plenary jurisdiction have discretionary power to grant an appropriate relief to the parties. The aim and object of the Industrial Disputes Act may be to impart social justice to the workman but the same by itself would not mean that irrespective of his conduct a workman would automatically be entitled to relief. The procedural laws like estoppel, waiver and acquiescence are equally applicable to the industrial proceedings. A person in certain situation may even be held to be bound by the doctrine of Acceptance Sub silentio. The Respondent herein did not raise any industrial dispute questioning the termination of her services within a reasonable time. She even accepted an alternative employment and has been continuing therein from 10-8-1988.. .. She, therefore, did not deny or dispute that she had been regularly employed or her services had been regularized. She merely exercised her right to join the service of the Appellant.[50]

(b) Reinstatement with Backwages

Neither reinstatement nor payment of backwages as such is a common law right. These reliefs can, however, be granted by the industrial tribunals in the course of industrial adjudication.[51] Generally the question of backwages would not arise, when the discharge or dismissal is not set aside and is upheld by industrial adjudication as proper and justified[52] but the question is accentuated when the adjudicator sets aside the discharge or dismissal and awards reinstatement. Normally, backwages must follow reinstatement as reinstatement is a compendious concept but industrial adjudication has insisted that backwages must be specifically awarded, to entitle a workman for the claim of backwages because quantum of backwages is in the discretion of the adjudicator.[53] The award of backwages has to be carried out by the employer in letter and spirit. In Phanindra Chandra Roy, the industrial tribunal had ordered reinstatement of the workman with full backwages and directed the payment of all his arrears within a month of the receipt of the award. The employer corporation reinstated the workman after more than a year on his agreeing to accept only 40 percent of the backwages to which he was entitled in terms of the award. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court set aside the order of the corporation as unfair and untenable and strongly deprecated such action particularly by a public sector undertaking.[54] The question, whether in a case where reinstatement is found to be a proper relief, what should be the guiding considerations for awarding full or partial backwages, crops up every time when the workman questions the validity and legality of termination of his service howsoever brought about, to wit by dismissal, removal, discharge or retrenchment and the relief of reinstatement is granted? As a corollary to this question, further question is as to, whether the workman should be awarded full backwages or some sacrifice is expected of him?[55] The effect of reinstatement is to restore an employee to his former capacity, status and emolument, as if his services had never been terminated and the employee gets the benefit of continuity of service. In the absence of cogent reasons to the contrary such compensation should normally be equal to the full wages or remuneration which the employee would have received, had he continued in service but for the order of termination of his service.[56]

The general rule in industrial adjudication is that when a workman is reinstated after a certain period of enforced idleness or unemployment, then in the absence of cogent reasons, such reinstated workman should be entitled to full wages or remuneration which he could have received had he continued in service.[57] 'Wages for the purpose of computing back wages can only be those wages which are permissible in law'. For instance, when a workman is reinstated with backwages, he should be paid the same wages as he would have been getting if he had not been dismissed.[58] In other words, ordinarily when the services of a workman have been illegally terminated by retrenchment, discharge or dismissal, he will be entitled to full backwages except to the extent he was gainfully employed during the enforced idleness.[59] In Changunabai Palkar, a female employee was dismissed without serving a charge-sheet or holding an inquiry for passive participation in an illegal strike by the workers in the textile mill. Though the other workers who participated in the strike were allowed to join, the workman in question who had an unblemished record of 40 years of service was not given the backwages for 14 months. The Bombay High Court held that the claim for backwages had a legal foundation and denial thereof in the facts and circumstances of the case was unwarranted and unjustified.[60] The effect of reinstatement is that the workman is to be restored to his previous position so far as his capacity, status and emoluments are concerned.[61] The workman has to be restored to his former position and status setting aside his discharge or dismissal from service as if he had never been dismissed, and he gets the benefit of continuity of service.[62]In other words, relief of reinstatement would mean that the employer has taken away, illegally the right of the workman to work, contrary to the relevant law or in breach of contract, and simultaneously deprived him of his earnings. Hence, the employer cannot shirk his responsibility of paying the wages which the workman has been deprived of by illegal or invalid action. If the workmen were always ready to work but they were kept away therefrom on account of invalid act of the employer, there is no justification for not awarding them full backwages which were legitimately due to them. Any other view would be a premium on the unwarranted litigative activity of the employer.[63] In such cases, full backwages are to be awarded to effectuate a twin purpose: firstly, that the discharge or dismissal having been found illegal, the workman continues in service in spite of the order, and secondly, that in such a case full backwages should be granted for the purpose of creating a climate in which workmen of the concern may be free from fear of reprisals in participating in the legitimate trade union activities.[64] However, there are exceptions to this rule where the tribunal in its discretion may deny or reduce backwages. In Gujarat Steel Tubes, the Supreme Court observed:

> Certainly, the normal rule, on reinstatement, is full backwages since the order of termination is non est...Even so, the industrial court may slice off a part if the workmen are not wholly blameless or the strike is illegal and unjustified. To what extent wages for the long interregnum should be paid is, therefore, a variable dependent on a complex of circumstances' but the discretion is to be exercised only in extraordinary cases.[65]

For instance, the relief of full backwages may be denied where that would place an impossible burden on the employer.[66] Similarly, if it is established by the employer that the management sustained a huge loss or a huge amount has to be paid to a large number of workmen covering a long period and the management will be adversely affected thereby.[67] The extent of income, if any, earned by the workman elsewhere during the period of his enforced unemployment and the nature of the efforts for the absence thereof, on his parr, to secure alternative gainful employment, will be the relevant factors to be taken into account in denying or scaling down quantum of backwages. Once the relevant facts are brought on record, there will be no defect in calculating the income, ifany, earned by the employee elsewhere.[68] Likewise, if the workman is found guilty of misconduct or lapse on his parr, it is within the discretion of the tribunal not to award wages for the period during which he may have remained out of employment.[69] In deciding the question, as to whether the employee should be recompensed with full backwages and other benefits until the date of reinstatement, the tribunals and the courts have to be realistic albeit me ordinary rule of full backwages on reinstatement.[70] In the very nature of things, there cannot be a strait jacket formula for awarding the relief of backwages. All relevant considerations will enter the verdict. More or less, it would be a motion addressed to the discretion of the tribunal. Full backwages except to the extent the workman was gainfully employed during the period of enforced idleness, would be the normal rule and the party objecting to it must establish the circumstances necessitating the departure.[71] For instance, in Zila Sahakari Bank, where the workman remained almost unemployed till his reinstatement except for a few months, the award of full backwages from the date of termination of the employment till the date of reinstatement was held to be valid and justified.[72] Likewise, in SG Chemicals and Dyes, in the circumstances of the case, the workmen whose services were terminated on the ground of illegal closure were entitled to full wages. The court discountenanced the plea of the employer that they must have taken alternative employment during the period between the date of closure of the undertaking and the hearing of the appeal before the Supreme Court and an inquiry, therefore, should be directed into the amount received by them from such alternative employer so as to set off the amount received by them, against full backwages and future salary payable to them.[73] Inordinate delay in agitating the dispute regarding the reinstatement and backwages will have a serious bearing on the question of backwages. For instance in Steel Authority of India, the labour court awarded reinstatement with backwages to the workman who had raised the dispute after more than ten years, the Supreme Court observed that even if the order of termination was void ab initio, there was no justification for waiting over a decade to challenge the order. The employer, therefore, could not be asked to pay for the default of the workman in raising the dispute after a decade. Even if the order of maximum punishment could be said to be harsh, there was no justification for the direction of payment of full wages. The court, therefore substituted the order of full backwages with 25 per cent of the backwages.[74]

that where the termination of service is found to be illegal, the date, on which such order is made which prevented the employee from returning to his service, should be the starting point for awarding him wages. It would not be proper to say that the date on which the order of termination of service was found to be illegal by the competent authority should be the starting date for awarding wages. The declaration of illegality relates back to the date on which the order was made because the termination brings about cessation in getting wages. In other words, if at the date on which the workman stopped rendering service by an order which is found to be illegal, that must be the relevant date from which the backwages must start subject to the general principle, that if that employee has thereafter served somewhere else, the amount so earned by him should be adjusted.[75] In dealing with different types of cases, the tribunal in each case has to see that relief should be given in a particular case to a particular workman in the matter of compensation by balancing the conflicting claims and the variations that exist in human conduct and the requirements of social justice.[76] On the parity of reasoning, the adjudicator has to counter-balance the claim of the employer that the workman was gainfully employed elsewhere during the period of unemployment with him, with the claim of the workman that he was not employed anywhere at all. The quantum of backwages is, therefore, a matter in the discretion of the tribunal dependent on the facts of a case. The tribunal will exercise its discretion keeping in view all the relevant circumstances.[77] The discretion has to be exercised having regard to certain approved principles an procedures.[78] A workman directed to be reinstated with backwages would not be entitled to backwages for the period during which he was usefully employed elsewhere,[79] because he cannot be allowed to take double advantage and make excessive gains relying on the wrongful act of the employer.[80] In Hindustan Tin Works, the Supreme Court reiterated that ordinarily the workman whose service has been illegally terminated would be entitled to full backwages except to the extent he was gainfully employed. If the workman was always ready to work but he was kept away by invalid or illegal act on the part of the employer, there would be no justification for not awarding him full backwages which were legitimately due to him. Speaking for the court, Desai J, observed:

> In the very nature of thing there cannot be a strait-jacket formula for awarding relief of backwages. All relevant consideration will enter the verdict. More or less, it would be a motion addressed to the discretion to the tribunal. Full backwages would be the normal rule and the party objecting to it must establish the circumstances necessitating departure. At that stage the tribunal will exercise its discretion keeping in view all the relevant considerations. But the discretion must be exercised in a judicial and judicious manner.[81]

The court discountenanced the plea that the payment of huge amounts of backwages to the reinstated workman would shake the financial viability of the company and the burden could be unbearable. However, keeping in view the facts and circumstances of the case, the court considered it proper to scale down the backwages to 75 per cent payable in two equal instalments. In A Phillips, a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court emphasised that the burden of showing that the normal rule should not be followed and the employee should be awarded full backwages is on the employer. Two factors relevant for departure from the rule and full backwages on reinstatement were pointed out, namely, gainful employment of the workman during the enforced idleness and the delay involved in raising the industrial dispute against the illegal termination of service. The further consideration for exercising the discretion in favour of the full backwages were stated to be harshness of punishment and the period during which the employee was kept out of employment due to no fault attributable to him, the nature of charges levelled against him and the delay in raising the dispute. In the facts and circumstances of this case, the backwages from the date of raising the dispute till the date of reinstatement were held to be just and fair.[82] In Surendra Kumar Verma, the court again recognised the discretion of the tribunal to deny the relief of full backwages in cases where the industry might be closed down or might be in severe financial doldrums and the relief of full backwages would place an impossible burden on the employer. In such and other exceptional cases, it is permissible for the court to mould the relief.[83] In GT Lad, in view of the fact that the period stretched over six years and further that the backwages had to be computed, if ordered in full, on a much higher scale because of two settlements which had raised the scale of wages substantially and the disputed fact that no specific case was put forward by the employer that the workman concerned had been employed elsewhere during this period, the Supreme Court took a total view of the whole case and directed the payment of 75 per cent of the wages for the entire period, ie, from the date of dismissal to the date of reinstatement on the scales and revised scales which might be applicable to the workmen.[84] In Gujarat Steel Tubes (supra), the court ordered reinstatement of a number of workmen whose services had been terminated en bloc and granted backwages ranging from 50 to 100 per cent to different categories of workmen.[85] In Pannijee Sugar, the court quashed the order of the labour court awarding full backwages to the workman as it had not taken into account the fact that the worker was admittedly a seasonal worker and remanded the case to the labour court with the direction to consider the question as to whether the worker is entitled to backwages for all the seasons which he had lost or for a particular season or for the entire period and for quantification of the relief The labour court was further directed to take into consideration the evidence, if any, that may be led by both the parties on the question whether the worker was gainfitlly employed elsewhere during the time he was not working with the employer.[86]

In Abhinash Chandra Gautam, the amount earned by the workman in his employment as a teacher, during the period of his unemployment after his discharge was deducted from the total amount of backwages.[87] In SM Saiyad, the workman was dismissed from service in 1969 and he pursued his remedies in civil courts and then got his dispute referred for industrial adjudication to a labour court. The labour court directed the reinstatement of the workman but declined to grant backwages. The Gujarat High Court modified the award by granting backwages only for the period between the date of the order of reference to the date of reinstatement by the labour court. The Supreme Court held that the fact that the workman pursued his remedies in the civil court could not be held against him for denying the relief of backwages, and directed payment of backwages as if he had continued in the service all along. However, with respect to the period of gainful employment of the workman as an advocate, the court directed that in computing the backwages for the period of gainful employment of the workman, an amount at the rate of Rs 150 per month should be deducted.[88] In Jai Bhagwan, in view of the fact that the workman had raised the dispute after a considerable delay without doing anything in the meanwhile to question the termination of his services, the Supreme Court did not think it proper to award full backwages. In the circumstances of the case, it awarded halfbackwages from the date of termination till the date of its judgment and thereafter full backwages from the date of judgment until reinstatement.[89] The Kerala High Court in Senior DPO, Southern Rly, held that it is inconsequential that no relief in respect of backwages was either prayed for or granted by the tribunal in its award ordering reinstatement. The workman still would be entitled to claim relief of backwages to which he is entitled from the date of the wrongful termination of his service to the date of his reinstatement. He can claim the same in an application under s 33C(2) and such claim would not be barred by the pleas of res judicata, discharge or limitation*etc*. The correctness of this decision is not free from doubt. If in its discretion, the tribunal has not granted backwages, no entitlement is created in the workman to make the claim of backwages.[90] In Pannijee Sugar, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the labour court with a direction to consider the question as to whether the worker was entitled to backwages taking into consideration the evidence, if any, that may be led by both the parties on the question whether the worker was gainfully employed elsewhere during the time he was not working with the employer.[91] In P Venugopal, the court affirmed the award of the labour court directing reinstatement of the employee with continuity of service and backwages on finding dismissal of the workman invalid and unjustified.[92] In SGChemical and Dyes, the court discountenanced the plea of the employer to direct an inquiry as to whether the workmen had taken up any alternative employment during the intervening period and had received any amount from such employment so as to set off the amount so received against the backwages and future salary payable to them. Madon J held:

> It is possible that rather than starve while awaiting the final decision on their complaint some of these workmen may have taken alternative employment. The period which has elapsed is, however, too short for the moneys received by such workmen from the alternative employment taken by them to aggregate to any sizeable amount, and it would be fair to let the workmen to retain such amount by way of solatium for the shock of having their services terminated, the anxiety and agony caused thereby, and the endeavours, perhaps often fruitless, to find alternative employment.[93]

In Central CSS Ltd, the employer had adopted a very cantankerous attitude towards the employee throughout the litigation arising out of her illegal dismissal from service which was set aside by the assistant registrar, co-operative societies ordering her reinstatement without backwages. The High Court of Himachal Pradesh ordered payment of backwages. The Supreme Court deprecated the cantankerous attitude on the part of the employer resulting in pain and agony to the employee for over a period of 20 long years. The court observed:

> For such thoughtless acts of its officers, the petitioner-society has to suffer and pay an amount exceeding three lakhs is indeed pitiable. But considering the agony and suffering of the opposite party that amount cannot be a proper recompense.. .. the permission given shall have nothing to do with the directions to pay the respondent her backwages. Steps, ifany, to recover the amount shall be taken only after the payment is made to the opposite party as directed by the High Court.[94]

In Mathura Electric Supply, in view of the fact that the year to year computation of backwages would be a long and tardy exercise, the employer requested the court to award a reasonable compensation for backwages. In the circumstances of the case, the court awarded a lump sum of rupees one lac as backwages.[95] In MS Dhantwal, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case and having regard to the monthly pay packet of the workman, the court directed the employer to pay Rs 5,000 to the workman as backwages, over and above the amount of Rs 20,000 awarded by way of compensation in lieu of reinstatement. Furthermore, in view of the fact that the workman had been kept on tenterhooks by the employer for nearly eight years, the court directed a further payment of Rs 2,000 to the workman by way of costs. And that all the payments should be made within a period of four weeks from the date of the judgment.[96] In Municipal Corpn of Delhi, a single judge of the Delhi High Court instead of remanding the matter for determining the backwages in view of the pendency of litigation for about 19 years, himself fixed the backwages at Rs 20,000 to meet the ends of justice as it was not possible to precisely determine as to what backwages the workman would have earned during that period.[97] In Vijaykumar Jasani, the tribunal held that the dismissal of a workman on the ground of absence from duty for two days was too harsh and disproportionate to the offence which was of a minor nature and set aside the dismissal and awarded reinstatement with 50 per cent of backwages. In a writ petition by the workman, challenging the denial of the remaining 50 per cent of the wages, the Gujarat High Court held that even the denial of 50 per cent wages to the workman was unreasonable and excessive punishment.[98] In RD Toplewar, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that even though there was an inordinate delay on the part of the employee in approaching the court in challenging the order of dismissal passed against him, the deprivation of the whole of the backwages would be unjust and disproportionate.[1]

In Punabhai Govindbhai, the tribunal had awarded the reinstatement of a daily wager with 50 per cent backwages. The Gujarat High Court observed that the passing of a vague order such as payment of 50 per cent backwages to a daily wager would create difficulties both for the workman and for the employer because a daily wager is not provided with work throughout the year. Accordingly, the court modified the award of the labour court on the basis that he had worked 76 days in a year and directed that the payment of 50 per cent backwages should be calculated on that basis.[2] When the tribunal makes an award stating that the employee in question is entitled to reinstatement with backwages, it really means that the employee should be paid wages for the period for which he has been kept out of employment and the fact that the award does not use the expression that he is 'entitled to backwages till the reinstatement' or 'with backwages till reinstatement' would not make any difference.[3] The direction of payment of backwages would normally contain the entire salary for the period to which the workman would have been emitled ifhis service had not been terminated. This would, a priori include the national and festival holidays. Hence the workman cannot make separate and independent claim for the salary for national and festival holidays particularly so because he was not asked to work on national and festival holidays.[4] In Ranchhodji Thakore, a junior clerk was dismissed from service on the basis of his conviction under s 302 read with s 34 of the IPC sentencing him to life imprisonment. But the conviction was set aside in appeal by the High Court. Thereafter, in a writ petition filed by the employee, the High Court directed the electricity board to reinstate the employee with continuity of service but without backwages. In appeal, upholding the decision of the High Court, the court observed that, 'since the petitioner had involved himself in a crime, though he was later acquitted, he had disabled himself from rendering the service on account of conviction and incarceration in jail', he was not entitled to payment of backwages.[5] In Krishnakant Bibhavnekar, the employee was charged for an offence under the Indian Penal Code and during the trial, he was kept under suspension. He was acquitted by the trial court and consequently, was reinstated in service without consequential reliefs. The Supreme Court held that in view of the relevant rules, it was in the discretion of the authority to grant him the reliefs consequent upon the reinstatement. The court observed:

> Though the legal evidence may be insufficient to bring home the guilt beyond doubt and though the prosecution may end in acquittal, the grant of consequential reliefs with all backwages cannot be as a matter of course.[6]

In Metro Tyres, the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that merely because the workman, after wrongful dismissal, had been earning his livelihood by undertaking agricultural operation in his native village, it could not be said that he was gainfully employed during the period of unemployment so as to reject his claim for backwages ordered by the labour court along with reinstatement.[7] Where the workman was dismissed for tearing of the leave application on not being granted leave, it was held that the punishment was not only shockingly disproportionate but was unconscionable, and the employer was directed to reinstate the workman and pay 25 per cent of backwages.[8] In Lokashikshana Trust, the facts disclosed that the workmen were dismissed for staging an illegal strike, after holding a disciplinary inquiry. The labour court, having recorded a finding that the strike was illegal and that the domestic inquiry held into the charges was valid, yet directed their reinstatement with full backwages on the ground that the punishment was disproportionate to the charge. The Supreme Court observed that the direction to pay full backwages in the facts and circumstances was too onerous and accordingly modified the order from full backwages to sixty per cent of backwages.[9] In Cement Corporation, the facts were that a workman inspite of notices issued by employer, failed to produce proof of age. He was retired from service on 30 June 1990 on the basis of the record available with the company. The workman raised an industrial dispute two years after his retirement and placed proof before the labour court to show that his date of birth was 2 February 1936. The labour court accepted the same and ordered backwages for the period between 20 June 1990 and 1 February 1994 and also interest thereon. Allowing the appeal, the Supreme Court modified the order of the labour court by reducing the backwages for a period of two years from 1 February 1992 to 30 January 1994 without any interest thereon.[10] The above decision of Supreme Court is open to criticism as that of the labour court. It is an admitted fact that the workman was indifferent to the several notices issued in all fairness by the corporation directing him to produce the proof of age. He did not respond as long as he was in service, but all of a sudden woke up two years after his retirement, and produced a certificate, albeit an authenticated one and claimed wages. It would have been more enlightening, had the Supreme Court reasoned out as to why an industrial employer should shell out, for no fault of his, two years' salary to a retired employee and for nothing in return from him in terms of work, production, etc. In Narsagoud, a Bench comprising Lahoti and Brajesh Kumar JJ of the Supreme Court observed:

> There is a difference between an order of reinstatement accompanied by a simple direction for continuity of service and a direction where reinstatement is accompanied by a specific direction that the employee shall be entitled to all the consequential benefits, which necessarily flow from reinstatement or accompanied by a specific direction that the employee shall be entitled to the benefit > of the increments earned during the period of absence. In our opinion, the employee after having been held guilty of unauthorised absence from duty cannot claim the benefit of increments notionally earned during the period of unauthorised absence in the absence of a specific direction in that regard and merely because he has been directed to be reinstated with the benefit of continuity in service.[11]

In Jarina Bee, a line attendant of the Electricity Board was dismissed on charge of theft. The labour court found that the departmental enquiry was not in accordance with principles of natural justice and ordered reinstatement with opportunity to Board to prove misconduct. The employee expired in the meantime. The High Court ordered the award of full back wages. Setting aside the order of the High Court as being improper and reducing the backwages to Rs. 85,000/-, Pasayat J (for himself and Raju J), of the Supreme Court held that the award of full backwages is not the natural consequence of an order of reinstatement.[12] In Nicks (India), Hegde J (for himself and Sinha J) of the Supreme Court held :

> In the instant case, we have already noticed that the basic ground on which the Labour Court reduced the back wages was based on a judgment of the High Court of Punjab and Haryana which, as further noticed by us, was overruled by a subsequent judgment of a Division Bench. Therefore, the very foundation of the conclusion of the Labour Court having been destroyed, the appellant could not derive any support from the abovecited judgments of that Court.. .. the trial court, apart from generally observing that in Ludhiana there must have been job opportunities available, on facts it did not rely upon any particular material to hold that either such job was in fact available to the respondent and he refused to accept the same or he was otherwise gainfully employed during the period he was kept out of work. On the contrary, it is for the first time before the writ court the appellant tried to produce additional evidence which was rightly not considered by the High Court because the same was not brought on record in a manner known to law. Be that as it may, in the instant case we are satisfied that the High Court was justified in coming to the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to full back wages.[13]

In Abdul Kareem, with an identical set of facts as that of Narsagoud (supra) and involving the same corporation, the Supreme Court held that, where the labour court directed reinstatement but without backwages, it is improper for the single judge and the division bench to order the payment backwages, and further observed that the principle of law on the point was no longer res integra.[14] In UP State Brassware Corporation, the Supreme Court held:

> The decision to close down the establishment by the State of Uttar Pradesh like other public sector organizations had been taken as far back on 17-11-1990 wherefor a GO had been issued. It had further been averred, which has been noticed hereinbefore, that the said GO has substantially been implemented. In this view of the matter, we are of the opinion that interest of justice would be subserved if the back wages payable to the Respondent for the period 1-4-1987 to 26-3-1993 is confined to 25% of the total back-wages payable during the said period.. .. .The judgments and orders of the Labour Court and the High Court are set aside and it is directed that the Respondent herein shall be entitled to 25% back wages of the total back-wages payable during the aforesaid period and compensation payable in terms of Section 6-N of the U.P. Industrial Disputes Act. If, however, any sum has been paid by the Appellant herein, the same shall be adjusted from the amount payable in terms of this judgment.[15]

In Rudhan Singh, the Supreme Court held:

> There is no rule of thumb that in every case where the Industrial Tribunal gives a finding that the termination of service was in violation of Section 25-F of the Act, entire back wages should be awarded. A host of factors like the manner and method of selection and appointment i.e... whether after proper advertisement of the vacancy or inviting applications from the employment exchange, nature of appointment, namely, whether ad hoc, short term, daily wage, temporary or permanent in character, any special qualification required for the job and the like should be weighed and balanced in taking a decision regarding award of back wages. One of the important factors, which has to be taken into consideration, is the length of service, which the workman had rendered with the employer. If the workman has rendered a considerable period of service and his services are wrongfully terminated, he may be awarded full or partial back wages keeping in view the fact that at his age and the qualification possessed by him he may not be in a position to get another employment. However, where the total length of service rendered by a workman is very small, the award of back wages for the complete period i.e... from the date of termination till the date of the award, which our experience shows is often quite large, would be wholly inappropriate. Another important factor, which requires to be taken into consideration is the nature of employment. A regular service of permanent character cannot be compared to short or intermittent daily-wage employment though it may be for 240 days in a calendar year.[16] ()

In Daya Shankar Rai, Sinha J (for himself and Hegde J), of the Supreme Court observed:

> We have referred to certain decisions of this Court to highlight that earlier in the event of an order of dismissal being set aside, reinstatement with full back wages was the usual result. But now with the passage of time, it has come to be realized that industry is being compelled to pay the workman for a period during which he apparently contributed little or nothing at all, for a period that was spent unproductively, while the workman is being compelled to go back to a situation which prevailed many years ago when he was dismissed. It is necessary for us to develop a pragmatic approach to problems dogging industrial relations. However, no just solution can be offered but the golden mean may be arrived at.[17]

In Mahendra Nath Tiwari, a bus conductor was dismissed for driving the bus unauthorisedly and thereby endangering public as well as property of the corporation. That apart, one passenger was found travelling without ticket, all of which constitute grave charges against the conductor who was holding a position of trust as far as the corporation is concerned. The Supreme Court, after taking all the circumstances into account, including the fact that the appeal was admitted on the limited question of back wages, observed that order of reinstatement should not be interfered at that distance of time. However, the Court had set aside the award of back wages, and held that the conductor was entitled to wages or salary only from date of his reinstatement pursuant to direction of labour Court.[18] In Sarada Prasad Misra, Thakker J (for himself and Lakshmanan J), of the Supreme Court cited, inter alia, the above decisions and held:

> .. . no precise formula can be adopted nor 'cast-iron rule' can be laid down as to when payment of full back wages should be allowed by the court or tribunal. It depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case. The approach of the court/tribunal should not be rigid or mechanical but flexible and realistic. The court or tribunal dealing with cases of industrial disputes may find force in the contention of the employee as to illegal termination of his services and may come to the conclusion that the action has been taken otherwise than in accordance with law. In such cases obviously, the workman would be entitled to reinstatement but the question regarding payment of back wages would be independent of the first question as to entitlement of reinstatement in service. While considering and determining the second question, the court or tribunal would consider all relevant circumstances referred to above and keeping in view the principles of justice, equity and good conscience, should pass an appropriate order.[19] ()

In a case where a driver was removed from service for hitting a road barrier and injuring an employee of the transport corporation, but it was not proved that the workman had caused injuries intentionally even though he drove the vehical negligently, the Supreme Court directed payment of 25% of backwages on reinstament.[20] In Swayam Prakash Srivastava, Lakshmanan J (for himself and Kabir J) of the Supreme Court held:

> We are also of the view that the award of the Labour Court is perverse as it had directed grant of back wages without giving any finding on the gainful employment of Respondent 1 and held that the discontinuance of the services of a probationer was illegal without giving any finding to the effect that the disengagement of Respondent 1 was in any manner stigmatic. In the decision in MP SEB v. Jarina Bee this Court held that payment of full back wages was not the natural consequence of setting aside an order of removal. In the instant case, though the termination was as far back as in 1983, the industrial adjudicator has not given any finding on unemployment. This Court in a recent case of State of Punjab v. Bhagwan Singh held that even if the termination order of the probationer refers to the performance being "not satisfactory", such an order cannot be said to be stigmatic and the termination would be valid.[21] ()

In Talwara CCSS Ltd, the Supreme Court observed that, while passing an award relating to back wages, it is necessary for the industrial courts to consider whether the industry is sick and whether it is in a position to bear the financial burden, and adjust the equities between the parties. Sinha J (for himself and Joseph J) of the Supreme Court held:

> Grant of a relief of reinstatement, it is trite, is not automatic. Grant of back wages is also not automatic. The Industrial Courts while exercising their power under Section 11A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 are required to strike a balance in a situation of this nature. For the said purpose, certain relevant factors, as for example, nature of service, the mode and manner of recruitment,viz., whether the appointment had been made in accordance with the statutory rules so far as a public sector undertaking is concerned etc., should be taken into consideration. For the purpose of grant of back wages, one of the relevant factors would indisputably be as to whether the workman had been able to discharge his burden that he had not been gainfully employed after termination of his service.. .. .We have noticed hereinbefore that the respondent was employed for a short period and that too in two different spells, viz., from 1987 to 1990 and from 1995 to 1997. Having regard to the fact that the respondent has not worked for a long period and the appellant does not have any capacity to pay as it is a sick unit, interest of justice would be subserved if in stead and place of an award of reinstatement with full back wages, a compensation for a sum of Rs. 2,00,000/- (Rupees two lakhs only) is directed to be paid.. . .[22]

In Mahendra Ram, the facts disclosed the services of an employee, who had worked for more than 240 days, were terminated. The labour court directed reinstatement with full back wages and continuingy of service, which was upheld by the High Court. Allowing the appeal filed by the employer in part, the Supreme Court restricted backwages to 50%.[23] The employee, after having been held guilty of unauthorized absence from duty, cannot claim the benefit of increments notionally earned during the period of unauthorized absence in the absence of a specific direction in that regard and merely because he has been directed to be reinstated with the benefit of continuity in service. The order of the labour court for re-fixing the pay duly taking into account the notional increments is not maintainable.[24] In Novartis, the facts disclosed that the company, which was a successor to Sandoz (India) Ltd., transferred three employees directing them to report at their respective places of transfer. On their refusal to report for duty at the places of transfer, the management discharged them by giving one month's notice, and without holding any enquiry. By the time the industrial tribunal passed the award, all the three of them superannuated. The tribunal, having taken this fact into consideration, ordered payment of back wages, which should be calculated on the last drawn pay. Writ petitions followed in the High Court. The High Court held that West Bengal was not the appropriate Government to make the reference. The workmen filed a special leave petition before the Supreme Court, which quashed the decision of the Division Bench and remanded the matter to it for fresh consideration. Pursuant to the said direction, the Division Bench held that there was no reason to interfere with the order passed by the tribunal and submitted the matter to the Supreme Court. On this, the Supreme Court, dealing with the original special leave petition filed by the workmen, issued notices confined only to back wages. Sinha J (for himself and Joseph J) observed that the Supreme Court was not inclined to exercise its jurisdiction under Art 142 for the purpose of directing the payment of back wages on the basis of revised scales of pay, and held that the award passed by the tribunal did not call for interference.[25]

In Metropolitan Transport, the facts briefly were: a conductor of the corporation was eventually selected internally as a Trainee Superintendent (Legal) consequent upon his acquiring a law degree. But during the training period his performance was not found satisfactory and he was reverted back to the post of Assistant. On January 31, 1995, the respondent was transferred to Poonamallee Depot but he did not join his duties there and remained absent for about three months without any prior sanction of leave or intimation. A charge-sheet was issued to him followed by a domestic inquiry. The workman did not attend the domestic inquiry despite repeated letters and notices including a notice published in local newspaper, and he was ultimately removed from service in December 1996. In a complaint filed under s 33A alleging contravention of the provisions of s 33(2)(b), the tribunal, by its order dated July 11, 2003, declared that the workman was deemed to have been in service and was entitled to all the benefits available. In a writ petition filed by the Corporation, the Madras High Court granted an interim stay of the order of tribunal, subject to the Corporation depositing the entire backwages as awarded by Industrial Tribunal and compliance of the provisions of Section 17B of the ID Act. The Corporation instead of paying last drawn wages to the respondent, reinstated him on 15 June 2004 without prejudice to the pending writ petition. The said writ petition came to be dismissed on 30 August 2006 and, thus, the order dated 11 July 2003 passed by the Industrial Tribunal attained finality. As the corporation did not pay back wages for the period from December 1996 to June 2004, the workman filed an application under s 33C(2) for computation and recovery of the same, which was allowed by the labour court, the amount being Rs. 6,54,766/-. The Corporation challenged the same in the High Court on the principal ground that he was enrolled as an advocate on 12 December 2000 and was thus gainfully employed, and hence, he was not entitled to back wages, which was dismissed at both the tiers of the High Court, thus finally reaching the Supreme Court. Allowing the appeal partially, Lodha J (for himself and Chatterjee J) of the Supreme Court held:

> It is difficult to accept the submission of the learned senior counsel for the respondent that he had no professional earnings as an advocate and except conducting his own case, the respondent did not appear in any other case. The fact that he resigned from service after 2-3 years of reinstatement and re-engaged himself in legal profession leads us to assume that he had some practice in law after he took sanad on December 12, 2000 until June 15, 2004, otherwise he would not have resigned from the settled job and resumed profession of glorious uncertainties.In this view of the matter, reasonable deduction needs to be made while determining the back wages to which respondent may be entitled. Taking overall facts and circumstances of the case and all other aspects including the aspect that he was enrolled as an advocate from December 12, 2000 to June 15, 2004, in our considered view, demand of justice would be met if the respondent is awarded back wages in the sum of Rs. 4 lacs instead of Rs. 6,54,766/-. We order accordingly.. . The appeal is, therefore, allowed to the aforesaid extent. The impugned judgments of the division bench as well as the learned single Judge stand modified accordingly. Time of eight weeks is granted to the Corporation to make payment of Rs. 4 lacs to the respondent, if not paid so far, failing which it shall carry simple interest @ 6 per cent per annum from June 15, 2004 until the date of payment.[26]

In Oberoi Flight Services, a workman was found carrying some 30 soup spoons concealed in his shoe and was caught by the security. He had himself admitted the misconduct, the management dismissed him from service without issuing any charge-sheet and without conducting any enquiry. The labour court ordered reinstatement with full back wages, which was upheld by a single judge of the High Court. The same was set aside by a division bench which ordered payment of Rs. 60,000/- as compensation in lieu of reinstatement. Allowing the appeal in part, the Supreme Court enhanced the compensation to Rs. 2,00,000/-, but without reinstatement.[27] In a dispute relating to back wages payable to a workman whose service was terminated without enquiry and without reasons coupled with the further facts, namely, (i) there was a dispute whether the workman was gainfully employed; and (ii) the employer in the meanwhile became financially unsound, the amount of back wages be curtailed to 50% from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement.[28] In Reetu Marbles, the labour court, while adjudicating a dispute relating to termination of the service of the workman, held that the termination was illegal for non-compliance with the provisions of s 25F, and accordingly directed the reinstatement of the workman. On the question of back wages, the labour court opined that, he must have worked somewhere to earn his livelihood and hence there was no justification to grant back wages, and on this view of the matter, it did not grant any back wages to the workman. In writ proceedings, the Allahabad High Court modified the award granting full back wages for the whole period, which order was challenged by the employer in the Supreme Court. Allowing the appeal, SS Nijjar J (for himself and Chatterjee J), of the Supreme Court reviewed the earlier decisions and summed up the views of the court thus:

> .. . the High Court erred in law in not examining the factual situation. The High Court merely stated that it was not the case of the employer that the workman had been gainfully employed elsewhere. Although it noticed the principle that the payment of back wages having a discretionary element involved in it, has to be dealt with in the circumstances of each case and no strait-jacket formula can be evolved, yet the award of the Labour Court was modified without any factual basis. (). .. payment of full back wages upon an order of termination being declared illegal cannot be granted mechanically. It does not automatically follow that reinstatement must be accompanied by payment of full back wages even for the period when the workman remained out of service and contributed little or nothing to the industry. (). .. It is now also well settled that despite a wide discretionary power conferred upon the Industrial Courts under Section 11-A of the 1947 Act, the relief of rein-statement with full back wages should not be granted automatically only because it would be lawful to do so. Grant of relief would depend on the fact situation obtaining in each case. It will depend upon several factors, one of which would be as to whether the recruitment was effected in terms of the statutory provisions operating in the field, if any. (). .. In our opinion the High Court was unjustified in awarding full back wages. We are also of the opinion that the Labour Court having found the termination to be illegal was unjustified in not granting any back wages at all. (). .. Keeping in view the facts and circumstances of this case we direct that the respondent shall be paid 50 per cent of the back wages from the date of termination of service till reinstatement."[29] ().

Claim for Reinstatement

(1) Claim for Back Wages on Reinstatement - Burden of Proof

The question whether it is for the workman to show that he was not employed elsewhere during the period between the termination of his service and the order of reinstatement or is it for the employer to establish that the workman was employed elsewhere, has given rise to a considerable divergence of judicial opinion. A single judge of the Allahabad High Court in Rakeshwar Dayal,[30] as an obiter said that 'a servant who sues his employer for wrongful dismissal must show that he made efforts to minimise his loss'. Following these observations, the Bombay High Court in Malik Dairy,[31] quashed the order of the labour court granting full wages and sent the case back to the labour court for rehearing on this point and gave no reasons of its own in favour of the holding. A similar view was expressed by a single judge of the Andhra High Court in SV Mills,[32] in observing that the mere order of reinstatement would not automatically entitle the workman to get the backwages for the entire period and in order to be entitled to get the backwages, the workman has to prove that he made sincere efforts to secure a job for mitigating the loss or damage and 'it is then for management to prove otherwise'. Likewise, a single judge of the Delhi High Court in Krishan ML Kapur,[33] held that the claim of backwages could not succeed merely because the termination or dismissal is set aside. The aggrieved workman would still be bound to make out a case for award of backwages by producing sufficient material which may show that during the period of his forced unemployment by the management, he had remained unemployed or partly employed or was otherwise not able to earn what his employment, if subsisting, with the management would have entitled him to. A single judge of the Madras High Court in United Bleachers, held that the allegation that the concerned workman was employed elsewhere and was earning during the period of unemployment has to be proved by the employer and it is not sufficient to take the plea in the written statement, but it has to be proved by leading evidence or cross-examining the workman before the tribunal for enabling it to assess the quantum of the backwages.[34] Similarly, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court in Kripa Shankar, held that the burden of proving that the workman was gainfully employed during the period of his unemployment was upon the employer and in the absence of any such plea or evidence in this behalf, the workman cannot be deprived of his full or partial backwages.[35] The Punjab and Haryana High Court observed that 'it is for the employer to raise this matter in the course of the inquiry and prove that the employee has been earning wages for the whole or for the part of the period in question.[36] In Postal Seals, the Allahabad High Court observed that if the normal rule is to award full backwages on reinstatement, then the burden of establishing the countervailing circumstances to neutralise the normal rule would be on the employer. It was, therefore, for the employer to prove that the workman had made some earnings during the period of his enforced idleness or that he had refused to seek or accept alternative job.[37]

The Bombay High Court in Lalit Gopal, also explained its earlier holding in Malik Dairy Farms case and held that the question whether the employee had been gainfully employed during the relevant period must ordinarily be raised not by the employee but by the employer in the proceedings before the industrial adjudicator.[38] In Sadanand Patamkar, another Division Bench held that it is only fair and proper that the employee should first state whether he was employed or not and whether any amount of income was earned by him. It is in that sense that the burden of proving the said facts lies on the employee. Once, however, the said burden is discharged, it is for the employer to prove facts to the contrary.[39] The Gujarat High Court in Dhari Gram Panchayat, held that a workman is entitled to full backwages unless the employer specifically proves that the workman was employed with some other employer and earning wages.[40] In Hindustan Tin Works, the court has specifically stated that ordinarily a workman whose services have been illegally terminated would be entitled to full backwages except to the extent that he was gainfully employed during the period of enforced idleness. Backwages would be the normal rule and the party objecting to it must establish the circumstances necessitating departure.[41] In BEST Workers Union, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that it is for the employer to allege and prove the circumstances, justifying the deviation from the normal rule of payment of backwages, such as that the workman was gainfully employed. The workman is not expected to allege and prove the negative. In view of the fact that the employer had not raised the contention either before the industrial court or in the affidavit filed before the writ court that the workman was gainfully employed at the time during the relevant period, the court confirmed the award of full backwages.[42] In Balakrishna Tindal, the same High Court further held that even if the employer makes an application to the tribunal to adduce evidence at the fag-end of the trial regarding gainful employment of the workman when he was not in service of the employer, the tribunal must give reasonable opportunity to the employer to prove his case.[43] The question of burden of proof as to who is to prove whether the workman did not get alternative employment for the period for which the backwages have been awarded to him could arise only if no evidence was given by either party or if the evidence given by them was evenly balanced but it loses its importance when the parties adduce whatever evidence they had to adduce.[44]

(2) Discharge and Disimissal - Whether Interim Relief can be Granted

The relief of reinstatement and payment of backwages or wages in lieu thereof, cannot be granted as an interim measure by the tribunal where the validity of the order of dismissal or discharge is pending adjudication before it. The final order that in such a case the tribunal can pass is either reinstatement or compensation in lieu of reinstatement and such final order would be passed if the employer failed to justify the disciplinary action taken by him before the tribunal.[45] The interim relief cannot be the whole relief that a workman would get if he succeeds finally.[46]

(3) Power to Order Reinstatement under Section 33A

Section 33A of the Act lays down that where an employer contravenes the provisions of s 33 during the pendency of proceedings before any labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, any employee aggrieved by such contravention may make a complaint in writing to any of these authorities and on receipt of such complaint the authority to whom the complaint is made, shall adjudicate upon the complaint as if it were a dispute referred to it or pending before it, in accordance with the provisions of the Act and shall submit its award to the appropriate Government and the provisions of the Act shall apply accordingly. It is thus clear that a complaint under s 33 A is equated to a reference under s 10 of the Act and the tribunal has all the powers to deal with it as it would have in dealing with a reference under s 10 of the Act. A priori, the provisions of s 11A will mutatis mutandis apply to the adjudication of such complaint. It follows, therefore, that the tribunal has the power to make such order of relief as may be appropriate in the circumstances of the case and as may be made if a dispute is referred to it relating to the dismissal or discharge of a workman. Hence, in such a complaint, it is open to the tribunal, in proper cases, to order reinstatement, as it is within its powers to order reinstatement on such complaint, if the complaint is that the employee has been dismissed or discharged in breach of s 33 of the Act.[47] In s 33A jurisdiction too, the tribunal cannot grant the interim relief of reinstatement or full backwages, in case the employer does not take the workman back in his service.[48]By making a complaint under s 33A of the Industrial Disputes Act, an employee would not succeed in obtaining an order of reinstatement by merely proving contravention of s 33 of the Act by the employer. After such contravention is proved, it would still be open to the employer to justify the impugned dismissal on merits, as the complaint is to be treated as an industrial dispute and all the relevant aspects of the said dispute are to be considered by the tribunal under s 33A of the Act.[49]An application for reinstatement in case of wrongful dismissal, can only be maintained by the person who is a 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act. The claim of a dismissed workman for reinstatement with or without compensation for the period of unemployment is not a 'question or claim respecting property' within the meaning of Art 133(1)(b). Hence, the aggrieved party cannot be entitled as a matter of right to get a certificate under Art 133(1)(b).[50]

(ii) Any Lesser Punishment

It is a fundamental principle of justice that the punishment should be commensurate with the guilt judex acquitalem semper spectat debet, a judge ought always to have equity before his eyes.[51] In Rama Kant Misra, the Supreme Court observed that it is a well-recognised principle of jurisprudence which permits the penalty to be imposed for misconduct that the penalty must be commensurate with the gravity of the offence charged.[52] For instance, in Bharat Fritz Werner, the misconduct of the workmen of indulging in acts subversive of discipline in threatening the president of the company with dire consequences, wrongfully confining him in his room and compelling him to withdraw notice were established. However, the court did not find this misconduct sufficient to warrant dismissal. Therefore, keeping in view the interests of the industry, the court held that reinstatement was not desirable and expedient. In the circumstances, the court directed compensation for loss of service in lieu of reinstatement.[53] In RM Parmar, the Gujarat High Court observed that the power under this section is a benevolent power conferred on the industrial adjudicators and has to be exercised 'in the spirit' in which the provision has been enacted in order to further the intendment and purpose of the legislation, keeping in view the following dimensions for adjudication of the question of punishment.[54] In B Maharana, it was held:

(1) There is widespread unemployment in our country and it is difficult to secure a job to earn enough to keep body and soul together unlike in developed countries.

(2) The state does not provide social benefits like unemployment allowance to enable a discharged employee to sustain himself and his family to some extent, as is being done in developed countries.

(3) In imposing punishment on an erring employee an enlightened approach informed with the demands of the situation and the philosophy and spirit of the times requires to be made. It cannot be a matter of the ipse dixit of the disciplinary authority depending on his whim or caprice.

(4) Be it administration of criminal law or the exercise of disciplinary jurisdiction in departmental proceedings, punishment is not and cannot be the 'end' in itself. Punishment for the sake of punishment cannot be the 'motto'.

(5) The length of service, based on good record and socio-economic condition of the delinquent workman are also considerations which should weigh with the tribunal while exercising its discretion.[55]

The powers under s 11A are alternative; the first is to direct reinstatement of the workman on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit and the second is to give some other relief to the workman including the award of any lesser punishment in lieu of reinstatement as the circumstances of the case may require.[56] Under the second alternative, the tribunal may give the relief of compensation to the workman, instead of directing reinstatement. In the absence of specific words requiring the application of the first limb to one category of unjustified dismissals and second limb to another category, it would not be reasonable or permissible to interpret the provisions so as to limit or restrict the application of either limb to any particular class of unjustified dismissals, if the tribunal is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal is unjustified, it may set aside that order and direct the reinstatement of the workman on terms, like with backwages or without backwages or with any part of the backwages. It may also award compensation in lieu of the reinstatement if the circumstances of the case justify such compensation or it may give any other relief to the workman including award of any lesser punishment.[57] The expression 'such other relief' does not necessarily mean payment of backwages upon the reinstatement of the workman. If the adjudicator holds that the workman should be given some kind of relief, he can award so. For instance, where after having taken all the relevant factors into consideration, the tribunal ordered reinstatement with 50 per cent backwages of workmen discharged from service on the ground of misappropriation of money, the award was held to be legal and justified because the denial of 50 per cent backwages to the workman was considered by the tribunal to be sufficient punishment for the misconduct proved against him.[58]

Likewise, where the labour court, took into account various mitigating circumstances having found the misconduct alleged against the workman to have been proved, and recorded a finding that in the totality of circumstances, the charges proved did not warrant the extreme punishment of dismissal and ordered reinstatement without backwages, the exercise of discretion by the labour court was held to be proper and judicious.[59] Similarly, where the tribunal alters the punishment of dismissal with reinstatement without backwages for the misconduct of a driver found to be blameworthy for some acts of misconduct duly proved against him, the High Court declined to interfere with the award which was just and reasonable though not exactly in conformity with law.[60] If the punishment of discharge automatically disentitles the workman to receive the terminal benefits like leave, salary, payment of gratuity etc, he can reduce the order of dismissal into one of discharge.[61] It is not necessary that the tribunal must arrive at a finding regarding unfair labour practice or victimisation. Even if no victimisation or unfair labour practice is proved, it is open to the tribunal to award lesser punishment in lieu of discharge or dismissal, if it is satisfied that the order of discharge or dismissal was not justified. For instance, where the tribunal finds that the domestic inquiry was fairly and properly conducted, the order of dismissal was out of proportion to the misconduct proved, taking into consideration the magnitude of the offence and the previous conduct of the workman, the tribunal may award lesser or minor punishment.[62]

Where the tribunal passes an order of reinstatement without backwages, it would mean penalty imposed upon the employee by way of lesser punishment. Ordinarily, reinstatement contemplates payment of backwages to the employee directed to be reinstated for all the period during which he was out of employment on account of the original order of wrongful dismissal or discharge. A direction withholding payment of backwages either fully or partly is, therefore, penal in nature.[63] 'Lesser punishment' contemplated by s 11A is not confined to the Standing Orders or any regulation of the employer. It takes in its sweep all punishments lesser than discharge or dismissal whether provided in the Standing Orders or regulations of punishment or not. The tribunals have very wide discretion in awarding punishment to the delinquent workman while dealing with a dispute relating to discharge or dismissal.[64] If on the facts and in the circumstances of a case, the tribunal finds that a lesser penalty than dismissal or discharge would be sufficient, it is incumbent upon it to convert the discharge or dismissal into lesser punishment.[65] In Bansi Purushottam, the labour court held that the misconduct alleged against the workman stood proved but the labour court still ordered the reinstatement of the workman with backwages. In the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court felt that the workman should either get the reinstatement with no backwages or just backwages without reinstatement. The court therefore modified the award of the labour court and ordered backwages and a sum of Rs. 20,000/-.[66] In HMT, while affirming the order of reinstatement of the workman, but in view of the fact that there was a 14 years time lag between the date of dismissal and the date of the order of the court, the court felt that instead of full backwages 60 per cent wages till the date of the reinstatement of the workman will meet the ends of justice.[67]

Disputes contemplated under s 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act are disputes of civil nature which would have been decided by civil courts but for the provisions with regard to compulsory adjudication contained in this section. A dispute regarding reinstatement cannot be considered to be a civil dispute as there is no right of reinstatement under the civil law which can be enforced by an employee against his employer.[68] The relief of reinstatement of the workmen even of a co-operative society has to fall within the purview of the industrial law and only tribunals can give the relief of reinstatement in industrial adjudication.[69]

(iii) Monetary Compensation in Lieu of Reinstatement

It is well-settled now that in cases of wrongful dismissal or discharge, the normal rule is to award reinstatement but where a case falls in any of the exceptions to the general rule of reinstatement, the industrial adjudicator has the discretion to award reasonable and adequate compensation in lieu of reinstatement. Section 11A vests the industrial adjudicators with discretionary jurisdiction to give 'such other relief' to the workmen in lieu of discharge or dismissal as the circumstances of the case may require, where for some valid reasons it considers that reinstatement with or without conditions will not be fair or proper. Compensation in such a case is the solarium for unjustified and premature termination of employment.[70] In Air Lanka, it was held that the tribunal has the discretion to award compensation instead of reinstatement if the situation of a particular case is unusual or exceptional so as to make reinstatement inexpedient or improper. The tribunal has to exercise its discretion judicially and decide whether the case is one of exception to the general rule of reinstatement.[71] As in case of reinstatement, so also in case of awarding compensation in lieu of reinstatement, it is necessary that the tribunal must hold that the dismissal or discharge of the concerned workman is wrongful.[72] The compensation cannot be granted on the ground of social justice.[73]

The award granting compensation in lieu of reinstatement does not infringe the provisions of Art 19(1)(g) in any way, as the tribunal, which is competent to award reinstatement, is equally competent to award compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[74] Termination of service as a punishment inflicted by way of disciplinary action has been specificially excluded from the definition of retrenchment. There is, therefore, no scope for allowing retrenchment compensation in such cases, for there is no question of retrenchment as such, where the tribunal decides not to pass an order of reinstatement but to give compensation instead.[75]Hence, compensation for wrongful dismissal cannot be quantified in accordance with the provisions of s 25F of the Act. Even in cases where the retrenchment of a workman with immediate effect is held to be unjustified, in fact and law, for want of the retrenchment notice and payment of compensation as required by s 25F and the court does not consider the order of reinstatement to be proper and expedient, the compensation payable instead of reinstatement in such a case, cannot be limited to compensation payable in the case of lawful retrenchment under s 25F and the quantum of compensation in such a case is in the discretion of the tribunal.[76] In SSShelly, the workman claimed compensation equivalent to a sum which he could have earned if he had continued in service till the age of retirement. The Supreme Court held that the compensation was not to be computed on the basis of breach of contract or tort committed by the employer in implementing the direction for reinstatement. Bhagwati J, of the Supreme Court observed:

> The industrial tribunal would have to take into account the terms and conditions of employment, the tenure of service, the possibility of termination of the employment at the instance of either party, the possibility of retrenchment by the employer or resignation or retirement by the workman and even of the employer himself ceasing to exist or of the workman being awarded various benefits including reinstatement under the terms of future awards by industrial tribunal in the event of industrial disputes arising between the parties in the future....In computing the money value of the benefit of reinstatement, the industrial tribunal would also have to take into account the present value of what his salary, benefits etc would be till he attained the age of superannuation and the value of such benefits would have to be computed as from the date when such reinstatement was ordered under the terms of the award. Having regard to the considerations detailed above, it is impossible to compute the money value of this benefit of reinstatement awarded to the appellant with mathematical exactitude and the best that any tribunal or court would do under the circumstances would be to make as correct an estimate as is possible bearing, of course in mind all the relevant factors pro and con.[77]

From the dicta of the Supreme Court, the Patna High Court in B Choudhury, deduced certain guidelines which have to be borne in mind in determining the quantum of compensation, viz:

(i) the backwages receivable;

(ii) compensation for deprivation of the job with future prospect and obtainability of alternative employment;

(iii) employee's age;

(iv) length of service in the establishment;

(v) capacity of the employer to pay and the nature of the employer's business;

(vi) gainful employment in mitigation of damages; and

(vii) circumstances leading to the disengagement and the past conduct. [78]

These factors are only illustrative and not exhaustive. In addition to the amount of compensation, it is also within the jurisdiction of the tribunal to award interest on the amount determined as compensation. Furthermore, the rate of such interest is also in the discretion of the tribunal.[1] In Assam Oil, the employee had given up previous employment for joining the company. Her services were terminated after she had been in employment for about two years. As against this, the court also took into account the countervailing facts that the employer had paid certain sums to her and her own earning in the alternative employment and ordered that 'it would be fair and just to direct the appellant to pay a substantial sum as compensation to her'. Accordingly, a sum of Rs 12,500/-, offered by the employer which represented about two years' salary of the employee, was considered to be a fair amount of compensation on payment of which the order of reinstatement passed by the tribunal was set aside.[2] In Santi Patnaik, the amount of compensation equivalent to two years' salary of the employee awarded by the industrial tribunal was reduced by the Supreme Court to an amount equivalent to one years' salary of the employee in view of the fact that she had been in service with the employer only for five months and also took into consideration the unusual manner of her appointment at the instance of the chief minister of the state. The court distinguished this case from the Assam Oil Co's case on facts.[3]

In Charottar GSM, an amount equivalent to six months' wages in the circumstances of the case was considered proper in lieu of reinstatement.[4] In PP Chopra, in the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court substituted the award of the tribunal directing reinstatement of the workman with half of his backwages till the date of reinstatement, with an order of compensation equivalent to his salary for one year.[5] However, in AK Roy, compensation equivalent to two years' salary (last drawn by the workman) was held to be fair and proper to meet the ends of justice.[6] In Brahmbhatt, the award of reinstatement was set aside and the workman was given salary up to the date of actual termination of his service. Since the termination of his service, was upheld as bona fide under the contract, the question of compensation in lieu of reinstatement did not arise.[7] In MK Chhatre, though the Supreme Court upheld the order of reinstatement made by the labour court, in view of the fact that the workman was prepared to accept payment at the rate of Rs 380 per month from the date of his suspension till the date of the award of the tribunal which worked out to Rs. 22,800/- by way of compensation in lieu of reinstatement, which the employer agreed to pay, the court awarded accordingly. The order of reinstatement made by the tribunal was converted by the Supreme Court into an order of compensation.[8]

In Johnson & Johnson, on the agreement of the parties before the Supreme Court, the award of reinstatement was converted into compensation of Rs 10,000/-.[9] In MS Dhantwal, the court quantified the compensation payable to the workman in lieu of reinstatement with full backwages to a sum of Rs 20,000/-. But while making the payment to the workman, the employer deducted Rs 2,145/- towards income-tax. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the employer was not justified in making the deduction, and directed the employer to refund the amount deducted with 15 per cent interest to the workman.[10] In ITC, having held that, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, it was not a fit case when the order of reinstatement could be sustained, the court directed that in lieu of reinstatement, the workman will get compensation of Rs 30,000/- which, roughly speaking, would include almost all sums of money payable to him such as basic pay, dearness allowance etc for a period of about five years.[11] In Anil Kumar Chakraborty, in view of the holding that the workman who held the position of trust and confidence had abused his position, the court converted the award of reinstatement into compensation of a sum of Rs 50,000/- as just and fair compensation in full satisfaction of all his claims for wrongful dismissal from service.[12]

In OP Bhandari, the Supreme Court observed that it was a fit case for granting compensation in lieu of reinstatement as it found that the apprehensions of the employer corporation as regards the negative consequences of reinstatement was not unreasonable. The court felt that compensation in lieu of reinstatement would be more appropriate relief but it felt that the claim for full salary and allowance till the date of superannuation which was more than eight years away was not reasonable and awarded compensation equivalent to 3.33 years' salary (including admissible allowances), found to be reasonable, as it would yield 50 per cent of annual salary and allowances to the employee.[13] In MK Agarwal, while affirming the order of the High Court reinstating the employee, the court restricted the back salary to 50 per cent of what would otherwise be payable to the employee.[14] In Bharat Fritz Werner, the workmen entered inside the room of the president of the company in an aggressive mood and threatened him with dire consequences if the notice given to them was not recalled. Not content with that, they confined him to his room and came very close to him making gesticulations with fisted hands. They did not go out inspite of requests and shouted that he should not go out. They stayed in the room till the president gave instructions to recall the notice. For these acts of misconduct, some of the workmen were found guilty in the domestic inquiry and were dismissed from service. The Karnataka High Court held that these acts of misconduct were not such as to deserve extreme penalty and directed that they should be taken back on duty with one-half of the backwages as such denial of backwages was sufficient punishment for the acts of misconduct committed by them. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed:

> Reinstatement has not been considered as either desirable or expedient in certain cases where there had been strained relations between the employer and the employee, when the post held by the aggrieved employee had been one of trust and confidence, or when, though dismissal or discharge was unsustainable. In the impugned order, the employee was found to have been guilty of an activity subversive or prejudicial to the interest of the industry ... In cases where it is felt that it will not be desirable or expedient to direct reinstatement, the workman is compensated monetarily by awarding compensation in lieu of reinstatement for loss of future employment.[15]

Then, the court noted that the acts of misconduct alleged against the workmen had been established. These acts were subversive of discipline on the part of the employees. In this fact situation, the court said that it is not desirable and expedient to direct reinstatement of these workmen and compensation in lieu of reinstatement may be granted. Accordingly, the court awarded Rs 1,80,000/- each towards backwages and compensation for loss of future employment in lieu of reinstatement in addition to the sum of Rs 72,000/- which had already been paid to them. In TP Srivastava, in view of the fact that the case had remained pending for 16 long years, the Supreme Court ordered that the employee may be paid three years' salary in addition to whatever had already been paid to him. However, the court made it clear that this decision will not be treated as a precedent.[16] In Yashvir Singh, the order inflicting the punishment of dismissal was attacked on the ground that the person who issued the chargesheet and ultimately inflicted the punishment was biased as it was he against whom the workman had misbehaved and to do so would be to appreciate the worth of his own evidence. Further, the mere fact that the appellate authority had confirmed the order, would not remove the taint which attached to the original order. Thus, the order of punishment was violative of the rules of natural justice. On the other side, the employer contended that under the Standing Orders of the company only that person was charged with the duty to pass order of punishment and had to do so out of sheer necessity. Hence, the order was not liable to be challenged. The court did not decide upon the rival contentions but in the circumstances of the case, with a view to put an end to the matter, it directed the payment of Rs 75,000/- in lieu of reinstatement with backwages.[17] In Naval Kishore, the tribunal held that the termination was not justified but it awarded compensation of Rs 15,000/- in lieu of reinstatement. In appeal by special leave against the award of the tribunal, the employer conceded that the workman may be reinstated. However, without recording any reason as to why the reinstatement should not be granted, the Supreme Court directed that, in view of the special circumstances of the case, a sum of Rs. 2,00,000/- be paid to the workman as and by way of compensation. The court gave the following further instructions:

> We further direct that from the amount herein directed to be paid Rs 75,000 are payable as backwages with interest for the period commencing from 1 March 1980 till today. The payment is Rs 15,000 for the period from 1 March 1980 to 31 March 1980 and Rs 15,000 for each subsequent year. As the income of the appellant is Rs 15,000 per year and as he had no other income, the > respondent is discharged from the liability of deducting income-tax as required by s 12 of the Income Tax Act 1961. The balance amount of Rs 1,10,000 (Rupees one lac and ten thousand) shall be deposited by the respondents-Management in the companies the name of which will be supplied by Mrs P Govindan Nair, learned counsel for the appellant within ten days, by way of fixed deposits at the rate of interest not less than 15 per cent per annum for a period more than three years in the joint names of the appellant and his wife. This amount of Rs 1,10,000 (Rupees one lac and ten thousand) is awarded as future compensation for loss of service at the rate of Rs 15,000 per year for the period of eight years but in order to save the respondents-management from the liability of paying the interest the payment shall be made as herein directed and spill over will be for a period of eight years. After the expiry of eight years from today, the amount shall be withdrawn and taken over by the appellant. The respondents-management is also directed to pay the costs to the appellant which is quantified at Rs 5,000.[18]

It is submitted that this decision of Desai J was based on his private sense of justice and is repugnant to all notions of law, justice, reason and fair play, and does not disclose any principle known to law. As already cited elsewhere in this book, Desai J was part of the three 'founding fathers of judicial chaos' along with Iyer and Reddy JJ. In this connection, it is considered expedient to cite the following passage from the book 'Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary':

> That there has been a conspicuous decline, in the quality of appointments to High Courts and Supreme Court, is not in doubt. There appears no mechanism worth the name for screening the candidates or for conducting proper reference checks before elevating them to High Courts. Even if it is there, appointments are being made, as the reports reveal, on extraneous considerations and in derogation of even IB reports. There are no yardsticks to determine the competency and legal acumen of the persons being considered for higher judicial positions. Mere marking attendance regularly in the High Court for 10-15 years does not by itself make an advocate fit to be elevated as a judge! As Washington Irving once said, "young lawyers attend the courts, not because they have business there, but because they have no business anywhere else!". .. Several cases have been cited in this book, which betray the absolute ignorance of even elementary legal principles, not to speak of a reasonable command or a minimum degree of philosophical penetration, on the part of several judges. To cite a few, with great respect, the decisions in Navinchandra,[19]Bharat Fritz,[20]GTTC,[21]S. Mukerjee,[22]Tansi Leather,[23]Amarnath Dey,[24] and a score of others (discussed in the preceding pages) bear eloquent testimony to the deteriorated standards of selection and/or elevation to High Courts. Even a few decisions of Supreme Court fall in this category. To illustrate, Crompton,[25]Sundaramony,[26]GST,[27]Hindustan Tin Works,[28]Maheswari,[29]Port of Bombay,[30]Santosh Gupta,[31]Govindarajulu,[32]TTD,[33]Glaxo,[34]Fakirbhai,[35]Meenakshi Mills,[36]Nedungadi,[37]Orissa Textile,[38]Punjab LDRC,[39] and several others are patently mediocre and/or perverse and/or even outrageous with far reaching consequences for the industrial community. It is common knowledge that the repercussions of poor quality selection and placement at the level of High Courts does not stop there, but extend up to the Supreme Court in the course of time. It is a wakeup call to the Chief Justice of India as well as the Governments at the Centre and in the States that a comprehensive, objective and transparent selection policy with focus on competence and integrity, duly supplemented by rigorous screening and clearance from Intelligence agencies, should be designed and put in place.[40]

In Sant Raj, the labour court, having held that that the termination of the service of the workmen was illegal for non-compliance with s 25F, declined the relief of reinstatement but it awarded one year's wages as compensation in lieu of reinstatement, as it held that 'the termination of service of the workman was bona fide and not in colourable exercise of power in accordance with the service rules'. The Supreme Court upheld the award, but modified the compensation payable, in lieu of reinstatement, to Rs. 2,00,000.[41] A similar order was made in KC Joshi,[42] where the termination of the service of the workman as assistant store keeper of the oil and Natural Gas Commission, was held to be illegal and unjustified by the Supreme Court but in the facts and circumstances of the case particularly that a period of nearly 18 years had passed, the court again awarded a sum of Rs. 2,00,000. In Chandulal,[43] the court awarded compensation of Rs 2 lakhs by way of backwages and in lieu of relief of reinstatement but no directions were given with respect to income-tax liability. In England, the Royal Commission on Trade Unions and Employers Association observed:

> while we do not favour a scale of compensation, we think it desirable for practical reasons to fix a ceiling to the amount of compensation which can be awarded. This will make it easier for employers to insure against the risk of being obliged to pay compensation which can be awarded. It would, in our view, be reasonable to provide that the maximum should be an amount equal to the employees' wages or salary for two years; and that, as in the case of compensation under the Redundancy Payments Act, in the compensation of this amount there should be wages or salary in excess of £40 a week[44]

This was carried into effect in 'The Industrial Relations Act, 1971' which provided in s 116 and 118(1) that the amount of compensation shall be such as the 'tribunal considers just and equitable in all the circumstances, having regard to the loss sustained by the aggrieved party ...' up to a maximum limit of £40,160 or two years' pay whichever is less. The Industrial Relations Act 1971 was repealed and replaced by the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 which has raised the maximum compensation payable to £5,200. Statutory provisions in regard to assessment of compensation in lieu of reinstatement vary in different countries. A survey conducted by the International Labour Office in 1974 noted that 'where compensation is awarded either in lieu of reinstatement or as the principal remedy the legislation in some cases leaves the calculation of the amount of compensation to the entire discretion of the competent body, it indicates certain factors which must be taken into account in the compensation, specifies a minimum amount of compensation or lays down a maximum amount of compensation'. However, in no case, the compensation in lieu of reinstatement extends to the balance work span of the workman. The factors which have to be taken into consideration are inter alia wages, length of service, loss of career prospects, circumstances of dismissal, age, nature of the work and custom.[45] In an illuminating review of the Indian, English and Ceylonese case-law on the relevant statutory provisions, the Supreme Court of Sri Lanka in Wijeratne, has stated the principles for awarding compensation in lieu of reinstatement in the following words:

> The labour tribunal should normally be concerned to compensate the employee for the damages he has suffered in the loss of his employment and legitimate expectation for the future in that employment, in the injury caused to his reputation in the prejudicing of further employment opportunities. Punitive considerations should not enter its assessment except perhaps in those rare cases where very serious acts of discrimination are clearly proved. Account should be taken of such circumstances as the nature of the employer's business and his capacity to pay, the employee's age, the nature of his employment, length of service, seniority, present salary, future prospects, opportunities for obtaining similar alternative employment, his past conduct, the circumstances and the manner of the dismissal including the nature of the charge leveled against the workman, the extent to which the employee's actions were blameworthy and the effect of the dismissal on future pension rights and any other relevant considerations. Account should also be taken of any sums paid or actually earned or which should also have been earned since the dismissal took place. The amount, however, should not mechanically be calculated on the basis of the salary he would have earned till he reached the age of superannuation and should seldom, if not never exceed a maximum of three years' salary.[46]

In Jagdish Chandra Sharma, it was held that the punishment of dismissal imposed for hitting a superior officer and also unauthorised absence is not disproportionate and the interference by the labour court in the punishment is unjustified and without jurisdiction.[47] In Tata Press Employees Union, the Bombay High Court peremptorily observed that once the labour court had come to the conclusion that the enquiry held by the employer was in order and that the punishment of dismissal was not disproportionate. Having held thus, the labour court proceeded to award compensation of Rs. 2 lakhs and 3 lakhs to the dismissed workmen. The said award was set aside by a single judge of Bombay High Court. The Division Bench, upholding the order of the single judge, observed:

> .. . the Labour Court has recorded a finding that considering the gravity of the misconduct proved against the workmen, punishment of dismissal cannot be said to be too harsh and disproportionate. In our opinion, once the Labour Court recorded this finding, it lost jurisdiction under Section 11-A of the Act to say anything further and to interfere with the punishment awarded. The view taken by the learned single Judge, in our opinion, is perfectly justified and therefore, the order of the learned single Judge does not require any interference."[48]

In a case where an employee was terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F, the Rajasthan High Court held that a compensation of Rs. 25000/- in lieu of reinstatement would meet the ends of justice in view of the fact that there was a lapse of 8 years and further the said employee had set up his own business.[49] Where the workman was dismissed for using filthy language against superiors and answering them insolently, the Supreme Court held that, in view of the bitter relations between the parties, it would be inappropriate to go foist a cantankerous and abrasive workman on it, and ordered payment of Rs. 10,00,000/- as compensation in lieu of reinstatement.[50]

Award Passed under S 11A - Whether amenable to Judicial Review

The discretionary power of the tribunal in upholding the punishment inflicted by the employer or interfering with it by awarding lesser punishment is amenable to judicial review by the High Courts in exercise of jurisdiction under Arts 226 and 227 or by the Supreme Court under Art 136. Under Art 227, a High Court is vested with the right of superintendence and it is indisputably entitled to scrutinise the order of a subordinate tribunal within well-accepted limitations.[51] The reviewing courts can examine whether the tribunal has properly approached the matter for exercising or refusing to exercise its power under s 11A but when the award is well-reasoned and the tribunal has stated the various considerations for inflicting the lesser punishment, the award cannot be said to be illegal and void.[52] In Baldev Singh, for instance, the tribunal found that the inquiry was held fairly and properly and there was no violation of the rules of natural justice but in view of the fact that the punishment was too harsh considering the nature of the charge, it directed reinstatement of the workman with continuity of service but without backwages and further directed that the period of absence from service is to be treated as leave of the kind due and in case no leave is due, as leave without pay. The Supreme Court held that the award of the tribunal was in conformity with the provisions of s 11A and there was no want of jurisdiction in making the order in question. The order was not contrary to the provisions of s 11A which vests the adjudicator, to whom the dispute has been referred, with jurisdiction to pass an appropriate order which he may think proper and expedient on the facts and in the circumstances of the case.[53] Likewise, in Scooter India, the Supreme Court held that the direction of the labour court on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, for reinstatement of the employee with 75 per cent backwages on the ground that the delinquent workman should be given an opportunity to reform himself and prove to be loyal and disciplined employee, was not illegal and arbitrary even though the disciplinary inquiry was fair and lawful.[54]

In Balwant Singh, the labour court converted the order of dismissal into one of discharge and awarded compensation to the workman in lieu of reinstatement.[55] A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that such award was not permissible under s 11A. Similarly in AA Fernandes, the workman was dismissed from service for an oral altercation between him and his superior officers. The labour court directed reinstatement without backwages and in cross appeals by the workman and the employer, the industrial court restored the order of dismissal. The Bombay High Court held that the misconduct in question even if it is read with the past conduct of the workman could not be considered to be a major one. Since the misconduct was of a minor nature, the punishment of dismissal was not justified and the maximum punishment it could merit was suspension for a few days or fine or stopping of increment etc. However, since the employee had already attained the age of superannuation, the court granted a declaration that the employee be deemed to have been continued in service till he attained the age of superannuation and he would be entitled to all retirement benefits on that basis.[56] In BV Rao, on the facts of the case, the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the order of the labour court holding the dismissal to be wrong and ordering reinstatement without backwages, could not be interfered with because it could not be said that there was no evidence to support the finding. Nor could it be said that the finding was perverse.[57]

In exercising discretion to award the lesser punishment, the tribunal has to consider the seriousness and gravity of the charge committed by the delinquent workman. The Madras High Court, held that the seriousness of the charges will not be mitigated with reference to the motive with which the workman behaved. Nor is the length of service of the workman relevant in imposition of punishment to prove misconduct because length of service cannot give license to a workman to commit misconduct. Likewise, the consideration whether the workman is married or not cannot be relevant in the matter of leniency of punishment which only depends upon the nature of the misconduct. Similarly, any undertaking by the workman not to commit misconduct in future or the fact that he had no motive to commit the misconduct or cause loss to the employer, cannot mitigate the seriousness of the charge. The question of punishment, therefore, has to be considered with reference to the gravity of the charges levelled against the workman and not de hors them.[58] Where the tribunal, having set aside the order of dismissal, directs reinstatement of the workman without backwages but with continuity of service, such an order of the tribunal would not be reviewable.[59]

The discretion should not be exercised in an arbitrary manner but it should be exercised in a judicious manner. The tribunal, therefore before interfering with the punishment imposed by the management, must take into consideration all the relevant facts and circumstances and should interfere with the punishment imposed by the management only when it comes to the conclusion that the punishment imposed is extremely harsh and unjust and wholly disproportionate to the misconduct proved. The altered punishment imposed by the tribunal, however, should not amount to absolving the employee of the misconduct or make the punishment illusory or allow the employee to go scot-free, particularly when the charges are found to be grave in nature.[60] On the facts and circumstances of the case, in Rama Kant Misra, the Supreme Court quashed the award of the labour court which had upheld the validity of the dismissal of the workman for the misconduct of using abusive and threatening language against a superior officer, as it felt that the punishment on the facts and in the circumstances of the case was too severe for the act of misconduct and substituted the punishment with 'withholding of two increments with future effect' which it felt would be more than adequate for a low paid employee.[61] In Mohd Usman, the Supreme Court upheld the award of the labour court reducing the punishment by setting aside the order of termination of service and substituted it with the punishment of stoppage of increments for two years. The court observed:

> Section 11A confers power on the labour court to evaluate the severity of misconduct and to assess whether the punishment imposed by the employer is commensurate with the gravity of misconduct. The power is specifically conferred on the labour court under s 11A. If the labour court after evaluating the gravity of misconduct held that punishment of termination of service is disproportionately heavy in relation to misconduct and exercised its discretion, this court, in the absence of any important legal principles, would not undertake to re-examine the question of adequacy or inadequacy of material for interference by labour court.[62]

In Jaswant Singh, while affirming the award of the labour court ordering reinstatement of the workman, the court imposed the punishment of stopping three increments in the time scale in which he would be reinstated for the next three years with a view to keep the workman within the bounds of well-disciplined conduct so that the humanistic approach of the court may not induce him to repeat his intemperate performance.[63] In Vasanti Shah, the Gujarat High Court held that the labour court had erred in upholding the extreme penalty of dismissal of the employees concerned as it had failed to consider the question as to whether in the background of the circumstances that transpired and the mass hysteria suffered by the workmen, the misconduct was so grave as to justify the extreme penalty of dismissal.[64] In Bhimsen Maharana, the Orissa High Court upheld the award of the labour Court setting aside the order of discharge of the workman found guilty of misappropriation taking into account his otherwise long unblemished record and ordering his reinstatement with 50 per cent of the backwages.[65] On the other hand, in EV Raju, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court after setting aside of the award of the labour court ordering reinstatement of the workman with half backwages, in view of the fact that the order of dismissal would seriously prejudice the future career of the workman who was in his middle age, ordered an ad hoc payment of Rs 25,000 as a lump sum compensation to enable him to rehabilitate himself by seeking suitable employment elsewhere.[66]

A single judge of the Bombay High Court in Unnikrishnan, upheld the award of the tribunal awarding 65 per cent of the wages up to the date of award in lieu of reinstatement as it had found that though the dismissal was not based on a proper and fair inquiry, the workman was guilty of gross negligence resulting in serious monetary losses to the employer, and therefore, the dismissal was justified.[67] In Sayar, the Management of the Mills was taken over by NTC under the provisions of the Industries (Development and Regulation) Act 1951 and an 'authorised controller' was appointed. The 'authorised controller' dismissed the delinquent workman for an act of misconduct. The reference relating to the dispute regarding dismissal of the workman was discharged by the labour court on the ground that no relief could be claimed against the owner of the mills. In a writ petition against the order of the labour court, the High Court held that the dispute had to be continued against the NTC Ltd. The High Court further held that the proceedings before the labour court were contested only on one ground, viz, against whom the award would be made and itself granted reinstatement of the workman with full backwages from the date of his dismissal. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the High Court was in error to hold that the workman was entitled to reinstatement with full backwages without there being any adjudication of the dispute. The court, therefore, set aside the order of the labour court and remanded the matter to the labour court for adjudication of the dispute raised by the workman and with direction to dispose it of in accordance with the law expeditiously.[68]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 12. Duties of Conciliation Officers.—

(1) Where any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, the conciliation officer may, or where the dispute relates to a public utility service and a notice under section 22 has been given, shall, hold conciliation proceedings in the prescribed manner.

(2) The conciliation officer shall, for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of the dispute without delay investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof and may do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to fair and amicable settlement of the dispute.

(3) If a settlement of the dispute or of any of the matters in dispute is arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings the conciliation officer shall send a report thereof to the appropriate Government [69][or an officer authorised in this behalf by the appropriate Government] together with a memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.

(4) If no such settlement is arrived at, the conciliation officer shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation, send to the appropriate Government a full report setting forth the steps taken by him for ascertaining the facts and circumstances, relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof, together with a full statement of such facts and circumstances, and the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, a settlement could not be arrived at.

(5) If, on a consideration of the report referred to in sub-section (4), the appropriate Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference to a Board, [70][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal], it may make such reference. Where the appropriate Government does not make such a reference it shall record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor.

(6) A report under this section shall be submitted within fourteen days of the commencement of the conciliation proceedings or within such shorter period as may be fixed by the appropriate Government:

> [71][Provided that, [72][subject to the approval of the conciliation officer,] the time for the submission of the report may be extended by such period as may be agreed upon in writing by all the parties to the dispute.]

LEGISLATION

This section was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947. The subsequent amendments have been indicated in the foot-notes to the body of the section. No doubt, sub-ss (1) to (4) and sub-s (6) deal with the duties of conciliation officers, but sub-s (5) does not at all refer to the duties of the conciliation officers. Instead it deals with the discretionary power of the appropriate Government to make or to refuse to make an order of reference. This sub-section further deals with the duty cast on the Government to record and communicate its reasons in case it refuses to make a reference. The proviso to sub-s (6) again does not refer to the duties of the conciliation officers but deals with the appropriate Government's power to extend the time for submission of the report of conciliation proceedings.

SUB-SECTION (1):

(i) Holding Conciliation Proceedings

Sub-section (1) requires a conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings in the prescribed manner where an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, and it makes a clear distinction between disputes relating to non-public utility services and public utility services; in case of non-public utility service concerns, discretion is vested in the conciliation officer whether or not to hold conciliation proceedings, whereas in disputes relating to public utility service concerns, conciliation is mandatory.[73] The Bombay High Court in East Asiatic, took the view that since the law confers discretion upon the conciliation officer whether he should enter upon conciliation or not, he should satisfy himself by all means available to him about the propriety of undertaking conciliation and, in doing so, if the conciliation officer embarks upon a preliminary inquiry, in the course of which he holds discussions with the representatives of the parties and even conveys proposals made by one of the parties to the other, such steps cannot be regarded as a part of conciliation proceedings.[74] In Suresh Vithoo Nare, it was held that mere issuance of a notice by a conciliation officer showing his intention that he may institute conciliation proceedings would not amount to institution of proceedings.[75] The Orissa High Court in Pratap Chandra Mohanty, expressed the view that the conciliation officer explores the possibility of a settlement by asking the parties for joint deliberations and such exploration is a preliminary inquiry to the actual conciliation proceedings.[76] This is not the correct view of law. Rule 10 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, lays down that where the conciliation officer receives information about an existing or apprehended 'industrial dispute', which does not relate to a public utility service and he considers it necessary to intervene in the dispute, he shall give formal intimation in writing to the parties concerned declaring his intention to commence conciliation proceedings with effect from such a date as may be specified therein. Section 2(e) defines 'conciliation proceedings' to mean 'any proceedings held by a conciliation officer...under this Act'. There is no provision either in the Act or in the Rules providing for holding any preliminary inquiry to enter upon the conciliation proceedings. If the parties attend 'any proceedings' held by a conciliation officer, in compliance with the notice served by him, such proceedings must necessarily be 'conciliation proceedings'. The concept of a preliminary inquiry into conciliation proceedings' is foreign to the statute.

A single judge of the Orissa High Court held that the conciliation officer can and should start conciliation proceedings as soon as he gets any information from any source about the existence or apprehension of an industrial dispute. There is nothing in the Act to show that the conciliation proceedings can be initiated by the conciliation officer only when he is formally moved by any of the parties. He has the jurisdiction to initiate conciliation proceedings as soon as he finds on some material or information before him that an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended.[77] Under this sub-section, either upon receiving a complaint from one of the parties or suo motu, where any industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, a conciliation officer may commence conciliation proceedings in a non-public utility service. In the course of a conciliation proceeding, the conciliation officer has to get the employer and the representative of the workmen together and investigate the dispute and for that purpose do all such things, as he thinks fit, with a view to induce the parties to arrive at a fair settlement of the dispute.[78]He has to act without delay. For this purpose, he is empowered to enforce attendance of any person for examining him and also to inspect any document which he deems necessary to inspect. The jurisdiction of the conciliation officer does not extend only to resolution of the disputes which are brought before him by the parties, but at least in certain cases it is possible that a dispute is raised about something and the final settlement requires solution of other disputes as well. For instance, the workmen may demand wage increase and go on strike and during the strike the management may take disciplinary action against some of the activists for intimidation of loyal workers, the dispute may ultimately be resolved only if the management agrees at the conciliation talks to drop the disciplinary proceedings. In such a situation, the conciliation officer would not be incompetent to counter-sign the final settlement embodying the withdrawal of the disciplinary proceedings. There is no manner prescribed for raising an industrial dispute and bringing it into existence. Fresh disputes are apt to arise during the conciliation proceedings of another dispute. A conciliation officer, therefore, is certainly competent to deal with all disputes brought to his notice whether existing at the commencement of the conciliation proceedings or cropping up during the pendency of such proceedings.[79] It is his duty to see that a settlement which, in his opinion, is a right settlement is amicably arrived at between the parties. After such a settlement is arrived at, he has to make a report to the Government accordingly and also forward along with it a memorandum of the settlement duly signed by the parties, ie, the representatives of the workmen and the representatives of the employer.[80]

The functions of conciliation officers are only conciliatory and not adjudicatory. The main task of the conciliation officer is to go from one camp to another and find out the greatest common measure of agreement, which certainly cannot be achieved, if the nature of his duties were judicial.[81] 'Even though a conciliation officer is not competent to adjudicate upon the disputes between the management and its workmen, he is expected to assist them to arrive at a fair and just settlement. He is to play the role of an adviser and a friend of both the parties and should see that neither party takes undue advantage of the situation'.[82] Form H of the Central Rules shows that the conciliation officer has also to sign the memorandum of settlement, evidencing that the settlement has been reached in the course of conciliation proceedings. It is, however, not the duty of the conciliation officer that he must investigate into the dispute even when the persons who raised the dispute are not present to substantiate as to what the dispute is. If the parties raising the dispute are not interested to get a settlement, it is not the duty of the conciliation officer to try to resolve the dispute in the absence of the persons raising the dispute. It is the duty of the persons raising the dispute to assist the conciliation officer regarding facts of the dispute and how the same can be possibly resolved. Rule 9 of the Central Rules envisages that the conciliation officer on receipt of the notice of strike shall forthwith arrange to interview both the employer and the workmen concerned at a given place and time as he may deem fit. If on calling the workmen who raised the dispute, the conciliation officer finds that the concerned workmen have failed to appear, there is no duty cast upon him to go ahead with the matter.[83] A union which is not the bargaining agent, cannot be allowed to join the pending conciliation proceedings. In Indian Aluminum Co, in a tripartite settlement for holding referendum for determination of 'bargaining agent' for workers, it was agreed that a union securing less than 20 per cent votes in the referendum, shall not be entitled to be a bargaining agent. In view of this settlement, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the union which has not secured 20 per cent votes in the referendum, had no right to represent the workmen in the conciliation proceedings. The union, therefore, could not be a party to the dispute in respect of which conciliation proceedings were pending.[84]

(ii) Industrial Dispute Exists or is Apprehended

Before a conciliation officer can embark upon conciliation proceedings, there must be:

(a) an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 2(k) of the Industrial Disputes Act; and

(b) such dispute must be either existing or apprehended.

The conciliation officer can take up the matter for conciliation not only when there is an 'existing' dispute but also when such dispute is 'apprehended'.[85]But the 'existing' or 'apprehended' dispute must be an -industrial dispute as defined in s 2(k) of the Industrial Disputes Act. A dispute which is not between the employers and employers, employers and workmen, or workmen and workmen, will not be an industrial dispute. Furthermore, a dispute even between such parties will not be an industrial dispute unless it is connected with the employment, non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour of any person. Any conciliation proceedings in a dispute which is not a dispute or difference connected with the employment or non-employment, terms of employment or conditions of labour of any person will not be conciliation proceedings for the purposes of this section.[86] An industrial dispute can come into existence when one party has made a demand on the other and the other party has rejected the same. Even the employer can approach a conciliation officer if there is a disagreement between the management and the workman on certain vital matters. But mere placement of charter of demands on the management does not create an apprehended or existing industrial dispute. A demand partakes the character of an 'industrial dispute' when it is rejected by the management either directly or before the conciliation officer. In exercise of his jurisdiction under s 12(1) to initiate 'conciliation proceedings', the conciliation officer has not been conferred by s 11 (1) the power to follow such procedure as he may think fit. He has, therefore, to confine himself to the procedure indicated by s 12 or prescribed by the relevant Rules.[87]

(iii) Conciliation Proceedings in Non-public Utility Service

The use of the word 'may' in s 12(1) referring to 'industrial dispute' in non-public utility service concerns makes it abundantly clear that the legislature has invested the conciliation officer with the discretion whether to enter upon conciliation in regard to such disputes or not. Such discretion cannot, however, be exercised in an arbitrary or capricious manner. In a case where any existing or apprehended industrial dispute relates to a public utility service is there, it is mandatory for the conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings where notice under s 22 has been given.[88] Where the conciliation officer refused to initiate conciliation proceedings on the ground that there was no industrial dispute existing or apprehended, he cannot be compelled to hold such proceedings as the Act confers a discretion on the conciliation officer to decide whether to hold such proceedings or not.[89]

(iv) Conciliation Proceedings in Public Utility Service

It is incumbent upon a conciliation officer to enter upon conciliation proceedings if:

(a) the concern to which the dispute relates is a public utility service within the meanings of s 2(n) ; and

(b) a notice under s 22 of the Act has been given.

From the text of the section, it appears that both these conditions are cumulative for making it compulsory for the conciliation officer to hold proceedings. But if the notice under s 22 is not given, it is in the discretion of the conciliation officer to initiate conciliation proceedings. In Jaslok Hospital, the industrial tribunal held that the conciliation proceedings are mandatory only when the dispute relates to a public utility service and notice under s 22 has been given. In other words, s 12(1) requires that, before holding the conciliation proceedings, both the conditions must be satisfied. But a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that this view was not correct as 'though the expression 'and' is used after the words 'where the dispute relates to a public utility service', the said expression must be read as 'or'.[90] But this holding is not supported by any reasoning. It is not correct law. From the language of s 12(1), s 22 and r 9 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, it is unequivocally clear that the holding of the conciliation proceedings in a public utility service is mandatory only where a notice under s 22 has been given. Otherwise, it is discretionary.

'In the Prescribed Manner':

The Central and state Government have made Rules prescribing the procedure for conciliation proceedings. Rules 9 to 12 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 are the relevant Rules prescribing the procedure for conciliation proceedings under the Act with respect to the industries in relation to which the Central Government is the 'appropriate Government'.

(v) Functions of Conciliation Officer not Judicial or Quasi-judicial

A conciliation officer is not an adjudicatory authority under the Act,[91] nor is he a 'court' within the meaning of s 195(1)(c) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[92] He is not invested with the powers to adjudicate on industrial disputes.[93] No doubt there are opposing parties and various points at issue between them before him, but the conciliation officer is not competent to hear and decide any of them; all that he can do is to try to persuade the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement.[94] Although a conciliation officer has wide powers to exercise his resourcefulness and power of persuasion to try to induce and persuade the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement, he is not competent to decide the various points in issue between the opposing parties.[95] In other words, his duties are only administrative,[96] and are purely incidental to industrial adjudication.[97] His function under s 12 advisedly is not of judicial or quasi-judicial nature, for if it were so, then in connection with everything he does, the formalities of a judicial trial would have to be observed.[1] Unless, therefore, a conciliation officer has committed some error of law in refusing to take up a dispute for conciliation, his action cannot be interfered with in writ proceedings. Thus, where the conciliation officer, after satisfying himself that the action of the management in regard to promotions was bona fide, refused to take up the dispute for conciliation, his order could not be interfered with by the High Court in writ proceedings.[2]

SUB-SECTION (2): EXPEDITIOUS INVESTIGATION OF DISPUTES

Sub-section (2) casts a duty on a conciliation officer to investigate disputes expeditiously and empowers him to do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to arrive at a fair and amicable settlement.[3] The first part of the sub-section is mandatory on its construction while the second part is merely directory. The first part requires the conciliation officer, for the purpose of bringing about settlement of the dispute, to investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof, without delay while the second part gives the discretion to him to do all such things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute.[4] He is required to do all necessary things as he thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute. If a settlement of the dispute or any of the matters in dispute is arrived at in accordance with the conciliation proceedings, the conciliation officer shall send a report thereof to the appropriate Government or an officer authorised in that behalf by the appropriate Government together with a Memorandum of Settlement signed by the parties. In the words of Venkatramiah J:

> Even though a conciliation officer is incompetent to adjudicate upon the dispute between the management and its workmen, he is expected to assist them to arrive at a fair and just settlement. He is to play the role of an adviser and friend of both the parties and should see that neither party takes undue advantage of the situation'.[5]

The Act does not provide any machinery to verify the membership of association. Therefore, the correct way of calculating membership is by check-off and by form E returns given by the members under the Trade Unions Act. For this purpose, the conciliation officer can call for records under check-off system and find out the majority union on the basis of form E returns filed by each of the union but the expression 'may do all such things as he thinks fit' cannot be given wide interpretation as to include power to verify physically the membership of the association to find out which of the unions operating in a particular establishment has got the majority character.[6] It is, therefore, the duty of the conciliation officer to satisfy himself that amicable settlement reached between the parties is a fair settlement.[7] The main task of the conciliation officer, therefore, is to go from one camp to the other and find out the greatest common measure of agreement.[8]A conciliation officer has to do a variety of things in the course of investigation for the conclusion of conciliation proceedings. His first duty for the purpose of bringing about a settlement is to act expeditiously without loss of time. When the conciliation officer decides to act, he has to find out what the dispute between the parties is. This has to be done by ascertaining from the parties to the dispute what their contentions are. The next function, that he has to discharge, is to further ascertain the merits and the right to settlement. The last important duty that he has to discharge is that of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute.[9]In effecting a settlement, the conciliation officer has always to take into account the conflicting claims between the employer on the one hand and the employees on the other and the view of the different groups of workers as well as all those relevant factors which would lead to the well-being of the industry, and a satisfactory settlement of the disputes. This necessarily means that adequate consideration must be given to the demands and viewpoints of the majority of workers. The scheme of the Act is that it reposes confidence in the conciliation officer in these matters.[10] But where a union is not a party to a dispute, the conciliation officer is not obliged to persuade such a union to participate in the proceedings or to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute raised by the other unions against the management.[11]

The mere presence of a minister of the Government in the conciliation proceedings does not vitiate such proceedings in which the conciliation officer does not abdicate his functions and duties as such officer, but takes such active part as is required under this provision by way of investigation of the dispute, examination of all matters involving right settlement of the dispute, and doing all such things as he may think fit for inducing the parties to come to a fair settlement thereof. In such a case, even absence of the conciliation officer from some meetings in relation to the demands in question, would not alter the character of conciliation proceedings.[12] The power of the conciliation officer is, however, only to promote the settlement. His power is not adjudicatory. He is not competent to decide finally the various points at issue between the opposing parties. All that he can do is to try to persuade the parties to agree upon a fair and reasonable settlement. Thus a special responsibility is placed on the conciliation officer to see that the settlement arrived at is fair and reasonable and he has to satisfy himself that it is so and then give his concurrence accordingly. The reason is that a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings has a far-reaching binding effect than a settlement arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings.[13]

SUB-SECTION (3): SETTLEMENT IN THE COURSE OF CONCILIATION PROCEEDINGS

Sub-section (3) makes it obligatory upon the conciliation officer to send a report to the 'appropriate Government', in case a settlement of industrial dispute is arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings before him, together with a memorandum of settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.[14] Such reports must be accompanied by a memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute. Rule 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 deals with the requirements of a memorandum of settlement. Sub-rule (1) prescribes that the memorandum of settlement shall be in form H, whereas sub-r (2) prescribes the mode and manner of signing the settlement and sub-r (3) enjoins upon the conciliation officer to send to the Central Government, the report of the settlement, together with a copy of the memorandum of settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.[15] The Punjab and Haryana High Court in Punjab Kesri held that a settlement which complies with all the ingredients of form H even though not formally written on form H, is a valid settlement in the eyes of law. This provision requires that, though a copy of the memorandum of settlement is to be sent to the Government, the said copy is to be duly signed by the parties to the dispute.[16] The Madras High Court in Natarajan Engg, had to deal with the question as to whether the signatures on the memorandum on true construction of s 12, should be only of the parties to the dispute. A corollary to this was whether r 25(2) of the Madras Rules which corresponds with r 58 of the Central Rules was ultra vires s 12 ? But the court left this question undecided because the case was decided against the employer on the ground of estoppel in view of his conduct in having altered the position and rights of the parties.[17] A single judge of the Delhi High Court in Krishna Gold, held that though a duty is cast on the conciliation officer to send the report to the 'appropriate Government' or authorised officer together with the signed memorandum of settlement, failure to perform this duty to dispatch the signed copy of the report cannot invalidate the settlement.[18]

The word 'report' must derive its meaning from the context in which it is used. When there is a settlement, a detailed report may not be necessary since the dispute in the ordinary course is amicably settled. Even the absence of a report under this section would not vitiate the settlement.[19] An agreement entered into between a majority union and the management can be validly certified and converted into a conciliation settlement by the conciliation officer provided it is fair and reasonable. It is, however, the duty of the conciliation officer to ascertain that the union which has entered into an agreement is a majority union and commands support of the majority of the workers in the establishment and that the agreement is fair and reasonable, when such an agreement is presented before him in the prescribed form. On such satisfaction, the conciliation officer is bound to certify that the agreement is a conciliation settlement so as to be binding on the parties to the dispute and also the persons who were not party to the dispute.[20] There is nothing in the Act which makes it obligatory on a conciliation officer to issue notice to any party before a settlement is signed under s 12(3) of the Act between the management and the workman. Nor is the conciliation officer obliged to hear the union which raised the dispute before certifying the settlement reached between the management and the recognised union. The fact that the conciliation officer has sent a failure report to the Government because of the stand taken by the employer that he is negotiating with the recognised union for settlement, would not bar a settlement being entered into between the management and the recognised union with the assistance of another conciliation officer.[21] Such a settlement cannot be said to be vitiated.

There is no provision either in the Act or under the Rules framed under the Act obliging a conciliation officer to counter-sign only those settlements where the consenting union officials represent a majority. Any settlement made with a minority union will bind all the workmen of the establishment when it is counter-signed by the conciliation officer, unless it is established that the dispute related to some special section of workmen with a special kind of demand and that the consenting parties were in no way representatives of such workmen. It is only a collusive settlement designed to defeat certain kinds of claims entered into by those who could not speak for even a small section of the workmen interested, could be an exception to the rule.[22] A settlement once arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings cannot subsequently be nullified by any party to it unilaterally. In Tiruchirapalli HCBE Union, the facts were: certain settlements were arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings in connection with wage structure of the employees in co-operative societies. In the settlement, the co-operative societies were represented by their office-bearers of the elected bodies who were in charge of the management of the societies. Subsequently, in place of the elected bodies, special officers were appointed. Thereupon, the registrar of the co-operative societies issued a circular purporting to nullify the settlement and directed the special officers to ignore the settlement. The Madras High Court in writ proceedings held that the circular of the registrar of co-operative societies is incompetent and without jurisdiction.[23] In Steel Authority of India, the facts disclosed that a settlement was arrived at under s 12(3) between the management and the union. Clause 8.9.4 of the settlement provided that "in case of death due to accident arising out of and in course of employment, employment to one of his/her direct dependents will be provided." It was contended that the death of an employee arose out of and in the course of employment, whereas the post-mortem report did not disclose that it was a natural death. The dependents of the deceased employee claimed appointment on compassionate grounds in terms of the aforesaid settlement. A writ petition filed by them was dismissed by a single judge of the Jharkhand High Court, but allowed by the Division Bench. Quashing the order of the Division Bench, Sinha J (for self and Joseph J) of the Supreme Court observed:

> Public employment is considered to be a wealth. It in terms of the constitutional scheme cannot be given on descent. When such an exception has been carved out by this Court, the same must be strictly complied with. Appointment on compassionate ground is given only for meeting the immediate hardship which is faced by the family by reason of the death of the bread earner. When an appointment is made on compassionate ground, it should be kept confined only to the purpose it seeks to achieve, the idea being not to provide for endless compassion.. .. It was, thus, not held that the death occurred due to an accident. It was not even the case of respondent. What would constitute 'an accident arising out of and in the course of employment' has not been defined. Evidently, the said phraseology has been borrowed from the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.[24]

On the issue of compassionate appointments, Sinha J (for self and Bedi J) cited the earlier decision of the Court in Umesh Kumar Nagpal,[25] and observed:

> .. . compassionate employment cannot be granted after a lapse of a reasonable period which must be specified in the rules. The consideration for such employment is not a vested right which can be exercised at any time in future. The object being to enable the family to get over the financial crisis which it faces at the time of the death of the sole breadwinner, the compassionate employment cannot be claimed and offered whatever the lapse of time and after the crisis is over. What should be a reasonable period would depend upon the rules operating in the field. (para 19). .. For the reasons aforementioned, the impugned judgment cannot be sustained which is set aside accordingly. The appeal is allowed. Respondent is hereby directed to offer appointment to the appellant on a suitable post within eight weeks from date.[26] (para 20).

In Karnataka Power Corporation, respondent was working in the corporation as a nominal muster roll workman with the appellant-corporation. On 29 January 1979 a settlement was arrived at under s 12(3) between the corporation and the union, clause 4 of which read thus:

> Casual Labour - Casual workmen who have worked for a period of not less than 240 days during a period of 12 calendar months are agreed to be brought on monthly establishment from the first of the following month effective from 1-10-1978, subject to availability of vacancies. The surplus workmen, if any, will be kept on the waiting list and appointed as and when vacancies occur. In the case of workmen who are not provided with work during monsoon period, the number of days worked in two consecutive seasons will be counted to determine their eligibility.

The facts disclosed that the respondent did not report for duty from February 1979, but sent a few letters on and off seeking employment as a mason. After a lapse of some 18 years, he filed a writ petition seeking directions to the corporation to absorb him for regular service. Both the single judge and Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court ordered in favour of the respondent-workman. Quashing the orders of the High Court, Pasayat J (for self and Chatterjee J) of the Supreme Court relied on several decisions of the court including KV Raja Lakshmiah,[27] RN Bose,[28] and P Samantaray,[29] and held that: (i) representations would not be adequate explanation to take care of delay, and if the Government had turned down one representation, the making of another representation on similar lines would not explain the delay; (ii) no relief could be given to the petitioner who without any reasonable explanation approaches the Court under Article 32 after inordinate delay, and that it could not be the intention of the Constitution makers that the Supreme Court should disregard all principles and grant relief in petitions filed after inordinate delay. Most importantly, the learned judge further observed that the question, whether the relevant clause in the settlement can be applied for providing appointment to the respondent, could not be adjudicated in a writ petition.[30]

SUB-SECTION (4): REPORTING FAILURE OF CONCILIATION PROCEEDINGS

'Failure Report'- Sub-section (4) requires the conciliation officer, as soon as practicable, to submit the 'failure report' to the appropriate Government, in case the conciliation proceedings do not end in a settlement. This requirement is mandatory, where the conciliation proceedings have taken place. But, when the conciliation proceedings have not taken place, the question of sending the failure report would not arise.[31] The scope of the report contemplated by this section is different from that of the report of the settlement under sub-s (3). The report under this section should set forth:

(i) the steps taken by the conciliation officer for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute;

(ii) the steps taken by the conciliation officer to bring about a settlement of the dispute;

(iii) a full statement of the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and steps taken by the conciliation officer to bring about its settlement; and

(iv) the reason on account of which a settlement could not be arrived at.

The word 'full report' must derive its meaning from the context in which it is used. The section requires a 'full report' when there is no settlement.[32] The failure report under s 12(4) is a very important document. It is one of the most important materials to be considered by the appropriate Government for considering the questions, whether there is a case for reference and whether it is expedient to make a reference or not. The object requiring the conciliation officer to make such a full and detailed report of all the relevant facts and circumstances including the reasons for failure of conciliation is to enable the Government to be in possession of all facts for deciding as to what course it should adopt under s 12(5) in making or refusing to make a reference.[33] In case of failure of the conciliation proceedings, the conciliation officer is required to submit the failure report 'as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation', stating therein the steps taken by him for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof together with full statement of such facts and circumstances and the reasons on account of which, in his opinion, the settlement could be arrived at. Though this sub-section does not provide any specific period of time for submission of the failure report, sub-s (6) provides that the report under s 12 shall be submitted by the conciliation officer within 14 days of the commencement of the conciliation proceedings and within such further period as may be fixed by the appropriate Government. The proviso to the section, however, provides that this period may be extended by agreement of all the parties to the dispute in writing and the approval of the conciliation officer. A single judge of the AP High Court in Praga Tools, held that even after having reported failure under this provision, a conciliation officer does not become functus officio and can hold conciliation proceedings again notwithstanding the submission of failure report. The court observed:

> .. . if, after submission of the report to the government, the parties approach him or if he feels that the parties are in a mood to relent or reconcile, it would be perfectly open to him to initiate fresh conciliation proceedings for bringing about a settlement of the dispute between the parties'.. .. this court's attention had not been invited to any provision in the Act or to any decision on the point. In case of failure of conciliation proceedings, such proceedings, according to s 20(2), are deemed to have been concluded on the day when the failure report is received by the appropriate government.. .. after the conclusion of the conciliation proceedings, if the parties again approach the conciliation officer, he can commence conciliation proceedings afresh for bringing about a settlement of the dispute.[34]

This may be correct as long as the dispute has not been referred to adjudication by the Government. But when the Government has referred the dispute to adjudication, even if the conciliation proceedings are pending before a conciliation officer, they are deemed to have been concluded under cl (c) of sub-s (2) of s 20. Hence, after the reference of the dispute to adjudication, a conciliation officer cannot commence conciliation proceedings whether he has to commence such proceedings for the first time or after submitting the failure report. If conciliation proceedings after the reference of the dispute for adjudication were permissible, it would lead to a conflict between the award resulting from the adjudication and the settlement arrived at, in the course of conciliation proceedings, both of which are binding under s 18(3) of the Act. Where the conciliation officer declined to admit the dispute raised by the union in conciliation on the ground that there was a subsisting settlement between the parties, that the award of the tribunal stipulating a 48 hour week was confirmed right up to the Supreme Court, the Bombay High Court held that the conciliation officer had no jurisdiction to determine the merits of the demands of the union while declining to admit the dispute in conciliation.[35] When an employee raises an industrial dispute against the termination of his services, saying that he was performing only clerical duties notwithstanding the designation of 'Manager', it is not open to the labour officer to refuse to close the proceedings and to submit his failure report to the Government on the ground that the said employee was not a workman. In such a case, the order passed by the labour officer is quashed and the Government is directed to refer the dispute for adjudication under s 10.[36] Where the subject-matter of the dispute has already been settled and the workmen have enjoyed benefits under the settlement, the conciliation officer has the discretionary power to refuse to take up the dispute for conciliation and to submit a failure report under s 12(4).[37] In Ramesh, the facts briefly were: the services of a few employees were terminated by the management. When the employees protested, the management promised to give them alternative employment in another plant owned by them, which promise was apparently not kept up. In addition, there were other contentions, claims and rival claims too. The conciliation officer accepted the case of management that the said employees were designated as Managers (Technical), etc., and, on that basis, the Conciliation Officer has prima facie decided that the petitioners could not be treated as workmen. On this view of the matter, he held that the conciliation proceedings could not be continued further, and no failure report was sent to the Government either. Quashing the order, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the conciliation officer exceeded his jurisdiction in determining whether the employees were workmen or not, which could only be decided in an adjudication proceeding, and directed the conciliation officer to send a failure report under s 12(2) (sic).[38]

SUB-SECTION (5)

(i) Making or Refusing to Make a Reference

Sub-section (5) of s 12 contains a dimorphism of power, viz, power to make a reference and the power to refuse to make a reference. The first part of the dimorphism which speaks of the power of the appropriate Government to make a reference lays down that if on a consideration of the report under sub-s (4), the appropriate Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference, it may make such reference. The first part of the sub-section has however, to be read as part of sub-s (1) of s 10, which empowers the appropriate Government to make a reference of the dispute. The combined effect of these provisions is that ordinarily the question of making a reference would arise after conciliation proceedings have been gone through and the conciliation officer has made a failure report.[39]However, the expression at 'any time' in sub-s (1) of s 10 signifies that the Government does not have to wait until the failure report has been made. It can decide to refer the dispute even if conciliation proceedings had not yet begun or were still pending. There is nothing in s 10(1) to indicate that the Government has to wait for the conciliation officer's report for exercising the power to refer a dispute because the jurisdiction of the Government to make a reference under s 10(1) is independent of the procedure laid down in s 12(5) of the Act.[40] Either on being satisfied after the consideration of the failure report that there is a case for reference, or otherwise, where the appropriate Government is of opinion that an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended, it may at any time refer the dispute. In case the Government decides to make a reference, it has to act under s 10(1), for that is the only provision which empowers the Government to make reference.[41] In other words, the appropriate Government has the power under s 10(1) to refer a dispute as soon as it forms the opinion that there is an existing or apprehended industrial dispute. This does not mean that the Government is bound to make the reference. The Government has been given an important voice in the matter of permitting industrial disputes to seek adjudication by reference to industrial tribunals, because 'it is not every case where parties allege the existence of an industrial dispute that a reference can be made'.[42] In UTI Cycles, the Supreme Court observed:

> The government has to weigh the facts keeping in mind the objective of industrial peace and smooth industrial relations between the parties. If, taking into consideration all the facts, the government finds that in the interest of industrial peace, it is not necessary to make the reference, it may not do so.[43]

In Alekh Bihari, Pasayat Acting CJ of the Orissa High Court held that it was open to the state Government to take broad features into considerations while exercising jurisdiction under s 10(1) of the Act. When the appropriate Government considers the question as to whether a reference should be made under s 12(5), it has to act under s 10(1) of the Act, and s 10(1) confers discretion on the appropriate Government either to refer the dispute or not to refer it for adjudication according as it is of the opinion that it is expedient to do so or not.[44] Refusal by the Government to refer a dispute raised by a workmen against his not being appointed as a physiotherapist was valid as the workman concerned did not possess the requisite qualifications and was overaged.[45] Where the Government refused to refer a dispute raised by the workman against the transfer order passed by the management on the ground that transfer is a management prerogative, the Gauhati High Court held that such refusal was not open to challenge.[46] In Pix Transmissions, the facts disclosed that subsequent to the submission of failure report by the conciliation officer to the Government under s 12(4), the parties arrived at a settlement at the bipartite level and filed the same with the Government with a request not to refer the matter for adjudication. Despite this request, the Government referred the dispute for adjudication. A single judge of the Bombay High Court, while quashing the order of reference, held that the Government had not addressed itself to the crucial aspect, namely, whether there was any subsisting industrial dispute at the relevant time, and directed the Government to re-examine the matter in the light of the settlement arrived at between the parties after the submission of failure report.[47] While exercising power under s 12(5), the appropriate Government cannot go into the merits of the industrial dispute and if it finds that the industrial dispute has arisen, then such dispute needs to be referred for adjudication.[48] Where a dismissed workman, having moved a writ petition in the High Court which was dismissed on merits, raised an industrial dispute and the Government refused under s 12(5) to make a reference of the said dispute, it was held that the refusal by the Government was in order, and that it was not open to the workman, he having lost the case in the High Court on merits, to agitate the matter before another forum.[49] In Dhenkenal Mehantar Sangha, the union submitted 18 demands and on the receipt of the failure report from the conciliation officer, the Government referred 15 demands for adjudication, while leaving out 3 of them. Further, the Government did not communicate any reasons for refusing to refer the said 3 demands. A single judge of the Orissa High Court while, directing the Government to take a fresh decision, observed the three disputes refused to be referred were covered by Item 6 of second schedule.[50]

In other words, the Government has to take into account the question of expediency of making a reference in the facts and circumstances of a case. However, when the 'appropriate Government' declines to make a reference, the second part of the dimorphism comes into play, ie, compliance of the requirements of sub-s (5) of s 12 also becomes relevant and necessary. The discretion not to make reference can be exercised only if (a) there is no existing or apprehended dispute; or (b) it is inexpedient to make a reference in the circumstances of the case.[51] Even if the Government comes to the conclusion that a prima facie case for reference has been made out, it would still be open to the Government to consider whether there are any other relevant or material facts which would justify its refusal to make reference. The question as to whether a case for reference has been made out or not, can be answered in the light of all the relevant circumstances, which would have a bearing on the merits of the case as well as on the incidental question as to whether a reference should invariably be made.[52] The discretion has to be exercised in such manner that it would not exceed the limits prescribed for the sphere of reference and enter into the territory of adjudication, the appropriate Government is only expected to decide before making a reference as to 'whether on a prima facie examination of the facts of the case, there is a dispute which requires a trial or adjudication by a tribunal or court'. The Government cannot take upon itself the function of adjudication.[53] For instance, where on a prima facie examination of the dispute, the writ court found that the dispute raised by the workman was covered by a valid settlement, it was held that the Government was justified in refusing to make the reference.[54] In Moorco, the facts were:

(a) the question whether the company is entitled to the infancy protection under s 16 of the Payment of Bonus Act was, pursuant to a settlement reached between the parties under s 12(3), referred to the Deputy Labour Commissioner for arbitration;

(b) the arbitrator gave his decision holding that the management was entitled to protection under s 16 of the Payment of Bonus Act, but the said decision was neither submitted to the Government nor published under s 17 ;

(c) the union in the meantime filed a civil suit questioning the award, apart from raising an industrial dispute on the self-same issue of bonus;

(d) the Government on receipt of the failure report from the conciliation officer referred the said dispute to the tribunal for adjudication;

(e) the management moved the High Court for issuing a writ of mandamus directing the Deputy Labour Commissioner to forward his decision under (b) above to the Government for publication, which writ petition was pending in the High Court; and

(f) the management filed another writ petition challenging the reference made by the Government under (d) above.

A single judge of the Madras High Court held that the reference was bad in law in view of the fact that the question of infancy protection was decided by the Deputy Labour Commissioner as agreed to by the parties in the course of as 12(3) settlement, and a suit filed by the union questioning the said decision of the Deputy Commissioner of Labour is pending in the civil court.[55] Where the facts disclosed that the salary and allowances of the workmen were revised unilaterally and were accepted by the workmen under protest and without prejudice to their rights as indicated in their letter submitted to the management, the refusal by the Government to refer the dispute on the ground of existence of a settlement between the management and one of the unions or of the acceptance of the benefits arising out thereunder under protest are not good grounds for refusing the reference, and accordingly the impugned order of the Government deserves to be quashed.[56] The first part of sub-s (5) of s 12 signifies that after forming the opinion under s 10(1), the appropriate Government ordinarily will further take into consideration the failure report for being satisfied whether there is a case for reference or it would be expedient to make the reference.[57] The problem which the Government has to consider under s 12(5) is whether there is a case for reference, which means that the Government must first consider whether a prima facie case for reference has been made out on merits.[58] In the name of such prima facie examination of merits to find out whether the claim is patently frivolous or not, the Government cannot undertake detailed examination, investigation, appreciation of facts and principles of law.[59] Refusal to make a reference on the ground that the demand mentioned in the demand notice was not fit for being referred for adjudication because the employee's case was not proved is incompetent and bad in law.[60]

In Sharad Kumar, the Supreme Court held that it was wrong for the Government to have refused to refer a dispute raised by an area sales executive on the ground that he was not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s), and it was for the labour court or tribunal to decide the question.[61]Where the Government declined to refer a dispute, raised by the union against a notice of change issued by the management under s 9A on the ground that the said change was sought to be introduced by the management after due notice under s 9A, the Government was directed to refer the issue for adjudication. It was held that the application of s 9A could not be held to be decisive for declining a reference under s 10 read with s 12(5) of the Act, and that it would be appropriate for the management to establish the justification for the said change before an adjudicatory forum before implementation.[62] Where the Government refused reference on the basis of rival contentions, namely, the employer contending that the workman resigned from service and offered to re-employ him, whereas the workman contended that he had neither resigned nor was there any offer of reinstatement, it was held that the refusal to refer the dispute was not legal.[63] Where it was an admitted fact that the workman had worked only for 85-90 days, the refusal by the Government to make a reference was justified and it could not be said that the Government had adjudicated upon the controversy regarding the denial of benefit of s 25F to the workman.[64] The refusal to refer a dispute relating to termination on the ground that there was no material to show that the workman had put in 240 days of service is bad in law as it has no power to delve into the merits of the dispute.[65] Where the workers raised a dispute that they were the employees of Indian Airlines and that they were entitled to the same wages as paid to the other employees of the Airlines, the refusal by the Government to refer the said dispute, on the ground that they were the employees of contractors and not of the Airlines, amounts to adjudication of the matter and is hence incompetent.[66] In Ramruch Pande, the Bombay High Court held that it was not open to the Government to go into the merits of demands and refuse to refer the dispute on the ground that the union had not substantiated its demand, and directed the Government to make the reference.[67] The order of the Government refusing to refer a dispute raised under s 2A, on the ground that the said termination was not illegal, amounts to adjudication of the dispute and is without jurisdiction.[68] Refusal by the Government to refer a dispute relating to termination of the service of a workman, who was given a fixed-tenure appointment for a period of 85 days, is an order and such refusal does not amount to adjudication of the dispute.[69] Refusal by the Government to make a reference of the dispute raised by bank employees on the issue of 'the non-granting of medical leave sans medical certificate from the bank's panel of doctors', on the ground that leave cannot be claimed as a matter of right and hence it was not a fit case for reference, does not amount to adjudication of the dispute by the Government, and the refusal is well within the power conferred on the Government under s 10 read with s 12(5).[70]

In deciding the question of expediency to make the reference or not, the consideration of the Government is not confined to the conciliation officer's failure report under s 12(4) alone.[71] It would be further open to the Government to consider other relevant materials and facts which may not be appearing in the report but may come to its knowledge or which may be brought to its notice.[72] Whether there was an expediency or not in the matter of making a reference is to be decided on evidence in the peculiarity of facts and circumstances of the case.[73] For instance, if prima facie the claim is patently frivolous or is clearly belated,[74] or the facts are glaringly against the claim and do not require any trial or adjudication, then it is open to the appropriate Government to take the view that the case is not a fit one for reference.[75] 'In fact, the patentness or frivolousness of the dispute would mean that the claim is so utterly untenable that it could not stand for a minute and that there is no arguable case and there is no case for any consideration whatsoever'.[76] Where the employer challenged the order of reference on the ground that the dispute was raised nine years after termination, it was held that the Government could not decline reference solely on the ground of delay.[77] Refusal by the Government to refer a dispute on the ground of unexplained delay of 10 years is justified.[78] Refusal by the Government to refer a dispute, raised after a lapse of 11 years on the ground that the dispute was frivolous, is justified.[79] A single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the refusal of a reference on the ground that there was a delay of 7 years is not justified when the workman furnished adequate reasons explaining the delay.[80]

Likewise, if the impact of the claim on general relations between the employer and the employees in the region is likely to be adverse, the appropriate Government may take that into account in deciding whether it would be expedient to make the reference or not.[81] In Atic Employees Union, the state Government found that referring the dispute would raise a spirit of discontentment amongst a substantial number of workmen who had already signed an undertaking and resumed work. Referring the dispute would, therefore, amount to giving fillip to industrial unrest on the spot. In the circumstances, the discretion of the Government refusing to make the reference was not held to be uncalled for or perverse which could be interfered with, in judicial review.[82] If a prima facie case has been made out, reference of the dispute for adjudication cannot be refused only on the ground of expediency without considering other relevant materials. Though expediency is a relevant circumstance to be taken into account, the fact of the rights and interests of a vast number of workmen is also a relevant consideration to be taken into account alongwith the consideration of the question of expediency. As a matter of fact, the consideration of the effect of the rights and interests of a vast number of workmen is itself a question of expediency.[83] In Shaw Wallace, the Madras High Court deduced the following principles for the Government to bear in mind while deciding the question of referring or refusing to refer a dispute for adjudication:

(1) The government would normally refer the dispute for adjudication.

(2) The government may refuse to make reference, if-

  (a) the claim is very stale;

  (b) the claim is opposed to the provisions of the Act;

  (c) the claim is inconsistent with any agreement between the parties;

  (d) the claim is patently frivolous;

  (e) the impact of the claim on the general relations between the employer and the employees in the region is likely to be adverse; or

  (f) the person concerned is not a workman as defined by the Act.

(3) The government should not act on irrelevant and extraneous considerations.

(4) The government should act honestly and bona fide.

(5) The government should not embark on adjudication of the dispute.

(6) The government should not refuse reference on the ground that domestic inquiry was fairly and properly held and punishment awarded was appropriate. [84]

It may be pointed out here that the question whether 'the person concerned is or is not a workman as defined by the Act' as formulated in point no 2(f) above is a jurisdictional question. It is a mixed question of fact and law, on the determination of which, will depend the jurisdiction of the tribunal. It cannot be said that the determination of such a question will not involve adjudication. In Hira Cement, it was held that, in a case involving the termination of the contract workers by the contractor, the Government is justified in refusing to make a reference of the dispute on the ground that there was no employer-employee relationship between the contract labour and the principal employer, and the High Court would not canvass the order passed under s 12(5) closely to see if there was any material before the Government to support its conclusion, as if it was judicial or quasi-judicial determination. The law is well settled that the jurisdiction to decide about abolition of contract labour, or to put it differently, to prohibit employment of contract labour is to be adjudicated in accordance with s 10 of the Contract Labour Act. The ID Act has absolutely no application.[85]Sub-section (5) requires the 'appropriate government' to record and communicate, to the parties concerned, its reasons for the refusal to make the reference. In other words, in dealing with an industrial dispute in respect of which a failure report has been submitted under s 12(4), the appropriate Government exercises its power under s 10(1) subject to the obligation imposed by s 12(5) to record and communicate its reasons for not making the reference when the dispute has gone through conciliation and failure report has been received under s 12(4) of the Act.[86] The requirement of recording and communicating the reasons to the parties by the 'appropriate Government' is mandatory and mere recording of the reasons cannot be characterised as adjudication.[87] In Maize Products, repelling the contention of the petitioner-employer, the Gujarat High Court held that, in terms of the Notifiation dated 26 March 1973 issued by the Government of Gujarat, the Deputy Commissioner of Labour had the power to refer an industrial dispute for adjudication to a tribunal under s 10(1) read with s 12(4) & (5) of the Act.[88] Where the petitioner-employee approached civil court in the first instance to enforce his right and got an adverse finding and, thereafter filed a writ petition without disclosing the fact that he lost in the civil court, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that the petitioner was not entitled to any relief because of the suppression of material facts before the High Court as well as the competent authorities.[89]

(ii) Judicial Review

(a) Quashing the Order refusing Reference

On the question whether the word 'may' used in the phrase 'it may make such reference' in s 12(5) should be construed to mean as 'shall' so as to make it obligatory on the Government to make reference, after it has formed its opinion that there is an existing or apprehended dispute, a considerable amount of decisional grist has got accumulated. The divergence in the interpretation of the words 'may' and 'shall' by different High Courts was set at rest in KP Krishnan, in which the Supreme Court juxtaposed the rival contentions on the construction of s 12(5) and steered clear of the decision on the question whether the word 'may' in the context of this provision should be construed to mean 'shall' and observed that both the approaches ultimately lead to the same crucial inquiry, viz, 'are the reasons recorded and communicated by the Government under s 12(5) germane or relevant or not'. If the writ court is satisfied that the reasons given by the Government for refusing to make a reference are extraneous and not germane, then it can issue, and would be justified in issuing a writ even in respect of such an administrative order.[90] Elaborating this view further in Bombay Union of Journalists, the court said that if the appropriate Government refuses to make a reference for irrelevant considerations, on extraneous grounds or acts mala fide, a party would be entitled to move the High Court for a writ of mandamus.[91] In Hochtief Gammon, the court pointed out that these are not the only powers of the courts in relation to the administrative orders of the governmental authorities. In this case, the court held that the order of the Government was unsustainable as it had not taken into consideration the relevant material and had also not said that it was inexpedient to refer the question for adjudication. In other words, the order of the Government really amounted to an outright refusal to consider the relevant matters and it also misdirected itself on a point of law in wholly omitting to take into account the relevant considerations which amounted to unlawful behaviour. Speaking for the court, Alagiriswami J, enunciated the law thus:

> The executive have to reach their decisions by taking into account relevant considerations. They should not refuse to consider relevant matter nor should take into account wholly irrelevant or extraneous consideration. They should not misdirect themselves on a point of law. Only such a decision will be lawful. The courts have power to see that the executive acts lawfully. It is no answer to the exercise of that power to say that the executive acted bona fide nor that they have bestowed painstaking consideration. They cannot avoid scrutiny by courts by failing to give reasons. If they give reasons and they are not good reasons, the courts can direct them to reconsider the matter in the light of relevant matters, though the propriety, adequacy or satisfactory character of those reasons may not be open to judicial scrutiny. Even if the executive considers it inexpedient to exercise their powers they should state their reasons and there must be material to show that they have considered all the relevant facts.[92]

The writ court cannot place itself in the position of the Government and make a reference itself by reason of its own satisfaction. Howsoever 'satisfied' the court may be,[93] it cannot direct the Government to make a reference because it cannot sit as a court of appeal on the order passed by the Government.[94] The court is, therefore, not entitled to consider the propriety or correctness of the reasons assigned by the Government,[95] nor can the Government be mandamussed to make a person a party to the reference as the remedy of such an aggrieved party would be before the industrial tribunal.[96] The writ court can, however, direct the Government to reconsider whether a reference should be made or not after leaving out the irrelevant and extraneous reasons.[97] The Punjab High Court in Oswal Weaving, enunciated the following proposition with respect to the judicial review of the Government's order refusing to make the reference:

(1) The appropriate government acting in exercise of its powers under s 10(1) read with s 12(5) of the Act exercises administrative functions and not judicial or quasi-judicial functions.

(2) In exercise of its powers under s 10(1) of the Act, the appropriate government has discretion to refer or not to refer any dispute to a labour court or tribunal, but such discretion has to be exercised in accordance with the provisions of the Act itself, ie, the appropriate government can decline to make a reference only on two grounds, viz:

  (i) that there is no industrial dispute which can be referred; or

  (ii) that it is not expedient to make a reference in the circumstances of the case.

(3) If the appropriate government declines to make a reference on any of the abovementioned two permitted grounds, the decision of the government would not be amenable to a writ or direction, and it would not be open to the court to compel the government to make a reference. The writ court will not sit in appeal over the decision of the appropriate government on any of the abovementioned two matters.

(4) The appropriate government can be compelled by a writ in the nature of mandamus to consider the matter as required by s 12(5) of the Act and then to exercise its discretion under s 10(1) of the Act in accordance with law if it is either admitted or proved that conciliation proceedings had taken place and a report had been submitted by the conciliation officer under s 12(4) of the Act, but that the government had not seen the report of the conciliation officer or taken it into consideration at all before deciding whether to make a reference or not.

(5) A writ of mandamus would also be issued if the government declines to make a reference under s 12(5) of the Act without recording the reasons for such refusal and without communicating the same to the parties concerned.

(6) An appropriate writ would also be issued to the appropriate government if it is admitted or proved that the refusal to make a reference of the dispute in question is not bona fide or is actuated by malice or is based on considerations which are wholly irrelevant or extraneous and are not germane to the statutory considerations on which reference can be declined.[1]

From the decided cases, the following grounds are discernible, on which the writ court would be justified in issuing a writ of mandamus directing the Government to reconsider the question of making or refusing to make reference of a dispute:

(i) Failure to record and communicate reasons

(ii) Ignoring conciliation officer's report

(iii) Nature of reasons:

(a) Irrelevant or extraneous

(b) Reasons tantamounting to adjudication

(iv) Mala fides.[2]

Failure to Record and Communicate Reasons:

In case the Government refuses to refer a dispute, it is the mandatory requirement of s 12(5) that it shall record its reasons for the refusal and communicate such reasons to the parties concerned, when the dispute has gone through conciliation and a failure report has been submitted under s 12(4) of the Act.[3] It is, therefore, obligatory on the part of the Government to set out in the communication issued to the parties clearly and precisely the grounds on which the request for reference was being declined.[4] The object of this provision is to require the 'appropriate Government' to state its reasons for refusing to make a reference, so that the reasons should stand public scrutiny,[5] because when the Government has to record reasons, it would apply a much closer mind to the question, as otherwise it may not be easy for it to give reasons for the decision it has come to.[6] The knowledge that reasons would be made public and be the subject of criticism, would manifestly tend to prevent capricious and ill-considered actions on the part of the Government,[7] and no Government-surely not a democratic Government-would ever take the risk of giving reasons which would be open to public criticism and even condemnation.[8]

After the Government has recorded and communicated its reasons to the parties, it cannot in its counter-affidavit to the writ petition say that in addition to reasons mentioned in the order refusing to make the reference, certain other relevant facts or grounds not disclosed in the order had also weighed with it in reaching the conclusion that no reference need be made.[9] Hence, in case of failure of the appropriate Government to comply with the mandatory requirement to record and communicate the reasons to the parties, it can be compelled by a writ of mandamus to record and communicate its reasons when it decides not to make a reference after considering the report of the conciliation officer under s 12(4) of the Act and other relevant materials.[10] The Patna High Court, held that the state Government was not obliged to record and communicate its reason for not referring some of the disputes for adjudication under s 12(5), because the power was exercised by the state Government straightaway under s 10(1)(d) without there being any conciliation proceedings.[11] This view is incorrect as it loses sight of the basic principles of industrial law in this behalf. Each one of the demands which is connected with the employment, non-employment, the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour of any person, when made by the workmen or their union and refused by the employer would give rise to an industrial dispute.[12] A number of such disputes arising out of the demands of the workmen may be referred for adjudication by a single order of reference. In other words, there is a clear distinction between an 'industrial dispute' and an 'order of reference'. When the appropriate Government exercises its power to make reference of some of the demands out of a charter of demands, it no doubt, exercises its power under s 10(1)(d) with respect to such dispute, but with respect to the demands which the Government refuses to refer, its power under s 10(1)(d) is not exhausted.[13]

Section 12(5) enjoins upon the 'appropriate government' to record and communicate its reasons to the parties for its refusal to refer the dispute. With respect to the demands which the Government refuses to refer, each one of which is an industrial dispute by itself, it is obligatory on it to record and communicate its reasons to the parties concerned. The failure of the Government to record and communicate the reasons with respect to the demands not referred would make the refusal order amenable to a writ of mandamus. Want of reasons in the order refusing reference cannot be supplied by the plea subsequently raised by the Government in the writ petition.[14] In other words, the Government cannot be, subsequently, heard to say that in addition to the reasons mentioned by them in the order, certain other relevant facts or grounds not disclosed in the order had also weighed with it in reaching the conclusion that no reference need be made,[15] because otherwise the mandatory provisions of this subsection may be deliberately violated and the aggrieved party will have to undergo the painful necessity of going to the High Court in order to ascertain the reasons for the Government's decision in refusing to make the reference.[16] In Nirmal Singh, where the labour commissioner exercising the powers of the state Government under s 12 for making reference, had not given any reasons to justify his conclusion that the delinquent workman was not a 'workman', the Supreme Court instead of remanding the matter for stating reasons, directed him to make a reference with a view to avoid delay in adjudication.[17]

Ignoring Conciliation Officer's Report under Section 12(4) :

From the background of the provisions of sub-ss (1), (2) and (4) of this section, it is clear that the appropriate Government is bound to consider very carefully the failure report of the conciliation officer under s 12(4) and treat it as furnishing relevant material which would enable it to decide whether a case for reference has been made out or not.[18]Section 12(5), inter alia, provides that if on consideration of the report referred to in sub-s (4), the appropriate Government is satisfied that there is a case for reference to the tribunal, it may make such reference. On the other hand, if it is satisfied that either there is no case for reference or it would not be expedient to make a reference of the dispute, it may decline to make the reference on consideration of the report of the conciliation officer and other relevant materials.[19] If, therefore, it is either admitted or proved that the conciliation proceedings have taken place and a report has been submitted by the conciliation officer under s 12(4) of the Act, but the appropriate Government has not seen the report or taken it into consideration at all before refusing to make a reference, the Government can be compelled by a writ of mandamus to reconsider the question after taking this report into account. In Oswal Weaving (supra), the facts disclosed that the conciliation officer had, in his failure report, travelled to the length of making recommendation to the Government about making reference and even enclosed a draft of the 'order of reference'. The High Court, instead of condemning the action of conciliation officer, commended his recommendation.[20] The legal position in this regard is very clear. Section 12(5) does not require a conciliation officer to make any recommendation unlike s 13(4). Hence, any recommendation made by the conciliation officer cannot form an integral part of the report. The case clearly falls within the ratio of Bombay Union of Journalists. The decision of High Court, therefore, is not correct.

Nature of Reasons:

The area of reasons is one of those areas where the courts having strayed into thickets, the compass reading of principle, not the random broken twigs or unbiased trail, must show the way out. Broadly stated, in entertaining a petition for issuing a writ of mandamus, the writ court does not sit in appeal against the value, quality, propriety, correctness, adequacy or the satisfactory character of the reasons recorded by the appropriate Government in refusing to make a reference.[21] The object of requiring the 'appropriate government' to state its reasons for refusing to make a reference is that the reasons should stand public scrutiny. It is, therefore, desirable that the parties concerned should be told clearly and precisely the reasons why no reference is made. However, that does not mean that the party challenging the validity of the Government's order declining to make a reference can require the court in writ proceedings to examine the propriety or correctness of the said reasons.[22] This provision has been made in order to provide an objective test which may be subjected to judicial scrutiny by a writ court to examine as to whether the reasons for refusing to make a reference are irrelevant or foreign.[23] As to what is the nature and extent of the reasons to be stated by the 'appropriate Government' when it refuses to make an order of reference, the Supreme Court has stated that the reasons should be germane to the dispute under consideration and should not be irrelevant or extraneous to the dispute. Furthermore, the reasons should not tantamount to the adjudication by the Government itself because the Government under s 12(5) discharges only an administrative function and not a judicial or quasi-judicial function which is the field of the adjudicator. The refusal of the Government, therefore, will be amenable to the writ of mandamus if the reasons (a) are irrelevant and extraneous or (b) tantamount to adjudication.

Irrelevant and extraneous reasons:

It is now a well settled principle that the order of the Government acting under s 10(1) read with s 12(5) is an administrative order and not a judicial or quasi-judicial one.[24] If in taking the decision to refuse to refer the matter for adjudication, the Government fails to take some vital and relevant material which it ought to have taken into account for taking the decision, the decision will be liable to be quashed.[25]Even in dealing with the question as to whether it would be expedient not to make reference, the Government must not act in a punitive spirit, but must consider the question fairly and reasonably, and take into account only the relevant facts and circumstances.[26] The requirement to record and communicate reasons means reasons, which have relevance to the conclusion reached by the Government, which, when adjudged by the normal test of cause and effect, were intelligible. Refusal to make reference for the reason that the case does not disclose any legal flaw is not a valid reason.[27] For instance, the refusal to refer the dispute for adjudication on the ground that the union which raised the dispute is not a recognised union is not germane to the question in dispute.[28] The refusal of the appropriate Government to make reference of a dispute relating to dismissal of a workman by saying that since the proceedings had been taken in accordance with the principles of natural justice or prima facie it was not mala fide, was held to be irrational. In Ashwini Kumar Mohanty, the reason for refusal to refer the dispute for adjudication that the bank was going to have regular recruitment in future, has been held to be improperly based on extraneous considerations.[29] Where the statement in the impugned order was to the effect that the state Government on consideration of the report of the conciliation officer as well as the surrounding facts and circumstances did not consider it fit to refer the dispute for adjudication, it was held that the order did not comply with the mandatory requirement of recording relevant reasons for refusing to make reference of the dispute for adjudication.[30] Similarly, where the Government refused to make reference between a corporation owned by it and its employees relating to quantum of bonus for the reason that it could not interfere in the payment of bonus more than the minimum permissible limit, it was held that refusal to refer was on a consideration which was totally on a different keel and was, therefore, reviewable.[31] Likewise, the order of the Government refusing to make reference was set aside for non-application of mind and the Government was directed to make reference.[32]

The mere statement that 'in the opinion of the state Government the dispute was not fit for reference', or 'it would not be expedient to refer the unsettled disputes to adjudication', or 'the action of the management was not mala fide', would not constitute due compliance with the requirements of this provision.[33] The Madras High Court held that where the services of a workman were terminated under the relevant Standing Order providing for automatic loss of lien of a workman who absents himself from duty for more than eight consecutive days is not an irrelevant or extraneous consideration.[34] No doubt, taking the relevant Standing Order into consideration cannot be said to be an irrelevant or extraneous consideration, but the question as to whether the workman was in fact absent for more than eight consecutive days or whether the relevant Standing Orders applied to him or not, are questions relevant to be taken into account.[35] In Tamil Nadu JAC&TT Union, the Government referred a dispute raised in a cluster of textile mills for adjudication. Later on, another order was issued specifying the individual mills. A few member-mills, which were parties to conciliation proceedings, were left out of the reference. These mills challenged the order of the Government by a writ petition before the Supreme Court. The court held that the dispute was an 'industry-wise dispute and not establishment-wise'; hence, these mills should also have been included in the reference and should not have been left out. Since these mills were members of the association and were parties to the conciliation proceedings, the Government should not have taken on itself the task of deciding whether these mills should or should not be governed by the general adjudication affecting all the workmen in the industry. In the circumstances, the court directed the state Government to forthwith include the mills so left out.[36] The refusal of the Government to make a reference on the ground that a temporary workman had failed to qualify for permanent recruitment in the written test was upheld by the Allahabad High Court in Onkar Nath Kapoor.[37] A single judge of the Madras High Court held that in refusing to refer the dispute relating to the termination of service of an apprentice on completion of two years of apprenticeship, after taking into account the relevant material considerations, the Government was not influenced by irrelevant considerations and there was no misdirection whatsoever in law.[38]

Reasons Tantamounting to Adjudication:

In TELCO Convoy Drivers,[39] the Supreme Court pointed out that the function of the appropriate Government is an administrative function and not a judicial or quasi-judicial function. Also, in performing this administrative function, the Government cannot delve into the merits of the dispute and take upon itself the determination of the lis, which would certainly be in excess of the power conferred on it by this section. To form opinion as to whether an industrial dispute 'exists' or 'is apprehended' is not the same thing as to adjudicate the dispute itself on its merits. The question as to whether the persons raising the dispute were workmen or not cannot be decided by the Government. In other words, in exercising its administrative powers under s 10(1), the Government cannot embark on detailed examination, investigation, appreciation of facts and application of law which is to be done by the adjudicatory authorities under the Act.[40] However, for forming its opinion, the Government may determine as to whether an industrial dispute 'exists' or 'is apprehended' or the claim is frivolous, bogus or put forth for extraneous and irrelevant reasons, not for justice or industrial peace and harmony.[41] The appropriate Government, before refusing to refer a dispute for adjudication, will have to apply its own mind to the question whether the punishment meted out by the management is justified by the proved misconduct. This is the field of objective adjudication by the tribunal and not the subjective satisfaction of the Government. In such a situation, the Government will not be justified to refuse to make the reference, because the workman is entitled to get the evidence as to the proof of his misconduct reviewed in such a reference as also the quantum of punishment, even if misconduct is held to have been proved.[42] The Government cannot decline to refer the dispute for adjudication simply because in its opinion based on examination of the merits of the case, it finds no substance in the same because such an approach would amount to arrogation by the Government to itself the role which properly belongs to an adjudicator.[43]

The Government is not empowered to decide the merits of the industrial dispute under the garb of giving reasons for refusal to make the reference.[44] The order of the Government refusing to make a reference will also be quashable on certiorari, if it has refused or failed to take into consideration the plea of the workman that his dismissal was by way of victimisation.[45] In cases of disciplinary discharge or dismissal, there is little scope left for the Government to refuse to make reference. However, the Orissa High Court,[46] upheld the refusal of the Government to refer the dispute relating to the dismissal of the workman on the ground that the workman was not able to show that the domestic inquiry was not proper. The attention of the court does not appear to have been drawn to the provisions of s 11A which has expanded the scope of the jurisdiction of adjudication. In Munichowdappa, the workman was dismissed from service for having obtained employment in the army by producing false certificate. The Government of Karnataka refused to refer the dispute on the ground that the workman had produced false army certificate for getting the appointment, and the services were terminated after conducting regular inquiry and found guilty of charges framed against him'. The High Court upheld the refusal.[47] In Syndicate Bank, the Supreme Court mandamus sed the Government to reconsider the question of making reference of a dispute relating to the punishment of stoppage of three increments of the workmen which was rejected on the ground that the 'charges of misconduct against the workmen were proved in a duly constituted departmental inquiry and the penalty was imposed after following the required procedure'. The Supreme Court held that the ground for refusal to make reference was not valid. It observed:

> If such a ground were permissible it would be the easiest thing for the management to avoid a reference to adjudication and to deprive the worker of the opportunity of having the dispute referred for adjudication even if the order holding the charges of misconduct proved was unreasonable or perverse or was actuated by mala fides or even if the penalty imposed on the worker was totally disproportionate to the offence said to have been proved. The management has simply to show that it has held a proper inquiry after complying with the requisite procedure and that would be enough to defeat the worker's claim for adjudication. Such a situation cannot be countenanced by law. [48]

In a batch of writ petitions in Ram Avtar, the Government had declined reference in a couple of cases on the ground that it was learnt that in the first one, the services were terminated only after the charges against him 'were proved in a domestic inquiry'; and in the second, that the removal was in accordance with the procedure. The court held that in both the cases, the reasons given were irrelevant, extraneous and not germane to the determination, and tantamounted to adjudication which was impermissible. Desai J observed:

> Section 11A confers power on the tribunal to examine the case of the workmen whose service has been terminated either by discharge or dismissal qualitatively in the matter of nature of inquiry and quantitatively in the matter of adequacy or otherwise of punishment, the question of legality and validity of the inquiry has to be adjudicated upon by the tribunal in a quasi-judicial determination not by the government and the government cannot usurp this field of adjudication.[49]

In Madhya Pradesh IK Sangh, Khalid J, of the Supreme Court observed:

> .. . while conceding a very limited jurisdiction to the state government to examine patent frivolousness of the demands, it is to be understood, as a rule, that adjudication of demands made by workmen should be left to the tribunal to decide. Section 10 permits the 'appropriate government' to determine whether the dispute exists or is apprehended and then refer it for adjudication on merits. The demarcated functions are: (i) reference and (ii) adjudication...There may be exceptional cases in which the state government may on a proper examination of the demand, come to a conclusion that the demands are either perverse or frivolous and do not merit a reference. Government should be very slow to attempt an examination of the demand with a view to decline reference and courts will always be vigilant whenever the government attempts to usurp the powers of the Tribunal for adjudication of valid disputes. To allow the government to do so would be to render sections 10 and 12(5) of the Industrial Disputes Act nugatory.[50]

In Jute Mills Staff Assn, the Patna High Court held:

> The state government's jurisdiction under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act to make a reference of the industrial dispute is confined to the satisfaction as to whether any industrial dispute existed or not or is apprehended or not. It has no jurisdiction to form its own opinion about the correctness or otherwise of the allegations made by either party to the dispute. It cannot come to its own conclusions on the merits of the dispute. It, however, can determine the issues which emerge from the facts placed before it but cannot record any finding to say that although a dispute has been raised and parties are at issue with respect to certain allegations of fact, yet it is not satisfied that an industrial dispute is in existence or is in offing. It shall be, in such a situation obliged to make a reference.[51]

A single judge of the Madras High Court in Balakrishnan, has suggested that the normal rule in cases of dismissal, discharge, termination of service or retrenchment of a workman falling under s 2A read with s 11A of the Act should be to refer the dispute for adjudication. However, in appropriate cases of exceptional nature, the Government may decline to make a reference. The court further observed that the reasons generally shall relate to the larger interest of labour or the establishment of industrial peace in the region and not on mere merits of the case either on law or on facts.[52] In Madhya Pradesh IK Sangh (supra), the Government had rejected the demand of workmen for (i) dearness allowance and (ii) cambal allowance on the ground that the Government could not bear the additional burden and that the workmen were not entitled to cambal allowance as the same was included in the consolidated pay of the workmen. The court held that the said rejection constituted adjudication and that the Government exceeded its jurisdiction in refusing to refer the dispute. The Madras High Court struck a different note in K Subramaniam, where speaking for the court Natrajan J, said:

> ...The government cannot be compelled to refer every dispute for adjudication by the labour court or tribunal solely because of the additional powers conferred on the tribunal under s 11A, irrespective of the fact whether the inquiry had been held in a fair and proper manner and the finding had been rendered on the basis of evidence. We are, therefore, unable to approve the view taken by the learned single judge and hold that because of s 11A the government is bound to apply its mind to the quantum of punishment before refusing to refer a dispute for adjudication, notwithstanding the fact that no reference is called for as regards the manner in which the inquiry was held or the correctness of the findings by it.[53]

In Port and Dock Workers, in the facts and circumstances of the case despite the fact that Government had encroached upon the jurisdiction of the adjudicator, a single judge of the Bombay High Court declined to issue any directions for reference of the demands for adjudication which could be termed as state demands.[54] The appropriate Government is not required to write an elaborate order indicating all the reasons that weighed in its mind in refusing to make reference,[55] but it is not precluded from considering the merits of the disputed questions of law of the facts prima facie,, for deciding whether a dispute should be referred or not the Government has to consider whether a prima facie case has been made out, ie, an 'industrial dispute' exists or is apprehended and whether it would be expedient to make the reference.[56] A prima facie examination of the merits of the matter, therefore, cannot be said to be foreign to the inquiry which the appropriate Government is entitled to make.[57] A prima facie case does not mean a case proved to the hilt but a case which can be said to be established if the material before the Government is to be believed. In other words, the relevant consideration is whether on the basis of the material before it, is it possible for the 'appropriate Government' to arrive at the conclusion in question, and not whether that was the only conclusion which could have been arrived at on the basis of that material. In the words of Gajendragadkar J:

> The question, as to whether a case for reference has been made out, can be answered in the light of all relevant circumstances which would have a bearing on the merits of a case as well as on incidental question, as to whether a reference should, nevertheless, be made or not.[58]

For this purpose, the Government may consider the prima facie merits of the case by taking into account the failure report submitted by the conciliation officer under s 12(4) and also other relevant considerations which would help to decide whether making a reference would be expedient or not. For instance, where the claim, on the face of it, is patently frivolous or is clearly belated or where on prima facie examination, if the impact of the claim appears to be such as is likely to adversely affect the relations of employers and employees in the region, the appropriate Government may take that aspect into consideration in refusing to make the reference.[59] Such reasons would not tantamount to the adjudication of the dispute by the Government. The only requirement of s 12(5) is that when the Government declines to make the reference for such reasons, it should set out those reasons in its order of refusal to make the reference and communicate the same to the concerned parties.[60] For deciding, therefore, whether a prima facie case has been made out or not, the Government has to see whether there is an existing or apprehended industrial dispute and then to consider whether it would be expedient to make a reference of such dispute in the circumstances of the case.[61] However, in determining the question, 'if the dispute in question raises questions of law,' the government should not purport to reach a final decision on the question of law, because that would normally lie within the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal.[62] For instance, the question whether the establishment to which the dispute relates is 'industry' or not, is a mixed question of fact and law, and it is not for the State Government to reach the final decision on such question. Such matter falls appropriately within the jurisdiction of industrial adjudication.[63] Furthermore, if instead of saying that the workman has no prima facie case, the Government says that he has no case in law, it shall be reaching a final conclusion on law.[64] Likewise, the point whether an award could be terminated in part or not being a question of law should not be decided by the appropriate Government, but must be left for tribunal to decide.[65]

Questions as to whether a dispute is an industrial dispute,[66] or whether an employee is a workman, being mixed questions of fact and law cannot be appropriately decided by the Government because their determination falls within the realm of adjudication.[67] Every person whose employment falls within the ambit of s 2(s) is a 'workman' whether he is temporary, permanent or probationer. The question that he should have worked for 240 days may be relevant for the purpose of s 25F, but it is irrelevant in deciding the question whether the dispute should be referred or not.[68] The question involving the interpretation of rules and regulations of an establishment having far-reaching effects would require adjudication, and the Government would not be justified in rejecting the demand for reference.[69] In Indian Oxygen, the Government had declined to refer the dispute arising out of the termination of service of a workman for unauthorised absence from duty in accordance with the Standing Orders without inquiry. The Supreme Court held that matter required reconsideration by the Government on the merits and directed the Government to consider various aspects of the matter and pass an order as to whether or not the dispute in question required to be referred.[70] Similarly, on disputed questions of fact, the appropriate Government cannot purport to reach a final conclusion, for that again would be the province of the industrial tribunal.[71] In a case of a disciplinary action, if for the purpose of seeing whether there is a prima facie case for reference or not, the Government looks into the report of the inquiry officer to see whether the inquiry was regularly conducted or not, it cannot be said that the Government gave a final decision on the disputed question of fact.[72] Conversely, it is not the jurisdiction of the appropriate Government to direct reinstatement of a dismissed workman as the question as to whether a workman should be reinstated or not is a question which falls within the jurisdiction of the industrial adjudicator. Hence, such an order will tantamount to adjudication.[73] It cannot be suggested that in any decision of the Government, the element of decision, even to a limited extent, should be absent as that would make s 12(5) entirely nugatory.[74] The power vested in the Government under this provision being dependent on its own satisfaction, the writ court is only concerned to find out whether such satisfaction was, in fact reached by the Government in good faith and on consideration of the matters that are relevant and uninfluenced by extraneous or mala fide considerations. The court will not go into the conclusion of fact prima facie reached by the Government.[75]

The mere fact that the workmen were dissatisfied with the result of conciliation or that the management did not concede to their demands does not ipso facto justify the reference of dispute. A speaking order passed by the Government scrutinising the record before it to see whether the grievance was genuine or baseless, without substance, frivolous or unjustified would not tantamount to adjudication. For coming to the prima facie conclusion, it is within the competence of the Government to see the genuineness of the dispute.[76] In England also, the courts quash administrative acts, if those performing them have acted on extraneous considerations,[77] though they persistently deny that in judicial review they can interfere with the way in which discretion is exercised[78] or that they are acting as a court of appeal[79] and maintain that they only ensure that discretion is exercised 'properly' or 'according to law',[80] or that the administration 'is not declining jurisdiction'.[81] The actions of the administrative authorities, therefore, are investigated in judicial review, with a view to see whether they have taken into account matters which they ought not to have taken into account, or conversely have neglected to take into account vital considerations which they ought to have taken into account.[82] Sometimes, the courts have suggested that they will quash an unreasonable decision, because extraneous factors have been taken into consideration.[83] However, Lord Greene suggested 'unreasonableness' may be a head separate from 'extraneous consideration'.[84] Of late, the English courts have been extending the field of judicial review to look into the 'reasons' of the administrative orders not only for their being extraneous but also for being vague, ambiguous and 'inadequate'. In Baldwin & Francis, Lord Denning wistfully remarked: 'Is there a difference when the order speaks but speaks the ambiguous voice of the Oracle? This may someday call for decision!'[85] In Re Poyser and Mills' Arbitration, the tribunal's decision was quashed on the ground that it had not given 'adequate reasons' as required by s 12 of the Tribunal and Enquiries Act 1950.[86] Megaw J observed:

> The reasons that are set out must be reasons which are not only intelligible but which deal with the substantial points that have been raised. The courts would intervene where the reasons were substantially wrong or inadequate.[87]

Mala Fides:

A discretion to consider all relevant facts which is conferred on the Government by s 10(1) could be exercised by the Government even in dealing with s 12(5) provided of course that the said discretion is exercised bona fide, its final decision is based on consideration of relevant facts and circumstances, and the second part of s 12(5) is complied with. In other words, if it is admitted or proved that the refusal to make a reference is mala fide or dishonest, or is actuated by malice or the refusal is based on considerations which are wholly irrelevant, extraneous and not germane to the question in dispute, a writ of mandamus would be issued against it.[88] For instance, where the workmen alleged that the Government refused to make the reference because it itself was a party to the dispute and the allegation was not controverted by the Government, the order of refusal was held to be mala fide.[89] However, the mere fact that the Government does not refer a dispute cannot be sufficient to charge the Government with mala fide or dishonest intentions,[90] though the reasons stated by the Government may be considered in dealing with the question of mala fides in its order refusing to make a reference.[91]There is a presumption of constitutionality of an administrative act,[92] and the Government may and should, be presumed to act with complete propriety and without any bias while exercising the statutory functions under ss 10(1) and 12(5) of the Act.[93]The burden of proving mala fides is, therefore, on him who seeks to invalidate such an administrative act or order of the Government. However, mala fides in the sense of improper motives need not be established only by direct evidence and if bad faith would vitiate the order, the same can be deduced as a reasonable and inescapable inference from proved facts.[94] In Rajindra Roy, GN Ray J held that it might not be always possible to establish malice in fact in a straight-cut manner. In an appropriate case, it is possible to draw reasonable inference of mala fide action from the pleadings, and antecedent facts and circumstances. However, there must be firm foundation of facts pleaded and established. Such inference cannot be drawn on the basis of mere insinuations or vague suggestions.[95]

(b) Directing Government to make Reference

In KP Krishnan, the Supreme Court issued a writ of mandamus to the Government directing that it should consider the question of, making or refusing to make a reference under s 12(5) ignoring the reasons for its refusal to make the reference. However, the court did not direct the Government 'to make the reference'.[1] In BPT, a single judge of the Bombay High Court said that it would be possible to urge in a given case that where the only grounds for refusing a reference have been found to be unsustainable, the court could direct the appropriate Government to make the reference.[2] Even after forming such opinion and being so satisfied, the Government has further to consider the question of the expediency of 'making the reference'. It is not obligatory on the part of the Government to refer each and every dispute where the workmen seek such a reference. The Government has to weigh 'the facts keeping in mind the objective of industrial peace and smooth industrial relations between the parties.[3] The AP High Court in Non-Pensioners Assn, held that the scope of mandamus is to declare a particular order of the Government as illegal and unconstitutional and to direct the Government to consider or reconsider the matter afresh. However, it cannot straightaway direct the Government to pass an order in a particular manner, ie, directing the Government to refer the dispute, since it is the discretion of the Government to pass orders after applying its mind to relevant factors and subject to prima facie satisfaction as to the existence of dispute or otherwise. In this view of law, the Bench set aside the order of the single judge directing the Government to refer the dispute as it suffered from arbitrariness and non-application of mind.[4] A number of High Courts held that the reviewing court, even if satisfied that the order refusing to make a reference is not proper or valid, cannot place itself in the position of the Government and make a reference by reason of its own satisfaction. In other words, even an erroneous view taken by the appropriate Government is not susceptible to correction by the reviewing court.[5] Nor can the reviewing court compel the appropriate Government to make a reference.[6] However, in subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court gave a go-by to this rule and itself directed the appropriate Government to refer the dispute for adjudication. In Sankari Cement, the court directed the Government to make a reference of the dispute for adjudication within four weeks from the date of its order.[7]

In Nirmal Singh, the Government was directed to refer the matter forthwith to dispose it of within two months from the receipt of its order.[8] In K Veerarajan, the Government was directed to refer the dispute for adjudication within one month from the date of the order of the court and further directed the labour court to dispose of the reference within four weeks from the time of the order of reference.[9] In TELCO Convoy Drivers, quashing the refusal order of the Government, the court directed it to make the reference of the dispute.[10] The charter of demands may contain a number of demands. Some of the demands may be genuine and some may even be of frivolous nature. Some of such demands may not even constitute an 'industrial dispute' at all, say for instance, the ideological demands. The appropriate Government may straightaway reject such demands because they will not fall within the ambit of the definition of 'industrial dispute'. if the dispute under consideration is not an 'industrial dispute' at all, the Government may justifiably refuse to make the reference.[11] However, each one of the demands of the workmen made to the employer which is connected with the employment or non-employment, or the terms of employment or with the conditions of labour of any person when made by the workmen or their union and rejected by the employer, would give rise to an 'industrial dispute.[12] A corollary to this is that the Government can decline to refer all or any of such items of dispute which in its opinion are not 'existing' or 'apprehended' industrial dispute if it is satisfied that it would not be expedient to refer such dispute. The Government, therefore, will refer only those demands which in its opinion are 'existing' or 'apprehended' industrial dispute and it is further satisfied that it would not be inexpedient to refer such disputes.

SUB-SECTION (6): PERIOD WITHIN WHICH THE REPORT SHALL BE SUBMITTED

Section 12 contemplates two types of reports, namely, (i) settlement report under sub-s (3) and (ii) failure report under sub-s (4). Sub-section (6) prescribes the period for submission of these reports. In the first instance, either of the reports is to be submitted within fourteen days or such shorter period as may be fixed by the appropriate Government. However, by virtue of the proviso to this sub-section, the time for submission of the report can be extended by such further period as may be agreed upon in writing by all the parties to the dispute. There appears to be some conflict between sub-ss (4) and (6). Under sub-s (4), the conciliation officer, in a case where no settlement has been arrived at, is required to send a full report to the appropriate Government, 'as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation'; whereas under sub-s (6), the report must be 'submitted within fourteen days of the commencement of the conciliation proceedings'.[13] This seems to be the result of careless drafting. The intendment of the legislature may, however, become clear by reading these two provisions together to mean that the report is to be submitted 'as soon as practicable' 'within fourteen days of the commencement of the conciliation proceedings'. However, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the time-limit prescribed by sub-s (6) is directory and not mandatory.[14] Contravention of s 12(6) requiring submission of the report within the prescribed time may be a breach of duty on the part of the conciliation officer, but that does not affect the legality of the proceedings which are concluded as provided in s 20(2) of the Act in view of certain decisions, laying down that the legality of the proceedings before the conciliation officer would not be affected in case he exceeds the time-limit prescribed by the section or the proviso. The proviso therefore, seems to have been rendered redundant, as there is nothing to stop a conciliation officer from continuing with the proceedings without waiting for the consent of the parties to the extension of the period.[15] In Bombay Tyres, the conciliation officer held 20 meetings to arrive at a negotiated settlement. However, no settlement could be arrived at. In the facts and circumstances of the case, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the holding of 20 meetings with the management and the union without any result clearly indicated failure of the conciliation proceedings. The failure of the conciliation officer to submit the failure report was, therefore culpable and without any justification. The court, therefore, issued mandamus to the conciliation officer to forward to the Government peremptorily, the failure report within one week [16]

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 13. Duties of Board.—

(1) Where a dispute has been referred to a Board under this Act, it shall be the duty of the Board to endeavour to bring about a settlement of the same and for this purpose the Board shall, in such manner as it thinks fit and without delay, investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement thereof and may do all such things as it thinks fit for the purpose of inducing the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute.

(2) If a settlement of the dispute or of any of the matters in dispute is arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings, the Board shall send a report thereof to the appropriate Government together with a memorandum of the settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.

(3) If no such settlement is arrived at, the Board shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation, send to the appropriate Government a full report setting for the proceedings and steps taken by the Board for ascertaining the facts and circumstances, relating to the dispute and for bringing about a settlement thereof, together with a full statement of such facts and circumstances, its findings thereon, the reasons on account of which, in its opinion, a settlement could not be arrived at and its recommendations for the determination of the dispute.

(4) If, on the receipt of a report under sub-section (3) in respect of a dispute relating to a public utility service, the appropriate Government does not make a reference to a [17][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] under section 10, it shall record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor.

(5) The Board shall submit its report under this section within two months of the date [18][on which the dispute was referred to it] or within such shorter period as may be fixed by the appropriate Government:

Provided that the appropriate Government may from time to time extend the time for the submission of the report by such further periods not exceeding two months in the aggregate:

Provided further that the time for the submission of the report may be extended by such period as may be agreed on in writing by all the parties to the dispute.

LEGISLATION

This section is somewhat analogous to s 7 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act, 1929, and it was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act of 1947. The subsequent amendments of section have been indicated in the footnotes to the text of the section.

SCOPE OF POWERS AND DUTIES OF BOARDS

'Board' has been defined in s 2(c). 'Conciliation proceedings' has been defined in s 2(e) to mean any proceeding held by a conciliation officer or Board under this Act. The scope of the powers and duties of Board under s 13 is much larger than the scope of the powers and duties of conciliation officer under s 12.

SUB-SECTION (1): DUTY TO BRING ABOUT THE SETTLEMENT

Unlike a conciliation officer under s 12(1), a Board under sub-s (1) of s 13 acquires jurisdiction to start conciliation proceedings only on reference being made to it by the 'appropriate Government' under s 10(1). On such reference being made, the Board shall commence conciliation proceedings with a view to bring about an amicable settlement of the dispute referred to it. Like a conciliation officer, the Board also endeavours to bring about a settlement of a dispute. Its powers are wider than those of a conciliation officer, but its functions are substantially the same.[19] In the course of its endeavour to bring about a settlement, the Board has been vested with the powers:

(i) to investigate the dispute and all matters affecting the merits and the right settlement of the dispute and for this purpose to act without delay and in such manner as it thinks fit;

(ii) to induce the parties to come to a fair and amicable settlement of the dispute; and

(iii) to do all such things as it may think fit for that purpose.

SUB-SECTION (2): SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

This sub-section is analogous to sub-s (3) of s 12. [See notes and comments under sub-s (3) of s 12].

SUB-SECTION (3): FAILURE REPORT

This sub-section is analogous to s 12(4), but its requirements are much wider than those of s 12(4). [See notes and comments under s 12(4)]. Under this sub-section, as soon as practicable after the close of the investigation under sub-s (1), the Board has to make a full report of the appropriate Government setting forth:

(i) the steps taken by it for ascertaining the facts and circumstances relating to the dispute;

(ii) the steps taken by it for bringing about a settlement of the dispute;

(iii) a statement of the facts and circumstances ascertained by it in the course of investigation;

(iv) its findings on the facts and circumstances ascertained;

(v) the reasons on account of which, in the opinion of the board, a settlement could not be arrived at; and

(vi) its recommendations for the determination of the dispute.

SUB-SECTION (4): DUTY TO RECORD AND COMMUNICATE REASONS

Under this sub-section, if on receipt of the failure-report made by the Board in respect of a dispute relating to a public utility service, the appropriate Government does not make a reference to a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal under s 10, it shall record and communicate to the parties concerned its reasons therefor. The provisions of s 13 considered as a whole clearly indicate that the power to make a reference in regard to dispute referred to the board is undoubtedly to be found in s 10(1). In regard to non-public utility services, there is no 'express provision made authorising the Government to make a reference. In case of a public utility service, it is open to the Government to refer a dispute under s 10(1) to a board, and if the board fails to bring about a settlement between the parties, the Government will be entitled either to refer or to refuse to refer the dispute for adjudication under s 10(1) of the Act. The second proviso to s 10(1) enjoins upon the appropriate Government to make a reference where a dispute relates to a public utility service and a notice under s 22 has been given.

SUB-SECTION (5): PERIOD WITHIN WHICH THE REPORT SHALL BE SUBMITTED

This sub-section prescribes, for the board, the maximum period of two months for submitting its report from the date on which the dispute was referred to it. The first proviso empowers the appropriate Government to extend the time maximum by another two months suo motu and the second proviso empowers it to further extend the period if all the parties agree to that in writing.

17 Subs by Act 36 of 1956, s 11, for 'tribunal' (wef 10-3-1957).

18 Subs by Act 40 of 1951, s 6, for 'of the notice under section 22 ' (wef 26-5-1951).

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 14. Duties of Courts.—

A Court shall inquire into the matters referred to it and report thereon to the appropriate Government ordinarily within a period of six months from the commencement of its inquiry.

LEGISLATION

This section was enacted in the original Act of 1947 and is based on s 5 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929 and it has not undergone any amendment. 'Court' has been defined as a court of inquiry in s 2(f) of the Act.

JURISDICTION AND DUTIES OF COURTS OF INQUIRY

The court acquires jurisdiction on a reference made to it under s 10(1). Courts of inquiry are constituted under s 6 for inquiring into 'any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute'. The procedure and powers of the court have been dealt with under s 11. The duties of a court of inquiry as laid down in s 14 have to be considered in the light of s 11. The first duty of the court is to inquire into the matter referred to it. It is not that all sorts of matters can be referred to the court of inquiry. The language of s 6 makes it clear that such court is constituted for the purpose of inquiring into 'any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute'. In other words, it is only those matters which are appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute that can be referred under s 10(1) to a court of inquiry. The second duty of the court is to make a report to the appropriate Government on the inquiry held by it on the matters referred to it, ordinarily within a period of six months from the date of commencement of the inquiry. The word 'ordinarily' qualifying 'the period of six months' appears to indicate that the period can be extended. Even if the period is not extended, the inquiry made beyond the period of six months will not be rendered illegal as the provision in this respect appears to be only directory.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[20][S. 15. Duties of Labour Courts, Tribunals and National Tribunals.—

Where an industrial dispute has been referred to a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal for adjudication, it shall hold its proceedings expeditiously and shall,[21] [within the period specified in the order referring such industrial dispute or the further period extended under the second proviso to sub-section (2A) of section 10], submit its award to the appropriate Government.]

ADJUDICATORY BODIES UNDER SECTION 15

There are three adjudicatory authorities under the Act, viz:

(i) labour courts

(ii) Industrial tribunals

(iii) National tribunals

These authorities are discharging functions similar to those of courts, although they are not courts in the technical sense of the word.[22] To use a well-known expression they have 'all the trappings of court' and perform functions which cannot but be regarded as judicial.[23] The decisions of these authorities are not 'awards' in the sense in which that term was used in the Arbitration Act 1940. An 'award' under this Act cannot be filed in court, nor is there any provision for applying to the court to set it aside. All considerations that apply to an 'award' under this Act, cannot be said to apply to an award made under the Arbitration Act.[24]

DUTIES OF TRIBUNALS, ETC

The duties of tribunals, etc, under s 15 are threefold:

(i) To hold Proceedings Expeditiously

The whole object of the Act is to ensure peace and harmony in the functioning of industry with a view to achieve maximum industrial productivity. With this object in view, the legislature has enjoined upon the adjudicatory bodies under the Act to hold adjudicatory proceedings expeditiously. As these bodies are not encumbered with the technicalities of procedure under the procedural law or the Evidence Act 1872, the proceedings before them should not involve the delays of the civil courts.

(ii) Adjudication

The adjudicatory authorities, in law, are under a statutory obligation to adjudicate the disputes referred to them by the appropriate Government. This function has to be discharged by them in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Act and the rules framed thereunder. The adjudicator is also under a statutory obligation, to grant relief as it may think fit and proper. He is to exercise jurisdiction conferred on him by making adjudication and such jurisdiction cannot be avoided or relinquished. In Jai Bhagwan, the Supreme Court observed:

> ...the tribunal to whom the dispute has been referred has no discretion to decide whether to adjudicate or not. Once a reference has been properly made to industrial tribunal, the dispute has to be duly resolved by the industrial tribunal. Resolution of the dispute cannot be avoided by the tribunal on the ground that the workman had failed to pursue some other remedy.[25]

This is illustrated by a Division Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court in GN Vohra, wherein the tribunal had refrained from adjudicating the dispute referred to it relating to the dismissal of certain workmen on the ground that they had elected to seek their relief before the labour court under s 33C(2). The High Court quashed the award of the tribunal for failure to exercise the jurisdiction.[26] However, during the course of adjudication before the tribunals occasionally the workmen give up or do not press some of their demands. Consequently, they do not lead any evidence relating to such demands. In the absence of any evidence on record, it would be impossible to adjudicate on the merits of such demands. In such situations, the tribunal has to content itself by recording the statement that the demands were given up or not pressed. This itself will constitute adjudication of the dispute.[27]

(iii) Submission of Award

This section has been amended by the Amending Act 46 of 1982.[28] Sub-section (2A) inserted in s 10 has engrafted the requirements of specifying the period of adjudication in the order of reference. The first proviso to that sub-section has made it incumbent on the adjudicators to submit their awards within a maximum period of three months in cases involving disputes of individual nature. The second proviso has empowered the adjudicators to extend the period of adjudication in their discretion. As a sequel to that amendment, this section has been amended to make it clear that the adjudicators will submit their awards within the period specified in the second proviso to sub-s (2A) of s 10.

JURISDICTION TO ADJUDICATE

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[29][S. 16. Form of Report or Award.—

(1) The report of a Board or Court shall be in writing and shall be signed by all the members of the Board or Court, as the case may be:

Provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to prevent any member of the Board or Court from recording any minute of dissent from a report or from any recommendation made therein.

(2) The award of a Labour Court or Tribunal or National Tribunal shall be in writing and shall be signed by its presiding officer.]

SUB-SECTION (1): REPORT OF BOARD AND COURT

Sub-section (1) makes it incumbent on all members of the Board or a court of inquiry to affix their signatures to the report submitted by them to the appropriate Government. The proviso to this sub-section clarifies the position that the requirement that all members should affix their signatures to the report should not be deemed to imply that any member choosing to dissent from a report or from any recommendation made therein is in any way prevented from doing so. It has already been noticed that a report of the inquiry court is the report about its investigation and a report of the Board is the report about the conciliation proceedings held by it, ie, settlement report or failure report. [See note and comments under s 13 .]

SUB-SECTION (2): AWARD

The term ‘award’ has been defined in s 2(b) of the Act to mean an interim or final ‘determination’ of an industrial dispute or any question relating thereto by a labour court, industrial tribunal or .national industrial tribunal, and includes an arbitration award made under s 10A of the Act.[30] After the evidence of the parties is concluded and all the necessary documents have been put in, the authority to whom the dispute has been referred has to decide the dispute, and embody its decision in the form of an award. In making his award the adjudicator must pay particular attention to certain points which are essential to its validity. Some of the points may be considered in the following order:

(i) Time of making the Award

Sub-section (2A) of s 10 now requires the appropriate Government to specify the period of adjudication in each order of reference. The first proviso to that sub-section requires the adjudicators to submit their awards in cases of the disputes of individual nature, while the second proviso vests the discretion in the adjudicators to extend the period. The award, therefore has to be submitted within the specified or extended time, as the case may be.

(ii) Form of the Award

Sub-section (2) requires that an award made by a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, ‘shall be in writing’ and ‘signed by its presiding officer’. Sub-section (4) of s 10A requires that the award of an arbitrator under that section shall be 'signed by the arbitrator'. The requirement of an arbitral award to be in 'writing' is implicit in this. Further, s 17 requires that such awards are to be published by the appropriate Government. An unsigned award will, therefore, not be operative in law.[31] Furthermore, the award must be signed by the presiding officer who heard the matter. An award heard by one presiding officer, but signed by his successor who did not hear the case at all will be illegal and vitiated for want of jurisdiction because he does not have the authority to sign the award without hearing the case. This will constitute a material irregularity touching the rights of the parties. Such an award will not be an award in the eyes of law.[32] Although such awards are to be in writing, no particular form has been prescribed. However, in preparing an award, care has to be taken to avoid any question arising in the future as to its validity. Broadly, an award usually consists of two parts, viz, (i) the recitals, and (ii) the operative part.

(a) The Recitals

Normally, an award should contain introductory matter by way of recitals. However, it is not necessary for its validity to preface the award with recitals, but in many cases they may be added with advantage, especially where the nature of the award, or certain part of it may be difficult to understand without some preliminary explanation. If recitals are introduced, they should be full and clear, and should be so drawn as to lead up to the operative part of the award. They must also be consistent with the subsequent parts of the award. The following matters may, advantageously be referred to in the recitals where they are included in the awards:

(i) the name of the appropriate Government;

(ii) parties to the dispute;

(iii) existence or apprehension of the dispute between the parties;

(iv) points of dispute specified in the order of reference or any matters relating thereto; and

(v) the subject-matter of reference, namely, the genesis of the dispute.

The fact that the recitals are incorrect or incomplete will not, however, vitiate the award. However, as an inaccurate recital might lead to a misconstruction of the award, it is highly desirable to guard against an error of this kind.

(b) The Operative Part

By operative part of an award is meant the decision of the adjudicator upon the matters in dispute under reference. It is the only real and essential part in an award. It is the duty of the adjudicator or arbitrator to give a decision upon the disputes which have been referred, and, so long as he gives a clear decision, the form or words in which it is expressed are of no importance. However, there are many points to be observed in an order. It may be clear that a full and complete decision has been given, and all the requisites have been satisfied for a valid and binding award.

(iii) Essentials of an Award

Section 10(4) requires that an award of an adjudicator should be confined to the points specified for adjudication in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto. It is, therefore, clear that the jurisdiction of the adjudicator is limited to giving decision upon such points and matters only. He has no authority to investigate other matters or give decision thereon. Hence, where the adjudicator goes beyond such points or matters, his award will not bind the parties so far as it applies to matters outside the order of reference. The award, to the extent it exceeds jurisdiction, will be quashable. The exact effect of such excess of jurisdiction will depend upon the award itself. If it is severable, ie, if that part of the award can be separated from the remainder, the award will be good as to the former part and bad as to the rest; but the good and the bad parts must be severable. If the good and bad parts cannot be separated, the whole award will be bad. The award must be so expressed that parties may know exactly what decision has been given by the adjudicator—Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. In other words, the parties must be able to ascertain from the award what must be done by them to satisfy its requirements. The following are some pertinent points upon which certainties are required in the award:

(i) The parties to be bound by or to perform the award must be certain.

(ii) If the payment of a sum of money by one party to another is directed, the amount to be paid must be specified, or some rule or direction given by which the sum to be paid may be calculated without any doubt.

(iii) If the performance of any conditions or terms is directed by the award, such conditions or terms must be clearly defined, and specific directions should be given as to their proper performance.

(iv) The time for performance of the award, or of any conditions or terms contained therein, must be expressly fixed, or such directions given as will enable the time to be easily determined.

If the award is not certain in its meaning, it will be bad, and it may be remitted to the adjudicator for the uncertainty to be removed unless from its terms a specific and certain meaning can be deduced. An award will not be bad for lack of certainty and held to be inconclusive, if it contains sufficient indications of the intention of the adjudicator. However, it is always preferable to prepare an award in clear and unmistakable terms in the first instance than to risk the consequences of a careless and ill-expressed decision. As a corollary to the rule of certainty, an award must be consistent in all its parts, and not ambiguous or contradictory. It applies, particularly to cases where several items have been referred for adjudication, or where from the nature of the dispute, the award directs the performance of certain terms and conditions. In such cases, care must be taken to see that the findings on the terms and conditions are consistent with one another and with the general implication of the award. The award must determine the points in dispute though such determination may be 'interim' or 'final'.[33] In order to be binding, an award must provide for settlement of all the points referred for adjudication, so that the parties to the dispute are able to know their legal position without having to resort to further judicial inquiry. The award must decide all the points covered by the order of reference and raised by the parties to the reference otherwise it will be vitiated. In deciding the points specified in the order of reference or any matter relating thereto, the tribunal is required to discuss the materials on which it bases its findings. Mere reference to certain documents without indicating as to what they say is not enough. When the materials which are the basis of the findings are not disclosed, it will be open to the reviewing court to examine whether the inference drawn from the undisclosed documents could be reasonably drawn from the materials on record.[34] In addition to deciding the points of reference, the adjudicator must give directions necessary for proper performance to give effect to the decision. The award which lacks necessary directions may be bad on the ground of want of finality. However, any directions that are contrary to the law of the land will render the award bad. Likewise, the directions given beyond the scope of the power of the adjudicator will also be bad for excess of jurisdiction. Finally, the award must be legal and capable of being performed. In other words, it must be physically possible for the parties to perform the award and to perform it without contravening the law. This is similar to the rule of law of contract which requires all contracts to be capable of performance, and to be legal and not contrary to public policy.

(iv) Language of the Award

In making an award it is the duty of the adjudicator not to indulge in language which is not characteristic of judicial approach. Remarks and criticism can be justified only when they are based on facts, but imputation of motives and mala fide to any party to the proceedings is not permissible when the facts of the case do not furnish any basis for the same.[35] The use of strong language may sometimes be permissible in judicial pronouncements, but using strong words without realising their due significance and without considering whether their use is justified is entirely out of place in such pronouncements.[36]

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[37][S. 17. Publication of Reports and Awards.—

(1) Every report of a Board or Court together with any minute of dissent recorded therewith, every arbitration award and every award of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal shall, within a period of thirty days from the date of its receipt by the appropriate Government, be published in such manner as the appropriate Government thinks fit.

(2) Subject to the provisions of section 17A, the award published under sub-section (1) shall be final and shall not be called in question by any court in any manner whatsoever.]

SUB-SECTION (1): PUBLICATION OF AWARD - MANDATORY

The use of the word 'shall' indicates that the requirements of s 17 are mandatory. The intendment becomes clear from the reading of ss 17 and 17A together, that a duty is cast on the Government to publish the award within 30 days of its receipt, and the provision for its publication is mandatory not directory.[38] The principle behind this requirement is that the parties should know the reasons which the tribunal may have recorded in determining the dispute referred to it. It has no authority to withhold the publication on the ground that the findings recorded by the tribunal indicated that the dispute referred to it was not an industrial dispute.[39] In Sirsilk, certain disputes between the employer and the workmen were referred to an industrial tribunal. After adjudication, the tribunal sent its award to the Government for publication. However, before the award was published, the parties to the dispute came to a settlement and accordingly, wrote a letter to the Government jointly, intimating the fact that the dispute had been settled, hence the award should not be published. On the Government's refusal to withhold the publication, the employer approached the High Court for a writ or direction to the Government to withhold the publication. The High Court rejected the writ petition as well as the writ appeal arising therefrom. In appeal, Wanchoo J, on a conspectus of ss 17 and 17A observed, 'It is clear, therefore, reading ss 17 and 17A together that the intention behind s 17(1) is that a duty is cast on the Government to publish the award within 30 days of its receipt and the provision for its publication is mandatory and not merely directory.' Though the Supreme Court maintained that s 17(1) is mandatory, and ordinarily the Government has to publish an award sent to it by the tribunal, in the special circumstances of the case and with a view to avoid a conflict between a settlement binding under s 18(1) and an award binding under s 18(3) on publication, it held that the only solution is to withhold the publication of the award as this would not in any way affect the mandatory provision in s 17(1) of the Act.[40]

In Remington Rand, the award having reached the Government on 14 October 1966, it had to be published latest on the 12 November 1966. However, it was published on 15 November 1966 instead. The award was challenged before the Supreme Court in appeal by special leave on the ground that it was ineffective as it was published after the period of 30 days prescribed by s 17(1) had expired, which was a mandatory requirement of law. While glossing on its observations in Sirsilk, the court observed that those observations merely showed that it was not open to the Government to withhold publication, but it never meant to lay down that the period of time fixed for publication was mandatory. It was, therefore, held that though s 17(1) makes it obligatory on the Government to publish its award, the time-limit of 30 days prescribed therein is merely directory and not mandatory. Mitter J held:

> The limit of time has been fixed as showing that the publication of the award ought not to be held up. But the fixation of the period of 30 days mentioned therein does not mean that the publication beyond that time will render the award invalid. It is not difficult to > think of circumstances when the publication of the award within 30 days may not be possible. For instance, there may be a strike in the press or there may be any other good or sufficient cause by reason of which the publication could not be made within 30 days. If we were to hold that the award would therefore be rendered invalid, it would be attaching undue importance to a provision not in the mind of the legislature. It is well-known that it very often takes a long period of time for the reference to be concluded and the award to be made. If the award becomes invalid merely on the ground of publication after 30 days, it might entail a fresh reference with needless harassment to the parties. The non-publication of the award within the period of 30 days does not entail any penalty and this is another consideration which has to be kept in mind.[41]

The language of s 17(1) does not admit of the dissociation of the requirement of publication from the time-limit prescribed therein. An indication of the legislative intent is that the section does not prescribe any particular mode of publication. The mode of publication is deliberately left to the discretion of the 'appropriate Government' and as such depending on the circumstances, the Government can decide in a particular case the quickest mode of publication. Therefore, the reason that due to a strike in the press, the Government may have to delay publication does not seem to have any relevance to the construction of the section. Nor the fact, that no penalty is prescribed for non-publication within 30 day, any bearing on the question, because there is also no penalty fixed even for non-publication of the award. Besides, the doctrine of 'good and sufficient cause' introduced by Remington Rand is not warranted by the statute. Question arises whether an award can be held to be valid on showing 'good and sufficient cause' even though published after an inordinate delay, say of a year or two? Conversely, can an award published after the delay of a day or two be held to be invalid, if the cause shown is not 'good and sufficient'? What are the norms that the court will bear in mind in determining whether the reasons given by the Government show 'good and sufficient cause'? Then, who is to show 'good and sufficient' cause? Is it the Government who may not be before the court? Or is it the party interested to sustain the award, who may not even be aware of the cause of delay? Furthermore, the holding that for 'good and sufficient cause', publication may be delayed, is apt to be used as a shield for procrastination in publication of awards resulting in hardship to employees and employers. In other words, it will be providing judicial protection to administrative inactions. Besides, delayed publication of awards may lead to anomalous consequences and in certain cases may even frustrate the purpose of the adjudication itself. For these reasons, Remington Rand requires reconsideration.

The NCL-II recommended that, instead of waiting for the publication of the awards in the Official Gazette, awards of the competent court including the labour courts and the labour relations commissions should be deemed to have come into effect unless an appeal is preferred within the prescribed period. The labour courts should be empowered to enforce their own awards as well as the awards of labour relations commissions. They should also be empowered to grant interim relief in cases of extreme hardship. Officials of labour departments at the Centre and the states who are of and above the rank of deputy labour commissioners/regional labour commissioners with ten years experience in the labour department and a degree in law, may be eligible for being appointed as presiding officers of labour courts. The Central and state labour relations commissions should be declared as set up under Art 323-B of the Constitution. The National Commission should be empowered with the powers of the Supreme Court of India.[42]

SUB-SECTION (2): AWARD FINAL AFTER PUBLICATION

Exclusion of Civil Court's Jurisdiction

This sub-section makes the award of an adjudicator final, subject to the provisions of s 17 A which empowers the appropriate Government to reject or modify the award in certain contingencies.[43] Once the award become final, it is sacrosanct and cannot be altered or modified by the parties. Nor would any other court be justified to modify or alter the award by taking a different view of the matter, simply because the status of that court is higher than that of the tribunal whose order has become final. The award can be reviewable only on the recognised grounds of judicial review.[44] The act of rejection or modification of an award under s 17 A is only an administrative act, and not a judicial act. There is no appellate or revisional remedy, against the orders and awards of the adjudicators, provided in the Act. On the other hand, this sub-section expressly makes the award on being published under sub-s (1), as 'final' and not liable to 'be called in question by any court in any manner whatsoever'. The crux of this provision is to oust the jurisdiction of the civil courts to interfere with industrial awards, but in cases where such awards are null and void, civil courts have not hesitated from setting them aside on the theory that such awards are not the 'awards' as contemplated by the Act, hence the provision of s 17, making them final and ousting the jurisdiction of the civil courts would not apply to them.[45] There is a growing tendency to exclude or restrict judicial review by legislative measures, by using the expression like the order 'shall be final' or 'shall not be questioned in any legal proceedings whatsoever' etc. This has resulted in a large body of legislation excluding or restricting judicial review by this device giving the final word to the authority concerned. However, indiscriminate use of such clauses even in cases where no necessity is evident, has made them an 'insidious habit'.[46] The courts, therefore, have penetrated the checkmate by holding that a general finality clause would be insufficient to deprive them of their power to interfere for patent errors of law, jurisdictional defects or violation of the rules of natural justice. In such cases, the ouster clauses have been held to be ineffective 'to abridge or attenuate judicial review',[47] as pointed out by Prof SA de Smith:

> A prominent characteristic of English public law has been the restrictive interpretation given by the superior courts to statutory formulae which, read literally, would have deprived them of their supervisory jurisdiction over inferior tribunals and administrative bodies, a jurisdiction exercised principally by the award of certiorari to quash. It is perhaps paradoxical that they have sometimes held their jurisdiction to be effectively ousted by subjectively worded grants of power to either bodies, while substantially disregarding the plain words of a statute giving the orders and decisions of those bodies the impress of finality.[48]

In England, to begin with, the courts took the ouster clauses at face value. The House of Lords held that such clauses provided an exclusive code of judicial review and, though there is no reference to prohibition and certiorari, prevent recourse to these remedies.[49] In Medical Appeal Tribunal, Lord Denning observed that where the statute said: 'any decision of a claim or question shall be final', certiorari could never be taken away except by most clear and explicit words. The expression 'final' etc only meant 'without appeal' and made the decision 'final only on facts not on law' and certiorari might still issue for excess of jurisdiction or for error of law on the face of the record.[50] In Anisminic, the House of Lords itself took a divergent view from the one it took in East Elloe. In this case, despite the statute providing that a determination of the foreign compensation commission 'shall not be called in question in any court of law', the House unanimously held that though this provision bars any challenge for mere error within jurisdiction, it would not protect any decision which was ultra vires. A majority of the House considered an error which might well have been considered a mere error within jurisdiction, as an error involving excess of jurisdiction for circumventing the ouster clause 'by stretching the doctrine of ultra vires to an extreme point'. Lord Wilberforce pointed out that in holding a 'decision' protected by ouster clause to be nullity, the courts are carrying out the intention of the legislature and it would be a misdescription to speak in terms of a struggle between the courts and the executive. The House made it perfectly clear that nullity is the consequence of all kinds of jurisdictional errors, eg, breach of natural justice, bad faith, failure to deal with the right question and taking wrong matters into account. Furthermore, the similarity of both kinds of ouster clauses was emphasised while rejecting East Elloe as contrary to precedent and principle.[51] Prof Wade has suggested that the result of this striking case was to focus attention on the danger of indiscriminate use of ouster clauses and to 'persuade Parliament to provide limited rights of appeal from the commission to the courts'.[52] It seems that the use of the ouster clause will no longer prevent an order being impugned on the ground that it is made mala fide or on wrong grounds, or is unreasonable, contrary to natural justice or ultra vires in any other way. However, this will have its own anomalous consequences. A solution to the dilemma has been suggested that the principle in Anisminic should only be applied in cases, of absolute ouster clauses and where recourse to court is restricted only after a prescribed time, the eventual barring of legal remedies may be necessary as under a normal statute of limitation, except possibly where an order is ultra vires on its face. Although this merely confirms the long-established law, it should help to resolve the tangle caused by paradoxical suggestion that action in excess of jurisdiction may be 'voidable' as opposed to 'void'. As observed by Lord Reid, there are no degrees of nullity. Thus, it may be possible to reconcile the two extreme views taken by the House of Lords in East Elloe and Anisminic. In the United Kingdom, though the courts disclaim any intention of rebelling against the sovereign legislature and appear to obey it rather than defy it, they take the 'uncompromising stand of holding ouster clauses to be inoperative in every kind of case where the error can be said to go to jurisdiction, artificial as some of these are'.[53]

In Australia, the legislature has made a frequent use of the drastic ouster clauses for keeping the courts of law out of the sphere of labour law. The High Court of Australia has adopted a pragmatic approach of reconciling the obvious intention of such clauses with the equally obvious intention that the powers of the arbitration court shall be legally limited. It would decline to intervene 'where the tribunal has made a bona fide attempt to exercise its authority in a matter relating to the subject with which the legislation deals and capable reasonably of being referred to the powers possessed by the tribunal,[54] Thus, the court refused relief where an appeal board went beyond the question under appeal which it had no power to do,[55] and where the tribunal was said to have exercised its jurisdiction by misconstruing 'lockout,[56] On the other hand, the High Court granted prohibition, in spite of express ouster of judicial remedies, where a board sat without the statutory quorum which was required for it to function validly. In this way a balance appears to have been struck between the 'legislative intention and constitutional logic'. But in Canada the exclusion of the courts from the field of labour law is less successful than in Australia and the decisions there are in the English tradition.[57] In the United States of America, there appears to be a considerable conflict of judicial dicta though, by and large, their approach is comparable to Anisminic case in favour of avoiding the exclusionary power by holding error of law to be jurisdictional.[58] Thus, though in Australia, the approach of the court to exclusionary clauses is resilient, in England, Canada and USA, the courts appear to refuse all compromise of any kind of jurisdictional question as a part of their judicial function.[59]

After the decision of the Supreme Court in Bharat Bank,[60] and Muir Mills,[61]it is established that the orders and awards of industrial adjudicators or the administrative orders of the administrative authorities under the Act are amenable to judicial review because 'the concept of rule of law still assumes that the judicial power of the state extends to review of executive, judicial and quasi-judicial acts, and that any restriction on this power of review is a menace to the rule of law'.[62] The awards of the industrial adjudicators or the orders of the administrative authorities have been made 'final' only on facts and not on law. In other words, the right of an aggrieved person to judicial review is not restricted.[63] Though judicial review of administrative, quasi-judicial or judicial orders would not normally extend to examination of the merits of the action, it would cover its legality on the grounds of jurisdictional defects, errors of law apparent on the face of the record or the violation of the rules of natural justice. However, the legislature has intended that the awards of the adjudicatory authorities shall be 'final' and that such awards shall not be called in question by any court 'in any manner whatsoever'. This intention normally shall not be defeated except in cases where the award of the tribunal is vitiated by errors of law apparent on the face of the record and has resulted in such grave miscarriage of justice as to disturb the conscience of the court or the award is in violation of the principles of natural justice, or is perverse or arbitrary in the sense that it is without any evidence whatsoever or extraneous considerations have gone into the making of the award. Except in such and similar circumstances, the power of judicial review shall not be exercised for the purpose of invalidating an award which is intended to be final and beyond question.[64]

Power to Set Aside an Ex Parte Award

A single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the finality as such does not affect the right of the tribunal to recall the award for reconsideration. What it affects is that so far and so long as it stands, it should not be reopened in any proceeding. In this connection, reference will have to be made to s 17A which lays down that the award shall become enforceable on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication. Therefore, before the expiry of the 30 days, the tribunal has the implied power to recall, in appropriate cases, the awards which have not become enforceable by operation of s 17(1).[65] In Grindlays Bank, the facts disclosed that the ex-parte award was made by the Tribunal on 9 December 1976, which was published by the Government on 25 December 1976. Thus, the said award became enforceable on the expiry of 30 days, ie..., with effect from 25 January 1977. The workman submitted his application for revival on 19 January 1977, and the Tribunal passed the revival order on 12 April 1977. One of the two issues raised was whether the Tribunal becomes functus officio on the expiry of 30 days from the date of publication of the ex parte award under Section 17, by reason of sub-section (3) of Section 20 and was, therefore, deprived of jurisdiction to set aside the award and the appropriate Government alone had the power under s 17-A(1) to set it aside. The Supreme Court observed:

> The contention that the Tribunal had become functus officio and, therefore, had no jurisdiction to set aside the ex parte award and that the Central Government alone could set it aside, does not commend to us. Sub-section (3) of Section 20 of the Act provides that the proceedings before the Tribunal would be deemed to continue till the date on which the award becomes enforceable under Section 17A. Under Section 17A of the Act, an award becomes enforceable on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication under Section 17. The proceedings with regard to a reference under Section 10 of the Act are, therefore, not deemed to be concluded until the expiry of 30 days from the publication of the award. Till then the Tribunal retains jurisdiction over the dispute referred to it for adjudication and up to that date it has the power to entertain an application in connection with such dispute. That stage is not reached till the award becomes enforceable under Section. In the instant case, the Tribunal made the ex parte award on December 9, 1976. That award was published by the Central Government in the Gazette of India dated December 25, 1976. The application for setting aside the ex parte award was filed by respondent 3, acting on behalf of respondents 5 to 17 on January 19, 1977 ie.., before the expiry of 30 days of its publication and was, therefore, rightly entertained by the Tribunal. It had jurisdiction to entertain it and decide it on merits.[66] ()

In Anil Sood, the facts disclosed that the Labour Court had rejected the recall application on the very same ground as of Grindlays Bank, i.e..., that after making the award it became functus officio in the matter. The order of the labour court was challenged before the High Court, which upheld the view of the labour court. In appeal this Court noted that the award was made on 11 September 1995 and the application for its recall was filed on 06 November 1995. The Court referred to the earlier decision in Grindlays Bank and the provisions of s 11(2) & (3) of the Act and held:

> The aspect that the party against whom award is to be made due opportunity to defend has to be given is a matter of procedure and not that of power in the sense in which the language is adopted in Section 11. When matters are referred to the Tribunal or Court they have to be decided objectively and the Tribunals/Courts have to exercise their discretion in a judicial manner without arbitrariness by following the general principles of law and Rule s of natural justice.. .. The power to proceed ex parte is available under Rule 22 of the Central Rules which also includes the power to inquire whether or not there was sufficient cause for the absence of a party at the hearing, and if there is sufficient cause shown which prevented a party from appearing, then if the party is visited with an award without a notice which is a nullity and therefore the Tribunal will have no jurisdiction to proceed and consequently, it must necessarily have power to set aside the ex parte award.. .. If this be the position in law, both the High Court and the Tribunal (sic Labour Court) fell into an error in stating that the Labour Court had become functus officio after making the award though ex parte. We set aside the order made and the award passed by the Labour Court and affirmed by the High Court in > this regard, in view of the fact that the learned counsel for the respondent conceded that application filed by the appellant be allowed, set aside the ex parte award and restore the reference. [67] (Paras 6, 7 & 8)

It is submitted that Grindlays Bank itself was wrongly decided in so far as the facts of the case revealed that the award was already published by the Government at the time when the proceeding was restored. Having stated the principle of law correctly, Sen J, misapplied the said legal principle to the case at hand, for the reason that as on the date the tribunal passed the order, the award was already in force for over two months. The reasoning of Sen J, in that case that the Tribunal had the power to revive the proceeding, in view of the fact that the workman filed his application before the expiry of 30 days u/s. 20 of IDA, is clearly misplaced. What is critical is not so much the date on which the workman submitted his application as the date on which the award became enforceable. In that case, the award became enforceable on 25 January 1977, whereas the Tribunal passed the order on 12 April 1977, i.e.., two and half months after the award became enforceable. Applying the provisions of the Act and the settled law on the point, what was the legal status of the Tribunal on and after 25 January 1977 in so far as the said award was concerned? Could it be said that the Tribunal remained alive to the said reference or did it become functus officio? The answer can unmistakably and manifestly be in favour of the latter. Thus, the decision rendered in Grindlays Bank was a product of misapplication of law and is clearly wrong.

Adverting to Anil Sood, which followed Grindlays Bank, the facts disclosed that the award was submitted on September 11, whereas the application for setting the said award aside was filed in November, i.e..., two months later, which admittedly implies that the award was published by the Government on or before October 11 in terms of the mandatory provision in s. 17, and that it came into force or was in the process of coming into force. Further, it was a case where the party did not enter appearance before the Tribunal despite notice, with the result he was set ex parte. Both the above decisions deserve to be assailed for propounding that the Tribunal has the power to set aside an award even after the expiry of 30 days after its publication by the Government. It is one thing to say that the Tribunal does not become functus officio after submitting the award, and quite another to suggest that it continues to enjoy the power to set aside the award after it had come into operation. Such an interpretation of law militates against the very objects of IDA. Once the award is published, the decision of the tribunal stands 'made public' with the further implication that the dispute has been conclusively adjudicated by a competent authority. The only exception to this position is where the Government simultaneously publishes another notice u/s. 17-A stating that the award so published u/s. 17 would not come into force on the expiry of 30 days, for certain extraordinary reasons, which is an exception to the normal rule. Even in such a rare of the rarest eventuality, the tribunal has no power to recall the award because, once the award is published, the matter passes into the absolute jurisdiction of the appropriate Government as provided for in s. 17-A. The facts of the case did not disclose publication of any second notice by the Government u/s. 17-A withholding the operation of the award. In these circumstances, what remains after the publication of the award u/s. 17 is nothing but the enforcement of the award, even if it was found that the award was, or had to be, passed ex parte, and it cannot be permitted to be set aside by the same Tribunal merely because the defaulting party had shown sufficient cause. If it was found that the Tribunal adjudicated the dispute arbitrarily without putting a party to notice, then the right course for the aggrieved party is to get it quashed in a writ proceeding, instead of permitting the tribunal to meddle with the award after it came into force. If, on the other hand, it was found that the party did not choose to appear even after being put it on notice and after granting sufficient number of adjournments, then the defaulter should not be allowed to gain an undue advantage from his own wrong. It is submitted that Grindlays Bank and Anil Sood were wrongly decided and require review. However, in Ajit Singh, a single judge of Punjab & Haryana High Court held that the Labour Court would become functus officio on the expiry of 30 days after the publication of the award, and hence the order passed by it setting aside the ex parte award after that period would be invalid.[68]Ajit Singh lays down the correct law as against Grindlays Bank and Anil Sood.

At this point it is necessary to draw the attention of the reader to the observation made by SB Sinha J, in Sangham Tape Co, while referring to the decision of Sen J, in Grindlays Bank. In Sangham Tape Co, the question relating to the "power of the tribunal to recall an ex parte award after the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication" had once again come up for the consideration of the apex court. SB Sinha J (for self and Hegde J), categorically held that the tribunal had no power to recall the award once it became enforceable u/s 17A. The learned judge admittedly relied upon Grindlays Bank (supra) as can be discerned from the following passage:

> In view of this Court's decision in Grindlays Bank (supra), such jurisdiction could be exercised by the Labour Court within a limited time frame, namely, within thirty days from the date of publication of the award. Once an award becomes enforceable in terms of Section 17A of the Act, the Labour Court or the Tribunal, as the case may be, does not retain any jurisdiction in relation to setting aside of an award passed by it. In other words, upon the expiry of 30 days from the date of publication of the award in the gazette, the same having become enforceable, the Labour Court would become functus officio.[69]

The reliance placed by Sinha J, on Grindlays Bank calls for some analysis. For this purpose, it is necessary to re-state the facts of Grindlays Bank, as admitted by Sen J, which, briefly, are:

(i) The Central Government made a reference of the dispute to the Tribunal on July 26, 1975;

(ii) The Tribunal, by a notice dated March 6, 1976 fixed peremptory hearing of the reference for May 28, 1976, but the hearing was adjourned from time to time on one ground or the other;

(iii) The final hearing of the reference was fixed by the Tribunal for December 9, 1976;

(iv) Counsel for the employees' association requested for adjournment on the ground that the General Secretary of the Association suffered bereavement of his father who died on November 25, and that he was required to perform the Shraddha ceremony of the departed soul, and also produced a telegram to that effect;

(v) Despite the genuineness of the request, duly supported by evidence to that effect, the tribunal rejected its request for adjournment and decided to proceed ex parte;

(vi) The award was made and submitted to the Government, which was published on December 25, 1976 u/s. 17;

(vii) The Government did not publish a second notice withholding the operation of the award, with the result, the decision of the Tribunal thus came into public domain and the award was destined to come into force on the expiry of 30 days, i.e..., with effect from January 25, 1977,

(viii) The Employees' Association filed a petition before the Tribunal on January 19, 1977, on the ground that they were prevented by sufficient cause from appearing on the day of final hearing on December 9, 1976;

(ix) The said application was admitted by the tribunal; and

(x) The tribunal passed its order on April 12, 1977 setting aside the award. (Italics supplied)

Sen J, categorically held that the Tribunal becomes functus officio on the expiry of 30 days from the date of the publication of the award. The learned judge discussed elaborately the provisions of IDA and Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 —'CPC' in short) in his judgment, but failed to realise that his final conclusion was diametrically opposite to the principle enunciated by him in the same case! The decision proper rendered by Sen J, in Grindlays Bank calls for some analysis on the anvil of the legal principle enunciated by himself in the same case. Once the award is published by the Government u/s 17, and no further action is taken by it either modifying or rejecting the award under the Proviso to s 17A (1) r/w the other provisions thereof, the legal consequences of publication would automatically follow, i.e..., the dispute stood finally determined and the award comes into force on the expiry of 30 days, in this case, on 25 January 1977. The recall petition was filed by the Association at the fag-end of the interregnum, i.e..., 19 January 1977—less than a week before the scheduled enforcement of the award. The Tribunal passed its order on 12 April 1977 setting the said ex parte award aside. In other words, as on the date of setting aside the award, the award was not only in public domain, but was also in force for over two months. In the face of this factual and legal position, could it be said that, even as early as 26 January 1977—not to speak of 12 April 1977—the Tribunal had the power to recall and set aside the award? What made the Tribunal to take a right-about-turn within a span of 40 days and persuade itself that there was sufficient cause, which self-same cause did not appeal to its judicial mind when the request was first made to it on 6 December 1976, in face of an ardent plea made by counsel for Association, duly substantiated by a telegram? Why did the Tribunal refuse to grant the adjournment in the first instance and why did it grant the same request later, when there was no change in the circumstances between 9 December 1976 and 19 January 1977? If this is not an abuse of power by the Tribunal, what else could it be? In such a situation, what is the duty of the Supreme Court, more so, in the light of the fact that the award came into force some 80 days before it was set aside? Should it close its eyes and passively condone the approbation and reprobation on the part of the Tribunal or should it uphold the rule of law, given the fact that the award had major implications for the disputing parties? Could it still be said that the final decision of Sen J, in Grindlays Bank was consistent with the principle enunciated by him in the same case? Under what provision of law did the Government comply with the recall order passed by the Tribunal, when it was fully aware of the fact that the award published by it had started producing its legal consequences? What was the justification for Sen J, to travel beyond the four walls of the law, and uphold a patent illegality attributable to the Tribunal? Answers to these questions are too obvious to need elaboration. Reverting to Sangham Tape Co, the decision of Sinha J, and the ratio enunciated therein are beyond the pale of attack, but his observation to the effect that Grindlays Bank was rightly decided, is a travesty of truth.[70]

In Radhakrishna Mani Tripathi, the facts briefly were: In an industrial dispute concerning the termination of service of a workman, the Labour Court passed an ex parte award in favour of the workman on 12 June 1998 directing his reinstatement with full back wages and continuity in service. The award was made after taking evidence (ex parte) led on behalf of the appellant. It was published on 05 August 1998. On 29 January 1999 employer filed a petition before the Labour Court making a prayer for recall of the award, on the ground that no notice was served on him and he was not aware of the proceedings before the Labour Court; and that he came to know about the matter only on 27 January 1999 on receiving a copy of the award sent to him by the Court. After a full dressed hearing on the recall petition the Tribunal found and held, vide order dated 12 July 2005, that the workman obtained the order for ex parte hearing of the reference by knowingly suppressing the correct address of respondent No. 1 and as a result the notice issued by the Labour Court was never served on him. In light of the finding, the Labour Court recalled its earlier award dated 12 June 1998 and fixed the matter for fresh hearing. The workman filed a writ petition in the Bombay High Court challenging the order of Labour Court setting aside the award. The High Court dismissed the writ petition and confirmed the order passed by the Labour Court. One of the issues was whether there was any conflict between r. 26(2) of Industrial Disputes (Bombay) Rules 1957 and s 17(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947. The said Rule runs thus:

> (2) Where any award, order or decisions made ex parte under sub-rule (1), the aggrieved party, may within thirty days of the receipt of a copy thereof, make an application to the Board, Court, Labour Court, Tribunal or an Arbitrator, as the case may be, to set aside such award, order or decision. If the Board, Court, Labour Court, Tribunal or Arbitrator is satisfied that there was sufficient cause for non-appearance of the aggrieved party, it or he may set aside the award, order or decisions so made and shall appoint a date for proceeding with the matter:
> Provided that, no award, order or decision shall be set aside on any application as aforesaid unless notice thereof has been served on the opposite party.

In appeal, Aftab Alam J surveyed the decisions rendered in Grindlays Bank and Anil Sood, and dismissed the appeal holding that the labour court does not become functus officio after submission of the award, and further observed that there was no conflict between r 26(2) of Bombay Rules and s 17A(1) of the Act.[71] In South Seas Distillaries, the facts disclosed that the employer did not appear even once before the conciliation officer during the pendency of conciliation proceedings despite sever letters having been sent to him nor did he present before the labour court despite notice resulting in the labour court passing an ex parte award. The employer filed an application before the labour court after a lapse of five months for setting aside the said award, which was rejected by the labour court. In writ proceedings, the Bombay High Court held that the labour court was right in rejecting the application, and observed that no case was made out by the petitioner-employer to interfere with the order of labour court.[72] In Tamil Nadu KVIB, the a single judge of Madras High Court held that the labour court becomes functus officio on the expiry of 30 days from the date of publication of the award, and that an application for setting aside the ex parte made, if made after the expiry of 30 days from the date of publication, was not maintainable.[73] In Stallion Garments, the facts briefly were: some 20 temporary workers remained absent unauthorisedly for several months, whereafter the management relieved them from their duties in June 2004. Thereafter they obstructed the premises of the company in a riotous manner, about which a police complaint was lodged and also obtained an interim injunction from the District Munsif against the workers from disturbing the peaceful running of the factory. After the said order, 17 out of 20 workers resigned from service, but a few raised an industrial dispute against the termination. It is stated that the summons sent by the labour court were received by one of the staff of the employer, who did not bring the same to the knowledge of the employer, and the employer was set ex parte and the award was passed on 28 May 2005. The ex parte award came to be known to the employer when the workmen sent letters on 26 June 2006 seeking employment based on the award and thereafter, the management filed application to set aside the ex parte award and also to condone the delay of 262 days. The labour court dismissed the petitions on the ground that it had become functus officio. Allowing the appeal a single judge of Madras High Court followed the ratio of Anil Sood and Radhakrishna Tripathi (supra) and held that the very ex parte award passed by the labour court was without application of mind and further observed that, in the circumstances of the case, the labour court could not be said to become functus officio.[74]

In Janakiram Mills, the facts were: the management terminated the service of a watchman, who had put in some 12 years service, without any charge-sheet or enquiry. The resultant dispute was referred for adjudication. Before the Labour Court, the parties have filed their respective statements. The workman marked 10 documents and examined himself, after the Management was set ex-parte. The Labour Court did not pass an award on merits and, instead, held that the Management was set ex-parte and claim of the workmen was proved, passed the award on 23 October 2010. In the writ petition, the management contended that (i) it was not an award, (ii) that it had received the copy of the award only in February 2011, (iii) since the award came into force by that time, it did not file a petition under s 11 of the Act r/w rule 48 of ID (Tamil Nadu) Rules to recall the award as it would serve no purpose, and (iv) hence, it approached the High Court. Allowing the writ petition, Vaidyanathan J of Madras High Court cited the decisions rendered in Andhra Handloom Weavers,[75] and United Transformers,[76] and observed:

> "The Courts have held that "dismissal for default" is not an award. If the contention of the Management has to be accepted that the labour Court has become functus officio and hence after the award has come into force they have approached this Court, all the > Management would wait for the award to come into force and thereafter file a writ petition stating that they have no remedy and the period mentioned under the Rules has expired.. .. It is a well settled law that mere absence of workman or the Union does not absolve the Labour Court or Tribunal from proceeding with a reference referred to it and making the award. . ., the Tribunal or Labour Court has to adjudicate on the dispute and not just close or end the proceedings before it by any method which does not involve adjudication or resolution of the dispute referred to. .. a technical termination of the proceedings does not serve the purpose of the reference or the object of the Act, 1947. Similar view is applicable to the dispute under the amended provisions. In case, the party to the proceeding fails to attend or to be represented, the Labour Court or Tribunal will have to proceed with the Industrial Dispute as if the party had duly attended or had been represented.. .. Based on the materials available on record, the Tribunal will have to pass an award on merits. In case, an ex-parte award is passed, the matter can be reopened and I.D can be restored if an application is filed before the award has come into force. If the award has come into force, the Tribunal or the Labour Court will become functus officio."[77]

In Birla Cotton, the facts briefly were: the tribunal, having submitted the consent award, recalled it on the application made by certain other unions which alleged that the settlement reached before the conciliation officer was not fair and just. Accordingly, the tribunal framed an additional issue for review, i.e.., "whether the settlement was fair and just". The writ petition filed by the management was admitted by the Delhi High Court and the reliefs prayed for were granted. In appeal by the union, inter alia, two questions touching upon the power of quasi-judicial tribunals i.e.., (i) procedural review, and (ii) review on merits, came up for the consideration of Supreme Court. Dismissing the appeal, Singh J (for self, Hegde and Sinha JJ) of the Supreme Court observed:

> .. . different considerations arise on review. The expression 'review' is used in the two distinct senses, namely (1) a procedural review which is either inherent or implied in a court or Tribunal to set aside a palpably erroneous order passed under a mis-apprehension by it, and (2) a review on merits when the error sought to be corrected is one of law and is apparent on the face of the record.. .. no review lies on merits unless a statute specifically provides for it. Obviously when a review is sought due to a procedural defect, the inadvertent error committed by the Tribunal must be corrected ex debit justitiae to prevent the abuse of its process, and such power inheres in every court or Tribunal.. .. it is apparent that where a Court or quasi judicial authority having jurisdiction to adjudicate on merit proceeds to do so, its judgment or order can be reviewed on merit only if the Court or the quasi judicial authority is vested with power of review by express provision or by necessary implication. The procedural review belongs to a different category. In such a review, the Court or quasi judicial authority having jurisdiction to adjudicate proceeds to do so, but in doing so commits a procedural illegality which goes to the root of the matter and invalidates the proceeding itself, and consequently the order passed therein. Cases where a decision is rendered by the Court or quasi judicial authority without notice to the opposite party or under a mistaken impression that the notice had been served upon the opposite party, or where a matter is taken up for hearing and decision on a date other than the date fixed for its hearing, are some illustrative cases in which the power of procedural review may be invoked.. .. The order passed is liable to be recalled and reviewed not because it is found to be erroneous, but because it was passed in a proceeding which was itself vitiated by an error of procedure or mistake which went to the root of the matter and invalidated the entire proceeding.. .. The recall of the Award of the Tribunal was sought not on the ground that in passing the Award the Tribunal had committed any procedural illegality or mistake of the nature which vitiated the proceeding itself and consequently the Award, but on the ground that some matters which ought to have been considered by the Tribunal were not duly considered. Apparently the recall or review sought was not a procedural review, but a review on merits. Such a review was not permissible in the absence of a provision in the Act conferring the power of review on the Tribunal either expressly or by necessary implication. (Paras 18-20) (Italics supplied).

On the question 'whether there was a conciliation proceeding' and 'whether the settlement reached between the parties could be said to be a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings', the learned judge observed:

> .. . The settlement itself recites the fact that there were series of bipartite and tripartite meetings between the representatives of the Management and the Unions in view of the labour unrest and threat of closing down the operation of the weaving department. Meetings were also held in the office of the Chief Labour Commissioner with a view to resolve the dispute and a meeting was thereafter held on May 17, 1983 in the office of Shri K. Saran, Joint Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) where the representatives of the Management and the Unions participated alongwith the officers of the Labour Department which ultimately resulted in a settlement. All these facts establish beyond doubt that there was labour unrest and the Conciliation Officer intervened in the matter and made attempts to bring about a settlement. The submission, therefore, that no conciliation proceeding was in progress when the settlement was arrived at, must be rejected.[78] ()

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Legislation

The orders and actions of authorities under this Act are reviewable in writ jurisdiction under Art. 32 & 226 and in superintendent jurisdiction under Art 227 and special appeal jurisdiction under Art 136. The writ jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art 32 can only be invoked for enforcing the 'fundamental rights' while the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226 can be invoked not only for enforcing 'fundamental rights' but 'for any other purposes' as well.[79] The 42nd amendment of the Constitution substituted a new Art 226 for the old one. In the new Article, the words 'for any other purposes' appearing in cl (1) of the old Article did not find any place. The remedies of directions, orders or writs mentioned in this article were available apart from the enforcement of the fundamental rights, for redressal of any injury of a substantial nature by reason of contravention of any other provision or any provision of any enactment or ordinance or any order, rule, regulation, by-law or other instrument made therein or for the redressal of any injury by reason of any illegality in any proceedings by or before any authority, under any such law where illegality has resulted in substantial failure of justice.[80]

Two new articles namely, Arts 133A and 226 A were introduced, which prohibited the High Courts from considering the constitutional validity of any Central law in any proceedings. Under Art 226, the jurisdiction in regard to a question as to validity of such laws was exclusively vested in the Supreme Court by Art 131A. Clause (3) of the new Art 226 prohibited the High Courts from entertaining petitions under that Article for redress of any injury referred to in sub-cl (b) or sub-cl (c) of cl (1) thereto, if any other remedy for such redress was provided by or under any other law for the time being in force. Clause (4) prohibited the High Courts from granting interim injunctions or stay orders unless (i) copies of writ petitions and all relevant documents were served on the opposite side and (ii) the opportunity was given to the opposite side of being heard in the matter. Clause (5) gave discretion to the High Court to dispense with the requirements of cl (4) in exceptional cases where the threatened injury could not be adequately compensated in money. Such interim order was, however, to stand vacated on the expiry of 14 days unless before that the opposite party was served with the writ petition and the relevant documents and was heard. Clause (6) proscribed grant of an interim order by way of injunction, stay or otherwise which would have the effect of delaying an inquiry into a matter of public importance. Article 227 was also substituted, partially restricting the High Courts' jurisdiction taking away its superintendence over 'tribunals'. By s 58 of the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act 1978, special provisions were made as to the pending petitions under Art 226. Then by the Constitution (43rd Amendment) Act 1977,[81] Arts 133A and 226 A were omitted and consequential amendments were made in Art 226. Shortly afterwards, by the Constitution (44th Amendment) Act 1978, Art 226, was amended again. Clause (1) of Art 226 was substituted by the present cl (1) which has again made the Constitutional remedies available 'for any other purpose', apart from the enforcement of fundamental rights. The ban of an alternative remedy in the previous cl (3) has also been removed and the procedure with respect to the interim stay orders or injunctions too has been modified, by substituting the previous cll (3), (4), (5) and (6) by the present cl (3). In Art 227, the previous cl (1) has been substituted by the present clause which restores the superintendence of the High Courts on 'tribunals'. Clause (5) of this article was omitted.[82]The effect of 44th Amendment is that the law has substantially been restored to its ante Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act 1976.

The scope of the jurisdiction of the writ courts to interfere with the orders and awards of the industrial adjudicators and to give appropriate relief to the aggrieved parties is very wide and comprehensive. However, this jurisdiction will not lend itself to aid a party when the relief prayed for raises a triable issue, such as, the issue of limitation in which case it would be best to leave the party to seek its remedy by the ordinary mode of action in a civil court.[83] The phrase 'for any other purpose', used in Art 226 is to be understood to mean 'for any other purpose for which any of the writs would, according to the well established principles, issue'.[84] The jurisdiction of the writ courts to issue directions, orders or writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari is quite wide, which confers on it an extensive discretion with the possible limitation that the discretion has to be exercised in accordance with well-established judicial principles and only on judicial considerations and not arbitrarily.[85] Therefore relief by way of appropriate writs or orders, cannot, generally be refused on an application under Art 226 on the ground that the particular relief, which the applicant was found entitled to has not been claimed by him.[86]Apart from the Government and its departments, such directions, orders or writs can be issued to other persons and authorities as well. A detailed treatment of such authorities is beyond the scope of this work, as it concerns itself only with the authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act.

Authorities under the Act

The authorities under this Act whose awards, orders or acts are generally exposed to judicial review are:

(i) The Appropriate Government

Since the state intervention permeates the scheme of the Industrial Disputes Act, the role of the Government is dominant in the statute. Its orders under various provisions of the Act, therefore, though of administrative nature, are reviewable by writ courts if they breach the fundamental rights or are made mala fide or are ultra vires the constitutional or statutory limitations. The finality conferred by the statute will not stand in the way of their judicial review.

(ii) Conciliation Officers, Board of Conciliation and Court of Inquiry

Section 12(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act confers discretion on the conciliation officer to decide whether he shall hold conciliation proceedings or not excepting cases where the dispute relates to a public utility service and a notice under s 22 has been given in which case, it is mandatory to hold conciliation proceedings. The statute makes a clear distinction between disputes relating to public utility service concerns and other concerns by using the words 'may' in the former case and 'shall' in the latter.[87] In the former case, there is no obligation cast on the conciliation officer to undertake the conciliation proceedings. Hence, there is no room for the issue of a writ of mandamus to a conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings. However, in a public utility service, it is incumbent on the conciliation officer to hold conciliation proceedings when notice under s 22 has been given. However, if such notice has not been given, the conciliation officer is not bound to hold the conciliation proceedings. Hence, he cannot be compelled by mandamus to hold conciliation proceedings unless such notice has been given.[88] A single judge of the Delhi High Court, held that there is no legal duty cast on the conciliation officer to intervene in the matter till some action is taken against the workman and the workman has a grievance to that extent. Therefore, a conciliation officer cannot be compelled to intervene before any dispute has arisen between the parties by a writ of mandamus.[89]

The function of a conciliation officer under s 12 is of a purely administrative character and not of quasi-judicial nature because he is not under a duty to act judicially and he cannot give a decision on the merits of the dispute. His task is one of discussion, advice and persuasion for thrashing out the various points of dispute in the presence of the parties for enabling them to come to a fair and amicable settlement. A settlement arrived at during the course of conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer is not quashable on certiorari as it is an act of the parties to the settlement in which the conciliation officer only uses his good offices to induce the parties to come to a settlement. It is neither an order passed by the conciliation officer nor a decision recorded by him. Even a writ of mandamus cannot be issued to a conciliation officer.[90] In Jaswant Sugar, the Supreme Court held that a conciliation officer acting under s 33 of the Act for the purposes of according or refusing 'permission' is not a tribunal within the meaning of Art 136. Hence an appeal against such decision of the conciliation officer is not competent. However, the court left the question whether such an order would be reviewable by writ courts, undecided, with the observation that this function of the conciliation officer is of quasi-judicial nature.[91] A Full Bench of Gujarat High Court in Testeels, has however, held that the decision of the conciliation officer under s 33 being of a quasi-judicial nature is amenable to the jurisdiction of the writ court under Art 226. Hence, the conciliation officer is bound to make a speaking order in this capacity, in other words, he must give reasons for his order.[92]

The board of conciliation can conciliate upon an 'industrial' dispute, only after a reference is being made under s 10(1)(a) of the Industrial Disputes Act. However, the reference is only for the purpose of 'promoting a settlement' of the dispute. The functions of the board, therefore, are analogous to those of the conciliation officer. Any settlement brought about with the mediation of the board will neither be by an order nor a decision of the board. It will purely be an agreement between the parties and not the 'result of any quasi-judicial proceedings. Therefore, such a settlement, will not be quashable on certiorari. Though a board may be severed a unit of mandamus to act under s 13 to promote a settlement of the dispute, no mandamus can be issued to it for the implementation or non-implementation of a settlement which is purely an agreement between the parties. A court of inquiry is constituted for the purpose of 'inquiring into any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to an industrial dispute'. It can, however, take cognizance of such a matter for inquiry, only when the appropriate Government refers such a matter to it under s 10(1) (b) of the Act. The court of inquiry is, therefore, nothing more than a fact finding body and its' findings will not have the character of a decision of the dispute or any matter appearing to be connected with or relevant to the dispute. On receiving the findings of the court of inquiry, the Government may consider the question, whether or not to make a reference under s 10(1)(a). If however, the court of inquiry does not investigate the matter referred to it, it may be issued a writ of mandamus to discharge its statutory functions.

(iii) Labour Courts, Industrial Tribunals and National Tribunals

It is now well-settled that the functions of these adjudicatory authorities are of quasi-judicial nature.[93] Their orders and awards, therefore, are reviewable by the High Court in their jurisdiction under Art 226 and by the Supreme Court in its appellate jurisdiction under Art 136. However, whenever a reference is made by the appropriate Government to a tribunal, it has to be presumed ordinarily that there is a genuine 'industrial dispute' between the parties which requires to be resolved by adjudication. An attempt, therefore, should be made by the reviewing courts to sustain as far as possible the awards made by the tribunals instead of differing on trivial points in the awards and ultimately, frustrating the entire adjudicating process by striking down the awards on hyper-technical grounds.[94] However, it is open to a party to show that what has been referred to the tribunal for adjudication is not an industrial dispute at all and, therefore, the jurisdiction of the tribunal to make the award can be questioned even though the factual existence of a dispute may not be subject to a party's challenge.[95] Therefore, when the orders and awards suffer from jurisdictional defects, errors of law apparent on the face of record or violation of the rules of natural justice, they may be quashed on certiorari. Section 10(4) of the Industrial Disputes Act prescribes the perimeter of the jurisdiction of the adjudicatory authorities by laying down that they shall confine their jurisdiction to the points specified in the order of reference and matters incidental thereto. If these authorities transgress these limitations, their orders again will be quashable on certiorari as ultra vires. Furthermore, if these authorities are constituted without complying with the requirements of ss 7 to 7B or their presiding officers suffer from any of the disqualifications envisaged by these provisions and s 7C, their continuance in office may be challenged by a writ of quo warranto and their orders and awards may be quashed on certiorari for want of jurisdiction and the proceedings before them may be arrested by a writ of prohibition. These authorities, for the purposes of this discussion, hereinafter are, compendiously referred to as tribunal.

(iv) Arbitrators

An award of an arbitrator under s 10A is amenable to judicial review by a writ court under Art 226. However, an arbitrator under this section is not 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art 136 or Art 227. Hence, an arbitral award under this section is neither amenable to the superintendence of a High Court under Art 227 nor appealable under Art 136.[96]

Judicial Remedies

The Act has not provided any statutory remedies against the orders or awards of industrial authorities. An aggrieved party, therefore, has to resort to non-statutory or Constitutional judicial remedies for seeking redress against such orders and awards. The principal Constitutional remedies are writs and appeals. Articles 32 and 226 empower the Supreme Court and the High Courts respectively to issue directions, orders or writs including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, and certiorari for enforcement of the fundamental rights or for any other purpose. Articles 133 & 136 vest the Supreme Court with ordinary and special appellate jurisdiction. The writs in the nature of certiorari, prohibition, mandamus, and quo warranto are generally resorted to in dealing with industrial matters while the writ in the nature of habeas corpus has no relevance in this branch of law. In case, where the complaint is 'for other purpose' than the breach of fundamental rights, an aggrieved person has to petition the High Court under Art 226 or Art 227 in whose territorial jurisdiction, the authority resides or the cause of action has taken place. In Re Eastern Coalfields, it was held that the Calcutta High Court has territorial jurisdiction to entertain a writ petition against the order of the Labour Court, Dhanbad which was served on the petitioner within the jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court.[1] Likewise in Vasudeva Rao, the Karnataka High Court held that if not wholly, a substantial part of the cause of action had arisen in the State of Karnataka, therefore, it had jurisdiction to entertain the writ petition.[2]

In cases of complaints against the breach of fundamental rights, apart from approaching such a High Court, an aggrieved person may also directly approach the Supreme Court under Art 32. However, in cases where a person has petitioned the High Court under Art 226 or Art 227, the petition may be heard by a single judge Bench or a larger Bench. In case, the petition is decided by a single judge, a writ appeal,[3] will lie to a Division Bench. Such appeals are permissible under the relevant clauses of the letters patent of the various High Courts. In an appeal under cl 15 of the letters patent of the chartered High Courts from the judgment (within the meaning of the term as used in that clause) of a single judge of the High Court, an appeal lies to the Division Bench of that High Court and there is no qualification or limitation as to the nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the single judge while passing his judgment, provided an appeal is not barred by any statute and provided that the conditions laid down in that clause itself are fulfilled. An intra court appeal against the judgment of a single judge in a petition under Art 226 is permissible as an intra court appeal against the judgment of a single judge. In other words, under the letters patent clauses of the High Courts, the decision of a single judge in writ jurisdiction under Art 226 is appealable to the Division Bench of that High Court.[4] In a letters patent appeal against the decision of the single judge, there is no limitation that the letters patent appeal bench can hear only a question of law under s 100, CPC. The entire matter on the questions of fact and law is open before the appellate bench.[5] The Division Bench may interfere with the holding of the single judge if he has misdirected himself while considering the evidence and takes into consideration matters which were not germane to the issues involved.

A finding based on a proposition militating against a long line of judicial dicta of the Supreme Court would be liable to be interfered with by the Division Bench. Where the single judge upheld the view of the labour court that the main and substantial work of a medical representative falls under the categories manual, technical or clerical, was held to be wrong in view of his own observations that the main work was canvassing and promoting sales.[6]Against the order or judgment of the Division Bench or the larger Bench, an appeal by a certificate under Art 133 will lie to the Supreme Court as the proceedings of the High Court arising out of the actions, orders and awards of the authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act are civil proceedings. If the High Court refuses to grant certificate under Art 133, an aggrieved party may move the Supreme Court by a petition under Art 136 for special leave to appeal. A party aggrieved by an order or award of an industrial authority may also directly petition the Supreme Court under Art 136 for special leave to appeal. The scope of appeal under Art 136 directly against the orders and awards of the industrial adjudicator is much wider than that of the High Court under Art 226. Hence, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in direct appeal, under Art 136, from the orders and awards of the industrial tribunal is much wider than its jurisdiction under Art 133 against the orders and judgments of the High Court in writ petitions against the orders or awards of such tribunals. In an appeal under Art 136, the Supreme Court can go into questions of facts as well as law in appropriate cases; whereas, the High Court in its writ jurisdiction and Supreme Court in its appellate jurisdiction under Art 133, can only consider questions which are strictly relevant for the writ court. An appeal, under Art 136, can succeed even if no case is made out for the issue of a writ.[7] However, if the appeal under Art 136 is against an order or judgment of the High Court in a writ petition, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court will be the same as that of the High Court in dealing with the writ petition.

(i) Certiorari and Prohibition

(a) In General

In challenging the orders and awards of the authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act, a composite prayer asking for certiorari and prohibition is generally advantageous. Since these two writs have many common characteristics, they are discussed together. Certiorari is, historically, an extraordinary legal remedy and is corrective in nature. It is used in the form of an order by a superior court to an inferior civil tribunal which deals with civil rights of persons and which is a public authority, to certify the records of any proceedings of the latter, to review the same.[8] This remedy arises on principle from the superintending authority which the superior court possesses and exercises over the inferior jurisdiction as the delegate of the sovereign.[9] 'Certiorari lies, on the application of a person aggrieved, to bring the proceedings of an inferior tribunal before the High Court for review so that the court can determine whether they shall be quashed, or to quash such proceedings. It will issue to quash a determination for excess or lack of jurisdiction, error of law on the face of the record or breach of the rules of natural justice, or where the determination was procured by fraud, collusion or perjury'.[10] The dictum of Lord Atkin LJ, delineating the scope of certiorari and prohibition, [11] despite certain in-built incongruities, has become classic, and the subsequent law found its stem and branches from the roots in the phrases used in it. The statement reads:

> Wherever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority, they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the king's bench division exercised in these writs.[12]

In the celebrated decision of the House of Lords in Ridge v Baldwin, Lord Reid pointed out how the gloss of Lord Hewart CJ was based on the misconception of the observations of Lord Atkin LJ and was inconsistent with the earlier dicta. Lord Reid observed:

> If Lord Hewart meant that it is never enough that a body has a duty to determine what the rights of an individual should be, but that there must always be something more to impose on it, a duty to act judicially, then that appears to be impossible to reconcile with the earlier authorities'.. .. the duty to act judicially may arise from the very nature of the functions intended to be performed as it need not be shown to be 'super-added.[13]

This decision broadened the area of application of the rules of natural justice and in the language of Professor Clark, this decision 'restored light to an area benighted by the narrow conceptualism of the previous decade'.[14] This development of law was followed in India.[15] In Binapani Devi, the Supreme Court observed, 'If there is power to decide and determine to the prejudice of a person, duty to act judicially is implicit in the exercise of such power'.[16] In AK Kraipak, the court observed that the concept of quasi-judicial power has been undergoing radical change and 'the dividing line between the administrative power and quasi-judicial power is quite thin, and is being gradually obliterated.[17] In the words of Bhagwati J:

> The net effect of these and other decisions was that the duty to act judicially need not be super-added, but it may be spelt out from the nature of the power conferred, the manner of exercising it and its impact on the rights of the persons affected...[18]

However, a writ of certiorari can never be issued to call for the records, papers and proceedings of an Act or Ordinance for quashing such Act or Ordinance.[19]Certiorari and prohibition may be issued to inferior statutory tribunals who do not claim to be and would not be recognised as courts of justice for controlling their proceedings.[20] The orders of the appropriate Government in making and refusing to make an order of reference under s 10 and s 12(5), appointing the authorities under ss 7, 7 A and 7B, transferring the proceedings from one tribunal to another under s 33B are amenable to writ of mandamus upon judicial review while the orders and awards of the adjudicatory authorities under ss 13, 15, 17, 17A 33, 33A, 33C, 36 and 36A are quashable on certiorari, if they are in excess of jurisdiction or suffer from an error of law apparent on the face of record or violate the rules of natural justice. These provisions vest these bodies with 'legal authority to adjudicate upon or otherwise decide' the questions of which they are seized. Furthermore, these authorities have 'to determine questions affecting the rights of the subjects'. They have, therefore, to comply with the basic procedural requirements. In Western India Automobile Assn, the federal court said that the industrial adjudicators have the discretionary jurisdiction to award the relief of reinstatement where they find that the services of industrial workers were illegally or wrongfully terminated.[21] This discretion of the tribunals is, however, reviewable.[22] Prohibition is 'a judicial writ, issuing out of a superior court to an inferior court, preventing the inferior court from usurping jurisdiction with which it is not legally vested' and it is issued to compel the courts entrusted with judicial duties to keep within the limits of their jurisdiction.[23] In the matter of granting prohibition, the court will not be fettered by the fact that an alternative remedy exists to correct the absence or excess of jurisdiction,[24] or that an appeal lies against the absence or excess.[25] However, an order in the nature of prohibition will not be issued unless there is a material question involved.[26] In cases of patent defects of jurisdiction or where the defect is apparent on the face of the proceedings, the order of prohibition is not discretionary, it issues ex debito ustitiae.[27] Prohibition cannot, however, be claimed as of right where the defect of jurisdiction is not clear. In other words, where the jurisdictional defect is-not patent, the court has a discretion and may decline prohibition, by reason of the conduct of a party.[28] In cases, where the proceedings before the inferior tribunal are partly within its jurisdiction and partly outside its jurisdiction, prohibition will lie against doing what is in excess of jurisdiction.[29] Likewise, where the inferior tribunal gives itself jurisdiction by an erroneous conclusion on a point of law, prohibition will lie. However, where the tribunal while determining the jurisdictional question, decides the question of fact on conflicting evidence,[30] the writ court will not interfere except on very strong grounds;[31] nor will prohibition be granted when it is clear that a question which might be raised in the proceedings, and which is not within the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal will not be contested in those proceedings,[32] or because the inferior tribunal in the course of its judgment merely uses certain language relevant only to a cause of action outside its jurisdiction.[33] Prohibition will, however, issue as soon as an inferior tribunal proceeds to apply a wrong law, when deciding a fact on which the jurisdiction depends.[34] The power of the High Court to issue writs under Art 226 cannot be disputed where the tribunal is not duly constituted and is acting without jurisdiction.[35]In cases arising out of the jurisdiction of the adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act, the High Courts generally refuse to bypass the normal procedure prescribed by the Act and throttle an inquiry into the facts by issuing writs of prohibition without a clear-cut prima facie case of want of jurisdiction.[36]

In Hari Vishnu Kamat, it was observed that the writs of certiorari and prohibition have many common characteristics. Both the writs have, for their object, the restraining of inferior court or tribunal from exceeding their jurisdiction and they can be issued, not merely to courts but to all authorities exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions. However, it has to be borne in mind that once an adjudication is over, it is only certiorari that can be invoked, as prohibition in such a case will be futile. However, if a tribunal decides a jurisdictional question erroneously, that decision may be quashed on certiorari and it may be further interdicted by prohibition from further proceedings to decide the matter on merits. Indian courts have, by and large, followed the English decisions in issuing writs of prohibition and certiorari though the other expression 'orders' or 'directions' used in Art. 226 and 32 have been liberally utilised in getting rid of the technicalities of the English Law. In other words, when an inferior court or tribunal takes up a matter over which it has no jurisdiction, for hearing, the person against whom proceedings are taken can move the writ court for an order of prohibition and that prohibition will forbid the inferior court from continuing the proceedings. On the other hand, if the court hears that cause or matter and gives a decision, the party aggrieved would move the superior court for a writ of certiorari and on that, an order will be made quashing the decision on the ground of want of jurisdiction.[37] One significant difference between them is that they are issued at different stages of the proceedings. Prohibition may, and usually must, be invoked at an earlier stage than certiorari. Prohibition will not lie unless something remains to be done that a court can prohibit. Certiorari will not lie unless something has been done that a court can quash. But it is sometimes appropriate to apply for both orders simultaneously - certiorari to quash an order made by a tribunal in excess of its jurisdiction, and prohibition to prevent the tribunal from continuing to exceed its jurisdiction.[38] In the words of Professor Wade: 'Prohibition stands in much the same relation to certiorari as injunction stands in relation to declaration. Certiorari and prohibition rest on common principles and frequently go hand in hand, as where an order is quashed by certiorari, and, at the same time, a prohibition is awarded to prevent any further irregularity being committed'.[39] In Navinchandra Shah, Desai J of the Gujarat High Court (as he then was), observed:

> The expansive and extraordinary power of the High Courts under Art 226 is as wide as the amplitude of the language used indicates and so can affect any person even a private individual-and be available for any other purpose...The Supreme Court has spelt out wise and clear restraints on the use of this extraordinary remedy and High Courts will not go beyond those wholesome inhibitions except where the monstrosity of the situation or other exceptional circumstances cry for timely judicial interdict or mandate. The mentor of law is justice and a potent drug should be judiciously administered. Speaking in critical retrospect and portentous prospect, the writ power has, been the people's sentinel by and large, on the qui vive and to cut back on or liquidate that power may cast a peril to human rights.[40]

In industrial adjudication, an order of reference itself may be challenged being beyond the competence of the 'appropriate Government'. There may be cases, where it is patent that the appropriate Government was not competent to make the reference. In such cases, a party aggrieved by the order of reference may directly invoke the jurisdiction of the writ court. In such a case, the writ court will quash the order of reference and issue a writ of prohibition to the tribunal directing it not to proceed with the adjudication of the reference. The scope of writ jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226 is not the same as that of an adjudicatory authority on a reference under s 10 or on an application under s 33 or s 33C(2). The jurisdiction of the authorities under these provisions is much wider. For instance, while adjudicating a dispute relating to dismissal of a workman under s 10 or dealing with an application under s 33, the industrial authorities can go into the question whether the dismissal of a workman amounts to victimisation or unfair labour practice or whether the employer has acted bona fide. These questions cannot be gone into by the writ court.[41] The confines of the writ court are only to see whether the orders or awards of the industrial authorities are suffering from any jurisdictional errors or are violative of the rules of natural justice or are vitiated by errors of law apparent on the face of the record.[42]There may be cases where lack of jurisdiction is not patent but it is latent. For instance, where the jurisdiction of the tribunal to adjudicate upon a dispute referred to it depends upon the determination of the question, whether the reference is valid; the tribunal may have to determine the collateral questions, such as, whether what is referred is an industrial dispute or the activity in question is an industry or the workman concerned is a 'workman' within the meaning of the definitions ascribed to these terms in the Act, and so on. The tribunal cannot assume jurisdiction by erroneously deciding these questions. The decision of the tribunal on these questions may be impugned before the writ court. If the writ court comes to the conclusion that the decision of the tribunal on these collateral or jurisdictional question is erroneous, it will quash the decision and prohibit the tribunal from proceeding with the adjudication of the dispute on merits.

The adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act are vested with jurisdiction to decide and resolve industrial disputes. Primarily it is for these bodies to decide the disputes referred to them. However, the jurisdictional issues may have to be decided as preliminary issues, if facts are not in dispute or such issues can be decided independently of the merits of the case. However, facts of a particular case may not permit or enable such issues to be decided de hors the merits of the case. In such an event, the adjudicators may have to decide the points of reference and the question, whether they involve industrial dispute, simultaneously. Normally, a writ court will not entertain the challenge to the order of reference on the ground that the reference is not an industrial dispute. There may be rare cases when the writ court may be in a position to decide such question on the basis of admitted facts and having regard to the particular circumstances of a case, in such a situation, the writ court may intervene at the initial stage. Otherwise, it would be unwise for the writ court to interrupt the proceedings at the initial stage on a reference in every case. The normal rule is to allow the tribunal duly constituted for a specific purpose by the law to proceed with its inquiries unless on the face of it, a particular inquiry does fall within the scope of its powers.[43] For instance, a writ court will not quash a memo of charge-sheet unless there is a total want of jurisdiction or the action is motivated with mala fides.[44]

The remedies of certiorari and prohibition may be sought together or alternatively for the grounds in the writ petition for both the remedies will be the same. After quashing the impugned order, the High Court in its writ jurisdiction, has also the jurisdiction to modulate the relief to meet the exigencies of a situation.[45] However, the fact that the writ court has power to mould the relief to meet the requirements of each case, does not mean that the draftsman of a writ petition should not apply his mind to the proper relief which should be asked for and throw the entire burden of it upon the court.[46] Where the labour court directed the reinstatement of a workman dismissed for unauthorised absence for 62 days on the ground that certain other workmen who absented from duty were not dismissed, the High Court exercising its writ jurisdiction under Art 226 set aside the order of the labour court.[47] In Panchanan Manna, the Calcutta High Court held that where the punishment imposed by the disciplinary authority shocks the conscience of the High Court, it could appropriately mould the relief, either by directing the disciplinary/ appellate authority to reconsider the penalty imposed or, to shorten the litigation, it may itself impose appropriate punishment with cogent reasons therefor in some cases. In the facts and circumstances of the case, the workman was ordered to be reinstated but without backwages.[48] An award passed by the labour court, (i) without properly appreciating the questions of law and fact, (ii) without properly construing the wage register and attendance register produced by the management to show that the workman never worked in the establishment, and (iii) by merely relying on the oral evidence of the workman, is not sustainable and is liable to be quashed in a writ of certiorari.[49] In PGIMER, the Supreme Court observed:

> The labour court being the final court of facts came to a conclusion that payment of 60 per cent wages would comply with the requirement of law. The finding of perversity or being erroneous or not in accordance with law shall have to be recorded with reasons in order to assail the finding of the tribunal or the labour court. It is not for the High Court to go into the factual aspects of the matter and there is an existing limitation on the High Court to that effect. In the event, however, the finding of fact is based on any misappreciation of evidence, that would be deemed to be an error of law, which can be corrected by a writ of certiorari. The law is well settled to the effect that finding of the labour court cannot be challenged in a proceeding in a writ of certiorari on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the labour court was insufficient or inadequate though, however, perversity of the order would warrant intervention of the High Court.[50]

In Lakshmi Precision, where the High Court upheld the order of labour court directing reinstatement of a workman whose services were terminated for unauthorised absence, on finding that his absence was on account of illness, the Supreme Court observed that interference by High Court is justified where it is found that the action was purely and surely arbitrary in nature. The Supreme Court further held that arbitrariness is an antithesis to the rule of law-equity, fair play and justice.[51] Where the employer offered reinstatement without backwages despite the fact that the workman had abandoned the service, and the workman did not opt for joining even after several reminders from the management, the High Court, while quashing the order of labour court, held that the employer had not terminated the services of the workman, the workman was indulging in vexatious litigation and that the labour court failed to consider what was wrong in ordering reinstatement with full backwages.[52] Promotion of the workman during the pendency of disciplinary proceedings does not mean that the charges against him were wiped out. At the most, it may be a factor while granting final relief to the workman. The award of the labour court that the workman was free from the charges on account of his promotion is wrong, and is set aside.[53] Where the labour court found that the charges of forgery and issue of fake certificates were not proved, and directed reinstatement of the employee after considering all the documents and evidence, the award of the labour court could not be said to be perverse.[54]Where the labour court ordered reinstatement of a worker dismissed for participating in an illegal strike, it was held that the labour court had power under s 11A to interfere with the quantum of punishment and that the High Court under Art 226 could not act as an appellate authority over the tribunal.[55] The tribunal has power under s 11A to reappraise evidence and satisfy itself whether the evidence relied upon by the employer establishes the misconduct alleged against the workmen. The writ would be justified in interfering with the order of the tribunal, only if it comes to the conclusion that the order of the tribunal is either contrary to some provisions of law or is based upon no evidence on record to substantiate the same or is based upon certain inadmissible evidence or the tribunal did not allow certain admissible evidence to be let in, or the conclusion of the tribunal was such which no reasonable person would arrive at.[56]

However, a single judge of Madras High Court went about reappraising the evidence and ordered reinstatement in a case where the workman was dismissed for being guilty of using indecorous language and the personnel officer of the company and the said dismissal was upheld by the labour court in an adjudication under s 11A.[57] Such exercise which borders on assuming appellate jurisdiction is not only unwarranted, but is a patent violation of the principles enunciated by the Apex Court. And this was certainly not one of those rarest of the rare cases falling within the ratio of BC Chaturvedi,[58] and Mahesh Kumar Mishra,[59] warranting the High Court to step in and undo the injustice. At any rate, it does not appeal to logic or common sense that judges should go about wrongfully interfering with disciplinary actions involving theft, fraud, dishonesty, misappropriation, or riotous, violent and disorderly behaviour, and set aside punishments on flimsy and questionable grounds. Another decision which falls in the same species as that of Damodaran is that of the same High Court in Thangaraj, in which Venkatachalam, J undertook the exercise of reappreciating the evidence, discussing and evaluating questions of fact, which he was not supposed to do in a petition under Art 226, and finally held that the dismissal for a misconduct involving giving of false complaint against his superior officer was disproportionate, quashed the order of labour court and ordered fresh appointment without attendant benefits.[60] In Yogeshwar Raj, the workman was charge-sheeted for submitting a bogus certificate to the effect that he belonged to a scheduled tribe at the time of employment for a post reserved for scheduled caste/scheduled tribe candidates. The workman did not submit any explanation despite extension of time sought for by him for submitting the explanation. An inquiry was conducted in the course of which the inquiry committee came to the conclusion that the caste certificate submitted by the workman was a bogus certificate. The inquiry committee, however, expressed the view that since the original caste certificate submitted by the workman in 1976 was subsequently affirmed by a certificate issued from the office of the Collector in 1999, the said action of the workman did not amount to delinquency on the part of the workman. It was also found that the caste certificate dated 4 February 1998, submitted by the workman was forged. The disciplinary authority rejected the findings of the inquiry committee duly supported by reasons and served a show-cause notice on the workman. The workman moved the High Court, which stayed the proceedings and issued a rule nisi. Allowing the appeal by special leave, Ruma Pal J observed:

> We are not aware as to the reason why the High Court was persuaded to issue a Rule Nisi, but its further observations, 'prima facie, we are satisfied that the petitioner belongs to the scheduled caste/scheduled tribe' and also grant of an interim order staying the proceedings before the disciplinary authority, were erroneous. It appears from a copy of the writ petition that the respondent has not questioned the jurisdiction of the disciplinary authority to issue the impugned show cause notice. The two issues of the respondent's caste and whether he had adequately explained the production of the bogus certificate of October 4, 1998 are yet to be decided by the disciplinary authority. Both the issues are primarily issues of fact. The High Court should not have pre-empted a factual decision of the disciplinary authority on the issues. Nor should the High Court have stayed the proceedings on a prima facie finding on the subject matter of inquiry particularly when the competence of the disciplinary authority was not in doubt.[61]

It is difficult to appreciate as to under what law and authority, constitutional provisions not excluding, could the High Court exercise a power of this kind and stall the disciplinary proceedings at such an early stage of charge-sheet and inquiry. On what basis did the High Court proceed to draw a conclusion to the effect that prima facie it was satisfied that the petitioner belonged to scheduled caste/scheduled tribe, when the matter was yet to be investigated in order to prove or disprove the claim of the petitioner? This is a striking illustration of abuse of the power of judicial review conferred on the High Court, and the Supreme Court rightly quashed the order. In Dharampal, the Supreme Court held that the High Court should not interfere with the approval granted by the tribunal under s 33(2)(b) on the ground that the tribunal had committed an error while granting approval. The appropriate course for the workman was to invoke s 10 to work out his rights.[62]

(b) Bars to Certiorari and Prohibition

It is well-settled law that in its writ jurisdiction under Art 32, the Supreme Court or the High Court under Art 226 will not decide the disputed questions of fact. The area to decide the disputed questions of fact is in the jurisdiction of the trial courts who are competent to determine such questions on taking appropriate evidence. A priori, the writ courts do not embark upon the trial of disputed questions of fact. For instance, in Surendra Prasad, the dispute between the workmen and the employer with respect to the claim that the canteen workers be treated at par with the other employees of the corporation, involved disputed questions of fact, the Supreme Court held that it was not the appropriate forum in its jurisdiction under Art 32 to decide the dispute. The court, therefore, directed the 'appropriate Government' to refer the dispute for adjudication to the industrial tribunal under s 10(1)(b) of the Act. Even the writ jurisdiction of a High Court under Art 226 is not of an appellate nature, howsoever wide, it is only supervisory jurisdiction.[63] The writ of certiorari can be issued the only in cases where the orders or awards of the quasi-judicial authorities suffer from jurisdictional defects or are vitiated by errors of law apparent on the face of the record or violate the rules of natural justice. It is not that every wrong decision of an inferior tribunal is reviewable on certiorari by the writ court. In other words, the writ court cannot sit in appeal over the findings recorded by a competent tribunal by re-appreciating the evidence for itself, which would be outside its jurisdiction unless such findings are supported by no evidence or are otherwise perverse.[64] Hence, the writ court is not competent to review the evidence adduced before the inferior tribunal, its duty is merely to see whether its conclusion is supported by evidence. The question of sufficiency of evidence will not be open before the writ court.[65]Some of the cases where the writ court will not review the orders and awards of the tribunals, like the adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act, are discussed under the following heads. These heads, however, are neither exhaustive nor mutually exclusive, but they overlap one another in certain areas. However, they have been devised for the convenience of treatment.

In Estrolla Rubber, the Supreme Court held that Art 227 does not confer an unlimited prerogative upon the High Court to correct all wrong decisions or to prevent hardships caused thereby. Exercise of this power in interfering with the orders of courts or tribunals is restricted to cases of serious dereliction of duty and flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of law or justice where, if the High Court does not interfere, a grave injustice remains uncorrected. The High Court acting under that article cannot exercise its power as an appellate court or substitute its own judgment in place of that of the subordinate court to correct an error which is not apparent on the face of the record.[66] In Madura Coats, Padmanabhan J of the Madras High Court, while quashing the order of the labour court directing reinstatement of workmen, who were dismissed for absence without permission as they were held in judicial custody, observed that the management could not be held responsible for the workmen being absent for their own personal reasons and without permission. Having held thus, the learned judge directed the management to pay a lump sum compensation of Rs 1,60,000 to each of the dismissed workmen in lieu of their reinstatement. Once it is held that the punishment was in order and was preceded by a proper inquiry, question arises as to whether there is a need to shower generosity on the dismissed workmen at the expense of the employer. If the employer could not be held responsible for the continued unauthorised absence of the workmen for their personal reasons and was perfectly justified in imposing the punishment of dismissal, then, by the same token, no liability could be fastened on to him to pay any compensation in lieu of reinstatement. The learned judge observed:

> Taking into consideration the short period of service rendered by each one of them, instead of reinstatement, the labour court should have directed the management to pay a lumpsum compensation as the workmen have obviously no regard for discipline as well as no regard for their employment and have failed to report for duty for several months.[67]

The conclusion reached by Padmanabhan J is repugnant both to the facts as admitted by him and his reasoning, and is manifestly perverse. In Mysore Sugar, the facts were that in respect of a dispute about the date of birth, the management constituted a medical board which determined the age of the workman, and the workman accepted the same. After about 30 years, the workman raised a dispute questioning the date of birth as determined by the medical board, and the labour court directed the management to reinstate the retired workman. Quashing the order of the labour court, the High Court held that the opinion of the medical board could not be challenged after a lapse of over thirty years when the employee himself had accepted it.[68]

Alternative Remedies:

Before the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act 1976, the existence of an alternative remedy was not a bar to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226, though it was a relevant consideration upon which the High Court could refuse to exercise its jurisdiction.[69] However, cl (3) of Art 226 substituted for the earlier Art 226 by the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act completely prohibited the High Courts from entertaining petitions for redress of any injury if any other remedy for such redress was provided for by or under any other law for the time being in force. This relegated the law to the pre-Constitution period when under s 45 of the Specific Relief Act 1877, the relief in the nature of mandamus was not available where the petitioner had any other specific and adequate legal remedy.[70] This amendment not only barred the writ of mandamus, but it also barred the writs of prohibition and certiorari as well, if any alternative remedy was available for redress, even in cases of patent excess of jurisdiction or error of law apparent on the face of the record or violation of the rules of natural justice. But cl (3) has now been omitted by the Constitution (Forty-fourth Amendment) Act 1978, the result of which is to restore the law to its pre-forty-second amendment with effect from 29 June 1979. After this amendment, a writ petition cannot be dismissed solely on the ground of existence of an alternative remedy.[71] Although there is no rule or provision of law to prohibit the extraordinary jurisdiction of the courts under Art. 32 and 226, the courts always insist upon recourse to ordinary remedy or the exhaustion of other remedies. A Constitution Bench of Supreme Court in Thansingh Nathmal dealt with the question as to how the discretionary jurisdiction of the writ court is required to be exercised with respect to a petition filed under Art 226 by a person before it by by-passing a statutory alternate remedy available to him for obtaining redressal of his grievance ventilated in his petition. The court reverberated the well-settled legal position that though the jurisdiction of the writ court is couched in wide terms and the exercise thereof is not subject to any restriction except the territorial restrictions which are expressly provided for in the article, the exercise of the jurisdiction is discretionary; it is not exercised merely because it is lawful to do so. The very amplitude of the jurisdiction demands that it will ordinarily be exercised subject to certain self-imposed restrictions. Speaking for the court, Shah J spoke thus:

> Where it is open to the aggrieved petitioner to move another tribunal, or even itself in another jurisdiction for obtaining redress in the manner provided by a statute, the High Court normally will not permit, by entertaining a petition under Art 226, the machinery created under the statutory to be bypassed and will leave the party applying to it to seek resort to the machinery so set up.[72].

In the words of Hidayatullah CJI, 'this attitude arises from the acceptance of the salutary principle that extraordinary remedies should not take the place of ordinary remedies'.[73] The remedy under Art 226 being in general, discretionary, the High Court may refuse to grant it to a litigant when an equally convenient, beneficial and efficacious alternative remedy is open to him and he should be required to pursue that remedy and not invoke the special jurisdiction of the High Court to issue a prerogative writ.[74] For instance, where for more than one year, the petitioner did not avail himself of the efficacious alternative remedy of appeal against his dismissal where he could appropriately canvass all questions of fact as to how the order of dismissal was improper or contrary to principles of natural justice, the writ court declined to exercise its jurisdiction.[75] However, in cases where the ordinary process of law appears to be inefficacious, the writ court would interfere even if other remedies are available. The existence of another remedy does not affect jurisdiction to issue a writ.[76] The rule requiring the exhaustion of statutory remedies, before a writ is granted, is however, a rule of policy, convenience and discretion rather than a rule of law. In the words SR Das CJI, 'There is no rule with regard to certiorari as there is with mandamus, that it will lie only where there is no other equally effective remedy.' Instances are numerous where a writ has been issued in spite of the fact that the aggrieved party had other legal remedies.[77] Where the order complained against is alleged to be illegal or invalid and being contrary to law, a petition at the instance of the person adversely affected by it, would lie to the High Court under Art 226 and such a petition cannot be rejected on the ground that an appeal lies to the higher officer of the state Government.[78]

The existence of an alternative remedy does not per se operate as an absolute bar to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226, though the existence of an adequate legal remedy is a thing to be taken into consideration in the matter of granting writs and the writ court will be slow to exercise such jurisdiction where there is an adequate alternative remedy open to the party. Where the statutory remedy is neither effective nor efficacious, dictates of justice demand that, in appropriate cases, the remedy under Art 226 should not be denied to the aggrieved party.[79] In Maharashtra GK Union,[80] the petitioners had not approached the labour court with an application for setting aside the ex parte award on the basis of the legal advice to the effect that no useful purpose would be served by filing such application considering the view taken by the same labour court in similar other cases. Thus, though an alternative remedy was available to the petitioners, they had not availed themselves of the same. However, this was done by them on legal advice and due to the misapprehensions of the position of law. In these circumstances, the Bombay High Court did not think it fair at the stage of the final hearing of the writ petition to dismiss the writ petition on the ground of alternative remedy. The Allahabad High Court in

Nathaniel Masih, held that when the petition has been admitted, it would not be proper to dismiss it at the final hearing on the mere ground of availability of alternative remedy.[81]

In Kailash Paswan, the Patna High Court held that once a writ petition is admitted and parties have filed affidavits and counter-affidavits and the matter remained pending in the High Court for some years, unless there are disputed questions of fact to be gone into, the writ court should be very loath to dismiss the writ petition on the grounds of alternative remedy. It should not ordinarily do so. However, the court pertinently pointed out that where certain disputed questions of fact have to be decided for determining a point in dispute, such questions cannot be decided by a writ court. After all it is a self-imposed restriction. It is a matter of discretion not of jurisdiction.[82] The exercise of discretion depends upon the wrong and illegality alleged and complained against. For instance, where an order is without jurisdiction and no inquiry into facts is necessary, it is open to the writ court to interfere without driving the parties to resort to the alternative remedy.[83] The alternative remedy must be a specific remedy, particularly, provided under the statute itself An alternative remedy, on its plain reading, means a remedy which is available to the petitioner concerned and which is not dependent on the opinion of any other authority.[84] The general remedies like suits or the discretionary appeals under Art 136 are not efficacious alternative remedies.[85]The question as to whether or not alternative remedy, in a given case, is equally adequate, efficacious and speedy, must naturally depend upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of that case and no rigid and inflexible rules can be formulated to cover every case. For instance, where the complaint was that a direction made by the authority under the Payment of Wages Act was erroneous in law, the defect could have been cured in appeal under s 17 of the Act, it was held that the failure to appeal precluded the employer from invoking the jurisdiction of the writ court.[86] Likewise, mandamus cannot be granted for enforcing an award of an industrial tribunal which is not a law and the manner of enforcement has been provided in the Act itself.[87]

If the matter in controversy would require investigation of questions of fact, such investigation cannot obviously be undertaken in a writ proceeding under Art 226.[88]In view of the specific remedy under s 13A of the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 being available for resolving the dispute as to whether on the materials found against the workman, the relevant Standing Order was applicable, the writ petition was held to be not maintainable.[89]On the question, whether the remedies provided by the Industrial Disputes Act constitute efficacious alternative remedies so as to bar the writ jurisdiction of the High Courts under Art 226, a single judge of the Madras High Court, observed that the provision of an alternative remedy is not always an absolute bar to the exercise of the jurisdiction vested in this court under Art 226, though the court should be slow to exercise such jurisdiction when there is an adequate alternative remedy open to the party. In the circumstances of the case, the court quashed the order passed by the tribunal in excess of its jurisdiction.[90] In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha, the Supreme Court affirmed the decision of Bombay High Court entertaining a writ petition against the order of retrenchment of certain workmen on the ground of breach of the provisions of s 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act.[91] In Basant Kumar Sarkar, a Constitution Bench, dealing with a notification issued under s 1(3) of the Employees' State Insurance Act 1948, observed that though the power of the High Courts under Art 226 is very wide, even this power cannot take within its sweep 'industrial disputes' of the kind which were sought to be raised before the High Court.[92] In Rohtas Industries, the Supreme Court observed that, if the industrial dispute relates to enforcement of a right or an obligation created under the Act, then the only remedy available to the suitor is to get an adjudication under the Act.[93] In Bihar Rajya Vidyut Parishad, the court dismissed the petition on the ground of alternative remedy as the question related to terms and conditions about the workmen, could only be adjudicated on evidence and a writ court would not enter into the question of fact.[94]

In Mohd Yousufoddin, the High Court of Andhra Pradesh did not entertain a writ petition without exhausting alternative remedy under the Industrial Disputes Act, where the workman kept silent for a number of years without challenging the determination of his date of birth either on account of the statement given by him or on account of the examination by the medical board.[95] The Karnataka High Court in Visvesvaraya Iron & Steel, held that the fact that there was a delay in disposal of proceedings before the labour court and that there was accumulation of a large number of cases was no cause to bypass alternative remedy by the writ court.[96] In Aziz, the court held that since the corporation was an authority within the meaning of Art 12, Arts 14 and 16 were applicable to the service conditions of the petitioners under the corporation. Therefore, it was open to the petitioners in a writ proceeding to enforce their right against the corporation on the ground that refusal to absorb them in the service of the corporation would be violative of the guarantees of Arts 14 & 16. The ground that the petitioners had an alternative remedy of raising an industrial dispute was of no avail.[97] Likewise, the employer took recourse to various measures in order to prevent the workmen from getting the bonus in terms of a settlement and the orders of the Supreme Court and the High Court. The Calcutta High Court in Amalendu Gupta, held that it is unlikely that the workmen will getquick and efficacious relief by taking recourse to the remedies provided in the Industrial Disputes Act.[1] But if the adjudication involves questions of fact which can be determined only by adducing relevant evidence in accordance with the procedure, the statutory remedy of s 10 and s 33C(2) should be treated as a bar to the writ jurisdiction.[2] Adjudication of the dismissal of a workman involves the questions of validity of domestic inquiry, justifiability of the punishment and bona fides of the management. These questions can appropriately be determined by an industrial tribunal on taking relevant evidence and hearing the parties and not by the writ court. Even from the point of view of the workman, the remedy of adjudication under s 10 is better and more effective because he will have full opportunity of adducing and rebuttal of evidence before the tribunal whose jurisdiction is very wide under s 11A. In such cases, the alternative remedy of reference and adjudication under s 10 should normally bar the constitutional remedy of writs.[3]

A Full Bench of Punjab and Haryana High Court in Manohar Lal, has also held that the remedy of reference available under s 10 of the Act bars the filing of a writ petition. This remedy does not cease to be a remedy simply because the matter of reference depends upon the opinion of the Government.[4] A similar view has been taken by a Full Bench of Patna High Court in Dinesh Prasad, in which Sandhawalia CJ held that the suitor must exhaust the remedies under the Industrial Disputes Act before seeking relief in the writ jurisdiction unless the 'monstrosity of situation or other exceptional circumstances cry out for interference by the writ court at the very threshold'.[5] The bar of alternative remedy is more applicable to a writ of mandamus than to a writ of certiorari. It has been pointed out by the Supreme Court in Mohammad Noor, that though there is no rule with regard to certiorari as there is with regard to mandamus that it would lie only when there is no other equally effective remedy. It is well established that provided the requisite grounds exist, certiorari will lie although a right to appeal has been conferred by statute.[6] Since mandamus will be issued where there is a specific legal right and no specific remedy, it may be refused where there is an alternative remedy which is adequate, that is to say, equally convenient, beneficial and efficacious.[7] But the writ of certiorari, subject to certain exceptions, is granted to an aggrieved party even though there is an alternative remedy, unless of course his conduct disentitles him to relief.[8] In granting an order of prohibition, the court will not be fettered by the existence of an alternative remedy or the availability of an appeal.[9] From the decided cases, it can be summed up that the following are some of the circumstances in which relief under Art 226 could be granted despite the existence of an alternative remedy:

(1) the petitioner complains of violation of the fundamental rights. However the extraordinary remedy under Art 226 is not intended to supersede completely the modes of obtaining relief by an action in a civil court or to deny defence legitimately upon any such actions. In such cases, it will be sound use of discretion to leave the aggrieved party to seek his remedy by ordinary mode of action in a civil court and to refuse to exercise in his favour the discretion to grant the remedy under Art 226;

(2) some mandatory provisions of the Constitution have been violated;

(3) rules of natural justice have been violated;

(4) the act complained of is contrary to law or without the authority of law;

(5) the alternative remedy is authorised by law which is ultra vires or the alternative remedy itself is unconstitutional or ultra vires;

(6) the act complained of is without jurisdiction and the state threatens coercive process for recovering the amount considered to be payable to it as an arrear of land revenue, if upon the facts established, the amount sought to be recovered is not payable even though the terms of the contract have to be construed. For instance, where the properties of a party are attached under the provisions of Revenue Recovery Act for recovering the sums said to be due under a certificate issued by the concerned authority under s 33C(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, existence of a remedy of a suit, could not be considered to be effective alternative remedy to bar the issuance of a writ, if the person aggrieved could satisfy the court that it has got jurisdiction otherwise to deal with the matter;

(7) the writ petition raises some important questions of interpretation of statutory provisions or rules which public interest requires to be decided speedily; or

(8) the remedy itself is not adequate.

Following are some of the instances where the remedy itself is not adequate:

(1) where resort to it will not secure the relief which the action complained of demands; for instance where interim relief will not be available by reason of a statutory notice, such as, is required under s 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure;

(2) where it would be futile to drive a party to an alternative remedy, for instance when an appellate authority has pre-judged the issue and the authority whose order is impugned has acted under the general or special directions of the appellate authority;

(3) where the alternative remedy is not a matter of right; for instance a remedy under Art 136 is not an alternative remedy to what could be granted under Art 226, because the right to apply for leave to the Supreme Court, if it could be called a 'right' at all cannot be equated to a right of appeal;

(4) where the alternative remedy is onerous and burdensome; or

(5) where an alternative remedy is available under a statute but some grounds to be raised fall beyond the jurisdiction of an authority created under the statute then the writ petition is maintainable to agitate not only sued grounds but also the grounds which would within the particular jurisdiction of the statutory authority.

In UP State Bridge Corporation, the facts were: some 168 workmen of the corporation remained absent from duty en bloc from 12 October 1995 causingserious dislocation to the construction work that was in progress. The corporation issued a notice on 18 October 1995 directing them to report for duty immediately, failing which their names would be struck off from the rolls, as provided for in the standing order. Similar notices were published in the Hindi Newspaper on 22 & 28 December 1995, which also stated that if the workmen whose names were appended to the notice did not report for duty within a period of three days from the date of the publication of the notice, it would be presumed that they had abandoned their services with the Corporation without notice and their contract of service would come to an end and their names would be removed from the muster roll. According to the appellant despite the repeated notices the workmen continued to absent themselves and ultimately on 19 January 1996 an order was issued putting an end to the services of 168 workmen on the presumption that they had abandoned their services with the Corporation on their own. Thereafter, one of the workmen filed a writ petition before the Lucknow Bench of the High Court, which was dismissed with the endorsement that they could raise an industrial dispute, if they so desired. A second writ petition was filed, this time by the union, before the Allahabad High Court, which was allowed by a single judge, who came to the conclusion that the word "absence" did not by itself mean "abandonment of service" and when an employee went on strike it was not the intention to abandon service. It was said that "Resorting to strike" is neither misuse of leave nor over-staying of leave. Standing order does not provide for any provision as to how the question of strike is to be dealt with." It was further said that the strike was not illegal as no notice was required to be given to the respondent under Section 22 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. It was also held that in any event - whether a strike was illegal or legal - it did not amount to abandonment of service justifying action under the standing orders of the company. Allowing the appeal filed by the Corporation, and quashing the order passed by the single judge, Ruma Pal J (for self and BP Singh J) of the Supreme Court held:

> We are of the firm opinion that the High Court erred in entertaining the writ petition of the respondent-Union at all. The dispute was an industrial dispute both within the meaning of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 as well the UPIDA, 1947. The rights and obligations sought to be enforced by the respondent-Union in the writ petition are those created by the Industrial Disputes Act. In The Premier Automobiles Ltd.. ., it was held that when the dispute relates to the enforcement of a right or an obligation created under the Act, then the only remedy available to the claimant is to get adjudication under the Act. This was because the Industrial Disputes Act was made to provide > > ... a speedy, inexpensive and effective forum for resolution of disputes arising between workmen and their employers. The idea has been to ensure that the workmen do not get caught in the labyrinth of civil courts with their layers upon layers of appeals and revisions and the elaborate procedural laws, which the workmen can ill afford. The procedure followed by civil courts, it was thought, would not facilitate a prompt and effective disposal of these disputes. As against this, the courts and tribunals created by the Industrial Disputes Act are not shackled by these procedural laws nor is their award subject to any appeals or revisions. Because of their informality, the workmen and their representatives can themselves prosecute or defend their cases. These forums are empowered to grant such relief as they think just and appropriate. They can even substitute the punishment in many cases. They can make and re-make the contracts, settlement, wage structures and what not. Their awards are no doubt amenable to jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 226 as also to the jurisdiction of this Court under Article 32, but they are extraordinary remedies subject to several self-imposed constraints. It is, therefore, always in the interest of the workmen that disputes concerning them are adjudicated in the forums created by the Act and not in a civil court. That is the entire policy underlying the vast array of enactments concerning workmen. This legislative policy and intendment should necessarily weigh with the courts in interpreting these enactments and the disputes arising under them.[10]
> Although these observations were made in the context of the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to entertain the proceedings relating to an industrial dispute and may not be read as a limitation on the Court's powers under Article 226, nevertheless it would need a very strong case indeed for the High Court to deviate from the principle that where a specific remedy is given by the statute, the person who insists upon such remedy can avail of the process as provided in that statute and in no other manner. (paras 12 & 13).

On the question of striking the names of 168 workmen, the learned judge observed:

> The final submission of the respondent was that the UPIDA provided for penalty after a departmental enquiry, in respect of the workman who may have gone on illegal strike and, therefore, there could be no termination of services on account of illegal strike. The submission is unacceptable as we have said there is no proof that the respondents were on strike at all. Besides, merely because the action is punishable does not mean that the consequence of an unauthorised absence is not available under the Certified Standing Orders if it so specifically provides. (para 26).. . In the circumstances, we have no hesitation in setting aside the decision of the High Court in dismissing the writ petition. This order will, however, not preclude the respondent-Union if it is otherwise so entitled to raise an industrial dispute under the UPIDA.[11] (para 27)

It is submitted that this case was rightly decided. It has to be stated that the misconceived decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in Sukhdev Singh,[12]Ajay Hasia,[13] and a few other cases - by which the apex court opened the floodgates to the litigants to discard statutory remedies provided by the law and to directly knock at the doors of High Courts and Supreme Court - were squarely responsible for the subsequent misuse and abuse of writ jurisdiction, not only by the High Courts, but by the Supreme Court itself during the past four decades.

Delay and Laches:

A writ court normally aids the vigilant. He who deliberately remains aloof or indifferent or recalcitrant cannot be heard to say that he is aggrieved.[14] It is well-established that the writ of certiorari will not be granted in cases where there is such a negligence or omission on the part of the applicant to assert his right as, taken in conjunction with the lapse of time and other circumstances, causes prejudice to the adverse party. This principle is to a great extent, similar to, though not identical with, the exercise of discretion in the Court of Chancery.[15] The principle has been stated by Sir Barnes Peacock in Lindsay Petroleum, as follows:

> Now the doctrine of laches in courts of Equity is not an arbitrary or a technical doctrine. Where it would be practically unjust to give a remedy, either because the party has, by his conduct, done that which might fairly be regarded as equivalent to a waiver of it, or where by his conduct and neglect he has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, yet put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted, in either of these cases, lapse of time and delay are most material. But in every case, if an argument against relief, which otherwise would be just, is founded upon mere delay, that delay of course not amounting to a bar by any statute of limitations, the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles substantially equitable. Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are the length of delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy. [16]

Unreasonable and inordinate delay on the part of the petitioner in coming to the High Court for relief under Art 226 without any satisfactory explanation as to such delay would disentitle him from obtaining any relief under this article.[17] For instance, in Govindrao, the employee was dismissed from service in October 1977 and his appeal against that order was also dismissed in July 1978. He did not challenge the appellate order in a writ petition but again filed a departmental appeal described as 'special appeal' which too was dismissed in May 1982. Subsequently, he challenged the validity of the dismissal order passed in October 1977. The Madhya Pradesh High Court quashed the order of dismissal. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held that there was no reason for the High Court to entertain a writ petition after a lapse of 10 years, and should have dismissed it in limine.[18] However, the principle that ordinarily delay will defeat the writ petition is a proposition, not a rule of law but a rule of practice based on sound and proper exercise of discretion and there is no inflexible rule that whenever there is delay, there must necessarily be an order of rejection of the petition on that ground alone. The question whether the delay will defeat the writ petition depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. In a case where the delay has been reasonably explained and no right has accrued to others in the meantime, which is likely to be disturbed if the petition is entertained, it will be inconsequential.[19] The petition cannot be rejected on the ground of delay where the petitioner was pursuing other remedies before invoking the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226,[20] particularly when no inconsistent legal or equitable situation had arisen because of delay or laches on the part of the petitioner.[21] Where the writ petition has been admitted and a prima facie case has been made out, it would be unjust to deny the relief merely on the ground of laches.[22] The fact that the writ petition was admitted and delay having been explained, the petition cannot be thrown out merely on the ground of delay and laches at the final hearing.[23] In other words, a petition may not be thrown out merely on the ground of delay, but it will be one of the factors that will weigh with the court in deciding whether or not the case is a fit one for exercise of the special jurisdiction of the court.[24] However, a petitioner cannot exonerate himself from delay on the ground that he was engaged in pursuing non-statutory representations when he is governed by statutory rules particularly when the delay is unreasonable and inordinate.[25] The Allahabad High Court in Board of Revenue, laid down the rule of practice that a writ petition under Art 226 should be filed as quickly as possible after the delivery of judgment. A period of 90 days, which is the period fixed for appeals to the High Court from the judgment of courts below, should be taken as the period for application for the issue of a writ of certiorari, and that time can be extended only when circumstances of a special nature, which are sufficient in the opinion of the court are shown to exist.[26] This rule has been explained by the Supreme Court in Chandra Bhushan thus:

> But in the absence of a statutory rule, the period prescribed for preferring an appeal to the High Court is a rough measure; in each case the primary question is whether the applicant has been guilty of laches or undue delay. A rule of practice cannot prescribe a binding rule of limitation; it may only indicate how discretion will be exercised by the court in determining whether having regard to the circumstances of the case, the applicant has been guilty of laches or undue delay...The rule which has been laid down in Mongey's case is at best a rule of practice, and not a rule of limitation.[27]

Though the Supreme Court thus recognised that normally the question whether a petition under Art 226 for the issue of a writ of certiorari has been presented without undue delay or laches is a question for the High Court to decide and it would not interfere with such discretion, in the circumstances of the case, it held that the High Court had erred in exalting a rule of practice to a rule of limitation and a departure from the rule of practice was justified. In this case, the attention of the court does not appear to have been drawn to its decision in Bhailal Bhai, holding that the maximum period fixed by the legislature as the time within which the relief by a suit in a civil court must be brought may ordinarily be taken to be a reasonable standard by which delay in seeking remedy under Art 226 can be measured.[28] This principle will apply to delay in writ petitions both under Arts 32 and 226. In Sadasivaswamy, the court pointed out:

> It is not that there is any period of limitation for the courts to exercise their powers under Art 226, nor is it that there can never be a case where the courts cannot interfere in a matter after the passage of a certain length of time. But it would be a sound and wise exercise of discretion for the courts to refuse to exercise their extraordinary powers under Art 226 in the case of persons who do not approach it expeditiously for relief and who stand by and allow things to happen and then approach the court to put forward stale claims and try to unsettle the settled matters.[29]

In Balwant Singh, the workman did not seek review of the High Court order, which was silent on payment of backwages nor did he move the Supreme Court against the order, with the result the said order became final. After a lapse of two years, he filed another writ petition in the High Court claiming monetary compensation also for the period during which he had not actually worked as well as for the termination of the service. The High Court allowed the writ petition granting the relief claimed. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held that the High Court, in these circumstances, was not justified in entertaining the claim and allowing the same and quashed the order of the High Court.[30] The Orissa High Court in Bishnu Charan Mohanty, stated the following principles to be kept in mind while determining whether a writ application would be liable to be dismissed on account of laches and delay:

(1) The Limitation Act has no application to writ petitions. Where, however, a suit for identical relief would be barred by the law of limitation, the court would ordinarily refuse to exercise discretion to grant relief under Art 226.

(2) Even if a suit for the same relief is not barred by limitation under the Limitation Act, yet the High Court may refuse to issue a writ if otherwise the delay is not explainable by satisfactory reasons.

(3) Two important circumstances to be borne in mind in all such cases are: the length of the delay, and the nature of the acts done during the interval which might affect either party and strike balance of justice or injustice in taking one course or the other so far as relates to the remedy.

(4) Where, by the conduct of the party, the delay might fairly be regarded as equivalent to a waiver of the remedy, the relief under Art 226 would be refused.

(5) Even if the conduct or act is not equivalent to a waiver, if the neglect of the petitioner put the opposite party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy is afterwards granted, the relief under Art 226 should be refused on account of delay and laches.

(6) Utmost expedition is the essence for a claim under Art 226.

(7) No hard and fast rule can be laid down. Each case is to be determined on its own facts and circumstances.[31]

Discretion of Tribunals:

Since writ court is not an appellate court where the correctness of the order or award under review is to be canvassed, it has no jurisdiction to substitute its own opinion for the opinion of the inferior tribunal,[32] even if it is satisfied that the decision is wrong. In other words, the writ court will not probe into the merits of the exercise of discretion of an authority unless the exercise of discretion is perverse. However, if the discretion has not been exercised in accordance with the principles recognised by law in this behalf-for instance where the power has been abused by exercising it capriciously, arbitrarily or improperly or the power is not used at all on account of abdication of power to someone else, or for any other reason, the writ court will quash the resulting order or award. It is well-settled that discretion must be exercised only by the authority to which it is committed. In the words of Professor SA de Smith:

> The authority must genuinely address itself to the matter before it: it must not act under the dictation of another body or disable itself from exercising a discretion in each individual case. In the purported exercise of its discretion it must nor do what it has been forbidden to do, nor must it do what it has not been authorised to do. It must act in good faith, must have regard to all relevant considerations and must not be swayed by irrelevant considerations, must not seek to promote purposes alien to the letter to the spirit of the legislation that gives it power to act, and must not act arbitrarily or capriciously.. .. These several principles can be grouped in two main categories:(i) failure to exercise discretion and (ii) abuse of discretionary power. The two classes are not, however, mutually exclusive. In other words, discretion may be improperly exercised when irrelevant considerations are taken into account; and where the authority hands over its discretion to another body, it acts ultra vires. Surrender of independent discretion in favour of the adoption of a policy pursued by a superior authority or to be guided by the dictates of a superior authority is no less improper. In some cases, authorities entrusted with statutory discretion are usually entitled to and occasionally obliged to take into account considerations of public policy, and in some contexts, the policy of the Government. Though it may be relevant to take these factors into consideration, these will not absolve the authorities from their duty to exercise their personal judgment in individual cases, unless explicit statutory provision has been made for them to give binding instructions by a superior. [33]

The tribunals cannot take any action incompatible with the due exercise of their powers and duties because to act so would be 'to renounce a part of their statutory birthright.[34] The principle that discretions must be exercised 'according to law' is, indeed, deeply entrenched in the common law, although the demarcation line between the legality and the merits of the exercise of discretion may very much depend upon the particular context in which the issue arises and upon the prevailing judicial climate of opinion on the proper role of the courts.[35] Yet discretion is not self-defining. Its ambit is usually established by judicial interpretation. It is, of course, plain that such an interpretation is not made in the abstract. It is made on the basis of a case. Broadly, it is the power which is given by the statute to make a choice among competing considerations. Most powers to act, of course, involve some element of choice even if it relates to mere details. Thus discretion implies power to choose between alternative courses of action.[36] The exercise of judicial discretion imports a duty to be, in the words of Lord Mansfield, 'fair, candid, and unprejudiced; not arbitrary, capricious, or biased; much less, warped by resentment, or personal dislike'.[37] The concept of discretion was elaborated by Lord Halsbury LC, as:

> a duty to act 'according to the rules of reasons and justice, not according to private opinion ...according to law, and not humour. .. not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful but legal and regular.[38]

Judicial discretion is always to be exercised, not capriciously or arbitrarily, but according to sound principles laid down for exercising it.[39] Desai J observed:

> Whenever, it is said that something has to be done within the discretion of the authority then that something has to be done according to the rules of reason and justice and not according to private opinion, according to law and not humour. It is to be not arbitrary, vague and fanciful but legal and regular and it must be exercised within the limit to which an honest man to the discharge of his office ought to find himself...It must be governed by rule, not by humour, it must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful.[40]

It is well-settled that the role of a writ court is limited to ensure that discretion has been exercised by the authority in accordance with the law.[41] It is, however, clear that, despite such discretion, the writ court is competent to review the agency's use of discretion in order to determine whether it is within the permissible class of actions. Presumptively an exercise of administrative discretion is reviewable for legal error, procedural detect or abuse. One of the methods of vitiating the exercise of discretion is where the person entrusted with it exercises it at the dictation of some other person. In such cases, reasoning adopted is that although such a person is acting himself, it is not his own discretion which governs the act, as the legislature intended that it should be.[42] However, this is not an absolute rule to be blindly applied to each case. There are, at least, two exceptions to this general rule. The first is that where an explicit statutory provision has been made for a person to be given binding instructions by a superior, if that person, acts accordingly, the action would not be vitiated.[43] The second exception is where the instructions are issued by a person who in law can himself exercise the discretion, it would not vitiate the action of the inferior authority. In other words, both the authorities superior as well as subordinate, if they have concurrent power to exercise administrative discretion then even if the inferior authority purports to exercise the discretion at the behest of such superior authority, such an exercise of discretion would not be bad in law.[44] But an authority who has a discretionary power, cannot be forced to exercise the discretion in a particular manner.[45] The exercise of discretion may be impugned directly or indirectly. The indirect method of challenge is more common. As SA de Smith wrote:

> A person aggrieved by the exercise of a discretionary power may, instead of attacking the merits of the exercise of the discretion, contend that the repository of the discretion has acted without jurisdiction or ultra vires because of the non-existence of the state of affairs upon which the validity of the exercise of the discretion depends. Or he may contend that the repository of the discretion has failed to observe the rules of natural justice (if they are found to be applicable) or other essential procedural requirements. If his contentions are successful the court will hold the discretionary act to be invalid and the fact that the true reasons for instituting proceedings will have been his dislike of the manner in which the discretion itself was exercised is not a valid objection to the proceedings.[46]

The discretionary power may be abused bona fide or mala fide. Mala fides can be a ground of invalidity sui generis. It can also be regarded as a quality which brings the exercise of power within one of the other recognised categories of invalidity. The writ court will generally review judicial discretion of administrative or quasi-judicial authorities;[47] but it will refrain from interfering when the discretion is purely of administrative nature, not measurable by reference to any objective standards.[48] A mere wrong decision cannot be corrected by the writ of certiorari as that would be using the writ jurisdiction as a cloak of an appeal in disguise. A writ of certiorari is generally granted in cases where a tribunal acts in flagrant disregard of the rules of natural justice when no particular procedure is prescribed. For instance, when it is brought to the notice of the court that in interpreting and appreciating the evidence on record the industrial tribunal forgot the principles of benevolent construction especially in a social welfare legislation, nothing will prevent it from interfering with the decision of such tribunal.[49] Likewise, the refusal of the labour court to grant normal relief of reinstatement with full backwages in a case of retrenchment without compliance with the provisions of s 25F would not be proper exercise of discretion.[50] A direction with regard to payment of subsistence allowance and backwages is a matter of discretion on the part of an industrial tribunal and such discretion cannot be interfered with in judicial review unless it is satisfactorily shown that the discretion has been exercised wrongly or without just grounds.[51] Likewise, the writ court cannot come to any definite finding as to actual increase in dearness allowance and substitute its own discretion in this connection for that of the tribunal.[52] The discretion exercised by the tribunal in fixing the age of retirement after taking the relevant factors into consideration cannot be interfered with in exercise of the power of superintendence under Art 227.[53] Similarly, the discretion exercised in fixing a gratuity scheme awarded by the tribunal taking into consideration the relevant factors in consonance with the law laid down by the Supreme Court could not be interfered with in judicial review.[54] Likewise, where the tribunal, taking the relevant facts of a case directs that its award in respect of wages, dearness allowance or any other matter will be operative from a date between the date of the demand and the date of the award, the reviewing court generally will not interfere with the discretion of the tribunal.[55] Discretion of the tribunal condoning delay or laches will also not be liable to be interfered with.[56]

In Shaw Wallace, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the power of the High Court under Art 226 to interfere with the discretion exercised by the labour court under s 11A was very limited, and unless it was shown that the labour court had taken a perverse or shockingly unreasonable view, which no reasonable person with an obligation to judiciously determine a question would have come to, the exercise of power to interfere in the said discretion was not available.[57] In PGI Medical Assn, the Supreme Court held that the labour court has the discretion to restrict the quantum of backwages, while ordering the reinstatement of a workman whose services were terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F. 'Where the interference of the High Court is sought against such an order of labour court, there exists an obligation on the part of the High Court to record in the judgment, the reasons before denouncing the order of tribunal. There ought to be available in the judgment itself a finding about the perversity or the erroneous approach of the labour court and it is only upon recording therewith that the High Court has the authority to interfere.[58] In Balbir Singh, the Supreme Court held that the tribunal has the discretion to mould the relief and if the discretion is exercised judicially, the order of the tribunal does not warrant interference.[59] Where the workman, who was dismissed from service for assaulting and using intemperate and foul language against superior officers, was directed by the tribunal to be reinstated with a lesser punishment, the award of the tribunal was quashed and the dismissal was upheld.[60]

Where the labour court upheld the dismissal of a workman for beating a co-worker, the High Court held that the labour court had exercised its jurisdiction properly in the matter.[61] In a case where a daily-rated workman did not join the place to where he was transferred and gave no satisfactory explanation, it amounts to the abandonment of service, and not a case of termination, yet he was awarded compensation for non-compliance with s 25F, but without reinstatement, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the workman had no right to hold the position, and the compensation awarded by the labour court was to meet the ends of justice, and hence, the order of the labour court did not warrant interference by the High Court.[62] Where the labour court directed reinstatement of an employee, terminated on grounds of abandonment for unauthorised absence from duties for two years, the High Court quashed the award and held that the labour court should not have exercised its discretion to interfere with the termination, in the face of admitted facts that the employee absented himself deliberately from duty without even a letter and that too for more than two years.[63] In Ramanna, the Karnataka High Court held that in a case, where a conductor was dismissed for not collecting fare from passengers and after taking into consideration the earlier default cases against him, the labour court while exercising its jurisdiction under s 11A ought not to have interfered with the punishment by modifying it as reinstatement with 50 per cent backwages.[64]

Findings of Fact:

A 'finding of fact' has been defined by Prof SA de Smith as 'an assertion that a phenomenon exists, has existed or will exist, independently of any assertions as to its legal effect'.[65] However, in analysing the nature of the process by which a tribunal has come to its conclusion on a question of fact, perplexing problems may arise. Every finding by an adjudicator postulates a process of abstraction and inference which may be conditioned solely by his practical experience and knowledge of affairs or partly or wholly by his knowledge of legal principles. He hears evidence and by satisfying himself as to its reliability, finds what were the 'true facts'; it may then be necessary for him to draw a series of inferences from these primary findings in order to determine what were the material facts on which he had to base his decision; in order to draw certain of these inferences correctly, he may need to apply his knowledge of legal rules.[66] However, a tribunal which has recorded a finding of a primary fact wholly unsupported by evidence or which has drawn an inference wholly unsupported by any of the primary facts found by it, will be held to have erred in point of law. The 'no evidence' rule is well-established because the writ courts will intervene where a manifest and gross error of this nature is revealed.[67] The jurisdiction of a writ court to issue a writ of certiorari under Art 226 has been succinctly stated by Gajendragadkar J in Syed Yakoob, in the following words:

> ... the jurisdiction to issue a writ of certiorari is a supervisory jurisdiction and the Court exercising it is not entitled to act as an appellate court. This limitation necessarily means that findings of fact reached by the inferior court or tribunal as a result of the appreciation of evidence cannot be reopened or questioned in writ proceedings. An error of law which is apparent on the face of the record can be corrected by a writ, but not an error of fact, however grave it may appear to be. In regard to a finding of fact recorded by the tribunal, a writ of certiorari can be issued if it is shown that in recording the said finding, the tribunal had erroneously refused to admit admissible and material evidence, or had erroneously admitted inadmissible evidence which has influenced the impugned finding. Similarly, if a finding of fact is based on no evidence, that would be regarded as an error of Jaw which can be corrected by a writ of certiorari. In dealing with this category of cases, however, we must always bear in mind that a finding of fact recorded by the tribunal cannot be challenged in proceedings for a writ of c ertiorari on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the tribunal was insufficient or inadequate to sustain the impugned finding. The adequacy or sufficiency of evidence led on a point and the inference of fact to be drawn from the said finding are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal, and the said points cannot be agitated before a writ court.[68]

It is now well-settled that the writ court can set aside an order in case of an error of law and not error of fact. In other words, it is not entitled to correct a finding of fact by the tribunal, as if it were a court of appeal, in its writ jurisdiction.[69] The tribunal is the sole judge of a fact and if there be some legal evidence on which its findings may be based, the adequacy or reliability of this evidence is not a matter which can be permitted to be canvassed in writ proceedings.[70] Thus, a finding of fact based on appraisement of evidence on record cannot be reappraised by a writ court.[71] The jurisdiction of the writ court under Arts 226 and 227 is to be most sparingly exercised and only in appropriate cases in order to keep the subordinate courts within the ambit and bounds of their authority and not for correcting mere errors.[72] In other words, interference by the writ court is not obligatory if facts of the case do not warrant such interference. Therefore, the power of the writ court to disturb the findings on question of fact in exercise of extraordinary powers is more than difficult.[73] It is only in matters when the tribunal acts without jurisdiction or in excess of or in violation of the principles of natural justice or refuses to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law or there is an error apparent on the face of the record and where all these aspects have resulted in manifest injustice.[74] It is now well settled law that the statement of facts recorded by a court or quasi-judicial tribunal in its proceedings, as regards the matter which transpired during the hearing, would not be permitted to be assailed as incorrect, unless steps are taken before the same forum. It may be open to a party to bring such statement to the notice of the court or tribunal and to have it deleted or amended. Further, it is not open to the parties to say that the proceedings recorded by the tribunal are incorrect.[75] The writ court cannot convert itself into an appellate court over the tribunals constituted under special legislation to resolve disputes of a kind qualitatively different from ordinary civil disputes and to readjudicate upon questions of facts decided by such tribunals.[76] Therefore, since the finding of fact is not ill-founded, unreasonable or perverse, the writ court will not interfere.[77]

The limitations on the exercise of writ jurisdiction in respect of matters based on findings of fact are too well known to be repeated. Therefore, the writ court cannot interfere with any finding of the adjudicatory authorities, only on the ground that on the basis of the material and evidence before it, another view was also possible.[78] In the case of Thonimudi Estate, the Madras High Court declined to interfere with the award of the labour court reinstating the workman, while it held that the award of backwages with continuity of service was excessive and reduced payment of backwages only for a period of two years.[79] Likewise, where on the question of age of the workman, the industrial tribunal accepted the evidence of the doctors on the basis of clinical and radiological tests and came to a definite finding that the workman was to retire on a particular date, the finding of the tribunal is not liable to be interfered with being perverse or unreasonable.[80] So long as the finding stands, the award of the tribunal cannot be interfered with. However, if the tribunal omits to take into consideration the important evidence while arriving at such a finding which has a material bearing on the controversy, its order would be vitiated and would be liable to be quashed.[81] In other words, if it is found that the tribunal ignored the legal evidence on record, considered one part of the evidence and rejected the other part on extraneous considerations, in that case the findings of the tribunal would be perverse inasmuch as he failed to consider the material evidence on record. It cannot go into the question of insufficiency and credibility of the evidence.[82] However, the writ court cannot set aside the finding of the fact on the basis of the assessment of the evidence, unless it is a case of 'no evidence'.[83] Even a wrong appraisal of evidence by the inferior tribunal would not justify the writ court in weighing the evidence, as if it were sitting in appeal against the order of the tribuna1.[84] In some cases, it might not be correct to rule out certain instances altogether as irrelevant because they might specifically become relevant as res gestae. Whether they were so or not, is for the tribunal to assess and not for the writ court to re-assess.[85] If the decision of the inferior tribunal is not perverse, the possibility of a view other than the one taken by the tribunal is no ground for interference by the writ court.[86]

Where the labour court rejected the charge of disobedience against the workman on the ground of non-production of certain documents which was called by the workman from the management, findings of labour court cannot be dubbed as perverse.[87] Likewise, a finding of the court about the date of birth of an employee based on oral and documentary evidence of the parties is a finding of fact not amenable to interference in judicial review.[88] However, if the tribunal in awarding some relief, acts without jurisdiction, the writ court has ample jurisdiction to interfere, as it is not a question of reviewing the finding of fact arrived at by the inferior tribunal.[89] In a writ petition filed by the employer, the writ court will have no jurisdiction to grant relief of interest to the workman even though the claim is reasonable.[90] For the application of these principles to cases of industrial adjudication, reference may be made to the under-noted cases.[91] In Navinchandra Shah, Desai, J extended the principle enunciated by the Supreme Court in Chitra Venkata Rao, not only to the extent of reappraising the evidence and quashing the order of the tribunal, but also granting relief to the party on the basis of such independent appreciation of evidence.[92] First let us take a look at the principle propounded in Chitra Venkata Rao, where the Apex Court held:

> The jurisdiction to issue a writ of certiorari under Art. 226 is a supervisory jurisdiction. The Court exercises it not as an appellate Court. The findings of fact reached by an inferior Court or Tribunal as a result of the appreciation of evidence are not reopened or questioned in writ proceedings. An error of law which is apparent on the face of the record can be corrected by a writ, but not an error of fact, however grave it may appear to be. In regard to a finding of fact recorded by a Tribunal, a writ can be issued if it is shown that in recording the said finding, the Tribunal, had erroneously refused to admit admissible and material evidence or had erroneously admitted inadmissible evidence which has influenced the impugned finding. Again if a finding of fact is based on no evidence, that would be regarded as an error of law which can be corrected by a writ of certiorari. A finding of fact recorded by the Tribunal cannot be challenged on the ground that the relevant and material evidence adduced before the Tribunal is insufficient or inadequate to sustain a finding. The adequacy or insufficiency of evidence led on a point and the inference of fact to be drawn from the said finding are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[93]

In Navinchandra Shah, Desai J raised the following 'leading' questions, which are rhetorical in nature and are themselves suggestive of the answers:

(i) Keeping in view our jurisdiction, namely that we can interfere with the order when the finding is completely baseless or perverse, could it not be said that before we say a finding is baseless or perverse that there was no misconduct at all on facts alleged and taken as admitted? (p. 67)

(ii) We are taking the evidence as produced to be wholly correct at the initial stage and feel that there is no misconduct. Can we not say that under Art 226? (p 67)

(iii) How do we expect a petitioner like the present one working as a weighman, more of a mechanical type of work, not calling for any educational attainment and ready to struggle for the whole of his life getting a meager wage of Rs 150 per month to understand the provisions of Standing Orders? (p 69)

(iv) Do we expect this petitioner to cross-examine witnesses on his own, unaided and unhelped by any one?

(v) If the petitioner says he was not employed and if that averment is not questioned in cross examination and if the employer does not lead evidence and does not say anything, it would indicate that the petitioner was not employed anywhere and the averment of the petitioner on oath must be accepted as trustworthy and reliable...The question then is should he not get his backwages?

(vi) What should be the approach in such a matter? The law of the land as pronounced by the Supreme Court is that in such cases, reinstatement must follow as a necessary corollary. Should he be denied wages? For what offence should the man be denied wages? Should he be visited with the further penalty by denying him wages? (p 73)

(vii) In such a case, for a writ of certiorari should the court content itself by merely quashing the order by which termination was provided for? In other words, is it a correct approach to the problem for in every case where a writ of certiorari is prayed for, the jurisdiction of the court under Art 226 (1) comes to an end as soon as the impugned order is quashed? (p 76)

(viii) The labour court completely overlooked the law of the land, namely, the decisions of the Supreme Court especially on the question whether before upholding the decision of the domestic tribunal, can it be said that what was alleged was misconduct within the relevant Standing Order and whether the prescribed mandatory procedure was followed or not and whether rules of natural justice is not in controversy. In such a case, the order is vitiated, the inquiry itself being illegal and defective. Now, what do we do? (p 80)

(ix) If Mr Nanavati is right, we quash the order and the matter goes back to the labour court. What has the labour court to do but merely to pass an order for reinstatement and backwages? (p 80)

(x) Even on the question of backwages, the relevant decisions of the Supreme Court which are binding have not been taken into consideration. Should we merely pay a lip sympathy to the form rather than the substance of the matter? (pp 80-81).

(xi) The injury is caused by not following the Standing Orders. Rules of natural justice govern every quasi-judicial inquiry. A contravention of it makes the order void is matter no more in dispute and what is the injury inflicted? (p 81)

Desai, J then proceeded to deal with them as follows:

It is not for a moment suggested that all errors must be overlooked as an error simpliciter. An error which has the consequence of leading to serious or atrocious consequences may be styled as negligence and it can only be gross provided the degree of culpability is very high (p 65)

This subsequent performance, therefore, clearly implies that the employer was actuated by an unfair motive in introducing facts subsequently so as to convert an accidental lapse or a slip of a. bona fide character into one of misconduct or were an element of mala fide as been introduced. Under these circumstances, the labour court could have interfered and should have interfered (p 68)

All these requirements are conspicuous by their very silence. This led us to make an observation, may be we are wrong, that at least apart from the petitioner, this manager of the institution was completely oblivious of the requirements of the Standing Orders. Possibly he did not know that there is something like Standing Orders (p 70)

We honestly feel that the labour court has completely missed the point and the order more or less reproduces the ipse dixit of the labour court. The court took the misconduct has proved without ever first examining, as was contended, whether the facts alleged constitute misconduct. It observed that on misconduct being proved, the other thing namely punishment must follow as a matter of course. It was open to the labour court to look at the inquiry and come to the conclusion whether it is vitiated or not. Not one word is to be found in the whole order of the labour court as to whether the inquiry was held consistent with the provisions of the Standing Orders (p 70)

The labour court then observed that the punishment of dismissal to a workman with clean record is too severe. Having so observed, the labour court converted the order of dismissal into an order of discharge...To say the least the labour court has practically approached the matter as if it was rubber-stamping the domestic inquiry. From a court of social justice, we expect much better approach. It must realise that dismissal in the life of a workman aged more than 50 means denial of further opportunity to work and when it converted the order of dismissal into discharge, we do not understand what was in the mind of the labour court. The mental process of the labour court is difficult to reconstitute. A termination of service with an averment of proved misconduct would > hardly help the petitioner even in getting gratuity, provided he had put in that much length of service which would qualify for gratuity. (p 70)

> After recording the finding of misconduct as proved, the conversion of dismissal into discharge is a paper formality devoid of any meaning. Its consequences are never appreciated. When he applies for service again no one is asking for a certified copy of the judgment of the labour court. section 11A was not introduced for this purpose. It was introduced to confer vital jurisdiction on labour court and when there is a dismissal for misconduct, what is expected of the labour court is to first ascertain whether on facts alleged it constituted misconduct, whether the finding is perverse and whether the inquiry was in consonance with the principles of natural justice as reproduced in the Standing Orders. None of the three steps is taken. The proof of misconduct is taken for granted without examining the charge, the complaint, the subsequent foisting in of a cooked up witness Udesing and the non-observance of relevant provisions of Standing Orders (pp 70-71)

> The illegality committed by the labour court is patent on the record in the sense that it did not care to look at the problem according to the law laid down in this country and in force in this country. Therefore, after the introduction of cl (b) and (c) in Art 226, we have no doubt in our mind that we cannot be confined to the narrow grooves of old historical notions with regard to writs in England but in the context of socio-economic justice, we must mould the reliefs as to be effective. That is what we must do and, therefore, this cloud or doubt about our power must stand dispelled by the discussion herein and we must grant appropriate relief. (p 81).

The above observations of Desai J are grossly misconceived and militate against the overriding decision of Supreme Court in Chitra Venkata Rao on the scope of jurisdiction of High Courts while dealing with a petition under Art 226. It is well settled that the High Court cannot review the evidence or correct an error of fact. It is well-settled that the petitioner would be entitled to wages only when it is found that he was wrongfully dismissed, and not otherwise. The mere fact that he had not worked anywhere else is no qualification for being entitled to backwages in the case of a dismissal, which was found by the labour court to be in order. If the labour court converted the order of dismissal into one of discharge, it was clearly to help the workman get the terminal benefits, but there was no finding whatsoever recorded by the labour court against the domestic enquiry or the quantum of punishment. What is meant by the observation: 'should he be denied wages?' and weather the employer need to bear the liability of paying wages for the period of unemployment in the post-dismissal period, when the enquiry did not suffer from any infirmity, and when he was prepared to comply with the order of labour court converting the dismissal into one of discharge? A perusal of the facts of the case suggest that the right course would have been to remand the matter to the tribunal, if the case disclosed an error of law for disposing it off in accordance with the provisions of law and/or the principles of natural justice. In Anil Vasant Marathe, Daud J of Bombay High Court held:

> The plea that the petitioner could have moved for a reference under s 2A read with s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 need not detain us for the existence of an alternative remedy is not always a bar to the invoking of the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226. More than five years have elapsed since the filing of the petition and it would be too late in the day to reject the petition on the ground of Petitioner not having exhausted the statutory remedies—assuming that these are available to him.[94]

The further observations of Daud J, in so far as the merits of the case are concerned, run thus:

> ...It is conceded that the petitioner's act of wrongfully confining Mrs Katdare was not motivated by any immoral or criminal considerations. He was annoyed with the refusal of Mrs Katdare to allow him to use the telephone board receiver. To give vent to his annoyance, he latched the cabin of the telephone reception from outside. This was a childish tantrum and should have been treated as such. It is said that the wrongful confining had a deleterious effect upon Mrs Katdare. Possibly so but reversion is too harsh a punishment. With respect to the Additional Municipal Commissioner he took an unusually severe view of the delinquency. Petitioner's so-called 'somewhat blemished record' has no bearing on the subject and should not lead to the imposition of the harsh punishment that is impugned in the present case. The question surviving is how the punishment is to be substituted. To my mind while a reprimand would have served in the normal circumstances. (at p 1085)

In the first place, mens rea is not a necessary pre-condition in respect of a misconduct of this nature, ie wrongful confinement of a co-employee, that too, of the opposite sex. Thus, the question of probing into the motive, ie whether it is with immoral intention or otherwise, becomes wholly irrelevant. Secondly, it is understandable if judges interfere with the punishment of dismissal on the ground that it takes away the livelihood of workmen but the High Court or Supreme Court cannot interfere with any punishment imposed under industrial law, except when it leads to severance of employer-employee relationship. Municipal corporation is an 'industry' and is therefore governed by the provisions of the industrial relations legislation and not Art 311. Lastly, the ID Act does not contemplate raising of an 'individual' dispute except in the case of discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination otherwise (s 2A), which means that in the instant case, the workman in his individual capacity was not entitled even to move the machinery provided under the Act. No labour court or tribunal is empowered to entertain the dispute or to interfere with any punishment short of dismissal (s 11A). That being the legal position with regard to the remedies provided under the Act, question arises as to whether the High Court could, entertain a writ petition circumventing the procedure prescribed in the statute. In a significant departure from the dysfunctional trends unleashed by Desai, Daud JJ and a few others, the Supreme Court in Mahendra Nissan, re-stated the scope of power conferred under Art 226 consistent with Chitra Venkata Rao and other cases. The facts of the case were: A workman was dismissed from service for certain acts of misconduct. The labour court confirmed the dismissal. The Andhra Pradesh High Court in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art 226 modified the order of the labour court to reinstatement without backwages (fresh appointment) on the ground that the charges levelled against the workman were not serious enough as to warrant dismissal. Allowing the appeal, Bharucha and Misra JJ observed:

> We do not agree with the High Court. The charges are of a serious nature. The first respondent was found to have led out workmen from the factory premises regardless of the challenge by the security guard. Along with these workmen, the first respondent entered the administrative building of the appellant and the room of the Deputy General Manager. The Deputy General Manager and Manager (Personnel) were abused in filthy language and threatened, examples of which have been given. Misbehaviour was also proved against the first respondent in his conduct with five executives of the appellants. if these are not serious charges against a workman worthy of his dismissal from service, we do not know what can be. The High Court was quite wrong in the conclusion that it reached and in the order that it passed. The punishment imposed against the respondent must remain unaltered. [95]

The above ruling has restored to Art 226, the scope of which was enlarged - by the judges of the hue and shade of Ray CJI, Desai J and others during the mid-1970s and thereafter, for no convincing reason - beyond the contemplation of the founding fathers of the Constitution. Despite several authorities as laid down by the Supreme Court repeatedly during the 1950s and 1960s to the effect that the scope of power and jurisdiction of a High Court while dealing with a petition under Art 226 was limited, this has not been strictly adhered to. The uncalled for dynamism and misplaced activism displayed by the learned judges as disclosed in Ajay Hasia, Sukhdev Singh and a spate of others during the two decades commencing from mid-1970, resulted in virtual anarchy in the legal firmament with litigants directly approaching High Courts and Supreme Court in absolute disregard of the statutory remedy provided under different enactments, thereby feeding the fire of inordinate delays in disposing of the cases languishing in the Higher Courts for decades. In Bhola Nath Singh, the facts disclosed that the High Court examined the evidence as a first appellate court and reversed the findings of fact recorded by the enquiry officer and accepted by the disciplinary authority while exercising its jurisdiction under Art 226. The Supreme Court, setting aside the order of High Court, observed that, where no errors of law or procedure leading to manifest injustice or violation of principles of natural justice were found committed in the domestic enquiry, the exercise undertaken by the High Court was illegal and unsustainable.[96] Where the reference was in terms 'whether the retrenchment of workmen of contractors is justified', the tribunal was right in refusing to go behind the reference and decide the question whether the retrenched workmen belonged to the contractor or the principal employer. Further, the finding of the tribunal that the workmen concerned were the workmen of contractor cannot be interfered with by the High Court under Art 226.[97]

Where the reference made by the Government was in terms 'whether the workmen should be treated as plant assistants and given consequential benefits on par with a workman who was appointed along with them, but as plant assistant', the Supreme Court upheld the award of the tribunal to the effect that the said workmen having accepted the posts as trainee operators and having worked in those posts for a long time, it was not open to them to contend that they were entitled to higher emoluments; that only when their services were treated as plant assistants and from the date they were plant assistants they would be entitled to the enhanced benefits. The court quashed the order of High Court and held that, in the circumstances, there was no justification for the High Court to have interfered with the award of the tribunal.[1] When the Labour Court arrives at a finding overlooking the materials on record, it would amount to perversity and the writ Court would be fully justified in interfering with the said conclusion. The High Court exercising writ of certiorari would not assume the role of the appellate Court, however, the Court is well within its power to interfere if is shown that in recording the said finding, the Tribunal/Labour Court had erroneously refused to admit the admissible and material evidence or had erroneously admitted any inadmissible evidence which has influenced the impugned finding, the writ Court would be justified in exercising its remedy. If a finding of fact is based on no evidence that would be regarded as an error of law which can be corrected by a writ of certiorari.[2]

In JK Synthetics, the facts were that the company had closed a section of its plant for want of power and terminated the services of workmen. The government made a reference in terms 'whether the 'retrenchment' of workmen of four divisions of the company was justified'. The tribunal proceeded to decide the question whether or not there was a closure before dealing with the question of retrenchment and granting relief to the workmen. The Rajasthan High Court came to the conclusion that there was no textile section and that there was no closure of it and hence, the tribunal would not have gone into the question of closure. Quashing the order and restoring the award of tribunal, the Supreme Court held that the High Court erred in drawing such a conclusion in the face of the fact that it was admitted before the tribunal and there was no dispute as to the existence of textile section as well as its closure, and observed that the tribunal was right in deciding that question in the first instance before going into the question of relief to the workmen.[3] In Velayudhan, the Supreme Court held that once the labour court examined the proportionality of the punishment to the gravity of the charge and came to the conclusion that the punishment of dismissal imposed by the management was justified and proper, it was not for the High Court to substitute its discretion for that of the labour court.[4] In Cyril Emanuel, Narayana J, of the AP High Court reappraised the evidence and directed that the dismissal, which was upheld by the industrial tribunal, be substituted with a lesser punishment.[5] The learned judge further imported his own conjectures into the case by holding that the workman might have become the victim of internal politics. In this case, the workman was dismissed for proved misconduct on charges inter alia of not working and sending petitions against superior officers, etc. This decision is a clear violation of the law laid down by the Apex Court in a battery of cases, and needs to be reviewed. In IOB, the canteen was closed, throwing the employees out of employment. This was challenged as violative of s 25-O. The tribunal ordered reinstatement of 33 employees of the canteen, which was set aside by a single judge of the High Court. The Division Bench in appeal restored the order passed by the tribunal. The Supreme Court observed:

> The learned single judge seems to have undertaken an exercise, impermissible for him in exercising writ jurisdiction, by liberally appreciating the evidence and drawing conclusions of his own on pure questions of fact, unmindful, though aware fully, that he is not exercising any appellate jurisdiction over the awards passed by a tribunal, presided over by a judicial officer. The findings of fact recorded by fact-finding authority duly constituted for the purpose and which ordinarily should be considered to have become final, cannot be disturbed for the mere reason of having been based on materials or evidence not sufficient or credible in the opinion of the writ court to warrant those findings, at any rate, as long as they are based upon some material which are relevant for the purpose or even on the ground that there is yet another view which can reasonably and possibly taken.[6]

Conduct of the Petitioner:

Writ remedies being of discretionary nature, a party may by his conduct preclude himself from claiming a writ ex debito justitiae, no matter whether the proceedings he seeks to quash are void or voidable.[7] A person whose conscience is not clear or whose hands are not clean or who has been guilty of laches and deliberate omission is not entitled to invoke the writ jurisdiction of the court for a writ of certiorari.[8] It is not open to a petitioner to pick and choose his own facts and to determine in advance, what is relevant material or omit to mention any material facts, proceedings and orders and then claim that he has acted bona fide.[9] In this extraordinary jurisdiction, the petitioner is expected to disclose all material facts, even if they go against him.[10] In Vasant Vithal Palse, an application for special leave to appeal filed by a trade union challenging the award was dismissed by the Supreme Court. Subsequently, an individual workman filed a writ petition before the High Court impugning the same award without disclosing the fact that the application of the trade union for special leave to appeal was rejected by the Supreme Court. The High Court took this fact into consideration for rejecting the writ petition and remarked:

> It is only fair that a citizen invoking the extraordinary jurisdiction of this court should place all the facts and circumstances in respect of the particular litigation before the court and if this obligation is not observed, the petitioner is certainly guilty of suppression.[11]

The High Court will not countenance a party taking a ground inconsistent with his own previous action, in granting relief in its writ jurisdiction.[12] Where the objection to the jurisdiction of a tribunal is latent, the acquiescence of the party who is aware of the assumption of jurisdiction, may disentitle him to a writ because of his conduct.[13] Where the petitioner failed to bring to the notice of the arbitrator under s 10A to entertain and decide the dispute in view of the efflux of time, the remedy of interference by a writ was declined on the ground of the conduct of the petitioner.[14] Where a party did not appear before the tribunal and allowed the matter to be decided uncontested and gave no explanation for its non-appearance, the writ court would be justified in refusing to entertain the writ petition because such a party will be deemed to have waived its rights.[15] The failure of the petitioner to file copies of his appointment and termination orders and his failure to prove, that the remedy before labour court is not efficacious, would disentitle him to invoke the jurisdiction of the writ court for violation of s 25F.[16] In KN Dutt,[17] the petitioner was a retired government officer and the government deducted certain amounts due to it, from his retiral benefits. His writ petition against the said deduction was dismissed. However, he again filed another writ petition without disclosing the previous writ petition and succeeded before a Division Bench. In appeal by the state, the Supreme Court strongly disapproved of the conduct of the officer as a serious lapse on his part.[18] In N Palaniswami, the tribunal refused to grant the relief of reinstatement of the workman on the ground that he was absent from service for a long time and the employer had made some alternative arrangement and, on this ground, it ordered the payment of Rs 10,000/- in lieu of reinstatement. Accordingly, the employer sent a cheque covering the amount awarded by the labour court but the workman accepted the cheque under protest and without prejudice to his right of filing a writ petition against the award. The court held that the principle of accord and satisfaction will not apply and the conduct of the worker will not disentitle him to relief either by way of writ petition or by application under any provision of law.[19] In Jayanta Nath Mazumdar, the court also awarded a lump sum of Rs. 5000/- in lieu of reinstatement. This amount was accepted by the workman without any protest. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the petitioner was disentitled to challenge the award of the tribunal in a writ petition.[20]

The High Court in its writ jurisdiction cannot interfere with legislative enactments or rules and regulations made thereunder.[21] Even if an order or award of the tribunal is vitiated by certain defects, the High Courts in their jurisdiction may not interfere unless there is any gross miscarriage of justice or flagrant violation of law calling for intervention.[22] On the same principles, the High Court will not entertain a writ petition for deciding merely technical and abstract questions.[23] Likewise, the court will also not issue writs where it will be futile to issue such writs or the interest of justice does not warrant or where there is no manifest injustice done to the petitioner. Similarly, where there is no infringement of any legal right or breach of any statutory rules, the extraordinary remedy under the writ jurisdiction will not be available to a petitioner.[24]Normally, the High Court will not be inclined to interfere where the petition involves disputed questions of fact. In such cases, if the High Court is of the view that the disputed questions of fact may not appropriately be tried in a petition for a high prerogative writ, it can refuse to try these questions and relegate the party to his normal remedy. The question whether an employee is a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) of the Act, cannot be adjudicated in writ proceedings and the employee has to raise an industrial dispute and get it referred under s 10.[25] The principle is that 'where basic facts are disputed and complicated questions of law and fact are involved, the writ court is not the proper forum for seeking relief. The right course for the High Court is to dismiss the writ petition on this preliminary ground without entering upon the merits of the case.[26] In Biecco Lawrie,[27] a single judge of the Calcutta High Court refused to interfere with a settlement which had been acted upon, and held that if a question of interpretation of the settlement was involved, the aggrieved party could have recourse to the provisions of s 36A. In UPSEB, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court refused to interfere with the order of the labour court under s 33C(2) of the Act as no manifest injustice had been done to the employer.[28] Where the labour court recorded a preliminary finding that the enquiry was vitiated and directed the management to let its evidence and the management filed a writ petition against the said direction, it was held that the High Court in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art 226 cannot interfere with the orders of the labour court at such a preliminary stage.[29]

(c) Judicial, Quasi-judicial and Administrative Functions

In the language of Griffith CJ:

> The words judicial power ...mean the power which every sovereign authority must of necessity have to decide controversies between its subjects, or between itself and its subjects, whether the rights relate to life, liberty or property. The exercise of this power does not begin until some tribunal which has power to give a binding and authoritative decision (whether subject to appeal or not) is called upon to take action.[30]

However, a judicial decision is not always the act of a judge or a 'tribunal' invested with powers to determine questions of law and fact; it must, however, be the act of a body or authority vested by law with authority to determine questions of dispute affecting the rights of citizens under a duty to act judicially. A judicial decision always postulates the existence of a duty laid upon an authority to act judicially. Administrative authorities are often invested with authority or power to determine questions which affect the rights of citizens. The authority may have to invite objections to the course of action proposed by it; it may be under a duty to hear the objectors, and its decision may seriously affect the rights of citizens, but unless, in arriving at its decision, it is required to act judicially, its decision will be executive or administrative. Legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of citizens, does not make the determination judicial; it is the duty to act judicially which invests it with that character. What distinguishes a judicial act from an administrative one is, therefore, the duty imposed upon the authority to act judicially.[31] For the purposes of certiorari and prohibition, judicial acts have to be distinguished from the discretionary acts which are ordinarily called administrative.[32]

In Cooper, the court of appeal indicated that it was not the character of an authority, but the character of the power exercised, that mattered. If it adversely affects the legal rights or interests, it must be exercised fairly.[33]Two especially important aspects are discernible from the judgments of this case; the universality of the principle, which makes it applicable to almost the whole range of administrative powers; and the presumption that it will always apply, however silent about it the statute may be. Thus, the courts justified their intervention by holding that every judicial act is subject to the procedure required by natural justice and then they denominated the great majority of administrative acts as 'judicial' for this purpose. The expression 'quasi-judicial' was coined as an epithet for powers which, though administrative, were required to be exercised as if they were judicial, i.e., in accordance with natural justice. By this device, the courts developed the system of fair administrative procedure.[34] Instead of saying that natural justice must be observed both in judicial and administrative acts, the courts stretched the meaning of 'judicial' in an unnatural way by treating 'administrative acts' as 'judicial' if they affected a person's rights or entailed penalty. A graphic example of this is a statement by Willis J in Hopkins.[35] However, Cooper's case played an important part in the recent revival of the 'right to be heard'. Thus, there was a complete overlapping of the expressions 'judicial' and 'administrative' where a person's rights were affected. For an illuminating exposition of the subject, reference may be made to the discussion by SA de Smith in Judicial Review of Administrative Action,[36] concluding on an optimistic note:

> At this point, terminological and conceptual problems may appear to be overwhelming. However, we shall see that to an increasing extent courts exercising powers of judicial review in administrative law are abandoning servitude to their own concepts and asserting mastery over them.[37]

In India also, the line of distinction between judicial and administrative functions is also equally blurred. In connection with the distinction between an administrative power and quasi-judicial power in AK Kraipak, the Supreme Court said:

> The dividing line between an administrative power and a quasi-judicial power is quite thin and is being gradually obliterated. For determining whether a power is an administrative power or a quasi-judicial power one has to look to the nature of the power conferred, the person or persons on whom it is conferred, the framework of the law conferring that power, the consequences ensuing from the exercise of that power and the manner in which that power is expected to be exercised. In a welfare state like ours, it is inevitable that the organ of the state under our Constitution is regulated and controlled by the rule of law. In a welfare state like ours, it is inevitable that the jurisdiction of the administrative bodies is increasing at a rapid rate. The concept of rule of law would lose its validity if the instrumentalities of the state are not charged with the duty of discharging their functions in a fair and just manner. The requirement of acting judicially in essence is nothing but a requirement to act justly and fairly and not arbitrarily or capriciously. The procedures which are considered inherent in the exercise of a judicial power are merely those which facilitate, if not ensure a just and fair decision. In recent years the concept of quasi-judicial power has been undergoing a radical change. What, was considered as an administrative power some years back is now being considered as quasi-judicial power...With the increase of the power of the administrative bodies it has become necessary to provide guidelines for the just exercise of their power. To prevent the abuse of that power and to see that it does not become a new despotism. Courts are gradually evolving the principles to be observed while exercising such powers. In matters like these, public good is not advanced by a rigid adherence to precedents: New problems call for new solutions. It is neither possible nor desirable to fix the limits of a quasi-judicial power.[38]

The question whether an act is a judicial act or an administrative one, arises ordinarily in the context of the proceedings of an administrative tribunal or authority. The fact that an order was issued or an act emanated from an administrative tribunal would not make it any less a quasi-judicial act, if the aforesaid tests are satisfied. The concept of quasi-judicial act has been conceived and developed by English judges, with a view to keep administrative tribunals and authorities, who are not courts and whose orders are not judicial strictu sensu, within their bounds. However, the term quasi-judicial has itself been used in several different senses.[39] In Cooper v Wilson , it was observed:

> A true judicial decision presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties, and then involves four requisites: (1) The presentation not necessary orally of their case by the parties to the dispute; (2) if the dispute between them is a question of fact, the ascertainment of the fact by means of evidence adduced by the parties to the dispute and often with the assistance of argument by or on behalf of the parties on the evidence; (3) if the dispute between them is a question of law, the submission of legal argument by the parties; and (4) a decision which disposes of the whole matter by a finding upon the facts in dispute and application of the law of the land to the facts so found, including, where required a ruling upon any disputed question of law. A quasi-judicial decision equally presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties and involves (1) and (2), but does not necessarily involve (3) and never involves (4). The place of (4) is in fact taken by administrative action, the character of which is determined by the minister's free choice. [40]

The distinction between quasi-judicial and administrative acts of tribunals has been succinctly stated by Parker J in Manchester Legal Aid Commitee, in the following words:

> The true view, as it seems to us, is that the duty to act judicially may arise in widely different circumstances which it would be impossible, and, indeed inadvisable, to attempt to define exhaustively...When, on the other hand, the decision is that of an administrative body and is actuated in whole or in part by questions of policy, the duty to act judicially may arise in the course of arriving at that decision. Thus if in order to arrive at the decision, the body concerned has to consider proposals and objections and > consider evidence, then there is the duty to act judicially in the course of that inquiry.. . Further an administrative body in ascertaining facts or law may be under a duty to act judicially notwithstanding that its proceedings have none of the formalities of and are not in accordance with the practice of a court of law.. .. If, on the other hand, an administrative body in arriving at its decision at no stage has before it any form of lis and throughout has to consider the question from the point of view of policy and expediency, it cannot be said that it is under a duty at any stage to act judicially. [41]

Halsbury's Laws of England states as follows:

> Potentially important legal consequences flow from the designation of a function as legislative, executive or administrative, judicial (or quasi-judicial), or ministerial. Precise definitions of these categories are, however, unattainable; one class of function tends to shade off into another, and in practice classification varies according to the context and the purpose for which classification is attempted.[42]

In India, Ridge v Baldwin has been followed by the Supreme Court in PN Sharma, in holding that the decision of an administrative authority required to act judicially without complying with the rules of natural justice will be a nullity. Gajendragadkar J held that in dealing with the questions whether any impugned order could be reviewed under Art. 226 of the Constitution, the test prescribed by Lord Reid in his judgment may afford considerable assistance.[43] The tests for distinguishing quasi-judicial functions from administrative functions were stated by the Supreme Court in KS Advani.[44] Those tests were reiterated in Radheshyam.[45] The industrial case in which these tests were approved is Jaswant Sugar, where speaking for the court, Shah J observed:

> A judicial decision is not always the act of a judge or a tribunal invested with power to determine question of law or fact: it must however be the act of a body or authority invested by law with authority to determine questions or disputes affecting the rights of citizens and under a duty to act judicially. A judicial decision always postulates the existence of a duty laid upon the authority to act judicially. Administrative authorities are often invested with authority or power to determine questions, which affect the rights of citizens. The authority may have to invite objections to the course of action proposed by him, he may be under a duty to hear the objectors, and his decision may seriously affect the rights of citizens but unless in arriving at his decision he is required to act judicially, his decision will be executive or administrative. Legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of citizens, does not make the determination judicial: it is the duty to act judicially which invests it with that character. What distinguishes an act judicial from administrative is therefore the duty imposed upon the authority to act judicially.[46]

The following criteria for identifying a judicial decision or act were stated:

(1) it is in substance a determination upon investigation of a question by the application of objective standards to facts found in the light of pre-existing legal rules;

(2) it declares rights or imposes upon parties obligations affecting their civil rights; and

(3) that the investigation is subject to certain procedural attributes contemplating an opportunity of presenting its case to a party, ascertainment of facts by means of evidence if a dispute be on questions of fact, and if the dispute be on question of law on the presentation of legal argument, and a decision resulting in the disposal of the matter on findings based upon those questions of law and fact.

(d) Grounds for Issue of writs of Certiorari and Prohibition

Every wrong order cannot be quashed merely because it is wrong. It can be quashed by certiorari or injuncted by prohibition, only if it is vitiated by some fundamental flaw such as violation of the fundamental rights, jurisdictional failures, violation of the rules of natural justice, errors of law apparent on the face of the record and perversity resulting in gross miscarriage of justice. In the words of Krishna Iyer J:

> Art 226 is a sparing surgery but the lancet operates where injustice suppurates... and judicial power should not ordinarily rush in where the other two branches fear to tread, judicial daring is not daunted where glaring injustice demands even affirmative action.[47]

In Harbans Lal, Pathak J observed:

> The limitations on the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226 of the Constitution are well settled... and it is well-known that a writ in the nature of certiorari may be issued only if the order of the inferior tribunal or subordinate court suffers from an error of jurisdiction, or from a breach of the principles of natural justice or is vitiated by a manifest or apparent error of law. There is no sanction enabling the High Court to reappraise the evidence without sufficient reason in law and reach findings of fact contrary to those rendered by inferior court or subordinate court. When the High Court proceeds to do so, it acts plainly in excess of its jurisdiction.[48]

The grounds for issuance of a writ of certiorari or prohibition can be conveniently treated under the following sub-heads:

(i) Fundamental Rights:

It is now well established that the Supreme Court, in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art 32 and the High Courts in their jurisdiction under Art 226, will quash the orders, directions or awards of the quasi-judicial authorities when they contravene the fundamental rights or are ultra vires the fundamental rights.[49] A detailed survey of this topic, therefore, would be out of place here.

(ii) Constitutional Safeguards:

Though the breach of constitutional safeguards other than the guarantees of the fundamental rights may not be amenable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under Art 32, they can be reviewed by the High Courts in their jurisdiction under Art 226. However, this topic also does not play any noticeable role in industrial law, hence this also is not being discussed in detail.

(iii) Jurisdiction:

Judicial control in Britain has grown out of the theory of jurisdiction, as applied through the old prerogative remedies, primarily certiorari and prohibition, hence excess or abuse of statutory jurisdiction will be quashed or prohibited as ultra vires, but power within jurisdiction cannot be controlled unless Parliament has provided a statutory appeal.[50] In other words, in writ jurisdiction, it is not possible for the High Court to examine an impugned award as if the court was hearing an appeal.[51] In the language of Diplock LJ, jurisdiction is an expression which is used in a variety of sense and takes its colour from its context.[52] Broadly speaking, jurisdiction means authority to decide.[53] The question whether a tribunal has jurisdiction depends not on the truth or falsehood of the facts into which it has to inquire, or upon the correctness of its findings on these facts but upon their nature, and it is determinable at the commencement, not at the conclusion, of the inquiry.[54] Hence, if a body has no such authority to decide a matter before it, its decision is either without jurisdiction or in excess of jurisdiction. In Ebrahim Aboobakar, the Supreme Court stated that want of jurisdiction may arise from:

(i) the nature of the subject matter; or

(ii) from the absence of some essential preliminary; or

(iii) upon the existence of some facts collateral to the actual matter which the court has to try and which are conditions precedent to the assumption of jurisdiction by it, ie, jurisdictional facts [55]

A more complete statement is by Sir James Coville in Colonial Bank, wherein he stated that these conditions may be founded either:

(i) on the character of the constitution of the tribunal;

(ii) upon the nature of the subject-matter of the inquiry; or

(iii) upon proceedings which have been made essential preliminary to the inquiry. [56]

The jurisdictional defects are dealt with under the following captions: (1) Absence of Jurisdiction on Account of Constitution of the Tribunal; (2) Excess of Jurisdiction or Lack of Jurisdiction: Nature of Subject-matter of Inquiry; (3) Declining Jurisdiction; (4) Proceedings Essential to Preliminary Inquiry: Jurisdictional or Collateral Issues; (5) Error of Law Apparent on the face of Record; (5) 'Jurisdictional fact' and 'Error of Law Apparent on the face of Record'.

(1) Absence of Jurisdiction on Account of Constitution of the Tribunal:

There is complete absence of jurisdiction if the tribunal is 'improperly constituted' or the proceedings before it have been 'improperly instituted'.[57] An authority, which is not constituted in accordance with the statute creating it will be acting without jurisdiction.[58] Not only such an authority will be amenable to a writ of quo warranto, the proceedings before it may be injuncted by a writ of prohibition and any orders or awards made by it will be liable to be quashed on certiorari. Sections 7, 7A & 7B of the Act lays down the requirements of law for the constitution of the labour courts, Industrial tribunals and national tribunals and the qualifications for the appointment of their presiding officers, while s 7C prescribes disqualifications against the appointment of the presiding officers of these bodies. Hence, if any of these authorities is constituted without complying with the requirements of these provisions or their presiding officers do not possess the requisite qualifications or are disqualified under s 7C, their continuance in office and their orders and awards will be reviewable on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction.[59]

(2) Excess of Jurisdiction or Lack of Jurisdiction: Nature of Subject-matter of Inquiry:

A startling instance of excess of jurisdiction is illustrated in the decision of the High Court of Assam and Nagaland in Kasojan Tea State. The labour court after hearing the case on preliminary points, made an award on the merits of the issues referred for adjudication instead of recording its decision on those points, without even giving an opportunity to the parties to adduce their evidence on merits. The High Court quashed the award and remanded the case for trial and expressed its annoyance by directing the government to transfer the matter from the labour court which had made that award to some other court under s 33B of the Act.[60]

(3) Declining Jurisdiction:

Declining jurisdiction is another ground on which the orders and awards of the tribunals are liable to be quashed on certiorari and the authorities may be served with the writ of mandamus to hear and determine the dispute before them in accordance with law. As to when a tribunal declines or does not decline jurisdiction, has been succinctly stated by Professor SA de Smith in the following words:

> A refusal to exercise jurisdiction may be conveyed by express words or by conduct. Thus, a tribunal is deemed to have declined jurisdiction if it fails to decide the question before it and instead decides a different question; or if it decides under the dictation of another body; or if it decides by reference to a predetermined rule of policy without giving any genuine consideration to the individual merits of the case before it; or if it improperly delegates its power of decision to another person or body; or if it rejects relevant evidence on the erroneous ground that it has no jurisdiction to inquire into the matter which the evidence was designed to prove; or if, misconceiving the scope of its own powers, it disclaims competence to take other relevant factors into account; or if it postpones the hearing for an unreasonable length of time or on inadmissible grounds.. .. A tribunal does not decline jurisdiction by making an erroneous decision on the merits of a case; but it does decline jurisdiction if it refuses to enter into the merits because it holds that it has no power to do so. There arises the familiar problem of distinguishing between the merits of a case and preliminary jurisdictional questions. In the context of refusal of jurisdiction, as distinct from excess of jurisdiction, English courts have given comparatively little attention to analysis of this problem, but it can be assumed that essentially the same principles apply to both refusal and excess of jurisdiction.[61]

The decision of the Calcutta High Court in Continental Commercial Co, provides an instance where the tribunal failed to exercise jurisdiction. While adjudicating on an industrial dispute covering several demands, the industrial tribunal rejected certain demands which were covered by an earlier settlement on the ground that the settlement governed the parties, since it was not terminated in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act. In writ proceedings, against the award of the tribunal, the High Court observed that the employer had waived the formal notice of termination of the settlement as required by s 19(2) of the Act. It was, therefore, held that the tribunal had failed to exercise jurisdiction vested in it by law and that part of the tribunal's award rejecting those demands of the workmen was quashed and a writ of mandamus was issued commanding the state government to place the remaining disputes before the same tribunal for fresh adjudication without taking the settlement into consideration.[62]

(4) Proceedings Essential to Preliminary Inquiry: Jurisdictional or Collateral Issues:

Broadly speaking, the existence of a fact which is a condition precedent to the operation of a statutory scheme has to be fully reviewed and independently determined as if it were a question of law by the reviewing court.[63] Such collateral facts are also commonly known as jurisdictional facts,[64] as they are collateral to the merits of the main question,[65] or the very issue,[66] which a tribunal has to decide in the proceedings before it. According to Prof. SA de Smith, the questions on the determination of which, the jurisdiction of the tribunal depends, are generally known as preliminary, jurisdictional or collateral questions. A preliminary or collateral question is said to be one that is collateral to the merits or to the very essence of the inquiry, it is not the main question which the tribunal has to decide. No satisfactory test has ever been formulated for distinguishing findings which go to jurisdiction from findings which go to the merits; and in some cases the courts, impressed by the logical difficulties, have ignored the distinction altogether. The courts, therefore, have been generally drawing rough and ready distinctions in individual cases and to justify them by reference to principles and authority. The result is that many of the reported decisions on the jurisdiction of the tribunals appear to be contradictory. The learned Professor observed thus:

> In so far as the question of a tribunal's jurisdiction is conceived of as being determinable 'at the commencement, not at the conclusion' of its inquiry, it is to be expected that the following matters will be treated as preliminary to the merits or as conditions of jurisdiction: whether the tribunal is properly constituted; whether the proceedings have been properly instituted by person entitled to initiate them; whether process has been duly served; whether a period of limitation has expired; whether the cause lies within the tribunal's territorial competence; whether the value of the subject-matter lies within prescribed monetary limits. None of these matters has been uniformly treated as jurisdictional; but it is clearly proper for a superior court to hold that an inferior tribunal lacks jurisdiction to embark on an inquiry unless the stage has been properly set.[67]

In this sense, in India, the theoretical distinction made between 'jurisdictional facts' which are collateral and the proof of which confers jurisdiction on the special tribunals and facts which are left to the decision of the tribunal is no doubt well settled,[68] but the demarcating line is as hazy as in England. In the former case, the correctness of the conclusion can be reviewed by the High Court acting under Art 226 of the Constitution, regardless of the fact whether the incorrect conclusion is a question of fact or a question of law,[69] while in the latter case, the power to interfere by the superior court will be limited to errors of law apparent on the face of record or errors of jurisdiction. In Commissioners of Income Tax, Lord MR Esher observed:

> When an inferior court or tribunal or body, which has to exercise the power of deciding facts, is first established by Act of Parliament, the legislature has to consider what powers it will give that tribunal or body. It may in effect say that, if a certain state of facts exists and is shown to such tribunal or body before it proceeds to do certain things, it shall have jurisdiction to do such things, but not otherwise. There it is not for them conclusively to decide whether that state of facts exists, and, if they exercise the jurisdiction without its existence, what they do may be questioned, and it will be held that they have acted without jurisdiction. But there is another state of things which may exist. The legislature may entrust the tribunal or body with a jurisdiction, which includes the jurisdiction to determine whether the preliminary state of facts exists as well as the jurisdiction, on finding that it does exist, to proceed further or do something more. When the legislature is establishing such a tribunal or body with limited jurisdiction, they also have to consider whether jurisdiction they give them, whether there shall be any appeal from their decision, for otherwise there will be none. In the second of the two cases I have mentioned, it is an erroneous application of the formula to say that the tribunal cannot give themselves jurisdiction by wrongly deciding certain facts to exist, because the legislature gave them jurisdiction to determine all the facts, including the existence of the preliminary facts on which the further exercise of their jurisdiction depends; and if they were given jurisdiction so to decide, without any appeal being given, there is no appeal from such exercise of their jurisdiction.[70]

By and large, the above dictum of Lord MR Esher has been followed by the Indian courts. If the tribunal proceeds to assume jurisdiction over an invalid reference or a non-industrial dispute, it can be successfully impugned before a writ court and the court will have the power to issue an appropriate writ in that behalf. The answer to the question whether or not the jurisdictional facts should be tried by a High Court in a writ petition or the tribunal, would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case and upon the nature of the preliminary issues raised between the parties.[71] Conversely, the tribunal cannot decline to exercise jurisdiction by erroneously holding that the dispute in question is not an industrial dispute. It is now well-settled that the superior court can review even the findings of fact relating to jurisdictional issues arrived at by an inferior tribunal.[72] In Sadhu Ram, the facts were: the employer had raised a preliminary objection that no industrial dispute was raised by the workman. The labour court had recorded a categorical finding that the union had raised a demand with the management. The High Court of Delhi quashed the award by issuing a writ of certiorari. In appeal, the Supreme Court observed that the jurisdiction under Art 226 had to be exercised with great circumspection. The fact that the questions decided pertain to jurisdictional facts does not entitle the High Court to interfere with the findings on jurisdictional facts which the tribunal is competent to decide. Where the circumstances indicate that the tribunal has snatched at the jurisdiction, the High Court may be justified in interfering. However, where the tribunal gets jurisdiction on a reference made to it, it was not proper for the High Court to substitute its judgment for that of the labour court and hold that the workmen had raised no demand with the management.[73]

The preliminary issues, such as whether on the facts of a case, the dispute is an 'industrial dispute' within the meaning of s 2(k) or whether the concerned persons are 'workmen' as defined in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act, can be validly examined and adjudicated upon by the tribunal itself, as it is the determination of such collateral issues which confers jurisdiction upon it to deal with the main reference entrusted to it.[74] Hence, a writ of prohibition would not be issued to a tribunal prohibiting it from proceeding with adjudication proceedings.[75] Absence of an 'industrial dispute' would obviously be sufficient to negative the jurisdiction and in such a case, the validity of the order of reference is open to examination by the High Court to decide whether the tribunal had jurisdiction.[76] Likewise, the question as to whether the reference is competent or not on the ground that previously the government had refused to refer the same dispute for adjudication, can be decided by the tribunal, hence a writ of prohibition cannot be issued restraining it from proceeding with the adjudication of such reference.[77]But if the vires of an Act creating a tribunal is challenged, such a question cannot be brought before the tribunal constituted under that Act.[78]Likewise, the validity of a notification under the Act constituting the tribunal can also not be challenged before that tribunal. Such questions, undoubtedly, have to be decided by the High Court in its writ jurisdiction without being agitated before the tribunals. In Express Newspapers, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> The High Court undoubtedly has jurisdiction to ask the industrial tribunal to stay its hands and to embark upon the preliminary inquiry itself. The jurisdiction of the High Court to adopt this course cannot be, and is indeed not, disputed. But would it be proper for the High Court to adopt such a course unless the ends of justice seem to make it necessary to do so? Normally, the questions of fact, though they may be jurisdictional facts, the decision of which depends upon the appreciation of evidence, should be left to be tried by the special tribunals constituted for that purpose. If and after the special tribunals try the preliminary issue in respect of such jurisdictional facts, it would be open to the aggrieved party to take the matter before the High Court by a writ petition and ask for an appropriate writ. Speaking generally, it would not be proper or appropriate that the initial jurisdiction of the special tribunal to deal with these jurisdictional facts should be circumvented and the decision on such a preliminary issue brought a High Court in its writ jurisdiction.. .. We wish to point out that in making these observations, we do not propose to lay down any fixed or inflexible rule; whether or not even the preliminary facts should be tried by a High Court in a writ petition, must naturally depend upon the circumstances of each case and upon the nature of the preliminary issue raised between the parties. Having regard to the circumstances of the present dispute, we think the court of appeal was right in taking the view that the preliminary issue should more appropriately be dealt with by the tribunal. The appeal court has made it clear that any party who feels aggrieved by the finding of the tribunal on this preliminary issue may move the High Court in accordance with the law.[79]

More often than not, the employers make it a practice to raise all sorts of preliminary objections, invite decisions on those objections in the first instance and then carry the matter to the High Court under Art 226 of the Constitution and then to the Supreme Court under Art 136 of the Constitution and then delay the decision of the real disputes for years, sometimes for decades. This situation was noticed by the Supreme Court in PP Mundhe, wherein it observed that when a case of dismissal or discharge of an employee is referred for industrial adjudication, the tribunal should first decide as a preliminary issue whether the domestic inquiry has violated the principles of natural justice when that matter is in controversy between the parties. However, with a view to obviate undue delay in adjudication of the real disputes caused by moving the writ courts against the decisions of the adjudicators on preliminary issues, the court made it clear that there will be no justification for any party to stall the final adjudication of the dispute by the labour court by questioning its decision with regard to the preliminary issues when the matter, if worthy, can be agitated even after the final award. It will be also legitimate for the High Court to refuse to intervene at this stage.[80] In Standard Pottery Works, it was held that the writ court should take into account that the decision on a preliminary issue is a matter concerning the jurisdiction of the tribunal whose further jurisdiction depends on the decision on the preliminary issue.[81]

In DP Maheshwari, speaking for a three-judge bench, Chinnappa Reddy J observed that with a view to avoid exploitation by the stronger parties of the weaker ones by dragging the latter from court to court for adjudication of peripheral issues, thus avoiding a decision on the main issues, the policy of deciding preliminary issues first must be reversed. He advised the tribunals to decide all issues in dispute at the same time without trying some of them as preliminary issues. He further advised the High Courts exercising writ jurisdiction under Art 226 of the Constitution against staying proceedings before the tribunals so that preliminary issues may be decided by them in the first instance. And further exhorted that Arts 226 and 136 should not be used to break the resistance of workmen by stifling the industrial tribunals by all manner of preliminary objections and journeying up and down. In exercise of the jurisdiction under these Articles, the High Courts and the Supreme Court are not required 'to be too astute to interfere with the exercise of jurisdiction by special tribunals at interlocutory stages and on preliminary issues. [82] These sentiments were again reverberated by the learned judge in SK Verma, wherein he pointed out that it has become quite a fashion to raise preliminary objections such as that if there is no 'industry', there is no 'industrial dispute' or the workman is not a 'workman', by the employers, whenever a dispute is referred for adjudication, thus avoiding the decision on the main issues referred for adjudication. Apart from discouraging the practice of interference by the High Courts and the Supreme Court by staying the proceedings before the industrial tribunals pending the decision on preliminary issues, the learned judge particularly and pertinently pointed out that the public sector undertakings must abjure the practice of arresting the decision on the main issues of the dispute under reference by raising preliminary objections.[83] In SD Singh, Khalid J deprecated the practice of the employers to stifle the efforts of workmen in their legitimate claims seeking benefits under the industrial law, by tiring them out in adjudication proceedings raising technical and hyper-technical pleas and thus, dragging on litigation for years altogether on such pleas. He exhorted the employers to meet the case of the workmen squarely on merits and get it adjudicated quickly.[84] In Chhatia Weaving Mills, the management had filed an application and undertook to substantiate its action through documentary and oral evidence at the time of hearing. But they led evidence only on the validity of the inquiry and not on the question of substantiating the allegations being under the impression that they would be called upon by the tribunal to adduce evidence after holding that the inquiry was not fair and proper. The High Court held that in coming to the conclusion that the management failed to justify its action of dismissing the workman, the tribunal did not commit any error. Patnaik J observed:

> Where piece-meal dismissal has not been directed by the tribunal or labour court and all controversies are to be disposed of simultaneously, there is no scope for the industrial tribunal or the labour court disclosing its mind to the parties. Furthermore, it is not obligatory on the tribunal to frame a preliminary issue on the question whether the inquiry was fair and proper because the law does not obligate the adjudicator to hear the matter piece-meal and to decide if the inquiry was fair and proper initially and then to grant an opportunity to the management if the finding went against it to adduce evidence on the delinquency of the workmen and the punishment imposed. [85]

On the other hand, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court in Binny, observed:

> It is clear that if in a given case, the decision on the preliminary issue given in favour of the party, who has come to the High Court in a petition under Art 226 of the Constitution, is not likely to end the main dispute and would unnecessarily prolong the dispute pending before the tribunal, it is appropriate for this court not to entertain the writ petitions. But in a case where the preliminary issue decided by the labour court is such that any decision in favour of the party approaching the High Court in a petition under Art 226 would end the dispute itself finally or would curtail unnecessary proceedings before the tribunal, the entertaining of the writ petition would be expedient in the interest of speedy final decision of the dispute itself.[86]

An Analysis of PP Mundhe, DP Maheswari & HD Singh cases

In PP Mundhe, the case turned on the question 'whether the Labour Court should decide, as a preliminary issue, whether the domestic enquiry violated the principles of natural justice, particularly, where the parties are at variance on that issue'. The main question was rightly decided by Goswami J by holding that it is for the employer to take a stand and seek permission to adduce additional evidence before the Labour Court; that if it chooses not to adduce any evidence, it would not thereafter be permissible for the management to raise the issue in any proceeding. But the further gloss added by the learned judge, to the effect that 'there would be no justification for any party to stall the final adjudication of the dispute by the Labour Court by questioning its decision with regard to the preliminary issue when the matter, if worthy, can be agitated even after the final award', is capable of producing great public mischief to the detriment of justice itself. In the first place, the said observation was more in the nature of obiter and, by no means was part of the ratio decidendi, as can be seen from his own statement: 'We are making these observations in our anxiety that there is no undue delay in industrial adjudication' (in para 22). In this connection, it should be noted that the above case was decided long before s. 17B was inserted in IDA.

According to the then prevailing legal position, it made no difference in terms of the legal consequences for employer, whether the Labour Court decided the preliminary issue first or decided both the preliminary issues and merits together. The insertion of s. 17B changed the complexion of the Act insofar as the employer is required to pay the last drawn wages, in the event he chooses to challenge the order of reinstatement, which means the final order of the Labour Court on merits gives rise to certain legal and financial consequences to the employer. Whatever may be the considerations that weighed with Goswami J in PP Mundhe, as regards the power to decide preliminary and merits together, they ceased to have any application the moment s. 17B was enforced. In HD Singh, Khalid J (for self and Reddy J) of the Supreme Court, held that the employer was prohibited from raising preliminary objections touching upon fundamental questions of law or jurisdiction of the court, and that the High Court should not interfere under Art 226.[87] In DP Maheshwari, Reddy J who was a member of the Bench that decided HD Singh, added further gloss, which runs thus:

> There was a time when it was though prudent and wise policy to decide preliminary issues first. But the time appears to have arrived for a reversal of that policy. We think it is better that Tribunals, particularly those entrusted with the task of adjudicating labour disputes where delay may lead to misery and jeopardise industrial peace, should decide all issues in dispute at the same time without trying some of them as preliminary issues. Nor should High Courts in exercise of their jurisdiction under Article 226 of the Constitution stop proceedings before a Tribunal so that a preliminary issue may be decided by them.[88] (Italics supplied).

The above observations of Khalid and Reddy JJ, are not only misconceived but are positively unconstitutional. The need for determining the preliminary issue is not merely confined to s. 33, but extends to the adjudication of disputes referred u/s. 10 as well. Order XIV, r 2 of CPC, runs thus:

2. Court to pronounce judgment on all issues—

(1) Notwithstanding that a case may be disposed of on a preliminary issue, the Court shall, subject to the provisions of sub-rule (2), pronounce judgment on all issues.

(2) Where issues both of law and of fact arise in the same suit, and the Court is of opinion that the case or any part thereof may be disposed of on an issue of law only, it may try that issue first if that issue relates to—

(a) the jurisdiction of the Court, or

(b) a bar to the suit created by any law for the time being in force, and for that purpose may, if it thinks fit, postpone the settlement of the other issues until after that issue has been determined, and may deal with the suit in accordance with the decision on that issue.

Rules 10B to 29 of IDCR (Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957) prescribe the procedure to be followed by the Labour Courts and Tribunals, which is to a large extent similar to that of a civil court. Reading the provisions of CPC and IDCR together, it becomes clear that where the issue raised is one of jurisdiction or of law, and if the proceedings can be disposed of on that issue alone, the court should try that issue as a preliminary issue before going into the merits. It would be futile for the court to go into the merits of the case, if it has no jurisdiction at all to try the matter or if the issue involves a question of law. In the face of this legal position coupled with the lethal effect of s. 17B, to say that the Tribunals would be justified in short-circuiting the adjudication process by arrogating jurisdiction wrongfully, merely because the trying of preliminary issues would lead to misery to one party, is outrageous. His further observation that the time had changed so much, warranting the trying of preliminary issues and merits together, is no less misplaced. Even assuming so, yet the letter and spirit of Arts 226 and 32 have certainly not changed to such an extent as to justify cutting corners by Tribunals. It is not as if the Constitution is meant exclusively for the benefit of one section of society to the detriment of others. This country has not yet decided to patronise communism as an ideology to be pursued at the national level so as to dispense the kind of lop-sided justice advocated by Reddy J. The said issue 'whether the Tribunals should decide preliminary issues first or decide them together with merits' was not raised at any forum below or even before Supreme Court. In these circumstances, should the above observation be taken as the 'ratio decidendi' or an uncalled for 'obiter' coming from an over-speaking judge?

Chief Justice Sethi of the Karnataka High Court followed the anarchic view of Reddy J, and held that the practice of framing preliminary issues in industrial disputes was contrary to 'law' and if permitted would defeat the very purpose for which the IDA was enacted.[89] It is doubtful as to which 'law' the learned Chief Justice was referring to—is it the law of jungle or of a civilised democracy governed by a Constitution of its own? If it were contrary to the so-called 'law', what prevented him from enlightening the Bar and Bench by citing the relevant legal provision? In the first place, whatever may be the legislative intent as regards 'speedy disposal' of industrial disputes, no provision of IDA prescribes 'summary procedure' of the kind provided for under O XXXVII of CPC. Section 11(3) of the IDA clearly states that the Labour Courts, etc, shall have the same powers as are vested with the civil court under CPC when trying a suit in respect of enforcing attendance, examination on oath, production of documents, issuing commissions, and other matters. It further stipulates that every investigation by Labour Court, etc., shall be deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of s s 193 and 228 of IPC. Rule 10B of the IDCR prescribes the powers of, and procedure to be followed by, Labour Courts,etc, which are analogous to that of a civil court. The observation of Reddy J, in Maheswari, though does not deserve to be elevated to the status of a sound, much less a sane, legal proposition, suffers from the further vice of being repugnant to the Constitution, given that it comes from a Supreme Court Judge, who is supposed to be the custodian of the Constitution. Even assuming that it was right, without conceding in the least, still its validity stood expired with the insertion of s 17B in IDA. Examples of gross abuse of power, self-misdirection, jurisdictional lapses and excesses on the part of Labour Courts far outnumber those which had been, and are being, decided in accordance with the law. A glance at the ever-inflating volumes of law journals in this branch bears eloquent testimony to this fact. If, in a chaotic dispensation bordering on licentiousness, the trial courts were to be directed not to frame preliminary issues that touch upon questions of jurisdiction and law, it would produce great public mischief to the detriment of the very concept of justice. To illustrate, where the preliminary issue touches upon questions such as -

(i) whether the Labour Court has jurisdiction at all to try the dispute; or

(ii) whether the person raising the dispute was the employee of the principal employer or of the contractor; or

(iii) whether the person answers at all to the definition of 'workman' u/s. 2(s); or

(iv) whether it is a case of abandonment on the part of the workman or a positive act of termination by the employer; or

(v) whether a workman can be said to be a 'workman concerned in the dispute' u/s. 33; or

(vi) whether the dispute referred for adjudication is an 'industrial dispute' u/s. 2(k) -

If the Labour Courts were to decide preliminary issues along with merits, it corrupts the judicial process and reduces it to what may be called 'unadulterated gambling'. Should the employer go on paying last drawn wages to the employee u/s. 17B on the basis of an award, which is prima facie incompetent, absurd and outside the competence of the Labour Court? Could it be said that s. 17B is meant for imposing such a preposterous obligation on the employer with no recourse in the event of the Labour Court arrogating to itself jurisdiction beyond the contemplation of the law? The decisions rendered in Maheshwari, HD Singh and Senapathy deserve to be condemned in the strongest possible language and terms as being insipid, perverse and repugnant to CPC, apart from being ultra vires the Constitution.

In the midst of judicial chaos of this magnitude, the decision of the Supreme Court in Hussain Mhasvadkar comes very refreshing in that the apex court made an attempt to undo the damage done by the likes of Reddy J. Two points were urged in the said case: (i) Whether the Bombay Iron and Steel Labour Board constituted under the provisions of the Maharashtra Mathadi, Hamal and Other Manual Workers (Regulation of Employment and Welfare) Act 1969 (MMHOMWREWA) falls within the definition of 'Industry' u/s 2(j) of IDA; and (ii) Whether the appellant, working at the relevant point of time as an Inspector, discharging duties, powers and obligations envisaged u/s 15 of the said Act answers to the description of 'workman' u/s 2(s) of IDA. Justice Raju (for self and Rajendra Babu J) of the Supreme Court, held that, in view of the fact that the court below entertained doubts about the status of the workman u/s 2(s) of IDA, they should have refrained from embarking upon adjudication on merits, and that the larger issue should have been entertained for consideration only if it was absolutely necessary, and not when the claim could have been disposed of otherwise without going into the nature and character of the undertaking itself.[90] This decision is consistent with the principles laid down in Motipur, Tata Iron and DCM as against the bankrupt rulings given in Maheshwari and other cases. Reverting to judicial remedies, it goes to the credit of the Karnataka High Court in so far as the learned judge admittedly rejected the insolvent decisions rendered by Chinnappa Reddy and Khalid JJ, and ordered that preliminary issues should be decided before going into the merits of the cases, as can be discerned in DV Jagadish. In this case, the employee had disputed the termination of his service as null and void, which was contested by the management on the ground that the concerned employee was not a 'workman' as defined in the Act. The Karnataka High Court quashed the order of the labour court which granted the interim relief without deciding the preliminary issue whether the employee was a 'workman' or not with the observation that the labour court ought to have decided the preliminary issue before considering the question of interim relief.[1]

(5) Error of Law Apparent on the Face of Record

In England though the application of certiorari to correct jurisdictional errors was never doubted, the efficacy of the writ to correct errors of law committed by inferior tribunals in exercise of their jurisdiction was for sometime diminished.[2] It was in Northumberland CAT, that the court of appeal revived the original scope and reach of the writ. The court of appeal held that certiorari could be issued to quash a decision of an inferior court on the ground of error of law apparent on the face of the record.[3] The development and the growth of law, making the error apparent on the face of record as a ground for quashing the decisions of quasi-judicial and administrative bodies in England,[4] is beyond the scope of this work. In TC Basappa, the Supreme Court accepted the view that error of law apparent on the face of record is a ground upon which a writ could be issued.[5] In Hari Vishnu Kamath, the court stated the law with more clarity by holding that it might be taken as settled that writ of certiorari could be issued to correct an error of law. But it is essential that it should be something more than a mere error; it must be one which must be manifest on the face of the record. The court observed that an error of law on the face of record cannot be defined and must be left to be determined on the facts of each case and, hence, it did not lay down any principles on which it was to be determined. It rather, expressed the apprehension that if caution is not exercised, certiorari might be issued as cloak of an appeal in disguise.[6] In Nagendra Nath Bora, Sinha J held that one of the grounds on which the jurisdiction of the High Court on certiorari may be invoked, is an error of law apparent on the face of record.[7]

(6) 'Jurisdictional fact' and 'error of law apparent on the face of record':

For the purpose of reviewing the wrong decisions of quasi-judicial authorities, a distinction is drawn between 'errors of law going to jurisdiction' and 'errors of law within jurisdiction', viz, going to the merits of the case. Normally, the excess of jurisdiction will invalidate a decision while an error within the jurisdiction will not.[8] In the latter type of cases, a tribunal has jurisdiction to go right, as much as it has jurisdiction to go wrong.[9] It is inherent in discretionary power that it includes the power to decide wrongly. The law on this subject has been succinctly stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, in the following words:

> Where the proceedings are regular on their face (emphasis added) and the inferior tribunal has jurisdiction to decide a matter, it ought not to be deemed to exceed its jurisdiction, merely because it goes wrong in law, for instance, if it incidentally misconstrues a statute, or admits illegal evidence, or rejects legal evidence, or misdirects itself as to the burden of proof or the weight of the evidence, or even arrives at a decision without any supporting evidence. Nevertheless, the area within which an inferior tribunal remains free to err on a question of law without committing a jurisdictional error must now be regarded narrow for such a tribunal may be held to exceed jurisdiction by taking legally irrelevant considerations into account or by failing to take relevant considerations into account or by asking itself and answering the wrong question, and there are but few errors of law which fall clearly outside these categories of jurisdictional error.[10]

This statement of law postulates that where 'the proceedings are regular on their face' there is immunity from judicial review. Conversely, if the proceedings are not regular on their face or there is some error or irregularity on the face of the proceedings, the case will be exceptional. In such cases, the power to decide wrongly does not extend to errors which are manifestly apparent or self-evident on the face of the record because it would be an affront to law.[11]

What is error of law apparent on the face of record?:

The expression 'error of law apparent on the face of record' is not capable of a precise definition as indefiniteness is implicit in its very nature. In R v Medical Appeal Tribunal, ex p Gilmore , Lord Denning LJ suggested that when a tribunal comes to a conclusion which could not reasonably be entertained by it, if it properly understood the relevant enactment, then it falls into error in point of law because, when the primary facts appear on the record, an error of this kind is sufficiently apparent for it to be regarded as an error on the face of the record such as to warrant an intervention of the court by issuing a writ of certiorari.[12] Later, in Baldwin & Francis, on an illuminating review of the earlier cases as an instance of 'error of law' he further said:

> ...if a tribunal bases its decision on extraneous considerations which it ought not to have taken into account, or fails to take into account a vital consideration which it ought to have taken into account, then its decision may be quashed on certiorari and a mandamus issued for it to hear the case afresh.[13]

In Anisminic, Lord Reid observed:

> But there are many cases where, although the tribunal had jurisdiction to enter on the inquiry, it has done or failed to do something in the course of the inquiry which is of such a nature that its decision is a nullity. It may have given its decision in bad faith. It may have made a decision which it had no power to make. It may have failed in the course of the inquiry to comply with the requirements of natural justice. It may in perfect good faith have misconstrued the provisions giving it power to act so that if failed to deal with the question remitted to it and decided some question which was not remitted to it. It may have refused to take into account something which it was required to take into account. Or it may have based its decision on some matter which, under the provisions setting it up, it had no right to take into account. [14]

An error of law must be a manifest error apparent on the face of the proceedings. In other words, it should be a patent error.[15] Gajendragadkar J observed:

> In all these cases, the impugned conclusion should be so plainly inconsistent with the relevant statutory provisions that no difficulty is experienced by the High Court in holding that the said error of law is apparent on the face of the record.[16]

But an error apparent on the face of the record does not mean a mere accidental or formal error which can be set right by the amendment, but it must be a substantial error which goes to the root of the matter.[17] In Satyanarayan, Das Gupta J attempted a negative test by stating what is not an error of law apparent on the face of record. The learned judge held:

> An error which has to be established by a long drawn process of reasoning on the point, where there may conceivably be two > opinions, can hardly be said to be an error apparent on the face of the record. Thus the complex nature of argument was adopted as a test of an error of law apparent on the face of record.[18]

In Ambica Mills, Gajendragadkar J observed:

> Sometimes it is said that it is only errors which are self-evident, that is to say, which are evident without any elaborate examination of the merits, that can be corrected, and not those which can be discovered only after an elaborate argument. In a sense it would be correct to say that an error of law which can be corrected by a writ of certiorari must be self-evident; that is meant by saying it is an error apparent on the face of the record, and from that point of view, the test that the error should be self-evident and should not need an elaborate examination of the record, may be satisfactory as a working test in a large majority of cases; ... Judicial experience, however, shows that though it cannot be easy to lay down an unfailing test of general application, it is usually not difficult to decide whether the impugned error of law is apparent on the fact of the record or not.[19]

In KM Shanmugam, Subba Rao J observed that this test also may not be successful:

> .. . for what is complex to one judicial mind may be clear and obvious to another. It depends upon the equipment of a particular judge. In the ultimate analysis the said concept is comprised of many imponderables. It is not capable of precise definition, as no objective criterion can be laid down, the apparent nature of the error, to a large extent, being dependent upon the subjective element. So too, in some cases the boundary between error of law and error of fact is rather thin. A tribunal may hold that 500 multiplied by 10,000 is 5 lakhs (instead of 50 lakhs); another tribunal, may hold that a particular claim is barred by limitation by calculating the period of time from 1956 instead of 1961; and a third tribunal may make an obvious error deciding a mixed question of fact and law. The question whether the said errors are errors of law or fact cannot be posited on a priori reasoning, but falls to be decided in each case. We do not, therefore, propose to define with any precision the concept of error of law apparent on the face of the record, but it should be left, as it has always been done, to be decided in each case.[20]

The Bombay High Court too, though in a more striking and emphatic language, echoed the test of self-evident error in New Gujarat Cotton, wherein it observed:

> ...the error must be so blatant, so obvious, so manifest or so palpable that when attention is invited to it, no elaborate argument is needed to support the contention that the conclusion is erroneous. Where, however, by elaborate argument and detailed reference to evidence a particular conclusion may be demonstrated to be erroneous, we do not think that the conclusion can be regarded as disclosing an error apparent on the face of the record.[21]

Error of law and error of fact:

In the language of Prof. Wade:

> Findings of fact are the domain where a deciding authority or tribunal can fairly expect to be master in its own house. Provided only that the facts are not collateral or jurisdictional, the finding will in general be exempt from review by the courts, which will in any case respect the decision of the body that saw and heard the witnesses or took evidence directly. Just as the courts look jealously on decisions by other bodies on matters of law, so they look indulgently on their decisions on matters of facts. However, the questions of law must be distinguished from the questions of fact. This is one of the situations where the rules have taken different forms under judicial manipulations. There could be no subject on which the courts act with such total lack of consistency as the difference between the fact and law.[22]

There is, however, an important exception. If an inferior tribunal records a finding of fact without taking into consideration the relevant materials or the finding is based on no evidence or is based on irrelevant or extraneous considerations, it will be an affront to the law which cannot be overlooked, and the order stands self-condemned even though it may be within jurisdiction.[23] In Dharangadhra Chemical Works, the court said that where the tribunal having jurisdiction to decide a question comes to a finding of fact, such a finding of fact is not open to question, under Art 226 unless it could be shown to be wholly unwarranted by the evidence.[24] It is, therefore, not only difficult but indeed it would be inexpedient to lay down any general test to determine which error of law can be described as errors of law apparent on the face of record.[25] However, this can safely be taken as settled law that the jurisdiction of a High Court to issue the writ of certiorari under Art 226 is of supervisory nature. Also, while exercising this jurisdiction, the writ court is not entitled to act as an appellate court which necessarily means that the findings of fact by inferior courts or tribunals, as a result of appreciation of evidence cannot be reopened or questioned. An error of law which is apparent on the face of record can be corrected by a writ court but not an error of fact, however grave it may appear to be. If a finding of fact is based on no evidence or if the tribunal has admitted inadmissible evidence which has influenced the finding, that would be regarded as an error of law which may be corrected by a writ of certiorari.[26]

The writ court can and must inquire whether there is any evidence at all in support of the impugned conclusion.[27] In Parry & Co, the Supreme Court observed that though the finding of fact by a tribunal having jurisdiction to decide a question is not open to judicial review unless it could be shown to be wholly unwarranted by the evidence, where the tribunal has disabled itself from reaching a fair decision by some considerations extraneous to the evidence and the merits of the case or where its conclusions on the very face of it is wholly arbitrary and capricious that no reasonable person could ever have arrived at that conclusion, interference by judicial review would be justified.[28] The case of Rajinder Kumar Kindra, provides an illustration of this point where the award of the arbitrator under s 10A was quashed by the Supreme Court being arbitrary and perverse with the observation that where a quasi-judicial tribunal or arbitrator records findings based on no legal evidence and the findings are either ipse dixit or based on conjectures and surmises and his findings suffer from the further infirmity of non-application of mind, such findings will be vitiated.[29] Where the finding of mala fide, unfair labour practice or victimisation arrived at by the tribunal is based on no material, the award will be quashable on certiorari.[30] In Radhakrishna Murthy, the workman had claimed medical reimbursement towards the treatment of his wife on the basis of a false medical certificate where, in fact, she had not undergone any treatment at all. The doctor who issued the certificate when contacted by the company informed that the certificate issued by him was not true and that he never treated the woman and that he issued the certificate under pressure brought on him by the workman. He also made an endorsement on the obverse of the medical certificate stating that 'this bill is hereby withdrawn'. When confronted with this endorsement, the workman admitted that he had submitted a false claim, regretted his action and requested the company for pardon. In the course of the domestic inquiry, the management produced four witnesses who testified the correctness of the endorsement of the doctor. But the doctor could not be examined as he was away in USA. A single judge of the AP High Court held that the inquiry was vitiated for non-examination of the doctor who was a material witness. Quashing the order of the Single judge, Jeevan Reddy J observed:

> May be the doctor's evidence was material; may be his evidence was important; but that is the question touching upon the adequacy of the evidence, which this court cannot go into under Art 226 of the Constitution. This court can interfere if there is no evidence in support of the charges or in a case where the finding or the conclusion is such that no reasonable person would have arrived at it, to wit, perverse; but this court cannot sit as an appellate authority and weigh the evidence. [31]

Where the charge levelled against the delinquent worker was that he had attempted to molest one female worker and whereas the tribunal found that the worker had actually molested the girl, it could not be said that the finding was perverse.[32] Similarly, where the en masse transfer of workmen from one factory to another owned by the same employer was found to be illegal, the order of the tribunal directing payment of certain amounts at certain rates as travelling allowance to the transferred place instead of nullifying transfers, was held not to be perverse or arbitrary in view of the fact that the workmen had already joined the place of transfer acting on the faith of the assurance extended to them by the employer in writing to arrange for transport or in the alternative to pay travelling allowance particularly so when the factory from which they were transferred was almost closed down.[33] On the other hand, upholding of the validity of a perverse report of the inquiry officer was held to constitute an error of law apparent on the face of record.[34] In Dayaram, the employer terminated the services of certain employees for being involved and prosecuted for alleged theft, for loss of confidence and for security reasons even though they were acquitted by the court. The award of the labour court ordering compensation in lieu of reinstatement was upheld by the High Court of Madhya Pradesh as there was no error of law or fact committed by the labour court in exercising its judicial discretion.[35]In Jila SK Bank, a single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the employer cannot challenge a compromise award passed by the tribunal, on the ground that its counsel engaged in the labour court had no authority to file compromise of the dispute, in view of the settlement arrived at between the parties.[36] In HC Goel, Gajendragadkar J pointed out that the findings of fact, recorded by the tribunal cannot be reviewed on the ground that the relevant material evidence adduced before the tribunal was insufficient or inadequate.[37] If a tribunal disables itself from reaching a fair decision by some extraneous considerations or where its conclusion on the very face of it is so wholly arbitrary and capricious that no reasonable person could ever have arrived at that conclusion, interference by the writ court would be justified.[38] Similarly an award which does not state reasons for its conclusions will be quashable on certiorari.[39]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

Error of law and mala fides:

The infirmity of mala fide and the infirmity of error of law apparent on the face of record are separate and distinct, though conceivably both may be present in the same case. There may be cases of 'no evidence' even where the authority is acting bona fide as well as when the authority is acting mala fide. In the latter case, the conclusion of the authority not supported by any evidence may be the result of mala fide. If it is shown that there is no evidence to support a conclusion of the authority, a writ of certiorari will be issued without further proof of mala fides.[40] To find a plea of mala fides, the court must be in a position to hold positively that the authority whose act is impugned could have been acting only with a dishonest motive. It is not sufficient to find that it was probably so.[41] It is established that 'the record' includes the documents in the case which are the basis of the decision as well as the statement of decision itself.[42]

Rules of Natural Justice:

In administrative law, rules of natural justice are foundational and fundamental concepts and are part of legal and judicial procedures. Since the rules of natural justice are not embodied rules, it is not possible and practicable to precisely define the parameters of natural justice.[43] In Ranjit Thakur, Venkatachaliah J said:

> It is the essence of a judgment that it is made after due observance of the judicial process; that the court or tribunal passing it observes, at least the minimal requirements of natural justice, is composed of impartial persons acting fairly and without bias and in good faith.[44]

In the words of Bhagwati J:

> Natural justice is a great humanising principle intended to invest law with fairness and to secure justice and over the years it has grown into a widely pervasive rule affecting large areas of administrative action.[45]

By developing the principles of natural justice the courts have devised a kind of code of fair administrative procedure. Through the principles of natural justice, the courts, therefore, control the procedure of the administrative authorities. Natural justice plays much the same part in British law as does 'due process of law' in the Constitution of the United States.[46] In America, natural justice has been described as the 'distillate of due process of law'.[47] In other words, it is 'the quintessence of the process of justice inspired and guided by 'fair play' in action'.[48] 'Natural justice', said Lord MR Esher, in Voinet v Barrett , 'is the natural sense of what is right and wrong'.[49] Harman LJ in Ridge v Baldwin , described natural justice only as 'fair play in action'.[50] Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, elaborated that 'fair play in action' is 'fair in all circumstances'.[51] According to Lord Morris, natural justice is but fairness writ large and judicially.[52] But as pointed out by Lord MR Evershed, the principles of natural justice are easy to proclaim but their precise extent is far less easy to define.[53] The expression is sadly lacking in precision,[54] and there really is very little authority indeed as to what it does mean.[55] In the language of V Ramaswami J:

> ... the extent and application of the doctrine of natural justice cannot be imprisoned within the strait-jacket of a rigid formula. The application of the doctrine depends upon the nature of the jurisdiction conferred on the administrative authority, upon the character of the rights of the persons affected, the scheme and policy of the statute and other relevant circumstances disclosed in the particular case.[56]

In its broadest sense, natural justice may mean simply the natural sense of what is right and wrong, and even in its technical sense it is now often equated with fairness. But in administrative law, natural justice is a well defined concept which comprises two fundamental rules of fair procedure; that a man may not be judge in his own cause; and that a man's defence must always be fairly heard.[57] Marshall has formulated these two essential elements of natural justice as follows:

(i) no man shall be judge in his own cause or nemo debet esse judex in propria causa; and

(ii) both sides shall be heard or audi alteram partem.[58]

The rules of natural justice were formulated by the committee on ministers' powers in England in 1932, by enunciating the following three rules:

(i) that no man shall be judge in his own cause, nemo debet esse judex in propria causa;

(ii) that no man shall be condemned unheard, audi alteram partem; and

(iii) that a party is entitled to know the reasons for the decision.[59]

Other principles that have been stated to constitute the elements of natural justice are, that the parties must have due notice of when the judge or tribunal will proceed, that the tribunal should not act under the dictation of other persons who have no authority and that if the tribunal consists of several members all must sit together all the time, that there should be orderly course of procedure and that the decision must be made in good faith.[60] The aim of the rules of natural justice is to secure justice or to put it negatively to prevent miscarriage of justice. These rules can operate only in areas not covered by any law validly made. In other words they do not supplant the law of the land but supplement it. The concept of natural justice has undergone a great deal of change in recent years. In the past it was thought that it included just two rules.[61] In the course of years many more subsidiary rules came to be added to the rules of natural justice. These and many other rules are merely extensions or refinements of the two main principles which are the essential characteristics of natural justice and are the twin pillars supporting it,[62]ie, (i) no man shall be judge in his own cause; and (ii) both sides shall be heard or audi alteram partem.[63] The Romans put them in two maxims nemo judex in causa sua or nemo debet esse judex in propria causa and audi alteram partem. These principles have been described by Lord Denning with remarkable precision in the phrase, 'impartiality and fairness'. These two rules are separate concepts and are governed by separate considerations.[64] The sole purpose of these rules is to ensure fairplay.[65]

Bias:

'The rule against bias' means that no man shall be a judge in his own cause i.e. Nemo debet esse judex in propria suo causa. This legal maxim, rooted in natural justice, is of ancient verity and has remained undoubted through the years. It forms the broad foundation upon which the doctrine against bias is based.[66] In the words of Bowen LJ, 'Judges, like Caeser's wife, should be above suspicion'.[67] In Manaklal, Gajendragadkar J observed that the test always is and must be whether a litigant could reasonably apprehend that a bias attributable to a member of the tribunal might have operated against him in the final decision of tribunal.[68] In Dimes, Lord Campbell observed that this rule is not to be confined to a cause to which the (judge) is a parry, but even applies to a cause in which he (judge) has an interest.[69] In Arlidge, Lord Haldane referred to it as the rule against bias.[70] This principle is based on the twin requirement, viz, (i) no man should be a judge in his own cause, and (ii) justice must not only be done but seem to be done.[71] There is, however, a distinction between 'interest' (bias) and 'favour'; and 'favour' should not be presumed in a judge.[72] An illustration of personal interest is to be found in AK Kraipak,[73] where the selection of certain officers made by a special selection board constituted by the Central Government in which one of the candidates himself was a member, was, quashed by the Supreme Court. Bias, broadly may be classified into three kinds:

Bias Due to Pecuniary Interest:

At common law no man who is himself a party to proceedings or who has any direct pecuniary interest in the result of the proceedings is qualified to adjudicate in those proceedings, so that the public confidence in the administration of justice may be maintained.[74] In the words of Blackburn J, 'there is no doubt that any direct pecuniary interest, however, small, in the subject of inquiry, does disqualify a person from acting as a judge in the matter'.[75] For instance, even a negligible shareholding of £ 5 held by a judge in a company of five million pounds has been held to be pecuniary interest vitiating his judgment and it has been observed, 'where a pecuniary interest exists, the law does not allow any further inquiry as to whether or not the mind was actually biased by the pecuniary interest. The fact is established from which the inference is drawn that he is interested in the decision, and he cannot act as a judge.[76] In DV Vyas, the facts disclosed that the chairman of a Committee of Arbitrators was held to have rendered himself incompetent to decide the cause before him since he had obtained for himself and his wife, free passage from Bombay to New York and back and free hospitality during their stay in USA during the inaugural flight of the 'Boeing' sponsored by the Air Corporation which was one of the parties. The High Court pointed out that the hospitality of the corporation accepted by the chairman could not be considered to be too formal or niggardly not to merit attention. Holding that the payment in kind to an arbitrator appointed under s 10A is not an appropriate mode of payment of fees, Chandrachud J observed that the courts had always zealously upheld the principle, 'it is not merely sufficient that justice is done but that justice must seem to be done'.[77]

Personal Bias or Non-pecuniary Bias:

'Personal bias' is the inclination of the adjudicator in favour or against one of the parties to the proceedings before him. Hence, where his partisan attitude towards the persons or the matter before him is reflected by words or deeds or his association with a party who is instituting or defending the proceedings before him, he may be said to be personally biased in favour of or against a party. In such cases, the reviewing courts will not inquire whether bias in fact has been shown by a Judge and will not hold him to be disqualified unless the circumstances point out to a real likelihood or reasonable suspicion of bias.[78] In order to disqualify a person from acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity on the ground of interest (other than pecuniary or proprietary in the subject-matter of the proceedings), a real likelihood of bias must be shown.[79]AK Kraipak is a case, which fell in the twilight zone of pecuniary interests and personal interests. In this case the Central Government constituted a special selection board for selecting persons in the senior scale as well as in the junior scale from those serving in the forest department of the State of Jammu and Kashmir. This board included one Shri Naqishbund who was also one of the candidates seeking to be selected to the All India Forests Services. Though he did not sit in the selection board at the time when his name was considered for selection, he did sit and participate in the deliberations of the board when the names of his rival candidates for the same post were considered for selection. He also did not participate in the deliberations of the board while preparing the list of selected candidates in order of preference. The Supreme Court struck down the selection with the observations that under the circumstances it was improper to include Naqishbund as a member of the board because he was one of the persons to be considered for selection. Speaking for a Constitution Bench, Hegde J observed:

> It is against all canons of justice to make a man judge in his own cause. It is true that he did not participate in the deliberations of the committee when his name was considered. But then the very fact that he was a member of the selection board must have had its own impact on the decision of the selection board. Further, admittedly he participated in the deliberations of the selection board when the claims of his rivals particularly that of Basu was considered. He was also a party to the preparation of the list of selected candidates in order of preference. At every stage of his participation in the deliberations of the selection board there was a conflict between his interest and duty. Under those circumstances, it is difficult to believe that he could have been impartial. The real question is not whether he was biased. It is difficult to prove the state of mind of a person. Therefore what we have to see is whether there is reasonable ground for believing that he was likely to have been biased. We agree with the learned attorney-general that a mere suspicion of bias is not sufficient. There must be a reasonable likelihood of bias. In deciding the question of bias we have to take into consideration human probabilities and ordinary course of human conduct. It was in the interest of Naqishbund to keep out his rivals in order to secure his position from further challenge. Naturally he was also interested in safeguarding his position while preparing the list of selected candidates.. .. In a group deliberation, each member of the group is bound to influence the others, more so, if the member concerned is a person with special knowledge. His bias is likely to operate in a subtle manner. It is no wonder that the other members of the selection board are unaware of the extent to which his opinion influenced their conclusions. We are unable to accept the contention that in adjudging the suitability of the candidates, the members of the board did not have any mutual discussion. It is not as if the records spoke of themselves. We are unable to believe that the members of the selection board functioned like computers. At this stage it may also be noted that at the time the selections were made, the members of the selection board other than Naquishbund were not likely to have known that Basu had appealed against his supersession and that his appeal was pending before the state government. Therefore, there was no occasion for them to distrust the opinion expressed by Naquishbund. Hence the Board in making the selections must necessarily have given weight to the opinion expressed by Naquishbund.[80]

A priori, when such a bias is proved, then the entire exercise of conducting an inquiry by a body or a board with the biased member would be rendered futile as the procedure would not conform to the rules of natural justice.[81] It is now well settled that close relationship of the adjudicator with any of the parties to the proceedings before him, or interested in the subject-matter of such proceedings will disqualify him.[82] In the case of family relationship, the challenge to the proceedings need only establish so close a degree of relationship as to give rise to 'reasonable likelihood' of the judge espousing the cause as his own.[83] Some cases are of personal prejudice and hostility,[84] and family relationship.[85] A judge would be disqualified if he were a friend of the mother of one of the parties and that party made it to be known that the judge would be on her side.[86] In MLL Kumar, the inquiry officer was subordinate to the officer who was complainant as well as the witness in the inquiry. In this situation a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the inquiry should not have been conducted by the officer because the employee did not have a fair trial. The court further held that the mere fact that the objection to the inquiry was not raised before the inquiry officer, would have vitiated the enquiry because there is no material to show that the workman was aware that he could raise such an objection at the inquiry though the plea of bias could be waived, there must be evidence that there was such a waiver by conscious understanding of the situation and particularly the awareness that the employee was entitled to raise the objection.[87] In Manaklal, a complaint alleging professional misconduct against an advocate of a High Court was filed by the respondent. The Chief Justice appointed a bar council tribunal consisting of a chairman and two other members to inquire into the allegations. But the chairman had earlier represented the complainant in a case. It was held that the chairman was disqualified on the application of the principle 'justice should not only be done, but must appear to be done' to the litigating public. It was further observed that actual proof of prejudice was not necessary. The possibility of bias was sufficient.[88]

In Ranjit Thakur, the court pointed out that as to the test of 'likelihood of bias' what is relevant is 'the reasonableness of the apprehension in that regard in the mind of the party'. Speaking for the court, Venkatachaliah J, held that the proper approach for the judge is not to look at his own mind and ask himself, however honestly, 'am I biased?'; but to look at the mind of the party before him.[89] Personal hostility or animosity towards a party disqualifies an adjudicator from adjudicating, if it gives rise to real likelihood of bias. In Mineral Development, the proceedings cancelling the petitioner's licence for the lease of certain land was quashed as it was found that there was a political rivalry between the petitioner and the revenue minister who also had filed a criminal case against the petitioner. It was held that the minister was disqualified from taking part in cancelling the licence in view of his personal hostility.[90] However, in the absence of compelling evidence of personal hostility or animosity, the courts would be reluctant to conclude that any adjudicator's decision is likely to be warped by personal feeling.[91] In NS Dhamankar, two members of the inquiry committee holding inquiry against the delinquent employee for contravention of the building rules of the cantonment were prosecuted at the instance of that employee. It was held that these members had sufficient motivation of being biased. In the circumstances, it was held that the entire proceedings of the inquiry were vitiated for violation of the rules of natural justice. The legal effect of personal hostility by members or presiding officers of quasi-judicial tribunals or administrative authorities exercising quasi-judicial functions in general, has 'to be determined by reference to the same criteria as those adopted for courts of justice subject to the proviso that it may sometimes be reasonable to disregard the hostility of a small number of members of a large public body.[92]

Mala Fides:

Personal animosity or hostility towards any of the parties to the proceedings apart from disqualifying the authority on the ground of personal bias may also fall under the head of mala fides. These several forms of abuse of power not only overlap to a very great extent but also run into one another, [93] and the task of separating them analytically in particular fact situation may be almost insuperable. Mala fides, apart from bringing the proceedings within the ambit of one of the recognised categories of invalidity, is sui generis a ground for invalidating the proceedings.[94] The concept of mala fides, though may not be capable of precise definition, may be said to comprise of dishonesty, fraud and malice. A power is exercised fraudulently if its repository intends to achieve an object other than that for which he believes the power has been conferred. For example, a local authority committee would exercise in bad faith its power to exclude interested members of the public if it deliberately chose to hold the meeting in a small room. The intention may be to promote another public interest or private interests. A power is exercised maliciously if its repository is motivated by personal animosity towards those who are directly affected by its exercise.[95] Such an exercise of power is always liable to be quashed on the main ground that it is not a bona fide exercise of power. The decisions of the Supreme Court in Mineral Developments case and Kraipak's case illustrate the point.

Official Bias:

Markose has explained 'official bias' in following terms:[96] In the case of official bias, the officer is not actuated by personal ill-will. He is so imbued with the desire to promote the departmental policy that he becomes blind to the existence of the interest of the private individuals. An administrator imbued with a fervour to push through government programmes may be an ideal official. But he will be a bad judge, his defeat is bias of a very subtle variety called 'official bias'. Official bias is now tolerated in England as 'some risk of bias is inseparable from the machinery which Parliament has set up'.[1] In India 'official bias' is not tolerated by courts even if it is sanctioned by statute. In this connection the following observations of Subba Rao J in Gullapalli Nageswararao, are noteworthy:

> It is not out of place here to notice that in England the Parliament is supreme and, therefore, statutory law, however repugnant to the principles of natural justice, is valid; whereas in India, the law made by Parliament or a state legislature should stand the test of fundamental rights declared in P art 3 of the Constitution. [2]

The relevant question is whether the officer, when he comes to make his decision, genuinely addresses himself to the question with a mind which is open to persuasion.[3] Normally, the quasi-judicial and administrative bodies have some predisposition or interest with regard to the special matters which they administer. In the language of Schwartz:

> The prime aim of administrative justice is, paradoxically, not justice at all, but the execution of the legislative policy embodied in the enabling Act. The administrative agency cannot weigh disputes coming before it with the virgin mind of the judge. It is responsible for the accomplishment of the policy embodied in the legislative scheme, and this may often predispose it in favour of certain results in the cases which come before it.[4]

The Supreme Court drew a distinction between the policy bias where an official, who is the repository of the power concerned with policy making, hears the matter, and where the matter is heard by a minister. The proceedings will be vitiated in the former case and not in the latter case, because in the former case the official is a part of the department, whereas the minister is only primarily responsible for the disposal of the business pertaining to that department. This is illustrated in two decisions known as Gullapalli Nageswara Rao's cases. In Gullapalli Nageswara Rao v APSRTC (the first case), the inquiry into the objections of the aggrieved persons against the scheme of nationalisation of road transport service by the home secretary of the state (though the final decision was taken by the chief minister) was held to have been conducted in substance by one of the parties to the dispute and was, therefore, violative of the principle against bias.[5] In the latter case, viz, Gullapalli Nageswararao v State of Andhra Pradesh (the second case), which was a sequel to the first case, the chief minister himself heard the representatives of the objectors and the Road Transport Corporation and then passed the orders approving the scheme as originally published. However, in this case, the same judge held that the position of the chief minister was quite distinct from that of the secretary of the department because while the secretary was the head of the department and so a part of it, the minister-in-charge was only primarily responsible for the disposal of the business pertaining to the department and he was not a part of the department.[6] This view does not appear to be correct. Another instance of departmental or official bias is where first a person takes part in instituting the proceedings and then he sits to adjudicate upon the same proceedings. In such a case, he will be combining the functions of a prosecutor and a judge. A typical instance of this is Mohammad Nooh, where in a departmental trial against a police constable before a deputy superintendent of police, the deputy superintendent of police, who conducted the inquiry, himself gave testimony. In other words, having pitted himself against, a witness of the constable, the deputy superintendent of police vacated the judge's seat and entered the arena as a witness. Having played the role of a witness, he again sat as a judge on the proceedings. The Supreme Court invalidated the proceedings because the two roles could not obviously be played by one and the same person. Speaking for the court, SR Das CJI held:

> If it shocks our notions of judicial propriety and fair-play, as indeed it does, it was bound to make a deeper impression on the mind of the respondent, as to the unreality and futility of the proceedings conducted in this fashion ... the rules of natural justice were completely discarded and all canons of fair-play were grievously violated, by the deputy superintendent of police, 'continuing to preside over the trial. [7]

Yet another instance of official bias is where any actions or utterances of the adjudicator savour of a pre-judgment. However, a distinction may have to be made in this connection between pre-judgment of facts specifically relating to a party and pre-conceptions or pre-dispositions about the questions of law, policy or discretion. Normally, in the former case the adjudicator will be disqualified, while in the latter a greater leeway may be permissible. Another brand of official bias is where the mind of the adjudicator abdicates its seat in favour of another's mind. In other words, when instead of bringing his own mind to bear on the subject for deciding the question before him, an adjudicator acts on the dictation of another, his decision will be tarnished and shall be invalidated on the ground of official bias. It is with a view to obviate the possibilities and probabilities of official bias that s s 7 to 7B of the Industrial Disputes Act provide that persons with judicial experience, either retired District Court judges or High Court judges shall be appointed as the presiding officers of labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals and s 7C(a) provides that these officers must be 'independent' persons.

Audi Alteram Partem:

Hearing both the sides: The phrase 'audi alteram partem' was first formulated by St Augustine.[8] This maxim means 'hear the other side'. Another maxim rendering the same idea is audiatur et altera pars which means 'no man should be condemned unheard.[9] In the language of Prof. Wade:

> It is fundamental to fair procedure that both sides should be heard: audi alteram partem, 'hear the other side'. This is the more far-reaching of the principles of natural justice, since it can embrace almost every question of fair procedure, or due process, and its implications can be worked out in great detail. It is also broad enough to include the rule against bias, since a fair hearing must be an unbiased hearing. .. [10]

In its application to administrative law, as a ground for certiorari, this rule has had its own ebbs and flows. The classic statement of this rule was formulated by Lord Loreburn in Board of Education, wherein he stated:

> The departments or officers of state who are under the duty of deciding or determining questions of various kinds...must act in good faith and fairly listen to both sides, for that is a duly lying upon everyone who decides anything. But I do not think they are bound to treat such a question as though it were a trial...they can obtain information in any way they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view. [11]

These dicta, however, were not free from snags because the duty to observe audi alteram partem rule could still be subject to important qualifications as the rules of natural justice are not rigid norms of unchanging content and their ambit may vary according to the context. Some of these trends were reflected in a decision from Ceylon, viz, Nakkuda Ali. The judicial committee of the Privy Council held that the controller of textiles although enjoined to act on 'reasonable grounds' while revoking a licence was under no duty to act judicially; hence, compliance with the rules of natural justice was not necessary. This view was founded on two reasons, (i) that certiorari could only be issued to an authority that was required to follow a procedure analogous to judicial in arriving at its decision, and (ii) that the controller was not determining a question affecting the rights of subjects, but was merely 'taking executive action to withdraw a privilege.[12] In Maneka Gandhi, Bhagwati J, observed:

> The audi alteram partem rule is not cast in a rigid mould and judicial decisions establish that it may suffer situational modifications. The core of it must, however, remain, namely, that the person affected must have a reasonable opportunity of being heard and the hearing must be a genuine hearing and not an empty public relations exercise.[13]

The scope of 'the right to be heard' has been discussed by the Privy Council in a case from Malaya, wherein Lord Denning graphically stated the law:

> If the right to be heard is to be a real right which is worth anything, it must carry with it a right in the accused man to know the case which is made against him. He must know what evidences have been given and what statements have been made affecting him; and then he must be given a fair opportunity to correct or contradict them.[14]

The rule of audi alteram partem is not confined only to conduct of strictly legal tribunals but is applicable to every tribunal or body of persons invested with the authority to adjudicate matters involving civil consequences to individual.[15] Hence, in industrial adjudication the rule of audi alteram partem has not only been appliedto the orders or awards of the adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act but has also been extended to domestic inquiries in the nature of disciplinary proceedings as well.[16] The requirements of audi alteram partem are : (a) Notice; (b) Reasonable Opportunity:

Notice:

The first requirement of the rule of audi alteram partem is that the persons who are likely to be directly affected by the decision or proceedings should be given adequate notice of the proceedings so that they may be able to (i) effectively prepare their case and to answer the case of the opponent, if any; (ii) make their representations; and (iii) appear at the hearing. Any proceedings commenced without notice to the parties are likely to vitiate the resulting decision.[17] The law requires that every person whose civil rights are affected must have a reasonable notice of the case he has to meet.[18] Notice must be real and definite,[19] and must give ample time to the parties without which they cannot be said to have been given a reasonable opportunity of being heard.[20] Notice should, therefore, intimate the parties of the date and time of commencement of proceedings and also of the venue of the proceedings.

Reasonable Opportunity:

The second requirement of the rule is that the parties whose civil rights are to be affected by a quasi-judicial authority must have a reasonable opportunity of being heard in their defence. In the words of Lord Tucker LJ, in Russel,[21] 'whatever standard of natural justice is adopted, one essential is that the person concerned should have a reasonable opportunity of presenting his case'. What opportunity may be regarded as reasonable would necessarily depend on the practical necessity of a situation. It may be a sophisticated full-fledged hearing or it may be hearing which is very brief and minimal; it may be a hearing prior to the decision or it may even be post-decisional remedial hearing. The rule is sufficiently flexible to permit modifications and variations to suit exigencies of myriad kinds of situations which may arise.[22] In TR Varma, Venkatarama Ayyar J, observed:

> Stating it broadly and without intending it to be exhaustive ...rules of natural justice require that a party should have the opportunity of adducing all relevant evidence on which he relies, that the evidence of the opponent should be taken in his presence and that he should be given the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined by that party, and that no materials should be relied on against him > without his being given an opportunity of explaining them.[23]

This statement of law postulates the following three requirements of fair opportunity or reasonable opportunity:

(i) the adjudicator should receive all the relevant material which a party wishes to produce in support of its case;

(ii) the evidence of the opponent, whether oral or documentary, should be taken in his presence; and

(iii) each party should have the opportunity of rebutting the evidence of the other by cross-examination or explanation.

Even if the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act or the technical rules of general law of evidence do not apply to the proceedings before industrial tribunals, they are required to observe the rules of natural justice in the conduct of the proceedings before them and if they do so, their decisions are not liable to be impeached on the ground that the procedure followed was not in accordance with that which obtains in a court of law.[24]In other words, though these tribunals are not bound by technical rules contained in the Indian Evidence Act, yet they cannot ignore the substantive rules which would form part of the principles of natural justice. An instance where the proceedings before an industrial tribunal were held to be violative of the rules of natural justice on account of the refusal of the tribunal to take evidence of a party is Technological Institute, in which it was found that the tribunal had adjourned the case from time to time to enable the workmen to produce their evidence and had allowed the case to drag on for about two years even after the union's case was closed. Yet it sternly refused to give an opportunity to the management to adduce evidence in support of its case and closed the case of the management suo motu and proceeded to give its award. Furthermore, during the course of examination-in-chief of the accountant of the company by the workmen, the statements produced by him were found to be incomplete and unsatisfactory and in that situation the management undertook to furnish the necessary statements in order to enable that witness to give proper evidence before the tribunal and those statements were supplied the very next day. Setting aside the award of the tribunal for violation of the rules of natural justice, Vaidialingam J, deprecated this attitude of the tribunal and held:

> Inspite of this helpful attitude adopted by the management it is rather regrettable that the tribunal should have closed the proceedings very abruptly ...without permitting the appellant to produce evidence on its behalf, to say the least, this attitude of the tribunal is highly arbitrary and unjust.[25]

Whether an adjournment in the circumstances of a case should or should not be granted, is in the discretion of the adjudicator.[26] However, if in refusing to grant adjournment, the tribunal acts arbitrarily, it will be a violation of the rules of natural justice and the award will be quashable on certiorari.[27] Likewise, if the tribunal refuses to give an opportunity to a party to adduce evidence, it would constitute violation of the rules of natural justice justifying judicial review of the resulting decision.[28] Refusing to summon a witness as required by a party and arbitrarily closing the case, would tantamount to breach of the rules of natural justice.[29] If a party is not allowed to lead his evidence, there will be gross violation of the rules of natural justice and the resulting order will be liable to be quashed. The reviewing court has to look to what actual prejudice has been caused to a person by the supposed denial to him of a particular right. If no real injustice has been done to the petitioner,[30] or where in spite of the hearing given to the person concerned, the answer to the question involved is the same and cannot be altered by any amount of persuasion or reasoning, the giving of so-called opportunity or giving a notice to that person would only be an empty formality or an exercise in futility.[31] In such cases the writ court will not interfere.

Even if all technicalities of the Evidence Act are strictly not applicable except in so far as s 11 of the Industrial Disputes Act and the rules prescribed therein permit, it is inconceivable that the tribunal can act on what is not evidence such as hearsay. Nor can a tribunal be justified in basing its award on copies of documents when the originals which are in existence and are not produced and proved by anyone of the methods either by affidavit or by witnesses who have executed them, if they are alive and can be produced. Again, if a party wants an inspection, it is incumbent on the tribunal to allow inspection, in so far as that is relevant to the inquiry. The applicability of these principles is well recognised and admits no doubt.[32] A mere leaning towards the principles of natural justice will not justify the interference by the reviewing court.[33] It is, therefore, not in every case that failure to record all evidence sought to be tendered by the party would vitiate the proceedings. If, some evidence immaterial or irrelevant to the inquiry is disallowed by the authority, the principles of natural justice will not be held to be violated.[34] For instance, where the tribunal did not take into consideration a document which was not placed on record, it was held that there was no illegality requiring interference by the writ court.[35]

Fraud and Collusion:

The reviewing courts have an inherent jurisdiction to quash the orders or awards of tribunals if they have been procured by fraud or collusion.[36] In the words of Lord Denning, no judgment of a court, no order of a minister, can be allowed to stand if it has been obtained by fraud.[37] Hence, an order which has been obtained by fraud or on the strength of perjured evidence may be quashed by a writ of certiorari.[38] However, the allegations of fraud are to be specifically pleaded and proved by relevant evidence because normally the writ court will decline to quash unless it is satisfied that the fraud was clear and manifest and was instrumental in procuring the impugned order.[39] Fraud and collusion must, therefore, be established by way of an affidavit as an evidence.

(e) Procedure and Practice

Power to Dismiss In Limine:

The High Court possesses the power to dismiss an application under Art 226 of the Constitution*in limine* when it discloses no substance. If the petition makes a claim which is frivolous, vexatious or prima facie unjust and may not be properly triable in a petition invoking the writ jurisdiction, the court may decline to entertain the petition.[40] Likewise, the court may also reject an application in limine if it takes the view that the authorities whose acts were called in question had not acted improperly or if it feels that the petition raised complicated questions of fact for determination, which could not be properly adjudicated upon in writ proceedings. However, the discretion is judicial. The court, therefore, should not throw out a petition in limine, if a prima facie case for investigation is made out.[41] Where the order of the inferior tribunal is sought to be quashed as prima facie violation of the rules of natural justice,[42] or an order is impugned on the ground of violation of certain provisions of the Constitution,[43] or where a substantial question as to the interpretation of some of the provisions of the Constitution is involved,[44] or where there is an allegation of mala fides against the government or any of its officers,[45] the High Court should not dismiss the application without hearing on the point. Similarly, where prima facie it appears that a fundamental right has been infringed, the petition should not be rejected in limine merely because evidence has to be taken on some disputed questions of fact.[46] In such cases, even if the affidavit filed by the petitioner is defective, the court should, instead of rejecting the petition in limine, give the petitioner a reasonable opportunity to file a better affidavit.[47] The writ court should generally consider the materials which were made available to the tribunal and normally should not allow to place fresh or further materials before it.[48]

Res Judicata:

In MSM Sharma, the Supreme Court held that the rule underlying the principle of res judicata is to give finality to a decision arrived at after contest and after hearing the parties interested in the controversy. The question whether the previous decision is right or wrong is absolutely immaterial in applying the doctrine of res judicata to a subsequent proceeding.[49] In Daryao, it was held that if a writ petition filed by a party under Art 226 is considered on merits as a contested matter and is dismissed, the decision would continue to bind the parties unless it is otherwise modified or reversed in appeal or other appropriate proceedings. In such a case, the Supreme Court will refrain from acting under Art 32 as it constitutes a comity between the Supreme Court and the High Court. Hence where a party has already moved the High Court with a similar complaint and for the same relief and failed, the Supreme Court would insist on an appeal to be brought before it and would not allow fresh proceedings to be started under Art 32.[50] From the decision rendered in Devilal Modi, the following principles emerge on the circumstances in which the proceedings under Art 226 would operate as res judicata in a subsequent petition filed before the High Court under the said Article:

(i) the principle of constructive res judicata applies with equal force to writ petitions under Art 226;

(ii) finality of decisions rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction is to be emphasised;

(iii) parties should not be made to fight twice over the same kind of litigation; and

(iv) a plea which could have been taken by a party in proceedings between him and his opponent, if not taken at the appropriate time, that party should not be permitted to take the plea against the same party in a subsequent proceeding on the same cause of action. [51]

Though the principles of res judicata are not applicable to writ petitions, a plea cannot be barred on the principles of res judicata in a subsequent proceeding, if the point was not expressly decided in the earlier petition which was founded on a different cause of action, particularly when the subject-matter in the earlier proceedings was different.[52] If a writ petition filed by a party is considered on merits as a contested matter and is dismissed, the decision thus pronounced would continue to bind the parties unless it is otherwise modified or reversed in appeal or other appropriate proceedings permissible under the Constitution. It would not be open to a party to ignore that judgment. If the writ petition is dismissed not on merits but on some preliminary point such as laches or alternative remedy etc, then the dismissal of the writ petition would not constitute a bar to a subsequent petition.[53] In Hoshnak Singh, the first writ petition of the petitioner was dismissed by a non-speaking order on the ground that the petitioner had an alternative remedy by way of an appeal or revision under the statute. The petitioner filed a second writ petition after pursuing the alternative remedy, which was again dismissed by the High Court on the ground that it was barred by principles analogous to res judicata. The Supreme Court held that the second petition was not barred by res judicata, as the cause of action was entirely different and the earlier dismissal could not stand in the way of the petitioner invoking the jurisdiction of the High Court.[54] In Lal Chand, Venkatachala J, stated the law thus:

> When a judge of single judge bench of High Court is required to entertain a second writ petition of a person on a matter, he cannot as a matter of course, entertain such petition, if an earlier writ petition of the same person on the same matter had been dismissed already by another single judge bench or a Division Bench of the same High Court, even if such dismissal was on the ground of laches or on the ground of non-availing of alternate remedy. Second writ petition cannot be so entertained not because the learned single judge has no jurisdiction to entertain the same, but because entertaining of such a second writ petition would render the order of the same court dismissing the earlier writ petition redundant and nugatory, although not reviewed by it in exercise of the recognised power. Besides, if a learned single judge could entertain a second writ petition of a person respecting a matter on which his first writ petition was dismissed in limine by another learned single judge or a Division Bench of the same court, it would encourage an unsuccessful writ petitioner to go on filing writ petition after writ petition in the same matter in the same High Court, and have it brought up for consideration before one judge after another. Such a thing, if is allowed to happen, it could result in giving full scope and encouragement to an unscrupulous litigant to abuse the process of the High Court, exercising its writ jurisdiction under article 226 of the Constitution in that any order of any bench of such court refusing to entertain a writ petition could be ignored by him with impunity and relief sought in the same matter by filing a fresh writ petition. This would only lead to introduction of disorder, confusion and chaos relating to exercise of writ jurisdiction by judges of the High Court for there could be no finality for an order of the court refusing to entertain a writ petition. It is why, the rule of judicial practice and procedure that a second writ petition shall not be entertained by the High Court on the subject matter respecting which the first writ petition of the same person was dismissed by the same court even if the order of such dismissal was in limine, be it on the ground of laches or on the ground of non-exhaustion of alternate remedy, has come to be accepted and followed as salutory rule in exercise of writ jurisdiction of courts. [55]

On a parity of reasoning, the principle of constructive res judicata would also apply to writ proceedings,[56] when the subsequent writ petition is based on the same cause of action on which the earlier petition was based.[57] Normally, where a writ petition is allowed to be withdrawn without going into its merits, the decision would not constitute res judicata. However, while allowing the withdrawal of the petition, the court renders a decision on a consideration of the merits of the case, such a decision would constitute res judicata.[58] This principle is applicable when the order is a speaking order and on merits, even if the petition is dismissed in motion without hearing the other side.[59] In Gulabchand,[60] the issue as to the circumstances in which a decision rendered under Art 226 would operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit was considered. It was held that the decision in an earlier writ petition on merits would bar a subsequent suit involving the same question and for the same relief on general principles of res judicata. The question, whether the decision of a High Court on a certain point in a writ petition under Art 226 would constitute res judicata in a subsequent appeal under Art 136 was considered by the Supreme Court in Northern Rly CCS, where Bhargava J observed:

> When exercising jurisdiction under article 226 of the Constitution, the High Court does not hear an appeal or revision. The High Court is moved to intervene and to bring before itself the record of a case decided by or pending before a court or tribunal or any authority within the High Court's jurisdiction. A petition to the High Court invoking this jurisdiction is a proceeding quite independent of the original controversy. The controversy in the High Court, in proceedings arising under article 226, ordinarily is whether a decision of, or a proceeding before a court or tribunal or authority, should be allowed to stand or should be quashed for want of jurisdiction or on account of errors of law apparent on the face of the record. A decision in the exercise of this jurisdiction, whether interfering with the proceeding impugned or declining to do so, is a final decision in so far as the High Court is concerned because it terminates finally the special proceeding before it. [61]

The technical rule of res judicata, although a wholesome rule based upon public policy, cannot be stretched too far to bar the trial of identical issues in a separate proceeding merely on the assumption that the issues must have been decided. When a writ petition is dismissed either at the threshold or after contest without expressing any opinion on merits, no issue could be deemed to have been decided and any other remedy of suit or other proceedings will not be barred by res judicata. In the absence of a speaking order, it would not be easy to decide what factors weighed in the mind of the court, and that it would be unsafe to hold that such a summary dismissal would constitute a bar of res judicata against a similar petition filed under Art 32.[62] In this regard, Ahmedabad Mfg Co, is an authority for the proposition that an order of the Supreme Court permitting to withdraw a petition for special leave unconditionally, would not amount to its dismissal.[63] In Paschimbanga TMKS, the Calcutta High Court has stated the following principles:

(1) the power of the principles of res judicata does not affect the jurisdiction of the court and the plea of res judicata can never be a jurisdictional question;

(2) the plea of res judicata can be waived and if a party does not put forward the plea of res judicata in a suit or proceeding, he must be taken to have waived it; and

(3) in the case of conflicting decrees, orders or decisions between the parties occasioned by non-raising of the plea of res judicata in the subsequent suit or proceeding, the last of the two conflicting decrees or decisions shall prevail on the ground that in the eye of law, the last one is binding between the parties.[64]

Where the writ petition filed by a workman whose services were terminated was dismissed granting liberty to the workman to take his grievance before the appropriate forum, it could not be said that the writ petition was decided on merits, and hence such summary dismissal of writ petition does not constitute res judicata so as to bar the reference of dispute.[65] In Thiagarajan, the facts were: An application filed by the employee under s 33C(2) was dismissed by the sixth labour court as not maintainable on the ground that, on the basis of oral and documentary evidence adduced, he was not a workman within the meaning of s 2(s). The management thereafter filed the aforesaid order before the first labour court, which was trying a reference made for the reinstatement of the said employee, and contended that in view of the fact that the employee had not challenged the said order of the sixth labour court holding that he was not a workman, the said issue had become res judicata, and that the first labour court was bound by the said decision. The first labour court accepted the said order of the sixth labour court and recorded its findings that the question of workman had become res judicata and rejected the reference on that point as not maintainable. The Bombay High Court upheld the view of the first labour court and observed that the issue was finally determined between the same parties by a competent forum and that the first labour court could not have taken any other view.[66] Where a reference pertaining to promotion, pay-scale fixation, orientation, etc, was decided against the workmen and another reference was made on similar issues, which was opposed on grounds of res judicata, it was held that the tribunal dealing with the second reference was in error to have decided the matter after having found it to be barred by res judicata.[67]

Parties:

In Charanjit Lal, the Supreme Court held that the rights that could be enforced under Art 32 must ordinarily be the rights of the petitioner himself who complains of infraction of such rights.[68] A writ is issued in favour of a person who has some right and not for sake of roving inquiry leaving scope of manoeuvring.[69] Hence, the aggrieved party has to show that he has a legal right which entitles him to any of the directions, orders or writs, etc mentioned in Art 226 and that such right has been infringed.[70] But different considerations arise when a trade union moves under Art 226 of the Constitution against an award made by an industrial tribunal.[71] Where a trade union espouses the cause of workmen, it will be entitled to file a writ petition when the award goes against the workmen.[72] A minority trade union aggrieved by a settlement arrived at between the management and the majority union which will be affected by the settlement in view of s 18(3), will be an aggrieved party and have locus standi to challenge the settlement by a writ petition.[73] A writ petition against illegal retrenchment of workman by a service association representing the employees has been held to be maintainable.[74] Likewise, a writ petition by the Association of Tehsil Mohurrirs vindicating rights or claims on behalf of or common to Tehsil Mohurrirs has been held to be maintainable.[75] However, where the grievances of the members of a 'trade union or an association' are of individual and personal nature, it would not give the union or association the locus standi to move the High Court by a writ petition.[76] Labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals are amenable to certiorari.[77] Hence, certiorari can be issued to a High Court judge acting as a special industrial tribunal constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act.[78] An arbitrator under s 10A is amenable to the writ jurisdiction of the High Court.[79] A conciliation officer acting under s 12 is not amenable to the writ jurisdiction,[80]but the order of the conciliation officer acting under s 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act being a quasi-judicial order, would be amenable to judicial review by the writ court. A necessary party is one without which no order can be made effectively; a proper party is one in whose absence an effective order can be made but whose presence is necessary for a complete and final decision on the questions involved in the proceedings.[81] But a party is a necessary party only if he is likely to be aggrieved or his right prejudicially affected by grant of relief to the petitioner and the relief cannot, therefore, be granted without hearing such party.[82] The following are necessary parties to a proceeding for certiorari:

(1) The inferior tribunal or an authority against whose order or award relief is sought.[83]

(2) Any other authority in whose possession the record remains.[84]

(3) Any person who is interested in maintaining the regularity of the proceedings out of which the petition arises or would be affected by the decision of the court.[85]

(4) Where the order of an authority is subject to confirmation by another body, the latter is not a party, for, on confirmation, it is the order of the initial authority which becomes effective.[86] But the position would be otherwise, where the final order has been passed on review or appeal by a superior authority. In such a case, if the superior authority is not impleaded, no relief can be given to the petitioner.[87]

(5) Where apart from the order or award of the tribunal, the order of reference is challenged, the appropriate government would also be a necessary party.

A writ cannot be issued against a person who is not impleaded as an opposite party to the proceedings,[88] and no party other than those who are impleaded would be bound by an order of the High Court made in the writ proceedings.[89] Therefore, in an application under Art 226, all persons must be made parties who are or likely to be affected by the issue of a writ or order.[90] The fact that the number of persons likely to be affected is large is no ground to dispense with their being impleaded.[91] For instance, in Teen Ali Tea Estate, the petitioner had challenged the order of reference of a dispute relating to the termination of some workmen as illegal and mala fide, but the workmen whose termination was the subject-matter of the dispute were not made parties. The Gauhati High Court held that the writ petition was not maintainable.[92] Where the workmen demands some benefits from the management, the management will be widely affected by an order of the court. Therefore, the management in such a case would be a proper party and any relief obtained by the workmen having a bearing on the interests of the management, in its absence, will not bind the management as the absence of the management would vitiate the proceedings.[93] The authorities whose orders are sought to be quashed and also persons interested in maintaining legality or regularity of proceedings of authorities should be added as parties to a writ petition.[94] Where there are allegations of mala fides or bias against some persons or officials in a writ petition, such allegations cannot be heard unless such persons are made parties to the petition and thus given opportunity to rebut those allegations.[95]

Any party likely to be affected by a writ or order may appear at the hearing (or make a prior application) and ask for leave to join the proceedings or for rule nisi to be served upon it. The court in appropriate case may order that the writ petition be amended by addition of parties, if a necessary party or a party likely to be affected by the writ or order or a party whose presence may be necessary to make the writ effective, is not before the court, either on an application made for that purpose, or of its own motion. The court may direct that such a party be added and the rule nisi be served upon him, or simply that rule nisi be served upon him or even that he may be permitted to be present at the hearing without being served with a rule nisi. Such amendments, should, however, ordinarily be done upon a notice to the party proposed to be added. And upon an amendment of this nature being affected, directions should be given for the use of affidavits or additional affidavits.[96] However, merely because certain questions will have to be determined incidentally in giving or not giving the reliefs asked for, the court does not make each and every person interested in such questions as necessary parties to such proceedings.[97] For instance, in Vijay Singh Mehta, the Rajasthan High Court held that the trustees of the provident fund and the gratuity fund were not necessary parties. They could only be proper parties because on account of the relevant regulations of the bank, the liability of the bank could not cease on transfer of the fund to the trust and the bank was bound to discharge its solemn obligation to see that the payment of the provident fund and gratuity are made to its employees.[98] In challenging the award of an Industrial tribunal before a writ court, no doubt such tribunal will be a necessary party but the appropriate government will not always be a necessary party to the writ proceedings.[99]

The appropriate government will, however, be a necessary party when apart from the validity of any order or award of the tribunal, the order of reference is also challenged. When an order of assistant labour commissioner under r 61(4) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, directing recognition of some workers as 'protected workmen' is challenged by a writ petition, without asking for any relief against those workmen, and the trade unions on whose representations that order has been passed are parties to the writ petition, the petition can be decided in the absence of those workmen as the unions are already parties; such 'protected workmen' are not necessary parties to the petition.[1]Likewise, when the writ court is not examining the competence of the appropriate government directly or of the subjective satisfaction of the government before it exercises the power conferred upon it under s 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, but the correctness of a finding given by the tribunal on the question of jurisdictional facts, it is not necessary to make the concerned government a party to a writ petition.[2] Similarly, the non-joinder of Union of India would not be fatal to the petition where the general manager of the railway who is an 'employer' within the meaning of s 2(g) has been made a respondent.[3] But a joint application would lie where the applicants are aggrieved by a common order.[4] The number of writs to be filed against an order or award of an authority or tribunal will depend upon the nature of the order or award and its effect on the parties. The rule is that persons having a common joint interest in the subject-matter in controversy may be joined as relators while those having separate and district rights may not.[5] However, each aggrieved person must file independent petitions for relief. Joint petitions by several aggrieved persons for relief although based on a common objection to an order or award of an authority would not lie.[6]

Where similar disputes between several establishments and their workmen were referred by a single notification to an industrial tribunal for adjudication, a single writ petition by the establishments for a writ of prohibition was held not to be maintainable. Likewise, where the interests of the petitioners though similar, are not joint or the same, a single writ petition would not lie.[7] On the other hand, where the service of the petitioners were terminated by one and the same order, a single writ petition would be maintainable.[8]Similarly, a single writ petition against the order refusing to approve the action of the management dismissing a number of its workmen under s 33(2) of the Industrial Disputes Act, would be maintainable because the action is one and the same. Therefore, the cause would also be the same.[9] In Transport Corpn, against a common award of the industrial tribunal, 28 employers filed separate writ petitions while certain other employers covered by the award, did not file petitions though notices of the 28 petitions were given through the newspapers by the petitioners. In the circumstances, the Bombay High Court held that the petitions before it were not valid simply because other employers had not filed writ petitions.[10]

Pleadings:

The allegations and averments in the petition should not be vague or indefinite.[11] A person, taking one position in his pleadings before lower authorities against the impugned order, will not be allowed to take inconsistent stand in his petition for a writ.[12] The allegations of fraud must be specifically stated and full particulars in clearest possible terms must be furnished.[13] Bad faith or ill-will is not to be held established except on clear proof thereof, even though such proof need not necessarily be by direct evidence alone but may be deduced as a reasonable and inescapable inference from proved facts.[14] The grounds, which were taken before the tribunal and dealt with, can only form the subject-matter of a writ petition under Art. 226 and 227 of the Constitution.[15] After setting out the grounds, the petitioner must make the prayer in specific and precise form showing as to what writ, order or direction he seeks for redressing a wrong which affects him.[16] In reply to the writ petition, the opposite party or parties have to file the return in the form of a counter-affidavit. The counter-affidavit has to be filed by a person who dealt with the matter in dispute and not by any other person having no concern with the matter. In other words, it should be a person in a position to speak from personal knowledge.[17] If the counter-affidavit denies the facts stated and averments made in the writ petition on the basis of some material, the petitioner has to controvert such averments by a rejoinder affidavit. If, however, the averments or allegations made in the writ petition, are not specifically denied or traversed in the counter-affidavit, the presumption will be in favour of the correctness of such averments etc.[18] But if the petitioner does not file any rejoinder affidavit challenging the correctness of the statements in the counter-affidavit nor files any documents in support of the petition, the High Court may accept the uncontroverted statements made in the counter-affidavit to be correct.[19] The law allows a party to take any defence which is open to him. In exercise of its jurisdiction in a writ petition, the court can look into any of the documents referred to in the order itself or the pleadings which initiated the proceedings.[20]

New Plea:

The jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 226 is not of appellate nature. Hence, it will not permit a party to raise an entirely new point which was not canvassed before the lower tribunal, for the first time before it.[21] It is well-settled that an allegation which is not pleaded cannot be examined because the other side has no notice of it, and if entertained, it would tantamount to granting unfair advantage to the other side.[22] Even if a point involving a question of fact is raised before the tribunal but has not been proved by leading relevant evidence before it, it cannot be permitted to be raised before the writ court for decision.[23] Likewise, where the point, that the workman was not given adequate opportunity to examine certain witnesses before the inquiry officer was not pleaded nor was it argued before the industrial tribunal, the High Court would not permit to urge this point in the writ petition.[24] On the same principle, a plea which was raised before the tribunal, but not pressed before it, cannot be raised before the High Court in its writ jurisdiction.[25] Hence, the High Court will not upset the award of a tribunal on a point not raised or argued before it which it had no occasion to decide.[26] Similarly, if an objection that could be validly raised before an industrial tribunal was not raised, it cannot be raised in the writ petition.[27] Likewise, the question of maintainability of the reference based on the contention that the dispute was not espoused by the union, being a question involving the termination of service was not permitted to be raised before the writ court for the first time.[28] Similarly, the question of loss of confidence which involves the questions of fact, if not pleaded before the industrial tribunal, cannot be deemed to be raised before the writ court.[29] 'When a party does not claim any privilege with respect to certain documents, the plea of privilege cannot be allowed to be raised at the stage of the argument.[30] A new point, which the opposite side had no opportunity to meet, cannot be allowed to be taken in the writ petition.[31] A pure question of law which arises on the admitted or proved facts, though not specifically raised, may be permitted to be canvassed by the High Court.[32]For instance, where the objection relates to the constitutional validity of a provision of the Act or the rules thereunder or affects the petitioners' fundamental rights, such a point can be raised for the first time in the High Court.[33]

The objections to the jurisdiction are generally of two types, viz, latent lack of jurisdiction and patent lack of jurisdiction. The former are those objections which depend upon the determination of certain facts by the tribunal which are known as jurisdictional facts. For instance, where the plea is that the activity of a particular establishment is not 'industry' or the dispute in question is not an 'industrial dispute' or the workman concerned is not a 'workman' or the government making the reference is not the 'appropriate government' etc, such points must be raised before the tribunal in the first instance. If these points have not been raised before the tribunal, they cannot be validly raised before the writ court. If this type of objection is not taken before the tribunal, the party raising them has to satisfy the High Court that he was unaware of the defects in jurisdiction and that is why it was not taken,[34] and the High Court in its discretion may refuse relief if the party by its own conduct had disentitled itself to it.[35] The latter type of objections relate to the inherent lack of jurisdiction, for instance, the constitutional validity of the Act or the rules thereunder or the constitution of the tribunal itself. Such points cannot be validly raised before or decided by a tribunal. Therefore, such points can always be taken before a writ court.[36] Similarly, where on the uncontroverted facts on record, the authority has no jurisdiction to deal with the matter, the petitioner cannot be debarred from raising the point of jurisdiction in the writ petition.[37] In such cases, the omission by a party to raise the objection as to jurisdiction will not clothe the tribunal with jurisdiction.[38] For instance, an objection that the government making the reference is not the 'appropriate government', can always be raised before the High Court for the first time.[39] Neither submission to jurisdiction nor acquiescence of the parties nor their taking part in the proceedings will debar them from taking the plea, before the High Court, that the award of the tribunal is without jurisdiction.[40] In other words, where the question of jurisdiction goes to the root of the jurisdiction of a tribunal, the absence of jurisdiction cannot be waived by any amount of consent of the litigant. Therefore, the business of a supervisory court, whether under Art 226 or Art 227, is to keep the statutory tribunal within its limits. Moreover, it cannot throw out a petition on the ground that such objection was not taken before the tribunal.[41]

Evidence:

The writ court normally will not go into disputed questions of fact. However, the basic facts have to be established by the petitioner. The opposite parties may admit or traverse such facts. The court will proceed on the basis of the uncontroverted facts. The facts, generally, are averred to by the petitioner by swearing an affidavit in support of them.[42] When a person swears an affidavit in a case which does not concern him, he must explain how he became acquainted with the events and the happenings which ordinarily did not appear to concern him.[43] The facts stated and averments and allegations made should be admitted or controverted by the opposing parties by filing return counter-affidavits and where no counter-affidavit is filed, the facts stated and the averments and allegations made in the writ petition supported by an affidavit will have to be accepted as true.[44] Where the return filed by the opposing party is not in the form of an affidavit, such return will not be a valid return and it need not be taken into consideration.[45]

Costs:

The normal principle of law is that costs must follow the event.[46] This rule would apply to proceedings under the writ jurisdiction as well unless of course some special reason can be shown for making an order otherwise.[47] The conduct of the parties is an important factor in making the order of costs.[48] For instance, in RK Anand, the Delhi High Court awarded costs of litigation against the Central Government as it found that the government was to be blamed for its inaction.[49] Where the petitioner himself is partly at fault resulting in the impugned order being quashed by the High Court and the authorities acted bona fide, the court will usually order the parties to bear their own costs.[50] In Sophia Reuben, where the collector, who had a statutory duty under s 33C(1) of the ID Act to recover the amounts due under a certificate issued by the labour court, did not take any steps for the recovery of the amount for nearly a year in the matter until the workmen were driven to file a petition for a writ of mandamus, after which he collected the amount; in these circumstances, the High Court ordered the collector to pay the costs of the writ proceedings personally.[51]

Appeals:

It is now well settled that an appeal will lie to a Division Bench from the order of a single judge in an application/petition under Art 226 provided such order constitutes a 'judgment' within the meaning of the letters patent.[52] The writ-appeal is limited in scope. The appeal court has the same jurisdiction as the single judge while dealing with the petition in the first instance in issuing or refusing to issue a writ, direction or order under Arts 226 or 227 on the basis of well recognised principles. The appellate court normally will not interfere with the discretion of the single judge unless it finds that the exercise of the discretion is erroneous or improper and not consistent with the well recognised principles of law in issuing the writs.

Relief:

The jurisdiction of the writ court under Arts 226 & 227 is confined not only to the narrow precincts of quashing the impugned order on certiorari but it can also modulate its order so as to grant the appropriate relief because the jurisdiction of the court does not come to an end as soon as the impugned order is quashed.[53] In a case where the service of the workman has been terminated by a verbal order and there is no such order in writing, the court can direct the employer to reinstate the workman in service on finding the termination of the service to be illegal.[54] It will be open to the writ court to pass proper order under s 11A, in a case where the tribunal did not consider the facts of the case and refused to exercise its powers under s 11A resulting in failure of justice.[55]

(ii) Mandamus

Mandamus literally means a command. It differs from the writ of prohibition or certiorari in its demand for some activity on the part of the body or person to whom it is addressed.[56] The order of mandamus is of most extensive remedial nature, and is, in form, a command issued by the High Court of justice, directed to any person, corporation, or inferior tribunal, requiring him or them to do some particular thing therein specified which appertains to his or their office and, in the nature of a public duty. Its purpose is to remedy defects of justice; and accordingly it will be issued, to the end that justice may be done, in all cases where there is a specific legal right and no specific legal remedy for enforcing that right; and it may be issued in cases where, although there is an alternative legal remedy, yet that mode of redress is less convenient, beneficial and effectual'.[57] In other words, mandamus is a coercive and not a corrective writ; it stimulates the lethargic into action; it commands performance, not resistance. It cannot lie to restrain action.[58]Mandamus is the most valuable and essential remedy in the administration of justice, but it can only be resorted to, to supply the want of some more appropriate ordinary remedy. Its purpose, as generally used, is to compel corporations, inferior tribunals or public officers to perform their functions, or some particular duty imposed upon them, which in its nature is imperative, and to the performance of which the party applying for the writ has a clear legal right. The process is extraordinary, and if the right be doubtful, or duty discretionary, or of a nature to require the exercise of judgment, or if there be any ordinary adequate legal remedy to which the party applying could have recourse, this writ will not be granted. The application for the writ being made to the sound judicial discretion of the court, all the circumstances of the case must be considered in determining whether the writ should be 'allowed unless the court is satisfied that it is necessary to secure the ends of justice, or to subserve some just or useful purpose'.[59] It is, however, not necessary that the person or the authority on whom the statutory duty is imposed need to be a public official or an official body. A mandamus can be issued, for instance, to an official of a society to compel him to carry out the terms of the statute under or by which the society is constituted or governed and also to companies or corporations to carry out the duties placed on them by the statutes authorising their undertakings.[60] But the writ court cannot, by mandamus compel an inferior tribunal to exercise a jurisdiction which it does not possess.[61] Normally, a writ of mandamus is not issued to or an order in the nature of mandamus is not made against a private individual. Such an order is made against a person directing him to do some particular thing, specified in the order, which appertains to his office and is in the nature of a public duty.[62] So long as the duty that is sought to be performed is in the nature of a public duty, it is not necessary that the person or the authority on which the duty is imposed should be a public official or an official body.[63] A writ, order or direction in the nature of a writ of mandamus can be issued in the case where there is a statutory duty imposed upon an authority and there is a failure on the part of that authority to discharge that statutory obligation.[64]

Requirements of Mandamus:

Mandamus cannot be issued unless the following requirements are satisfied:

(1) The applicant must have a legal right to the performance of a legal duty.[65]

(2) The applicant must further have the legal right to enforce performance of the duty.[66]

(3) The duty should be imposed by law on the respondent and such duty should be of an imperative ministerial character involving no judgment or discretion on the part of the respondent.[67]

(4) The applicant must have made a definite demand of justice and there should be a definite refusal by the respondent and the fact of such demand and refusal must be set out in the petition.[68]

(5) The applicant must act in good faith and not for some ulterior purpose or for the benefit of a third party,[69] and should not suppress or mis-state material facts in the application.[70]

(6) The applicant should not have been guilty of laches or unexplained delay.[71]

(7) Remedy of mandamus should not have become futile or ineffective.[72]

(8) The applicant should not have approached the court in mere anticipation of an authority doing something to his prejudice.[73]

(9) Irregularity complained of, not affecting jurisdiction, should have resulted in failure of justice.[74]

(10) The petition should not involve complicated question of fact in respect of title to property.[75]

Alternative Remedy:

Judicial remedies are not meant to short-circuit or circumvent statutory procedures. It is only where statutory remedies are entirely ill-suited to meet the demands of the extraordinary situations as, for instance, where the very vires of the statute is in question or where private or public wrongs are so inextricably mixed up and the prevention of the public injury and the vindication of public justice requires it, then recourse may be had to such remedies. But the court must have good and sufficient reason to bypass the alternative remedy provided by the statute.[76] Normally, if the petitioner has no other specific legal remedy which is adequate to afford complete relief and if there would be failure of justice if the aid of the writ court is not extended, remedy by way of mandamus may be invoked.[77] Likewise, when a party alleges the breach of his fundamental rights, his way will not be barred by the rule that when there is an adequate remedy, a prerogative writ will not issue.[78] The person claiming the relief by a writ of mandamus must plead and prove that the remedies available under the Industrial Disputes Act are not adequate and efficacious. In the absence of such plea and proof, a writ petition for mandamus will not be maintainable.[79] The basic rule is that only a person who has the right to enforce performance of public duty may apply for mandamus.[80] In other words, it is necessary, that the person claiming a writ of mandamus must have a legal right to the performance of a legal duty by the one against whom the writ is sought.[81]

In the words of Prof. de Smith, 'Mandamus lies to secure the performance of a public duty, in the performance of which the applicant has a sufficient legal interest'.[82] Hence, an application for mandamus will not lie for an order of reinstatement to an office which is essentially of a private character nor can such an application be maintained to secure the performance of obligations owed by a company towards its workmen or to resolve private disputes.[83] But once the dispute relating to termination of service of a workmen claiming reinstatement is resolved by an award of the Industrial tribunal ordering his reinstatement with backwages, it confers a legal right on the workman to be so reinstated and a corresponding obligation is imposed on the employer to take steps to implement the award. Therefore, the workman has the right to seek a writ of mandamus against the employer to implement the award of reinstatement with continuity of service and backwages.[84] The words 'any person or authority' are not confined to the statutory authorities and instrumentalities of the state, but include any other person or body discharging public duty. There are, however, two exceptions to this rule, viz, if the rights are purely of a private nature, no mandamus can be issued and similarly if the authority is purely a private body with no public duty, mandamus cannot be issued. The public duty is to be judged in the light of the obligation, whether statutory or otherwise, imposed upon the person or authority for the benefit of the affected party.[85] In this connection Shetty J, speaking for the Supreme Court in Anandi Mukta Trust, has stated the law with clarity and precision:

> The words 'any person or authority' used in Art 226 are, therefore, not to be confined only to statutory authorities and instrumentalities of the state. They may cover any other person or body performing public duty. The form of the body concerned is not very much relevant. What is relevant is the nature of the duty imposed on the body. The duty must be judged in the light of the positive obligation owed by the person or authority to the affected party. No matter by what means the duty is imposed. If a positive obligation exists mandamus cannot be denied...Here again we may point out that mandamus cannot be denied on the ground that duty to be enforced is not imposed by the statute...judicial control over the fast expanding maze of bodies affecting the rights of the people should not be put into watertight compartments. It should remain flexible to meet the requirements of variable circumstances. Mandamus is a very wide remedy which must be easily available 'to reach injustice wherever it is found.[86]

A single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Gattaiah, has held that a writ of mandamus can be issued to a company registered under the Companies Act to compel it to carry out the statutory requirements of s 25N of the Industrial Disputes Act. He further observed that the requirements of chapter V-B are in the nature of 'public duty' in laying-off or retrenching workmen.[87] In a later case, in EID Parry,[88]another single judge of the same High Court observed that s 33 of the Act creates a statutory mandatory obligation upon the employer not to-alter the conditions of service of the workmen concerned in a dispute pending before the conciliation officer, board, arbitrator, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, to their prejudice. Hence, if such alteration is proposed or is likely to take place, the writ court would be 'perfectly justified in issuing a writ of mandamus commanding the employer to abide by the said statutory mandatory obligation'. However, in view of the fact that there was no pendency within the meaning of s 33(1)(a), the court held that there was no occasion for issuing a writ directing the enforcement of the statutory mandatory obligation. But in this case, the court did not give any reasons for its view. Nor did it even suggest that a public duty is cast on the employer by the provisions of s 33 of the Act. Another single judge of the same High Court in IDL Chemicals held that a writ petition against a company is maintainable, even though it is not 'state', if there is a violation of the statutory duties under s 33 of the Act. Accordingly, the court issued a writ of mandamus to the company for breach of s 33 and declined permission to the company to justify its action resulting in breach of s 33 in the writ proceedings.[89] Even in this case, the court did not give any reasons for the maintainability of a writ petition against a company except relying on Gattaiah.

Similarly, the Gujarat High Court held that the word 'person' in Art 226(1) and also in s 3(42) of the General Clauses Act 1897, as provided by Art 367 of the Constitution would cover the companies, who are required to comply with the requirements of s 25FFA, s 25FFF or s 25O which are the statutory obligations or public duties and not private duties or obligations. In this case, the court held that the wholesale termination of service of the employees without complying with the requirements of s s 25FFA and 25FFF of the Industrial Disputes Act was ineffective, inoperative and invalid in law.[90] On the other hand, the Delhi High Court in National Seeds, held that non-compliance of the statutory requirements of s 9A of the Act did not entitle the workman to claim a writ of mandamus against the company. The court observed that there is no statutory obligation on a company incorporated under the Companies Act to follow s 9A in the manner in which there will be a statutory obligation on a company to comply with the provisions of the statute which brings it into existence.[91] The Bombay High Court in Scindia Steam Navigation, did not lay down any new principle but only gave effect to the established principle that if there is any statutory duty cast upon an individual that will be enforced under Art 226. The Bench observed:

> It is now well-established that the mandamus lies to secure the performance of the public or statutory duty though it is not necessary that the person or authority on whom the statutory duty is cast need be a public official or an official body. If it is found that the company has some obligation to perform a statutory or a public duty, then it may not be possible to contend that no writ can be issued to the company merely because it is a company registered under the Companies Act to enforce the performance of the public duty or the statutory duty.[92]

In view of the fact that the 'settlement' as defined in s 2(p) though binding under s 18 of the Act, is not an instrument creating a statutory right or obligation, the High Court declined to issue a writ of mandamus. It further observed that when it is said that mandamus will issue for the enforcement of a public duty, then as observed by Garner,[93] 'the duty which it is sought to enforce by order of mandamus must be of a public nature'. In Ganesh Dutt,[94] it was held that Maruti Udyog Ltd was not an instrumentality of the state, and hence was not amenable to writ jurisdiction. Where the Union challenged the closure of a textile mill under s 25FFA by filing a writ petition under Art 226, it was held that the employer, not being a State within the meaning of Art 12, was not amenable to writ jurisdiction and no relief could be granted in a petition under Art 226.[95] A single judge of Calcutta High Court held that the refusal of the application for approval of dismissal under s 33(2)(b) does not have the effect of transforming a contractual liability into a statutory liability, and hence no writ can lie against the employer.[1] In Narkesari Prakashan, the Supreme Court held that the appellant could have availed of the remedy of a reference as provided in sub-s (6) of s 25N, against an order granting permission to retrench under s 25N ; that the appellant, having chosen the remedy of moving the High Court under Art 226, could not therefore be heard to make a grievance that the High Court should not have gone into the merits of that contention.[2]

In Anaimalai NEW Union, Sivasubramaniam J of the Madras High Court held that a writ could be issued against a private company, if it violates statutory or public duties or indulges in monstrous activities.[3] This decision induces grave misconceptions about the writ jurisdiction of High Courts vis-`a-vis the distinction (or, the absence of it) between a 'statutory duty' and a 'public duty', as the above observation has placed statutory duties on the same footing as 'public duties' alongside 'monstrosities'. In the words of Prof. de Smith, 'Mandamus lies to secure the performance of a public duty, in the performance of which the applicant has a sufficient legal interest'.[4] In Gattaiah (supra), where similar question arose in relation to chapter V-B, PA Chowdary J of Andhra Pradesh HC issued a writ of mandamus directing the company to reinstate the workmen, as the management did not obtain prior permission under s 25N before retrenching the workmen.[5]

A contractual obligation between the employer and an employee can hardly be said to have the character of a public nature. It is purely a private contract between two parties to the agreement, namely, the employer and the employee. In Roche Anglo-French,[6] the Bombay High Court held that the company had no public duty in complying with the requirements of s 33(2) and non-observance of the provisions of that section would not entitle the High Court to issue a writ of mandamus. The crux of the law relating to the writ of mandamus is that mere breach of statutory duty will not entitle the aggrieved party to a writ of mandamus. The statutory duty must also be a 'public duty'. If a duty though statutory, is not a 'public duty', no mandamus can be issued. If the view of the Andhra Pradesh High Court that mere breach of statutory obligation will call for a writ of mandamus is accepted, then every breach of the Contract Act or the Companies Act or any other statute by private individuals or companies will call for issuance of a writ of mandamus. The following observations of Shah, J in Roche Anglo-French, in a direct reference to Gattaiah, deserve special mention:

> Now, it is well settled that where the applicant seeks to enforce the performance of duty of public character, a writ of mandamus can be issued. It is equally well settled that normally a writ of mandamus cannot be issued against a private person, though in proper cases where the performance of duties of a public nature is involved, such a writ can be issued even against a private individual. It is also equally well settled that the writ of mandamus can be issued against public officials and public bodies failing to perform any public duty with which they have been charged ... s 33(2) undoubtedly makes a statutory provision imposing an obligation on the employer with regard to the matters mentioned in the provisions as regards the conditions of service or employment of different employees. Merely because the statute provides for certain service conditions which are binding on the employer notwithstanding the conditions of service which may be agreed upon between the employer and employees and merely because the provisions relate to a dispute which is common to the several employees of the company, it is difficult to accept the contention that they involved performance of duties of a public nature. The provision is obviously in the nature of regulating the terms of employment of the employees who have raised the dispute which is pending before the conciliation officer. In other words, the rights involved are of a private nature and cannot be given the status of public duty imposed on the employer. ()...It appears that the learned Judge was of the view that the limitations on the powers of the employers imposed by the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act being not merely on the interests of individual workman but in the general interest of industrial peace, a writ of mandamus could be issued. With respect, it is not possible to agree with the view taken by the learned Judge. Merely because the enactment prescribes certain statutory restrictions in the matter of retrenchment of workmen it would not follow that thereby a public duty is cast upon the employer. Such provisions merely regulate the relationship between the employer and the workmen and put limitations on the exercise of the right of the employer. Such statutory provisions cannot be likened with public duties, performance of which can be directed by issuing a writ of mandamus. It is not possible to agree with the view expressed by the Andhra Pradesh High Court, which, in our view, runs counter to the law laid down by the Supreme Court....()

In Madras Labour Union, Srinivasan, J of Madras High Court, referring to the decision in Gattaiah, held:

> ...A perusal of the entire judgment would show that mandamus would issue against a private individual or an incorporated company provided the private individual or the company is enjoined by law to perform a duty of a public nature. If the learned judge has meant that a writ could be issued against a private person or an incorporated company even for the purpose of enforcing a contractual right without reference to the question. whether the writ that is sought for would lie against that private individual or company under the established principles, then we must confess, with great respect to the learned judge, that we are unable to subscribe to that view and we see no justification for holding that 'person' referred to in Art 226 would take in every private individual with respect to every private act or a mission of his.[7] (Italics supplied)

The decisions rendered by Bombay and Madras High Courts are consistent with the law laid down by a host of authoritative decisions of Supreme Court and are right. It is a judicial misconception of rudimentary nature on the part of Chowdary J that, being a judge at the level of the High Court, he grossly failed to distinguish a 'statutory duty' of contractual nature from a 'public duty' having a public law element therein. While it is conceded that in the event of violation of 'public duty' a writ could be issued even to a private person or party, every 'statutory duty' cannot be classified as a 'public duty'. In order for a duty to partake the character of a public duty, it should be shown that it is a duty, which, though directed at the moment towards a private party, has implications for the general public. Paraphrasing, the effect of non-performance of such a duty by the authority concerned is not confined to the party alone, but has implications extended to the public at large. What public duty could presumably have been violated in a case where an employer retrenches a few of his workmen? Could it be said that a retrenchment of this kind would have far reaching implications for the community in the sense that the fundamental rights guaranteed to the members of the public get infringed? Chowdary J grossly misdirected himself and handled the case without applying his mind to the facts and without following the settled principles and binding precedents. The reasoning and conclusions reached by Prakash Narain J of the Delhi High Court in National Seeds, Srinivasan J of the Madras High Court in Madras Labour Union, and that of Shah J of the Bombay High Court in Roche Anglo-French are consistent with the legal principles governing mandamus laid down by the Apex Court and are right. On the other hand, the decision of PA Chowdary J of AP high Court in Gattiah reflects nothing worthwhile except a manifest abuse of judicial power on his part, is clearly misconceived, wholly perverse and absolutely wrong, and deserves to be condemned outright and rejected without a second look.

In Bharat Petroleum, the Madras High Court comprising Subhashan Reddy CJ and Murugesan J had proceeded to issue a writ of mandamus against the trade union for resorting to a strike which presumably was illegal within the meaning of s 22 of the Industrial Disputes Act.[8] With great respect, the Chief Justice had no less misdirected himself than PA Chowdary J of AP High Court in Gattaiah (supra). What public duty is involved in a strike called out by a trade union which calls for interference by the High Court by way of a mandamus, albeit in a public utility service, more so, when the ID Act read with standing orders provide for elaborate process and an effective alternative remedy as to the manner of treating and handling an illegal strike or illegal lockout? Yes, it is conceded that the workmen staging an illegal strike in a public utility strike cause serious inconvenience to the public apart from financial loss to the employer. It is also admitted that there is no statutory right, much less a fundamental right, to strike regardless of the fact that strikes and lockouts are an intrinsic part of the collective bargaining process. The fact that the combined focus of sections 22, 23 and 24 of the ID Act is on prohibition - and not promotion - of strikes and lockouts is also taken note of. But these facts per se do not by any stretch of imagination give rise to an inference that the High Court and the Supreme Court can misuse and abuse the power conferred on them under the Constitution by issuing writs of the kind of mandamus in a reckless manner, more so, when the Act itself provides for an efficacious remedy to treat the said industrial actions of contractual nature and also the consequences ensuing therefrom. Could it be said that a trade union or, for that matter, an industrial employer carrying on a particular business, howsoever critical it might be for the general public, is performing a statutory duty of public duty character having a public law element in it? In this connection, it will do well to recall what JC Shah J had to say about the expression 'authority' appearing in Art 12 in Rajasthan State Electricity Board. The learned judge in his concurring judgment observed:

> I am unable, however, to agree that every constitutional or statutory authority on whom powers are conferred by law is "other authority" within the meaning of Article 12. The expression "authority" in its etymological sense means a body invested with power to command or give an ultimate decision, or enforce obedience, or having a legal right to command and be obeyed... Those authorities which are invested with sovereign power, i.e., power to make rules or regulations and to administer or enforce them to the detriment of citizens and others fall within the definition of "State" in Article 12, and constitutional or statutory bodies which do not share that sovereign power of the State are not in my judgment, "State" within the meaning of Article 12 of the Constitution.[9] (Italics supplied).

In the face of this candid observation, is it possible by any stretch of imagination to brand a trade union of workmen as an 'authority' invested with the State's sovereign power in the sense of making rules and enforcing their obedience by the citizens, etc.? It is both amusing and disgusting to hear Subhashan Reddy CJ with decades of experience at the bar and the bench, travelling to the length of holding that a trade union of workmen was an 'authority', within the meaning of Art 12, performing a public duty![10] The contentions raised by counsel in the case (at Para 17 of the judgment), that the trade unions could not be termed as 'other authorities' within the meaning of the said Article and that no writ was maintainable, were right, whereas the reasoning and conclusion reached by Reddy CJ are trite and misconceived. In another case involving the same company and the same cause, the Bombay High Court comprising Khanwilkar and Gyanoo JJ decided the case on the same lines as its Madras counterpart.[11] Both the High Courts apparently followed the decisions of the Supreme Court, inter alia, in Som Prakash Rekhi,[12] and Shri Anandi Mukta Trust,[13] which are themselves finished products of grave misconceptions on the part of the learned judges. This dysfunctional trend, which had its disquieting beginning in Sukhdev Singh,[14] and Ajay Hasia (infra), at the hands of a team of over-zealous judges headed by AN Ray CJI during the black days of 'Emergency' and is continuing unabated for over 40 years now, needs to be curbed sooner than later, for the good of the country as well as for upholding the reputation and standing of the Supreme Court. In this connection, it is considered expedient to devote some space to the decisions in Som Prakash Rekhi and Shri Anandi Mukta Trust and other cases, prefaced by Ajay Hasia. In Ajay Hasia, Bhagwati J contributed his own share of misconceptions and proceeded to hold that even companies incorporated under the Companies Act and Societies registered under Societies Registration Act would fall within the expression of 'Authority' in Art 12, as can be seen from the following passage:

> We may point out that it is immaterial for this purpose whether the corporation is created by a statute or under a statute. The test is whether it is an instrumentality or agency of the Government and not as to how it is created. The inquiry has to be not as to how the juristic person is born but why it has been brought into existence. The corporation may be a statutory corporation created by a statute or it may be a Government company or a company formed under the Companies Act 1956 or it may be a society registered under the Societies Registration Act 1860 or any other similar statute. Whatever be its genetical origin, it would be an 'authority' within the meaning of Article 12 if it is an instrumentality or agency of the Government and that would have to be decided on a proper assessment of the facts in the light of the relevant factors. The concept of instrumentality or agency of the Government is not limited to a corporation created by a statute but is equally applicable to a company or society and in a given case it would have to be decided, on a consideration of the relevant factors, whether the company or society is an instrumentality or agency of the Government so as to come within the meaning of the expression 'authority in Article 12. [15]

It is this kind of intellectual myopia, which afflicted the judicial vision of a few 'activist-populist' judges of the 1970s & 1980s, that was largely responsible for the docket explosion and unmanageable workload in higher courts, as the litigants were given a green signal to circumvent the ordinary and more effective remedies provided under the respective statutes and directly knock at the doors of higher courts in every trivia. In Som Prakash Rekhi, the judicial perversions touched their zenith in so far as Iyer J held that Bharat Petroleum Corporation was 'State' within the enlarged meaning of Art 12, and further observed that the commonsense signification of the expression 'other authorities under the control of the Government of India' was plain and there was no reason to make exclusions on sophisticated grounds such as that the legal person must be a statutory corporation.[16] In striking contrast, the decision in Tekraj made a refreshing departure from the insolvent trends noticed Ajay Hasia, Sukhdev Singh and Som Prakash Rekhi. In Tekraj, counsel relied on Sukhdev Singh to press his argument that the Institute of Constitutional and Political Studies which was a voluntary society formed under Societies Registration Act, but comprising members of the two Houses of Parliament, was an agency or instrumentality of the state within the meaning of 'other authorities'. Justice Misra repelled the contention and held that objects of the society were not governmental business, but aspects which were expected to equip Members of Parliament and the state legislatures with the requisite knowledge and experience for better functioning. Many of the objects adopted by the society were not confined to the two Houses of Parliament and were intended to have an impact on society at large, and hence it could not be said to fall within the meaning of 'other authorities'.[17] In Shri Anandi Mukta Trust, Shetty J held that the words 'any person or authority' used in Art 226 may cover any person or body performing public duty, and not confined only to statutory authorities and instrumentalities of the state.[18] The rendition of Mishra J is right and those of Bhagwati, Iyer and Shetty JJ are repugnant to the Constitution, and are patently wrong.

Reverting to Bharat Petroleum, the decisions of Madras and Bombay High Courts disclose nothing worthwhile except judicial high-handedness and a gross and unadulterated abuse of judicial power on the part of the learned judges. If the High Court chooses to interfere with contractual actions and statutory violations in this manner, then what is the sanctity of s s 26, 27 & 28 of the ID Act and of the acts of misconduct enumerated in the Standing Orders, which provide for the machinery and procedure for handling such contraventions? Can the High Court assume the direct responsibility of managing industrial undertakings over the heads of the employers themselves? It is this kind of misplaced judicial activism, bordering on perversion, that is responsible for encouraging litigants to cut corners by discarding the more effective remedy provided in the respective enactments, and invoking the writ jurisdiction of High Courts. At a more basic level, what is the sanctity of mandamus issued against a few thousand workmen and what sense does it make even to a layman? Could it be enforced in any meaningful way, if the whole body of workmen defies the order with impunity? Is it possible to arrest and try some 60,000-70,000 employees spread across the country or to initiate contempt proceedings against them for flouting the misconceived mandamus? Assuming that it can be done, how does the mandamus get enforced in so far as it commands the party to do its duty vis-à-vis the consumers who are adversely affected by the strike!? And assuming further that the employees could be arrested and tried, what would be the fate of production operations of the company? The remedy would be worse than the disease, as it renders the supply of essential products to the community even more remote and impossible. What practical considerations did prevail with, and what kind of intellectual exercise was pressed into service by, the learned judges while deciding the case in such a desolate manner? And, strangely, the judges at the level of High Courts and Supreme Court appear to be content with issuing writs, in all and sundry cases, while millions of cases are languishing for decades waiting for disposal, nay, parturition. That is the abysmal level to which the standard and quality of judicial decisions have taken a plunge! The above decisions are reckless, mediocre and insipid and deserve nothing short of an outright condemnation in the strongest possible language and terms!

In Eagle Rolling Mills, a Constitution Bench presided over by Gajendragadkar, CJI, held that though the power of the High Court under Art 226 is very wide, even this power cannot take within its sweep 'industrial disputes' of the kind which were sought to be raised before the High Court.[19] In Rohtas Industries, Krishna Iyer J, speaking in the same strain, held that if the industrial dispute relates to enforcement of a right or an obligation created under the Act, then the only remedy available to the suitor is to get it adjudicated under the Act.[20] In Bihar RVPFK Union, Pathak CJI dismissed the petition on the ground of alternative remedy being available to the workmen which could only be adjudicated on evidence and that the writ court would not enter into questions of fact.[21] Viewed against this backdrop, the relationship between IDL Chemicals (the 'employer' in this case) and the temporary workmen who were retrenched, was purely contractual and private in character, and the question raised therein fell squarely within the definition of 'industrial dispute'. At any rate, it could never be considered at par with the relationship that exists between the state or its instrumentality, on the one hand, and the citizens, on the other. If, in the opinion of the court, there was a violation of the relevant provisions of the ID Act, the right course would have been to direct the party to approach the appropriate tribunal provided for under the Act, instead of assuming jurisdiction wrongfully and granting a writ under the wrong pretext that it was a public duty. Adverting to Animal National Estate, could it be said that the non-issue of a notice of change under s 9A would have an adverse affect on the public at large? If, as averred by the learned judge, the non-compliance of s 9A could be considered as a violation of 'statutory duty' and, therefore, a 'public duty, then what class of duties imposed under various labour laws or, for that matter, in any law of any branch, would possibly fall outside the class 'public duty'? It is also not a case where the Act conferred a particular right with no specific remedy to enforce it, which circumstance alone could justify the issue of a writ. If the management had changed the conditions of service without notice and without permission during the pendency of a proceeding, there is a specific remedy provided under s 33A of the Act itself. What was the warrant for the learned judge to issue a writ in the face of an equally or more efficacious remedy available to the workman? The learned judge turned a blind eye to what Prof. Schwartz and Prof. Wade peremptorily observed about prerogative writs:

> The important aspect of the prerogative remedies is that they belong exclusively to public law (with the exception of habeas corpus), their primary object being to make the machinery of government work properly rather than to enforce private rights. This introduces a valuable 'public interest' element. An application for certiorari is, as the title of the case indicates, a proceeding by the Queen to call some public authority to account for exceeding or abusing is power. Similarly in a suit for mandamus the Queen is calling for the proper discharge of some public duty. Although private persons are of course the real plaintiffs, the public character of the proceedings is more than a mere form.[22] (Italics supplied).

According to Halsbury:

> The order of mandamus is an order of a most extensive remedial nature, and is, in form, a command issuing from the High Court of Justice, directed to any person, corporation, or inferior tribunal, requiring him or them to do some particular thing therein specified which appertains to his or their office and is in the nature of a public duty. Its purpose is to supply defects of justice; and accordingly, it will issue, to the end that justice may be done in all cases where there is a specific legal right and no specific legal remedy for enforcing that right..[23]

The writ of mandamus is not a 'writ of course' or a 'writ of right', but is discretionary. But where the right, which the applicant seeks to enforce, is the performance of duties of a public nature which are merely ministerial and cannot be secured at all if a mandamus is refused, the issue of the writ is not discretionary.[24] In exercising its discretion, the court will refuse the writ, if there is an alternative remedy at law, but the alternative remedy must be equally convenient, beneficial and effectual. In England, such alternative remedies include a petition of right (replaced by proceedings under the Crown Proceedings Act 1947); an appeal to a court or tribunal; an election petition; an execution; and an action at law.[25] The above authorities eloquently demonstrate that the issue of mandamus is inalienably linked to duties of public nature and not to enforce private rights inter partes, whether conferred by a statute or otherwise; that even in the case of non-performance of a public duty by an authority, the issue of a writ is discretionary, if there is an alternative remedy at law which is equally convenient, beneficial and effectual. It cannot be denied that the Indian Constitution adopted these writs on an as-is-where-is basis from English law and, by the same token, they cannot acquire a connotation different from that of English jurisprudence, which implies that Indian judges are not free to transgress their legitimate confines while exercising the writ jurisdiction. In VST Industries, the facts were, the VSTI Employees' Union filed a petition in the Andhra Pradesh High Court seeking for a writ of mandamus directing the company to treat certain contract workers engaged in the canteen (who were members of the union) as the employees of the company and for grant of certain monetary and other consequential benefits. Despite the contention of the management that no writ would lie against a company in view of the fact it was not an authority or a person within the meaning of Art 12 of the Constitution and that it was not discharging any public duty, both a single judge and the Division Bench of High Court apparently following Parimal Chandra Raha, and Gattaiah, and held that a writ would lie against a company under a private management. The High Court further held that s 46 of the Factories Act 1948 imposed on the company a public duty to establish and maintain a canteen; and that inasmuch as the members of the union were working in the canteen they were entitled to seek a mandamus. Rejecting the view of the High Court, the Supreme Court held:

> Manufacture and sale of cigarettes will not involve any public function. Incidental to that activity there is another obligation under Section 46 of the Act to set up a canteen when the establishment has more than 250 workmen. That means, it is a condition of service ... In other words, it is only a labour welfare device for the benefit of its work-force unlike a provision where Pollution Control Act makes it obligatory even on a private limited company not to discharge certain effluents. In such cases public duty is owed to the public in general and not specific to any person or group of persons. Further the damage that would be caused in not observing them is immense. If merely what can be considered a part of the conditions of service of a workman is violated, then we do not think there is any justification to hold that such activity will amount to public duty. Thus, we are of the view that the High Court fell into error that appellant is amenable to writ jurisdiction.[26] (,)

Viewed in this background, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the decision of Sivasubramaniam J in Anaimalai NEW Union, coming, as it were, after the decision of Supreme Court in VST Industries amounts to a blatant defiance of a binding precedent and constitutes judicial indiscipline of grave magnitude. In Mukul Kumar Shukla, Sikri J of the Delhi High Court, while repelling the argument of counsel for petitioner for issuing a writ against the respondent for reason of non-compliance with the mandatory provisions of s 25F of the ID Act, observed:

> A Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in the case of Eagle Rolling Mills,[27] has categorically held that in relation to an industrial dispute, a writ petition under Art 226 of the Constitution of India cannot be entertained and the Writ Court shall not convert itself into an Industrial Court. The petitioner, in the instant case, has failed to show that any public law character is involved in the writ petition. Even assuming that the respondent has not complied with the mandatory requirements of s 25F of the Act, its remedy would be to take recourse to the provisions of the said statute in terms whereof its service conditions are protected. In the Sain Steel Products case,[28]. .. relied upon by the petitioner no contention had been raised as to whether a writ petition would be maintainable nor the earlier binding precedents of the Supreme Court had been cited. It is now a well established principle of law that a judgment cannot be relied upon for the proposition which had not been canvassed before the Court. Having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case, we are of the opinion that it is not a fit case where this Court should exercise its discretionary jurisdiction under Art 226 of the Constitution of India. This writ petition is, therefore, dismissed with liberty to the petitioner to avail alternative remedies available to him. [29]

Sikri J declined, and very rightly so, to issue a writ against Hindustan Times, which decision is consistent with the ratio laid down by the Apex Court in several cases. Speaking in the same vein, the Allahabad High Court in Pepsico, held that the respondent-company was a private company and not state or an instrumentality of the state under Art 12, and hence the writ petition filed by the workmen seeking relief against termination of their services by the company was not maintainable.[30] In PNB Employees, where the settlement entered into with one union was challenged by another union in a writ petition, Menon J dismissed the writ petition and directed the petitioners to approach the tribunal/labour court under the provisions of the ID Act, and further held that the remedy under Art 226 was not to supersede completely the remedy of obtaining relief by civil suit or any other statutory provision.[31] The decisions of the Bombay, Madras, Delhi, Allahabad and Madhya Pradesh High Courts in Roche Anglo-French, Madras Labour Union, Hindustan Times, Pepsico and PNB, respectively, should be accepted as propounding correct law consistent with the ratio evolved by the Apex Court in Eagle Rolling Mills, Rohtas Industries and other cases. In Nirmalendu Roy, the Calcutta High Court held that the grant of relief under Art 226 is discretionary and should be exercised only in exceptional circumstances and where the dismissed workman in a public sector undertaking has efficacious alternative remedy available under s 2A, he must be relegated to avail of the said remedy before invoking the extraordinary jurisdiction of the High Court.[32]

In Maruti Udyog, the facts were, as a consequence of industrial relations, problems coupled with go-slow, tool-down strike, and threats of total strike, etc, the management demanded that the workers should sign a 'good conduct' undertaking that they would not resort to go-slow, etc, in breach of the Standing Orders. The union of workmen, having been unsuccessful to get an injunction issued by the civil court on jurisdictional grounds, filed a writ petition in the High Court praying inter alia for an injunction against the management from enforcing the good conduct undertaking. The High Court held, following several decisions of the Apex Court, that Maruti Udyog Ltd, was not a 'State', and that the union cannot invoke the writ jurisdiction of High Court for obtaining the same relief, which it could not obtain from the civil court. That the union does not satisfy the three conditions necessary for the grant of an injunction, namely, (i) that it had a prima facie case; (ii) that the balance of convenience was in its favour; and (iii) that irreparable loss would be caused to it, if the injunction was not granted, and therefore the petition should be dismissed.[33] In Balakrishna Transport, pending the conciliation proceedings in the labour court, the union of employees of stage carriage operator resorted to violence and destructive activities by damaging the vehicles to force the employer to agree to the charter of demands. A single judge of the Kerala High Court directed the police to take effective steps to protect the vehicles from the highhanded destructive activities of the union and its followers to give protection to the employer in plying its vehicles. The court observed:

> If the workmen resort to force and their actions amount to commission of offences under the ordinary law of the land, police will have to take effective steps to prevent the same and to bring the offenders to due process of law. Under the guise of the labour agitation, no one can be permitted to take the law into his own hands. Any laches on the part of the police in this direction will affect the industrial peace in the state.[34]

Accordingly, the court directed the police authorities to give protection to the employer in plying his vehicle and it also directed the labour court to settle the dispute pending before it expeditiously.

(iii) Quo Warranto

(a) Nature of

A writ in the nature of quo warrnato would lie 'against a person who claimed or usurped an office, franchise or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supported his claim, in order that right to the office or franchise might be determined'.[35] The leading case on quo warranto is Speyer, in which Lord Reading CJ traced the evolution of the writ of quo warranto and enunciated the following principles:

(1) A stranger whose motives are not proper cannot apply for a writ of quo warranto;

(2) Quo warranto will lie if there is a public office of subordinative character, even if such office is held at pleasure;

(3) Even if an appointment to the office is made by the Crown, the court even in semblance, cannot command the Crown, the writ of quo warranto will operate on the occupier of the office;

(4) It is not to be supposed that the Crown would reappoint the person to an office from which he has been ousted on a writ of quo warranto; and

(5) Even, where a public office is held at the pleasure of the Crown, a writ of quo warranto will lie against the usurper of that office.[36]

This decision has been followed in most of the Indian cases. The law on the subject has been stated with precision by Gajendragadkar J in University of Mysore, thus:

> Broadly stated, the quo warranto proceeding affords a judicial inquiry in which any person holding an independent substantive public office, or franchise, or liberty, is called upon to show by what right he holds the said office, franchise or liberty; if the inquiry leads to the finding that the holder of the office has no valid tide to it, the issue of the writ of quo warranto ousts him from that office. In other words, the procedure of quo warranto confers jurisdiction and authority on the judiciary to control executive action in the matter of making appointments to public offices against the relevant statutory provisions; it also protects a citizen from being deprived of public office to which he may have a right. It would thus be seen that if these proceedings are adopted subject to the conditions recognised in that behalf, they tend to protect the public from usurpers of public office; in some cases, persons not entitled to public office may be allowed to occupy them and continue to hold them as a result of the connivance of the executive or with its active help, and in such cases, if the jurisdiction of the courts to issue writ of quo warranto is properly invoked, the usurper can be ousted and the person entitled to the post allowed to occupy it. It is thus clear that before a citizen can claim a writ of quo warranto, he must satisfy the court, inter alia, that the office in question is a public office and is held by usurper without legal authority, and that necessarily leads to the inquiry as to whether the appointment of the said alleged usurper has been made in accordance with law or not.[37]

(b) Quo warranto: When Will Issue?

A writ in the nature of quo warranto would lie in respect of an office, if:

(1) such office was created by a statute or the Constitution;

(2) the duties of such office are of public nature;

(3) the office is of a permanent nature; and

(4) the occupier is in its possession and user as a usurper.

(c) Who can Petition?

The writ in the nature of quo warranto differs from other writs, viz, certiorari, prohibition and mandamus, where it is necessary that the petitioner has been prejudicially affected by any wrong act of a public nature or that he is denied any legal right, or a fundamental right of his, has been infringed or that any legal duty is owed to him. In otherwords, the petitioner must be a person aggrieved, in other words, a proceeding for quo warranto is, thus, an exception to the general rule that only the person who has been individually aggrieved can apply for the writ. A writ of quo warranto can be issued at the instance of any member of the public who acts bona fide and is not a mere pawn in the game having been set up by others.[38] But in the case of quo warranto, even a stranger acting bona fide, can petition a writ court.[39] In other words, any member of the public may apply for a writ of quo warranto challenging the right of a person to hold a public office, provided he is not a man of straw, set up by others and provided that it is in public interest that the legal position regarding the office should be declared.[40] It is not necessary that the petitioner should be a person who himself claims the office. For instance, even a rate-payer can challenge the right of a person to sit on a local government board.[41]

(d) Quo warranto: Against whom can be Issued?

It is clear from the wide scope of Art 226 that the High Court has power to issue an order restraining any person acting in an office in which he is not entitled to act, and also if the case so requires, declare the office vacant, where the office has been created by the Constitution itself [42] The remedy of quo warranto is generally regarded as an appropriate and adequate remedy to determine the right or title to a public office and to oust an incumbent who has unlawfully usurped or intruded into such office or is unlawfully holding the same.[43] A writ in the nature of quo warranto will lie against a person who claims or usurps an office[44] or is otherwise unfit to hold it. However, quo warranto cannot be issued unless the respondent is in actual possession of the office and exercises the office in fact.[45] The person exercising the powers of the office is a necessary party. When the approval of another person is necessary to the validity of an appointment, that other person is also a necessary party.[46] For instance, where a person is appointed to an office by a government, such government is generally made a party to the proceedings. ID Act contemplates certain public offices under ss 4 to 7B. The conciliation officers are to be appointed by the government under s 4 while the chairman and the members of the Board are to be appointed under s 5. The court of inquiry is to be appointed under s 6. The labour courts, industrial tribunal and national tribunals are to be constituted and their presiding officers to be appointed under ss 7, 7A and 7B. These provisions specify certain requirements for the appointment of the presiding officers to these adjudicatory offices. Furthermore, s 7C imposes certain disqualification on the appointment of the presiding officers of the adjudicatory authorities. The appointment of any person, to these offices which is not consistent with these provisions; will be void and amenable to a writ in the nature of quo warranto. In HR Deb, Hidayatuallah CJI observed that, in a quo warranto proceeding, the High Court should be slow to pronounce upon the matter unless there was a clear infringement of the law. Hence, where there is clear infringement of the provisions of ss 7 to 7C in the appointment of the presiding officers of the adjudicatory authorities, such an appointment will be vulnerable to a writ of quo warranto.[47] In Joginder Pal, a Full Bench of the Punjab and Haryana High Court held that since the appointment of the presiding officers of the industrial tribunal and the labour court in the State of Haryana was not in compliance with the requirements of cl (aa) inserted in s 7A(3) of the Industrial Disputes Act, by the State of Haryana read with Art 233 of the Constitution, the appointments were bad in law. The court, therefore, quashed the appointments on a writ of quo warranto.[48]

(e) Alternative Remedies

Quo warranto is a discretionary remedy. Normally therefore, quo warranto will be declined if there is another equally convenient and effective remedy available.[49] However, the existence of a statutory remedy will be no bar to quo warranto if the objection of the petitioner is outside the scope of the statutory remedy.[50] Likewise, the existence of another remedy will not bar the exercise of the writ court to issue quo warranto if the circumstances of the case demand interference.[51] In V Sasitharan v State of Tamil Nadu , a writ petition was filed by some advocates and a social worker as a public interest litigation seeking a writ of quo warranto to the chief secretary to show that he was competent to hold the said office. In response to the application, it was pleaded on behalf of the state that in view of the provisions of the Administrative Tribunals Act 1985 which provided suitable efficacious remedies for redressing the grievances of the aggrieved petitioners, a writ of quo warranto would not lie. A single judge of the Madras High Court discountenanced the plea holding that a public interest litigant could not go before the tribunal because he could not be construed or equated with a person aggrieved by any order pertaining to any matter within the jurisdiction of the tribunal. Therefore, a public interest litigant could only approach the High Court questioning the legality of the appointment by filing a writ of quo warranto.[52]

(f) Delay or Laches

Delay and laches on the part of the petitioner may bar the remedy of quo warranto.[53] Whether the High Court should issue a writ in such a case would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. However, the English rule, that quo warranto is not available against an incumbent who held office for a number of years, has no application in India.[54]

(g) Acquiescence

Acquiescence of the petitioner in the act alleged in the petition impugning the right of office will make the application liable to be dismissed. However, in cases under the Industrial Disputes Act, though an award made by a tribunal may not be quashable on certiorari, on the application of the doctrine of de facto, the incumbent can undoubtedly be made to vacate the office by a writ of quo warranto.[55] At this point, it is considered necessary to devote some space to the 'doctrine of de facto', for the ready reference of the readers. Simply stated, the said doctrine means "the acts performed by a person acting under the colour of official title would be valid, even though it is later discovered that the legality of that person's appointment or election to the office was deficient." In Gokaraju Rangaraju, the facts were: An Addl. Sessions Judge, West Godavari, heard a criminal appeal filed by the accused-appellant under s 6C of the Essential Commodities Act, and rejected the same. Thereupon, the accused filed a Criminal Revision Petition before the High Court. While the petition was so pending, the Supreme Court, in another case relating to the legality of the appointment of judges, quashed the appointment of a few judges, which included that of the Addl. Sessions Judge, West Godavari, with the result he had to vacate the post. The contention raised by the appellant was that, in the light of the fact that the appointment of the Addl. Sessions Judge was quashed by the Supreme Court, the order passed by the judge rejecting his appeal should be treated as invalid and non est, for the reason that his appointment itself was subsequently declared illegal by the apex court. Rejecting the contention, Chinnappa Reddy J (for self, Sen and Islam JJ) held:

> The doctrine is now well established that "the acts of the officers de facto performed by them within the scope of their assumed official authority, in the interest of the public or third persons and not for their own benefit, are generally as valid and binding, as if they were the acts of officers de jure" (Pulin Behari v King Emperor).[56] ... the doctrine is founded on good sense, sound policy and practical experience. It is aimed at the prevention of public and private mischief and the protection of public and private interest. It avoids endless confusion and needless chaos. An illegal appointment may be set aside and a proper appointment may be made, but the acts of those who hold office de facto are not so easily undone, and may have lasting repercussions and confusing sequels, if attempted to be undone. Hence the de facto doctrine."[57]

(h) Futile Writ

A quo warranto writ will not be issued where it will be futile[58] nor will the court grant a writ of quo warranto in cases of mere technical irregularities.[59]

(iv) Superintendence of the High Court under Art 227

(a) Nature and Scope of Article 227 of the Constitution corresponds to s 107 of the Government of India Act 1915, which was reproduced in the Government of India Act 1935, as s 224. This section, however, introduced new a sub-s (2), providing that nothing in the section should be construed as giving the High Courts any jurisdiction to question any judgment of an inferior court which was not otherwise subject to appeal or revision. Section 224 of the 1935 Act has been reproduced with certain modifications as Art 227 in the Constitution, inter alia, omitting the sub-s (2). This significant omission has been regarded by all High Courts in India, before whom this question has arisen, as having restored the power of judicial superintendence it had under s 15 of the Indian High Courts Act 1861, and s 107 of the Government of India Act 1915 to the High Courts.[60] The power of superintendence has been extended by Art 227 to superintendence over the inferior tribunals as well. The Constitution has conferred two types of jurisdiction on the High Courts: one, under Art 226 and the other under Art 227, which is supervisory jurisdiction. When the executive discharges a judicial function under the provisions of certain laws, then it acts as a tribunal and in that capacity, it is amenable to the jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 227. The scope of these two jurisdictions is not identical.[61] The power of superintendence conferred by Art 227 has to be exercised most sparingly and only in appropriate cases in order to keep the subordinate courts or inferior tribunals within the bounds of their authority and not for correcting mere errors.[62] It is thus clear that the power of judicial interference under Art 227, with orders of judicial or quasi-judicial nature, are not greater than the powers under Art 226.

Under Art 226, the power of interference may be extended to quashing an impugned order on the ground of errors of law apparent on the face of the record. However, the power of interference is limited to seeing that the tribunal functions within the limits of its authority.[63] In appropriate cases, Art 227 may be employed to correct at least errors of jurisdiction, to wit, assumption of excessive jurisdiction or illegal or irregular exercise of it or the refusal or failure to exercise the same—to put the matter at its lowest—and it would certainly cover cases of non-exercise of jurisdiction in as much as cases of excessive jurisdiction, the one, pointing to the lower limit, and the other to the higher, of the phrase 'keeping within the bounds of authority'.[64] For instance, the High Court will quash the award of an industrial tribunal, where it decides the question not referred to it.[65] Likewise, the High Court will be justified in interfering with the order of an industrial adjudicator where he has transgressed his authority or jurisdiction conferred by s 11A, particularly in cases where the order is arbitrary and tantamounts to abuse of discretionary jurisdiction.[66] Howsoever, wide the power of the court under Art 227 it may be compared to the provisions of s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, it is well established that the High Court cannot assume appellate powers to correct every mistake of law in exercise of this power. An error not being apparent on the face of record, cannot be corrected by the High Court in revision under s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure or under Art 227 of the Constitution.[67] Likewise, merely erroneous decisions cannot be corrected under Art 227. In other words, in exercising jurisdiction, under Art 227, the High Court cannot sit in appeal over the decision, of an industrial tribunal, which is brought before it and it cannot upset the discretionary orders on the ground that if the matter had been raised before it, it might have exercised its discretion differently.[68] However, the High Court will not go into the averments or allegations involving disputed questions of facts[69] nor will it normally interfere with interlocutory orders[70] but it may intervene, if the exercise or discretion is capricious or perverse or ultra vires.[71]

In exercise of supervisory jurisdiction under Art 227, the High Court has undoubtedly the power not only to quash the orders made by inferior courts or tribunals, but also to pass substantive orders in place of the orders it has quashed or set aside.[72] In other words, it can not only annul the decision of the tribunal but it can also issue further directions in the matter.[73] However, this jurisdiction being of a discretionary nature will be exercised only where grave miscarriage of justice or flagrant violation of law calling for intervention takes place.[74] While reviewing the decisions of the labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals, the superintending jurisdiction of the High Court under Art 227 is to be confined to correcting the jurisdictional errors. Where the conclusion of the tribunal has been based on some acceptable evidence, however inadequate it might be, the High Court would generally not interfere with such finding in an application under Art 227. However, where the finding is based on evidence which is ascintilla as to be practically non-existent, or the evidence is such which no reasonable man will accept, interference with such finding is called for.[75] In some High Courts, Art. 226 and 227 are invoked together for impugning the orders of quasi-judicial authorities for seeking relief on the same grounds. The courts also generally do not adopt hyper technical rules in granting relief. However, in some High Courts, Art 227 alone is utilised for the purpose of securing relief by way of writs or directions in the nature of writs, more accurately contemplated by Art 226 of the Constitution.[76] In some cases, this article is invoked for getting orders of inferior tribunals revised just as s 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 is utilised for revision of orders of subordinate courts.[77] However, this practice has been rebuked by the Supreme Court in Ahmedabad Mfg, Dua J observed:

> We should, however, not be understood to express our approval of the use of article 227 for seeking relief by way of writs or directions in the nature of writs for which purpose article 226 is expressly and in precise language designed. [78]

(b) Tribunals

Adjudicatory authorities under the Industrial Disputes Act,viz, labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals are not 'courts' strictu sensu. Hence, they will not fall within the meaning of the expressions 'courts' used in Arts 136 or 227 of the Constitution. However, after the decision of the Supreme Court in Bharat Bank, it is well-settled that these authorities will fall within the ambit of the expression 'tribunals' used in Art 136 of the Constitution. On the parity of reasoning, they will fall within the expression 'tribunal' used in Art 227.[79] The Bombay High Court in Air Corporation, held that an arbitrator under s 10A of the Industrial Disputes Act also would fall within the meaning of the expression 'tribunal' used in Art 227.[80] This view, however, was pronounced by the High Court before the decision of the Supreme Court in Engineering Mazdoor Sabha, holding that an arbitrator under s 10A is not a tribunal within the meaning of Art 136 though in a proper case, a writ may lie against his award under Art 226 because his functions are of a quasi-judicial nature.[81] Thus, Air Corporation was expressly overruled by the Supreme Court.

(c) Procedure and Practice

General: It has been seen that the jurisdiction of a High Court under Art 227 is of supervisory nature limited to the extent of keeping the courts and tribunals within their jurisdiction. In other words, in this jurisdiction, a High Court, will go into the question of jurisdictional defects. To that extent, the jurisdiction of the court under Art 227 is more or less the same as that of the court under this Art 226. The general procedure and practice of the court under this Article will also be the same as under Art 226.

New Plea: A point not taken before the original authority cannot be allowed to be raised before the High Court in application under Art 227 of the Constitution.[82]

Laches: There is no rule of limitation fixing a period of limitation for preferring an application/petition under Art 227. Such a rule could not be fixed because this right, which is an important right, is given to a party under Art 227. But generally the accepted rule is that a party must come to the court as expeditiously as possible. However, the filing of a petition with utmost expedition is not absolute rule. Exceptional circumstances might arise where notwithstanding the delay, it would be open to the court to entertain a petition and deal with the matter on merits.[83] In Harnam Singh, the facts were that a reference of a dispute relating to termination of service without complying with s 25F was challenged by the employer by way of a writ petition 12 years after the reference. The High Court accepted the contention of the management that the workmen were not their employees and that s 25F was not applicable, and quashed the said reference. The Supreme Court, while setting aside the order of the High Court and directing the labour court to adjudicate the reference, held that the High Court failed to take notice of the inordinate, unexplained delay on the part of the employer in filing the writ petition and that it was surprising that the employer took 12 years to approach the Court.[84]

Adjournment: In the under-noted case,[85] the prayer for adjournment of hearing of an appeal being rejected, the labour appellate tribunal dismissed the appeal before it, without going into its merits. The Bombay High Court, set aside the order of the labour appellate tribunal as being incompetent and unjustified in the exercise of its power under Art 227.

CONSTITUTIONAL APPEALS

(i) Appeals under Article 133 of the Constitution

From any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in a writ petition against orders or awards of the industrial authorities under the Act, an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court if the High Court grants a certificate of fitness under Art 133 of the Constitution. For the purposes of granting a certificate, the High Court is required to consider as to whether the case raises a substantial question of law of the kind mentioned in this constitutional provision. Even if a single such question of law is found to arise in the case, a certificate must be granted. A certificate of fitness under Art 133 is a pre-condition to the maintainability of an appeal to the Supreme Court. The stage at which the High Court considers the grant of certificate under Art 133(1) and the stage at which the Supreme Court hears the appeal, are two distinct stages, and different jurisdictions are exercised with respect to each stage. Considerations pertaining to the grant of a certificate are not identical with the considerations which govern the hearing of the appeal. Accordingly, even if some of the points raised by the appellant in the High Court in support of the petition for a certificate are found insufficient for grant of leave, they can be considered as grounds during the hearing of the appeal. Thus, the certificate is an open one enabling the appellant to urge all the points arising in the appeal in the Supreme Court.[86] However, a successful party may question the maintainability of the appeal on the ground that the certificate was issued by the High Court, in contravention of the provisions of Art 133 of the Constitution.[87]

In an appeal, under this Article, the Supreme Court undoubtedly has the power to review the concurrent findings of the fact arrived at by the lower court in appropriate cases. The Supreme Court will not ordinarily interfere with concurrent findings of fact except in exceptional cases. For instance, where the finding is such as it shocks the conscience of the court or by disregard to the forms of legal process or some violation of some principles of natural justice or otherwise substantial and grave injustice has been done, the Supreme Court will be justified to interfere with the findings. It is not possible nor advisable to define the circumstances in which the court will interfere with such concurrent findings of facts and it is in the discretion of the Supreme Court to decide having regard to the facts of a particular case.[88] However, the orders and awards of industrial authorities are impugned before the High Courts by writ petitions under Arts 226 and 227 of the Constitution. It is, therefore, against the orders and judgments of the High Courts in such writ petitions that an aggrieved party can approach the Supreme Court in appeal, on a certificate under Art 133 of the Constitution. In such an appeal, the scope of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is exactly the same as that of the writ court. It will interfere only if the writ court has failed to exercise its jurisdiction. In granting a certificate under Art 133, the High Court must state as to under what particular clause of this Article the leave is granted, otherwise the certificate would be invalid and the appeal would not be maintainable.[89] An objection to the validity of the certificate should be taken at the earliest possible moment and the respondent's failure to do so would not be allowed to prejudice the appellant, making it impossible for him to resort to the proper remedy of special leave under Art 136, as he could have done if the objection had been taken at an early stage. Thus, the appellant will not be made to suffer for the failure of the respondent and the court will not simply dismiss an appeal on the ground that the leave obtained was not a proper one and leave the matter to rest there. In such cases, if the circumstances of a case warrant, the court would go to the length of granting special leave to the appellant on oral application.[90]

(ii) Appeals under Article 136 of the Constitution

Article 136 of the Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to entertain an appeal by special leave from any judgment, decree, determination, sentence or order in any cause or matter passed or made by any court or tribunal in the territory of India. The non obstante clause in the beginning of this Article indicates that very wide discretion has been conferred on the Supreme Court in the matter of entertaining appeals under this Article and this discretion is not hedged by other Articles in chapter 4 of P art 5 of the Constitution. In Rajkrushna Bose, referring to the language of cl (1), the Supreme Court observed that it was sufficient to say that the power conferred on us by Art 136 could not be taken away or whittled down by the legislature. So long as these words remain, discretion of Supreme Court and High Courts remains unfettered.[91] This view was affirmed in Sangram Singh, where it was held that the jurisdiction which Art 136 confers, entitles the Supreme Court to examine the decisions of all tribunals to see whether they have acted illegally. The following passage from the judgment of Bose J, who spoke for the court is fascinatingly illuminating:

> That jurisdiction cannot be taken away by a legislative device that purports to confer power on a tribunal to act illegally by enacting a statute that its illegal acts shall become legal the moment the tribunal chooses to say they are legal. The legality of an act or conclusions. is something that exists outside and apart from the decision of an inferior tribunal. It is a part of the law of the land which cannot be finally determined or altered by any tribunal of limited jurisdiction. [92]

The extraordinary power, conferred by Art 136 on the Supreme Court cannot therefore, be taken away by any legislation short of a constitutional amendment.[93] The power of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal from the decision of any court or tribunal in the territory of India, save military tribunals, is not subject to any constitutional limitation, and is left entirely to the discretion of the Supreme Court. An appeal under Art 136 is not a matter of right but it is in the discretion of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal or not.[1] In Bengal Chemicals, dealing with an industrial case specifically, Subba Rao J held:

> Though article 136 is couched in widest terms, it is necessary for this court to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction only in cases where awards are made in violation of the principles of natural justice, causing substantial and grave injustice to parties or raises an important principle of industrial law requiring elucidation and final decision by this court or discloses such other exceptional and special circumstances which merit the consideration of this court.[2]

In Shambhu Nath Mukherji, the Supreme Court declined to interfere with the decision of the High Court because the High Court in its writ jurisdiction had refused to interfere with the award of the tribunal in view of the fact that there was no manifest error of law on the face of the record nor was there any error of jurisdiction.[3] Likewise, in Fuel Injection, the court did not find any merit in the plea to interfere with the judgment of the High Court. Speaking for the court, Krishna Iyer J pointed out that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in entertaining an appeal by special leave under Art 136 must ordinarily be confined to what the High Court could and would have done under Art 226 and this limitation must be borne in mind while dealing with the judgment under appeal.[4] Article 136(1) refers to a 'tribunal' in contradistinction to a court.[5]The Supreme Court has jurisdiction to grant special leave from the determination of a tribunal which is a body that has been invested with a part of the judicial power of the state. The tribunals which fall within the purview of Art 136 occupy a special position of their own under the scheme of the Constitution as special matters and questions are entrusted to them for their decisions. The labour courts, industrial tribunals and national tribunals constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act have been held to fall within the ambit of the expression 'tribunal' used in Art 136(1) of the Constitution as they have many trappings of a court and exercise quasi-judicial functions, though they are not full-fledged courts in the strict sense of exercising judicial powers.[6]However, a body which derives its authority to decide matters by the consent of parties and is not invested with the judicial power of the state cannot be a 'tribunal' with the meaning of Art 136. An arbitrator acting under s 10A of the Act has, therefore, been held to be de hors the purview of, tribunal' as postulated by Art 136(1) of the Constitution.[7] In Jaswant Sugar Mills, the facts, in brief were: the management filed an application before the conciliation officer for permission to dismiss 52 workers for having resorted to an illegal strike. The conciliation officer granted permission to dismiss only 11 out of the 52 workmen in exercise of the powers conferred on him under cl 29 of the Order promulgated by the Governor under the UP Industrial Disputes Act1947. The said clause corresponds to s 33 of the Central Act. Two issues fell for the consideration of a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court, i.e. (1) Whether an appeal may be entertained in exercise of powers under Art 136 of the Constitution against a direction of the Conciliation Officer issued in disposing of an application under cl. 29 of the Order promulgated by the Governor of Uttar Pradesh under the U P Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 and (2) Whether against the direction issued by the Conciliation Officer exercising authority under cl. 29 of the Order an appeal lay to the Labour Appellate Tribunal under the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950. Counsel for the workmen contended that the appeal against the direction given by the Conciliation Officer was not maintainable because that the officer exercising authority under cl. 29 of the said Order was neither a 'Court' nor a 'Tribunal' within the meaning of Art 136 of the Constitution and, hence, no appeal could lie to the Supreme Court against the impugned direction. Upholding the contention of the workmen, Shah J observed:

> .. . The Conciliation Officer is again not capable of delivering a determinative judgment or award affecting the rights and obligations of parties. He is not invested with powers similar to those of the Civil Court under the Code of Civil Procedure for enforcing attendance of any person and examining him on oath, compelling production of documents, issuing commissions for the examination of witnesses and other matters. He is concerned in granting leave to determine whether there is a prima facie case for dismissal or discharge of an employee or for altering terms of employment, and whether the employer is actuated by unfair motives; lie has not to decide whether the proposed step of discharge or dismissal of the employee was within the rights of the employer. His order merely removes a statutory ban in certain eventualities, laid upon the common law right of an employer to dismiss, discharge or alter the terms of employment according to contract between the parties. The Conciliation Officer has undoubtedly to act judicially in dealing with an application under cl. 29, but he is not invested with the judicial power of the State: he cannot therefore be regarded as a 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art 136 the Constitution.. .. it is thus manifest that the conciliation officer does not hold the status of an industrial tribunal in exercising powers under s 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act or clause 29 of the Uttar Pradesh Order. It must therefore be held that an appeal under Art 136 of the Constitution, to this court is not competent against the direction given by the conciliation officer exercising power under clause 29 of the order issued by the Governor of Uttar Pradesh under the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act 1947."[8]

It is not necessary that an authority must be given the nomenclature 'tribunal'. It is sufficient if it satisfies the requirements of law for an authority to fall within the ambit of a 'tribunal' as used in Art 136(1) of the Constitution. For instance, the state government exercising authority under rr 6(5) & 6(6) of the Punjab Welfare Officers (RCS) Rules framed under s 49(2) of the Factories Act 1948, was held to be a 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art 136(1).[9] In Bharat Bank, the Supreme Court laid down the following principles for interference with the orders and awards of tribunals:

(i) excess of jurisdiction;

(ii) approach to the question referred to in a manner which is likely to result in injustice; or

(iii) adoption of a procedure which runs counter to the well established rules of natural justice, ie:

  (a) denial of hearing to a party;

  (b) refusal to record evidence of a party; and

  (c) acting in any other manner in any arbitrary or despotic fashion.[10]

However, in Calcutta Tramways, the court classified rather too widely the necessary pre-requisites for interference with the orders and awards of the industrial tribunal whose conclusions on questions of fact are generally final. Speaking for the court Govinda Menon J enunciated the following circumstances for the interference of the court:

(i) where the tribunal acts in excess of jurisdiction conferred upon it under the statute or regulation creating it or where it ostensibly fails to exercise a patent jurisdiction;

(ii) where there is an apparent error on the face of the decision; and

(iii) where the tribunal has erroneously applied the well-accepted principles of jurisprudence.[11]

In Bengal Chemicals, Subba Rao J further broadened the scope of appeal against the awards of industrial tribunals by laying down the following requirements for the exercise of the discretionary jurisdiction of the court, namely:

(i) that there is violation of the principles of natural justice, causing substantial and grave injustice to parties;

(ii) that the appeal raises an important principle of industrial law requiring elucidation and final decision by the Supreme Court; or

(iii) that the appeal discloses such other exceptional or special circumstances which merit consideration of the Supreme Court.[12]

In Meenakshi Mills, the Supreme Court observed that though the appropriate government or the specified authority is required to act judicially while granting or refusing permission for retrenchment of workmen under sub-s (3) of s 25N of the Industrial Disputes Act, it is not invested with the judicial power of the state and it cannot be regarded as tribunal within the meaning of Art 136 of the Constitution and no appeal would, therefore, lie to the Supreme Court against the order passed under that provision.[13] In Sarathy, Saghir Ahmed J held that the Deputy Commissioner of Labour (Appeals), Madras, which was notified as the authority under the Tamil Nadu Shops and Establishments Act 1947, had the jurisdiction to adjudicate upon an order terminating the services of an employee. The Deputy Commissioner could exercise jurisdiction to decide whether the order of dismissal passed by the employer was valid or it was passed in violation of any statutory rule or principles of natural justice. Under s 41(3), the order passed by him is binding on the employer as also on the employee. Ahmed J further held that the Deputy Commissioner of Labour (Appeals) might not be a 'Civil Court' within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure, but was definitely a court.[14] The nature of jurisdiction being essentially of a discretionary character and not being fettered by any rules or principles, the court has dealt with each case on its own merits depending upon its peculiar facts and circumstances. As such, no hard and fast rules are discernible from the decided cases.

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[15][S. 17A. Commencement of the Award.—

(1) An award (including an arbitrational award) shall become enforceable on the expiry of thirty days from the date of its publication under section 17 :

Provided that—

(a) if the appropriate Government is of opinion, in any case where the award has been given by a Labour Court or Tribunal in relation to an industrial dispute to which it is a party; or

(b) if the Central Government is of opinion, in any case where the award has been given by a National Tribunal, that it will be inexpedient on public grounds affecting national economy or social justice to give effect to the whole or any part of the award, the appropriate Government, or as the case may be, the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, declare that the award shall not become enforceable on the expiry of the said period of thirty days.

(2) Where any declaration has been made in relation to an award under the proviso to sub-section (1), the appropriate Government or the Central Government may, within ninety days from the date of publication of the award under section 17, make an order rejecting or modifying the award, and shall, on the first available opportunity, lay the award together with a copy of the order before the Legislature of the State, if the order has been made by a State Government, or before Parliament, if the order has been made by the Central Government.

(3) Where any award as rejected or modified by an order made under sub-section (2) is laid before the Legislature of a State or before Parliament, such award shall become enforceable on the expiry of fifteen days from the date on which it is so laid; and where no order under sub-section (2) is made in pursuance of a declaration under the proviso to sub-section (1), the award shall become enforceable on the expiry of the period of ninety days referred to in sub-section (2).

(4) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (1) and sub-section (3) regarding the enforceability of an award, the award shall come into operation with effect from such date as may be specified therein, but where no date is so specified, it shall come into operation on the date when the award becomes enforceable under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3), as the case may be].

LEGISLATION

Section 17A was inserted in the Act by s 34 read with the Schedule to the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act 1950. That section again was repealed and in its place the present s 17A was substituted by s 12 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment & Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956.

SECTION 17A - STRUCK DOWN AS ULTRA VIRES THE CONSTITUTION

This entire section together with sub-sections (1) to (4) was struck down by a single judge of Andhra Pradesh High Court as being ultra vires the Constitution in Telugunadu WES Federation v Union of India , in which the learned judge observed:

> The Constitution has assigned the Courts the function of determining as to whether the laws made by the legislature are in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution. In adjudicating the Constitutional validity of the statutes, the Courts discharge an obligation which has been imposed on them by the Constitution. The Courts would be shirking their responsibility if they hesitate to declare the provisions of a statute to be unconstitutional, even though those provisions are found to be violative of constitutional scheme or the provisions. In view of what is stated supra and as I have come to the clear and unmistaken conclusion that the impugned provision encroaches upon the judicial power of the State, as it violates the basic concept of rule of law and democratic pattern envisaged by the Indian Constitution, unhesitatingly, I strike down the impugned provision as being ultra vires the Constitution and consequently the provision contained under Sec. 17(2) of the Act to the extent of the words "subject to the provisions of Section 17-A " and whole of Section 17-A with sub-sections 1 to 4 thereof are non-est under law. As an inevitable corollary, G.O.Ms.No.2 Labour Department, dated 20.1.1994 is quashed as being unsustainable in view of what is held above. Now, the award which has been published in G.O.Rt.No.2761, Women's Development, Chief Welfare and Labour Department, dated 23.12.1993 shall be operative and the same be implemented by respondents 3 to 5 within a period of one month from the date of receipt of a copy of this order.[16]

The above decision of the single judge of AP High Court, which can be described as a revolutionary rendition, was reiterated by a Division Bench of the AP High Court. and further the said judgment was neither reversed nor set aside by the apex court. Moreover, so far the position remains the same despite the fact that nearly 20 years have rolled on. Thus, the said decision holds good. Referring to the said decision of AP High Court, another Division Bench of the Madras High Court expressed a similar view as expressed by the single judge of the said High Court in Textile Technical Tradesmen Assn, in which Vasant Kumar J (for self and Ravichandra Babu J) observed:

> In this case, a competent Special Industrial Tribunal, constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, rendered a decision/award and if the parties to the award are aggrieved about the findings rendered or directions issued, they can only approach the appellate Court to challenge the award and exercising power under Section 17-A(1) of the ID Act, 1947, which was already declared as unconstitutional by the Andhra Pradesh High Court in the year 1997 itself.. .. The said position, viz., declaration of unconstitutionality of Section 17-A with sub-sections (1) to (4) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 holds good even today as the Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court reiterated the said position in W.A.No.403 of 2004 dt. 26.11.2004 and the said judgment has not been reversed or set aside by the Hon'ble Supreme Court. Hence the learned single Judge was perfectly justified in allowing the writ petition and no ground is made to interfere in the order of the learned single Judge.[17]

It is submitted that the decision of the AP High Court striking down s 17A as being violative of the basic structure of the Constitution is right. It is rather surprising that this section remained alive in the Act for four decades. Once it is conceded that an award passed by the labour court or an industrial tribunal is appealable under Art 136,[18] notwithstanding the fact that the State's Judicial Power has not been delegated to these quasi-judicial tribunals in full flow, the conclusion that the awards of labour courts, etc., stand on the same footing as the orders and decrees passed by civil courts is inescapable. That being so, to stipulate that the award of labour court and tribunal is subject to the scrutiny of the appropriate government and, not only scrutiny, but are also subject to modification and rejection by the appropriate government, militates against the very concept of adjudication and judicial process. The AP High Court rightly struck down the entire section. The learned single judge, the Division Bench of AP High Court and the Division Bench of Madras High Court deserve full compliments for striking down a retrogressive provision of the Industrial Relations Law. In the final analysis, and for the above reasons, s 17A is as good as non-existent.

SUB-SECTION (1): WHEN THE AWARD BECOMES ENFORCEABLE

Sub-section (1) of s 17A makes the award of any of the adjudicatory authorities, ie, the labour court, the industrial tribunal or the national tribunal, including the award of an arbitrator under s 10A, enforceable on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication under s 17. A single judge of the Madras High Court observed that the expression 'an award shall become enforceable on the expiry of 30 days', means that the reinstatement, on the dismissal being found to be wrongful, must be given effect to by the time the award becomes enforceable, ie, within 30 days of the publication of the award.[19]A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that no award, therefore, is enforceable before the expiry of 30 days and therefore, no obligation is to be discharged before the expiry of the said period. There is no obligation at all on the employer to implement the award before the expiry of 30 days from its publication and if he does not implement the award, it cannot be said that he has committed an offence under s 29 of the Industrial Disputes Act.[20] This is the correct view of law.

PROVISO: DECLARATION

Sub-section (1) of s 17A lays down the general rule that an award of an adjudicator or an arbitrator, on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication under s 17, shall become enforceable. The proviso to it lays down the conditions under which the appropriate government or the Central Government may declare that the award shall not become enforceable on the expiry of the period of 30 days from the date of its publication. Before making the declaration under the proviso, the appropriate government or the Central Government, as the case may be, must form its opinion that it will be inexpedient to give effect to the whole or part of the award on public grounds affecting national economy or social justice. It cannot be gainsaid that the opinion of the government should be formed on the basis of some material before it that the requirement of national economy or social justice makes it inexpedient to give effect to a part or the whole of the award. Any opinion formed by the government without any material before it or taking into account irrelevant or extraneous considerations in deciding that it will be inexpedient to give effect to the award will be vulnerable. But if the government has formed its opinion after applying its mind to the material before it and without taking any irrelevant or extraneous considerations into account, the declaration made by the government being an administrative action will not be reviewable. The declaration is to be made by a notification in the Official Gazette.

SUB-SECTION (2): POWER TO MODIFY OR REJECT THE AWARD

This provision empowers the appropriate government or the Central Government, as the case may be, by an order to reject or modify an award. The requirements for the exercise of this power are:

(i) a declaration under proviso to sub-s (1) should have been made;

(ii) the order rejecting or modifying the award should be made within 90 days from the date of publication of the award under s 17 ; and

(iii) on the first available opportunity, a copy of the order rejecting or modifying the award along with the award should be laid before the legislature of the state, if the order has been made by the state government and before Parliament, if the order has been made by the Central Government.[21]

All these requirements are cumulative. If anyone of them has not been complied with, the order modifying or rejecting the award will be invalid. The government in exercise of its power under sub-s (2) might reject the award as a whole or any part thereof or modify the award. In other words, the rejection of the award may be total or partial. The word 'modified' will cover not only a partial rejection of the award but would also include any alteration or amendment of the award as well.

SUB-SECTION (3): WHEN AN AWARD AFTER DECLARATION, MODIFICATION OR REJECTION BECOMES ENFORCEABLE

This sub-section is in two parts. The first part deals with the point of time when a rejected or modified award becomes enforceable and the second part deals with the point of time when an award, which has not been rejected or modified under sub-s (2) but has only been deferred by a declaration under the proviso to sub-s (1) becomes operative. In the latter case, the operation of the award as a result of the declaration is merely deferred and the award, as it is made by the adjudicatory authority, comes into force after the expiry of the period of 90 days. In the former case, the modified award shall become enforceable on the expiry of 15 days from the date on which it is laid before the legislature of a state or the Parliament, as the case may be, under sub-s (2). But in case the government rejects the award in its entirety, the effect of such rejection will be that the award will be a nullity. It is, therefore difficult to understand how a nullity can become enforceable. The words 'any award as rejected...shall become enforceable', if refers to an award rejected in entirety appear to be incongruous-perhaps the result of carelessness in drafting.

SUB-SECTION (4): 'ENFORCEABILITY' AND 'OPERATION' OF AN AWARD

This sub-section lays down that subject to the provisions of sub-s (1), which fixes the time for enforcement, the award of the tribunal shall come into operation with effect from such date as may be specified therein, but where no date is specified, it shall come into operation from the date when the award becomes enforceable under sub-s (1). Ordinarily an award would come into operation from the time when it becomes enforceable i.e., on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication or on the expiry of the periods prescribed in sub-ss (3) and (4). But an industrial tribunal has the discretion to order that its award shall be operative from another date.[22] Thus, the Act recognises the distinction between 'operation' and 'enforcement' of an award. Though normally, the date of enforceability and the date of operation may be identical, yet there may be cases where the two dates may be different. The date from which the award of a tribunal shall be operative is the date specifically mentioned in the award itself. But the date of enforceability of the award is the date which follows on the expiry of 30 days from the date of its publication under s 17 of the Act.[23]

Retrospective Operation of Award

An adjudicator can specify the date from which an award given by it shall come into operation and that date may be one prior to the date of reference itself, and in such a case the award takes effect retrospectively. Where a demand for arrears of increment was for the first time made collectively in August 1957, the tribunal could not direct the benefit of such arrears for the period prior to August 1957 as it would amount to entertainment of stale claims.[24] There is no conflict between the provisions of ss 17A and 19 of the Act.[25] No general rule can be laid down as to the date from which an award should be made effective.[26] The annual financial burden which an award is likely to cast upon a concern is one of such relevant considerations. Likewise, in giving retrospective effect or in determining the extent of retrospective operation of an award fixing wage-structure, the adjudicator should take into consideration the fact that on other occasions it increased the wages of workmen and it should be immaterial whether the increase was referable to the actual matter in dispute before it or not. In any event, no retrospective operation can be given to an award for any period prior to the date on which any demands in question were made.[27] There is no vested right in any party as to from what particular date an award should be given effect to.[28] Within the two extreme points, viz, the date of demand and the date of award,[29] it is open to the tribunal to fix, in its discretion, a date from which an award passed by it shall come into operation, even without a specific reference being made on the question of retrospective operation of the award.[30]

The normal rule, however, is that for justifying the retrospective effect of an award, some special case should be made out. For instance, it should be shown that there was some deficiency or deprivation caused to employees. Thus, where employees are getting more salary as compared with the employees of other concerns, there is no just reason for any grievance on that score and the award should not be given retrospective effect.[31] In some cases, the Supreme Court itself in exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Art 136 of the Constitution made awards effective from the date when the demand was first made. In other cases, it declined to interfere with the date fixed by the tribunal. It does not, however, appear that any general criterion, in this connection, has been laid down.[32] Whether or not an award should be given retrospective effect, is a question to be determined by the tribunal in its discretion, and the discretion exercised on judicial principles by the tribunal about the commencement of an award cannot be reviewed by courts.[33] If the tribunal has exercised its discretion and no substantial ground is made out to show that it was unreasonably exercised, the mere fact that it has made its award operative retrospectively from the date of the demand is hardly a ground for interference with the award. But the tribunal has to exercise its discretion in a judicial manner. The courts in judicial review of the award will interfere with the discretion of the tribunal if it is exercised unreasonably or arbitrarily in fixing the date of operation of the award.[34]

Illustrations

Where the tribunal in the award directed that the minimum wages fixed under it should be given retrospective effect from the date of the demand and not from the date of the reference, as by that time the cost of living index had already gone up considerably and not to have done so would have been to deprive the workmen of the minimum wages commensurate with the rise; it was held that there was no reasonable ground made out to show that the tribunal had unreasonably exercised its jurisdiction and the mere fact that the award was retrospectively enforced from the date of the demand would hardly be a ground for interference with the award.[35] Where the tribunal in fairness to both the parties felt that an intermediate date between the date of demand and the date of reference was the proper date from which the award should come into operation and the ground for selecting this date according to the tribunal was that the prices of commodities began to rise steeply in the region from that date and this ground was not controverted by any material to the contrary; it was held that there could barely be any ground for interference by the Supreme Court.[36] Where the tribunal after taking note of the rise in the cost of living index and also adverting to the fact that though the cost of living had increased considerably, the company did not choose to adjust the dearness allowance suitably and after having regard to all the circumstances, awarded that the workmen should get dearness allowance commensurate with the cost of living index from the date of reference, the court declined to interfere with the award.[37] Where the tribunal directed that the revised wage structure should take effect retrospectively and as a result of which the company had to pay arrears of wages for a long period of five to six years; it was held that the award was justified in view of the fact that since that date there had been a very considerable rise in the price index and the labour had not so far raised a fresh dispute for a further revision of wages.[38] Where the tribunal chose an intermediate date with a view to be fair to both the sides for giving effect to its award revising the wage structure, it was held that there was nothing illegal or unfair in the choice of the date.[39] Where the tribunal gave effect to the award from the date of reference rejecting the claims of both the sides, viz, the claims of the workmen to give effect from the date of the demand and the claim of the employer from the date of the award, it was held that the award could not be interfered with.[40]

Where on consideration of the circumstance that there will be a considerable increase in the burden of expenditure on the company as a result of the revision of wage scales and the rates of dearness allowance, the tribunal decided that the award should be effective with effect from the usual date when it comes into force, ie, one month after the date of its publication, it was held that the discretion exercised by the tribunal could not be interfered with as it could not be said to be arbitrary or unreasonable.[41] Where the tribunal chose an intermediate date between the order or reference and the award for enforcing the scheme of gratuity framed by it, the direction in the award was upheld.[42] Where bearing in mind the fact that there was a good deal of go-slow practised by the workmen during the period between the demand and the award, the direction of the tribunal to give effect to the increase in wages from a date between the date of the reference and the date of the award; it was held that there was no reason for interference as in the circumstances of the case, the award could hardly be called retrospective.[43] But, where the labour appellate tribunal modified the original award of the industrial tribunal and gave direction that the benefit of increments awarded to the employees should take effect from a date prior even to the demands, the direction was set aside as it was a clear error of law.[44]

APPEAL UNDER ARTICLE 136 OF THE CONSTITUTION

Whatever finality may be claimed under the provisions of the Act in respect of an award by virtue of ss 17 and 17A of the Act, it must necessarily be subject to the result of determination of an appeal by special leave.[45] However, it is only by virtue of specific orders made by the Supreme Court under Art 136 of the Constitution, staying operation of an award, or some such order that operation or enforcement of an award can be stayed and the employer can be made immune from the operation of the provisions of s 29 which impose penalties for infringement of terms of an award.[46]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

[47][S. 17B. Payment of full wages to workman pending proceedings in higher courts.—

Where in any case, a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal by its award directs reinstatement of any workman and the employers prefers any proceedings against such award in a High Court or the Supreme Court, the employer shall be liable to pay such workman, during the period of pendency of such proceedings in the High Court or the Supreme Court, full wages last drawn by him, inclusive of any maintenance allowance admissible to him under any rule if the workman had not been employed in any establishment during such period and an affidavit by such workman had been filed to that effect in such Court.

Provided that where it is proved to the satisfaction of the High Court or the Supreme Court that such workman had been employed and had been receiving adequate remuneration during any such period or part thereof, the Court shall order that no wages shall be payable under this section for such period or part, as the case may be.]

OBJECT AND REQUIREMENTS

Before the enactment of this section, the awards of tribunals directing re-instatement were often contested by the employers in the High Courts or the Supreme Court. Hence, it was felt that the delay in implementation of such awards caused hardship to the workman. It was, therefore, felt necessary to provide payment of 'wages last drawn by the workman from the date of the award till the date it is finally decided in the Supreme Court or the High Court'. This provision, therefore, codifies the right of the workmen to get their wages, which they could not get in time, on account of long drawn litigation. This provision gives a mandate to the courts to order wages if its conditions are satisfied.

In Bharat Singh, the Supreme Court noted that even before this section was enacted, the courts were, in their discretion, awarding wages to workmen when they felt such a discretion was necessary but that was only a discretionary remedy depending upon court to court.[48] This provision is a piece of social-welfare legislation and aims at ameliorating the hardship caused to the workman who were deprived of the benefits of re-instatement awards during the protracted litigation in which awards were injuncted by the High Courts or the Supreme Court. The object of introducing this provision is, therefore, to enable the workman to receive the 'full wages last drawn' by him to sustain himself to resist the litigation carried to the High Courts or the Supreme Court by the management.[49] More often than not, the employers, as a matter of routine, would prefer proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court challenging such awards and obtain stay of their operation. Instances are legion where workmen have been dragged by the employers into an endless mire of litigation with preliminary objections and other technical pleas to tire them out. Though occasionally, in their discretion, the courts subjected the stay orders to certain conditions, such as payment of certain amounts to the workmen during the pendency of the proceedings before them. There was no standard formula quantifying the payment during the pendency of the proceedings. Nor could such payments be claimed by the workmen as a matter of right because the conditions of payment were imposed on the facts and in the circumstances of each case. Therefore, by and large, during the pendency of such proceedings, workmen were deprived of their legitimate right to wages upon reinstatement. Now this section, at once, codifies the right of a workman to get the wages and quantifies the amount of such wages payable to him during the pendency of the proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court where the award of his reinstatement is challenged by the employer. In the language of Kamat J:

> Normally, no party has or gets any vested right in the life of the litigation in this or any other court ... However, s 17B of the Industrial Disputes Act is a statutory exception and creates liability in favour of the workman and against the employer and the inevitable elongated life of the litigation in such a case becomes necessary to be watched and controlled by the parties and the system by a process of expedition or characterisation of such petitions as a separate priority-category having preceding position as compared to other pending proceedings.[50]

This right is a separate and independent right available to a workman during the pendency of the proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court, where the proceedings have been preferred by the employer, against the award of reinstatement in his favour. The pre-requirements for invoking this section are:

(i) the award of the tribunal should have directed reinstatement of the workmen on setting aside the order of his dismissal or unfair termination of service;

(ii) the employer should have preferred proceedings against such award before a High Court or the Supreme Court;

(iii) the workmen should not have been gainfully employed in any establishment during the pendency of the proceedings; and

(iv) as a proof of that, the workman should have filed an affidavit before the court before which the proceedings have been preferred.

Once these requirements are satisfied, the workman becomes entitled to the wages as contemplated by this provision and no order of the court, before which the proceedings are pending, is necessary for entitling him to such wages, as the statute itself creates the right. If, after the workman has filed the affidavit of non-employment, the employer fails to pay wages to the workman, as required by this section, the workmen may file an application before such court for direction to the employer to make such payment. Non-compliance with the requirement to pay such wages to the workman should block further hearing of the proceedings before the court. Any interim payment made to the workman under the order of the industrial tribunal, in the course of adjudication proceedings, will not bar the claim of the workman to the wages as contemplated by this section, though the payment so made by the employer may become deductible out of the payments to be made to him under the provisions of this section, depending upon the nature of the orders of such payment and the facts and circumstances of each case.[51] In Bharat Petroleum, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that once it is shown that all the three ingredients stipulated in s 17B, namely, (i) the labour court directed reinstatement of the workman; (ii) the employer preferred proceedings against the award in the High Court or the Supreme Court; and (iii) the workman had not been employed in any establishment during such period, the employer would be liable to pay the last drawn wages to the workman. The liability under s 17B continues during the whole period of the pendency of proceedings in higher courts, even if the workman has in the meantime crossed his normal age of superannuation and would have retired, had he not been dismissed or discharged.[52]Section 17B is mandatory in character and it gives a mandate to the court to award full wages if the conditions enumerated in s 17B are fully satisfied. Delay in making the application will not affect the powers of the court.[53] In CM Saraiah, the order of a single judge staying the reinstatement order of the labour court with a direction to the employer to comply with the provisions of s 17B was reversed by the Division Bench on the ground that the very dispute itself was raised after inordinate delay. The Supreme Court, while setting aside the order of the Division Bench, held that the court had no jurisdiction to direct non-compliance with s 17B when the condition precedent for passing an order in terms of s 17B was satisfied.[54]

In Commandant, Defence Security, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the wages paid under s 17B are in the nature of subsistence allowance and, hence, not refundable even if ultimately the award is set aside by the court.[55] While dealing with an application under s 17B for payment of last wages drawn, the High Court has no discretion to impose conditions or to add rider to the order, though it may be open to the High Court to deny the benefit completely, if the conditions set out in the said section are not satisfied.[56] Payment under s 17B continues only so long as the workman is in service. Once he reaches the age of superannuation, he loses the right to get the last drawn wages under the section. In such a case, his right is confined only to backwages as per the award.[57] An employee cannot continue to get the benefit of full wages by taking recourse to s 17B after attaining the age of superannuation.[58] In U Cheralu, the Supreme Court directed the college to make ad hoc payment of Rs 500/- per month to the respondent who was to be reinstated as per the labour court's order, in lieu of such reinstatement till the disposal of the writ petition filed by the petitioner in the High Court.[59] In Nagar Panchayat, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the proceedings commence when the petition is filed before the High Court or the Supreme Court, as the case may be, and that the Court can pass an order in favour of the workman from the date of pendency of such proceedings but not from the date of the award.[60] In Ghanshyam, the Supreme Court observed:

> .. . in the event of an employer not reinstating the workman and not seeking any interim relief in respect of the award directing reinstatement of the workman or in a case where the court is not inclined to stay such award in toto, the workman has two options, either to initiate proceedings to receiving the full wages last drawn by him without prejudice to the result of the proceeding referred by the employer against the award till he is reinstated or proceedings are terminated in his favour, whichever is earlier.. .. s 17B does not preclude the High Courts and the Supreme Court from granting better benefits, more just and equitable, on the facts of the case, and that the management would be eligible to seek refund of payment of such additional sums in the event the case is decided in its favour, and hence the payment of any such amount over and above the amounts payable under s 17B was ordered to be paid on such terms and conditions as would enable the employer to recover the same.[61]

Last drawn wages are payable from the date of initiation of writ proceeding before the High Court and not from the date of award.[62] The benefit of s 17B must continue until the employer by positive assertions files an affidavit that the employee has been employed somewhere else. However, the employee is not required to file such an affidavit at every point of time.[63] Where reinstatement has been ordered, backwages will be payable from the date of the award till the date of the proceedings. Orders under s 17B can be passed even when reinstatement has taken place. The employer is directed to pay the wages last drawn by the workman, which should not be less than the minimum wages applicable from time to time.[64] Where a single judge of the High Court, on application by the management, stayed the operation and implementation of the award of reinstatement passed by the labour court, a Division Bench held that the learned single judge was not justified in granting stay without requiring the employer to make payment of last drawn wages as contemplated by s 17B, and accordingly modified the order passed by the single judge.[65] Where the High Court refused to go into the merits of the writ petition filed by employer against the order of tribunal directing reinstatement of the workman, on the ground that the employer had not complied with the order made under s 17B, the Supreme Court observed that the High Court ought to have dealt with the merits of the case and decided the case instead of declining to go into the merits because of non-compliance with the order made under s 17B. The Supreme Court had set aside the order of the High Court and remitted the matter back to the High Court for fresh consideration and to decide the case on merits in accordance with law.[66]The liability of the employer under s 17B has to be enforced through the court, and there is provision in the Act that unless the wages of the workmen were paid, the petition would not be maintainable. There is no obligation on the part of the employer to pay without the orders of the court. The workman has to claim and satisfy the court before being entitled to an order for payment under s 17B.[67]

In Hindustan Vegetable Oils, the Supreme Court held that an application under s 17B should be disposed of by the High Courts with great promptitude before the principal petition and that the former should be disposed of most expeditiously.[68] In MP Laghu Udyog, a workman was terminated prior to the transfer of the undertaking from the State Industries Department, the labour court ordered reinstatement and directed the transferee-employer to pay full back wages even though the transferee-company was not made party to the dispute. The workman filed an application under s 33C(2) claiming payment under s 17B and made the transferee employer the respondent for the first time despite the defence of the transferee-company that as the transferee of the establishment, it was not liable to discharge the liability under the award of reinstatement, which was executable against the Industries Department of the Government. The labour court, exercising its jurisdiction under s 33C(2), held that the workman was deemed to have continued in the services of the transferee-company and directed it to make payment under the provisions of s 33C(2). Kulsreshtha J of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that (a) s 17B came into operation only when proceedings were preferred before a High Court or the Supreme Court against the award directing reinstatement and it would not apply if the award of reinstatement was not challenged; (b) in the present case, what was in issue was whether the transferee-company was not the employer in relation to the workman and, hence, was not liable to satisfy the award directing reinstatement; (c) the award could not be enforced against the transferee who was not a party to the dispute in which the award was passed; and (d) that it was not a case covered by s 25FF, the ratio of Anakapalle CAIS,[69] had no application, and hence the workman could only enforce the claim against the transferor and not against the transferee.[70] The learned single judge further held that the workman was not precluded from claiming the benefit under the award in accordance with law from the party liable thereunder. This decision is very refreshing in so far as it reflects high standards of judicial analysis and reasoning. In Mideast India, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that the pendency of proceedings before the BIFR and invocation of s 22 of the Sick Industrial Companies (Special Provisions) Act 1985 would not come in the way of relief granted and payable under s 17B.[71]

In KNM Hospital, the facts disclosed that the management had established before the High Court by adducing ample evidence that the dismissed clerk enrolled himself as an advocate and was a busy practitioner with a decent professional income during the period of his unemployment. Despite this factual position, the High Court ordered payment of last drawn wages u/s 17B. Quashing the order, Pasayat J held that the High Court reached the conclusion contrary to the materials on record. The learned judge, however, held that if any amount had already been paid in the peculiar facts of the case, the workman would not be liable to refund the same.[72] In North East Karnataka RTC, the facts were: the workman, during the period of unemployment, resulting from his dismissal, was engaged in cultivation and was receiving income from agricultural operations. The labour court held that the income generated from agriculture could not be treated as 'gainful employment' within the meaning of s 17B and, on this view of the matter, awarded full back wages. Both the single judge and the division bench of the Karnataka High Court were of the opinion that the workman was not gainfully employed and, hence, upheld the order of the labour court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Altamas Kabir J (for self and Lakshmanan J) held:

> .. . we are unable to accept the reasoning of the Labour Court that the income received by the respondent from agricultural pursuits could not be equated with income from gainful employment in any establishment. In our view, "gainful employment" would also include self-employment wherefrom income is generated. Income either from employment in an establishment or from self-employment merely differentiates the sources from which income is generated, the end use being the same. Since the respondent was earning some amount from his agricultural pursuits to maintain himself, the Labour Court was not justified in holding that merely because the respondent was receiving agricultural income, he could not be treated to be engaged in "gainful employment" (para 17). .. The single Judge of the High Court without looking into this aspect of the matter merely observed that the management had not established that the workman was engaged in any gainful employment during the period of dismissal and on such finding, the learned single Judge chose not to interfere with the award as passed by the Tribunal after remand. (para 18). .. The Division Bench which heard the Writ Appeal did not also consider the aforesaid aspect of the matter and mechanically disposed of the appeal with the observation that after going through the order of the learned single Judge and the award of the Tribunal, it found no ground to interfere with the findings recorded therein. (para 19). .. . regarding the income received by the respondent for the period of his dismissal from service till the date of the award, we are of the view that the award passed by the Tribunal after remand and affirmed by the High Court. .. is liable to be modified and the earlier award of the Labour Court dated 23rd February, 1998 is liable to be restored. (para 20). .. We, accordingly, allow the appeal and restore the award passed by the Labour Court dated 23rd February, 1998 and direct the respondent to give effect to the same expeditiously, if the same has not already been implemented. (para 21). .. In the event full back wages from the date of dismissal till the date of the award has already been paid to the respondent, the appellant-Corporation will be entitled to recover the same from the respondent.[73] (para 22).

In Talwara CCSS, Sinha, J held that neither the grant of relief of reinstatement nor the grant of back wages could be automatic. The learned judge further held that the Industrial Courts while exercising their power u/s 11A of the IDA were required to take into consideration certain relevant factors as, for example, the nature of service, the mode and manner of recruitment, viz., whether the appointment had been made in accordance with the statutory rules so far as a public sector undertaking is concerned, etc.; and that for the purpose of grant of back wages, one of the relevant factors would indisputably be as to whether the workman had been able to discharge his burden that he had not been gainfully employed after termination of his service.[74]

It is submitted that the last part of the above decision in Talwara CCSS, i.e., "the workman should discharge the burden that he had not been gainfully employed" does not seem to be consistent with the law relating to the burden of proof. A person who denies a thing cannot admittedly prove it. It is one thing to say that he should file an affidavit to the effect that he was not employed during the period of forced unemployment, and quite another to direct him to discharge the burden that he was not employed during that period. In view of the fact that the liability to pay full back wages (if awarded by the labour court) lies on the employer, it is for the employer to prove that the workman was gainfully employed during the period between the date of dismissal and of reinstatement, in order that he can be entitled to the benefit of 'reduced liability' or 'no liability' to pay back wages. This burden can never be fastened to the workman. If the employer fails to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the workman was gainfully employed, he cannot escape the liability to pay back wages.[75] Where there was no stay of the reinstatement order, and the workman failed to take up the offer of reinstatement by the employer, and had not enforced the order of reinstatement passed by the labour court, he would not be entitled to invoke s 17B for wages last drawn by him.[76] Where the workman failed to produce any document to the effect that he was employed by the company or the receipt of salary or the letter terminating his service, he will not be entitled to any relief under s 17B.[77]

In Rajasthan Gramin Bank, both the tiers of the High Court proceeded to decide the case in favour of the workman on the sole ground that the management did not counter the specific plea of the workman that he was not gainfully employed, whereas the facts disclosed that the management, in its reply to the application of the workman, specifically stated that he worked in two transport companies subsequent to his dismissal and the copies of vouchers showing the salaries paid by the two companies were also placed on record in its supporting affidavit. Quashing the orders of the High Court, a Division Bench comprising Jain and Lodha JJ remanded the matter to the single judge for fresh adjudication.[78]Section 17B cannot be invoked by a workman in case the impugned award is for regularisation of service, and not for his reinstatement.[79] The workman is not required to produce evidence that he was not gainfully employed. It is enough if he files an affidavit to that effect in order to be entitled to 17B payment.[80] Last drawn wages under s 17B are payable from 30 days after the publication of the award.[81] Unless employer proves that workman was receiving adequate remuneration, during pendency of proceedings before the High Court or the Supreme Court preferred by employer against award of labour court directing reinstatement of workman, the benefit under s 17B cannot be denied to the workman.[82]

In Bharat Coking Coal, the facts were: an industrial dispute raised by workmen for regularization was referred for adjudication. While the proceedings were pending, one of them was transferred. Being aggrieved, a complaint was lodged under s 33A alleging that the transfer was in violation of Section 33. While the said application was pending the company issued a charge sheet for alleged wilful absence, resulting in termination of service. The tribunal set aside both the order of transfer and dismissal, and ordered reinstatement with full backwages, which was challenged by the company by writ application. During the pendency of the writ petition, the workman filed an application under Section 17B for full wages. The company alleged that application under Section 17B was not maintainable as it was not an award. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that, if a complaint was lodged under s 33A on the ground that the employer contravened the provisions of s 33, the complaint was in nature of a dispute and the tribunal would be within power to order reinstatement, and accordingly s 17B gets attracted. The learned judge further observed that where the award directing reinstatement of any workman was challenged by the employer, the workman would be entitled to relief under Section 17B till the disposal of writ application.[83] In a case involving a dispute relating to date of birth and the consequential retirement, the labour court found that the retirement was illegal and ordered reinstatement with full back wages. A single judge of the Jharkhand High Court stayed the operation of the award in so far as it related to back wages. The question before the Division Bench was 'whether the last drawn wages were to be paid from the date of the award or from the date the employer filed the writ petition'. The Bench comprising Patel and Gupta JJ held that the last drawn wages were payable from the date of the award and not from the date of filing writ petition by the employer, as such a rendition would operate to the disadvantage of the workman in that the employer would file the writ petition belatedly and deprive the workman of the last drawn wages that are due from the date of the award.[84] It is submitted that this case was rightly decided.

LIABILITY PENDENTE LITE

Before this section was inserted, the High Courts and the Supreme Court used to give interim relief of some payments to the workers while granting stay of the operation of the awards ordering reinstatement. However, the workmen had no right to claim any wages pendente lite. This provision now recognises the right and gives it mandatory force. In Bharat Singh, the facts disclosed that the labour court directed reinstatement of the workman with continuity of service and backwages in September 1983. Writ petitions followed in the High Court and the matter finally came up before the Supreme Court. The Court held that this section could operate retrospectively and would apply even to those awards which were passed prior to 21 August 1984, if they had not become final. Speaking for the court, Khalid J said:

> .. . there are no words in the section to compel the court to hold that it cannot operate retrospectively ... to construe it in a manner detrimental to workmen would to be defeat its object.[85]

A single judge of the Calcutta High Court has correctly held that the liability cannot be deferred till the conclusion of the 'proceedings' because that would make the provision illusory and nugatory and would turn out to be mere otiose.[86]The expression 'wages' has to be construed to mean 'wages' as defined in s 2(rr) of the Act. In IAAI,[87] the Madras High Court directed that the payment as quantified in terms of s 17B should be paid every month. Therefore, the basis of the payment of monthly wages to the workman during the pendency of such proceedings will be 'full wages' [as defined in s 2(rr)] drawn by him at the time of termination of his service which will also include any maintenance allowance admissible to him under any rule. In Kiritikumar Patel, the Gujarat High Court, while exercising its powers under s 17B directed payment of wages as revised, including the increments, DA etc. which were granted to the employees under two settlements. The Supreme Court held that the expression 'full wages last drawn' must be given the plain and grammatical meaning and declined to construe the words 'full wages last drawn' in a manner which would cast additional burden on the employer and set aside the directions of the High Court. In appeal, the Supreme Court categorised the interpretations placed by various High Courts on the expression 'full wages last drawn' under three heads:

(i) Wages only at the rate last drawn and not at the same rate at which the wages are being paid to the workmen who are actually working.

(ii) Wages drawn on the date of termination of the services plus the yearly increment and the dearness allowance to be worked out till the date of the award.

(iii) Full wages which the workman was entitled to draw in pursuance of the award and the implementation of which is suspended during the pendency of the proceedings.

The court then commented that the first construction gives plain and grammatical meaning to the expression 'full wages last drawn' while the second as well as the third constructions read something more than their plain and grammatical meaning in the words used in the expression. These constructions read the words 'full wages which would have been drawn' instead of the words 'full wages last drawn'. This extended meaning is not warranted either by the language of or the object underlying the statute. The court observed:

> The object underlying the provision is to relieve, to a certain extent the hardship that is caused to the workman due to delay in the implementation of the award. The payment which is required to be made by the employer to the workman is in the nature of subsistence allowance which would not be refundable or recoverable from the workman even if the award is set aside by the High Court or this court. Since the payment is of such a character, the Parliament thought it proper to limit it to the extent of the wages which were drawn by the workman when he was in service and when his services were terminated and, therefore, used the words 'full wages last drawn'. To read these words to mean 'wages which would have been drawn by the workman if he had continued in service' if the order terminating his service had not been passed since it had been set aside by the award of the labour court or the industrial tribunal would result in so enlarging the benefit as to comprehend the relief that has been granted under the award that is under challenge. Since the amount is not refundable or recoverable in the event of the award being set aside, it would result in the employer being required to give effect to the award during the pendency of the proceedings challenging the award before the High Court or the Supreme Court without his being able to recover the said amount in the event of the award being set aside.[88]

The above decision placed the law in the correct perspective consistent with the legislative intent coupled with the plain language of the provision. As a matter of fact, the language used in s 17B is so clear and unequivocal that it excludes uncalled for interpretational gymnastics. Despite this, a few High Courts went about placing wild and weird interpretation on the provision to mean 'the wages he would have drawn had he not been dismissed', which was clearly warranted. At last, the apex court denounced this expansionist approach of High Courts and rightly delineated the contours of the said provision in crystal clear terms.

In view of the observations of the court that the payment made under the provisions of this section to a workman is in the nature of subsistence allowance, such payment would not be refundable or recoverable from him if the award is set aside by the High Court or the Supreme Court. But if the award is finally affirmed by the High Court or the Supreme Court, the workman would not only be entitled to be reinstated in service, but he will also be entitled to other attendant benefits including the backwages from the date of dismissal to the date of reinstatement. This will comprise of two parts, namely (a) period between the date of dismissal to the date of initiation of the proceedings in a High Court or the Supreme Court; and (b) the period from the date of initiation of such proceedings and the date of reinstatement on the conclusion of the litigation. Prima facie, it may appear that for the period between initiation of litigation against the reinstatement award by the employer and the factual reinstatement of the workman, he will be getting double the back wages, viz, (i) in terms of the award; and (ii) as paid under the provisions of this section. However, a little reflection would show that it is a mere illusion. The payment of backwages in terms of the award is sequitur to the award of re-instatement while the payment under this section is the statutory recompense to the workman for the expenses incurred by him on the litigation before a High Court or the Supreme Court and the harassment and hardship suffered by him during the pendency of such litigation. The former type of payment will be available to the workman only in case the award of re-instatement is upheld by the High Court or the Supreme Court and not when the award is set aside. But the latter type of payment is unrefundable and irrecoverable from the employee even if the award is set aside. The provisions of this section relate to the period during which proceedings are pending before a High Court or the Supreme Court. The liability of the employer, to pay wages as contemplated by this section, commences from the day he prefers proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court. This does not take into account the period prior to preferring of the proceedings before the High Court or the Supreme Court.[89]

If the employer prefers proceedings against the award after unreasonable delay, it is open to the writ court or the Supreme Court, in its judicial discretion, to compensate the workman with wages for the period between the date of the award and the initiation of the proceedings before it. Where the employer filed a writ petition against the award of labour court ordering reinstatement and the workman also filed an application for payment of last drawn wages under s 17B, it was held that the mere disposal of writ petition does not render the application of the workman infructuous, and the management was liable to pay wages from the date of filing the writ petition till it was finally disposed of.[90] The word 'pending' in s 17B has been used without any qualification. A petition is pending before the court under Art 226 once it is filed. The benefit under s 17B is payable to the workman from the date of filing of the writ petition and not from the date of its admission by the High Court.[91] In Rajasthan SRTC, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court disposed of the application filed by the workman under s 17B by directing the Corporation to pay back wages at the rate of last drawn wages together with increments and revisions of pay. In appeal, the High Court quashed the order of the single judge and held that the Act does not provide for back wages along with annual increments and periodical revisions of pay; and that it simply meant wages drawn at the time of dismissal. However, in view of the fact that the Corporation had reinstated the said workmen while continuing the proceedings in higher courts, they would be entitled to their normal wages and increments, only from the date of their reinstatement.[92]

REINSTATEMENT

This section can only be invoked if there is a direction in the award of the tribunal to 'reinstate' any workman. The relief of reinstatement is normally granted by the industrial adjudicators when the discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination is set aside as being illegal, unfair or mala fide. The effect of the direction of reinstatement is merely to set at naught such illegal, unfair or mala fide determination of service of the workman and to restore him to his former position and status as if the contract of employment originally entered into has been continuing.[93] In other words, 'reinstatement' postulates that the workman should be put back in the position in which he was before the termination of his service, as if his service was never terminated. He should be restored to the work which he was doing before the termination of his service with all the attendant benefits. Once the direction of reinstatement is carried out, nothing further remains to be done. The liability of the employer to pay and the corresponding right of the workman to receive wages under this section arises as soon as the High Court or the Supreme Court orders stay of operation of the award during the pendency of the proceedings preferred by the employer before it. The extraordinary powers of judicial review under Art l36 or Art 226 of the Constitution cannot be used to destroy the statutory right of a workman under this section because the right pendente lite has been statutorily recognised by the legislature to remove the hardship to workmen and to protect their interests.[94]In case the High Court or the Supreme Court declines to grant stay, the provisions of this section will not come into operation because in that event the employer would be bound to reinstate the workman forthwith. The failure of the employer to reinstate the workman, in the absence of an order of stay of operation of the award granted by a High Court or the Supreme Court, will expose him to the penal consequences of s 29 of the Act apart from recovery proceedings under s 33C of the Act. In VA Unnis, the award of the labour court directed reinstatement of the workman with backwages which was challenged by the employer in the Madras High Court. During the pendency of the writ petition, the workman claimed the benefits of s 17B which was rejected by the single judge with the observation that 'there was nothing in that provision to suggest that the High Court should direct the management to pay full wages last drawn by the workman, and that the workman will be at liberty to work out his remedies for obtaining relief presumably under s 33C(2) of the Act. Quashing the order of the single judge, a Division Bench observed:

> Forcing the employee to work out his rights by a separate proceeding would be contrary to the spirit and the purpose of s 17B of the Act. In view of the plain language, the court observed that this provision is 'intended to be invoked in the course of the proceedings in the High Court and the High Court is entitled to make an order as contemplated by s 17B in the proceedings, taken by the employer challenging the order of the labour court in the High Court. It is thus clearly permissible for the High Court to make an order requiring the employer to comply with the provisions of s 17B of the Act. It would be extremely hard and contrary to the spirit of s 17B to force an employee to seek remedy elsewhere separately to recover wages permitted to be claimed under s 17B of the Act by an application under s 33C(2) of the Act.[95]

In Samser Ali, the Calcutta High Court had taken the view that the order of an industrial tribunal refusing the 'approval' to the dismissal of a workman would fall within the definition of the 'award' and, therefore, the provisions of s 17B would be applicable and the workman would be entitled to wages as contemplated by this provision during the pendency of the writ proceedings in which the order of the tribunal was challenged.[1] But subsequently, in Bata India, a single judge of the same High Court took a diametrically opposite view that an order of the tribunal refusing approval of the action of dismissal under s 33(2)(b), is neither an award nor an order of reinstatement.[2] A similar view was taken by the Orissa High Court in IDL Chemicals,[3] In which the court observed that even though the provisions of s 17B would not be attracted where an order passed under s 33(2)(b) refusing approval was challenged by the employer. It is open to the workman to move the High Court and the High Court has the jurisdiction to grant him wages in accordance with the formula embodied in s 17B. This holding is correct law because refusal to grant approval under s 33(2)(b) is not an award. The effect of such order is simply that the dismissal of the workman is non est. Therefore, the question of reinstatement does not arise. A priori, the provisions of s 17B are not attracted. But that does not mean that an employer can be permitted to frustrate the right of the workmen to wages by initiating proceedings in the High Court or the Supreme Court against such order of the tribunal and by not permitting him to continue to work during the pendency of such proceedings. The courts have ample power to give relief to the workman analogous to s 17B while injuncting the operation of such order. In GSRTC, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court held:

> The legislature has restricted the scope of the beneficial provision under s 17B to the awards of these judicial authorities. It is possible to extend the same benefit to the orders of these authorities under s 33(2)(b) of the Act...However, the same logic cannot be extended further to the determination of the conciliation authorities under s 33(2)(b) of the Act, in the absence of specific provisions in that behalf under s 17B of the Act.[4]

An order of a conciliation officer passed under s 33(5) cannot come within the meaning of the phrase 'award directing reinstatement' under s 17B, having regard to the nature of limited jurisdiction of authorities under s 33, and they cannot direct reinstatement although the consequence of a refusal to grant approval may render the order of dismissal void. Even if an employer contravenes s 33(2)(b), the employee cannot claim reinstatement. He must invoke s 33A of the Act.[5] In Hotel Mansingh, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that an application under s 17B for payment of wages could be made and allowed even in cases of rejection by the industrial tribunal of the approval sought by the employer for removal of a workman under s 33(2)(b).[6] In Air India, Shah, J, having observed that where the employer challenged the order of tribunal refusing to grant approval of the action of dismissal under s 33(2)(b), held that, even though the workman was not entitled to invoke s 17B as there was no existing right vested in him, the High Court was competent to direct payment of wages to the workman in exercise of its jurisdiction under Art 226.[7]

'PROCEEDINGS IN THE HIGH COURTS OR IN THE SUPREME COURT'

Section 17(2) of the Act makes the adjudicator's award, after publication under s 17(1), 'final' and not liable to be called 'in question by any court in any manner whatsoever'. The jurisdiction of the ordinary civil courts to entertain challenge to such awards has thus been ousted by this legislative device. Even the Act does not provide for any appeal or revision against the orders or awards of the industrial adjudicators. The expression 'any proceedings' in the High Court or the Supreme Court, therefore, can refer only to the 'proceedings' through extraordinary constitutional remedies of judicial review by way of a writ petition to the High Court under Arts 226 and 227 and an appeal to the Supreme Court under Art 133 or Art 136 of the Constitution. The discretion to grant stay orders injuncting the operation of the industrial awards is a necessary concomitant of the powers exercisable by these courts. In Vysya Bank, the services of the employee were terminated on completion of the probationary period during which her services were not found to be satisfactory and she was found to be inefficient in her work. On consideration of the material on record, the tribunal found that the work of the employee 'could not be said to be satisfactory by any stretch of language'. Furthermore, it held that the termination order was a case of discharge simpliciter because the overall performance was not satisfactory. Despite these findings, the tribunal not only directed her reinstatement with continuity of service, but also directed that after reinstatement she should be put on probation for another period of 9 months from the date of joining the duty and from that period, the employer shall be entitled to ascertain her suitability. The Karnataka High Court held that the order was purely on compassionate grounds which is not permissible or warranted under the provisions of s 11A of the Act. Therefore, prima facie, there was sufficient material on record to ignore the effect of s 17B and decline the relief thereunder by the writ court when the matter is before it. Since it was a rare case, the court in its writ jurisdiction was justified in declining the relief of payment of wages under s 17B pendente lite.[8]

AFFIDAVIT OF NON-EMPLOYMENT IN ANY ESTABLISHMENT

The main object of this provision is to remove the economic hardship to a workman where the award directing his reinstatement is checkmated by the employer by preferring proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court against such award, during the pendency of such proceedings. But the benefit of this section will be available to the workman only if he is 'not employed in any establishment' during the period of pendency of the proceedings before a High Court or the Supreme Court. This provision, therefore, requires the workman to file an affidavit before such court as a proof of the fact that he is not so employed. In the absence of such affidavit, the presumption will be against the workman that he is gainfully employed in some establishment. Hence, he will not be entitled to the benefits of this provision. The purport of this provision is that during the pendency of such proceedings, the workmen should not have been gainfully employed in any other establishment from which he receives adequate remuneration. If the workmen is not employed in any other establishment and is carrying on some work to make both ends meet to sustain himself and his family, he will not be disentitled to get the benefits provided by this provision. For instance, in HMT, where the workman was running a tea shop and earned some amount, a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that the workman was not employed as envisaged by this section and he was, therefore, not disentitled to get the benefits provided by it.[9]

PROVISO: BURDEN OF PROOF

The workman in whose favour the industrial tribunal has made an award directing his reinstatement is required by the main part of this section to file an affidavit before the court where the employer has preferred proceedings against such award to the effect that he 'had not been employed in any establishment' during the pendency of such proceedings. Once such affidavit has been filed by the workman, he has discharged the burden cast upon him. Then, by virtue of the proviso, the burden of proof shifts to the employer. Thereafter, it is for the employer to satisfy the court that the workman, in fact, had been employed and he had been receiving adequate remuneration during such period or part thereof. If the employer successfully satisfies the court that the workman had been so employed, the court must direct that wages as contemplated by s 17B, shall not be paid by the employer to the workman for the period or part thereof, as the case may be. In the absence of such proof, payment of wages as contemplated by this section must automatically follow on the workman having filed his affidavit. The employer has to place sufficient and cogent material before the court for satisfying it that the workman had, in fact, been employed in any establishment and had been receiving adequate remuneration. The court must pass an order that the employer shall not be liable to pay wages as required by this section, for the period of pendency or part thereof, as the case may be, during which the workman was so employed. But if the employer fails to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the workman was so employed, he has to continue to pay wages as required by this section.[10] In Oriental Containers, instead of placing any material before the court, the employer referred to the report of some detective agency without filing an affidavit stating that the report had been accepted as correct. The Bombay High Court held that the report of the detective agency per se is not any evidence and evidence has to be led in proof thereof. As no such evidence had been placed before the court, it did not entertain the plea.[11]

CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY

The question of the constitutional validity of this section came before the Supreme Court in Dena Bank, wherein it affirmed that a High Court under Art 226 and the Supreme Court under Art 136 is not precluded by s 17B from passing an order directing payment of a higher amount to the workman, if such higher amount is considered necessary in the interest of justice. The court may also give directions regarding refund or recovery of the excess amount in the event of the award being set aside. Such directions, however, would be de hors the provisions of this section. Conferment of the right on the workman under s 17B cannot be regarded as a restriction on the powers of the High Court or the Supreme Court under Arts 226 and 136 of the Constitution.[12]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 18. Persons on whom settlements and awards are binding.—

13[(1) A settlement arrived at by agreement between the employer and workman otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding shall be binding on the parties to the agreement.

(2) [14][Subject to the provisions of sub-section (3), an arbitration award] which has become enforceable shall be binding on the parties to the agreement who referred the dispute to arbitration.]

15[(3)] A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings under this Act[16][or an arbitration award in a case where a notification has been issued under sub-section (3-A) of Section 10-A] or [17][an award [18][of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] which has become enforceable] shall be binding on—

(a) all parties to the industrial dispute;

(b) all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute, unless the Board, [19][arbitrator,] [20][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] as the case may be, record the opinion that they were so summoned without proper cause;

(c) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is an employer, his heirs, successors or assigns in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates;

(d) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part.

LEGISLATION

This section was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947. It has since undergone numerous amendments which have been indicated in the footnotes to the body of the section. Section 18 divides settlements and awards into two categories. The first category consists of settlements which are arrived at otherwise than in the course of any conciliation proceedings and the arbitration awards under s 10A. This category is envisaged by sub-ss (1) and (2). The second category consists of settlements which are arrived at 'in the conciliation proceedings' before a conciliation officer or the Board and the awards of the adjudicatory authorities,viz, the labour courts, tribunals or the national tribunal. The binding effect of settlements and awards falling under these two categories is also different. The employer, of course, is a common party in both types of settlements and awards, but workmen who get bound by settlements and awards falling under the first category are only those workmen, who were parties to the agreement in the case of settlement or were parties to the reference made to a private arbitrator. The case, however, is different in respect of settlements and awards falling under the second category.[21]

The Right to Represent and Bargain Collectively:

In State Bank of India, Srikrishna J (for self and Balakrishnan J), while setting aside the order of the Orissa High Court, dealt with the issue of 'general right of a union to bargain', and observed:

The review petitioner [State Bank of India] has urged two points in support. First, that even the majority union does not have the right of negotiation or representation with respect to individual grievances and denial of this right to a union, which was admittedly a minority union, could hardly be said to be discriminatory as the High Court seems to have assumed. On the contrary, it is urged that conferring such a special right on the minority union would amount to reverse discrimination. Secondly, it is contended that in Common Law there is no obligation on an employer to confer upon a union the right to represent individual employees and unless such a provision is expressly made by any statute or statutory rules, the employer is not obliged to grant any such right. The High Court has found that the 1994 Verification Rules do not apply. In any event, the State Bank as a public sector bank had created its own efficacious grievance settlement machinery and there was no justification for the High Court to import the principle, if any, from Rule 24 of inapplicable rules to override the grievance redressal machinery which was already in place. The petitioner contends that these submissions have been lost sight of in the judgment, which is sought to be reviewed. Hence, the review petition.. .. For the respondent association [All Orissa SBI Officers Association], however, it is contended that there is no law under which the representative character of the majority association has been determined. It is also contended that there is no statutory provision, which could decide as to which of the contending trade unions really represents the concerned employees. In these circumstances, it is urged that the judgment of the High Court took a reasonable view, namely, that the non-recognised trade unions should also be accorded the right of representing individuals and ventilating their grievances by holding discussions with the employer which is precisely what has been accepted, and reiterated in the judgment of this Court dated May 6, 2002. It is, therefore, contended that there is no scope whatsoever, much less any need, to review the judgment.. .. In our view, the contention urged by the counsel for the Review Petitioner has merit and needs acceptance. There is no Common Law right of a trade union to represent its members, whether for purposes of collective bargaining or individual grievances of members. This is an inroad made into the Common Law by special statutes. Either the special statute operates proprio vigore, or it does not. In the situation before us, it is undisputed that Rule 24(a) on which the respondent association and the High Court placed reliance, has no application. This is accepted even in the judgment under review. Nonetheless, on general principles of equity, justice and fair play the judgment under review holds that the minority trade union should also be afforded an opportunity of ventilating individual grievances of its members. It appears to us that, in doing so, the attention of this Court was not adverted to the elaborate grievance procedure machinery which is in existence and the details of which are placed on record.[22]

SUB-SECTION (1): BINDING EFFECT OF A PRIVATE SETTLEMENT

This sub-section was introduced by the Amending Act of 1956, with a view to remedy a defect in the then existing law. Prior to this amendment, there was no provision to make such settlements binding even on the parties thereto, with the result that the workmen notwithstanding, such a settlement could raise an 'industrial dispute' on the identical matter agreed upon by their union.[23]By the same amending Act, the definition of 'settlement' was also amended, as the original definition contemplated only a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, so as to include written agreements between the employer and workmen arrived at otherwise than 'in the course of conciliation proceedings' where such agreement has been signed by the parties thereto in the prescribed manner and a copy thereof has been sent each to the 'appropriate government' and the conciliation officer.[24] This sub-section provides that a settlement arrived at by agreement between the employer and the workmen 'otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings', as is apparent from the language of this provision, shall be binding only 'on the parties to the agreement. In order to make such a settlement binding on them, it should be arrived at by agreement between the employer and the workmen.[25] Normally, it is the union or the representatives of the employees who enter into agreement with the employer. All the employees do not, as a matter of fact, become parties, to the agreement but the settlement signed by such representatives binds all those whom they represent. Therefore, the terms of the settlement become a part of the contract of employment of each individual workman represented by such representatives.[26] In Herbertsons, the Supreme Court held that, where a union claims that a substantial number of workmen were not a party to the settlement entered into with the majority union and hence they would not be bound by such settlement, it has to establish that fact before the tribunal by adducing relevant evidence. Even if a few workers were not members of the majority union, if it is a just and fair settlement arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings, it should not be disturbed particularly when a recognised and registered union enters into a voluntary settlement.[27]

In Tata Chemicals, the court held that a settlement in relation to industrial disputes between the employer and the union representing the majority workmen will not bind the minority union, who was not a party to the settlement.[28] Construed in the light of the other provisions of s 18, the definition of the term 'settlement' and the relevant statutory Rules, this sub-section does not appear to vest in the employer and the workmen 'freedom to settle a dispute as they please and clothe it with a binding effect on all workmen' or even on all member-workmen of the union to which they belong. The settlement has to be in compliance with the statutory provisions.[29] For instance, an agreement which is by acquiescence and is not in writing or is not signed, is not a settlement as defined in the Act and cannot, therefore, bind even the parties to such an agreement.[30] Rule 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, provides that a settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings or otherwise shall be in Form H, and prescribes the persons by whom the memorandum of settlement can be signed on behalf of the employer and the union respectively. However, a reading of this rule clearly shows that it pre-supposes the existence of a settlement already arrived at between the employer and the workmen and it only prescribes the form in which the memorandum of settlement should be signed and by whom it should be signed. It does not deal with the entering into or arriving at a settlement. Thus, where a settlement is alleged to have been arrived at between an employer and one or more office bearers of the union, and the authority of the office bearers, who signed the memorandum of settlement, is challenged or disputed, the said authority has to be established as a fact.[31]

Affidavits filed by workmen before the industrial tribunal stating that they had effected the settlement of their disputes with the employer would not constitute a 'settlement' of their dispute within the meaning of the term as defined in the Act.[32] The validity of a settlement arrived at under s 18(1) of the Act cannot be gone into by the authority, under the provisions of a state statute like the Shops and Establishments Act.[33] Any memo of the employer subsequent to the settlement to the contrary cannot override the settlement.[34] In DN Ganguly, the Supreme Court observed that it would be unreasonable to assume that the industrial tribunal would insist upon dealing with the dispute on merits even after it is informed that the dispute has been amicably settled between the parties.[35] In Sirsilk, a settlement was arrived at between the parties on the same dispute in respect of which the tribunal had sent its award to the government for publication. However, before the publication of the award, the parties jointly wrote to the government intimating it of the settlement and requesting it not to publish the award. In view of the mandatory provisions of ss 17(1) and 18(1), the government refused to withhold the publication. The employer, therefore, filed a writ petition in the AP High Court praying for a writ restraining the government from publishing the award. The High Court rejected the writ petition. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held that, though the requirement of s 17(1) to publish the award is mandatory, in the special circumstances of the case and with a view to avoid conflict between a settlement binding under s 18(1) and an award binding under s 18(3) on publication, the only solution was to withhold the publication of the award and that would not in any way have affected the mandatory requirement of s 17(1) of the Act. Wanchoo J observed:

> Therefore, as soon as an agreement is signed in the prescribed manner and a copy of it is sent to the government and the conciliation officer, it becomes binding at once on the parties to it and comes into operation on the date it is signed or on the date which might be mentioned in it for its coming into operation. In such a case, there is no scope for any inquiry by government as to the bona fide character of the settlement which becomes binding and comes into operation once it is signed in the manner provided in the rules and a copy is sent to the government and the conciliation officer. The settlement having thus become binding and in many cases having already come into operation, there is no scope for any inquiry by the government as to the bona fides of the settlement.[36]

In Amalgamated Coffee, the dispute in question was compromised by agreement between the employer and his workmen during the pendency of the appeal by special leave in the Supreme Court against the award of the industrial tribunal. Consequently, the employer moved the court for disposing of the appeal in terms of the settlement. This motion was resisted by some of the workmen on the ground that they were not parties to the agreement and the agreement, therefore, was not binding on them. The court in the circumstances, remitted the case to the tribunal calling for a finding on the facts whether actually a large number of the workmen employed by the employer had accepted payments consistent with the terms of the agreement set up by the employer. The tribunal returned the finding that in every estate, payments were made in terms of the settlement, that such payments were voluntarily and knowingly accepted by the workmen and that the settlement was a fair settlement, having regard to the basic facts of the dispute between the parties. In view of these findings, the Supreme Court observed that the settlement was a fair one, hence the objection by the dissenting workmen could not be sustained.[37] This decision goes even further than the Sirsilk case, preferring a private settlement between the parties even to an award which had, in fact, been published and become binding under s 18(3) and was the subject-matter of appeal before the Supreme Court. In Delhi Cloth Mills, the court appears to have taken a diametrically opposite view holding that during the conciliation proceedings or after the failure of the conciliation proceedings, the parties cannot arrive at a private settlement and clothe it with a binding effect even on the members of the union which entered the settlement. In this connection, Dua J who delivered the opinion of the court said:

> We do not think the management and the union can, when a dispute is referred to the conciliation officer, claim, absolute freedom of contract to arrive at a settlement in all respects binding on all workmen, to which no objection whatsoever can ever be raised by the workmen feeling aggrieved. The question of a valid and binding settlement in such circumstances is, in our opinion, governed by the statute and the rules made thereunder. Reliance was next placed on section 18(1) to support the binding character of the settlement. This sub-section for its proper construction must be read with the other sub-sections and the relevant rules, in the light of the definition of 'settlement' as contained insection 2(p) of the Industrial Disputes Act. 'Settlement' as defined therein means a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings and includes a written agreement between the employer and workmen arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding where such agreement has been signed by the parties > thereto in such manner as may be prescribed and a copy thereof has been sent to the appropriate government and the conciliation officer. In the light of these provisions we do not think that section 18(1) vests in the management and the union unfettered freedom to settle the dispute as they please and clothes it with a binding effect on all workmen or even on all member workmen of the union. The settlement has to be in compliance with the statutory provisions.[38]

These observations are clearly contradictory to the ratio of Sirsilk and Amalgamated Coffee to which the attention of the court does not appear to have been drawn. In Sirsilk case, it was pointedly stated that 'as soon as an agreement is signed in the prescribed manner and a copy of it is sent to the government and the conciliation officer, it becomes binding at once on the parties to it and comes into operation on the date it is signed. Applying this rule, it would appear that the settlement became binding on the day it was signed. The requirement of s 2(p) to send a copy of the settlement to the conciliation officer was also obviously complied with. Hence, the settlement was in accordance with law and was binding under s 18(1) on the workmen who were parties to it, particularly the concerned workman himself who was the president of the union at the time of the settlement. In this connection, it is relevant to note that s 18(1) makes an 'agreement between the employer and workman otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings', binding on the parties to the agreement. In other words, if the workman concerned himself enters into a private agreement with the employer that will make the agreement binding on him. The workman in this case, therefore, who was a party to the settlement was also bound by the settlement. The observations of the court, that 'when a dispute is referred to the conciliation officer', the parties cannot 'claim absolute freedom of contract to arrive at a settlement', is not borne out by the statute. The Act does not postulate any 'reference' to a conciliation officer of any 'industrial dispute'. The conciliation proceedings in a public utility service, as in this case, commence when a notice of strike is received by the conciliation officer, and where no settlement is arrived at, they are deemed to have concluded when the failure-report of the conciliation officer is received by the 'appropriate government'. It is nowhere provided in the Act or the Rules that during the pendency of the conciliation proceedings or after the failure of such proceedings, the parties are barred from arriving at a private settlement. If there is no bar to a private settlement after the award has been made, as in Sirsilk, and even after the publication of the award as in Amalgamated Coffee, much less can there be a bar to such a settlement during the pendency of conciliation proceedings or after the failure of such proceedings. The view of the court that the parties cannot arrive at a private settlement during, or after the failure of, the conciliation proceedings, is neither warranted by the statute nor by precedent. The further observation of the court that the provisions of s 18(1) do not vest in the parties 'unfettered freedom to settle the dispute as they please and clothe it with a binding effect', is no less misconceived. The court found a further flaw in the settlement on the ground of non-compliance of r 58(4). This rule requires the parties to the settlement to send a copy thereof jointly to the appropriate government. The memorandum of settlement in this case was sent along with a letter from the management to the government. The court took the view that since the settlement in question was not jointly sent to the government, the rule was not complied with in order to clothe the settlement with a binding character on all the workmen. This view is equally misplaced, because the requirement of jointly sending a copy of the memorandum of settlement to the government is merely directory and not mandatory. The decision of Dua J in Delhi Cloth Mills is replete with a host of infirmities of rudimentary nature, such as, misreading of provisions, misapplication of law and perverse analysis, and deserves to be rejected outright as being repugnant to the time-tested canons of collective bargaining and s 18 of the Act.

The Patna High Court in Rohtas Industries, held that the tribunal had complete jurisdiction to decide whether the settlement arrived at between the parties was bona fide and as also its binding effect on the workmen concerned. It was further observed that the tribunal would take into consideration the settlement while passing the final award by it.[39] In Sirsilk, the Supreme Court prohibited the publication of the award with a view to avoid a likely conflict between a binding award and a binding settlement covering the same subject matter. The High Court does not appear to have appreciated the ratio of that decision of the Supreme Court and contented itself merely by saying that the said decision had no application to the present case. The legal position is very clear in so far as a settlement, if arrived at genuinely and bona fide, would be binding on the parties under s 18(1) and the tribunal should accept it as it is. In Blue Star, pending adjudication, the parties had jointly filed an application bringing to the notice of the labour court that a private settlement had been arrived at between them to the effect that the workman will be reinstated without backwages or allowances. As a matter of fact, pursuant to the settlement, the workman had even joined duty. However, the labour court did not pass an order on the application for a period of two years. Then, the workman filed an application before the labour court seeking the relief of backwages based on an alleged oral agreement and the labour court proceeded to inquire into the claim. In a writ petition filed by the employer for prohibiting the labour court from proceeding with the inquiry, a single judge of the Delhi High Court held that the labour court could not adjudicate upon the question which stood settled by the settlement because after the settlement, the adjudication had become infructuous. The learned judge further observed that since there was no explanation from the workman regarding the delay of two years in seeking the relief of backwages, the workman had acquiesced and was estopped from raising any dispute.[40]

In WIMCO, on behalf of the employer, a novel point was addressed to the Supreme Court, that the letter of appointment of a probationer was in the nature of a privatesettlement binding under s 18 of the Act. In fact, the case was not governed by s

18 of the ID Act but was governed by s 6B of the UP Industrial Disputes Act which is somewhat similar to s 18 of the ID Act. On a construction of the provisions of that section, the court held that 'any privately negotiated settlement should be submitted for registration to the conciliation officer'. In this view of law, the contention was rejected.[41] In Veeramani, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court held that a settlement under s 12(3) read with r 59 of ID (Mysore) Rules 1959, which had been signed by a person who was not an authorised agent of the party, has no binding effect on the party whom he seeks to represent.[42] A settlement under s 18(1) between the management of the bank and the union, which stipulates that a candidate should secure minimum percentage of marks in English to qualify in the written test for promotion, is not violative of any of the provisions of the Constitution or of the Official Languages Act 1963 or for that matter any public policy. The said settlement is binding on both the parties unless revoked in accordance with law.[43] Where the management withdrew the facility of treating the office-bearers of recognised trade union as on duty for the purpose of doing trade union work, a single judge of the High Court, having dismissed the writ petition filed by the workmen on the ground that the matter involved disputed questions of fact, yet directed the Corporation to continue the facility duly scaled down from what it had been agreed in the settlement.[44]

In Hindustan Lever, Savant J of Bombay High Court held that a settlement as understood by s 2(p) must necessarily be with the union since the dispute before the court was not concerning either discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination of the service of a workman.[45] The decision rendered in Hindustan Lever merits analysis, if for nothing else, to highlight the spate of misconceptions that Savant J brought to bear upon the concept of collective bargaining as well as the provisions of the ID Act. A look at the ID Act unfolds that there is nothing either in s 2(p) or in s 18(1) to suggest that an individual workman is prohibited from entering into a settlement with the management or that there should necessarily be a trade union in every industrial establishment to represent workmen in negotiations. At least in India, no enactment has so far mandated compulsory unionisation of industrial establishments. On the contrary, the law permits a group of workmen or even an individual workman to enter into a settlement with the management, whether or not there is a union and whether or not he/they are the members of it. Section 18(1) stipulates in terms: 'A settlement arrived at by agreement between the employer and workman otherwise than in the course of...' The singular noun 'workman' - and not plural 'workmen' - occurring in the above sub-section clearly points to the fact that an individual workman is as much entitled to negotiate with management and arrive at a settlement just as any other group of workmen or a trade union is. The learned judge relied, inter alia, on Ram Prasad Vishwakarma (infra), and Brooke Bond (infra), in support of his decision. Strangely, however, neither of the two decisions touches upon the question that was substantially at issue in Hindustan Lever. For a complete appreciation of the misplaced comparison drawn by Savant J, it is necessary to briefly discuss both the cases. The first case was Ram Prasad Vishwakarma, in which the facts were:

(a) It was a case of dismissal of a workman; it had nothing to do with either collective bargaining or with s 18 of the Act.

(b) At the time of deciding the case (1961), s 2A of the ID Act did not take its birth, which section was inserted some four years later in 1965

(c) Hence, in the pre-1965 dispensation, there was no provision for an individual dispute in terms of the ratio of Central Provinces Transport Services,[46] even in the event of discharge, dismissal etc., and such a dispute had to be necessarily espoused by a union or a group of workmen, in order to bring it within the ambit of the definition of industrial dispute under s 2(k).

(d) The general secretary of the union espoused the dispute relating to the dismissal of the appellant-workman, which was pending before the tribunal for adjudication. The tribunal granted several adjournments as the union and management represented that talks were going on at the bipartite level and that a compromise was likely to be reached in the matter.

(e) In the meantime, the appellant-workman filed an application before the tribunal stating that he had not authorised the general secretary to represent his case; that he had no faith in him; and any agreement or compromise filed by him should not be accepted by the tribunal.

(f) The tribunal rejected the said application and passed an award in terms of the compromise reached between the management and the union. Having lost the case in the High Court, the workman filed an appeal in the Supreme Court.

The issue raised before the Supreme Court was whether the appellant was entitled to separate representation in spite of the fact that the Union, which had espoused his cause, was being represented by its Secretary. Rejecting the contention of the workman, Das Gupta J (for self, Gajendragadkar and Wanchoo JJ) held:

> It is now well-settled that a dispute between an individual workman and an employer cannot be an industrial dispute as defined in section 2(k) of the Industrial Disputes Act unless it is taken up by a Union of the workmen or by a considerable number of workmen.. .. it cannot be said that the Tribunal committed any error in refusing the appellant's prayer for representation through representatives of his own choice in preference to Fateh Singh, the Secretary of the Union.[47]

What is the relevance of the above decision to the facts of Hindustan Lever? The second case relied upon was Brooke Bond, in which the issue was 'what would be the effect if the office bearers signing the settlement had no authorisation from the executive committee of the union'. The Apex Court held that in the absence of an authorisation from the executive committee, an agreement between any office-bearer and the management cannot be called a settlement as defined in s 2(p).[48]Here again, there is nothing which could throw any light on the issues canvassed in Hindustan Lever, in which the facts disclosed that the individual workmen signed settlements with the management, which were undoubtedly binding on them. It is one thing to say that a settlement, in order to be binding on the workmen in general, should be signed by the union which represents them, and quite another to suggest that an individual workman is wholly debarred from entering into a settlement in a matter concerning his service conditions. It is also not disputed that where a union ostensibly represents the workmen, the office-bearers should submit the authorisation in Form 'F' without which the settlement so arrived at cannot bind the workmen whom the union claims to represent. Where, however, the individual workman himself signs the settlement touching upon his own conditions of service, the law does not require him to furnish any such authorisation. In the face of unambiguous language used in s 18(1), to hold that 'settlement' means 'a settlement arrived with the union' is a misreading of the provisions, and amounts to rewriting the enactment. Both the finding recorded by the tribunal and the conclusion reached by Savant J are contrary to the letter and spirit of the ID Act. In striking contrast, another single judge of the same High Court, Kochar J, in another case involving the same company, ie, Hindustan Lever, ruled that, where all but one field-force employee arrived at individual settlements on identical lines with the management during the pendency of the dispute raised by the union on their behalf, it was not reasonable on the part of the tribunal to proceed further with the reference, and that it should make an award in terms of the settlement between the parties as laid down by the Supreme Court in DN Ganguly.[49] The above decision of Sawant J in Hindustan Lever betrays his inability to understand the provisions of ID Act in their proper perspective, is wholly misconceived and absolutely wrong. Between these two decisions, the view taken by Kochar J is consistent with the objects and scheme of the Act and is right, whereas that of Savant J is repugnant to the law and deserves to be rejected outright without a second look.

In Karnataka SRTC, the Supreme Court held that the management, having entered into a settlement under s 18(1) recognising the union as the sole bargaining agent for four years and extending the same for another four years coupled with the facility of check-off, cannot unilaterally withdraw the check-off facility during the subsistence of the settlement and even after the expiry of the period, until the said settlement is validly terminated under s 19 and a new settlement is arrived at modifying the terms thereof. The court further held that the order passed by the state government for withdrawal of the check-off facility during the currency of a valid settlement was totally ultra vires and uncalled for.[50] Where a workman is aggrieved against the bipartite settlement arrived at under s 18(1) between the management of the bank and the recognised union is not binding on him because he was not a party to the settlement, it is always open to him to challenge the same in a manner known to law, and he is not entitled to any relief in a writ appeal.[51] In Dena Bank, the Supreme Court held that, where the bank acted in accordance with the settlement reached under s 18(1) providing for two channels of promotion-one by seniority-cum-merit and the other by merit alone—it would not be proper for the High Court to direct the management to consider the cases of candidates, who were unsuccessful in the test prescribed for promotion through 'merit', as long as the settlement itself has not been challenged.[52] The very fact that the All India Union is representing the workmen employed all over the country in the establishments of the company and substantially large number of workmen have accepted the settlements, there has to be legitimate inference that the settlements are reasonably acceptable to the workmen. There is no reason for the minority union not to accept the settlements, after having accepted the benefits flowing from the said settlements. The will of the majority of the workmen has to be accepted by the petitioner-union and it cannot persist to have independent and separate adjudication of its own demands when all such demands have been covered by the settlements with the All India TC Employees Union and the company.[53] Where the settlement between the management and union provided for the employment of a dependent of an employee who died while in service, the denial of appointment to the son of deceased workman on the ground that the wife of deceased employee was already employed in the company, goes against the spirit of the settlement, and the tribunal's order upholding the management's contention is contrary to law.[54]

The intention of the parties to the settlement has to be gathered by the words used by the parties to the settlement. Having regard to the context in which it was used, even if there is any ambiguity, the court should look at all the parts in the settlement to ascertain what was really intended by the parties. In this context, the word 'defect' in the settlement, which refers to a disease suffered by the workman making him unfit for work and disentitling him for absorption, has to be construed, not technically, but liberally so as to advance the right to livelihood. When an employee was disabled by a disease to perform the duties of his post, the employer should make all attempts to see the final result and make allowances to get treatment since it promotes reasonableness in employment, otherwise, it amounts to taking away the employment construing in a technical sense in a manner not reasonable, fair and just.[55] In a case where, consequent upon the taking over of a dairy run by the Municipal Corporation by Dairy Development Corporation, a settlement was reached between the transferor, transferee and the employees otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings providing for regulating the service conditions of the erstwhile dairy employees of the Municipal Corporation, such settlement is binding only on the parties to the agreement in accordance with s 18(1). It does not confer any benefit on the badli workmen who came to be subsequently employed in the dairy under the transferee-corporation. It is only the settlement, which is arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, ie, under s 18(3), which is binding on the workmen in employment at the time of settlement as also all those who subsequently become employed in that establishment.[56]

Where the employees solemnly entered into an agreement with the management under s 18(1) agreeing to scale down the gratuity amount payable under the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972 in the background of the sickness of the undertaking and the need for its revival, such an agreement is valid and is not violative of s 14 of the Payment of Gratuity Act. The workmen, having received the amounts in full, cannot question the lesser payment later.[57] The union and workmen, who are not parties to a settlement reached under s 18(1) between the management and another union, cannot be said to be aggrieved persons as regards the said settlement, and the writ petition filed by them against the settlement is not maintainable.[58]Once an agreement under s 18(1) was entered into which provided for pension and other benefits, and the said agreement was acted upon by the employer, he cannot turn round and say that it was not an agreement within the meaning of s 2(p) of the Act as the copy thereof was not sent to the authorities concerned. Once the agreement is acted upon, there was a performance of the terms and once it is so performed, even in pain, would attract the principle of equitable estoppel.[59] A settlement arrived at under s 18(1) with the recognised union is binding on its members and an individual workman of the union cannot be permitted to contend that it was not binding on him, merely because he did not agree to the terms of the settlement or that he was not a signatory thereto.2[60] In Sarva Shramik Sangh, the facts were, out of the two unions which submitted charter of demands, the management entered into a settlement with one, which was the majority union. The minority union did not accept the terms of settlement and raised an industrial dispute which was referred for adjudication. The industrial court recorded its opinion that the settlement arrived at between the management and the majority union was just and fair and passed an award in terms of the said settlement. Repelling the contention challenging the validity of the said award by the minority union, the High Court held that the award of the industrial court did not warrant interference.[61]

A settlement reached between the employer and employees under s 18(1) implies that they are the employees of the employer. It acquires statutory status and the engagement made as a result of such settlement, may be, by way of a job contract, cannot be said to be a job contract and the employees cannot be said to be contract labourers. In fact, they are workmen in view of their engagement being the result of statutory settlement under the ID Act. That being so, 'cessation of work' and the consequent non-employment of the workmen amounts to retrenchment within the meaning of s 6N of the UP Industrial Disputes Act. On this view of the matter, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court upheld the award of the labour court that the cessation amounted to retrenchment in contravention of the UP Act.[62] Once a workman has accepted the VR Scheme and entered into a settlement with the management under s 18(1), he cannot turn round and complain that his signature was obtained under coercion. There is no scope to construe that there was an industrial dispute under s 2A and, by the same token, the order passed by the single judge of the High Court in favour of the workman cannot be sustained and has to be set aside.[63] In HMT, the facts disclosed that a settlement was arrived at between the management and the union in April 1995 in terms of which, the wages and allowances were revised substantially. The settlement was to be in operation for a period of five years from 1 January 1992 to 31 December 1996. Clause 13 of the settlement provided that the payment of arrears from 1 January 1992 to 31 March 1995 would be discussed based on a periodic review of the financial performance of the company. The question before the Supreme Court was in respect of arrears, which were not paid as the company was on a downhill course. The financial figures showed a net loss of Rs. 3657 lakhs during the year 1998-99 and net earnings Rs. 2441 lakhs during the year 2000-01. The net worth of the company rose from Rs. 2410 lakhs to Rs. 5414 lakhs during the same period. On behalf of the company, however, the attention of the court was drawn to accumulated losses, which were Rs. 139.60 lakhs in 1998-99, Rs. 436.51 lakhs in 1999-2000 and Rs. 379-99 lakhs in 2000-01. The figures for the year 2001-02, the net earnings of this year were Rs. 1024 lakhs and the accumulated losses as on 31st March, 2002 were Rs. 368 crores. As on 31st March, 2003 the accumulated losses would be about 403.33 crores. Allowing the appeal in part, Srikrishna J (for self and Balakrishnan J) held:

> .. . Clause 13 does not say that the disbursement of arrears would be made only after all accumulated losses are completely wiped out. It merely says that it would be done on periodical review of the improvement in the financial performance. In our view, therefore, the appellant was not justified in taking the rigid stand of refusing to disburse any of the arrears on the ground that accumulated losses persisted. This was obviously an unreasonable stand and the High Courts were justified in exercising their writ jurisdiction in directing the appellant to make the disbursements. However, we are not satisfied that the High Courts were justified in directing full disbursement of arrears at one go. We are conscious of the fact that there has been improvement in the financial performance, yet at the same time, we are also not satisfied that the financial performance had improved to such extent that the entire liability needs to be discharged at one go. In our view, it would be necessary to give some more breathing time to the appellant to ensure that the trend of financial improvement does not get reversed.. .. In the result, we allow the appeals partly and modify the judgments of the Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh High Court as under :

(A) It is held that there is some improvement in the financial performance of the appellant company subsequent to the settlement dated 23-4-1995 and its implementation.

(B) It is held that the appellant's obligation to discharge the liability towards arrears under Clause 13 of the said settlement has partly arisen.

(C) It is directed that the appellant shall disburse 55% of the arrears payable during the period from 1-1-1992 to 31-3-1995 to all eligible employees, to the extent of their eligibility, within three months from today.

(D) The balance amount of the arrears payable as aforesaid shall be computed and disbursed to all eligible employees in three equal annual installments on or before 31st of March, 2005, 31st of March, 2006 and 31st of March, 2007 respectively.[64]

In Satheeshchandran, the facts related to the promotions in UCO Bank. The employee was employed as a clerk in the Bank. He was promoted as Assistant Manager with effect from 1 August 1997. The promotion order stipulated that he would be on probation for one year, which was likely to be extended up to a total period of two years as specified in the Promotion Policy Settlement (PPS) dated 13 April 1988. While he was on probation, he was transferred to Mavoor where he had joined the service. A few days later, he requested the management to revert him to his original post, which was acceded to by the Bank on the following conditions :-

(1) You shall forfeit permanently your chance for promotion to officer's cadre;

(2) You shall be posted in the capacity of a Clerk notwithstanding your occupying any functional special allowance post prior to your promotion;

(3) Your name will be included in the common seniority list of eligible employees in the clerical cadre for selection to functional special allowance posts under bipartite settlements after five years from the date of such reversion;

(4) On reversion, you shall work in both Cash and Accounts Department; You will not be eligible for stagnation increments.

This order was challenged by the employee by way of writ petition, and later in appeal to the Supreme Court. Allowing the appeal in part, and quashing that part of the order which disentitled him to all future promotions, Naolekar J (for self and Panta J) held:

> 11. Under sub-clause (b) of Clause 3.8.3 of the Bipartite Agreement, when an employee seeks reversion after the expiry of probation period, he may be allowed reversion on his request in the discretion of the Bank and if such a request is acceded to by the Bank, the employee shall have to forfeit permanently his chances for promotion to officers' cadre. Therefore, if the promoted officer has made a request after the expiry of the probation period, he has to give up all chances of future promotions to the officers' cadre. Thus, to forfeit chances of promotion to the officers' cadre, the request for reversion is to be made after expiry of the probation period. In the present case, the request for reversion, which was made by the appellant on 3.3.1999, was although after a period of one year but was during the period of probation. The appellant's case will be governed by sub-clause (a) of Clause 3.8.3 of the Bipartite Agreement and, thus, he can be denied future promotion only for a period of two years from the date the order of reversion is made effective. The order of the Bank debarring the appellant of all future promotions to the higher rank of Officer beyond the period of two years is, therefore, illegal and requires correction.. .. the appeal is partly allowed. The order of reversion imposing a condition that the appellant shall forfeit permanently his chances for promotion to the officers' cadre is set aside and it is directed that he shall forfeit his chances for promotion to the officers' cadre only for a period of two years from the date of the order of reversion.[65] (Paras 11-14) (Italics supplied).

It is submitted that this case was rightly decided. An employee may opt for reversion to his original post, during the period of promotion to a higher grade post involving higher responsibilities, for a variety of reasons. It could be a case of self-assessment on his part whether he was having the necessary knowledge and skills to handle the higher grade position, before the management comes to such a conclusion, which is more detrimental to his career prospects. It could well be understood that the employee wants time to acquire the knowledge and skills so that he can stake his claim for promotion at a later date. The mere request to revert him to his original position, that too, during the period of probation in the promoted post, should not be used as a tool to condemn him for life. The reversion order issued by the management is archaic, primitive and tyrannical, apart from being in contravention of the terms of settlement reached under s 18(1). The said portion of the order was rightly struck down by the learned judge.

In Air India Cabin Crew, there was a long history of settlements commencing from 1977 covering, inter alia, the promotion policy of male Cabin Crew and female Air Hostesses with separate promotional avenues, as, for instance, male

Cabin Crew was only eligible to post of In-Flight Supervisor prior to 1997. While this was so, a settlement was arrived at between the Association and the Management in 1997 which provided for a new promotion policy by which the post of Inflight Supervisor was thrown open to both male cabin crew (i.e., Inflight Purser) and female Air Hotesses, thereby bringing parity between the two genders. The settlement further provided that all the earlier settlements, awards, past practices, record notes and understandings arrived at between the erstwhile Corporation (i.e., Indian Airlines Corporation) and the Association, would continue. Immediately after the signing of the said Memorandum of Settlement, on the very same day, Air India Limited issued a promotion policy for all the Cabin Crew members, but treated the pre-1997 and post-1997 crew separately. By a specific clause, the said promotion policy amended the existing promotional avenues for the male Cabin Crew to that of In-Flight Supervisors and female Cabin Crew to the post of Senior Check Air Hostesses recruited prior to the settlement. The said promotion policy kept the promotional avenues in the two streams of male Cabin Crew and female Cabin Crew, recruited prior to 1997, separate. The common issue raised before the Supreme Court was whether the promotional avenues and other terms of service of the pre-1997 cadre of Assistant Flight Pursers could be changed to their prejudice. Justice Altamas Kabir (for self and Cyriac Joseph J), while conceding the position of the appellant-union that that prior to 1997, there was a category of Cabin Crew referred to as In-Flight Supervisors, which was confined to In-Flight Pursers alone and did not concern the Air Hostesses, rejected the other plea for treating In-Flight Supervisor as a separate post, and held that the duties discharged by persons designated as 'In-Flight Supervisors' did not create any separate post and the post remained that of 'In-Flight Pursers'. On the question of the right of the management to change the promotion policy and the binding effect of the settlement reached in 1997, the learned judge, while dismissing the petitions filed by the Association, observed:

> In our view, the Management of Air India was always entitled to alter its policies with regard to their workmen, subject to the consensus arrived at between the parties in supersession of all previous agreements. We are also unable to accept the further submission made on behalf of the appellants that those workmen who had been promoted to the Executive category would continue to be governed by the Settlements arrived at when they were workmen and were represented by the Association. In our view, once an employee is placed in the Executive cadre, he ceases to be a workman and also ceases to be governed by Settlements arrived at between the Management and the workmen through the concerned Trade Union. It is not a question of an attempt made by such employees to wriggle out of the Settlements which had been arrived at prior to their elevation to the Executive cadre, which, by operation of law, cease to have any binding force on the employee so promoted by the Management.[66] ().

In Needle Industries, the issue was the binding effect of a settlement arrived at otherwise in the course of conciliation proceedings. A workman who was not a member of the union which signed the settlement and hence not a party thereto filed an application under s 33C(2) for computation and recovery of the benefits accruing therefrom, which was allowed by the labour court, but was rejected by a single judge of Madras High Court. Upholding the decision of single judge, Nagappan J (for self and Sundresh J) observed:

> The claimants were not parties to the Settlement under Section 18 (1) of the Act and in the absence of any existing right, claim under Section 33C(2) of the Act cannot be legally sustained and the Order granting relief to them suffers from lack of jurisdiction; error apparent on the face of the record and hence, liable to be set aside.[67]

The NCL-II took note of the practice of industry level negotiations on interest issues, which obtain in several industries and recommended that the practice should continue. The Commission is in favour of unit level negotiations and settlements in respect of wages, allowances, general conditions including total number of hours of work, leave, holidays, social security, safety and health, productivity, manpower adjustments, change in shifts etc, so as to maximize the efficient functioning of the individual establishments. The Commission recommended that a settlement entered into with a recognised negotiating agent must be binding on all workers. This is a recommendation of far reaching consequences in the face of the current law on the binding nature of settlements arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings [s 18(3)] as against the ones arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings [s 18(1)]. In other words, the Commission favours that a settlement arrived at the bipartite level with the recognised negotiating agent should have the same effect as that of a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings. The Commission further recommended that the recognition, once granted, should be valid for a period of four years to be co-terminus with the period of settlement; that no claim by anyother trade union/federation/centre for recognition should be entertained till at least 4 years have elapsed from the date of earlier recognition. The individual workers' authorisation for check-off should also be co-terminus with the tenure of recognition of the negotiating agent or college.[68]

SUB-SECTION (2): BINDING EFFECT OF THE AWARD OF AN ARBITRATOR

This sub-section was inserted by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956. It has been amended by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964. Before the amendment, an arbitration award was binding on the parties who referred the dispute to arbitration, after such an award became enforceable. Now, the result of the amendment is that such an award would be binding subject to the provisions of sub-s (3). In other words, in a case where a notification has been issued under sub-s (3A) of s 10A, the award of the arbitrator would not only be binding on the parties to the agreement who referred the dispute to arbitration but shall also bind the parties mentioned in cl (d) of sub-s (3).

In Nagdevi Kamgar Sabha, the binding effect of an arbitration award came in for the consideration of Bombay High Court. The facts of the case were: an arbitration agreement was entered into in September 1992 between a union of workmen and four associations trading establishments. The government issued a notification under s 10A(3). Another union (petitioner, in the case) submitted a charter of demands to the Commissioner of Labour on 28 August 1992 and when the arbitration agreement was arrived at between the seventh respondent and respondent Nos. 3 to 6, the petitioner-union protested before the Commissioner of Labour in writing, and also filed a writ petition before the Bombay High Court challenging the notification issued under s 10A(3). The Commissioner of Labour declined to make a reference in respect of the charter of demands raised by the petitioner on the ground that arbitral proceedings were to take place in pursuance of the notification under Section 10-A and that the petitioner could raise a dispute before the arbitrator under Section 10-A(3) of the Act. The writ petition was disposed of by a learned single Judge recording the agreement between the parties that the petitioner would be entitled to represent its workers and would be entitled to be heard before the Board of Arbitrators. In another writ petition filed by the petitioner against the refusal by the labour commissioner to refer the dispute, the single judge directed the arbitrator to arbitrate upon the dispute raised by the petitioner union as well. Before the Board of Arbitrators, the petitioner was impleaded as a party. The Board of Arbitrators, however, declined to issue notices in respect of 700 workers who had been left out of the purview of the arbitration. The Board of Arbitrators made an award dated 29 October 1994. The petitioner thereupon filed another writ petition challenging the validity of the award. The employers' association, respondent Nos. 3 to 7 also challenged the award by filing writ petitions. One of the issues canvassed before the High Court was the extension of the award to all the workmen and the establishments set out in the petitioner's application before the Board of Arbitrators dated 20 March 1993. Rejecting the contention, Chandrachud J held that in view of the admitted fact that no notification was issued under s 10A(3A), the operation of the said award could not be extended to other establishments, which were not parties to the original arbitration agreement that was published by the Government under s 10A (3) in September 1992.[69]

(i) Settlements arrived at in the Course of Conciliation Proceedings and Awards

The original s 18 has been renumbered as the present s 18(3) by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956. This provision with respect to the binding effect, places the 'settlements arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' at par with the awards made by the adjudicatory authorities. The combined effect of cll (a) to (d) of this sub-section is that the 'settlements arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings', or the award made by the adjudicatory authorities, viz, labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals or an arbitrator [where a notification under sub-s (3A) of s 10A has been issued] shall be binding on the following persons:

(i) all parties to the industrial dispute [section 18(3)(a)];

(ii) all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute, unless the authority before whom the proceedings are going on, records its opinion that such parties were summoned without proper cause [section 18(3)(b)];

(iii) the heirs, successors or assigns of the employer in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates [section 18(3)(c)]; and

(iv) all persons who were employed in the establishment or a part thereof on the date of the dispute, and all persons who become subsequently employed in the establishment or a part thereof [section 18(3)(d)].

Such settlements or awards bind not only the employer who is actually a party to the industrial dispute, but also his heirs, successors or assigns in respect of that particular establishment.[70] A settlement as a whole is binding on the parties, not parts thereof only. In other words, those who invoke s 18(3) are not entitled to seek the implementation of a settlement with the reservation treating parts of the terms as binding on them and parts of it not binding.[71]

Binding on All Parties to the Industrial Dispute:

This clause makes a settlement arrived at 'in the course of conciliation proceedings' and an award of a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal or of an arbitrator [in a case where a notification under sub-s (3A) of s 10A has been issued], binding on all parties to the dispute. Law gives greater sanctity to settlements than it gives to awards. Therefore, industrial law does not contemplate any interference with the finality of a settlement and compels a settlement to run on for the period mentioned in the settlement itself and neither party is permitted to challenge that settlement during the period of its operation.[72] A settlement arrived at even by an unregistered union is binding on the parties to such a settlement.[73] The principle behind this is that a minority shall not be allowed to jeopardise the right of a majority,[74] and in the interest of uniformity and industrial peace such a settlement should bind all the parties.[75] The object of giving extended application to a settlement 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' is to uphold the sanctity of such settlement and to discourage an individual employee or a minority union from scuttling the settlement. In the language of Ahmadi J:

> There is an underlying assumption that a settlement reached with the help of a conciliation officer must be fair and reasonable and can, therefore, safely be made binding not only on the workmen belonging to the union signing the settlement but also on others.[76]

Such a settlement has been put at par with an award. In ITC, the Supreme Court reiterated that a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, being a product of collective bargaining, is entitled to due weight and consideration. It cannot be ignored unless it is demonstrably unjust, unfair or the result of mala fides. A settlement extending benefits of life pension only to employees retiring after a particular date and excluding those who retired before the said date could not be a ground to characterise the settlement as unjust or unfair. A settlement arrived at under s 12(3) carries a presumption that it is just and fair. It is binding on all the parties to the dispute as well as the other workmen in the establishment to which the dispute relates and all other persons who may be subsequently employed in the establishment. An individual employee cannot seek to wriggle out of the settlement merely because it does not suit him.[77] A minority union has no locus standi to challenge a settlement arrived at between the management and the majority union in the course of conciliation proceedings under s 12(3) r/w s 18(3) of the Act.[78]

Power to Summon Parties to Appear:

The original parties to an industrial dispute are those parties that are mentioned in the order of reference and none other.[79]There is no sanction in the Act which expressly empowers a tribunal to add parties to the proceedings. However, such power is necessarily to be implied from s 18. From the provisions of cl (b), it is to be implied that the tribunal has power to summon parties other than parties to a reference to appear in the proceedings before it as parties to the dispute. This has a reference to proper and necessary parties who need not necessarily belong to the category of employer and workmen.[80] A necessary or proper party to a dispute referred for adjudication can be summoned at the instance of one of the parties or suo motu by the tribunal and the award eventually passed will be binding on the party so summoned unless the tribunal records that the said party was summoned without proper cause.[81] In Brahmaputra Tea, the Supreme Court held that where a receiver was appointed with respect to a tea company and an official liquidator was appointed, the labour court should have issued notices to either or both of them as it was entitled to, and then should have proceeded to consider, as to whether any reliefs could be granted to the workmen in view of the provisions of s 18 which clearly visualise parties being summoned to appear before the labour court.[82] Though the power to implead a party to adjudication does not fall under any of the four heads enumerated in s 11(3), there is abundant authority that the provisions of s 18(3) of the Act vest an implied authority in the industrial tribunals to implead parties. This power of the tribunals is similar to that under O I, r 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 to add necessary and proper parties to a dispute[83] on whom an award shall be binding.[84]The power implied in this provision is to summon such a party. There is no form of summons prescribed so far. The tribunal, however, may issue summons in a form it deems fit and proper under s 11 (1) and follow such procedure with regard to it as it may think fit, until the rules are framed under the Act, which deal with the matter of summons, etc.[85]

Parties cannot be added to Enlarge the Scope of Reference:

The power to summon and add other parties to the dispute which is implied in s 18(3)(b), cannot, however, be exercised by the industrial tribunal so as to enlarge materially the scope of the reference itself, because basically the jurisdiction of the tribunal to deal with an 'industrial dispute' is derived solely from the order of reference passed by the appropriate government under s 10(1) of the Act. What the tribunal can consider in addition to the points of dispute specified in the order of reference, are only the matters incidental to the said dispute; and that naturally suggests certain obvious limitations on the implied power of the tribunal to add parties to the reference before it, purporting to exercise its implied powers under this clause. If it appears to the tribunal that a party to an 'industrial dispute' named in the order of reference does not completely or adequately represent the interest either on the side of the employer, or on the side of the employees, it may direct that other persons should be joined who would be necessary to represent such interest. If the employer named in a reference does not wholly represent the interest of the employer as such, other persons who are interested in the undertaking of the employer may be joined. Similarly, if unions specified in a reference do not represent all the employees of an undertaking, it may be open to the tribunal to add such other unions as it may deem necessary.[86]A receiver of a factory is not a party to the dispute even if he has terminated the services of a workman because the workman is the employee of the factory owner and not of the receiver. The receiver can act only on behalf of the suit-parties and not on his own behalf and he does not step into the shoes of the owner and unless specifically directed does not carry on the business in the usual course.[87] The terms of reference in any particular case determine the amplitude of the jurisdiction as well as the scope of powers exercisable in such a case. The power of the tribunal to summon parties is narrow and limited and is confined to cases where the summoning of the parties is necessary to make the adjudication of the dispute, as referred, effective and enforceable. The Act does not vest any power in an industrial adjudicator to summon or implead the heirs or the legal representatives of a deceased workman and to entertain their claims on behalf of the estate of the deceased workman and to permit further prosecution of the proceedings. To concede such power will result in a wholesale substitution of an 'industrial dispute' as referred by another dispute between the heirs of the deceased workman and the employer which is not permissible and would be outside the purview of the Act.[88]

Principles governing the joinder of parties:

The test always must be: Is the addition of a party necessary to make adjudication itself effective and enforceable? Conversely, the test may well be, would non-joinder of a party make adjudication proceedings ineffective and unenforceable? It is in the light of this test that the implied power of the tribunal to add parties must be held to be limited. The implied power of the tribunal to summon additional parties is confined only to cases where such addition appears to be necessary for making a reference complete and an award effective and enforceable. Such a power would not be exercised to extend the scope of the reference and to bring in matters which are not the subject-matter thereof, and which cannot be incidental to the dispute which has been referred.[89] Before impleading a party in a dispute, the tribunal should record a finding that it is a necessary party to the dispute under O 1, r 10(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. For instance, where a party who has purchased property from the vendor, ie, owner of a closed industry who is a party to the dispute in regard to lockout declared by him, the tribunal must record a finding that the purchaser who is sought to be impleaded must be a person held to be successor-in-interest. Without such a finding, the tribunal cannot validly implead a person as a necessary party.[90] The parties whose presence is not necessary for the adjudication of a dispute which is pending before a tribunal, cannot be parties who can be summoned by the tribunal under the sub-section.[91] In a case where two unions raise industrial disputes and one of them settles the dispute raised by it while the other one let the matter be referred to adjudication on account of the dispute having been settled, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the former union is not a necessary party for adjudication.[92] But the correctness of this view is not free from doubt.

Section 18 of the Act empowers an adjudicator to summon the parties to the dispute and all other parties to appear in the adjudication proceedings as parties to the dispute before it. In Bhagwan Dass Chopra, the Supreme Court felt it necessary to evolve a reasonable procedure to deal with cases in which, a devolution of interest takes place during the pendency of a proceeding arising under the Act. The court considered it reasonable to hold that in every case of transfer, devolution, merger, takeover or a scheme of amalgamation under which the rights and liabilities of one company or corporation stand transferred to or devolve upon another company or corporation either under a private treaty, or a judicial order or under a law, the transferee company or corporation as a successor-in-interest becomes subject to all the liabilities of the transferor company or corporation and becomes entitled to all the rights of the transferor company or corporation subject to the terms and conditions of the contract of transfer or merger, the scheme of amalgamation and the legal provisions as the case may be under which such transfer, devolution, merger, takeover or amalgamation, as the case may be, may have taken place. Hence, the transferee company subject to such terms becomes liable to be impleaded or becomes entitled to be impleaded in place of or in addition to the transferor company or corporation in any action, suit or proceeding filed against the transferor company or corporation by a third party and that whatever steps have already taken place in those proceedings will continue to operate against and be binding on the transferee company or corporation in the same way in which they operate against a person on whom any interest has devolved in any of the ways mentioned in O XXII, r 20 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subject of course to any terms in the contract of transfer or merger, scheme of amalgamation or other relevant legal provisions governing the transaction under which the transferee company or corporation has become the successor-in-interest of the transferor company or corporation.[93] Where the validity of a settlement arrived at between the management and the union was referred for adjudication, the tribunal, while adjudicating the issue, did not bring on record the said union which was the party to settlement, Biswas J (for self and AK Mathur CJ) of the Calcutta High Court set aside the award of the tribunal on the ground that the award was vitiated by a jurisdictional error in so far as it did not bring on record the Mazdoor Union which was party to the settlement.[94]

Procedure to Summon Parties to Appear:

The law in respect of the power of the adjudicatory authorities, viz, labour courts, tribunals or national tribunals to summon a person other than the employer or workmen to appear as a party to the dispute, and the procedure to be followed for the exercise of such power has been summarised by the Calcutta High Court in Anil Kumar, as follows:

(1) An industrial dispute under the Act arises between an employer and his workmen, where the employer is concerned.

(2) Such a dispute can only be referred for adjudication by an order made by the appropriate government under the Act. There is no express provision in the Act or the rules framed thereunder, for adding any party to the adjudication proceedings other than parties to the reference, by the adjudicating court or tribunal.

(3) Such a power may be granted by prescribing rules and or making the relevant provision of the Code of Civil Procedure, but so far it has not been done.

(4) From the provisions of cl (b) of sub-s (3) of s 18 of the Act, it is to be implied that the tribunal has power to summon parties other than parties to the order of reference, to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute. This has a reference to proper and necessary parties, as such parties need not necessarily belong to the category of employer or workmen.

(5) The power to be implied from the provisions of cl (b) is to summon such a party. The form of summons has not yet been prescribed, but under sub-s (1) of s 11, the tribunal may issue summons in its own form, and follow such procedure with regard to it as it may think fit, until rules framed under the Act deal with such matter.

(6) Form D1 is not an appropriate form of summons for that purpose.

(7) Clause (b) of sub-s (3) of s 18 clearly contemplates that not only should there be such a summon but that the party summoned should have an opportunity to show that he has been summoned without proper cause. Such an opportunity be given when the party is added as a party without any notice to him, and he is compelled to join in the whole reference proceedings.

(8) It is not necessary to add such a party at all, but it is sufficient to summon such a party to appear in the proceedings as party to the dispute. However, after the summons has been served, or a show cause notice why such a summons should not be served and he has an opportunity of showing cause, it would not be illegal to put him formally on the records as a party if the tribunal thinks that it would be more convenient for the purposes of the adjudication proceedings.[95]

A company went into liquidation and its Managing Director, PG Brookes, was appointed as a receiver. The workmen's union applied to the tribunal to implead the receiver for the reason that he had taken possession of all the assets of the company and further that some financial commitments were involved in the issues; therefore it was necessary to implead the receiver. The industrial tribunal accordingly impleaded the receiver. It was held that s 18(3)(b) by necessary implication, gives power to the tribunal to add parties.[96] There was an industrial dispute between the workers of 65 textile mills and their managements regarding compensation for involuntary unemployment caused to the workers. One of the mills applied to the industrial tribunal to summon and implead the Government of Madras as a party to the proceedings before it. It was held that the tribunal had sufficient authority to summon and implead the government.[97] An industrial dispute between the Delhi Cloth Mills and a few other textile mills on one hand, and their workmen on the other represented by Kapra Ekta Union, was referred to the adjudication. A petition was made by the Textile Mazdoor Sangh to be added as a party to the industrial dispute. The tribunal allowed the petition and impleaded the Sangh as a party. The Punjab High Court held that the tribunal was vested with the power under s 18(3)(b) to implead such parties.[98] In an industrial dispute between Parry & Co, and their workmen, the workmen applied to the tribunal for impleading the contractors of the employers as a party to the dispute. The tribunal accordingly impleaded the said contractors and subsequently made an award granting certain reliefs against the said contractors. It was held that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to give an award against the said contractors. The Government had referred one dispute, while the tribunal decided another one. Nothing in s 18(3) can possibly be construed as authorising a tribunal to enlarge the ambit or alter the character of a dispute referred for adjudication under section 10 of the Act.[1]

In CRO Canteen, an industrial dispute between workmen employed in a canteen and the canteen management was referred for adjudication. The workmen applied to the industrial tribunal to implead the factory management as a party to the industrial dispute, alleging that their real employer was the company, and not the canteen committee. The tribunal on evidence on record found that the real employer was not the company and hence dismissed the application. In writ proceeding it was held that in view of the findings arrived at by the industrial tribunal, its order rejecting the application to implead the company as a party to the industrial dispute could not be interfered with. However, liberty was given to the petitioner for making a second application for impleading the company as a respondent on any ground other than that the company is the real employer of the concerned workmen.[2] The demand for amendment of the Provident Fund Rules was referred for adjudication. The provident fund vested in the trustees under the Rules of the Provident Fund Scheme. Held, the trustees of Provident Fund in the circumstances could be summoned to appear as parties to such disputes.[3] An industrial dispute in regard to a claim for bonus between workmen and an employer 'X' was referred for adjudication.

Employer 'X' contended that 'B' is the real employer and that under the terms of the contract, the latter is liable to meet the claim of bonus by the concerned employees. Held, the employer 'B' in the circumstances could not be impleaded as a party to the pending dispute. Such questions are not incidental to the main dispute referred for adjudication.[4]

An industrial dispute in regard to various service conditions between the workmen and management of an electric supply undertaking was referred for adjudication. Pending such reference, the licence of the company to manufacture and supply energy was revoked by the State Government, and the properties and assets of the company were sold to the State Electricity Board, under an agreement, inter alia, providing for sale of a substantial portion of the machinery of the undertaking to the Board. The Board further had option to take such of the orders and contracts of the company as selected by it. But the Board was not liable to fulfil contracts or obligations of the company in respect of supply of energy. The assets of the undertaking were sold free from all incumbrances. Sale and purchase prices were determined in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Electricity Act 1910. The Board was not under any obligation to meet the claims of the employees of the company, or to take over or employ any employee of the company. On revocation of its licence, the company terminated the services of all the employees paying them retrenchment compensation under s 25 FF of the Industrial Disputes Act. It was held that in the circumstances, the Board could not be considered as a successor-in-interest of the company, even though there was continuity and identity of the company. The Board in the circumstances was not considered necessary or proper party, even though there were continuity and identity of the company. The order of the industrial tribunal impleading the Board as a party to the adjudication proceedings pending between the concerned employees and the company was quashed by a writ of certiorari.[5]

In Udaipur Phosphates, a few employees were retrenched by the transferor-employer. In the subsequent transfer of the undertaking, the transferee-employer signed a 'Memo of Understanding' agreeing to employ the existing employees of the transferor-employer. A single judge of the Gujarat High Court held that the tribunal would be justified in adding the transferee-employer as a party to the proceedings, only after it comes to the conclusion that the retrenchment effected by the transferor-employer prior to the transfer of undertaking was invalid.[6] Where, in a dispute between a contract worker and the contractor running a canteen in HMT factory, the Government impleaded the company as a party to the dispute, by a subsequent order and on the request made by the worker, it was held that the state government had no authority or power to implead another party on the request of one of the parties to the dispute, more so, in the face of a direction issued by the Division Bench to the tribunal to decide the dispute between the two parties according to the original order of reference.[7] If the labour court considers that the presence of a party is necessary for the effective adjudication and enforcement of the award, it has implied power to add or admit a party to the industrial dispute. Where the promotion of a few employees was challenged by certain others through a civil suit and, during its pendency, by raising simultaneously an industrial dispute, the application of the first category of employees (who were promoted) seeking to be impleaded as necessary parties cannot be refused by the labour court in the interests of effective adjudication of the dispute.[8] But such power cannot be exercised by the tribunal to enlarge the scope of reference.[9]

The management of the company is not a relevant or necessary party to the dispute relating to the termination of the service of a workman employed by the cooperative society running the industrial canteen, as the workman was neither appointed nor terminated by the management.[10] Where the labour court directed the Chairman-cum-Managing Director to be impleaded as a party in a dispute where the management contended that there was no employer-employee relationship between the company and the workman whose services were terminated and that he was in the personal employment of the Chairman-cum-Managing Director, the High Court quashed the direction of the labour court holding that the said direction virtually amounts to amending the terms of reference. The High Court further held that the onus of proving that the workman was not the employee of the company lies on the management.[11]In a case where the labour court passed an order under s 33C(2) against the Bay of Bengal Programme of United Nations, which enjoyed legal immunity under the United Nations (Privileges and Immunities) Act 1947, the High Court held that it is the Government which is answerable to such a claim against the organisation and accordingly ordered that the Central Government stood impleaded as the opposite party in the proceedings before labour court[12]

Extended Operation of Settlements:

The whole policy of s 18 appears to be to give an extended operation to settlements arrived at 'in the course of conciliation proceedings', and that is the object with which four categories of workmen on whom such settlements are binding are specified in s 18(3) of the Act.[13]It is manifest that cll (a) and (b) have been given extended meaning by the introduction of cll (c) and (d) to s 18(3) of the Act.[14]

Heirs, successors or assigns:

Sub-clause (c) makes a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings, and the awards binding on the 'heirs, successors or assigns' of the employer in respect of the establishments to which the dispute relates, whether or not they were summoned to appear before the tribunal as parties to the dispute. But a settlement or an award will not bind the heirs, successors or assigns of an employer if at the time of the settlement reference or the award, they were minors.[15] This provision has been enacted with a view to checkmate the devices to avoid the liability under settlements and awards by transfer of establishments. In Anakapalle CAIS, a company manufacturing sugar which was running at a loss was contemplating to shift its mills to another locality. The local cane-growers formed a co-operative society and purchased the machinery and the business of the company. The company agreed to pay statutory compensation to its employees. The society did not purchase the goodwill of the company nor its outstandings and liabilities. The dispute with respect to 49 permanent employees and 103 seasonal employees who were not absorbed into the service of the co-operative society, was referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication. On a preliminary objection being raised, the tribunal held that the society was a 'successor-in-interest' of the company, and gave the relief of re-employment to the concerned employees. In appeal, the Supreme Court discussed various aspects of the question. Then after enumerating a number of factors to be taken into consideration for deciding the question whether one party is the successor-in-interest of another, the court observed that 'the decision of the question must ultimately depend upon the evaluation of all the relevant factors and it cannot be reached by treating anyone of them as of overriding or conclusive significance.[16] In Brahmaputra Tea, the official liquidator conveyed, by a registered sale deed, the equity of redemption in three tea gardens to a purchaser along with certain other items of machinery. The sale by the official liquidator, acting on behalf of the tea company, was specifically of the equity of redemption owned by the company and was subject to the mortgage decree and other liabilities payable up to the date of sale. In view of the facts and circumstances of the case and the recitals in the sale deed, following the tests laid down in Anakapalle case, the court held that the purchaser could not be said to be the successor-in-interest of the tea company because what was purchased by him was only the equity of redemption and part of the assets of the tea company in respect of which the official liquidator was still functioning.[17]

Factors to be considered for treating Transferee as Successor-in-interest:

This provision imposes liabilities of an award not only on an employer in the industrial dispute but also his heirs and successors or assignees. To enforce this liability against a transferee, he must be a successor-in-interest. A person can be called a successor-in-interest only if the prior business is taken over as a going concern with all its assets and liabilities. Therefore, before impleading a party, the tribunal should record a finding that the person proposed to be impleaded is successor-in-interest of the employer, and without such finding, the tribunal cannot implead a person as a necessary party to the dispute. A person can be called a successor-in-interest only if the prior business is taken over as a going concern with all its assets and liabilities. But where the entire business is not taken over, only land and buildings are purchased for starting altogether a new business and the plant and machinery is left to the vendor's disposal, the purchaser cannot be considered a successor or assignee of the old business.[18] In Anakapalle CAIS (supra), the Supreme Court has stated the following illustrative tests:

(i) Did the purchaser purchase the whole of the business?

(ii) Was the business purchased as a going concern at the time of the sale transaction?

(iii) Is the business purchased carried on at the same place as before?

(iv) Is the business carried on without a substantial break in time?

(v) Is the business carried on by the purchaser the same or similar to the business in the hands of the vendor?

(vi) If there has been a break in the continuity of the business, what is the nature of the break and what were the reasons responsible for it?

(vii) What is the length of the break?

(viii) Has goodwill been purchased?

(ix) Is the purchase only of some parts and the purchaser having purchased the said parts, purchased some other new parts and started a business of his own which is not the same as the old business but is similar to it?

But these tests are merely illustrative and by no means exhaustive or exclusive of one other. For applying these tests to a particular case, the following observations of the court provide the guidelines:

> These and all other relevant factors have to be borne in mind in deciding the question as to whether the purchaser can be said to be a successor-in-interest of the vendor for the purpose of industrial adjudication. It is hardly necessary to emphasise in this connection that though all the facts to which we have referred by way of illustration are relevant, it would be unreasonable to exaggerate the importance of anyone of these facts or to adopt the inflexible rule that the presence or absence of anyone of them is decisive of the matter one way or the other. If industrial adjudication were to insist that a purchaser must purchase the whole of the property of the vendor concern before he can be regarded as a successor-in-interest, it is quite likely that just an insignificant portion of the property may not be the subject-matter of the conveyance and it may be urged that the exclusion of the said fraction precludes industrial adjudication from treating the purchaser as a successor-in-interest. Such a plea, however, cannot be entertained for the simple reason that in deciding this question, industrial adjudication will look at the substance of the matter and not be guided solely by the form of the transfer. What we have said about the entirety of the property belonging to the vendor concern, will apply also to the good-will which is an intangible asset of any industrial concern. If good-will along with the rest of the tangible property has been sold, that would strongly support the plea that the purchaser is a successor-in-interest, but it does not follow that if good-will has not been sold, that alone will necessarily show that the transferee is not a successor-in-interest. The decision of the question must ultimately depend upon the evaluation of all the relevant factors and it cannot be reached by treating anyone of them as of overriding or conclusive significance.[19]

Establishment to which the Dispute Relates:

The words 'establishment to which the dispute relates' have been significantly used in cll (c) and (d). This indicates that the settlements or awards mentioned in this sub-section would bind the employer under cl (c) only with respect to the establishment to which the industrial dispute under reference relates. An illustration of this is to be found in the decision of the Supreme Court in Indian Oxygen.[20] In AEI, the Calcutta High Court held that, from the use of the expression 'establishment' in s 18(3)(c), it is fairly clear that the establishment must exist in some definite or indefinite form. As a result of taking over of various establishments of insurance companies doing the life insurance business, the establishment run by the Life Insurance Corporation is a unified establishment, and the old establishments have not retained their identity. Consequent upon such merger of the various establishments, it is not possible to say that any old establishment as such has continued. In this view of the law, the awards and settlements which governed the employers and employees in relation to various insurance companies, before the establishments were taken over by the Life Insurance Corporation, were held to have ceased to bind the Life Insurance Corporation under s 18(3) of the Act.[21] In Arunachalam, a purchaser who purchased only four buses along with the route permits from a motor service company, was held not to be a successor-in-interest of the previous owner, because it did not purchase the entire business of the previous operator whose identity had been extinguished by selling his business to several purchasers.[22]

Practice and Procedure:

For the application of s 18(3)(c) of the Act, it is necessary that, if the award is sought to be enforced against a person who is not a party to the award, such person must be either an heir, successor or an assignee of the establishment to which the dispute relates. In the absence of evidence to show that the parties against whom certain sums are directed to be recovered under a certificate issued under s 33C(1) were heirs, successors or assignees of the employer, the certificate issued by such authority would be bad in law.[23]

Binding on Present and Future Workmen:

This clause appears to have been designed to meet some difficulties implicit in the collective bargaining with a floating army of workmen, a few of whom may not choose to be the members of any union and, one or more unions may, for reasons of their own, not like to reach a settlement. Legislature contemplates making such settlement binding, even on such indifferent or unwilling workmen, if the conciliation officer brings it about bona fide to ensure industrial peace.[24] From the language of this clause, it is clear that where a party referred to in cl (a) or cl (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates, on the date of the dispute, and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part thereof, would be bound by the settlement or the award. In order to bind the workmen, it is not necessary to show that the said workmen belong to the union which was a party to the dispute before the conciliator. The whole policy of s 18 appears to be to give an extended operation to an award and a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings or adjudication proceedings', and that is the object with which the four categories of persons bound by such awards and settlements are specified.[25] The expression 'any party bound by the award' in s 19(6) refers to and includes all persons bound by any award under this section.[26] There is a significant difference between the provisions of cl (c) and cl (d). Clause (c) contemplates that a settlement or an award shall be binding not only upon the employer, but also upon his heirs, successors or assignees in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates. But no reference to the heirs, successors or assigns of a workman is to be found in cl (d). Evidently, it was not the intention of the legislature to provide for adjudication of an industrial dispute at the instance of heirs or legal representatives of a deceased workman. No duty, therefore, is cast on the tribunal to bring on record, the heirs or legal representatives of a deceased workman.[27]

In Anthony Gomes, conciliation proceedings were initiated in connection with a dispute relating to the dismissal of the workman. But subsequently, a settlement was arrived at between the union and the management, relating to certain disputes including the dispute relating to the dismissal of the workman despite the fact that he had ceased to be a member of the union at that time. In terms of the said settlement, the employment of the workman ceased with effect from a particular date and he was to be given ex gratia amount equivalent to 40 per cent of his basic wages and dearness allowance for the period of two months together with one month's wages inclusive of dearness allowance as an additional ex-gratia payment and the provident fund dues of the workman were to be paid in accordance with the company's rules. Accordingly, the company discharged the workman from service in terms of the settlement. A single judge of the High Court held that the discharge of the workman being by a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings was binding on him.[28] This holding does not appear to be correct law. Since, the workman raised a dispute on his own under s 2A without involving the union, it was not open to the union to club the said dispute with other disputes which were admitted in conciliation and which nullified the conciliation proceedings initiated into the dispute raised by the workman under s 2A. In Andhra Bank Offices Union, the AP High Court held that, in order to be binding, a settlement should essentially be between the employer and the workmen. In other words, a settlement between the employer and non-workmen or a union not representing the workmen will not be binding on the parties.[29] In Punjab National Bank, the facts were: a reference was made by the Government in the following terms:

> Whether the demand of the Commission Agents or as the case may be Deposit Collectors employed in the banks listed in Annexure that they are entitled to the pay scale and other service conditions admissible to regular clerical employees of these banks is justified? If not to what relief the workers concerned entitled to and from which date?

Several banks including the Indian Banks Association (IBA) were impleaded in the said reference. The tribunal passed an award on 22 December 1988, in which it opined that the deposit collectors were 'workmen' and as such the reference was maintainable. The tribunal, in its award, directed absorption of eligible deposit collectors, who are less than 45 years of age as on 3 October 1980, if otherwise eligible, and, to others, extension of benefits as conferred by the Award, i.e., full back wage of Rs. 750/- linked to minimum deposit of Rs. 7500/ p.m., (ii) Incentive remuneration @ 2% for deposit collected above Rs. 7500/ p.m., (iii) Conveyance allowance of Rs. 50/ p.m. for deposit collected less than Rs. 10,000/ and Rs. 100/ p.m. for deposit collected over Rs. 10,000/ p.m., and (iv) Gratuity equal to 15 days commission for each year of service rendered. In the writ petition filed by the Banks against the award, the High Court had set aside that part of the award which directed absorption of the Deposit Collectors, while upholding the other part thereof. Appeals to Supreme Court soon followed both from the Banks and the workmen on different grounds including (i) non-maintainability of the award, (ii) not being given individual notice to the employees, and (iii) the binding nature of the award on the workmen who were not put on individual notice. Rejecting the contention of respondent-workman that he was not bound by the award, Sinha J (for self and Bhandari J) observed:

> From a perusal of clause (d) of sub section (3) of Section 18 of the Industrial Disputes Act, it is, thus, evident that all workmen who are employed in the establishment or who subsequently become employed in that establishment would also be bound by an award made by an industrial Tribunal. The management as also the workmen were parties to the said award. Hence, respondents cannot be heard to say that the award was not binding on them only because they were not parties.. .. In an industrial dispute referred to by the Central Government which has an all India implication, individual workman cannot be made parties to a reference. All of them are not expected to be heard. The Unions representing them were impleaded as parties. They were heard. Not only the said Unions were heard before the High Court, as noticed hereinbefore from a part of the judgment of the High Court, they had preferred appeals before this court. Their contentions had been noticed by this Court. As the award was made in presence of the Unions, in our opinion, the contention of respondents that the award was not binding on them cannot be accepted. The principles of natural justice were also not required to be complied with as the same would have been an empty formality. The Court will not insist on compliance of the principles of natural justice in view of the binding nature of the award. Its application would be limited to a situation where the factual position or legal implication arising thereunder is disputed and not where it is not in dispute or cannot be disputed. If only one conclusion is possible, a writ would not issue only because there was a violation of the principle of natural justice.[30]

Settlement which runs counter to the statutory provisions:

In Oswal Agro, the facts disclosed that, after filing an application for permission under s 25-O, the company entered into a settlement with the workmen, which was challenged by the workmen in the High Court successfully. Dismissing the appeal filed by the management, Sinha J (for self and Hegde J) observed:

> A settlement within the meaning of Section 2(p) read with sub- section (3) of Section 18 of the Act undoubtedly binds the workmen but the question which would arise is, would it mean that thereby the provisions contained in Sections 25-N and 25 -0 are not required to be complied with? The answer to the said question must be rendered in the negative. A settlement can be arrived at between the employer and workmen in case of an industrial dispute. An industrial dispute may arise as regard the validity of a retrenchment or closure or otherwise. Such a settlement however, as regard retrenchment or closure can be arrived at provided such retrenchment or closure has been effected in accordance with law. Requirements of issuance of a notice in terms of Sections 25-N and 25 -0, as the case may, and/or a decision thereupon by the appropriate Government are clearly suggestive of the fact that thereby a publicpolicy has been laid down. The State Government before granting or refusing such permission is not only required to comply with the principles of natural justice by giving an opportunity of hearing both to the employer and the workmen but also is required to assign reasons in support thereof and is also required to pass an order having regard to the several factors laid down therein. One of the factors besides others which is required to be taken into consideration by the appropriate Government before grant or refusal of such permission is the interest of the workmen. The aforementioned provisions being imperative in character would prevail over the right of the parties to arrive at a settlement. Such a settlement must conform to the statutory conditions laying down a public policy. A contract which may otherwise be valid, however, must satisfy the tests of public policy not only in terms of the aforementioned provisions but also in terms of Section 23 of the Indian Contract Act.. .. Indisputably, in this case, the industrial undertaking belonging to the appellant herein attracts the provisions of Chapter V-B of the Act and consequently the provisions referred to in Section 2(s) including Section 25-J shall apply in relation thereto.[31] (Paras 15 & 19).

Different Unions concerned with Conciliation Proceedings:

Occasionally peculiar situations arise in the process of settlement of industrial disputes on account of trade union rivalries. The same establishment may have more than one union. Sometimes, each one of such unions may enter into negotiations with the employer with respect to certain or some demands of the workmen and likewise, each one of such unions may go before the conciliator for conciliation of the demands. It also happens that the negotiations with one of the unions in the course of conciliation proceedings may succeed and end in a settlement whereas there may be no settlement with the other unions. The question naturally will arise whether such a settlement will bind the other unions, and the workmen in general in terms of s 18(1)(d). In Ramnagar Cane Sugar, the Supreme Court held that such a settlement will bind the workmen of the other unions as well as all other workmen who are employed on the date of the dispute and who may be subsequently employed in the establishment.[32] In Tiruchi-Srirangam, a single judge of the Madras High Court took the view that where there are identical disputes raised by two sets of workmen or there are relative unions before the same conciliation officer, they should be regarded as one dispute any settlement in such a situation will have to be arrived at, not between the management and some of the workmen only, but between the management and the entirety of the workmen who are parties to the dispute either by themselves or through their unions before the same officer, so as to make the settlement come within the ambit of s 18(3) of the Act.[33] The attention of the High Court does not appear to have been drawn to the decision of the Supreme Court in Ramanagar Cane Sugar. The holding in Tiruchi-Srirangam is inconsistent with the holding of the Supreme Court in Ramanagar Cane Sugar and is wrong. If an industrial establishment has two unions, say 'A' and 'B', an agreement otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding between the management and the workers of union 'A' will be binding on the management and the workers of union 'A' only. But a settlement 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' will be binding on all the members of the other unions who were not parties to the agreement as well as by virtue of s 18(3)(d) of the Act.[34] In Pierce Leslie, a conciliation settlement was arrived at with the participation of only one of the two unions operating in the establishment. Both the unions had raised a demand with the employer; but only one union was invited for conciliation talks. In these circumstances, the Kerala High Court observed that it may be difficult to say that the settlement is a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Act.[35] But in Kerala Minerals, a single judge of the same High Court held that a union which has not put forth any demand cannot be said to raise any industrial dispute under s 12 and was not, therefore, entitled to participate in the conciliation proceedings. The fact that such a union was not invited to participate in the conciliation proceedings will not in any way vitiate the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings and such a settlement would be binding on all workers including those who may not owe allegiance to the participating union.[36]

Illustrations

Where some workmen after considering an offer, by a statutory corporation offering certain changes in the service conditions of its employees with an option to the employees to opt for the existing service conditions accepted it, it was not later on open to them to challenge the settlement agreement on the ground that most of the workmen who agreed to the change were not aware of its implications.[37] There were two unions: union 'A' and union 'B' in an establishment. But there was only one conciliation proceeding pending before the conciliation officer. No objection was taken by the union 'A' to the settlement that had been arrived at between union 'B' and the management in the course of the conciliation proceeding, despite the notice by the conciliation officer to the effect that the conciliation proceedings, were being heard by him in the matter of the dispute. In these circumstances, it was held that the settlement would come under s 18(3) and would be binding upon all the workmen including those who owed their allegiance to union 'A'.[38] A company had many branches in Kerala, Mysore and Madras states, including one in Cochin. A majority of the monthly paid employees were members of the Cochin Commercial Employees' Association. minority members of the Cochin office and a large number of employees of the company in other branches, were members of the Mercantile Employees' Association. In the course of a conciliation proceeding, the management entered into a settlement with the Mercantile Employees' Association in respect of a demand in the Cochin office. It was held that the Cochin Commercial Employees' Association could not question the validity of the agreement.[39] In a concern three unions represented the workmen and each one of them presented a charter of demand to the management. One of the unions arrived at a settlement with the management without reference to the other two. But regarding the demands made by the other two unions, the conciliation officer served notices on them. It was held that the settlement between the first union and the management did not bind the workmen who were not its members and also did not affect the rights of the members of the other two unions to raise the industrial dispute.[40] Where the dispute regarding additional bonus was raised by one of the unions and the conciliation officer recorded the settlement after holding conciliation proceedings in relation thereto, and the management in the circumstances of the case could negotiate for settlement only with that union, it was held that the settlement was binding on all the workmen of the establishment under s 18(3)(d) of the Act.[41]

Where a settlement was arrived at between the transferor-bank and its union providing for compassionate appointments to the heirs of its deceased employees, it was held that on a subsequent amalgamation, the transferee bank which had emerged as a result of the amalgamation would be liable to meet the contractual obligations flowing from the settlement entered into by the transferor bank, regardless of the fact that the transferee bank was an outsider (stranger) to the settlement (contract) between the transferor bank and its employees.[42] A settlement arrived at under s 12(3) between the management and four out of the five unions limiting the payment of lay-off compensation to the forty-five days as provided in s 25C is binding on all the workmen including those belonging to the union which is not party to the settlement; the workmen of the said union cannot invoke s 33C for computation and recovery of compensation for the period beyond forty-five days on the ground that the said settlement was not binding on them or on the ground that the statutory right given under s 25C could not be whittled down by a settlement to which they were not parties.[43]A settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings and executed between parties has a statutory force and is binding upon an unregistered trade union and its members. A suit by the unregistered union alleging that the terms of settlement are not fairly implemented is barred. The proper remedy is to seek reference for industrial adjudication under the Act.[44] A tripartite settlement arrived at between the management and the recognised union cannot be challenged by a section of the employees.[45] A settlement of disputes between the parties themselves should be preferred, where it could be arrived at, to industrial adjudication, as the settlement is likely to lead to more lasting peace than an award. A settlement is arrived at by the free will of the parties and is a pointer to there being goodwill between them. When there is a dispute that the settlement is not bona fide in nature or that it has been arrived at on account of fraud, misrepresentation or concealment of facts or even corruption and other inducements, it could be the subject-matter of an industrial dispute which an appropriate Government may refer for adjudication after examining the allegations as there is an underlying assumption that the settlement reached with the help of the conciliation officer must be fair and reasonable.[46]

In SC Adhikari, the Bombay High Court held that a clause in a settlement arrived at in the course of a conciliation proceeding under s 18(3) cannot be challenged in a writ petition. The court, however, observed that the petitioners could seek their remedy under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act.[47]The latter part of this decision is clearly flawed. In the case of a settlement arrived at in the course of a conciliation proceeding, the presumption is in favour of its fairness for the reason that the terms are settled with the help and under the supervision of a competent authority. In the face of this legal position, it is difficult to comprehend what was the remedy under the so-called provisions of the Act, which the learned Chief Justice was referring to! It is equally doubtful whether a term of such a settlement could at all be challenged by raising an industrial dispute, if that is what the observation implies, so long as the settlement is in operation. In Shyam Lal, the Supreme Court held that where a settlement was arrived at under ss 12(3) and 18(3) of the Act between the University and its employees providing that the employee would be posted as a clerk, the University cannot wriggle out of its obligations under the settlement and refuse regularisation of the service of the clerk based on qualifications prescribed by the Vice-chancellor, prior to entering into the settlement.[48] A settlement arrived at under s 18(3) by the union, who enjoyed the majority support of the workmen employed in two units of the company located at Hubli and Harihar, has an extended application and is binding on all the workmen of the establishment in both the units. The petitioner-union, having acquiesced in the practice and agreement under which the two units were to be represented as a single unit for the purpose of collective bargaining, cannot go back on its own stand and plead that the two units should be treated separately.[49] Where subsequent to the raising of a dispute by a few workmen, the management drew up a scheme for payment of compensation to the workmen before closing down the unit and signed a settlement with the union, as a consequence of which the workmen received the payments and resigned from service, thereafter the workmen who left the service cannot raise a dispute claiming that the said settlement was achieved through misrepresentation and that it was an unfair labour practice. Once the workmen resigned and accepted the stipulated amounts under the settlement, neither the service nor the dispute could survive, and the Government would be justified in refusing to refer the dispute for adjudication.[50] In Air India, the facts were that the management entered into a settlement with the recognised union under ss 12(3) and 18(3), which provided for a deduction from the wages of employees towards death benefit scheme. While the agreement was subsisting, the management stopped the said deduction, admittedly at the instance of the labour commissioner, on the ground that the individual workmen had not authorised the said deduction. The Bombay High Court held that when the recognised union negotiates with the employer, the workmen as individuals would not come into the picture and that the settlement was binding on all workmen and the employer was not justified in stopping the deductions unilaterally.[51]

Application of Awards:

There is nothing in s 18 to bar the adjudication of a dispute by the commissioner for workmen's compensation.[52] Further, this section will also not apply to a particular award, the decision of which is intended for a particular class of employees. Thus, if under an award a particular number of old workmen are to get a certain benefit, it does not ipso facto mean that all new entrants would be equally entitled to the benefit, when they have been by necessary implication, excluded from the operation of the award.[53]

'On the Date of the Dispute':

Section 18(3)(d) does not refer to the date of reference under s 10(1), but it refers to the date on which the industrial dispute arose. Thus, if a workman was in the employment of the company on the date on which the dispute arose, he becomes a party to the dispute, and being employed as such, the award is binding on him as well as his employer[54] The same principle applies to settlements.[55] Though an award is binding on every workman who was employed in the establishment on the date of the dispute, it cannot be assailed by an individual workman because at no stage, was he a party to the dispute in his individual capacity.[56] The industrial disputes except those falling under s 2A, postulate collective disputes. The awards, therefore, can only be assailed by the workmen in their collective character whether through a union or otherwise.

(ii) Settlements Arrived at in the Course of Conciliation Proceedings

The import and effect of the words 'in the course of conciliation proceedings', has been discussed under s 2(p). The mode and manner of arriving at 'settlements in the course of conciliation proceedings', has been discussed under s 12(3). Section 12 makes a distinction between a settlement 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' and a settlement 'arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings'. The legal effects of both kinds of settlements are not identical. Under s 18(3), a settlement 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' will be binding on all parties to the industrial dispute referred to in cll (a) to (d) of s 18(3) which in the case of the employer will include his heirs, successors or assignees in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates and in the case of a workman will include all persons who are employed in the establishment or part of the establishment on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in the establishment or part thereof. But the settlement arrived at between the management and workmen otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings will bind only the actual parties to the agreement in accordance with s 18(1) of the Act.[57] Intervention of the conciliation officer and his belief in the settlement being fair and reasonable, appears to be the basis of this provision which presently takes into account the impossibility of satisfying every section. It is the intervention of the conciliation officer that makes the difference between the settlement that is reached in the course of conciliation proceedings and the one reached otherwise than in conciliation proceedings and makes the former binding on a larger cross-section of the workmen. 'Therefore, a settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings with a recognised majority union will be binding on all workmen of the establishment and even to those who belong to the minority union which had objected to the same. To that extent, it departs from the ordinary law of contract. The object obviously is to uphold the sanctity of settlement reached with the active assistance of the conciliation officer and to discourage an individual employee or a minority union from scuttling the settlement. There is an underlying assumption that a settlement reached at with the help of the conciliation officer must be fair and reasonable and can, therefore, safely be made binding not only on the workmen belonging to the union signing the settlement, but also on others'.[58]

That is why a settlement arrived at 'in the course of conciliation proceedings is to be put on par with an award made by an adjudicatory authority'. In other words, such a settlement is binding in the same manner as the award of an adjudicatory authority. It is, therefore, assumed that the conciliation officer will not persuade any union to settle unless he is satisfied that the settlement is fair and reasonable and it is in the larger interest of industrial peace and in the interest of the workmen as a whole. The legislature has given statutory effect to such a settlement by preventing agitation of the same dispute by other workmen for the statutory period even if they do not happen to be a party to it and are found to have not been agreeable to the terms indicated therein. The circumstance, that the signatory union happens to represent majority of the workmen in a concern, is not relevant as long as the settlement has been arrived at bona fide with the mediation of the conciliation officer and its terms appear to be on the whole, reasonable and fair.[59] The settlement arrived at during the course of conciliation proceedings, however, binds the parties under this section only to the extent of the matters covered by the settlement. It cannot prevent the workmen from raising any dispute in future which was neither visualised at the time of the settlement nor covered by the settlement. In other words, the sanctity of settlement is confined to the terms of settlement which has been signed and sealed between the parties. But the concept of sanctity of a settlement cannot be extended to cover disputes or demands made on behalf of the workmen which are not specifically covered by such settlement. The general clauses in a settlement to the effect that no demands involving any monetary commitment will be entertained by the management and the settlement is deemed to be full and final settlement of all demands and the demands not referred to would be deemed to have been withdrawn would also not preclude the workmen from raising such other disputes as are not covered by the settlement. The words 'relating to monetary or financial commitment' cannot be stretched to an extent that the management is absolved forever of undertaking any financial obligation for the benefit of the workmen in view of the settlement arrived at. In such a situation, the question of monetary or financial commitment would be confined to the concept of the terms of settlement. But the management cannot render itself immune from assuming any financial obligation of any kind, as this cannot be borne out by interpretation of such clauses of a general nature. Similarly, the expression that the 'settlement is deemed to be full and final settlement of all demands made by the union and the demands which had not been made would be deemed to have been withdrawn also would have to be given a plausible interpretation—the settlement would be deemed to be full and final settlement in regard to all the demands which had been considered in the settlement'.[60]

For binding the parties, s 18 makes a distinction between a case of settlement without the aid of the recognized agency under the Act and the one arrived at with the help of it or which may be the result of the adjudication by a tribunal functioning under the Act.[61] The whole policy of s 18 appears to be to give an extended operation to the 'settlements' arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings and that is the object, with which the four categories of persons bound by such settlement are specified in s 18(3) of the Act.[62] 'In extending the operation of such a settlement beyond the parties thereto, sub-s (3) departs from the ordinary law of contract and gives effect to the principle of collective bargaining'.[63] The legal effects of both the kinds of settlements are not identical in that whereas the former binds, under the clear provisions of s 18(1), only the actual parties to the agreement; the latter binds the others also as specified in s 18(3), even though such persons were not parties to the dispute and joined the establishment subsequent to the settlement.[64]Section 18(1) is merely intended to cure the defect in the law and to make an agreement possible with reference to an industrial dispute, binding on the parties thereto. It is intended to go no further.[65] There is nothing in the section to justify an extended meaning being given to it, contrary to the ordinary law that a contract will bind only those that are parties to it. In other words, such a settlement would bind only those workers who were represented by the union at the time when the settlement was arrived at and not the workers who had ceased to be members of the union at the time when the settlement was arrived at. If it were to be binding on others as well, there was really no need for any reference in sub-s (3) to the binding nature of a conciliation settlement.[66]Section 18(3) specifically provides that a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' which has become enforceable, shall be binding on all the parties specified in cll (a), (b), (c) and (d). Clause (c) binds the 'heirs, successors or assignees' whereas a party referred to in cl (a) or (b) is an employer and cl (d) makes it clear that where a party referred to in cl (a) or (b) is composed of workmen, all persons, who were employed in the establishment or the part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates, on the date of the dispute, and all persons, who become subsequently employed in that establishment or part of the establishment, shall be bound by the settlement.[67] It is only by virtue of this provision that the settlement specified in the section becomes binding on persons not actually parties thereto.

In Barauni Refineries, the facts disclosed that a settlement was arrived at between the management and union providing, inter alia to the effect that the unions shall not raise any demand 'having financial burden on the corporation' was arrived at between the management and the workmen in the course of conciliation proceedings. Subsequently, the workmen sought to have the clause relating to superannuation age modified by raising the retiral age from 58 to 60 years. The court held that during the operation of the settlement it was not open to the workmen to demand change in the relevant certified Standing Orders because any upward revision of the age of superannuation would come in conflict with the settlement as the upward revision of superannuation would throw additional financial burden on the management.[68] In Motor Industries, a settlement between the employer company and the union provided that the parties would not resort to direct action, such as strike, go-slow, lock-out, etc without giving four days' notice. The workmen went on a spontaneous strike without giving the required notice and without there being any call from the association. The workmen took the stand that the settlement was between the management and the association, which was a distinct legal entity and that the obligation to give the notice was only on the association and not on the workmen and as such the strike by the workmen could not be called a strike in breach of the relevant term of the settlement. The Supreme Court rejected the contention and held that a settlement arrived at between an employer and a union representing the employees during the conciliation proceedings is binding not only on such union but also on the workmen whom it represents.[69] Similarly, in Ram Pukar Singh, the settlement was arrived at between the management and the union of the workmen in the course of conciliation proceedings. Pursuant to this settlement, the appellant employees were upgraded. Subsequently, another settlement was entered into between the management and the union for revision of the pay scales and under that settlement, the appellants received higher salary from the revised pay scales. Even then, they raised another dispute in which they took the stand that the aforesaid settlements were not binding on them because they were in a 'supervisory' category and not 'workmen'. Hence, the union had no right to represent them. The Supreme Court discountenanced these contentions holding that under the settlements, the workmen had not only received the benefits of arrears of salary but also of revised pay scales since then.

They could not have had these benefits if they were not workmen and, therefore, had considered themselves as belonging to a non-supervisory category. Since there was only one union representing all workmen during the relevant period, the appellants were bound by the settlements, whether they were members of the union or not.[70]

Where a dispute relating to the termination of service of a workman has been referred to adjudication under s 2A, it cannot be the subject-matter of a settlement between the union and the management without the consent of the concerned workman.[71] A settlement, in either case, by virtue of s 19(2) shall be binding on the parties for such period as may be agreed upon by them and, if no such period is agreed upon, it shall be binding for a period of six months from the date on which the memorandum of settlement has been signed by the parties to the dispute and shall continue to be binding until the expiry of two months from the date on which a notice in writing intimating an intention to terminate the settlement is given by one of the parties to the other party or parties to the settlement.[72] In order to be binding under s 18(3), a settlement must be one which is 'arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings'. A settlement arrived at between the management and the union representing the majority of the workmen will not cease to be a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings merely because the minority union has not signed it.[73] But the sanctity of the settlement under s 18(3) cannot be extended to cover the demands or disputes raised on behalf of the workmen which were neither visualised nor covered by the terms of settlement. In other words, even the settlement arrived at in the course of the conciliation proceedings has to be confined to its specific terms.[74] A settlement arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings shall bind only the parties to such settlement under s 18(1) and not others. A settlement arrived at with respect to an industrial dispute after that dispute has been referred for adjudication under s 10(1), cannot be a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings', even if such settlement has been arrived at with the mediation of a conciliation officer.[75]Likewise, where a settlement is arrived at before a conciliation officer, whose appointment has not been made by a notification in the Official Gazette of the 'appropriate government', will not be a 'settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings', as such an officer will not be a conciliation officer as appointed under s 4(1) of the Act.[76]

(iii) Binding Effect of Awards

The award of the adjudicatory authorities, viz, labour courts, tribunals and national tribunals and the arbitrators, under s 10A where a notification under sub-s (3A) of s 10A has been issued have been made binding of the parties mentioned in cll (a), (b), (c) and (d) of sub-s (3). Such awards will remain in operation as provided under s 19(3) after having become final under s 17(2). The effect of this is that as long as an award is not terminated after the period of its operation is over, it will remain binding on the parties. But there are two types of awards, viz,

(1) Where the subject-matter of the dispute is decided once for all; for instance, the question of legality of the action of discharge or dismissal of a workman. In such a case there is no question of the period of its operation or its being terminated by the parties. The award is binding once and for all.

(2) Where the subject-matter revives after the period of operation of the award is over, for instance, the question of fixation of wages or dearness allowance, in such cases after the period of operation of the award is over, a fresh dispute can be raised and referred under s 10.

It is clear that once an 'industrial dispute' is the subject-matter of adjudication, there can be no conciliation proceedings, before a conciliation officer or a board with respect to that dispute. Hence there can be no settlement arrived at 'in the course of conciliation proceedings' after an industrial dispute has been referred to an adjudicatory authority and is pending adjudication before it. However, there is nothing in the Act to prohibit a private settlement between the parties even during the course of the adjudicatory proceedings.[77] The parties, therefore, may arrive at a settlement between themselves and approach the adjudicator to make its award in terms of the settlement. It is now well settled that in such a case the tribunal will make an award in terms of the settlement.[78]Even though a dispute is referred to an adjudicator, he cannot refuse to accept the settlement made by the parties. There is no provision in the Act which gives power to the adjudicator to veto the settlement arrived at between the parties not even similar to one under O XXIII, r 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 in respect of compromises.[79] In DN Ganguly, the Supreme Court held that a reference once made to an adjudicator cannot be withdrawn or cancelled. It must, therefore, be adjudicated upon by the adjudicator. If the subject-matter of reference is settled between the parties, the settlement must come before the adjudicator finally disposes of the matter by making his award, even though the award may be in terms of the settlement. The Court observed:

> It would be very unreasonable to assume that the industrial tribunal would insist upon dealing with the dispute on the merits even after it is informed that the dispute has been amicably settled between the parties. There can be no doubt that if an industrial dispute before a tribunal is amicably settled, the tribunal would immediately agree to make an award in terms of the settlement between the parties.[80]

In Amalgamated Coffee, the Supreme Court held that a settlement arrived at between the parties during the pendency of the appeal before it, against the award of the industrial tribunal covering the same dispute was binding on the parties in preference to the award.[81] Even if there is a compromise between the parties which comes before the tribunal, the tribunal should bring its own judicial mind to bear upon such a compromise for determining whether it is fair, just and equitable between the parties as it is implicit in the word 'determination' that it should be judicial implying that the tribunal exercises its own judgment.[82] The principle that emerges is that a private settlement between the parties after having received the stamp of adjudication by the adjudicator loses the character of a 'settlement' as defined in s 2(p) and partakes the character of an award as defined in s 2(b) and becomes binding on the parties under s 18(3) instead of s 18(1). In this view of law, the observation of the Delhi High Court in Hindustan Housing, to the extent it suggests that it is not necessary for the industrial tribunal to bring his own judicial mind to bear upon the compromise to give it the character of 'determination' is not correct.[83]

SETTLEMENT - IF BARS REFERENCE OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE

A settlement as defined in s 2(p) will be binding upon the parties either under s 18(1) or 18(3), as the case may be, and it will remain in operation for the period as provided in s 19(2) of the Act. It will remain binding upon the parties as long as it is in operation. Since there is no specific provision in the Act prohibiting the raising of an 'industrial dispute' with regard to a matter which is the subject of a settlement arrived at under s 12 and is in operation in accordance with s 19(2) ; some conflict in judicial opinion has arisen on the question whether such a dispute can be referred for adjudication during the operation of the settlement. The Bombay High Court in Poona Mazdoor Sabha, held that despite the absence of any such specific provision, it is clear that neither an 'industrial dispute' can be raised with regard to the matters covered by the settlement nor can such matter be the subject-matter of a conciliation during the period of operation of the settlement.[84] A similar view has been taken by the Mysore High Court[85] and a single judge of the Calcutta High Court.[86] But the Orissa High Court in State Transport Service, on the other hand, has taken the view that since there is no specific provision prohibiting the raising of a fresh dispute with respect to the matter covered by an operating settlement, there can be no bar to raise such a dispute.[87]

The view of the Bombay, Mysore and Calcutta High Courts is correct and the view of the Orissa High Court is not correct. The Orissa High Court has contented itself by noticing the absence of any specific provision and gave no other reason for arriving at its conclusion and it completely lost sight of the scheme of the Act. The bar to the reference of a dispute covered by a settlement is the direct result of the legal position that when a dispute between the workers and the employer is concluded by a settlement which binds them, no industrial dispute relating to any item covered by the settlement can come into existence or can be apprehended, which can be referred by the Government under s 10 of the Act. It is only when a dispute exists or is apprehended that the question arises whether a reference should or should not be made. If during the period of operation of settlements, fresh disputes could be raised with respect to the subject-matter covered by such settlements, the purpose of the Act to achieve peaceful and harmonious industrial relations by settlements will be completely foiled. The object of ss 18 and 19 is to achieve industrial peace with regard to the subject-matter of the settlements for the duration of the settlement agreement. Obviously, therefore, if there is to be industrial peace for the period contemplated then the parties bound by a settlement cannot be allowed to raise an 'industrial dispute' with regard to the matters covered by that settlement. Section 18(3) places a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' at par with the awards of the adjudicatory authorities with respect to its binding effect. Since the Act does not contemplate any interference with the finality of an award, there can be no interference with the finality of a settlement as well during the period of its operation and it must run on for the period of its operation. Furthermore, if during the period of operation of a settlement, an industrial dispute relating to the subject-matter of the settlement is raised and referred to adjudication, there will be a conflict between the settlement which will be binding under s 18(1) or s 18(3) and the award which will be binding under s 18(3). Hence, the matters covered by a settlement cannot be made the subject-matter of conciliation proceedings under s 12 or the subject-matter of a reference under s 10(1) of the Act.[88]

The reference of a dispute under s 10 during the period of operation of the settlement will, therefore, be barred by such settlement.[89] However, in this connection, the distinction between the bar to refer the disputes covered by a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' and 'private settlements' has to be borne in mind. The former type of settlements will be a complete bar to the reference of the disputes relating to the subject-matter covered by them, but the latter type of settlements will not operate as a complete bar against making a reference of the subject-matter covered by them because in case of a private settlement, the existence of an 'industrial dispute', though in a mutilated form, is a statable possibility. A private settlement binds only those workmen who are parties to it. Hence, it is not binding on those who are not parties to it. Therefore, such a settlement will not bar a reference of the dispute relating to the matters covered by such a settlement between the employer and the workmen who are not parties to such a settlement. However, the question which in such a case will arise in connection with the making of a reference for adjudication will be a question of expediency.[90]

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 19. Period of operation of settlements and awards.—

(1) A settlement [1][* * *] shall come into operation on such date as is agreed upon by the parties to the dispute, and if no date is agreed upon, on the date on which the memorandum of the settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute.

(2) Such settlement shall be binding for such period as is agreed upon by the parties, and if no such period is agreed upon, for a period of six months [2][from the date on which the memorandum of settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute], and shall continue to be binding on the parties after the expiry of the period aforesaid, until the expiry of two months from the date on which a notice in writing of an intention to terminate the settlement is given by one of the parties to the other party or parties to the settlement.

3[(3) An award shall, subject to the provisions of this section, remain in operation for a period of one year [4][from the date on which the award becomes enforceable under S. 17-A]:]

Provided that the appropriate Government may reduce the said period and fix such period as it thinks fit:

Provided further that the appropriate Government may, before the expiry of the said period, extend the period of operation by any period not exceeding one year at a time as it thinks fit so, however, that the total period of operation of any award does not exceed three years from the date on which it came into operation.

(4) Where the appropriate Government, whether of its own motion or on the application of any party bound by the award, considers that since the award was made, there has been a material change in the circumstances on which it was based, the appropriate Government may refer the award or a part of it [5][to a Labour Court, if the award was that of a Labour Court or to a Tribunal, if the award was that of a Tribunal or of a National Tribunal], for decision whether the period of operation should not, by reason of such change, be shortened and the decision of [6][Labour Court or the Tribunal, as the case may be] on such reference shall, [7][] be final.

(5) Nothing contained in sub-section (3) shall apply to any award which by its nature, terms or other circumstances does not impose, after it has been given effect to, any continuing obligation on the parties bound by the award.

(6) Notwithstanding the expiry of the period of operation under sub-section (3), the award shall continue to be binding on the parties until a period of two months has elapsed from the date on which notice is given by any party bound by the award to the other party or parties intimating its intention to terminate the award.

8[(7) No notice given under sub-section (2) or sub-section (6) shall have effect, unless it is given by a party representing the majority of persons bound by the settlement or award, as the case may be].

SUB-SECTION (1): OPERATION OF SETTLEMENT

Under this sub-section, a settlement shall come into operation:

(i) on the date which has been agreed upon by the parties to the dispute; or

(ii) in case where no date has been agreed upon, on the date on which the memorandum of the settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute.

Signing the memorandum of settlement:

section 2(p) postulates two methods of arriving at a settlement, viz (i) a settlement in the course of conciliation proceedings, and (ii) a settlement otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings. From the definition of 'settlement', it is clear that as far as the settlement arrived at otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceedings is concerned, it must be signed, by the parties in the prescribed manner. But in reference to a 'settlement arrived at in the course of conciliation proceedings' the definition of, 'settlement' in s 2(p) and s 18, which makes a settlement binding, only requires that such a settlement should be 'arrived at'. However, s 12(3) requires the memorandum of a settlement to be signed by the parties to the dispute and to be sent by the conciliation officer along with his report to the appropriate Government. Rule 58 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 prescribes the form and mode of signing both the types of settlements.

SUB-SECTION (2)

(i) Period of Operation of Settlements

The obvious intendment of sub-s (2) is that every settlement reached between the parties shall continue to be binding upon the parties, even after the expiry of the period of settlement, until one of the parties expresses its intention to terminate the settlement by a notice in writing to the other party.[9] The plain purpose of the legislature, was to provide for continuance of the settlement until its termination was manifested in the prescribed manner so that there is no disturbance of industrial peace until then.[10]The object of this provision is to ensure that once a settlement is arrived at, there prevails peace, accord and cordiality between the parties during the period agreed upon and if the settlement does not require to be altered for some reason or other, the same climate prevails by extension of the settlement by operation of law. There is an option given to either party to terminate the settlement by a written intimation. After the expiry of two months from the date of such notice, the settlement will stand terminated. This is in accordance with the policy of settlement of industrial disputes which is the principal object underlying the provisions of the Act. In a given case, it may be even advantageous to the parties, who do not want to continue the settlement, to strike a new bargain without loss of time so that unnecessary bickering and resultant industrial unrest do not take place.[11] In Binny, a single judge of the Karnataka High Court summed up the import of this sub-section thus:

(i) In the case of a settlement in which no period is mentioned, the settlement would be in force and binding on both the parties for a period of six months. During this period, a party to the settlement has no right to terminate the settlement. In other words, no notice of termination can be given by any of the parties terminating the settlement on any date earlier to six months. Even if it is given, it is invalid.

(ii) The position is the same in respect of a settlement in which a period of operation is mentioned. Until the expiry of that period, none of the parties to the agreement has any right to repudiate or terminate the agreement and even if it is done by a party to the settlement, the settlement does not come to an end before the expiry of the period agreed upon.

(iii) After the expiry of the period agreed upon in respect of an agreement or in the absence of such specification, in the agreement after the expiry of six months, any of the parties to the agreement can, by issue of two months' notice, terminate the agreement with effect from a date on or after the agreed or statutory period comes to an end and such a notice becomes effective after the expiry of two months from the date of service of notice. [12]

In India Reconstruction, the labour appellate tribunal took the view that the words 'after the expiry of the period aforesaid' qualify the second part, namely, the period of six months mentioned therein and not the first part which refers to the period 'agreed upon by the parties'.[13] But this view has been dissented from by the Calcutta High Court in National Carbon, observing that if the period is fixed either by contract or statute, then it amounts to the same thing, and there is no reason why the provision as to notice and extension of the period during which the settlement would subsist, should refer only to the one and not to the other.[14] The view of the Calcutta High Court represents the correct law. Therefore, a notice of intention to terminate the settlement in writing under s 19(2) would also be necessary to terminate a settlement which was agreed upon by the parties to remain in operation for a fixed period.[15] The settlement does not cease to be binding ipso facto on the expiry of the period aforesaid in (i) and (ii). It is not open to a party to terminate and unilaterally repudiate the settlement without complying with the requirements of sub-s (2) of s 19 of the Act.[16]

(ii) Notice to Terminate the Settlement

A party intending to terminate a settlement has to give a notice in writing to the other party or parties of its 'intention to terminate the settlement'. The settlement will be terminated after the expiry of two months from the date on which the notice is given by the intending party to the other party or parties. In other words, the settlement shall continue to be binding for a period of two months from the date on which the notice is given.[17] Therefore, the terms of a settlement continue to govern the relations between the parties after the notice of termination and till the expiry of a period of two months thereafter until the settlement is replaced by a valid contract or award between the parties.[18] If, therefore, a party intends to terminate the settlement on expiry of the period specified in this sub-section, it has to give notice of its intention to terminate the settlement two months prior to the expiry of such period. The notice terminating the settlement can, therefore, be given even before the actual expiry of the period of operation of the settlement as specified in it.[19] There is no legal bar to give advance intimation about the intention to terminate the settlement on the expiry of the agreed period and to start negotiations for a more favourable settlement immediately thereafter. The only condition that has to be fulfilled by such a notice is that the period of two months from the date of notice must end on the expiry of the settlement and not before it.[20] The termination of a settlement by a notice with effect from the date prior to the expiry of the period of operation prescribed in the settlement would be invalid.[21] The requirements of law will be satisfied if:

(i) a notice in writing is issued,

(ii) which conveys a clear intention to terminate the settlement,

(iii) on a date after the period of settlement agreed upon, and

(iv) a period of two months has elapsed between the date of issue of the notice and the termination of settlement.[22]

Otherwise, the settlement shall continue to be binding for a further period of two months from the date of notice. Failure to give notice goes to the root of the matter.[23] This section requires the notice merely to be 'in writing'. The Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 do not prescribe any form for giving such notice.[24] All that has to be done, therefore, is to see that the provisions of s 19(2) or s 19(6), as the case may be, are complied with, and in substance a notice is given by one party to the other party or parties, intimating its intention to terminate the settlement or award.[25] This provision contemplates not a tacit representation but an express representation physically in the form of writing, terminating an agreement.[26] However, the intimation of the intention to terminate the settlement or award, has to be fixed with reference to a particular date so as to enable a court to come to the conclusion that the party, giving that intimation, has expressed its intention to terminate the settlement. Such a certainty regarding the date, is absolutely essential, because the period of two months, after the expiry of which, the settlement will cease to be binding on the parties, will have to be reckoned from the date of such intimation.[27] In other words, the intimation to terminate a settlement, whether it is by a formal notice in writing or it is to be spelt out from the correspondence, must be certain as to the particular date on which such a termination is to take effect. This is vitally necessary, because the court has to fix the period of two months with reference to s 19(2) after which the settlement or award ceases to be binding on the parties.[28]

In Cochin State Power, the presentation of a charter of demands, referring to a resolution of the union to terminate the settlement was held to be sufficient notice.[29] Likewise, in WIMCO, the representation of the union in the charter of demands coupled with the relevant correspondence itself was considered to be notice within the meaning of s 19(3).[30] In Bangalore WCS Mills, the court rejected the contention that an inference of termination of the settlement could be gathered from the correspondence that passed between the management and the union, and observed that that decision 'does not lend any support to such a view'.[31] If the termination of the settlement has not been proved with certainty as regards date of such termination, a reference of the dispute covered by the settlement would be incompetent and the award passed in consequence thereof would be invalid.[32] In Indian Link Chain, a particular letter stating that it terminates the settlement was taken as the requisite notice. The court also viewed the matter from a different angle, viz, when both the parties to the dispute proceeded on the plea that there was no settlement binding on either of them, the Government was justified to refer the dispute for adjudication on the failure of conciliation proceedings. Hence, the management was estopped from taking the stand that the settlement was not put an end to, and that the reference was invalid. Jaganmohan Reddy J held:

> It is true that though a written notice can be spelled out from the correspondence, there must be a certainty regarding the date on which such a written notice can be construed to have been given because a settlement notwithstanding such notice continues to be in force for a period of two months from that date'.[33]

In Karnani Properties, it was held that a particular letter was a notice under s 19(2) as well as under s 19(6) of the Act. The letter of the union which was addressed to the labour commissioner was sent to the employer as well. In this letter there was a clear intimation of the intention of the employees to terminate the award and from the reply of the employer to this letter, it was evident that it had become aware of the intention of the union to terminate the award. In the circumstances, the court held that the award had been validly terminated.[34] In Thungabhadra Industries, the workmen did not give any notice in terms of s 19(6) before they served a charter of demands on the management on all matters covered by the previous award. The court observed that the union must establish the point of time when the previous award had been terminated and pointed out that the fact, that the workmen went on a strike on the refusal of the employer to accede to their demands and the participation of the management in conciliation proceedings, did not indicate that the award had been terminated as required by s 19(6). The serving of charter of demands too was not held to be an indication of the termination of the previous award, because if the notice was served, the workmen would not have gone on an illegal strike before the expiry of two months from the date of the service of the charter of demands.[35] Where the agreement is not a 'settlement' as contemplated by its definition, for instance an agreement by acquiescence and without a memorandum being signed, it is not necessary to give a notice of the termination of such an agreement.[36]

This sub-section, however, requires only the expression of intention to terminate a subsisting settlement and nothing more. It does not provide that the workmen shall by their act terminate the subsisting settlement with effect from a particular date. The workmen are required only to express the intention which produces the statutory results of terminating the settlement. The mere fact that the workmen in their notice first referred to the charter of demands and then expressed their intention to terminate the existing settlement would not vitiate the notice on the ground that the charter of demands preceded the expression of intention to terminate the existing settlement because both were simultaneous.[37] In Rajasthan Atomic Power, the settlement provided that the motor vehicle drivers would be paid overtime allowance in accordance with the provisions of the Motor Transport Workers Act 1961. After the expiry of about one year, the management gave notice to the union under s 19(2) conveying their intention to terminate the settlement in so far as the staff car drivers were concerned and on the expiry of two months from the service of this notice, the management gave a further notice under s 9A of the Act proposing to effect a change in the conditions of service of the car drivers as indicated in the earlier notice. The dispute raised by the workmen was referred for adjudication. The tribunal, agreeing with the contention of the employer, took the view that since the car drivers were not motor transport workers within the meaning of s 2(h) of the Motor Transport Workers Act, they were wrongly included in the settlement and that the termination of the settlement in so far as it concerned the staff car drivers was, therefore, justified. Hence, the tribunal held that the car drivers were not entitled to any relief and made the award accordingly. In appeal the Supreme Court proceeded, on the basis that the right asserted by the staff car drivers arose out of the settlement which adopted the provisions of the Motor Transport Workers Act with respect to over-time allowance payable to motor vehicle drivers. Hence, the court took the view that there was no question of entering into a settlement on a mistaken belief.[38]

In National Engg, the Supreme Court held that a settlement arrived at under ss 12(3) and 18(3) of the Act between the management and the recognised union could not be terminated by a minority union by issuing a notice under s 19(2), and that such a notice of termination would be invalid as it did not represent the majority of the persons bound by the settlement nor the union could be said to be a representative union.[39] In NTC, the facts were: the employees of a corporation fell in three categories, with separate settlements for each category, but any change in the conditions of service of one category had its own impact on the status of the employees belonging to the other categories. The Supreme Court held that it was permissible to make a reference of the dispute raised by the affected category of employees, even during the subsistence of the settlement, because of the material change in the circumstances. For instance, due to a change brought about in respect of one category, the gardener was to get less emoluments by being treated under category II (ministerial staff) while his helper were to receive higher emoluments in view of the settlement entered into with category III (workmen) to which the helper belonged, the whole system smacked arbitrariness and unfair treatment of different categories of employees. In such an event, reference of the dispute raised by category II employees was admissible.[40]

(iii) Effect of Termination of Settlement on the Rights and Obligations of Parties

In DJ Bahadur, a majority of a three judge bench held that there is no difference between the effect of termination of a settlement under s 19(2) and termination of an award under s 19(6) on the rights and obligations of the parties. The topic has been discussed in detail under s 19(6).[41] In Patiala CC Bank, the settlement reached between the bank and the union under s 12(3) provided, inter alia, for dearness allowance. The settlement was due to expire on 31 March 1977, but continued in operation as no notice was given by either party of its intention to terminate the settlement. In the meantime, s. 84B was inserted in 1981 in the Punjab Co-operative Societies Act 1961, which provided that 'notwithstanding anything contained in this Act or any other law for the time being in force or any agreement, settlement or award no employee of a co-operative society shall be paid dearness allowance at a rate higher than that admissible to the employees of the government drawing pay at the same rate'. The validity and applicability of this provision was challenged by the union in the High Court, which held that the said provision was not only ultra vires the state legislation, but also had no application to the settlement. Setting aside the decision of High Court, a three-judge Bench comprising Sen, Jeevan Reddy and Majumdar JJ, by a majority held that if, after the settlement was entered into, any law was passed and the settlement could not be enforced without violating that law, then the law would prevail over the terms of settlement in view of the non obstante clause in s 84B.[42]

(i) Period of Operation of Awards

This sub-section prescribes the statutory period of operation of an award at one year from the date on which it becomes enforceable under s 17A. But this provision does not provide any period of limitation for enforcement of an award. It only lays down that subject to other provisions of this section, the duration for which the award shall remain in force or continue to be binding.[43] A claim to recover money due under an award not being in the nature of a continuing obligation on the parties to the award and the fact that claim awarded is in respect of an antecedent period would take it out of the operation of this provision.[44] The power to extend the award for a period not exceeding one year from the date of its becoming enforceable under s 17A which is given to the Government by the second proviso, is an independent power, and such extension does not in any way, affect the jurisdiction or power of the tribunal. The maximum period of one year mentioned in s 19(3) starts from the date on which the award becomes enforceable and does not cover the period antecedent to the award.[45] A Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Ikram Ahmed, had taken the view that the term 'award' used in this provision would include 'awards' made under other enactments as well.[46]But from a plain reading of sub-s (3), it would appear that it refers to such an award as would be 'enforceable under s 17A '. In other words, it is only an award as contemplated by s 2(b) of the Act that can be enforceable under s 17A. The awards under other enactments obviously would not be enforceable under s 17A of this Act. The section, therefore, concerns itself only with the awards as defined in this Act and not under other enactments. Though the full bench has entered into a long dissertation, it does not appear to have adverted to the plain language of the statute. The construction placed by the full bench is clearly incorrect.

(ii) 'Subject to the Provisions of this Section'

The words 'subject to the provisions of this section' used in this sub-section makes the period of operation of the award subject to the other provisions in s 19. A private settlement between the parties, after having received the stamp of adjudication by an adjudicator, arrived at during the course of adjudicatory proceedings loses the character of a 'settlement' as defined in s 2(p) and partakes the character of an 'award' as defined in s 2(b) of the Act. This rule, however gives rise to the query whether such an 'award-settlement' would be operative as a 'settlement' in accordance with the provisions of sub-s (2) or as an award according to the provisions of sub-s (3). The Bombay High Court, in Ghatge Patil, having regard to the language of this sub-section, took the view that the tribunal cannot direct that the award should remain in operation for a period longer than one year despite a longer period agreed upon in the settlement-award. In this case in a pending reference, the employer produced agreements signed by 104 out of 124 workmen and asked for an award in terms thereof. The union representing the workers objected to the award being made in terms of the agreement and contended that the agreements were contrary to the principles of collective bargaining and were brought about by fraud, misrepresentation and coercion. The tribunal went into each of the items of settlement between the parties and accepted the settlement as being fair and just except in regard to two matters, viz, privilege leave and bonus, consequently, it made its own award though substantially in consonance with the settlement filed by the employer. One of the terms of the settlement was that the award should be effective and operative for a period of three years. The High Court held that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make the award for a period longer than one year in view of the language of s 19(3) and unless the Government had extended the period of operation of award in exercise of its power under the proviso to s 19(3), the award could only remain in force for a period of one year.[47] But subsequently another Division Bench of the same High Court in Garment Cleaning, took a different view on the construction of the words 'subject to the provisions of this section'. In this case the settlements arrived at between the parties were filed before the tribunal in the course of adjudication proceedings which contained a longer period for the operation of the 'settlement-award' than the statutory period of one year provided in sub-s (3). The court distinguished this case from Ghatge & Patil and held that the 'settlement award' shall be binding for the period agreed upon in the settlement rather than the statutory period of one year for an award as provided in sub-s (3).[48] This view does not appear to be correct. The court has lost sight of the principle that after the tribunal has adjudicated upon a settlement and made the settlement, its own award which became final under s 17A, no longer remained a settlement. To extend the statutory period of the operation of an award under sub-s (3), is beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal. But the court has pressed into service the words 'subject to the provisions of this section' in observing that 19(3) is subject to sub-s (2) as much as to the second proviso thereto which gives power to the Government to extend the operation of an award. Sub-section (3) which refers to awards, cannot be subject to the provisions of sub-s (2) which refers to the period of operation of settlements. On true construction of sub-s (3), it would be obvious that it is subject to those provisions of s 19 which deal with the period of operation of 'awards'. Such provisions are the two provisos to sub-ss (3)-(6). The statutory period of operation of an award under sub-s (3) is only subject to these provisions and not sub-s (2).

(iii) First Proviso: Reduction of the Period of Operation

This proviso empowers the appropriate Government to reduce the period of an award from one year to such short period as it may think fit. Since the provisions of sub-s (3) are 'subject to the provisions of s 19, the period can be shortened only after complying with the requirements of sub-s (4). In other words, before the appropriate Government can fix a reduced period of operation of an award, it must comply with the requirements of sub-s (4).

(iv) Second Proviso: Extension of the Period of Operation

This proviso empowers the Government to extend the period of operation of an award. The requirements of this proviso are:

(a) the period must be extended before the period prescribed in sub-s (1) has expired;

(b) the period extended should not exceed one year at a time; and

(c) the total period of operation of any award should not exceed three years from the date on which the award came into operation.

The award will be in operation:

(1) For a period of one year from the date on which it becomes enforceable under s17A.

(2) For such shorter period to which the appropriate government in its discretion may reduce it.

(3) For such extended period to which the government in its discretion may extend the period of operation of the award. The period of extension is subject to the following qualifications:

  (a) the period of extension cannot be more than one year at a time;

  (b) the total period of extension of operation of the award should not exceed three years from the date on which it comes into operation, under s 17A (4).

(4) For such extended or reduced period as aforesaid, till the expiry of two months from the date of a notice as required by sub-s (6).

From the scheme of sub-s (3) along with the provisos, it appears that the period of operation of an award has been fixed by the statute at one year. The tribunal has not been given the discretion to increase or reduce this statutory period. The reduction and extension of the period of operation is the prerogative of the 'appropriate Government'. However, in case of reducing the period of operation from the statutory period of one year, the Government must comply with the requirements of sub-s (4).

SUB-SECTION (4)

(i) Reference of Award for Reducing the Period of its Operation

This sub-section empowers the 'appropriate Government', suo motu or on the application of any party bound by the award, to make a reference for a decision whether the period of operation thereof should not be shortened. But before making a reference under this sub-section, the 'appropriate Government' must consider whether since the award was made, there has been a material change in the circumstances on which the award was based. In other words, this is a precondition to such a reference. The award of a labour court can be referred to a labour court, whereas the award of an industrial tribunal or a national tribunal can be referred to an industrial tribunal. It is, therefore, for the labour court or the industrial tribunal to decide whether the period of operation should not by reason of such change be shortened. Such a reference under s 19(4) is different from the reference under s 10 or under s 36A. Under s 19(4), the tribunal has to decide only the limited question 'whether the period of operation of the award should not, by reason of a material change in the circumstances on which it is based, be shortened?'.[49] The decision of the labour court or the tribunal on such reference shall be final. In case the labour court or the tribunal decides that the period should be shortened, the 'appropriate Government' in exercise of the power under the first proviso to sub-s (3) will reduce the period of operation of the award. But if the labour court or the tribunal decides that there is no case for shortening the period, the decision being final, the 'appropriate Government' will have no power to reduce the period of operation as the power under the proviso in sub-s (3) is subject to other provisions of s 19. The words 'the decision of a labour court or tribunal as the case may be, on such reference shall be final' ousts the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil courts. But such decision being of a quasi-judicial nature, the labour court or the tribunal will decide the question after giving a hearing to the parties and complying with the rules of natural justice. The use of the word 'decision' in s 19(4) indicates that the decision of the tribunal on a reference under this provision is not an award and does not require publication. The legislature has advisedly used the word 'decision' instead of the word 'award' which has been made final. Hence the decision of the labour court or the tribunal under s 19(4) does not require publication under s 17(1) which specifically speaks of an 'award'. Such decision will be reviewable by a writ court if vitiated by errors of law apparent on the face of the record or perversity, or if it is in violation of the rules of natural justice.

(ii) Constitutional Validity of Sub-section (4)

This provision does not empower the 'appropriate Government' to change the period of operation of an award, merely by its own volition and without having regard to the circumstances of a particular case. The discretion given thereunder shall not be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously. This provision, therefore, was held not to be unconstitutional or void as infringing the fundamental rights guaranteed under Art. 14 and 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution.[50]

SUB-SECTION (5): CONTINUING OBLIGATION UNDER THE AWARD

There are two types of awards: (i) those which decide the questions once and for all without any continuing obligation; (ii) those with a continuing obligation for the parties. For instance, the awards involving personal rights, eg, upholding the discharge or dismissal of workmen or setting aside the discharge or dismissal and directing reinstatement of a discharged or a dismissed workman for victimisation or any other unfair labour practice; or the awards dealing with questions like transfer, legality or justifiability of lock-outs or strikes etc.[51]

SUB-SECTION (6)

(i) Extended Operation of the Award: Notice of Termination

This sub-section postulates that after the expiry of the period of operation of an award, be it for one year as specified in sub-s (3) or for a reduced or extended period as contemplated in the two provisos thereto, it does not automatically cease to be 'binding' on the parties. In other words, though the period of operation expires, the binding effect of the award would still survive. In order to terminate the award, the party intending to terminate it must give a notice of two months' duration under s 19(6) to the other party or parties. It is clear from the language of this provision that even after the notice, the award continues to be binding for a further period of two months from the date on which it is given. Section 19(3) talks of the period of operation of an award, while s 19(6) talks of the award continuing to be 'binding' notwithstanding the expiry of the period of operation. There is the difference between an award being in 'operation' and an award being 'binding on the parties'. After the period of operation of an award has expired, the award does not cease to be effective or binding but continues to be binding thereafter on the parties until the notice has been given by one of the parties of its intention to terminate it and for a further period of two months from the date of such notice.[52] 'In considering the intendment of sub-ss (3) and (6) of s 19, the distinction between the expressions 'in force' and 'in operation' has to be borne in mind. While sub-s (3) lays down that an award shall be in operation for the different periods mentioned therein whenever action has been taken by the Government after the expiry of the period of operation, the award does not automatically cease, but it continues to be in force and binds the parties until it is terminated by a notice and such termination takes effect two months after the notice. The words 'in operation' have reference to the period fixed by law or by the parties according to law while the words 'in force' have reference to the period (subsequent to the period of operation) during which it will statutorily be binding on the parties to the award or settlement'.[53] The legal position on reading of these two provisions, viz, sub-ss (3) and (6) seems to be that the operation of the award is for a period of one year from the date on which the award becomes enforceable under s 17A and this period may be extended from time to time up to a maximum period of three years under the second proviso to sub-s (3). A party to the award, therefore, cannot terminate it so long as it remained operative either during the period of one year or during the extended period under sub-s (3) of s 19. It does not cease to be binding on the parties merely by the lapse of the period of its operation.[54]

As long as the award continues to be binding any further reference for adjudication of the matters covered by the award would be barred. In order to terminate the binding effect of the award any party bound by it has to give a notice to the other party or parties intimating its intention to terminate the award. Hence any party bound by the award can get rid of the award by service of two months' notice under sub-s (6) on the other party or parties bound by it at any time from the date, two months before the expiry of the statutory period of the operation of such award under sub-s (1) or sub-s (3). From the date of such notice, for a further period of two months, the award shall continue to be binding on the parties. It is on the lapse of this period of two months, that the award ceases to be binding. If any of the parties wants to terminate the binding effect of the award with the expiry of the period of its operation, it has to give notice of its intention to terminate the award to the other party or parties, two months before the expiry of the period of operation prescribed under sub-s (3). Then the award will cease to be binding on the expiry of the period of its operation. The Delhi High Court has taken the view that the notice of termination contemplated by sub-s (6) can be given only after the expiry of the period of operation under sub-s (3) because 'reading sub-s (3) and sub-s (6) together it has to be held that no notice of termination can be given within the period of operation of the award.[55] This view is not warranted by the language of the statute. On a plain reading of sub-s (6), it is clear that the termination of the binding effect of the award can be made co-terminus with the expiry of the period of its operation. But the award shall continue to be binding until a period of two months has elapsed from the date on which the notice is given.

Even where the award mentions the date till which it would be binding on the parties, notice under s 19(6) is necessary.[56] 'It cannot be over-emphasised that an intimation, claimed to have been given, regarding the termination of an award, be fixed with reference to a particular date, so as to enable a court to come to the conclusion that the party, giving that intimation, has expressed its intention to terminate the award. Such a certainty regarding the date is absolutely essential, because, the period of two months after the expiry of which, the award will cease to be binding on the parties, will have to be reckoned, from the date of such clear intimation'.[57]The provision in s 19(6) as regards the period for which the award shall continue to be binding on the parties is not in any way affected by s 4 of the Industrial Disputes (Banking Companies) Decision Act 1955.[58] In Bank of India, the Supreme Court held that under s 19(6), an award would continue to be binding on the parties even after the period stated in s 19(3) ; and that s 4 of the Industrial Disputes (Banking Companies) Decision Act 1955, would not affect the same. An award would not cease to be binding on the parties in view of s 19(6) until the parties intimate each other about their intention to do so.[59]

Notice in writing:

On the question whether the notice intending to terminate the award under s 19(6) should be in 'writing' or not, as unlike s 19(2) the words 'in writing' do not occur in s 19(6), there is a conflict of judicial opinion. The Rajasthan[60] and Delhi[61] High Courts have taken the view that it is absolutely necessary that the notice must be 'in writing' and a contrary opinion might land the parties in a further dispute on a question of fact, because under sub-s (6) limitation arises on the expiry of two months from the date of the notice. It may be communicated in any manner, provided the party for whom it is intended, has sufficient knowledge of the facts constituting it. In case the notice is not 'in writing', though it may be possible to presume that the party for whom the notice is intended had sufficient knowledge of the facts constituting the notice, it will be extremely difficult to determine as to on what date, for the first time, the party for whom the notice was intended, came to know, such facts. Such a construction, therefore, will lead to further disputes on questions of facts. On the other hand, the plain language of the statute does not contain the words 'in writing' in sub-s (6). If the legislature uses different words in the same enactment, and particularly in the same section, it must be deemed to have intended to give those words different meaning. Though it may lead to disputes on questions of facts as to the date on which the notice was served, if the notice is not 'in writing', such facts can be determined by the tribunal. This construction does not lead to any absurdity. Hence, it would not be permissible for the court to infer the omission of the words, 'in writing' and add the same to sub-s (6). The view of the labour appellate tribunal and the Calcutta and the Mysore High Courts appears to be correct. But, it is advisable that the legislature amends sub-s (6) by adding to it the words 'in writing' and obviate disputes on questions of facts as to the date on which the notice was given. If a notice terminating a settlement is to be in writing, there is no reason why a notice terminating an award should not be in writing.

(ii) Supersession and Waiver of Notice

A notice under s 19(2) or s 19(6) may be waived by the party for whom it is intended.[62] If after the notice under s 19(6), the Government extends the period of operation of an award by a further period, the notice will be superseded by the order of the Government. The party intending to terminate the award shall again have to give a fresh notice under s 19(6) of two months before the date from which it intends to terminate the award.

(iii) Effect of Termination of Award under Section 19(6) on Rights and Obligations of Parties

There are three stages or phases with different legal effects on the life of an award. There is a specific period contractually or statutorily fixed as the period of operation. After the expiry of this period, the award does not cease to be effective. But it continues to be binding on the parties until notice has been given by one of the parties of its intention to terminate it and two months have elapsed from the date of such notice. This is the second stage. The last stage is arrived at when the period of notice, under s 19(6), by either party, expires. After this, the award ceases to be binding under the Act. In other words, the effect of termination of the award is to prevent the enforcement of the obligations under it in the manner prescribed. After the termination of the award, it is open to the workmen to raise fresh industrial disputes relating to the subject-matter of the award. However, the termination of the award does not have the effect of extinguishing the rights flowing there from. The rights and obligations which flow from it are not wiped out. Evidently, by the termination of an award, the contract of employment is not terminated.[63] In South Indian Bank, the Supreme Court pointed out that even if an award has ceased to be in operation under s 19 or ceased to be binding under s 18 on the parties, it will continue to have its effect as a contract between the parties that has been made by industrial adjudication in place of the old contract. In other words, 'even though the period of the operation of the award and the period for which it remains binding on the parties may elapse, new contract would continue to govern the relations between the parties till it is replaced by another contract'.[64]

The obligations created by the award or contract can, however, be altered by a fresh adjudication or fresh contract created either by a fresh award or a fresh settlement. In other words, when a notice intimating termination of an award or a settlement is issued, the legal import is merely that the stage is set for fresh negotiations or industrial adjudication and until either effort ripens into a fresh set of conditions of service, the previous award or settlement does not cease to regulate the relations between the employer and the employees.[65]

(iv) Bar to Further Reference

Hence, when there is a subsisting settlement or award, binding on the parties, the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to consider the same point, in a subsequent reference. Since the points covered by a settlement or an award are binding on the employer and the workmen, they cannot raise any industrial dispute relating to those points. Hence, there can be no existing or apprehended industrial dispute relating to the points. In the absence of an existing or apprehended industrial dispute, a subsequent reference relating to such points will itself be invalid and illegal.[66] In other words, where an item of dispute covered by a settlement or award is substantially the same, as set out in a subsequent reference, a change of phraseology in the language of the subsequent reference would not create a new dispute.[67] When an inquiry is to be on the grounds mentioned in s 19(4), it must be confined to the question whether the period of operation should not, by reason of the alleged change, be shortened. But unless the period is so shortened and effect of the award is terminated or the matter is re-opened after termination of the award under s 19(6), the first award will not cease to be operative and its binding effect cannot be avoided. The matter covered by such an award, therefore, cannot be referred or adjudicated upon.[68]

Illustrations

While a 'consent award' providing that a supervisor would not be a workman was in force and the same had not been terminated as required under s 19(6), a fresh dispute on the same question was held to be barred.[69] Where the concerned workmen withdrew certain demands and that matter was incorporated in the award, they could not raise the same demand as long as the prior award was in force.[70] The bar of s 19(6) will, however, operate only where there is an adjudication by a tribunal on the merits of the dispute in an award. The settlement or award wherein certain items of dispute were not pressed and were withdrawn, would not operate as a bar to a subsequent reference in regard to such items, as in such a case there would be no adjudication on merits by the industrial tribunal in regard to items withdrawn and not pressed by the workmen. Similarly, in regard to such items of dispute, which were not pressed and were withdrawn, there could be no agreement or settlement between the parties.[71] The bar will not apply where there has been a settlement between the parties to have the dispute referred. In order that a particular award should operate as a bar to further adjudication, the matter should have been directly and substantially in issue in the former proceedings. For instance, where there was no inquiry whether certain persons were workmen, for the reason that no material was placed before the tribunal to adjudicate the question, the previous award would not bar subsequent adjudication of the question.[72] Likewise, where the 'grades and scales' of pay were covered by a previous award, a subsequent reference regarding 'dearness allowance' was not barred as the two disputes were not identical or substantially identical.[73] If the question in subsequent reference is not the same or substantially the same, the second reference will not be barred; for instance, a reference with reference to 'dearness allowance' would not be barred by a previous award regarding 'pay' of an employee.[74]

SUB-SECTION (7): WHO CAN GIVE EFFECTIVE NOTICE

This sub-section was inserted by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964. The effect of this provision is that a notice under sub-s (2) or sub-s (6) of s 19 to be effective, must be only by a party representing the majority of persons bound by the settlement or award, as the case may be. This sub-section annuls the effect of the Supreme Court decision in ACC, in which it was held that a trade union representing even a minority of the workmen in an establishment could terminate an award by giving notice under s 19(6) of the Act.[75]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 20. Commencement and conclusion of proceedings.—

(1) A conciliation proceeding shall be deemed to have commenced on the date on which a notice of strike or lock-out under Section 22 is received by the conciliation officer or on the date of the order referring the dispute to a Board, as the case may be.

(2) A conciliation proceeding shall be deemed to have concluded—

(a) where a settlement is arrived at, when a memorandum of the settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute;

(b) where no settlement is arrived at, when the report of the conciliation officer is received by the appropriate Government or when the report of the Board is published under Section 17, as the case may be; or

(c) when a reference is made to a Court, [76][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] under Section 10 during the pendency of conciliation proceedings.

(3) Proceedings [77][before an arbitrator under Section 10-A or before a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] shall be deemed to have commenced on the date of the [78][reference of the dispute for arbitration or adjudication, as the case may be,] and such proceedings shall be deemed to have concluded [79][on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under section 17-A].

SUB-SECTION (1): COMMENCEMENT OF CONCILIATION PROCEEDINGS

(i) In a Public Utility Service

The first part of this provision relates to the commencement of conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer in a 'public utility service'. The date of commencement of conciliation proceedings is the date on which a notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is received by the conciliation officer. Section 22 prohibits strikes and lockouts in a 'public utility service' concern and has no reference to 'non-public utility service' concerns. Therefore, if the undertaking is not a 'public utility service' as defined in s 2(n) of the Act, provisions of s 22 will not be attracted. In other words, even if a notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is given by a party to the other, conciliation proceedings shall not be deemed to have commenced on the date of such notice.[80] The second part of the sub-section provides that the proceedings before a Board commence when a reference under s 10(1) is made to it by the 'appropriate Government', whether the dispute relates to a public utility or a non-public utility service. This sub-section, by a fiction, makes the date on which the notice of strike or lockout is received by the conciliation officer or the date on which the dispute has been referred to the Board, to be the date of commencement of conciliation proceedings. The word 'deemed' indicates that in a public utility concern even if the conciliation officer had been negotiating with the parties or had received a charter of demands from the workmen and the reply from the employer prior to the date of receipt of notice by him under s 22, it would not tantamount to conciliation proceedings as the conciliation proceedings in such a case can only commence from the date on which the notice of strike or lockout under s 22 is received.

(ii) In a Non-Public Utility Service

From the provisions of s 20(1), it is clear that upon a reference of dispute, being made to a Board under s 10(l)(a) for promoting a settlement, whether relating to a public utility service or a non-public utility service, proceedings before it shall be deemed to have commenced on the date when the order referring the dispute to it is made. However, there is no indication in sub-s (1) as to from what date the conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer in a 'non-public utility service' shall be deemed to have commenced. However, for determining the pendency of conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer, the determination of the date of commencement is essential. The date of commencement, therefore, has to be determined from the other provisions. Section 12(1) lays down that 'where an industrial dispute exists or is apprehended the conciliation officer may ... hold conciliation proceedings in the prescribed manner'. The manner of holding the conciliation proceedings has been prescribed in r 10 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 which lays down that 'where the conciliation officer receives any information about an existing or apprehended industrial dispute which does not relate to a public utility service ... he shall give formal intimation in writing to the parties concerned declaring his intention to commence conciliation proceedings with effect from such date as may be specified therein'. From this rule, it appears that the date of commencement of conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer will be the date specified by him in his communication sent to the parties in writing, intimating them of his intention to commence the proceedings. It is neither the date on which the conciliation officer receives the information nor the date on which he communicates his intention to the parties on which the conciliation proceedings commence. Even if on the date specified by the conciliation officer in his communication to the parties, any or all the parties do not appear before him, the conciliation proceedings before him shall still be deemed to have commenced on that date.

SUB-SECTION (2): CONCLUSION OF CONCILIATION PROCEEDINGS

This sub-section provides the following points of time on which the conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer or a Board shall be deemed to have concluded in different situations:

(i) In case a settlement is arrived at, whether before a conciliation officer or the board, the date on which the memorandum of settlement is signed by the parties to the dispute. Though the report of the board regarding the settlement of the dispute is to be sent by it to the 'appropriate government' under s 13(2) and is to be published under s 17(1), the date of the conclusion of the proceedings before the board, like the conclusion of the proceedings before a conciliation officer, has been made the date of signing of the memorandum and not the date of the publication of the report.

(ii) In case no settlement is arrived at:

  (a) the date on which the report of the conciliation officer is received by the appropriate government; or

  (b) the date on which the report of the board is published under s 17.

(iii) In case, during the pendency of conciliation proceedings, the dispute is referred for adjudication, the date of reference is the date of conclusion of the conciliation proceedings.

The provisions of sub-s (2) apply to all conciliation proceedings, whether in regard to a public utility service or otherwise. A conciliation proceeding under this sub-section shall be deemed to have been concluded in the manner aforesaid. The conciliation proceedings, therefore, do not end when the report under s 12(6) is submitted by the conciliation officer, but it ends when that report is received by the appropriate Government. If a conciliation officer does not, for some reasons, submit his report within the period of 14 days prescribed by s 12(6), his action may be reprehensible, but that will not affect the interpretation of s 20(2)(b) that the conciliation proceedings only terminate as provided thereunder.[81] The word 'received' in s 20(2)(b) obviously implies actual receipt of the report by the Government where no settlement is arrived at. It cannot mean that when the report should have been received by the appropriate Government.[82] However, there may be cases where the report is not received by the Government at all. For instance, it might have been lost in transit or might not have been dispatched due to clerical inadvertence. In such cases, on the evidence that the conciliation officer has dispatched his report to the Government, it must be presumed, unless there is evidence to the contrary, that the report was received by the Government in the normal course.[83] Clause (c) of sub-s (2) provides that when, during the pendency of conciliation proceedings before the conciliation officer or the board of conciliation, a reference of the dispute is made to the court of inquiry, labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, the conciliation proceedings shall be deemed to have been concluded. In other words, the conciliation proceedings do not survive a reference under s 10(1). Hence, a conciliation officer cannot enter upon conciliation proceedings of an industrial dispute which has been referred under s 10(1) for investigation or adjudication.[84]

SUB-SECTION (3)

(i) Commencement and Conclusion of Arbitration or Adjudication

Under this sub-section, arbitration or adjudication proceedings before an arbitrator or a tribunal, etc shall be deemed to have:

(a) commenced on the date of reference of the dispute for arbitration or adjudication; and

(b) concluded on the date on which the award becomes enforceable under section 17A(1).[85]

(ii) Date of Reference

By legal fiction of s 20(3), the proceedings before an arbitrator or the tribunals etc shall be deemed to have commenced from the date when the order of reference is made. There is nothing in the Act to suggest that a reference is incomplete until it has reached the tribunal or the parties; nor is there any indication to suggest that a reference is not complete until the original order is signed and delivered to the tribunal. On plain construction of s 10 and s 20, as soon as a reference is made 'by order in writing', it becomes a complete reference. It is that date on which the proceedings before a tribunal, etc, shall be deemed to have commenced within the meaning of this sub-section. The date of the delivery to or receipt by the tribunal of the order of reference is not material.[86]

CHAPTER IV Procedure, Powers and Duties of Authorities

S. 21. Certain matters to be kept confidential.—

There shall not be included in any report or award under this Act any information obtained by a conciliation officer, Board, Court, [87][Labour Court, Tribunal, National Tribunal or an arbitrator] in the course of any investigation or inquiry as to a trade union or as to any individual business (whether carried on by a person, firm or company) which is not available otherwise than through the evidence given before such officer, Board, Court, [88][Labour Court, Tribunal, National Tribunal or arbitrator], if the trade union, person, firm or company in question has made a request in writing to the conciliation officer, Board, Court, [89][Labour Court, Tribunal, National Tribunal or arbitrator], as the case may be, that such information shall be treated as confidential; nor shall such conciliation officer or any individual member of the Board, [90][or Court or the presiding officer of the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal or the arbitrator] or any person present at or concerned in the proceedings disclose any such information without the consent in writing of the secretary of the trade union or the person, firm or company in question, as the case may be:

Provided that nothing contained in this section shall apply to a disclosure of any such information for the purposes of a prosecution under Section 193 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

LEGISLATION

This section was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947, and corresponds to s 13 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. It has since undergone some minor amendments which have been footnoted in the text of the section.

SECRECY OF INFORMATION

This section makes provision for secrecy of the information obtained in the course of various proceedings before the authorities under the Act, which is not otherwise available than through the evidence given before such authorities. However, the party desiring such information to be kept confidential has to make a request in writing to the concerned authority that such information should be treated as confidential. On such request being made, it is incumbent on the authority concerned to treat the said information as confidential. The protection of this section is not available to a party against prosecution for perjury under s 193 of the Indian Penal Code. In Garment Cleaning, the tribunal had relied on certain information disclosed by the employer regarding his financial capacity at the trial. The employer had requested the tribunal to keep the information confidential under s 21 of the Act. After examining the balance-sheet and other information, the tribunal came to the conclusion that the employer had the financial capacity to bear the burden of provident fund, besides gratuity. However, in view of the provisions of s 21, neither the tribunal nor the labour appellate tribunal in appeal could refer to the figures in the award. In appeal, before the Supreme Court against the award, the employer took the plea that the tribunal had not considered the question of capacity to pay in its proper perspective and hence, the matter might be remanded to it. Rejecting the plea, Gajendragadkar J, held that if the employer wanted the tribunal to consider the figures and state its conclusion in the light of the said figures in its award, it need not have claimed privilege under s 21 at the trial. At the stage of appeal before the Supreme Court, the privilege could not be waived for consideration of the matter afresh by the Supreme Court or the industrial tribunal on remand.[91]

Once a document has been secured as evidence, there is nothing in s 21 to justify refusal of inspection to the other party. The provision of s 21 only prevents the authority concerned from including in its award the contents of any documents claimed by a party to be confidential. However, it does not prevent a party from asking for inspection of any document produced in evidence by his adversary. It is a fundamental rule that a party must have inspection of any document which the other side wishes to use.[92] In this view of law, the labour appellate tribunal in Kanpur Hosiery, directed the representative of the employer company to give inspection of the balance-sheet to the representative of the union.[93]The provisions of s 21 of the Act afford ample protection against the disclosure of information which a party may wish to be treated as confidential. When workmen or their representatives ask for inspection of the account books or any other relevant confidential paper, it should ordinarily be possible for the employer to comply with the request, subject, however, to the protection of s 21. When a prayer is made to the tribunal by a party for inspection of the confidential papers of the opposite party, the tribunal has to use its judicial discretion in the matter and in the absence of any special circumstances would ordinarily be justified in asking the opposite party to give reasonable access to the account books or all relevant confidential papers to the party applying for inspection.[94]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER V Strikes and Lockouts

S. 22. Prohibition of Strikes and Lockouts.—

(1) No person employed in a public utility service shall go on strike in breach of contract—

(a) without giving to the employer notice of strike, as hereinafter provided, within six weeks before striking; or

(b) within fourteen days of giving such notice; or

(c) before the expiry of the date of strike specified in any such notice as aforesaid; or

(d) during the pendency of any conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer and seven days after the conclusion of such proceedings.

(2) No employer carrying on any public utility service shall lock-out any of his workmen—

(a) without giving them notice of lock-out as hereinafter provided, within six weeks before locking-out; or

(b) within fourteen days of giving such notice; or

(c) before the expiry of the date of lock-out specified in any such notice as aforesaid; or

(d) during the pendency of any conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer and seven days after the conclusion of such proceedings.

(3) The notice of lock-out or strike under this section shall not be necessary where there is already in existence a strike or, as the case may be, lock-out in the public utility service, but the employer shall send intimation of such lock-out or strike on the day on which it is declared, to such authority as may be specified by the appropriate Government either generally or for a particular area or for a particular class of public utility services.

(4) The notice of strike referred to in sub-section (1) shall be given by such number of persons to such person or persons and in such manner as may be prescribed.

(5) The notice of lock-out referred to in sub-section (2) shall be given in such manner as may be prescribed.

(6) If on any day an employer receives from any person employed by him any such notices as are referred to in sub-section (1) or gives to any persons employed by him any such notices as are referred to in sub-section (2), he shall within five days thereof report to the appropriate Government or to such authority as that Government may prescribe, the number of such notices received or given on that day.

RIGHT TO STRIKE

The right to strike work is not one of the fundamental rights recognised by the Constitution and would not come within the ambit of Art 19(1)(c) of the Constitution. Therefore, in this country nobody including a workman has a fundamental right to strike. However, strikes and lockouts are weapons in the armoury of labour and the employer in the process of collective bargaining all over the world. The Act does not purport to take away the right to strike or lockout. As a matter of fact, these rights have been impliedly recognised by the Act. The right to strike or the right to declare lockout may be controlled or restricted by a proper industrial legislation and the validity of such legislation would have to be decided not with reference to the criteria laid down in Art 19(4) of the Constitution but on totally different considerations.[1]Thus, the right of the workmen to strike and the right of the employer to lockout are regulated by the Act. With a view to achieve the purpose of the Act, viz, peaceful investigation and settlement of industrial disputes and for eliminating industrial strikes and lockouts, and achieving harmonious relations between the industrial employers and their workmen, the right of the workmen to strike and the right of the employer to lockout have been subjected to certain restrictions imposed by the Act. The Act has prohibited the resort to strikes and lockouts in certain circumstances. Sections 10(3) and 10 A(4A) prohibit the continuance of strikes and lockouts and ss 22 and 23 prohibit the commencement of strikes and lockouts in the circumstances stated therein.

Though the right to strike as a mode of redress of legitimate grievances of the workmen is recognised in industrial jurisprudence, this right is circumscribed by the statutory provision of this Act, and is to be exercised on compliance with the requirements of the provisions in ss 10(3), 10A(4A), 22 and 23 of the Act. A strike during the pendency of conciliation between the management and the workmen was held to be illegal. Furthermore, a strike by workmen for enforcement of a settlement between the management and workmen without complying with the requirements of r 58(4) of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 was held to be not permissible. The strikes and lockouts continued or commenced in contravention of these statutory provisions have been made illegal by s 24.[2] The Act, however, takes note only of the right of the workmen as defined in this Act to strike work. However, it does not recognise the right of non-workmen to strike. It is only the workmen who can raise an industrial dispute in connection with which they can strike. Since the right of raising an 'industrial dispute' is the right of the workmen, the right to go on strike, a priori, belongs to the workmen alone. Non-workmen do not, therefore, have the right to strike.[3]

(i) 'Public utility service'

This section is analogous to s 15 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. It was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947 and has not been amended since.[4]It bans the commencement of strikes and lockouts in public utility services while s 23 bans strikes and lockouts generally in industrial establishments, in the circumstances enumerated therein. Every industrial establishment is not a public utility service though every public utility service, is an industrial establishment. Therefore, the provisions of ss 22 and 23 cumulatively will apply to prohibition of strikes and lockouts in 'public utility services', as defined in s 2(n) of the Act.[5] The effect of combined reading of ss 22 and 23 is that a strike will be illegal if:

1. it is in breach of contract of employment;
2. the concern is a public utility concern; and 3.
   (i) notice required by s 22(1) has not been given;
   (ii) it is commenced during the period of operation of a settlement or an award in respect of the matters covered by that settlement or award; or
   (iii) it is commenced;
      (a) during the pendency of conciliation proceedings, and
      (b) within seven days from the conclusion of such proceedings; or
   (iv) it is commenced during the pendency of:
      (a) adjudication proceedings before a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal, or
      (b) within two months after the conclusion of such proceedings; or
      (c) during the pendency of arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator; or
      (d) within two months after the conclusion of such proceedings where a notification under sub-s 3A of s 10A has been issued.

The object of the legislature in giving additional protection to public utility services was to provide safeguard to the running of public utility services and to obviate the possibilities of inconvenience to the general public and society.[6] The breach of s 22 or 23, makes the strikes illegal and entails the penalties under s 26. In Swadeshi Industries, the facts disclosed that the company was running three units, namely, cotton textile weaving, silk mill and an art silk products manufacturing unit. Cotton textiles industry was notified to be a public utility service. The concerned workmen, 230 in number, were employed at the time of their going on strike in the silk mill unit. No evidence was led by the company to show that at or about the relevant time or prior to that the concerned workmen had ever worked in the cotton weaving mill. There was nothing to show that any work in the cotton textile section was ever assigned to any of the concerned workmen. On this evidence, it was held that the workmen concerned could not be considered to have been employed in a public utility service.[7]

(ii) Burden of Proof

Apart from the above requirements, making a strike illegal, two other important ingredients have to be proved, namely: (i) that the concern in which a strike took place is a 'public utility service' within the meaning of s 2(n) of the Act and (ii) that the strike is in 'breach of a contract of service' of the striking workmen. The burden to prove that the strike was resorted to in breach of the contract of employment and that the concern is a public utility concern is on the employer. There cannot, however, be any set formulae for proving breach of contract on the part of employers or employees. The proof will depend upon the facts and circumstances arising in a particular case. As the expression 'breach of contract' does not mean breach of a condition of service, it is not incumbent on the prosecution to produce and prove the standing rules in order to establish that the employees were guilty of breaking the contract.[8]

(iii) Prohibition of Strikes in a Public Utility Service

The Act, as regards strikes, makes a clear distinction between persons employed in a 'public utility service' and those employed in ordinary industrial occupations. The enactment of s 22, is for the purpose of preventing a handful of workmen employed in public utility services from holding the community at large to ransom by resorting to lightning strikes. Such workmen are not shorn of their right to go on strike, but a qualification is attached thereto requiring them to fulfil certain additional conditions as enumerated in the four clauses of s 22(1) of the Act. These conditions have been prescribed for avoiding inconvenience to the society and the general public. The relevant rule for notice is r 74 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 which prescribes Form 'L' for giving notice, regarding precise specification of the date on which the strike is to commence. The obvious object is to enable the authorities to make alternative arrangements for running the public utility service vital to the day-to-day life of the community in the event of a strike. The provisions are mandatory and their violation would not only entail penal consequences under the Act, but will also expose the workmen to the disciplinary action against the misconduct of going on an illegal strike apart from disentitling them to wages for the period of the strike.[9] The NCL-II recommended that in the case of socially essential services like water supply, medical services, sanitation, electricity and transport, when there is a dispute between employers and employees in an enterprise, and when the dispute is not settled through mutual negotiations, there may be a strike ballot as in other enterprises, and if the strike ballot shows that 51% of workers are in favour of a strike, it should be taken that the strike has taken place, and the dispute must forthwith be referred to compulsory arbitration [by arbitrators from the panel of the Labour Relations Commission (LRC), or arbitrators agreed to by both sides].[10]

(iv) Notice

If the strike is to be resorted to in a public utility service, s 22 enjoins upon the persons proposing to go on strike to comply with the following requirements:

(a) The notice of the intention to go on strike should be in the prescribed manner as required by sub-s (4). Rule 71 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 requires that the notice shall be in Form 'L'.

(b) Before the date of striking, the notice should have been given within six weeks. In other words, from the date of the notice to the date of strike a period of six weeks should not have elapsed. After the expiry of six weeks, a fresh notice with all its requirements will all over again become necessary [s 22(1)(a)].

(c) A period of 14 days must have elapsed from the date of notice to the date of the strike [s 22(1)(c)].

(d) The date specified in the notice must have expired on the day of strike [s 22(1)(d), r 71, Form 'L'].

Thus, if the workmen proposed to go on strike on 15 October 1998, the notice of strike should be given on any date not earlier than 1 September 1998 and not later than 1 October 1998 specifying therein that the strike will be resorted to on 14 October. In Mineral Miners' Union, the issue was about the interpretation of the phrase within six weeks before striking work, appearing in s 22(1)(a). The brief facts were: the union issued a notice of strike on 01 September 1984 intimating its intention to go on one day token strike on any day after 20 September 1984. Conciliation proceedings commenced thereon and took place in terms of s 20(1) of the ID Act on 19 September 1984. On 1 October 1984, the conciliation failed and report about the failure of conciliation was submitted to the State Government on 12 October 1984. But the parties were informed about the failure of conciliation on 09 November 1984. The members of the union went on strike on 10 December 1984. The management considered that the strike resorted to by the workmen without a fresh notice and without informing the date of strike was illegal, and in the circumstances, the workmen were not entitled to wages. Accordingly, the management published a notice on 20 December 1984 stating that on the principle of 'no work, no pay', the workmen were not entitled to wages on 10 December 1984. The management also informed that they were deducting 8 days wages from the wages payable to the workmen, as permitted u/s 9(2) of the Payment of Wages Act 1936. The two points, namely, (i) what is meant by the expression "within six weeks before striking"; and (ii) "whether a fresh notice of strike is required to be served in respect of the same demands, if six weeks stand expired from the date of first notice", need some analysis. Rama Jois J held:

> On a harmonious construction of the relevant provisions of the Act it is clear that fresh notice of strike u/s. 22(1) is necessary if, in a given case, by the date on which the failure of conciliation is intimated, six weeks period from the date of notice of strike issued earlier u/s. 22(1) of the Act had expired. In respect of public utility services, workmen cannot go on strike abruptly which would result in irreparable loss and damage to the industry and State. Workmen could go on strike after the expiry of seven days after the date of conclusion of conciliation in failure. If by that time, six weeks had expired from the date of notice of strike issued u/s. 22(1), the issuance of a fresh notice u/s. 22(1) is obligatory on the part of the workmen. If such notice is issued, the provisions of Ss. 12(1) and 20(1) are not applicable though the demand in respect of which the fresh notice of strike is given is identical with the one, which was the subject matter of earlier notice of strike and conciliation proceedings which ended in failure. Any other interpretation will lead to incongruous results for the result would be commencement of purposeless conciliation and a continued prohibition of strike and the same cycle continuing endlessly, resulting in total prohibition of strike though such result is unintended by S. 22 of the Act. The only course open under the Act to prevent the strike in public utility service is to refer the demands for adjudication u/s. 10 of the Act.[11] (Paras 8 & 10) (Italics supplied).

The same question came up before the SC in Essorpe Mills.[12] Pasayat J (for self and Sathasivam J), gave a curious interpretation to the words "within six weeks before striking", appearing in s 22 (1) (a). The learned judge held that the said expression meant that, in a public utility service, no strike can be resorted until the expiry of the six weeks. The learned judge observed:

> Somewhat unacceptable plea has been taken by the respondents 2 to 23 that in terms of Section 22(1)(b) after 14 days of giving the notice, the workmen can go on strike. If this plea is accepted, six weeks' time stipulated in Section 22 (1)(a) becomes redundant. The expression "giving such notice" as appearing in Section 22(1)(b) refers to the notice u/ s. 22(1)(a). Obviously, therefore, the workmen cannot go on strike within six weeks notice in terms of Section 22(1)(a) and 14 days thereafter in terms of Section 22(1)(b). .. the expression "such notice" refers to 6 weeks advance notice. Earlier illegal strike is not remedied by a subsequent strike as provided in Section 22. If such stand is accepted it will go against the requirement of Section 22 which aims at stalling action for illegal strike. (Paras 19 & 20)

This is a wrong reading and a misconstruction of the said provision in its entirety. If the interpretation placed by the learned judge were to be accepted as correct, then what is the significance and import of cl(b), which prohibits strike 'within fourteen days of giving such notice'? And what is the import of cl(c), which extends the said prohibition in terms: 'before the expiry of the date of strike specified in any such notice as aforesaid'? The fallacy of above reasoning lies in the fact that the learned judge proceeded to expound the said provision in the reverse direction. Where, for instance, a provision prescribes a longer period in order for some act or event to be legal and, in the same breath, also prescribes a shorter period for the same act or event to be legal, then which of the two periods get eclipsed and become redundant - the longer one or the shorter one? The answer is too obvious. It is not the "six weeks time" [cl. (a)], which becomes redundant, as averred by the learned judge, but the "expiry of fourteen days" [cl (b)] and the "expiry of the date, if any, prescribed in the notice" [cl (c)], which become redundant. This is because of the fact that the period of six weeks stipulated in cl (a) is a longer period and takes into its fold the shorter periods stipulated in the next two clauses. In the face of this position, to hold that "if this plea is accepted, six weeks' time stipulated in Section 22(1)(a) becomes redundant" is a misreading of the provision in its comprehensive whole. Secondly, if the intention of the legislature were to prohibit a strike or lockout until after the expiry of six weeks from the date of notice, what was the need for incorporating clauses (b) & (c) in the section; and for what ostensible purpose? In view of the settled legal position that no court should presume that the legislature has used words either wastefully or without purpose, what would be the significance of clauses (b) & (c), which prescribe certain vital conditions in substantial terms? The correct legal position with regard to strikes in a public utility service u/s 22 can be stated thus:

(i) No strike (or lockout) can be resorted to without serving a notice of six weeks on the opposite party with a copy to the conciliation officer.

(ii) The notice so served shall remain in force for a period of six weeks (42 days).

(iii) In any case, the strike cannot be resorted to until the expiry of the first 14 days after the issue of the notice, as it is considered as the 'cooling off' period.

(iv) In a situation, where the party mentions a specific date in the notice on or after which, it intends to strike work, it cannot resort to strike until the expiry of the said date, notwithstanding the fact that the first 14 days stood expired.

(v) Where the conciliation has failed and the failure report is received by the Government, the party cannot strike work within 7 days of the receipt of the failure report. (This period is intended for giving time to the Government to take a decision and make a reference of the dispute for adjudication).

(vi) If the Government makes a reference, no strike can be resorted to during the pendency of the adjudication proceedings and within two months after the conclusion thereof.

(vii) If, in the rare eventuality of the Government not referring the dispute within 7 days after the receipt of the failure report, the party is free to strike work (or declare a lockout) after the expiry of the 7th day.

What is crucial in this process is Point No. (vii) above, i.e., the non-reference of the dispute by the Government for adjudication, which, of course, is an exception than a rule, in so far as a public utility service is concerned. On this aspect, Rama Jois J of the Karnataka HC rightly reasoned and concluded that if the government has not referred the dispute for adjudication after the receipt of the failure report and, in the meantime, the outer limit of six weeks stood expired from the date of strike notice, then there is no need for the union to issue a fresh notice, as it would result in the commencement of purposeless conciliation and a continued prohibition of strike and the same cycle continuing endlessly, resulting in total prohibition of strike. Justice Rama Jois, rightly observed that such an absurd legal position would not have been intended by s 22. It is submitted that the reasoning and conclusion reached by Rama Jois J are right, whereas the interpretation placed by Pasayat J is unsound for the reason that it renders the whole section a dead letter and non est. This decision needs to be reviewed by a larger Bench and overruled.[13]

In Bharatiya ANSKCPG Hospital, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that if the employer bona fide believes and decides that the strike resorted by workmen is an illegal strike within the meaning of s 22, he need not go to a court of law to get it declared illegal before initiating disciplinary action or dismissing the workmen.[14] In Bharat Petroleum, the facts disclosed that the trade union conducted a gate meeting to take strike ballot with 92 percent of workers voting in favour of strike. The management immediately took steps to shut the operations of refinery one-by-one in view of the apprehension that any stoppage of work by a section of workmen in the refinery with highly interdependent operations might lead to an explosion endangering the safety and security not only of the plant and personnel, but also the lives of people living in the neighbourhood of the refinery. Kochar J of the Bombay High Court held that the workmen were not entitled to wages for the strike period. He observed that, given the extremely sensitive and hazardous nature of operations, such establishments as refineries should be treated as the 'intensive care units' of the nation, and further held that it is high time that all and every strike in public utility services should be banned by law.[15]

Where the employees of Food Corporation of India belonging to scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, in the course of protest against their transfer to Andhra region, indulged in acts of violence, threatening with inflammatory agitation not conducive to the reputation of the institution and interfering with the conduct of business, the application for grant of injunction restraining the employees from resorting to such forms of demonstration is maintainable. Employees do not have any right to indulge in such activities, which cannot be supported by law in the light of the fact that no notice of strike was given as required under s 22. Injunction was granted restraining the employees from holding demonstrations, shouting slogans, exhibiting banners, placards and posters within a distance of 100 meters from the office of the corporation.[16] Where the bank management deducted a full day's wages in respect of a strike resorted to by the employees lasting for one and a half hours and one hour on different dates, it was held that the action of the management deducting a full day's wages for stoppage of work on each occasion was justified.[17]

(v) Settlements and Awards

Section 18 makes settlements and awards binding on the parties and s 19 lays down the period of operation of the settlements and awards. During the period of operation of the settlements and awards, strike action is prohibited in respect of any of the matters covered by such settlement or awards [s 23(c)]. The words 'in respect of the matters covered by the settlement or award' have been deliberately inserted in cl (c) of s 23 to limit its operation. During the period in which a settlement or award is in operation, the workmen cannot strike and the employer cannot lockout in respect of any of the matters covered by the settlement or award. Strikes and lockouts in respect of other matters are not prohibited. A clear distinction between strikes and lockouts relating to matters in respect of which an award or settlement has been made and strikes or lockouts connected with matters not covered by such an award or settlement, has been made.[18] In Ballarpur Collieries, the Patna High Court held that the regional labour commissioner merely used his good offices in effecting some sort of a settlement and did not act in terms of the statutory provisions of the Act. Since the conciliation proceedings and the matter in dispute at the time of the strike were not covered by the settlement of the regional labour commissioner, it was held that cl (c) of s 23 would have no application.[19] A settlement, which does not conform to the requirements of the expression as defined in s 2(p) as, for instance, it is a mere agreement or an acquiescence without being in writing and signed, will not be a settlement, the breach of which will attract the provision of s 23 (c).[20]

(vi) Conciliation Proceedings

In a public utility service, during the pendency of conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer as well as the Board, and up to the expiry of seven days from the date of conclusion of such proceedings, resort to strike is prohibited [ss 22(1)(d) and 23(a)]. Sub-sections (1)(d) and (2)(d) lays down that no person employed in a public utility service shall go on strike in breach of contract and no employer carrying on public utility service shall declare a lockout during conciliation proceedings before a conciliation officer and seven days after the conclusion of such proceedings. The effect of these provisions is clear. If a strike or lockout is declared in a public utility service during the pendency of conciliation proceedings or till the expiry of seven days after the conclusion of such proceedings, it would be illegal. The pendency of a conciliation proceeding on a dispute relating to all the employees will operate as a bar against all the employees going on strike. However, if the conciliation proceedings in question are confined to a specific demand limited to a specific class of employees, the other workmen who are not concerned with the said demand, may not be bound by the said proceedings.[21]

In Industry Colliery, the facts briefly were: The conciliation officer submitted his report on 20 October 1949, i.e., well within 14 days from the commencement of the conciliation proceedings as required by s 12(4) of the Act. The report was sent through the 'routine official channel' and was received in the office of the chief labour commissioner at New Delhi on 25 October 1949. However, the report was not passed on to the Ministry of Labour which was also at New Delhi until about 17 November 1949. The employees had no means of knowing when the report was actually 'received' by the Central Government which was the 'appropriate Government' or when the period of seven days after such receipt expired. In these circumstances, the employees went on strike on 7 November 1949 in accordance with the date specified in their notice. However, in view of the fact that the chief labour commissioner was not the agent of the Central Government, the 'receipt' by him was not the receipt by the Central Government. Hence, on strict construction of the provisions of s 22(1), it was held by the Supreme Court that the strike was illegal and the employees must face and bear the consequences of an illegal strike. The reason is that if in respect of a public utility service, the workmen go on strike abruptly it is sure to result in great inconvenience to the public and might result in irreparable loss and damage to the industry and to the state. Thus, although factually the conciliation proceedings terminate when a settlement is arrived at or when it is found that no settlement can be arrived at, in the latter case, the Act by a legal fiction, prolongs the conclusion of the conciliation proceedings to the date of the actual receipt of the report by the appropriate Government and goes on further to provide that the appropriate Government must have seven days time to consider what further steps it would take under the Act.[22] Hence, up to the expiry of this period of seven days, from the day the Government received the conciliation officer's report, the Act prohibits any strike, but after that period is over, the employees are free to resort to strike.

(vii) Adjudication and Arbitration Proceedings

During the pendency of adjudication proceedings before a labour court, a tribunal or a national tribunal and till the expiry of two months after the conclusion of such proceedings, the commencement of strike in any industrial establishment, a fortiori, in a public utility service is prohibited [s 23(b)]. Section 20(3) deals with the commencement and conclusion of the proceedings before the labour court, tribunal, national tribunal or the arbitrator under s 10A. Likewise, during the pendency of arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator and till the expiry of two months after the conclusion of such proceedings, where a notification under s 10A(3A) has been issued, the commencement of strike is prohibited [s 23(bb)]. The object of ss 22 and 23 is to ensure an atmosphere of calm and peace during the period of conciliation proceedings before Boards, adjudication proceedings before labour courts, tribunals and national tribunals, and arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator under s 10A. Strikes and lockouts are forbidden not only during the pendency of proceedings before these authorities, but also till the expiry of seven days after the conclusion of the proceedings before the conciliatory authorities and till the expiry of two months after the conclusion of the proceedings before the adjudicatory authorities. The words in these clauses cover all strikes and lockouts irrespective of the subject-matter of the dispute pending before these authorities.[23] Thus, where the solutions regarding victimisation of workers and certain pending demands were not put for consideration before the tribunal, it was held that that would not make any difference in as much as the workers are not permitted in law to resort to a strike during the pendency of proceeding before the tribunal or a Board or an arbitrator under s 10A according to the conditions laid down both under s 22 and s 23 of the Act.[24] However, where in a pending reference, neither the employer nor the workmen were taking any part, it was held that cl (b) of s 23 would have no application to the strike declared during the pendency of such reference.[25]

(viii) 'In Breach of Contract'

The word 'contract' means contract of service. Such contract may be express or implied, and the expression 'breach of contract' in ss 22 & 23 of the Act means breach of contract of service or employment and not a special contract to not go on strike.[26] This is clear from the fact that while there must necessarily be a contract of service, express or implied, between a workman and his employer, a special contract not to go on strike does not constitute an essential part of the contract between a workman and his employer, so that a contract of service may exist without any special contract, in the contract of employment of every workman, there is an implied term that he will work according to the rules of the concern in which he is employed.[27] The expression 'breach of contract' does not mean breach of a condition of service. The provisions of ss 22 & 26 read together are of a penal nature and have to be construed strictly.[28] A mere breach of a Standing Order is not sufficient to make a strike illegal under ss 23 & 24 of the Act. It may be that the Standing Orders, after having been approved by the statutory authority, regulate the contractual relationship between the workmen and the employer, and any strike in contravention of the terms of the Standing Orders may be strike in breach of contract. However, s 23 does not say that a strike in 'breach of contract' is by itself sufficient to make the strike illegal. On the other hand, that section clearly states that, apart from the 'breach of contract', the strike or lockout must have been resorted to during the pendency of the proceedings in terms of cll (a), (b) & (bb), or during the period of operation of a settlement or award, in terms of cl (c) before it can be held to be illegal. In other words, it must have taken place during the pendency of conciliation proceedings or during pendency of the proceedings before an adjudicatory authority or during any period in which the settlement in respect of any of the matters covered by the settlement is in operation.[29] There cannot be any set formulae for proving breach of contract on the part of the employees. The proof will depend upon the facts and circumstances arising in a particular case.[30]

SUB-SECTION (2): PROHIBITION OF LOCKOUT IN A 'PUBLIC UTILITY SERVICE'

Sub-section (2) prohibits an employer from declaring lockout in a public utility service in contravention of the provisions thereof. Whatever has been stated in the preceding paragraphs in relation to strike applies in equal measure to a case of lockout in a public utility service.

SUB-SECTION (3): NO NOTICE IN CASE OF EXISTING STRIKE OR LOCKOUT

Sub-section (3) provides that: (1) if a strike is already in existence at the time of declaring a lockout, a notice of such lockout as required by sub-s (2) shall not be necessary. Similarly, if a lockout is already in existence at the time of declaring a strike, a notice of such strike as required by sub-s (1) shall also not be necessary. This sub-section is in the nature of an exception to cll (a), (b) and (c) of sub-ss (1) and (2), respectively. However, a duty is cast on the employer to send intimation of the lockout declared by him or of the strike declared by the workmen, which falls within the purview of sub-s (3). Such intimation in either case, is to be sent by the employer to the authority specified by the appropriate Government.

SUB-SECTIONS (4) AND (5): MANNER OF SERVING OF NOTICE

Sub-sections (4) and (5) lay down that the notice of strike or lockout as contemplated by sub-s (1) or (2), as the case may be, shall be given by such number of persons to such person or persons in the manner as may be prescribed. Rules 71 to 74 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 lays down that the notice of strike to be given by workmen in a public utility service shall be in Form 'L'. Form 'L' requires that the notice shall be given by five elected representatives of workmen and shall specify the date on which they propose to call the strike and also to state the reasons for going on strike. This rule further requires the employer to intimate the conciliation officer having jurisdiction in the matter, of the fact of his having received the notice forthwith. Rule 72 prescribes that the notice of lockout shall be in Form 'M', and further requires the employer to display the notices conspicuously on the notice board at the main entrance of the establishment and in the manager's office and further to serve a copy of the notice on the secretary of the trade union where a registered trade union exists. Form 'M' requires the employer to state the reasons therein for declaring the lockout. Rule 73 prescribes Form 'N' for the notice of lockout or strike in a public utility service to be submitted by the employer.

SUB-SECTION (6)

Sub-section (6) further requires the employer to send a report to the appropriate Government or such authority as that Government may prescribe of the number of notices received by him under sub-s (1) from any person employed by him or the notice given to any persons employed by him under sub-s (2) within five days of the receipt of giving of such notices. Rule 74 prescribes that the report of the notice of strike or lockout to be submitted by the employer under sub-s (6) of s 22 shall be sent by registered post or given personally to the conciliation officer (central) appointed for the local area concerned, with a copy by registered post to the authorities enumerated therein.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER V Strikes and Lockouts

S. 23. General Prohibition of Strikes and Lock-outs.—

No workman who is employed in any industrial establishment shall go on strike in breach of contract and no employer of any such workman shall declare a lock-out—

(a) during the pendency of conciliation proceedings before a Board and seven days after the conclusion of such proceedings;

(b) during the pendency of proceedings before [31][a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal] and two months after the conclusion of such proceedings; [32][* * *]

33[(bb) during the pendency of arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator and two months after the conclusion of such proceedings, where a notification has been issued under sub-section (3-A) of Section 10-A ; or]

(c) during any period in which a settlement or award is in operation, in respect of any of the matters covered by toe settlement or award.

GENERAL RESTRICTION ON STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

The provisions of ss 22 & 23 cumulatively apply to public utility services, while the provisions of s 23 apply to public and non-public utility services. Section 23 imposes a general restriction on declaring strikes and lockouts in breach of contract:

(i) during the pendency and till the expiry of seven days after the conclusion of conciliation proceedings before a Board;

(ii) during the pendency and two months after the conclusion of proceedings pending before a labour court, tribunal or national tribunal;

(iii) during the pendency and two months after the conclusion of arbitration proceedings before an arbitrator, where a notification has been issued under sub-s (3A) of s 10A ; and

(iv) during the period of operation of a settlement or award in respect of the matters covered by such settlement or award.

The pendency of proceedings contemplated by cll (a), (b) & (bb) refers to the parties to the proceedings either actually or constructively. Hence, the pendency of an industrial dispute under s 2A before a tribunal will not be a bar to the workmen going on strike in general room.[34] In Gujarat Steel Tubes, Krishna Iyer J pointed out that s 23(a) appears to convey the meaning that strike will be illegal when launched during the pendency of adjudication of another industrial dispute, although the ambit of cl (a) may have to be investigated fully in some appropriate case in the light of its scheme and rationale. The learned judge observed:

> It looks strange that the pendency of a reference on a tiny or obscure industrial dispute and they often tend too long-should block strikes on totally unconnected yet substantial and righteous demands. The constitutional implications and practical complications of such a veto of a valuable right to strike often leads not to industrial peace but to seething unrest and lawless strikes. This will equally apply to cases of lockout as well.[35]

'EMPLOYED IN ANY INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENT'

The words 'employed in any industrial establishment' must mean employed in some particular place, being the place used for manufacture or an activity amounting to 'industry' as that term is used in the Act. The words 'industrial establishment' means the place at which workmen are employed and the words as used in s 2(n)(ii) must have the same meaning as they are used in s 23 of the Act.[36] As such, s 23 cannot cover the case of workmen in Bombay striking against an employer with whom employees in Calcutta have a dispute.[37]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER V Strikes and Lockouts

S. 24. Illegal Strikes and Lockouts.—

(1) A strike or a lock-out shall be illegal if—

(i) it is commenced or declared in contravention of Section 22 or Section 23 ; or

(ii) it is continued in contravention of an order made under sub-section (3) of Section 10[38][or sub-section (4-A) of Section 10-A].

(2) Where a strike or lock-out in pursuance of an industrial dispute has already commenced and is in existence at the time of the reference of the dispute to a Board, [39][an arbitrator, a] [40][Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal], the continuance of such strike or lock-out shall not be deemed to be illegal, provided that such strike or lock-out was not at its commencement in contravention of the provisions of this Act or the continuance thereof was not prohibited under sub-section (3) of Section 10[41][or sub-section (4-A) of Section 10-A]

(3) A lock-out declared in consequence of an illegal strike or a strike declared in consequence of an illegal lock-out shall not be deemed to be illegal.

LEGISLATION

This section is based on s 16 of the repealed Trade Disputes Act 1929. The section was enacted as part of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947. The amendments have been footnoted in the body of the section.

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS, WHEN ILLEGAL AND WHEN NOT ILLEGAL

Section 24 lays down the circumstances under which strikes and lockouts shall be illegal and under which they shall not be deemed to be illegal.

(1) A strike or a lockout shall be illegal if it is:

(i) commenced or declared in contravention of s 22 in a public utility service;

(ii) commenced or declared in contravention of s 23 in any industrial establishment;

(iii) continued in contravention of an order made by the 'appropriate Government' under s 10(3) of the Act; or

(iv) continued in contravention of an order made by the 'appropriate Government' under sub-s (4A) of s 10A and a notification has been issued under sub-s (3A) of s 10A.

(2) A strike or a lockout shall not be deemed to be illegal if:

(i) it is at its commencement not in contravention of the provisions of this Act; or

(ii) its continuance has not been prohibited by the appropriate Government under s 10(3) or s 10A(4A) and notification as required by s 10A(3A) is not issued;

(iii) a lockout is declared in consequence of an illegal strike or a strike is declared in consequence of an illegal lockout.

It is not that every strike is illegal. In fact, workers have a right to go on strike whenever they like in order to demonstrate their grievances or to make certain demands in the process of collective bargaining. This right of the workmen cannot be impaired. Section 24 makes the strikes illegal only when they contravene the provisions of ss 10(3), 10A(4A), 22 and 23 of the Act.[42] In Otis Elevator, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that a lockout declared in violation of s 24(2), though illegal at its commencement and until the expiry of 14 days from the date of such commencement, could still be a legal lockout subsequent to the expiry of the period of 14 days.[43] A lockout declared by the management from 24 December 1983 as a consequence of continuous 'go-slow' resorted to by the workmen, coupled with taking out processions, slogan-shouting, etc., and a total strike on 23 December 1983, and the continuance of it up till 8 February 1984 was legal and that the workmen were not entitled to wages for the whole period of lockout.[44] In India Radiators, the facts disclosed that the management declared a lockout from October 22 1986 till November 18 1986, as a consequence of 'go-slow' resorted to by the workmen and the consequent fall in the production. The management further maintained that the said go-slow was also in contravention of an incentive scheme which, inter alia, required that the workmen "should not resort to any direct action like not working for incentive, before the failure of mutual discussion". The facts further disclosed that mutual discussion was in progress at the time the workmen decided to reduce the level of production, and that, sometime after the lock-out was declared, the disputes which had led to the go-slow and the subsequent lock-out was in fact resolved amicably. While so amicably resolving the dispute which concerned bonus and also general demands it was agreed that the question of wages for the lock-out period would be referred for adjudication. The tribunal held that the lockout was unjustified. Setting aside the order of the tribunal, Jayasimha Babu J of the Madras High Court cited the observations of the court in an earlier decision involving the same parties as follows:

> 'Slowing down' implies the existence of a higher level before slowing down commenced, and falling to the lower level after the slowing down was practised. The lower level of production was in this case, only by reason of the deliberate action of the workmen in not exerting themselves to the level which they were capable and maintained consistently for a long period of time.[45]

The learned judge further observed:

> The object of the Industrial Disputes Act is to provide a machinery for the peaceful resolution of differences between the management and workmen so that even during the currency of the dispute, the work of the industry goes on unhampered and that the levels of production are not brought down by reason of the disputes for resolving which provision is made in the Act by way of settlement, by way of mutual negotiations, through conciliation, as also the resolution of disputes through the machinery of arbitration and ultimately by adjudication. The very object of establishing industry is to produce goods or services and the joint effort of management and labour in the organised industry is aimed at maintaining a level of production which at the best of times should be the optimal level having regard to the resources available and the conditions of the market in which such goods and services are bought or sold. Declining to maintain the higher level of production is, therefore, not a part of the role assigned either to the management, or workmen as a lever in bargaining with each other. The incentive scheme in this case did require the maintenance of a level of production which had taken note of what the workmen were capable of doing and which they admittedly were doing by ensuring the higher level of production which they were giving prior to their own decision voluntarily taken to slow down the production.. . The action of the workmen in deliberately slowing down the production contrary to the terms of the scheme which was binding on them, the scheme being part of the settlement which had been entered into bilaterally did amount to breach of the requirements of Section 23 of the Act, more particularly, sub-clause (c) which resulted in the management having the right to regard the lock-out declared by it as legal and justified by reason of the illegal strike resulting from the breach of the terms of the scheme on the part of the workmen.[46]

The above decision of Jayasimha Babu J when considered against the backdrop of the anarchic decisions handed down in Gujarat Steel Tubes,[47] and Glaxo Laboratories,[48]looks all the more handsome in so far as it gives an assurance to the industrial community as well as every civilised citizen of the country that sanity and good sense - which became so conspicuous by their absence for nearly two decades - have not totally disappeared from the precincts of higher courts. The learned judge deserves full compliments for expounding the law consistent with the spirit and scheme of the Act.

CHAPTER V Strikes and Lockouts

S. 25. Prohibition of financial aid to illegal Strikes and Lockouts.—

No person shall knowingly expend or apply any money in direct furtherance or support of any illegal strike or lockout.

ILLEGAL STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

The word 'illegal' occurring before 'strike or lockouts' qualifies both the words, namely, 'strikes' as well as 'lockouts'. In other words, financial aid, both to illegal strikes as well as to illegal lockouts, is prohibited by s 25.

MENS REA

The section makes it clear, by the use of the word 'knowingly', that before a person can be said to have contravened the provisions of s 25, he must have knowledge that the strike or lockout in direct furtherance or support of which he has expended or applied any money, must be an illegal strike or lockout. If the strike or lockout is not illegal, the provisions of this section are not attracted.[49] This section should be read along with s 28 which prescribes penalty for giving financial aid to illegal strikes and lockouts. The cumulative effect of both these sections is that before a person can be convicted for its breach, the prosecution must prove that:

1. the strike or lockout in question was illegal; and
2. the accused had the knowledge:
   (i) that the strike or lockout is illegal; and
   (ii) that the money expended by him was in direct furtherance or support of the strike or lockout; and
   (iii) that the money was expended or applied by the accused.

The NCL-II made the following observations in respect of strikes:

> Strike could be called only by the recognised negotiating agent and that too only after it had conducted a strike ballot amongst all the workers, of whom at least 51 percent support the strike. Correspondingly, an employer will not be allowed to declare a lockout except with the approval at the highest level of management except in cases of actual or grave apprehension of physical threat to the management or to the establishment. The appropriate Government will have the authority to prohibit a strike or lockout by a general or special order and refer for adjudication the issue leading to the strike/lockout. The general provisions like giving of notice of not less than 14 days, not declaring a strike or lockout over a dispute which is in conciliation or adjudication and so on will be incorporated in the law. In this context we also recommend that an illegal strike or illegal lockout should attract similar penalties. A worker who goes on an illegal strike should lose three days wages for every day of illegal strike, and the management must pay the worker wages equivalent to three days wages per day of the duration of an illegal lockout. The union which leads an illegal strike must be de-recognised and debarred from applying for registration or recognition for a period of two or three years.[50]

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25A. Application of Sections 25C to 25E.—

(1) Sections 25-C to 25 -E inclusive [8][shall not apply to industrial establishments to which Chapter V-B applies, or—]

(a) to industrial establishments in which less than fifty workmen on an average per working day have been employed in the preceding calendar month; or

(b) to industrial establishments which are of a seasonal character or in which work is performed only intermittently.

(2) If a question arises whether an industrial establishment is of a seasonal character or whether work is performed therein only intermittently, the decision of the appropriate Government thereon shall be final.

[9][Explanation.—In this section and in Sections 25-C, 25-D and 25-E, "industrial establishment" means—

(i) a factory as defined in clause (m) of Section 2 of the Factories Act, 1948 (63 of 1948); or

(ii) a mine as defined in clause (j) of Section 2 of the Mines Act, 1952 (35 of 1952); or

(iii) a plantation as defined in clause (f) of Section 2 of the Plantations Labour Act, 1951(69 of 1951)].

EXEMPTIONS TO CERTAIN INDUSTRIES FROM APPLICATION OF SECTIONS 25C TO 25E

Three types of 'industrial establishments' have been exempted from the provisions of ss 25C to 25E, namely:

(i) those to which ch VB applies;

(ii) those in which less than fifty workmen on an average per working day have been employed in the preceding calendar month; or

(iii) those which are of seasonal character or in which work is performed intermittently.

The result is that the last two types of industrial establishments are exempted from the payment of lay-off compensation as required under s 25C, maintaining the muster rolls of workmen as required by s 25D and compliance with the requirements of s 25E. However, to the establishments of the first type, the provisions of ss 25M and 25O will apply. In case an industrial establishment falls under one of the last two types, the industrial tribunals have no jurisdiction to award lay-off compensation to the workmen employed in such an industrial establishment. Again the tribunals cannot circumvent the statute by calling the compensation awarded by them as 'unemployment compensation' or by any other name. The matter is governed by the provisions of the statute rather than considerations of equity or social justice. The bar of s 25A is absolute.[10] However, in Kundan Iron & Steel, despite the finding that the provisions of s 25C were not applicable to the facts of the case, a single judge of the Punjab High Court held that the award granting compensation was justified because the lay-off virtually amounted to mala fide termination of the services of the workmen.[11] This decision does not lay down the correct law.

SUB-SECTION (1): EXEMPTION FROM SECTIONS 25C TO 25E

(i) Clause (a)

(a) 'On an Average per Working Day'

The words 'on an average per working day' are significant. The provisions of s 25C are not applicable to industrial establishments in which less than 50 workmen on an average per working day have been employed in the preceding calendar month. Therefore, even when more than 50 workmen had been employed on certain days, if the average number of persons employed per working day during the preceding month was less than 50, the provisions regarding lay-off would not apply. No compensation can, therefore, be claimed for lay-off in concerns in which less than 50 workmen on an average per working day have been employed in the preceding calendar month.[12]

(b) 'Preceding Calendar Month'

In Kohinoor Saw Mills, it was held that the expression 'preceding calendar month' can have reference only to a claim, arising under s 25C, i.e., a claim of a workman for compensation for having been laid-off by his employer. Thus, if that claim is satisfied by the employer, no further question could arise of the employer pleading that he is not liable to pay any compensation. If the claim of the workmen is resisted on the ground specified in s 25A(1)(a), that the industrial establishment is one in which less than 50 workmen were employed on an average per working day, the period with reference to which that test has to be applied is the calendar month that preceded that point of time, the point of time when the statutory right conferred by s 25C arose. The expression 'intermittent' is distinct from 'seasonal', implying seasonal or otherwise intermittent. 'Seasonal' would certainly appear to imply dependence on nature, over which obviously neither the employer nor the employee in a given industrial establishment has any control. The use of the words 'industrial establishment' limits the ambit of application of the provisions relating to 'lay-off' and 'retrenchment' to a particular factory or workshop.[13]

(ii) Clause (b): 'Seasonal Character'—'Intermittently'

Neither the expression 'seasonal' nor 'intermittent', as they occur in ss 25A(1)(b) and 25A(2), have been defined in the Act. However, in the context of s 25A(2), both the expressions are not synonymous. The exemption of this provision is available to only those establishments where the work is performed only intermittently. In Fisheries Terminal Division, the Supreme Court, while rejecting the contention that it was a seasonal establishment, observed that the claim was not substantiated by bringing relevant evidence on record. On this view of the matter, the court, while dismissing the appeal, held that the burden of proof that he was employed for 240 days was initially on the workman, but it shifts to the employer once the workman has discharged his burden once he has deposed from the witness box; and that as the employer had failed to produce complete records it could not sustain its stand, and further, on facts, procedure under Section 25-G was not followed.[14]

SUB-SECTION (2): DECISION OF THE GOVERNMENT

The expression 'question' in s 25A(2) implies a question at issue between two contending parties. Such a 'question' can arise only if there is a disputed claim to a right or a disputed liability. The Government can have jurisdiction to determine such a question only if it arises under s 25A(2), and its exercise thereof would be a quasi-judicial function, because a decision has to be given in a dispute between two contending parties. Such a decision could be given by the statutory authority normally only after giving an opportunity to both contending parties to make their representations.[15]

EXPLANATION: SCOPE OF AUTHORITY

The true scope and effect of the explanation is that it explains as to what categories of factories, mines or plantations, come within the meaning of the expression 'industrial establishment' for the purpose of ss 25A, 25C, 25P, 25E.[16] The definition of an industrial establishment in the explanation to s 25A(2) is limited in its scope and cannot apply to the interpretation of 'industrial establishment' as it has been used in s 25G. For the purposes of applying s 25G, the term 'industrial establishment' has not been defined in the Act.[17]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

[18][S. 25B. Definition of Continuous Service.—

For the purposes of this Chapter.—

(1) a workman shall be said to be in continuous service for a period if he is, for that period, in uninterrupted service, including service which may be interrupted on account of sickness or authorised leave or an accident or a strike which is not illegal, or a lock-out or a cessation of work which is not due to any fault on the part of the workman;

(2) where a workman is not in continuous service within the meaning of clause (1) for a period of one year or six months, he shall be deemed to be in continuous service under an employer—

(a) for a period of one year, if the workman, during a period of twelve calendar months preceding the date with reference to which calculation is to be made, has actually worked under the employer for not less than—

(i) one hundred and ninety days in the case of a workman employed below ground in a mine; and

(ii) two hundred and forty days, in any other case;

(b) for a period of six months, if the workman, during a period of six calendar months preceding the date with reference to which calculation is to be made, has actually worked under the employer for not less than—

(i) ninety-five days, in the case of a workman employed below ground in a mine; and

(ii) one hundred and twenty days, in any other case.

Explanation.—For the purposes of clause (2), the number of days on which a workman has actually worked under an employer shall include the days on which—

(c) he has been laid-off under an agreement or as permitted by standing orders made under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946 (20 of 1946) or under this Act or under any other law applicable to the industrial establishment;

(ii) he has been on leave with full wages, earned in the previous years;

(iii) he has been absent due to temporary disablement caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment; and

(iv) in the case of a female, she has been on maternity leave; so, however, that the total period of such maternity leave does not exceed twelve weeks].

CONTINUOUS SERVICE

This section has been substituted for the old s 25B and s 2(ee) by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964 (Act 36 of 1964). It consolidates the law in one place with minor additions and alterations. The definition of the expression ‘continuous service’ is prefaced with the words ‘for the purposes of this chapter’, which means that the effect of continuity or interruption of service in terms of this definition is to be limited only for the purposes of this chapter, viz, for calculating, quantifying and payment of compensation under the provisions contained in this chapter. The words 'continuous service' occur in ss 25B, 25C, 25F, 25FF, 25FFF in ch VA, which gives certain rights and advantages to the workmen who have been in 'continuous service' for a specified period of time. The section further lays down that the service shall be deemed to be continuous in spite of its interruption on account of any of the reasons stated therein and should remain uninterrupted.[19] According to this definition, what is required is that the workman should have been in 'continuous service' under an employer. The employer must be one and the same. It is, however, not necessary that the workman should work in the same capacity during the required period in order to earn 'continuous service' as defined in this section. If a person is a workman as defined in the Act and the employer is the same, he earns 'continuous service' by working for 240 days within a period of 12 calendar months preceding the date of retrenchment.[20] Sub-section (1) defines 'continuous service' for 'a period' as uninterrupted service for that period, and by fiction includes also the service interrupted for the enumerated reasons. Sub-section (2) introduces further fiction in calculating the continuous service for 'one year' or 'six months'.

SUB-SECTION (1): 'CONTINUOUS SERVICE FOR A PERIOD'

Under sub-s (1), 'continuous service for a period' may comprise of two periods, viz:

(i) Uninterrupted Service

The use of the words 'shall be said to be in continuous service' makes this part of the definition exhaustive, i.e., all uninterrupted service means 'continuous service', and

(ii) Interrupted

Service which is interrupted on account of any of the following reasons, namely:

(a) sickness,

(b) authorised leave,

(c) an accident,

(d) a strike which is not illegal,

(e) a lockout, or

(f) acessation of work that is not due to any fault on the part of the workman shall be included in the 'continuous service'.

The purport of this sub-section is that if a workman has been in 'uninterrupted service' of the establishment for a certain period, he shall be said to be in 'continuous service' for that period. For instance, if a person has been in uninterrupted service for a period of one year (12 months), he shall be said to be in continuous service for one year irrespective of the number of days he has actually worked. However, the workman must have been in service during the period, i.e., not only on days when he actually worked, but also on days he could not work under the circumstances set out in sub-s (1). In other words, he should be in the employment of the employer concerned not only on the days he has worked, but also on the days on which he had not worked either on account of his inability or on account of his being prevented by the employer from working.[21] Furthermore, even if his service during such period is interrupted by any of the reasons set out in the second part of this section, he shall still be in 'continuous service' for that period. It is obvious that the definition of the expression 'continuous service' in this section is in two parts. The first part is the meaning of the expression 'continuous service' and the second part is an inclusive definition. In regard to the first part, to be 'continuous', the service must be uninterrupted. The second part takes within the scope of the term 'continuous service' even the period of service which has been interrupted for the reasons enumerated therein. However this does not mean that if the service is interrupted for any reasons other than the enumerated reasons, it will ipso facto disrupt the contract of service or sever the vinculam juris of the relationship of employment. In such cases, the continuity of the contract of service will subsist albeit the continuity of service for the purposes of this chapter, viz, calculating, quantifying and payment of compensation is interrupted. In other words, for other purposes the 'continuity of service' will not be interrupted even if the interruption is not due to sickness, accident, or lockout, or is without leave, or is on account of illegal strike, or is for any fault on the part of a workman. For other purposes than the purposes of this chapter, the continuity of service will be interrupted or disrupted only when the employee is retrenched, discharged, dismissed or his service is otherwise terminated either in accordance with contract of service or in accordance with the Standing Orders of the establishment. For instance, taking part in an illegal strike amounts to misconduct on the part of an employee, for which he invites an order of dismissal. If certain workmen go on an illegal strike for a number of days, though the continuity of their service for the purposes of this chapter shall be ipso facto interrupted, their contract of service will not be disrupted causing the discontinuity of their service for other purposes.[22]

On the construction of the expression 'continuous service' as used in the provisions of a gratuity scheme under an award, in which it was not defined, the Supreme Court in Jeewanlal, observed that participation in an illegal strike may incur the punishment of dismissal, but mere participation in an illegal strike cannot be said to cause a breach in continuity of service for the purposes of gratuity.[23] However, on the construction of 'continuous service' in s 49B of the Factories Act 1948, in Buckingham & Carnatic, the court held that interruption by illegal strike by itself interrupted the continuity of service and there was no further necessity to terminate the service by way of dismissal for the misconduct of taking part in an illegal strike.[24] This view of the Supreme Court has been followed by the Madras High Court in construing the expression 'continuous service' occurring in the proviso to s 3 of the Tamil Nadu Industrial Establishments (National and Festival Holidays) Act, 1958 (prior to its amendment by the Madras Act (43 of 1961).[25]However, the meaning attributed to the words 'continuous service' in the context of the Factories Act or the National or Festival Holidays Act is not relevant for the construction of the expression as used in s 25B of the Industrial Disputes Act. The same words may mean one thing in one context and altogether another in a different context. The decision on the meanings of particular words or collocation of words in other statutes are scarcely of much value while construing specific statutes; they can be helpful, but cannot be taken as guides or precedent. The expression 'cessation of work' has to be interpreted ejusdem generis, i.e., when a particular expression precedes a general expression, the latter should be interpreted in the light of the former.[26] On the construction of this expression in the light of this rule, this expression has to be interpreted in the light of illegal strike or lockout and matters of similar nature which are not difficult to be foreseen like power failure, imposition of curfew, acceleration of bandhs, breakdown of law and order and related matters, merely because a casual worker was willing to work, there is no obligation on the part of the employer to provide him with work even if there is no work.[27]

SUB-SECTION (2): CONTINUOUS SERVICE FOR ONE YEAR OR SIX MONTHS

This sub-section introduces a fiction to the effect that even if a workman is not in 'continuous service' within the meaning of cl (i) for a period of one year or six months, he shall be deemed to be in continuous service for that period under an employer if he has 'actually worked' for the days specified in cll (a) and (b) thereof.

(i) Clause (a): Continuous service for a period of one year

By fiction of this clause even if a person has not been in 'continuous service' within the meaning of sub-cl (i) for a period of one year, he shall be deemed to be in 'continuous service' under an employer for that period if he has 'actually worked' under that employer for 190 days in case he is employed underground in a mine or 240 days in any other case. On the construction of the old provisions in Sur Enamel, the Supreme Court had held that before a workman can be considered to have completed 'one year of continuous service' in an industry, it must be shown first that he was employed for a period of not less than 12 calendar months and next that during those 12 calendar months he had worked for not less than 240 days. Both these conditions had to be cumulatively satisfied.[28] In Digwadih Colliery, the court observed that the amendment only consolidates the provisions of ss 25B and 2(eee) in one place, and the purport of the new provision is not different. The amendment only removes the vagueness.[29] After the amendment of the section, in Ramakrishna Ramnath, the Supreme Court observed:

> Under s 25B a workman who during the period of 12 calendar months has actually worked in an industry for not less than 240 days, is deemed to have completed one year's service in the industry. Consequently, an inquiry has to be made to find out whether the workman had actually worked for not less than 240 days during a period of 12 calendar months immediately preceding the retrenchment. These provisions of law do not show that a workman after satisfying the test under s 25B has further to show that he has worked during all the period he has been in the service of the employer for 240 days in the year.[30]

However, these observations did not elaborate the law because the point does not appear to have been argued in detail. In this case, the court did not refer to its earlier decisions in Sur Enamel and Digwadih Colliery. Here the workman had worked for eight years in the service of the employer. The contention of the employer was that a workman has to establish that he had worked for 240 days in all the years for each year the compensation was claimed. The court rejected the contention with the observation that before claiming compensation, the workman has only to establish that he has been in continuous service for not less than one year in the undertaking immediately before he was retrenched or deemed to have been retrenched from service. In Surendra Kumar Verma, the court observed:

> These changes brought about by Act 36 of 1964 appear to be clearly designed to provide that a workman who has actually worked under the employer for not less than 240 days during a period of twelve months shall be deemed to have been in 'continuous service' for a period of one year whether or not he has in fact been in such continuous service for a period of one year. It is enough > that he has worked for 240 days in a period of 12 months; it is not necessary that he should have been in the service of the employer for one whole year.. .. Even if a workman has not been in 'continuous service' under an employer for a period of one year, he shall be deemed to have been in such 'continuous service' for a period of one year if he has actually worked under the employer for 240 days in the preceding period of twelve months. There is no stipulation that he should have been in employment or service under the employer for a whole period of twelve months. In fact, the thrust of the provision is that he need not be. That appears to be the plain meaning without gloss from any source.[31]

The law was elaborated in Mohan Lal, in the following words:

> Sub-section (2) provides for a fiction to treat a workman in continuous service for a period of one year despite the fact that he has not rendered uninterrupted service for a period of one year but he has rendered service for a period of 240 days during the period of 12 calendar months counting backwards and just preceding the relevant date being the date of retrenchment. In other words, in order to invoke the fiction enacted in sub-s (2)(a), it is necessary to determine first the relevant date, i.e., the date of termination of service which is complained of as 'retrenchment'. After that date is ascertained, move backward to a period of 12 months just preceding the date of retrenchment and then ascertain whether within the period of 12 months, the workman has rendered service for a period of 240 days. If these three facts are affirmatively answered in favour of the workman, pursuant to the deeming fiction enacted in sub-s 2(a), it will have to be assumed that the workman is in continuous service for a period of one year, and he will satisfy the eligibility qualification enacted in s 25F.[32]

In Ramasamuz, the workman was in employment of the company between January 1945 and April 1975. His claim for retrenchment was resisted by the employer on the ground that he had not worked for a period of 240 days every year and, therefore, he could not be deemed to be in 'continuous service' as contemplated by s 25B. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that the mere fact that during some years in a long period of service, the workman had not worked for 240 days, is not sufficient to deprive him of the retrenchment-compensation by ignoring the entire period.[33] A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court in MR Khosla, held that a workman in service on daily wages for nearly six years except for a break of one day in the middle of service was in 'continuous service' for the entire period despite the break as he had served for 240 days in each year of service in the relevant 12 months' period.[34] In Kailash Paswan, the Patna High Court held that the section only postulates rendering of work for 240 days in the preceding period of 12 months. It cannot be said that for 'continuous service' for a period of one year, the workman must do and continues to do the same work for which he was engaged or the other work at the same time for a period of 240 days in the preceding 12 months.[35] If a workman is engaged initially for a particular period and that period is extended from time to time, such employment has to be treated as continuous service, if he has continued in service uninterruptedly for a period of 240 days in the calendar year preceding the date of termination.[36] The condition precedent for invoking s 25F is that the workman ought to have been employed continuously for 240 days under the same employer. It is not necessary that the employment during the requisite period should be of the same character. The period of past service put in before appointment on probation should be included and not ignored.[37] In the absence of proof that the concerned workmen/daily wagers worked for at least 240 days in the year, they cannot claim protection against termination of their service nor seek regularisation of their service on monthly salary with benefits like pension, gratuity, etc.[38] Interruption of service because of accident occurring during the course of job has to be included in uninterrupted service.[39] Sundays and holidays should be included in computing the continuous service under s 25B.[40]

(a) 'Actually worked'

The fiction of this sub-section will operate only if the workman has actually worked under the employer for the number of days specified therein. The explanation specifically includes the days on which the workman has been laid-off under an agreement, or he has been on leave with full wages or he has been absent due to temporary disablement caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and in the case of a female workman the maternity leave, in the expression 'actually worked'. The explanation obviously is inclusive and not exhaustive. However, the Madras High Court, held that the words 'actually worked' would not include holidays much less Saturdays and Sundays for which full wages are paid. The words 'days worked' itself would normally mean days actually worked. The legislature, as if, to give emphasis, has also added the word 'actually'. There could, therefore, be no scope for argument that paid holidays are to be included in 'actually worked'. The explanation to s 25B has included in the expression 'the actually worked', certain deemed actual working days. Only those days which are provided in the explanation could be included in calculating 240 days in addition to the actual working days. The meaning of the words 'actually worked' cannot be enlarged beyond what is contained in the explanation.[41]

In American Express, the Supreme Court held that the expression 'actually worked under the employer' cannot mean only those days when the workman works with hammer and sickle or pen, but must necessarily comprehend all those days during which he was in the employment of the employer and for which he had been paid wages either under express or implied contract of service or by compulsion of statute, Standing Orders, etc. Accordingly, the court held that Sundays and other holidays would be comprehended in the words 'actually worked' and it discountenanced the contention of the employer that only days which are mentioned in the explanation should be taken into account for the purpose of calculating the number of days on which the workman had 'actually worked' though he had not so worked and no other days. The court observed that the explanation is only clarificatory, as all explanations are, and cannot be used to limit the expanse of the main provision.[42] Where the labour Court upheld the termination of service of a daily rated worker, engaged by the irrigation department, after the completion of the project, the Bombay High Court dismissed his writ petition and upheld the award of the labour court rejecting his claim on the ground that he did not put in 240 days continuous service and that no relief could be granted to him under the Act.[43] Rejecting the contention of workmen engaged on a specific project undertaken by the Indore Development Authority, Sinha J (for self and Hegde J) observed:

> This case involves 31 employees. A distinction is sought to be made by Dr. Dhawan that out of them 27 had been appointed to a project and not in a project. The distinction although appears to be attractive at the first blush but does not stand a moment's scrutiny. As noticed hereinbefore, the High Court's observation remained unchallenged, that the project was to be financed by ODA. The project was indisputably to be executed by the Indore Development Authority; and for the implementation thereof, the appointments had to be made by it. If the Appellants were appointed for the purpose of the project, they would be deemed to have been appointed therefor and only because such appointments had been made by the Respondent would by itself does not entitle them to claim permanency. The life of the project came to an end on 30-6-1997. The maintenance job upon completion thereof had been taken over by the Indore Municipal Corporation. The Appellants were aware of the said fact and, thus, raised an alternative plea in their statements of claims. The Labour Court could not have granted any relief to them as prayed for, as Indore Municipal Corporation is a separate juristic person having been created under a statute. Such a relief would have been beyond the scope and purport of the reference made to the Labour Court by the State Government. Furthermore, the Indore Municipal Corporation was not a party and, thus, no employee could be thrust upon it without its consent.[44] (para 37)

In Executive Engineer, ZPD, the facts were: A few workers were engaged as daily wagers in relation to a scheme known as Kriya Scheme aimed at providing drinking water and construction of roads for the benefit of the rural poor in the District of 'Gulbarga' in the State of Karnataka. The employment commenced in the year 1993. The services of the said workers were terminated in 1996. They filed writ petitions before the Karnataka High Court contending inter alia that, having worked for a number of years, they became entitled for regularization. It was furthermore contended that they were still continuing in service. The writ petition and the writ appeal were dismissed by the single judge and Division Bench respectively of the High Court. Thereafter they raised an industrial dispute before the labour court without however disclosing the dismissal of their writ petition and writ appeal. The labour court directed reinstatement of the said workers with 50% back wages. Two writ petitions were filed on behalf of the Executive Engineer in the High Court which were dismissed by the High Court. Setting aside the award of the labour court as well as the orders of the High Court and holding that the orders of the courts below were barred by the operation of res judicata, Sinha J (for self and Hegde J), cited the following observation of the Supreme Court in P Kulothangan, in which it was observed:

> The principle of res judicata operates on the Court. It is the Courts which are prohibited from trying the issue which was directly and substantially in issue in the earlier proceedings between the same parties, provided the Court trying the subsequent proceeding is satisfied that the earlier Court was competent to dispose of the earlier proceedings and that the matter had been heard and finally decided by such Court. Here the parties to the writ petition filed by the respondent in the Madras High Court and the industrial dispute were the same. The cause of action in both was the refusal of the appellant to allow the respondent to rejoin service. The Madras High Court was competent to decide the issue which it did with a reasoned order on merits and after a contested hearing. The Madras High Court was competent to decide the issue which it did with a reasoned order on merits and after a contested hearing. This was not a case where the earlier proceedings had been disposed of on any technical ground as was the case in. .. Cochin Port Trust,[45] and Pujari Bai.[46] The 'lesser relief' of reinstatement which was the subject-matter of the industrial dispute had already been claimed by the respondent in the writ petition. This was refused by the High Court. The correctness of the decision in the writ proceedings has not been challenged by the respondent. The decision was, therefore, final. Having got an adverse order in the writ petition, it was not open to the respondent to re-agitate the issue before the Labour Court and the Labour Court was incompetent to entertain the dispute raised by the respondent and re-decide the matter in the face of the earlier decision of the High Court in the writ proceedings.[47]

Applying the said principle to the facts of the present case, Sinha J held:

> For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the Labour Court and the High Court committed a manifest error in passing the impugned judgments and awards and as such they are liable to be set aside.[48]

In UP Brassware, Sinha J (for self and Balasubramanian J) held that Section 25B(2)(a) raises a legal fiction that if a workman has actually worked under the employer continuously for a period of more than 240 days during a period of twelve calendar months preceding the date with reference to which calculation is to be made, although he is not in continuous service, he shall be deemed to be in continuous service under an employer for a period of one year.[49] Where the tribunal took into account the unpaid sundays and holidays into account while arriving at 240 days, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court quashed the award directing reinstatement on the ground that the tribunal committed an error of law, and remitted the matter to the tribunal for fresh decision.[50] In Haryana SCS Marketing Federation, the facts were: the employee was engaged as a Chowkidar on casual basis by the District Manager, HAFED, Jind in August, 1998 for 29 days. On expiry of the said contract, fresh contracts were executed from time to time and he rendered service there until 31 December 1998. He was engaged afresh by the District Manager, HAFED, Hissar on 15 January 1999 where he worked upto 31 May 1999. As the service of the respondent was not renewed after 31 May 31 1999, he issued demand notice under Section 2-A of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947 (for short 'ID Act'). The industrial tribunal-cum-labour court held that there was contravention of s 25F in view of the fact that the workman had put in 240 days service in all, and directed reinstatement with 50% back wages, which order was confirmed by the High Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Lodha J cited the following passage from Haryana Urban Development Authority:

> The Industrial Tribunal-cum-Labour Court unfortunately did not go into the said question at all. If both the establishments are treated to be one establishment for the purpose of reckoning continuity of service within the meaning of Section 25-B of the Act, as was held by the Tribunal, a person working at different points of time in different establishments of the statutory authority, would be entitled to claim reinstatement on the basis thereof. However, in that event, one establishment even may not know that the workman had worked in another establishment. In absence of such a knowledge, the authority retrenching the workman concerned would not be able to comply with the statutory provisions contained in Section 25-F of the Act. Thus, once two establishments are held to be separate and distinct having different cadre strength of the workmen, if any, we are of the opinion that the period during which the workman was working in one establishment would not ensue to his benefit when he was recruited separately in another establishment, particularly when he was not transferred from one sub-division to the other. In this case he was appointed merely on daily wages.[51] ().

Having referred to the above decision, the learned judge finally held:

> In what we have discussed above, the conclusion would appear to us to be inescapable that the office of the District Manager, Jind and the office of the District Manager, Hissar are separate and distinct and the services rendered by the workman at these two establishments cannot be clubbed for the purpose of reckoning continuity of servicewithin the meaning of Section 25-F read with Section 25-B of the I.D. Act. The workman having not completed 240 days of continuous service under the employer in the year preceding his termination, Section 25-F is not at all attracted. In the circumstances, the impugned judgment cannot be sustained and has to be set aside.[52] ()

In UP Drugs and Pharmaceuticals, the termination of a few casual workers was referred for adjudication under s 4(k) of UP Industrial Disputes Act. The facts disclosed that none of the workers had put in 240 days service in the year immediately preceding the date of termination. However, some 29 of them had worked 240 days per year in the previous years. The labour court directed reinstatement of the said 29 workmen of which some 18 workmen challenged the award. Setting aside the award, the High Court held that under s 6-N read with s 2(g) of the UP Act, it was not necessary for the workmen to complete 240 days in the preceding year and since workmen had completed 240 days in earlier calendar years preceding the 12 months on the date of retrenchment, they were deemed to be in a continuous service and hence their termination in violation of Section 6-N of the UP Act was illegal. The respondents have been held to be in continuous service. The High Court directed that they shall be given consequential service benefits including reinstatement except the back wages. The company was directed to pay the wages of the respondents from the date of reinstatement. Dismissing the appeal filed by the company, Sabharwal J (for self and BN Agarwal J) observed:

> .. . the word 'preceding' has been used in Section 25-B of the ID Act as incorporated in the year 1964. Section 2(g) does not use the word 'preceding'. The concept of 'proceeding' was introduced in the ID Act so as to give complete and meaningful benefit of welfare legislation to the working class.. .. The High Court has rightly concluded that the termination of the respondents was in violation of Section 6-N read with Section 2(g) of the U.P. Act. Regarding denial of back wages to the respondents, in our view, no interference is called for having regard to the facts and circumstances of the case including the circumstance of the financial position of the appellant and the proceedings before the Board for Industrial and Financial Reconstruction.[53] (Paras 10 & 12).

In a similar set of facts and circumstances in Sriram Industrial Enterprises, i.e., where the workmen had not put in 240 days service in the preceding twelve calendar months, though they had worked for 240 days or more in the preceding years, the tribunal accepted the plea of the management and upheld the termination of workmen, which order was set aside by the High Court. In appeal by the company, Altamas Kabir J (for Self and Lakshmanan J) followed the above decision of the Supreme Court in UP Drugs and Pharmaceuticals, and affirmed the view of the High Court to the effect that the termination was illegal.[54] In Chairman, ONGC, the Supreme Court held that the onus of proving that he has worked for 240 days is on the workman. The onus shifts to the employer only after evidence is led. The court further held that whether a person has worked for more than 240 days or not is a disputed question of fact which should not be examined by the High Court, and the proper remedy for a person making such a claim is to raise an industrial dispute.[55] A direction for regularisation of daily wagers who worked for six years, without considering the availability of sanctioned posts is not sustainable.[56] In Indian Railway Construction, the Supreme Court held that persons engaged for project work in a Public Sector Undertaking, on an ad hoc basis and de hors the rules governing such appointments, do not get automatically converted into regular employees of the company, regardless of the fact that the company extended group insurance and regular pay scales to them. On completion of the project work, they cannot claim regularization in the company's services. Further, the opportunity given to the employees to appear for regular selection in the company was not availed of by them. In these circumstances, termination of their services cannot be said to offend Art 16 (Equality in Public Employment) and Art 21 (Right to Life) of the Constitution.[57] In Hindustan Aeronautics, the Supreme Court held that the fact of completing 240 days by a workman only imposes certain obligations on the employer at the time of termination of service, but it does not confer any right to regularization; and the direction given by the High Court for creating a post and for payment of regular salary to the workman could not be sustained.[58]

In Santuram Yadav, the facts disclosed that the termination of the services of a few workmen, who were daily wagers was upheld by the labour court on the ground that they had not worked for 240 days. The workers did not, through ignorance, produce the voluminous material, in their possession to prove that they had worked for 240 days, before the labour court. In view of the peculiar facts of the case and also in the light of the stand taken by the Management in the form of compromise agreeing to reinstate and provide seniority from the date of their first appointment i.e. 05 August 1989, as evidenced in the 'compromise deed', the Supreme Court remanded the matter to the labour court with permission to both the management and workmen to place all the relevant evidence in their possession before the labour court in support of their defence.[59] In Sunita Gupta, the facts were: the female employee was not continued after working as a daily wager for a period of 18 months. The labour court found that she had worked for more than 240 days, and directed reinstatement on the ground that her service was terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F. Dismissing the writ petition filed by the employer, the MP High Court held that it was clearly established that she had worked for more than 240 days and hence she was entitled to reinstatement. The court, however, held that in the circumstances grant of back wages was not proper.[60] Where the tribunal, having recorded a finding that the termination of a casual worker engaged by Telephone Department on daily wages was illegal, did not grant either reinstatement or backwages, except a compensation of Rs. 35000/-. Quashing the order of the tribunal, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that there was no justification for denying reinstatement.[61]

In Director of Transport, the facts briefly were: the respondent-workman was engaged for a fixed tenure as a data entry operator on an ad hoc basis in a leave vacancy with a clear stipulation that the appointment would come to an end on the expiry of the period. When the situation arose for making regular appointment for the post of data entry operator, the respondent did not apply against the advertisement issued by the employer. When the respondent applied for the post, the selection process was already completed. The respondent raised a dispute. The tribunal directed reinstatement. Quashing the order of the tribunal, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the provisions of s 25B are not applicable to the case, and that the termination was on the expiry of the period stipulated in the contract. The learned judge further held that the tribunal misdirected itself in ordering reinstatement.[62] In Ranbir Singh, the facts were: the services of a workman, who was engaged on daily wages for some seven years were terminated on the ground that he had been involved in a criminal case. The criminal case ended in his acquittal. The workman raised an industrial dispute alleging violation of Section 25F. The labour court directed his reinstatement with 50% back wages. The State of Haryana challenged the said order in so far as back wages were concerned. A single judge set aside the award in toto and instead awarded a compensation of Rs. 60,000/- to the appellant. The Division Bench, though noticed that the order of the single judge was beyond the prayer of the Government, nevertheless held that, in view of the fact the workman was a daily wager, the technicality touching upon the prayer in the writ petition would not stand in the way of quashing the award of the labour court, and accordingly affirmed the order of the single judge. Allowing the appeal of the workman, a Bench of the Supreme Court comprising HS Bedi and CK Prasad JJ held:

.. . the learned counsel for the appellant has argued that in the writ petition filed by the respondent-State challenging the Award of > the Labour Court, the only plea was against the grant of back wages and nothing more. In support of this submission, the learned counsel has drawn our attention to the writ petition which has been appended with the paper book. We find that the assertion of the learned counsel is correct. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the order of the single Judge as well as of the Division Bench was well beyond the scope of the prayers in the writ petition. If the State felt aggrieved by the Award of the Labour Court in toto there was no impediment in its way to challenge it in its entirety. We feel that a party must be held to be bound by its pleadings; a prayer clause cannot be construed or dubbed as a technicality. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the appeal deserves to succeed. We, accordingly, allow the appeal and set aside the orders of the single Judge as well as the Division Bench and restore the order of the Labour Court to the extent of reinstatement.[63] ().

(b) Burden of Proof

It is for the workman to show by adducing relevant evidence that he has been in continuous service for not less than one year under the employer who had retrenched him from service and during the period of twelve months, he had served for not less than 240 days, for maintaining his complaint that the provisions of s 25F were not complied with.[64] Where the union espoused the cause of workmen whose services were terminated alleging contravention of the provisions of s 25F, a single judge of the Bombay High Court, while dismissing their writ petition, held that the burden of proving that they had worked for 240 days was on the workmen, which they could not discharge.[65] In Hadimani, the Supreme Court held that the burden of proving that he has worked for 240 days is on the workman.[66] In Essen Deinki, the facts were: the workman joined the services of the company as a helper on 1 July 1990 and continued till 26 February 1991. His service was terminated however, on the ground that his work was not found to be of desired standard. The company did not comply with s 25-F due to the fact that the workman had not completed 240 days in the preceding 12 calendar months. At all stages, the company contended that the workman had worked for a total period of 219 days in the preceding 12 months. The labour court passed an award holding that the termination was valid and the compliance with s 25F was not required in view of the shortfall in the number of days worked. The said award was set aside by the High Court with a direction to reinstate the workman. Quashing the order of the High Court and restoring the award of the labour court, Banerjee J (for self and Sabharwal J) relied on the decision rendered in ST Hadimani (supra) and held:

> Having regard to the opinion of this Court in the last noted decision [ST Hadimani], question of affirmance of the impugned judgment cannot and does not arise more so by reason of the fact that even this Court searched in vain in regard to the availability of such an evidence. The High Court, in our view, has thus committed a manifest error in reversing the order of the Labour Court.[67]

In Hariram the Supreme Court, while quashing the order passed by the labour court and the High Court, observed:

> The above burden having not been discharged and the Labour Court having held so, in our opinion, the Industrial Court and the High Court erred in basing an order of reinstatement solely on an adverse inference drawn erroneously.[68] ().

In Lakshmoji Rao, the facts were: In response to the advertisements made by APSRTC, the respondent-workmen were selected as conductors and appointed on daily-wages initially for a certain period of time and thereafter their services were extended on the same terms and ultimately regularized after a year or two. They were placed on time scale of pay and their seniority was counted from the date of such regularization. Long afterwards, the respondents filed writ petitions contending that their services ought to have been regularized from an anterior date i.e., from the date of their initial appointment on daily-wage basis and the service benefits should be granted accordingly. This prayer was practically granted by the High Court with a rider that they should have completed one year of continuous service as defined in s 25B. In his opening remarks, Venkatarami Reddy J (for self and Rajendra Babu J) chastising the defective approach and deplorable style of handling the case by the AP High Court and held thus:

> These cases involving the issue as to the effective date of regular appointment and seniority unfold certain disturbing features - non-application of mind by the High Court to the crucial aspects of the case, vagueness of the directions issued, the deficiency of pleadings and material placed on record by the contending parties and above all the default of the appellant-Corporation in allowing other similar orders becoming final while contesting certain others including the present matters. ().. . There was practically no discussion on the merits in any of these cases either in the judgments under appeal or the earlier judgments which were followed in the instant cases. All the writ appeals were disposed of at the admission stage itself. One more fact to be noticed is that no averment has been made nor any material placed before us to establish that the judgments which were followed in these cases or similar judgments in certain other cases have been contested by APSRTC by filing LPAS or SLPS. (). .. A learned single Judge disposed of the writ petition on 20-6-1988 with a direction to the respondents to "declare the petitioners to be in service on regular basis from the dates of their joining duty and give consequential benefits". The only reason given by the learned Judge is > contained in the following paragraph which we quote: 'The petitioners were selected by a Committee on the basis of their eligibility and they have been appointed on June 10, 1983. Therefore, though there appears the term 'on temporary basis on daily wages', the fact remains that they have been discharging the duties on regular basis.'. .. The short order passed by the Division Bench on 24-7-1995 reads as follows:

> Heard learned counsel for the appellant and learned counsel for the respondent. We do not think there is any mistake in the direction issued by the learned single Judge except that a clarification is required to reckon the date of continuous appointment and thus regularization in the post held by the petitioners respondents from the date of continuous appointment for the purpose of both of emoluments as well as seniority. We accordingly clarify that the date of initial appointment as indicated in the order of the learned single Judge will be read as the date of continuous appointment as defined under Section 25B of the Industrial Disputes Act. Such continuous service of the petitioner/respondents shall be counted for all benefits in the service in accordance with law. With the clarification as above, the appeal is dismissed.
> This order was followed in most of the writ petitions and writ appeals including the orders under appeal. (). .. It is difficult to comprehend the ratio of the above decision. While purporting to clarify the order passed in the writ petition by the learned single Judge, the Division Bench imported a totally alien concept of continuous service within the meaning of Section 25B of the ID Act which was for the special purpose of applying the provisions as to lay off and retrenchment contained in Chapter V-A of the Act. Moreover, the order in the writ appeal is as vague as it could be. The expression 'date of continuous appointment' makes no sense. Even if it is taken that the said wording has been inaccurately used for the words 'continuous service', still, the direction is unintelligible. Continuous service within the meaning of Section 25B- for how long? Nothing has been specified. ().

That was the level of intellectual acumen and the legal sense displayed so pathetically by the Division Bench. It is disconcerting to come across such mediocre observations purported to have been made at the level of a High Court! The above analysis of Reddi J, and the specific passages cited by him in the above paragraphs, betray the serious misconceptions of fatal dimensions entertained by the single judge as well as the Division Bench of the AP High Court, which is an unflattering reflection on the standard and quality of judges being appointed to higher level judicial positions. This aspect has been discussed at some length elsewhere in the book, hence not being repeated here. Adverting to the issues raised before the Supreme Court, Reddi J discussed the facts in detail and, after highlighting the absolute mess created by the AP High Court, finally held:

> In view of this peculiar situation and in order to avoid the anomalies that might otherwise ensue, while we hold that the respondent-employees have failed to establish their legal right to get the status of regular employees right from the date of their initial appointment on daily wage basis and the respective dates of regularization assigned to the respondents cannot be legally faulted, we are inclined to mould the relief in modification of the directions given in the judgments under appeal and direct as follows :
> If any of the Conductors, junior to the respondents in the relevant seniority list of the concerned Division/Region, have got the benefit of seniority and regularization OR are entitled to get the same by virtue of the judgments that have become final, then the respondents who are seniors to them, shall be given the same benefit on the same principle.[69] ()

In Municipal Corporation Faridabad, the court observed:

> A court of law even in a case where provisions of the Indian Evidence Act apply, may presume or may not presume that if a party despite possession of the best evidence had not produced the same, it would have gone against his contentions. The matter, however, would be different where despite direction by a court the evidence is withheld. Presumption as to adverse inference for non-production of evidence is always optional and one of the factors which is required to be taken into consideration is the background of facts involved in the lis. The presumption, thus, is not obligatory because notwithstanding the intentional non-production, other circumstances may exist upon which such intentional non-production may be found to be justifiable on some reasonable grounds. In the instant case, the Industrial Tribunal did not draw any adverse inference against the appellant. It was within its jurisdiction to do so particularly having regard to the nature of the evidence adduced by the respondent.[70] (at p 5187).

Following the above decisions, another Bench of the Supreme Court, in Rajasthan State Ganganagar Mills, held:

> It was the case of the workman that he had worked for more than 240 days in the year concerned. This claim was denied by the appellant. It was for the claimant to lead evidence to show that he had in fact worked up to 240 days in the year preceding his termination. He has filed an affidavit. It is only his own statement which is in his favour and that cannot be regarded as sufficient evidence for any Court or Tribunal to come to the conclusion that in fact the claimant had worked for 240 days in a year. These aspects were highlighted in Range Forest Officer v. S.T. Hadimani . .. No proof of receipt of salary or wages for 240 days or order or record in that regard was produced. Mere non-production of the muster roll for a particular period was not sufficient for the Labour Court to hold that the workman had worked for 240 days as claimed.[71] ().

In Sports Authority of India, a single judge of the Delhi High Court, while dismissing the petition filed by the employer, held that once the workman discharged the burden by establishing that he had worked for 240 days including sundays and holidays, the burden shifts to the management, and the failure of the management to produce the attendance register and other records led the court to draw an adverse inference against the management, and the award of the labour court directing reinstatement needs no interference.[72] In Reserve Bank of India, the facts were: the respondents were employed intermittently as Ticca Mazdoors in RBI. They were not engaged every day or continuously and were never regarded as regular mazdoors. When they were interviewed for appointment as regular mazdoors, they produced certain certificates, which were later found to be fake and forged certificates. An FIR was lodged with the police and in the course of the criminal trial, they were acquitted, whereupon they submitted fresh school certificates and requested for appointment as regular mazdoors, which was rejected by the Bank. In the course of adjudicating the resultant dispute, the tribunal held that they had completed 240 days service and hence their termination without complying with s 25F was illegal. On this view of the matter, the tribunal directed their reinstatement with full back wages. A single judge dismissed the writ petition filed by the Bank, while the Division Bench observed that the non-employment of the workman was due to their submitting false certificates and that it had cast a stigma on them, and gave liberty to the Bank to hold a domestic enquiry into the alleged misconduct. Allowing the appeal filed by the Bank, Sinha J (for self, Hegde and Singh JJ), made a few observations of profound significance and import, which are reproduced below:

(i) It is trite that a judgment of acquittal passed in favour of the employees by giving benefit of doubt per se would not be binding upon the employer. The employer had no occasion to initiate departmental proceeding' against the respondents. They were not regularly employed. They, according to the appellant, filed forged and fabricated documents and as such were not found fit to be absorbed in regular service. ()

(ii) The concerned workmen in their evidence did not specifically state that they had worked for 240 days. They merely contended in their affidavit that they are reiterating their stand in the claim petition. Pleadings are no substitute for proof. No workman thus, took an oath to state that they had worked for 240 days. No document in support of the said plea was produced. It is, therefore not correct to contend that the plea raised by the respondents herein that they have worked continuously for 240 days was deemed to have been admitted by applying the doctrine of non-traverse. In any event the contention of the respondents having been denied and disputed, it was obligatory on the part of the respondents to add new evidence. (Paras 18 & 19)

(iii) An adverse inference, therefore, was drawn for non-production of the attendance register alone, and not for non-production of the wage-slips. Reference to 'other relevant documents' must be held to be vague as the appellant herein had not been called upon to produce any other document for the said purpose. It appears that the learned Tribunal considered the matter solely from the angle that the appellant has failed to prove its plea of abandonment of service by the respondents. (Paras 22 & 23)

(iv) The initial burden of proof was on the workmen to show that they had completed 240' days of service. The Tribunal did not consider the question from that angle. It held that the burden of proof was upon the appellant on the premise that they have failed to prove their plea of abandonment of service. ()

(v) The findings of the learned Tribunal, as noticed hereinbefore are wholly perverse. He apparently posed unto itself wrong questions. He placed onus of proof wrongly upon the appellant. His decision is based upon irrelevant factors not germane for the purpose of arriving at a correct finding of fact. It has also failed to take into consideration the relevant factors. A case for judicial review, thus, was made out. ()

(vi) Absorption of the Ticca Mazdoors in the services of the appellant was not automatic. The concerned workmen were required to fulfil the conditions laid down therefor. In law, 240 days of continuous service by itself does not give rise to claim of permanence. Section 25-F provides for grant of compensation if a workman is sought to be retrenched in violation of the conditions referred to therein (Paras 44 &46)

(vii) Furthermore, a direction for reinstatement for non-compliance of the provisions of Section 25-F of the Industrial Disputes Act would restore to the workmen the same status which he held when terminated. The respondents would, thus, continue to be Ticca Mazdoors, meaning thereby their names would continue in the second list. They had worked only from April, 1980 to December, 1982. They did not have any right to get work.[73] ()

It is submitted that the above case was rightly decided. The decision of the industrial tribunal was at a tangent and is wholly perverse. The learned single judge and the Division Bench of the Bombay High Court were no worse in so far as they made highly perplexing observations while deciding the case against the Bank, which were deftly handled by Sinha J. In Bank of Baroda, the facts disclosed that a driver engaged by the bank had worked for more than 240 days before being terminated from service. The tribunal directed reinstatement of the driver, which was affirmed by a single judge and the Division Bench of the Gujarat High Court. Dismissing the appeal filed by the bank, Hegde J (for self, Singh and Sinha JJ) observed:

> While there is no doubt in law that the burden of proof that a claimant was in the employment of a Management, primarily lies on the workman who claims to be a workman. The degree of such proof so required, would vary from case to case. In the instant case, the workman has established the fact which, of course, has not been denied by the bank, that he did work as a driver of the car belonging to the bank during the relevant period which comes to more than 240 days of work. He has produced 3 vouchers which showed that he had been paid certain sums of money towards his wages and the said amount has been debited to the account of the bank. As against this, as found by the fora below, no evidence whatsoever has been adduced by the bank to rebut even this piece of evidence produced by the workman. It remained contended by filing a written statement wherein it denied the claim of the workman and took up a plea that the employment of such drivers was under a scheme by which they are, in reality, the employee of the Executive concerned and not that of the bank; none was examined to prove the scheme. No evidence was led to establish that the vouchers produced by the workman were either not genuine or did not pertain to the wages paid to the workman. No explanation by way of evidence was produced to show for what purpose the workman's signatures were taken in the Register maintained by the bank. In this factual background, the question of workman further proving his case does not arise because there was no challenge at all to his evidence by way of rebuttal by the bank. (). .. As held by the High Court and referred to hereinabove, neither the judgment of this Court in the case of Punjab National Bank (supra),[74] nor in Range Forest Officer (supra),[75] would assist the appellant in this case because of the proved facts of this case. Even the case of M.P. Electricity Board (supra),[76] relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellant, does not help the appellant. Said judgment only lays down that the initial burden of establishing the factum of the workman having continuously worked 240 days in the year, rests with the workman.[77] (para 9)

In Batala Sugar Mills, the workman claimed that he had worked for 240 days and that his termination without paying retrenchment compensation was illegal, which claim was resisted by the management. The tribunal directed reinstament of the workman on the ground that the burden of proving that the workman had not worked for 240 days was on the management. Setting aside the order of tribunal, Pasayat J (for self and Lakshmanan J) held:

> .. . the tribunal was not right in placing the onus on the management without first determining on the basis of cogent evidence that the respondent had worked for more than 240 days in the year preceding his termination. It was the case of the claimant that he had so worked but this claim was so denied by the appellant. It was then for the claimant to lead evidence to show that he had in fact worked for 240 days in the year preceding his termination. Filing of an affidavit is only his own statement in his favour and that cannot be regarded as sufficient evidence for any court or tribunal to come to the conclusion that a workman had, in fact, worked for 240 days in a year. No proof of receipt of salary or wages for 240 days or order or record of appointment or engagement for this period was produced by the workman. On this ground alone, the award is liable to be set aside. However, Mr. Hegde, appearing for the Department states that the State is really interested in getting the law settled and the respondent will be given an employment on compassionate grounds on the same terms as he was allegedly engaged prior to his termination, within two months from today.[78] ()

In a somewhat similar set of facts in Surendernagar District Panchayat, the workman claimed that he had worked for 10 years and that his service was terminated without complying with s 25F. The tribunal passed an award in favour of the workman. While quashing the orders of the courts below, Naolekar J (for self and Variava J) observed:

> .. . it was necessary for the workman to produce the relevant material to prove that he has actually worked with the employer for not less than 240 days during the period twelve calendar months preceding the date of termination. What we find is that apart from the oral evidence the workman has not produced any evidence to prove the fact that he has worked for 240 days. No proof of receipt of salary or wages or any record or order in that regard was produced; no co-worker was examined; muster roll produced by the employer has not been contradicted.It is improbable that workman who claimed to have worked with the appellant for such a long period would not possess any documentary evidence to prove nature of his engagement and the period of work he had undertaken with his employer. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the workman has failed to discharge his burden that he was in employment for 240 days during the preceding 12 months of the date of termination of his service. The Courts below have wrongly drawn an adverse inference for non production of the record of the workman for ten years. The scope of enquiry before the Labour Court was confined to only 12 months preceding the date of termination to decide the question of continuation of service for the purpose of Section 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act. The workman has never contended that he was regularly employed in the Panchayat for one year to claim the uninterrupted period of service as required under Section 25B(1) of the Act.. .. In the absence > of regular employment of the workman, the appellant was not expected to maintain seniority list of the employees engaged on daily wages and in the absence of any proof by the respondent regarding existence of the seniority list and his so called seniority no relief could be given to him for non-compliance of provisions of the Act. The Courts could have drawn adverse inference against the appellant only when seniority list was proved to be in existence and then not produced before the Court. In order to entitle the Court to draw inference unfavourable to the party, the Court must be satisfied that evidence is in existence and could have been proved.[79] ().

In RM Yellatty, the issue of burden of proof had once again come up for the decision of the Supreme Court. Speaking for a full bench, Kapadia J (for self, Variava and Lakshmanan JJ) observed:

> .. . it is clear that the provisions of the Evidence Act in terms do not apply to the proceedings under section 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act. However, applying general principles and on reading the afore-stated judgments, we find that this court has repeatedly taken the view that the burden of proof is on the claimant to show that he had worked for 240 days in a given year. This burden is discharged only upon the workman stepping in the witness box. This burden is discharged upon the workman adducing cogent evidence, both oral and documentary. In cases of termination of services of daily waged earner, there will be no letter of appointment or termination. There will also be no receipt or proof of payment. Thus in most cases, the workman (claimant) can only call upon the employer to produce before the court the nominal muster roll for the given period, the letter of appointment or termination, if any, the wage register, the attendance register etc. Drawing of adverse inference ultimately would depend thereafter on facts of each case. The above decisions however make it clear that mere affidavits or self-serving statements made by the claimant/workman will not suffice in the matter of discharge of the burden placed by law on the workman to prove that he had worked for 240 days in a given year. The above judgments further lay down that mere non-production of muster rolls per se without any plea of suppression by the claimant workman will not be the ground for the tribunal to draw an adverse inference against the management.. . .[80]

In ONGC, Pasayat J referring to the earlier decisions on the question and, more specifically, to RM Yellatty (supra) observed:

> .. . The respective stand was to be examined in the light of law laid down by this Court in the decisions referred to above. The question of shifting of onus assumes relevance only when evidence is led. Almost all the decisions referred to above related to matters which came to the High Court after evidence was led before the Tribunal by the contesting parties. High Courts should not entertain writ petitions directly when claim of service of more than 240 days in a year is raised. Whether a person has worked for more than 240 days or not is a disputed question of fact which is not to be examined by the High Court. Proper remedy for the person making such a claim is to raise an industrial dispute under the Act so that the evidence can be analysed and conclusion can be arrived at. As in the instant case the legal position has not been analysed in the proper perspective, it would be appropriate if the matter is decided by the forum provided under the Act.[81] (Italics supplied).

Where the workmen furnished some documentary evidence to show that they were working for two years, and the employer withheld the information, the Supreme Court upheld the award of the labour court directing reinstatement with 25% backwages, but modified the award by ordering payment of Rupees one lakhs to each of the workmen in lieu of reinstatement.[82] Where the workman had not discharged the burden of proving that he had worked for 240 days, and the labour court also did not record a finding that he had worked for 240 days, the order directing reinstatement passed is not maintainable.[83] In a case involving termination of service of daily wagers without complying with the provisions of s 25F, the labour court directed reinstatement with continuity of service and 50% back wages. The High Court, interfering with the award, ordered payment of Rs. 50,000/- as compensation in lieu of the 50% of back wages. Quashing the order of the High Court and restoring the award of the labour court, the Supreme Court observed that, in the face of the fact that the management did not take the plea that the post in question was not sanctioned nor that the appointment was not as per the rules nor did it establish that there was no vacancy, the interference with the award was improper.[84] In*Bhavanagar Municipal Corporation*, the facts disclosed that a conductor, whose services were terminated raised an industrial dispute which was referred for adjudication. The workman contended that he worked for 240 days, whereas the management contended that he worked only for 58 days. The tribunal directed reinstatement on the basis of a xerox copy of a certificate purported to have been issued by the Corporation to the effect that he was in the employment of the corporation as a conductor, and directed reinstatement, which was confirmed by the High Court. Thakur J (for self and Ms Banumati J) relied upon several landmark cases decided during the first decade of the present century (quite a few of which were cited in the preceding paragraphs) and held:

> It is fairly well-settled that for an order of termination of the services of a workman to be held illegal on account of non-payment of retrenchment compensation, it is essential for the workman to establish that he was in continuous service of the employer within the meaning of Section 25B of the Industrial Disputes Act 1947. For the respondent to succeed in that attempt he was required to show that he was in service for 240 days in terms of Section 25B(2)(a)(ii). The burden to prove that he was in actual and continuous service of the employer for the said period lay squarely on the workman. The decisions of this Court. .. unequivocally recognise the principle that the burden to prove that the workman had worked for 240 days is entirely upon him. So also the question whether an adverse inference could be drawn against the employer in case he did not produce the best evidence available with it, has been the subject-matter of pronouncements of this Court. .. This Court has held that only because some documents have not been produced by the management, an adverse inference cannot be drawn against it.. .. The Labour Court has, in the case at hand, placed reliance upon a Xerox copy of a certificate allegedly issued by an officer of the appellant-Corporation stating that the respondent was in the employment of the appellant-Corporation as a Conductor between 3rd October, 1987 and 31st March, 1989.. .. That being so the admission of the Xerox copy of the certificate, without any objection from the appellant-Corporation, cannot be faulted at this belated stage. When seen in the light of the assertion of the respondent, the certificate in question clearly supported the respondent's case that he was in the employment of the appellant-Corporation for the period mentioned above and had completed 240 days of continuous service. That being so, non-payment of retrenchment compensation was sufficient to render the termination illegal. Inasmuch as the Labour Court declared that to be so it committed no mistake nor was there any room for the High Court to interfere with the said finding especially when the findings could not be described as perverse or without any evidence. The High Court was also justified in directing deletion of the back wages from the award made by the Labour Court against which deletion, the respondent did not agitate either before the Division Bench by filing an appeal or before us.. .. The case at hand, in our opinion, is one such case where reinstatement must give way to award of compensation. We say so because looking to the totality of the circumstances, the reinstatement of the respondent in service does not appear to be an acceptable option. Monetary compensation, keeping in view the length of service rendered by the respondent, the wages that he was receiving during that period which according to the evidence was around Rs.24.75 per day should sufficiently meet the ends of justice. Keeping in view all the facts and circumstances, we are of the view that award of a sum of Rs.2,50,000/- (Rupees Two Lacs Fifty Thousand only) should meet the ends of justice.[85] (Paras 8, 9 & 16).

(ii) Clause (b): Continuous service for a period of six months

The old s 25B defined only 'continuous service' for one year, and there was no reference to 'continuous service' for a period of six months in that section. Now, cl (b) to sub-s (2) of s 25B has defined 'continuous service for a period of six months'. The conditions to be fulfilled under this provision are similar to those in sub-s (2)(a).

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

[86][S. 25C. Right of workmen laid-off for compensation.—

Whenever a workman (other than a badli workman or a casual workman) whose name is borne on the muster rolls of an industrial establishment and who has completed not less than one year of continuous service under an employer is laid off, whether continuously or intermittently, he shall be paid by the employer for all days during which he is so laid off, except for such weekly holidays as may intervene, compensation which shall be equal to fifty per cent. of the total of the basic wages and dearness allowance that would have been payable to him had he not been so laid off:

Provided that if during any period of twelve months, a workman is so laid-off for more than forty-five days, no such compensation shall be payable in respect of any period of the lay-off after the expiry of the first forty-five days, if there is an agreement to that effect between the workman and the employer:

Provided further that it shall be lawful for the employer in any case falling within the foregoing proviso to retrench the workman in accordance with the provisions contained in section 25F at any time after the expiry of the first forty-five days of the lay-off and when he does so, any compensation paid to the workman for having been laid-off during the preceding twelve months may be set off against the compensation payable for retrenchment.

Explanation.—"Badli workman" means a workman who is employed in an industrial establishment in the place of another workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of the establishment, but shall cease to be regarded as such for the purposes of this section, if he has completed one year of continuous service in the establishment].

INTRODUCTORY

The originals 25C was enacted along with ch VA in 1953 by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1953 (Act 43 of 1953) with a view to give the right of compensation to a laid-off workman. The section was amended by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1956 (Act 41 of 1956). The section so amended provided that a workman (who had completed not less than one year of continuous service) on being laid-off, was entitled to receive compensation up to a maximum period of 45 days during the course of any 12 months. Where, however, the period of lay-off after the expiry of the first 45 days comprised of a continuous period of one week or more, the workman was to be paid compensation for all the days comprised in every such subsequent period of lay-off, unless there was an agreement to the contrary between the workman and the employer. This provision was open to abuse inasmuch as workmen could be denied lay-off compensation by being made to work for some days in each week after the first forty-five days of lay-off. With a view to prevent such abuse, it was considered necessary to make provision that lay-off compensation would become payable for all the days of lay-off beyond the first 45 days, whether the period was continuous for a week or not. With this end in view, the new s 25C was substituted for the old section by the Amending Act of 1965. By the Amending Act 32 of 1976, the provisions of this section have been made inapplicable to those industrial establishment to which ch VB applies. Such establishment will be governed by the provisions of s 25N in that chapter.

CHANGES IN LAW

The whole section has again been recast. Previously there were two sub-sections and each sub-section had a proviso. At the end of the section there was an explanation. The new s 25C has no sub-sections. The main section itself has two provisos and then there is the explanation. The new s 25C corresponds to the old s 25C (1). However, in the new section it has been clarified that whether lay-off is continuous or intermittent, workmen will be entitled to compensation. The first proviso to s 25C replaces the provisos to the old sub-s (1). The effect is that now lay-off compensation would become payable to laid-off workman for all the days of lay-off beyond the first 45 days, whether such days constitute a continuous week or not. The present second proviso corresponds to the proviso to old sub-s (2) and has the same effect. The provisions of the section will not apply to industrial establishments to which ch VB applies.

COMPENSATION FOR LAY-OFF

Laying off a workman is an action of the employer. It results in depriving the laid-off workman of the opportunity to work and earn wages. The employer is, therefore, required to pay compensation to the workman who is laid-off, if the workman's case falls within the provisions of s 25C of the Act, which entitles a workman to lay-off compensation equivalent to 50 percent of the total of the basic wages and dearness allowance for the period of his lay-off, except for the intervening weekly holidays.[87] However, in order to be entitled to lay-off compensation under this sub-section, a workman should satisfy the following conditions:

1. his name should be borne on the muster rolls of the industrial establishment and he should not have been retrenched;
2. he should not be a 'badli' workman or a casual workman;
3. he should have completed not less than one year of continuous service under the employer; and
4. he should not be employed in an industrial establishment to which ch VB applies.

The expression 'he shall be paid by the employer for all days during which he is so laid-off', necessarily indicates that the lay-off could be for less than a day or even half a day, otherwise the expression should have been 'he shall be paid by the employer for all the day of lay-off' and not 'all days during which he is so laid-off'. If the intention of the legislature was to limit the lay-off to a period of full day or half day, there was nothing to prevent it from saying so.[88] A badli workman or a casual workman has been specifically excluded in the opening part of s 25. However, a badli workman who has completed 'one year of continuous service' in the establishment, will cease to be a badli workman and will be treated as permanent workman. Thus, a badli workman is treated on a better footing than a casual workman as a badli workman has been given the right to claim lay-off compensation after he has completed 'one year of continuous service.' Such a right has not been given to a casual workman.[89] The industrial employer has no right to lay-off his workmen if such right is not provided by any statutory provision or Standing Orders or the contract of service between the employer and an employee, that is, the right to lay-off has to be specifically provided for, so that the employer and the employee know that the employer has the right to lay-off. The right to lay-off cannot be claimed as an inherent right of an employer if he cannot provide work for his workmen for a particular day or days during the continuance of his employment. This right has to be specifically provided for either by a statute or by the contract of service.[90]

ADJUDICATION

In dealing with a lay-off compensation case, it is not open to the tribunal to inquire whether the employer could have avoided the lay-off, if he had been more diligent, more careful or more foresighted. That is a matter relating to the management of an undertaking, and unless mala fides are alleged and proved, it would be difficult to assume that the tribunal has jurisdiction to sit in judgment over the managerial acts of the employer and investigate whether a more prudent management could have avoided the situation which led to the lay-off. Such transgression of jurisdiction is amenable to a writ of certiorari. However, the question whether the employer has brought about a lay-off mala fide in the sense that he has deliberately and maliciously brought about a situation where lay-off became necessary, or whether a lay-off has been declared in order to victimise the workman for some other ulterior purpose, are questions of fact to be determined by the tribunal. Such findings of fact are not amenable to judicial review. If lay-off is justified and the requirements in the definition of lay-off along with the requirements of s 25C are satisfied, the only relief to which the concerned workmen are entitled is the statutory relief prescribed by s 25C of the Act. If, however, lay-off is mala fide in the sense that the employer has deliberately and maliciously brought about a situation where lay-off became necessary, then it would not be a lay-off in the eyes of law. Also the relief provided to laid-off workmen under s 25C would not be the only relief to which they would be entitled. Mala fides of the employer in declaring a lay-off really means that no lay-off, as contemplated by the definition, has taken place. In other words, a finding of mala fides of the employer in declaring a lay-off, takes the lay-off out of the definition of s 2(kkk), and as such s 25C cannot be held to be applicable to it so as to confine the workman's right to the compensation prescribed therein.[91]Besides, the lay-off referred to in s 25C, is lay-off as defined in s 2(kkk), and so the workmen who can claim the benefit of s 25C must be those workmen who are laid-off for reasons contemplated in s 2(kkk) of the Act.[92] For instance, a 'lay-off' declared in order to victimise the workman or for some other ulterior purpose, would not be a 'lay-off'. Likewise, where an employer has no power to lay-off any workman, it is open to the tribunal to award just and proper compensation which might not be equal to full amount of basic wages and dearness allowance.[93]

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION NOT A CONDITION PRECEDENT TO LAY-OFF

The Act does not make the payment of compensation a condition precedent to the 'lay-off' of a workman. Hence, a workman who has been laid-off will be entitled to recover lay-off compensation in accordance with the provisions of the Act. No doubt, the Standing Orders of an establishment have to be read along with the provisions of ch VA but it does not follow that in case of a lay-off, compensation must be actually paid before a workman is laid-off. The Standing Orders read with ch VA, though create a right in favour of the workman, who has been laid-off, to claim compensation, they do not create a right of being paid compensation before he is laid-off. He can work out his right independently and so also the employer can exercise his right of laying-off independently of the payment of compensation under s 25C of the Act.[1] Compensation for lay-off cannot, therefore, be awarded in advance of actual lay-off and on grounds of social justice.[2]

LAY-OFF COMPENSATION IS WAGES

In Suraj Mal Mehta, the Supreme Court held that the payment of compensation under ss 25F, 25FF and 25FFF is wages within the meaning of s 2(vi)(d) of the Payment of Wages Act 1936. The same principles will apply to lay-off compensation under s 25C.[3] In this view of law laid down earlier in Anasuyabai,[4] and other cases are no longer good law.

FIRST PROVISO: COMPENSATION NOT TO BE CONFINED TO FIRST FORTY FIVE DAYS

The object of this proviso is to make provision that lay-off compensation should become payable for all the days of lay-off beyond the first 45 days, whether the period is continuous for a week or not, unless there is an agreement to the contrary. There was a lacuna in the previous provisos, the effect of which was that if lay-off was for an unbroken period of a whole year, the concerned employees were entitled to compensation for 45 days only, but if it was for broken periods, they might receive more compensation.[5] In Modi Food Products, where Venkatarama Ayyar J observed:

If, as observed in the above decision, this conclusion leads to an anomalous position it is for the Legislature, if it thinks fit, to amend the section and not for the tribunal to construe it otherwise than what it plainly means'.[6]

This judicial suggestion was given effect to by engrafting the present first proviso for the previous two provisos by the Amending Act of 1965.

SECOND PROVISO: EMPLOYER'S RIGHT TO RETRENCH A WORKMAN AFTER FORTY FIVE DAYS OF LAY-OFF

This proviso provides an alternative choice to the employer. Where during any twelve calendar months, a period of 45 days of lay-off of a workman either continuously or intermittently has expired and the periods of lay-off after the expiry of the said 45 days comprises of one week or more at a time, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the employer can do one of the two things; namely (i) to go on paying lay-off compensation for such subsequent periods under s 25C, or (ii) to retrench the workman under the second proviso. In case the employer exercises his right to retrench a workman laid-off under this proviso, he is bound to comply with the provisions of s 25F, i.e. 'conditions precedent to retrenchment of workman'. In case of such retrenchment, the employer has been enabled to set-off the lay-off compensation paid by him to the workmen so retrenched during the last 12 months against the compensation payable to him under the second proviso.[7]However, the right to such set-off is available to the employer only in cases of retrenchment as contemplated by s 2(oo) effected upon complying with the requirements of s 25F of the Act. This right is not available on the termination of the services of a workman or workmen by any other mode. For instance, where the services of laid-off workmen are automatically terminated upon closure of the undertaking, this proviso is not attracted, because the legal fiction in s 25FFF to treat the compensation, payable to the workmen on closure, as retrenchment compensation is limited to only two points i.e. the point of notice and the amount of compensation. It does not extend further and does not make the automatic termination of service upon closure as 'retrenchment' effected in accordance with s 25F. In other words, the termination of the service of workmen upon closure is not at all 'retrenchment' effected in accordance with the provisions of s 25F of the Act.[8]

EXPLANATION: BADLI WORKMAN

A badli workman means a workman who is employed in an industrial establishment in the place of another workman whose name is borne on the muster rolls of the establishment, but shall cease to be regarded as such for the purposes of this section, if he has completed one year of continuous service in the establishment. According to the explanation, the name of a badli workman should not be found in the muster-rolls of an establishment, but he should act for some other workman whose name is found in the muster rolls. Therefore, a workman cannot be said to be a badli workman simply because the management has chosen to describe him as a 'badli workman' in the muster rolls. The phrase 'is employed' leaves no doubt that the explanation seeks to cover a badli worker in whose case actual substitution has taken place, i.e., some workman on the muster rolls has been absent and in his place the badli worker is actually employed on the day in question. The explanation, therefore, would not apply to a case where there is no question of any vacancy being filled in by employing a badli worker in place of some other workman on the muster rolls. The effect of the explanation is that when a badli workman is available, the employer must provide him with work if he has completed one year's continuous service. If the employer fails to do so, the badli workman would be entitled to get lay-off compensation, if he has completed one year continuous service. However, where the worker, whose name is found in the muster rolls of the establishment, even though he is described in the muster rolls as a badli worker, he would be deemed to be a workman entitled to lay-off compensation. The explanation indicates that a worker in order to come within the purview of the term badli workman should not be one whose name is found in the muster rolls. What, therefore, decides the right to lay-off compensation to a badli workman is the effect of his name being found in the muster roll and not how he is described therein.[9] A badli is a workman appointed against a post, permanent or temporary, when the incumbent in that post is temporarily absent. Unless he has completed one year of continuous service in the establishment, a badli cannot claim the status of a permanent workman even though the management has failed to satisfactorily prove that the permanent incumbent was there in the respective place or was temporarily absent.[10]

The explanation was enacted for the reason that when a workman had been continuously working for a year within the course of which he had been working for 240 days, it was reasonable to presume that in the ordinary circumstances he would be provided with employment and therefore when the whole industrial unit is working he would also have got employment.[11] The presumption would apply when the whole of the industrial unit had ceased working and all its workmen were laid off. In such circumstances, the badli workman who fell within the explanation to s 25C would be entitled to lay-off compensation.[12] The Gujarat High Court in Girdharlal Laljibhai, took the view that a badli workman was but a substitute and casual workman. Therefore, when no employment was given to him, no question of lay-off compensation would be involved.[13] This view was followed in two decisions,[14] by two different single judges of the Madras High Court. However, a Division Bench of that High Court in Gopal Textile Mills, dissented from this view and held that the definition of 'workman' does not exclude even a casual employee or a substitute like a badli, and there is nothing in s 2(kkk) which would allow by-passing of the definition and it cannot be implied into this provision that only a man who has got a right would come in the purview of s 2(kkk). The question is not one of right to get employment but one of the badli having completed 240 days of continuous service and having qualified himself as a workman under s 2(kkk) and s 25C for compensation.[15] This decision lays down the correct law.

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25D. Duty of an employer to maintain muster-rolls of workmen.—

Notwithstanding that workmen in any industrial establishment have been laid off, it shall be the duty of every employer to maintain for the purposes of this Chapter a muster roll, and to provide for the making of entries therein by workmen who may present themselves for work at the establishment at the appointed time during normal working hours.

In order to be entitled to lay-off compensation, the laid-off workman must at least once a day present himself for work at the establishment, at the appointed time on each working day, during normal working hours. The fact that a workman has so presented himself should be evidenced by his making entries in the muster roll maintained by the employer for this purpose. Section 25D casts a two-fold duty on the employer, viz, (i) to maintain a muster roll for the purposes of this chapter, and (ii) to provide facilities to the workmen who may present themselves for work at the establishment, at the appointed time, during normal working hours, to make entries about their so presenting themselves. This requirement of law is mandatory. The breach of the provisions of this section entails a penalty under s 31(2). But non-compliance with the provisions of this section is not a pre-condition to 'lay-off' though such non-compliance will debar the employer from taking advantage of the provisions of s 25E(ii).

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25E. Workmen not entitled to compensation in certain cases.—

No compensation shall be paid to a workman who has been laid off—

(i) if he refuses to accept any alternative employment in the same establishment from which he has been laid off, or in any other establishment belonging to the same employer situate in the same town or village or situate within a radius of five miles from the establishment to which he belongs, if, in the opinion of the employer, such alternative employment does not call for any special skill or previous experience and can be done by the workman, provided that the wages which would normally have been paid to the workman are offered for the alternative employment also;

(ii) if he does not present himself for work at the establishment at the appointed time during normal working hours at least once a day;

(iii) if such laying off is due to a strike or slowing-down of production on the part of workmen in another part of the establishment.

CIRCUMSTANCES DISENTITLING A WORKMAN TO LAY-OFF COMPENSATION

The main provision for payment of lay-off compensation is contained in s 25C. The provisions of s 25E carve out an exception to the general provision for payment of lay-off compensation.[16]Though lay-off is the result of an action on the part of the employer, he is absolved from the obligation to pay compensation in cases where the provisions of anyone of the three clauses of s 25E are attracted. In other words, s 25C creates the right to lay-off compensation in favour of a laid-off workman, whereas s 25E enumerates the circumstances which will disentitle him to lay-off compensation. Hence before a workman can claim lay-off compensation, he has to show that he was 'laid-off' within the meaning of s 2(kkk). Nonetheless it is open to the employer to repudiate the claim by showing that the workman was disentitled to claim compensation because his case falls within any of the three clauses of s 25E of the Act.[17]

CLAUSE (I): REFUSAL TO ACCEPT ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT

Refusal of the workman to accept an alternative employment offered to him by the employer will disentitle him to claim lay-off compensation if such alternative employment is:

(i) in the same establishment from which he has been laid-off;

(ii) in any other establishment belonging to the same employer situate in the same town or village or situate within a radius of five miles from the establishment to which he belongs; or

(iii) in the opinion of the employer the alternative employment does not call for any special skill or previous experience and can be done by the laid-off workman; and

(iv) it carries the same wages which would normally have been paid to the workman in his original employment.

CLAUSE (II): ABSENCE FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT AT THE APPOINTED TIME

This clause casts a duty on a laid-off workman to present himself for work at the establishment from which he has been laid-off at the appointed time during normal working hours at least once a day during the period of lay-off, before he can be entitled to lay-off compensation. It absolves the employer from his liability to pay lay-off compensation in case the laid-off workman commits default in so presenting himself.[18]

The requirement of this clause is correlated to the question of compensation only for the lay-off period. Non-compliance with the condition that a laid-off workman should present himself for work, as required under this clause, does not militate against his right to be reinstated when lay-off is no longer necessary. In Nutan Mills, Chagla CJ observed:

> During the period of the lay-off, the employee would be entitled to go and serve another master. The only result of his doing so would be that he would be disentitled to receive compensation. But it is entirely a matter of his option whether he should present himself at the office of his employer and thus claim compensation or earn wages under a different employer and even though he may serve a different employer he would still have the right to be reinstated when the proper occasion arises.[19]

In other words, during lay-off, the relationship of master and servant is temporarily suspended and it would be revived as soon as the lay-off is over.

CLAUSE (III) :

(i) Lay-off Occasioned by a Strike or Go-slow

The intention of the legislature appears to be to absolve the employer from the obligation to pay compensation where the lay-off is occasioned by a strike or slowing down of production in another part of that establishment. The word 'part' used in this clause must be interpreted as meaning workers other than those who were on strike or have slowed down production, even if both the categories of the workmen be doing the same type of work or even in the same part of the factory premises. The phrase 'on the part of the workmen in another part of establishment' qualifies both the words 'slowing down of production' and 'a strike'. On proper construction of these expressions, if that phrase is read as qualifying the words 'slowing down of production', the rest of the clause which relates to a strike would read 'if such laying-off is due to a strike'. Strike can be of all workmen of an establishment or only of some. There is no provision in the Act for laying-off workmen who are themselves on strike or for payment of lay-off compensation to such striking workers. In the absence of such latter provision, no exception can be made in this clause absolving the employer from his obligation to pay compensation to workmen who are themselves on strike. Where all workmen are on strike, there would be no question of laying-off any workman or paying any lay-off compensation. This clause, therefore, will apply only when some workmen are on strike. No lay-off compensation need be paid when some workmen are laid-off due to a strike of workmen other than those who are laid-off. It is naturally inherent in this provision that there must be a strike in one part of the establishment, i.e., of one section of the workmen and due to that reason there is a lay-off of workmen in another part of the establishment, i.e., of workmen other than those on strike. It is this very provision, which is inherent in the situation, which is contained in the said qualifying words. The words, therefore, are applicable to the words, 'a strike' as well. Hence, the workmen laid-off as a consequence of strike by some other workmen in the same establishment will not be entitled to any lay-off compensation.[20]

Slowing down of production by workmen deliberately with a view to coerce the management to concede to their demands disentitles those laid-off, as a consequence of such slowing down, from claiming lay-off compensation.[21] A strike on the part of the workmen in another part of the establishment is thus made a justifiable reason for exonerating the employer from the liability to pay lay-off compensation.[22] If, therefore, on account of strike by some workmen in one part of the establishment, the management refuses to give work to the workmen in another part of the establishment, it will be quite justified in doing so.[23] However, in Churakulam, the Supreme Court in the peculiar circumstances of the case affirmed the award of the tribunal directing full wages for the period of lay-off.[24] In India Radiators, the Madras High Court held that when there was slowing down of production by workmen deliberately to pressurize the management to concede to their demands, they would not be entitled to layoff compensation, as provided for in s 25E.[25] In KDCS Mill, the facts were: The management had to stop operations one-by-one and lay-off the workmen because of refusal to work by the workmen of one section of the mills. The tribunal ordered payment of wages to the workmen on the ground that the lay-off, though bonafide, was illegal for failure to obtain permission under s 25M. When the matter was taken to the High Court in a writ petition, Misra J of the Madras High Court held that there was factual justification for laying off workmen and that they were not entitled to entire wages, but curiously enough, he modified the award by directing the management to pay 75 per cent of wages during the lay-off period, instead of full wages awarded by the tribunal.[26]

To say the least, both the decisions of the tribunal and the High Court run afoul of the plain language of the Act and are patently misconceived. What sense does it make to expect the employer to make an application for lay-off, going through all the cumbersome procedure, and wait for 60 days before a result could come, when the workers of a section resorted to a lightning strike with impunity thereby holding the entire factory, its employees and the processes to ransom? Secondly, it was not a case of mala fides or victimisation on the part of the employer. It is an admitted fact that the employer was left with no option than to shut down operation-by-operation as there was no work for them due to the stoppage of work in a critical section. That being the position, why should the employer pay full wages (75 per cent as modified by the single judge) to the whole body of workmen for no work and no output, which situation was brought about by the workmen themselves? Does the mere fact that the unit was covered by ch VB transforms an illegal stoppage of work or go-slow in one part of the establishment [s 25E(iii)] into a perfect legal action so as to render other workmen eligible for lay-off compensation, not to speak of full wages or 75 per cent of wages? And, lastly, where did the learned single judge get the figure of 75 per cent of wages as compensation - was it from any provision of the law or from his own wild imagination? Verily it is this kind of private notions of justice and misplaced benevolence on the part of judges that has largely been responsible for the gross indiscipline of workers as well as for industrial sickness. This decision undoubtedly sets an unwholesome precedent in the realm of industrial relations by sending wrong signals to workers that a small group of workmen could strike work with absolutely no concern for law and the employer would be called upon to pay full wages to the whole body of workmen. This is an obnoxious decision which requires to be reviewed and reversed.

(ii) Another Part of the Establishment

The expression 'workmen in another part of the establishment' should be interpreted to mean workmen other than those who were on strike or those who slowed down production though both these categories of workmen be doing the same kind of work, and even in the same part of the factory premises.[27] In such a case, an industrial tribunal cannot direct the management to pay unemployment compensation to the laid-off workman on the ground that the inability to give work, amounts to lockout, as such direction would be beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal.[28] For general purposes of ch VA, the term 'industrial establishment' has not been defined in the Act.[29]

(iii) Tests to Determine whether One Establishment is Part of Another

In Associated Cement Companies, the Supreme Court had to decide the question, whether a lime-stone quarry run by a company owning a cement factory situated at a distance of a mile and a half was 'another part of establishment', viz, the cement factory. The relevant facts were that the accounts of the factory and the quarry were common. A manager was the common authority in respect of the quarry as well as the other departments of the factory. The manager used to transfer the staff from the quarry to the factory and vice versa, according to the exigencies of the business. There was also unity of purpose and functional integrality between the quarry and the factory. The company laid off a number of workmen in the factory on account of strike in the quarry. As the Act does not prescribe any tests for determining what is 'one establishment', the court noticed the difficulty in determining the question where an industrial establishment consists of parts, units, departments, branches, etc. especially where the undertaking has such parts, units, branches and departments, situated in different locations, near or distant and the further question as to what tests should be applied for determining what constitutes 'one establishment'. Adverting to several tests adumbrated before it in the course of the arguments such as: (i) geographical proximity; (ii) unity of ownership; (iii) management and control; (iv) unity of employment and conditions of service; (v) functional integrality, ie, functional inter-dependence of the nature that one unit cannot exist conveniently and reasonably without the other; and (vi) general unity of purpose, SK Das J observed:

> It is perhaps, impossible to lay down anyone test as an absolute and invariable test for all cases. The real purpose of these tests is to find out the true relation between the parts, branches, units, etc. if in their true relation they constitute one integrated whole, we say that the establishment is one; if on the contrary, they do not constitute one integrated whole, each unit is then a separate unit. How the relation between the units will be judged must depend on the facts proved, having regard to the scheme and object of the statute which gives the right of unemployment compensation and also prescribes a disqualification therefor. Thus, in one case the unity of ownership, management and control may be the important test; in another case functional integrality or general unity may be the important test; and in still another case, the important test may be the unity of employment. Indeed, in a large number of cases several tests may fall for consideration at the same time. The difficulty of applying these tests arises because of the complexities of modern industrial organisation: many enterprises may have functional integrality between factories which are separately owned; some may be integrated in part with units or factories having the same ownership and in part with factories or plants which are independently owned. In the midst of all complexities, it may be difficult to discover the real thread of unity.. . We must have regard to the provisions of the statute under which the question falls to be considered; if the statute itself says what is one establishment, then there is no difficulty. If the statute does not, however, say what constitutes one establishment, then the usual tests have to be applied to determine the true relation between the parts, branches, etc., namely whether they constitute one > integrated whole or not. No particular test can be adopted as an absolute test in all cases of this type and the word 'establishment' is not to be given the sweeping definition of the organisation of which it is capable, but rather is to be construed in the ordinary business or commercial sense.[30]

There cannot be a strait-jacket formula. Though the question about the unity of two industrial establishments has to be considered in the light of relevant tests laid down by the courts from time to time, it would be unreasonable to treat anyone of the tests as decisive.[31] These tests and principles cannot be applied mechanically and by way of syllogism. It is enough to mention that among the many tests that have been evolved, functional integrality, inter-dependence or community of financial control and management, community of manpower and of its control, recruitment and discipline, the manner in which the employer has orgainsed the different activities, whether he has treated them as independent of one another or as inter-connected and inter-dependent, enjoy place of pride, but this list is by no means exhaustive.[32] In order to find whether there is sufficient functional integrality between the concerns, which may be separate entities, it is necessary to take an overall picture of their activities and the interest, if any, which they have in common.[33]

Judicial Review:

The inference, on application of these tests to the facts of a particular case, cannot be said to be a pure question of fact.[34] In other words, the question whether a branch or a department is in itself an industrial establishment is a mixed question of fact and law, and the correct inference to be drawn from the facts established, is one of law open to consideration in judicial review. Apart from lay-off, for determining the question whether a particular unit is a part of a larger establishment have been considered by the industrial adjudication in several other contexts as well, e.g., applying the principle of 'last come first go' under s 25G,[35] profit bonus,[36] incentive bonus,[37] wage-structure and dearness allowance,[38]etc. It is also important to bear in mind that the significance or importance of these tests or factors would not be the same in each case. The question whether the two units constitute one establishment or really two separate and independent units, must be decided on the facts of each case.[39] There is bound to be a shift of emphasis in application of these tests from one case to another.[40] How the emphasis on one test or the other or a collocation of tests has varied according to facts and circumstances of each case may be illustrated by discussing some decided cases. In Pratap Press, the Supreme Court was dealing with the question of payment of bonus. The facts were that the Pratap Press belonged to an employer and he subsequently started the publication of 'Vir Arjun'. He was one of the partners of the firm which owned another paper-'the Daily Pratap'. The question for consideration was: whether the three activities, viz, the Pratap Press, the Vir Arjun paper and the Daily Pratap paper, were one establishment or separate and distinct units. The tribunal found that the ownership of the 'Daily Pratap' was different from the ownership of the 'Pratap Press' and the 'Vir Arjun'. It also found that the 'Vir Arjun' was a distinct and separate entity from the 'Pratap Press'. Hence the results of the 'Vir Arjun' and the 'Daily Pratap' could not be taken into consideration in deciding the question of bonus in the 'Pratap Press'. The parties were on issue on this point because, if the working results of the 'Vir Arjun' were taken into account, the position would be that the profits made by the 'Pratap Press' in the relevant year would have been wiped out by the losses incurred by the 'Vir Arjun' and no surplus profit would remain for distribution as bonus. In the first instance the Supreme Court enunciated the following principle:

> The question whether the two activities in which the single owner is engaged are one industrial unit or two distinct industrial units is not always easy of solution. No hard-and-fast rule can be laid down for the decision of the question and each case has to be decided on its own peculiar facts. In some cases, the two activities each of which by itself comes within the definition of 'industry' are so closely linked together that no reasonable man would consider them as independent industries. There may be other cases where the connection between the two activities is not by itself sufficient to justify an answer one way or the other, but the employer's own conduct in mixing up or not mixing up the capital, staff and management may often provide a certain answer.

The court observed that 'of all these tests the most important appears...to be that of 'functional integrality' and the question of unity of finance and employment and of labour'. Regarding the unity of ownership, the court held:

> Where two units belong to a proprietor, there is almost always likelihood also of unity of management. In all such cases, therefore, the court has to consider with care how far there is 'functional integrality' meaning thereby such functional inter-dependence that one unit cannot exist conveniently and reasonably without the other and on the further question whether in matters of finance and employment the employer has actually kept the two units distinct or integrated.[41]

Applying this test of 'functional integrality' to the facts of the case, the court held that there was no such functional inter-dependence between the 'Pratap Press' and the 'Vir Arjun' and the two could conveniently and reasonably exist without one another, and the two were not parts of one industrial unit. Furthermore, this conclusion was accentuated by the conduct of the employer, in treating the finances and employment in the two units distinct and separate. In these circumstances, the conclusion of the tribunal holding the press and the paper to be two distinct separate industrial units was affirmed. In Pakshiraja Studios, the question again related to the payment of bonus. In this case, the management of a cinema studio also carried on the business of producing films and taking distribution rights of pictures. The question for consideration in this case again was whether for determining the 'available surplus,' all these activities constituted one establishment or were separate and distinct units. The tribunal treated all these activities as one establishment. In appeal, in the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court relied more on the 'unity of ownership' than 'functional integrality', and observed that if the employer mingles several sides of his business activities they become one unit. Since there was one capital fund for the two lines of business, one cash book was maintained and separate staff was not maintained, there was one accountant for both the production and the studio side, the administrative side was also the same, the whole business was held to be one establishment. The fact that the account of the studio was prepared separately or that the separate balance-sheets were prepared for the two lines of business, was held to be of no consequence in the circumstances of the case.[42]

South India Mill Owners, again related to the question of bonus. A limited company had two textile mills in two different towns in the State of Madras situated at a distance of 150 to 200 miles. The labour force for the two mills was different and the workmen were not transferable from one unit to the other. Separate accounts were maintained for the two mills though ultimately were merged in the profit and loss account and the balance sheet of the company as a whole. The two units had two separate trade-marks. On these facts, the tribunal for the purposes of payment of bonus held that the two units should be treated as part of the same establishment. In appeal the Supreme Court observed that the question, as to whether the two units run by the same employer constitute one establishment or are separate and distinct units, is not easy of decision and restated the law in the following words:

> In dealing with the problem, several factors are relevant and it must be remembered that the significance of the several relevant factors would not be the same in each case, for their importance. Unity of ownership and management and control would be relevant factors. So would the general unity of the two concerns; the unity of finance may not be irrelevant and geographical location may also be of some relevance; functional integrality can also be a relevant and important factor in some cases. It is also possible that in some cases, the test would be whether one concern forms an integral part of another so that the two together constitute one concern, and in dealing with this question the nexus of integration in the form of some essential dependence of the one on the other may assume relevance. Unity of purpose or design, or even parallel of coordinate activity intended to achieve a common object for the 'purpose of carrying out the business of the one or the other can also assume relevance and importance.. .. In the complex and complicated forms which modern industrial enterprise assumes, it would be unreasonable to suggest that anyone of the relevant tests is decisive; the importance and significance of the tests would vary according to the facts in each case and so, the question must always be determined bearing in mind all the relevant tests and co-relating them to the nature of the enterprise with which the court is concerned. It would be seen that the test of functional integrality would be relevant and very significant when the court is dealing with different kinds of businesses run by the same industrial establishment of employer. Where an employer runs two different kinds of business which are allied to each other, it is pertinent to inquire whether the two lines of business are functionally integrated or are mutually inter-dependent. If they are, that would, no doubt, be a very important factor in favour of the plea that the two lines of business constitute one unit. But the test of functional integrality would not be as important when we are dealing with the case of an employer who runs the same business in two different places. The fact that the test of functional integrality is not and generally cannot be satisfied by two such concerns run by the same employer in the same line, will not necessarily, mean that the two concerns do not constitute one unit. Therefore, in our opinion, Sri Sastri is not justified in elevating the test of functional integrality to the position of a decisive test in every case. If the said test is treated as decisive, an industrial establishment which runs different factories in the same line and in the same place may be able to claim that the different factories are different units for the purpose of bonus. Besides, the context in which the plea of the unity of two establishments is raised cannot be ignored. If the context is one of the claim for bonus, then it may be relevant to remember that generally a claim for bonus is allowed to be made by all employees together when they happened to be the employees employed by the same employer.[43]

In this view of law and on the facts of the case, the court had set aside the finding of the tribunal, that the two mills run by the same employer at different places constituted one unit. In Fine Knitting, a limited company was carrying on the business of manufacturing of hosiery goods. Later on, with a view to assure supply of yarn for its hosiery manufacture, the company installed a spinning machinery unit. In the course of time, spinning of yarn became the principal activity of the company and bulk of the yarn manufactured in the spinning section was not suitable for consumption in the hosiery section and was sold in the open market. Only twenty per cent of the yarn manufactured in the spinning section was consumed in the hosiery manufacture and the rest was sold in the market. The company treated the employees working in the two units on separate basis in regard to wages, dearness allowance and payment of bonus. It also supplied the prescribed quantity of yarn manufactured by it to the Government in accordance with a notification under the Cotton Textile (Control) Order 1948. The Registrar recognised the spinning and hosiery sections of the company under s 11 of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act 1946 as two distinct and separate undertakings and enterprises. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the test of functional integrality or unity of employment or unity of purpose and design could not be considered to have been satisfied. Speaking for the court, Gajendragadkar J held that though the question about the unity of two industrial establishments has to be considered in the light of the relevant tests, such as functional inter-dependence, unity of ownership, management, labour, finance and habitation and treatment by the employer concerned, it would be unreasonable to treat anyone of the said tests as decisive. In dealing with such problems, several factors are relevant, but it must be remembered that the significance of several factors would not be the same in each case nor their importance.[44]

In DCM Chemicals, a limited company was engaged in the business of manufacturing various products such as textiles, chemicals and sugar etc. The units engaged in the manufacture of textiles and chemicals were situated in Delhi at two different places. The bulk of the chemicals manufactured by the chemical unit was sold in the open market and a small percentage of the chemicals was supplied to the textile unit for its use at the market price. The two units were treated as separate and distinct for the purposes of recruitment of labour, sale and conditions of service for the workmen employed therein. However, all the units had a common balance sheet for the whole company and there was no separate capital or reserve fund for the different units and dividends to the shareholders were declared on the basis of total profit of the company as a whole. It was held that the Chemical Works unit was an independent unit and therefore in fixing the wage structure etc., it had to look to-the position of the Chemical Works units only and could not integrate it with other units and consider its wage-structure etc. on the basis of such integration. The fact, that the company was a legal entity in which all the profits and loss accounts of all the units merged, could not lead to the conclusion that the various undertakings carried on by the company must be regarded as one integral whole for the purpose of determining the wage structure etc., of the workmen of the chemical unit. The conduct of the employer company in dealing with the different units in the past also was taken into account in holding them as independent units.[45]

In Wenger & Co, the court was concerned with fixation of wages and dearness allowance etc. for certain restaurants and hotels. The question that arose was whether the wine shop owned by a restaurant was a separate and distinct unit from the restaurant or was a part of the same establishment for the purpose of fixing wages and dearness allowance. The evidence on record showed that there was unity of ownership, unity of finance, unity of management and unity of labour in regard to the restaurant and the wine shop attached to the restaurant in question. Furthermore, the wine shop and restaurant had not been registered as separate establishments under the provisions of Delhi Shops and Establishments Act 1954. On these facts, it was held that the wine shop and restaurant to which the wine shop was attached formed part of the same establishment for the purposes of fixation of wages, dearness allowance and other service conditions.[46] In WIMCO, the company was engaged in the manufacture of matches having one of its factories at Bareilly and had also a separate sales office at the same place to look after the sales of the goods manufactured at the factory. The staff employed by the company at the sales office consisted mainly of the salesmen and inspectors. The workmen employed in the factory and the staff working at the factory office of the company were having the benefit of production bonus scheme while the workmen employed at the sales office of the company were not given the benefit of that scheme. In these circumstances, the court held that functional integrality was writ large on the activities of the factory and the sales office in as much as the sales office could not exist without the factory. The test of 'functional integrality' was emphasised as the most relevant and the fact that the recruitment and control and discipline of manpower and muster rolls of the factory and sales office were different were not held to be relevant. Das Gupta J observed:

> It is enough to mention that among the many tests that have been evolved, functional integrality, inter-dependence, or community of financial control and management, community of man-power and of its control, recruitment and discipline, the manner in which the employer has organised the different activities, whether he has treated them as independent of one another or as inter-connected and inter-dependent, enjoy pride of place. But this list is by no means exhaustive. Nor can the tests and the principles that have been laid down be applied mechanically or by way of syllogism. That is why in applying the well-settled test and principles on these problems we have to bear in mind that while all tests that are possible of Application should be applied, the value and importance to be attached to an individual test will very according to the nature of the industrial activities and according to the nature of disputes in which the problem has arisen, viz, whether it is in respect of lay-off, retrenchment, production bonus, profit bonus or something else.[47]

In Indian Cable Co, the court was concerned with the application of the rule, 'last come first go' to an industrial establishment under s 25G of the Industrial Disputes Act. In this case, the company was carrying on business at various places in India. It decided to close one of its branches and consequently all the workmen employed and working at that branch were retrenched. An industrial dispute was raised on behalf of some of these workmen that their retrenchment was not valid as the provisions of s 25G of the Act were not applied by taking all the branches of the company as one unit. The tribunal accepted this plea of workmen and directed the company to reinstate the workmen with backwages. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that the test of the location of the establishment and of financial integrity were held to be decisive.[48]

In Straw Board, the court was dealing with a case of closure of one of the units of the company. The company owned two units known as Straw Board Mill and Regmal Mill. The former manufactured straw board while the latter manufactured abrasive paper and cloth described as regmal. These two units were situated close to each other with only a railway line intervening. Each unit was a factory registered separately under the Factories Act. However, one balance sheet and one profit and loss account was prepared for the company as a whole consolidating the accounts of both the mills. The Straw Board Mill had more than 200 workmen whereas the Regmal Mill had only 50 workmen. The company closed the Straw Board Mill on the ground of non-availability of bagasse which was the raw material for the manufacture of straw board and terminated the services of the workmen of this mill by stages spread over a period of nearly two months. One of the questions for considerations was whether the Staw Board Mill and the Regmal Mill formed part of the same establishment. In this connection, the court observed that the principles laid down in the earlier dicta were not 'too rigid' and the question had to be decided on the basis of 'functional integrality' of the two units ascertainable from the facts on record. The common features between the two units were: unity of ownership; ultimate control and supervision: unity of finance; similarity of certain conditions in general; similarity of general wage structure; proximity of the units; some work for the Regmal Mills being performed in the Straw Board Mills; common boiler supplying steam to Regmal Mills; location of the processing furnace of the Regmal Mills in the Straw Board Mills, identical bonus scheme for both the units except for one year; inter-transferability of employees from one unit to the other; identical working conditions; maintenance of one balance sheet and profit and loss account and one consolidated account for the company including both the units depreciation fund, the same occupier, and, above all, treatment by the company of both the units as one in certain matters as above. The court said that the most important aspect in this particular case relating to closure was whether one unit has such complemental relation that closing of one must lead to the closing of the other or one cannot reasonably exist without the other. Functional integrality would assume an added significance in a case of closure of a branch or unit; and that the Regmal Mills was capable of functioning in isolation was of material import. The court, while holding that the two units were separate and independent of one another and that it was a clear case of closing an independent unit and not a part of the establishment, stated the principle thus:

> There is bound to be a shift of emphasis in application of various tests from one case to another. In other words, whether independent functioning of the R. Mill can at all be said to be effected by the closing of the S Mill. . .[49]

Likewise, in Isha Steel, the court held that the fact that (i) the two factories belonging to the same wonder had common PF and ESI number and (ii) there was a settlement containing similar terms between the management and the workmen of the two units; was not sufficient to hold that the two units were one and the same. There was no provision for inter-transferability of the workmen. The tribunal held that the two units were independent of each other and, therefore, s 25G was not attracted. The said award was set aside by the High Court. In appeal, the Supreme Court set aside the judgment of the High Court and restored the award of the tribunal, and observed that the findings of fact recorded by the tribunal were not amenable to interference by the High Court under Art 226 of the Constitution, and that the very fact that the second party continued to function notwithstanding the closure of the first one, evidenced the fact that there was no functional integrality between the two factories.[50] In SG Chemicals, the pharmaceutical division was at Worli, the laboratory and dyes division were at Trombay and the marketing and sales division was at Churchgate. It was held that the two units were considered to be integral part of the manufacturing activities of the factory at Trombay because the factory could never have functioned independently without the Churchgate division being there.[51] In Andhra Cement, the Andhra Cement Co. Ltd established the Andhra Cement Factory at Vijaywada in 1938, and in 1978 it established another factory at Visakhapatnam styled as 'Visakha Cement Works'. This was registered as a separate factory and had a separate management. Besides, a separate licence also was granted in its favour. The state Government allowed interest free sales tax loan and a rebate of 25 per cent in power tariff to this factory. However, the managing director and the general manager were the same persons in both the units; there was a management service pool consisting of managers, officers, supervisors and other service personnel working in all the units and officers had been transferred from one unit to the other. The annual report referred to the Vijayawada unit as the mother clinkering plant and the company itself referred to Visakha Cement works as a unit. On the basis of these facts, a single judge of the High Court held that Visakha Cement Works was a branch of the Vijayawada factory.[52] Where a company having several manufacturing units, such as an aerated water factory, electrical department, drugs factory, soda factory, air conditioning departments, pharmaceuticals, consumer stores, etc., had closeddown one of the units, namely, the 'House Furnishing Unit' in which a total of 89 workers were employed, it was held that all the units should be taken together to arrive at the total number of employees which would work out to be more than 100 under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, and that the said unit which was closed could not be said to be a 'separate establishment' for the purpose of s 25E. On this view of the matter, the High Court held that the workmen retrenched as a consequence of the said closure should be reinstated with full backwages.[53]

(iv) On the Part of Workmen

The phrase 'on the part of workmen in another part of the establishment' qualifies both the expressions, i.e., 'slowing down of production' as well as 'strike'. Therefore, the workmen who are laid-off due to strike on the part of the workmen in another part of the establishment would not be entitled to lay-off compensation.[54]

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25F. Conditions precedent to retrenchment of workmen.—

No workman employed in any industry who has been in continuous service for not less than one year under an employer shall be retrenched by that employer until—

(a) the workman has been given one month's notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment and the period of notice has expired, or the workman has been paid in lieu of such notice, wages for the period of the notice;

[55][* * * * *]

(b) the workman has been paid, at the time of retrenchment, compensation which shall be equivalent to fifteen days' average pay [56][for every completed year of continuous service] or any part thereof in excess of six months; and

(c) notice in the prescribed manner is served on the appropriate Government [57][or such authority as may be specified by the appropriate Government by notification in the Official Gazette].

LEGISLATION

This section was inserted as a part of ch VA by s 3 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1953. Some amendments were introduced by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964, which have been shown in the footnotes to the text of the section.

OBJECT OF THE SECTION

Realising the position that an employer could not be expected to carry the economic dead weight of surplussage of labour, the legislature provided for the compensation under this section to soften the rigour of hardship resulting from an employee being thrown out of employment though for no fault of his.[58] In enacting s 25F, the legislature has also standardised the payment of compensation to workmen, 'retrenched in normal or ordinary sense in an existing or continuous industry'.[59] Before the enactment of this provision, tribunals had to deal with a perplexing variety of factors for determining appropriate relief and, by and large, adopted a simple yardstick of length of service of the retrenched workmen.[60] The right created by s 25F is based on grounds of humane public policy and on the consideration that involuntary unemployment causes dislocation of trade and industry and may result in general economic insecurity.[61] Station masters and traffic inspectors employed by the State Road Transport Corpn., being outside the scope of the definition of 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s), the question of non-compliance of s 25-N does not arise.[62]

'NO WORKMAN EMPLOYED...SHALL BE RETRENCHED BY THAT EMPLOYER UNTIL'

This section is captioned 'conditions precedent to retrenchment of workmen' and the conditions laid down in it have been preambled with the words, 'no workman employed in any industry who has been in continuous service for not less than one year under an employer shall be retrenched by the employer until'.[63] The postulates of this provision are that the person claiming its protection must be (i) having the relation of employee with the employer, (ii) he must be a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) of the Act, (iii) the establishment in which he is employed must be an industry within the meaning of s 2(j) and (iv) he must have put in not less than one year of continuous service as defined by s 25B under the employer. These conditions are cumulative. If anyone of these conditions is lacking, the provisions of this section will not be attracted. In Oasis School, the AP High Court held that if the law prescribes certain requirements for valid termination of employment, retrenchment without complying with such requirements will not be void ab initio, as the provisions of this section will not be attracted.[64] For instance, in Eranalloor Co-op Bank, the appointment made without obtaining the prior approval of the Registrar of Co-operative Societies and without complying with the requirements of the relevant rule was held to be made without the authority of law and hence, void ab initio. The Kerala High Court observed that the person who claims the benefit of s 25F, must be one validly appointed in the service of the employer. In other words, he shall establish that he is in the service of the employer having been validly appointed. It is the contract of service that is terminated and service cannot be terminated unless it is capable of being continued. The workman should, therefore, establish that he has the right to continue in service and that the said service has been terminated without complying with the provisions of s 25F.[65]

Likewise, where the establishment in which the employee is employed is not an industry, the provisions of s 25F will not be attracted.[66] Even in a case where the workman was employed within a period of about 13 months on different occasions and each engagement was separate and distinct from every other engagement and there was no nexus between the one engagement and another engagement and his services for such engagements were utilised intermittently to do certain work which arose only on certain occasions and he was employed only to do work of a casual nature and not the work connected with the work of the bank, the workman could not be said to have been in continuous service for 240 days.[67] Furthermore, the continuous service of 240 days must be under the same employer. The period of employment under two different employers cannot be clubbed for the purposes of this section.[68] Likewise, earlier part-time employment can also not be taken into account for computing the period of 240 days.[69] It is for the workman to show that he has been in continuous service for not less than one year under the employer who retrenched him from service and during that period of twelve months he had served for not less than 240 days.[70] In Hutchiah, the Karnataka High Court held that where a workman has not worked for a period of 240 days immediately prior to the date of discharge, or during any other year, it is a matter relevant for consideration for computation of the amount payable under s 25F(b). He might not be entitled to 15 days salary for such year. However, that does not mean that if for some reason or other, a workman has not worked for 240 days in the year preceding the date of termination, his past service by the force of which he would be entitled to the notice and payment prescribed in s 25F would be wiped out.[71] Even a badli workman,[72] and a probationer,[73] is entitled to the protection of the provisions of this section. Likewise, even a daily worker who has put in more than 240 days in a year has to be regarded as a workman for the purposes of the protection of this section.[74] Merely because an employee has worked for 240 days or even for two years or three years on daily wage basis he cannot claim regularisation of service as a matter of right. For regularisation, there must be both posts and funds and the need for retention of the employee according to the requirement of work. Besides, he must be qualified and the work and conduct of such employee must also be satisfactory. It is also to be considered whether appointments on ad hoc/daily wage basis have been made against the leave or casual vacancies. In cases of appointment on such vacancies there would hardly be any scope for regularisation. These and various other factors have to be taken into consideration before deciding the question as to whether service of employee appointed on ad hoc or daily wage basis should be regularised. Regularisation cannot be made as a rule of thumb on the basis of completion of certain years of service of such an employee. It all depends on various facts and it is for the employer to decide as to whether in the facts and circumstances of the case, the services of those employees who were appointed on ad hoc or daily wages basis should be regularised.[75]

The negative form adopted by this section coupled with the use of the word ‘until’ which introduces the three conditions, indicates that the conditions must be first satisfied before retrenchment can be validly affected.[76] It is, implicit in the opening part of the section that a person claiming the protection and benefit of the section must show that he is a ‘workman’ because the protection and the benefit under this section is available only to an employee who is a workman as defined in s 2(s) and not any other employee.[77]Hence, for the purposes of this Act, a badli workman is a workman.[78] Clause (a) requires the employer either to give the workman one month’s notice or to pay him wages in lieu thereof before he is retrenched, while cl (b) provides that the workman is to be paid at the time of the retrenchment compensation which shall be equivalent to 15 days’ average pay for every completed year of service or any part thereof in excess of six months. The payment has to be made at the time of retrenchment. These requirements provide a safeguard in the interests of the workmen. Clause (c) require the employer to give notice of retrenchment to the ‘appropriate Government’ in the prescribed manner. The requirements of cll (a) and (b) are mandatory conditions precedent to valid retrenchment but the requirement of cl (c) cannot be said to constitute a condition precedent which has to be fulfilled before retrenchment can be validly effected. In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha, the court held that non-compliance of the mandatory conditions of s 25F would render the impugned retrenchment invalid and inoperative.[79] A similar view was taken in National Iron and Steel.[80] Where the retrenchment is invalid, it does not bring the employment relationship to an end, and the workman will be entitled to reinstatement with continuity of service and backwages.[81] Therefore, when the retrenchment is found to be illegal and invalid for non-compliance with s 25F, it is imperative for the tribunal to award the relief of reinstatement with full backwages and it has no discretion to award any other relief.[82] Desai J observed:

> If the termination of service is ab initio void and inoperative, there is no question of granting reinstatement because there is no cessation of service and a mere declaration follows that he continues to be in service with all consequential benefits. In certain exceptional circumstances, the courts have not insisted on strict adherence to this rule. For instance, where it is established to the satisfaction of the tribunal that there, in fact, was need and necessity for retrenchment in the industry and the management for valid and legal reasons decided to retrench the workman, the tribunal will have to consider whether it would be just and reasonable to order reinstatement after holding that the mandatory requirements of s 25F had not been complied with. In other words, in cases of bona fide retrenchment without complying with the mandatory pre-conditions, the tribunal will have discretion to award compensation in lieu of reinstatement, depending on the facts and circumstances of the case.[83]

In Surendra Kumar Verma, the Supreme Court said that invalid retrenchment 'must ordinarily lead to the reinstatement of the services of the workmen. It is as if the order has never been, and so it must ordinarily lead to backwages too. But there may be exceptional circumstances which make it impossible or wholly inequitable vis-a-vis the employer and workmen to direct reinstatement will full backwages'. Then the court pointed out the instances where the adjudicator may have discretion to mould the relief and make appropriate consequential orders instead of reinstatement or backwages. For instance, where the industry is closed or is in severe financial doldrums or the workman might have secured better or other employment elsewhere, the relief of reinstatement might be denied. Likewise, the relief of full backwages also might be denied where it would place an impossible burden on the employer.[84] In Bharat Heavy Electricals, in the facts and circumstances of the case, the Gujarat High Court upheld the direction of the tribunal awarding reinstatement with backwages from a date subsequent to the date of termination of service till reinstatement and also granting only 25 per cent of backwages.[85] However the fact that retrenchment is justified would not bring the jurisdiction of the tribunal to an end; it would still have to see whether before ordering reinstatement, the statutory conditions have been complied with. Further, the rule of estoppel or waiver cannot be applied against retrenched workmen who have no freedom to refuse payment in view of their slender financial position caused by retrenchment.[86] Even if workmen have received sums paid to them 'in full and final settlement' of their accounts, they would still be entitled to challenge the order of retrenchment for non-compliance of the statutory requirements, if compensation as required by the section, has not been paid. There cannot be estoppel against the statute; particularly when non-compliance with the statute goes to the root of the thing. The management on the other hand, is on a higher platform. Therefore, acceptance of a lower post cannot be treated as acquiescence, and it would not amount to condonation of the illegality committed by the employer nor would such acceptance extinguish his rights under the law to have a declaration that the retrenchment was illegal particularly so when the workman is without employment and in need of making a living.[87] In Straw Board, Goswami J held that extreme technical considerations usually invoked in civil proceedings may not be allowed to out-weigh substantial justice to the parties in an industrial adjudication.[88] Nor is the benefit of retrenchment compensation subject to any contract between the parties, as the terms of contract cannot over-ride the statutory provision.[89]

For attracting the provisions of this section, the termination of service of the employee must be by a voluntary act of the employer. If there is no termination of service by the employer out of his own volition and discharge of the employee is brought about on account of a supervening act or even over which the employee has no control, then it cannot by any stretch of language be said that there is termination of the service of the employee by the employer. The essence of the idea of 'retrenchment' is that the termination of the workman's service is by a voluntary act on the part of the employer.[90]The benefit of this provision can only be claimed by an employee who falls within the definition of 'workman' in s 2(s) of the Act. For this purpose, even a temporary workman would also be entitled to claim the benefits under this section.[91] The Act makes no distinction between the casual workmen and other workmen. Benefit of this section, therefore, is available to casual workers as well. What is relevant is the relationship of employer and the employee for requisite length of time and the nature of employment is irrelevant provided that the conditions of s 2(s) are satisfied.[1] However, a person, who is not a 'workman' at all, cannot claim these benefits even though he may be an employee of the employer. However, the pre-conditions for effecting valid retrenchment provided in this section are required to be satisfied only in the case of a workman who was in continuous service for not less than one year at the time of the retrenchment and not in respect of others.[2] Where a question as to whether retrenchment was justified, is referred for adjudication, it would include whether it was legally and factually justified.[3] A lawful retrenchment cannot be struck down merely because it did not accord with executive instructions of a Government department because such instructions do not per se confer any legal right on an employee.[4]

REQUIREMENTS OF VALID RETRENCHMENT

This section postulates three conditions to be fulfilled by an employer for effecting a valid retrenchment, namely:

(i) one month's notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment or wages in lieu of such notice;

(ii) payment of compensation equivalent to fifteen days, average pay for every completed year of continuous service or any part thereof in excess of six months; and

(iii) notice to the appropriate Government in the prescribed manner.[5]

It is now well-settled that considering the negative language used in s 25F, the section imposes a mandatory duty on the employer which is a condition precedent to retrenchment of a workman. Therefore, the contravention of the mandatory requirements of the section would invalidate the retrenchment and render it void ab initio.[6] The Mysore High Court took the view that these three things should be done simultaneously. In other words, the employer's conduct should show that the three things are parts of the same transaction.[7] The Supreme Court, on the construction of the section, held that requirement of notice to the Government postulated by cl (c) is not a condition precedent.[8] Hence, it need not be complied alongwith the conditions postulated by cll (a) and (b) which must be simultaneously complied with. Thus, any retrenchment effected without giving notice or paying wages in lieu of such notice as required by cl (a) and without paying the definite amount of compensation as required by cl (b) will be invalid.[9] However, it does not mean that the provision requires split-second action. The essence of the matter is that compliance with these requirements should appear to be parts of a single transaction. For instance, where the retrenchment notice stated that one month's wages in lieu of the notice as well as retrenchment compensation will be paid on the same day at the managing director's office, which was about a mile away from the factory, it could not be said the retrenchment and payment of wages and compensation did not form part of a single transaction.[10] In Parsuram Mishra. the retrenchment of the workman affected after complying with the requirement of s 25F was upheld by the industrial tribunal. The High Court directed that the workman should be retained in service pending the decision of the writ petition. After the writ petition was dismissed by the High Court, the employer struck the name of the workman off the rolls. This action of the employer was again challenged by a writ petition on the ground that striking the name of the workman off the rolls was retrenchment and that since the requirements of s 25F were not complied with, the retrenchment was invalid. This contention was negatived by the High Court holding that there was no question of a second retrenchment when the writ petition was finally disposed of. From the mere fact that the name of the workman was struck off the rolls subsequently, it could not be held that he was retrenched for the second time. Striking off the name of the workman was merely a clerical act and the retrenchment had taken effect when, it was effected by complying with the procedure under s 25F.[11]

In Ramesh, Kochar J of the Bombay High Court held that the fact that the retrenchment compensation was not paid along with notices and the further fact that vide a separate letter, the employees were asked to collect their retrenchment compensation from their concerned divisions, did not amount to any violation of s 25F, considering the fact that the large number of employees were employed in various divisions spread over miles of distance, it would be totally impracticable and impossible for the cashiers to carry the cash on to the sites and to offer or pay them the same along with retrenchment notices. In the circumstances, it could not be said that there was breach of s 25F if the employer had requested the workmen to come to the accounts department or the office and collect the amount of retrenchment of compensation as required under s 25F.[12] This ruling is inconsistent not only with the provisions of s 25F, but also with the numerous decisions of the apex court on the subject. The fact of practical difficulties involved in a project work of this nature with different divisions employing a large number of employees spread over several miles is no valid ground to violate s 25F, which prescribes, in unmistakable terms, the payment of notice wages and retrenchment compensation as 'conditions precedent to retrenchment'. Going by the maxim, conditio praecedens adimpleri debet prius quam sequatur effectus, which means, 'a condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow', a notice of retrenchment, which is couched in terms, 'you are advised to collect your dues/retrenchment compensation from the accounts department: runs counter to the spirit of s 25F and renders the retrenchment invalid. Directing the retrenched workers to collect their dues from the account office is not the same thing as paying the compensation before effecting retrenchment as a condition precedent. This decision is wrong. In Parrys, a single judge of Calcutta High Court held that payment of retrenchment compensation through account payee cheque by registered post acknowledgment due on the date of retrenchment is sufficient compliance of s 25F.[13]

In Pramod Jha, speaking for the Supreme Court, Lahoti J (for self and Brajesh Kumar J) held that, where the facts disclosed that (i) the employer served one month notice under s 25F, (ii) tendered the compensation in the form of Banker's cheques, and (iii) also gave opportunity to the workmen to be heard on the said notices, even though he was not required under the law, the retrenchment could not be found fault with on any of the grounds under clauses (a) and (b) of s 25F.[14] In Jagir Singh, Sinha J (for Self and Hegde J) held that the question of compliance with s 25F arises when the service of the workman is terminated on a ground other than dismissal. Hence, the question of paying retrenchment compensation or serving the statutory notice would not arise in the case of dismissal for an act of misconduct.[15] The requirement to comply with the provision of Section 25-F(b) is mandatory before retrenchment of a workman is given effect to. In the event of any contravention of the said mandatory requirement, the retrenchment would be rendered void ab initio. Insufficient compensation paid to the workman, than what is prescribed in s 25F, renders the retrenchment invalid.[16]

In ONGC, it was held that the number of days worked in broken spells in different departments, which are independent departments of the corporation, cannot be taken as continuous service for the purpose of s 25F.[17] In Abaskar Constructions, the labour court recorded a finding to the effect that the retrenchment ordered by the management was in order in every respect as, for instance, the notice, the payment of compensation as a condition precedent to retrenchment, and the adherence to the principle of 'last come, first go'. Having held so, the labour court directed reinstatement of the workmen on the ground that the Joint Managing Director was not competent to sign and issue retrenchment letters. Quashing the order of the labour court, a single judge of the Delhi High Court dealt with the relevant provisions of the Articles of Associations and the provisions of the Companies Act and held that a Joint Managing Director was as much the Managing Director and performs all the functions assigned to the Managing Director.[18]

In Mackinon Mackenzie, the facts were: The company was having some 150 employees. In 1992, the company served a notice of retrenchment on 98 workmen together with the statement of reasons, which stated that the company was accumulating losses and the proprietors had taken a decision inter alia to rationalise its activities. Since there was a deviation from the seniority list of some workers in the clearing and forwarding departments and some of the remaining workers from the alleged closed departments of the company were to be transferred to the aforesaid retained departments, a seniority list of all the workmen was put up on the notice board. The union filed a complaint before the Industrial Court alleging the unfair labour practices on the part of the employer under the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU&PULP Act 1971). The industrial court directed, inter alia, to pay all the arrears of wages to retrenched workmen from the date of alleged retrenchment till the date of the award. Both the tiers of the High Court upheld the award. Dismissing the appeal, Gopala Gowda J (for self and Nagappan J) observed:

> .. . the cumulative effect of the pleadings, Statement of Reasons appended to the retrenchment notice, it is made very clear that the retrenchment notice served upon the concerned workmen was an action of closure. .. no cogent evidence has been brought before us by the appellant-Company to prove that the above referred one month's salary of the concerned workmen in lieu of the retrenchment notice has been actually paid to them. Further, the concerned workmen were given notice of retrenchment with Statement of Reasons appended therewith by the appellant-Company only on 27.07.1992 which was effective from 4.08.1992. Therefore, one month notice was not given to the concerned workmen before their retrenchment came into effect nor one month's salary in lieu of the retrenchment notice was paid to the concerned workmen. Therefore, the said action by the appellant-Company is a clear cut breach of the above said provision of condition precedent for retrenchment of the workmen as provided under Section 25F clause (a) of the I.D. Act. The Industrial Court after examining the facts and evidence on record has rightly answered the question of breach of Section 25F clause (b) in the negative since no evidence has been produced by the respondent-Union to prove the same and further no calculation is brought to our notice as to the amount received by way of retrenchment compensation and also the actual amount sought to have been paid to the retrenched workmen. Further, with regard to the provision of Section 25F clause (c), the appellant-Company has not been able to produce cogent evidence that notice in the prescribed manner has been served by it to the State Government prior to the retrenchment of the concerned workmen. Therefore, we have to hold that the appellant-Company has not complied with the conditions precedent to retrenchment as per Section 25F clauses (a) and (c) of the I.D. Act which are mandatory in law.[19]

In Durgapur Casual Workers Union, the facts were: the Food Corporation of India had long back setup a rice mill in the name and style of Modern Rice Mill at Durgapur and it had been handed to successive contractors for running the same. The concerned workmen, forty nine in numbers, had been working as contract labours under the contractors in the rice mill. The last contractor was Civicon. The contract system was terminated and the rice mill was closed in the year 1990-1991. Thereafter, the concerned workmen were directly employed by the Corporation in June, 1991 as casual employees on daily wage basis in the Food Storage Depot at Durgapur for performing the jobs of sweeping go down and wagon floors, putting covers on infested stocks for fumigation purpose, cutting grass, collections and bagging of spillage from god owns/wagons etc. A dispute raised by the workers for regularization was referred for adjudication in July 1996. The tribunal directed the corporation to regularize the services of the said workmen in view of their long service and held their continued casualisation amounted to unfair labour practice as stipulated in Part I (10) of Schedule-V to the ID Act. A single judge of the Calcutta High Court dismissed the writ petition filed by the management, which was reversed by a division bench, which apparently relied on the apex court decision in Uma Devi,[20] and held that no regularization of casual workers would be permissible unless the contingencies of law was satisfied. Aggrieved, the union approached the apex court. Allowing the appeal, Mukhopadhyaya J (for self and PC Pant J) held:

> In the present case, it is admitted that the workmen had been working as contract labours under the contractor in the rice mill of the Corporation. The contract system was terminated and the rice mill was closed in the year 1990-1991. The effect was termination of services of the workmen. In that view of the matter, they were entitled for re-employment when the employer proposed to take into his employment any person, in view of Section 25H. .. . Under Section 25H the retrenched workman who offer themselves for employment shall have preference over other persons. It was for the said reason the workmen were employed by the Corporation > in June, 1991.. .. Having accepted that there was unfair trade practice, it was not open to the Division Bench of the High Court to interfere with the impugned award.[21] (paras 20 & 23) (Italics supplied).

With great respect, the reasoning and conclusion of Mukhopadhyaya J are not free from serious fallacies of fact and law, and deserve to be assailed on more grounds than one. In the first place, is it possible to hold that the closure of the rice mill in 1991 and the termination of contract between the Corporation and the contractor, resulting in the unemployment of the contract workers, amounted to retrenchment; if so, under what provision of the ID Act? Secondly, both sections 25FF & 25FFF stipulate notice and compensation on the lines of s 25F, as can be seen from the phrase 'as if the workman had been retrenched'. It is well settled by a Constitution Bench decision that the said phrase was inserted as a legal fiction to the effect that, even though such termination occasioned by the transfer or closure of undertaking is not retrenchment stricto sensu, yet for the limited purpose of notice and compensation, it should be treated as retrenchment.[22] The said decision holds the field unscathed for over fifty years now. Thirdly, even from a common sense point of view, neither s 25G ("last come, first go") nor s 25H ("re-employment of retrenched workmen") could apply to a case of transfer or closure of undertaking for the reason that the undertaking was either sold or completely closed, and there is nothing left for the employer to 're-employ' the workmen, because, in the first case the undertaking was transferred, i.e., sold to, or acquired by, another, and, in the second, it was completely closed. By the same token, the principle of 'last come, first go' also doesn't apply, as the services of the whole body of workmen stand terminated in both the cases of transfer and closure. Fourthly, in the given set of facts, the corporation had, after the closure of the rice mill and the termination of the contract, appointed them on its rolls on a casual basis, though no obligation was cast on the corporation, given the fact that they were the employees of the contractor as on the date of closure of the mill in 1991. Fifthly, even assuming that s 25H was applicable to the case, without conceding in the least, does it impose a duty on the employer to compulsorily employ the workmen who were retrenched earlier? The said section, which was reproduced by the learned judge, is appended below for ready reference:

> Section 25H. Re-employment of retrenched workmen.- Where any workmen are retrenched, and the employer proposes to take into his employ any persons, he shall, in such manner as may be prescribed, give an opportunity to the retrenched workmen who are citizens of India to offer themselves for reemployment and such retrenched workman who offer themselves for re-employment shall have preference over other persons.

The said section merely casts an obligation of giving opportunity to the retrenched workmen in the event of future re-employment and preferential treatment over other persons, and nothing more. There is no warrant for any judge at any level to read more into the said provision. As is well understood, preferential treatment simply means that "other things remaining equal, the ascertained person should be given preference", with the further implication that "if the merits are not equal, the word 'preference' loses its sanctity and becomes irrelevant". Sixthly, that being the legal position, does the section confer a statutory right on retrenched workmen to be re-employed or, when so employed, to be given the same job and terms and conditions that were applicable to them at the time of retrenchment? Seventhly, is there is anything in the said section to show that a duty was imposed on the employer to necessarily employ the retrenched workmen, who offer themselves for re-employment? The answers to these two questions are a firm "No'. Eighthly, the learned judge averred (in para 20): "Under Section 25H, the retrenched workmen who offer themselves for employment shall have preference over other persons. It was for the said reason the workmen were employed by the Corporation in June, 1991". What is the truth value of this averment? Was it because of s 25H or was it on compassionate grounds and voluntarily that the corporation gave employment to the workers? The answer again is too obvious, for the reason that the said workmen were the employees of the contractor before closure, and were never on the rolls of the corporation. Ninthly, could it by any stretch of imagination be canvassed that 'contract workers' have a statutory right to offer themselves for re-employment under the 'principal employer', and the latter has a corresponding duty to employ them; if so, under what provision of law? Tenthly, should the generosity shown by the corporation - by giving direct employment to contract workers, despite closure of the rice mill and termination of the contract itself - be branded as 'Unfair Labour Practice'? And, lastly, what is the judicial propriety in accepting the outrageous conclusion of the tribunal that it was a case of 'unfair labour practice', at its face value, without investigating into the factual position? As a matter of fact, the issues raised in this case are squarely covered by the ratio of Uma Devi. It is disquieting to see the learned judge advancing untenable arguments and mediocre reasoning to reach an insipid conclusion. The order passed by the tribunal was arbitrary, irresponsible, callous and illegal and, shockingly, the decision of Mukhopadhyaya J, was no different! The learned judge failed to get a hang of the basic distinction between s 25F, on the one hand, and ss 25FF & FFF, on the other. Similarly, his analysis betrays his inability to grasp the non-severable link between s 25F and ss 25G & H, which either apply or do not apply uno flatu to a given case. The learned judge failed to come to grips with the legal position that ss 25G & H could have no application, whatsoever, to a case falling within the pale of s 25FF & s 25FFF. Without a sound knowledge of the inter-relationship among these five provisions, what is it that a judge could decide in a matter falling within their range, and what quality of judgment does he propose to deliver? With great respect, the Division Bench of the High Court was clear in the analysis of facts and candid in its reasoning and the application of law, and is right, whereas the decision of Supreme Court reflects nothing judicious, except an abuse of judicial power, apart from perversions of grave magnitude, and is manifestly wrong. This decision calls for review by a larger bench and has to be overruled sooner than later, as it is capable of producing great public mischief, if allowed to stand in the form in which it was pronounced.

CLAUSE (A): NOTICE OR WAGES IN LIEU OF NOTICE

This clause requires that the workman proposed to be retrenched should be given one month's notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment, and the period of notice should expire before retrenchment. Alternatively, it provides that the workman may be paid in lieu of such notice wages for the period of notice, i.e., one month. In other words, it is open to an employer not to give a notice but in that event it will be incumbent on him to pay at the time of retrenchment one month's wages in lieu of the notice, that is, for the period of the notice.[23] This clause, therefore, affords a safeguard to a retrenched employee. It requires the employer either to give him one month's notice or to pay him wages in lieu thereof before he is retrenched. The notice or payment in lieu of notice has to precede the retrenchment and not to follow it. Having regard, to the object which is intended to be achieved by this clause, it is clear that the requirement of serving a notice or pay wages in lieu thereof is mandatory.[24] Retrenchment effected without complying with the requirements of this clause would therefore be illegal and ineffective.[25] The first part of this clause prescribes the requirement of one month's 'notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment'. For instance, in Rabindra Kumar, the termination order was given to the workmen on 7 July 1983 terminating their services wef 31 July 1983 afternoon. Since there was no notice for a complete month, the Orissa High Court held that the requirement of law to give one month's notice had not been complied with and, therefore, the retrenchment was illegal.[26]

A notice pasted on the board of the company without serving on the workmen for affecting retrenchment is not sufficient compliance of this provision.[27] This clause further requires that the reasons for retrenchment are to be indicated in the notice. The second part dispenses with the requirement of the notice in a case where the workman has been paid in lieu of such notice, wages for the period of notice. The language of this clause is plain and suggests that the two parts are completely independent. In other words, the employer has to 'either give one month's notice in writing indicating the reasons for the retrenchment, or to make payment of wages in lieu of such notice. The expression 'in lieu of such notice' is significant. The words 'such notice' means the notice referred to in the first part of the clause which prescribes that it should be in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment. Failure to give one month's notice, or to state reasons for the retrenchment in the notice will vitiate the retrenchment.[28] Where one month's wages 'in lieu of the notice' have been paid, the requirement of indicating reasons does not survive.[29] However, where the winding-up order was passed on 5 December 1960, and the workers were discharged only more than a month thereafter on different dates, the claim of the workers to notice-pay of one month under s 25F(a) was disallowed, as they worked for more than the notice period and drew salary for such period and it was further held that the winding-up work of the liquidator was not the continuing of the business of the company.[30] An employer cannot take advantage of the Standing Orders providing for 48 hours' notice for termination of service of the workman in the face of the statutory provisions of s 25F of the Act which provides for one month's notice for retrenchment of a workman.[31]

CLAUSE (B): RETRENCHMENT COMPENSATION

(i) Quantum

It is implicit in the provision in s 25F that it confers a right on the workman to receive retrenchment compensation.[32] Clause (b) lays down that as a pre-condition to retrenchment, a workman should be paid compensation at the time of retrenchment at the rate of 15 days' average pay for every completed year of continuous service or any part thereof in excess of six months.[33] Thus, in order to be entitled to compensation under this clause, a workman should have worked during the period of twelve calendar months preceding the date of retrenchment, i.e., (i) for 190 days in case he is employed to work in a mine below ground; or (ii) 240 days in any other case. A plain reading of this clause along with the head-note and the opening words of the section, makes it clear that the requirement of paying compensation is a mandatory pre-condition for valid retrenchment of a workman, the non-compliance of which will make the retrenchment invalid and inoperative.[34] In National Project Construction, the Patna High Court held that the question of retrenchment compensation was relevant only when the employment was regular. There could be no compensation in case of employment of temporary character.[35] This decision is wholly misconceived. There is nothing in s 25F, which distinguishes 'regular' or 'permanent' tenure from 'temporary' for the purpose of entitlement to retrenchment compensation. All that it stipulates is 'one year continuous service' as the minimum qualifying requirement for being eligible to notice and retrenchment compensation. As a matter of fact, the tenure of service is not a relevant factor. The invidious distinction sought to be drawn by the Division Bench is clearly unwarranted and repugnant to the plain language of s 25F. Regardless of the fact whether a workman is 'permanent' or 'temporary' or 'casual', the employer is mandated to comply with the requirement of notice/notice wages and retrenchment compensation, if the workman has put in one year continuous service under s 25F r/w s 25B. On the other hand, the LAT held that the plea that the retrenched workman was a 'temporary' workman, and was therefore not entitled to it will not hold good, if 'continuous service' for the time required under s 25F has been put in.[36] The decision rendered by LAT in KNPR Weaving Factory is right, whereas that of the Patna High Court in National Project Construction is patently wrong and deserves to be rejected on the threshold. The second proviso to s 25C gives a right to the employer to set-off any compensation paid to a workman for having laid-off during the preceding twelve months as against the compensation payable for retrenchment.[37] In awarding retrenchment compensation, the concepts of social justice cannot be taken into consideration.[38] The Calcutta High Court held that it would be sufficient compliance with the requirements of cll (a) and (b) of s 25F, if at the time of retrenchment, one month's pay in lieu of notice and the retrenchment compensation is paid to the concerned workman and it is not necessary to pay the arrears of wages, if any, due to the workman, at that time.[39] In a reference for determining the adequacy of compensation, the question that the retrenchment was unfair, cannot be raised and adjudication on such a point would be beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal.[40] In Purna Theatre, the retrenchment of the workman was held to be void ab initio because the amount offered towards retrenchment compensation fell short of the amount required to be paid under this clause and such a mistake in payment could not be rectified after retrenchment was effected.[41]

(ii) Compensation - When Payable

The object the legislature had in mind in making this condition obligatory and in making it as a condition precedent was to partially redress the hardship caused by retrenchment.[42] In Rajasthan SRTC, the corporation retrenched the concerned workmen on 1 June 1982 with immediate effect. At the time of retrenchment, the corporation did not pay or tender the compensation to the workmen. On the same day at about 6 pm the corporation started the process of remitting dues to the workmen by mailing demand drafts for the requisite amount. However, on the reckoning of the court, the amount could not have been received by the workmen before the 3 June 1982. In the circumstances, the court held that it was impossible to say that the employer corporation had complied with the condition precedent of payment of compensation.[43] This appears to be too hyper-techincal view. In Bombay Union of Journalists, Gajendragadkar J held that the compensation for retrenchment must be paid at the time of retrenchment. It is implicit in the requirement to pay compensation at the time of retrenchment that the law recognises and declares the right of the workman to compensation at the time of retrenchment.[44] When the provision imposes a liability upon the employer to pay compensation at the time of retrenchment, it necessarily means that a corresponding right has been created in favour of the workmen.[45] This condition is a condition precedent to a valid order of retrenchment. If, therefore, no retrenchment compensation is paid to the workmen before they are asked to go, the retrenchment order is had and invalid, and is inoperative in law.[46] If the retrenchment order is invalid in law ab initio, subsequent payment of compensation cannot validate it.[47] Even if the workmen received compensation subsequent to the order of retrenchment, they will not be estopped from challenging the legality and validity of the order of retrenchment for there can be no estoppel against the statute.[48] The Madras High Court, on the construction of the word 'paid', held that the payment by cheque at the time of retrenchment will constitute valid payment for the purpose of this provision.[49]

On the issue of the time of payment of retrenchment compensation - before or after retrenchment - there was wide divergence of opinion among different High Courts, which is not being discussed here in view of the conclusive decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in several cases commencing from Hospital Mazdoor Sabha.[50] The purported retrenchment will be void ab initio and, therefore invalid and inoperative in law and cannot be said to have terminated the relation of employment. In such a case, the termination of the service cannot be treated as a 'sort of retrenchment'.[51] It will not be a case of retrenchment at all. In Mohanlal, Desai J held that, if the termination of service is void and inoperative ab initio, there is no question of granting reinstatement because there is no cessation of service and mere declaration follows that the workman continues in service with all consequential benefits.[52] In such a situation the provisions of s 11A will not be attracted.[53] However, since such termination is not retrenchment in the eyes of law, the workman will not be entitled to claim compensation under s 25F(b). Likewise, s 25F will have no direct application where services of all workmen have been terminated by the employer on real and bona fide closure, and in such a case, s 25FFF will come into play. [54] In case there is no retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo), the provisions of s 25F are not attracted. For effecting a valid retrenchment, the conditions of s 25F have to be satisfied. Good faith on the part of the employer or his efforts to get a job for the retrenched workman would not divest a workman of his right to that compensation before being retrenched.[55]

(iii) Unconditional Tender of Compensation Equivalent to Payment

The requirement of this clause, inter alia, is that no workman shall be retrenched by the employer until he 'has been paid' the prescribed compensation at the time of retrenchment. In Delhi Transport, the court observed that the law does not mean that the wages for one month should have been actually paid because in many cases the employer could only tender the amount before the dismissal but could not force the employee to receive the payment before the dismissal becomes effective. In this case, the workman was intimated that he was to be paid one month's wages and that he should report immediately to the accounts officer at the head office to receive the payment. However, the workman did not go to receive the payment. In these circumstances, the court held that the tender was made before the dismissal came into force and the wages would have been paid to him if he had cared to receive them.[56] It is now well settled that giving notice or tendering payment is enough and refusal to receive the notice of payment by the workman does not invalidate the notice or tender of payment.[57] Merely because the workman declines to receive the notice or the payment tendered to him, it cannot be said that he has not been given notice or paid wages.[58] In National Iron & Steel, the Supreme Court held that the fact that the employer had asked the workman concerned to collect his dues from the cash office during the working hours was not sufficient compliance of the requirement offender or offer to pay compensation as it was incumbent upon the employer to pay to the workman such compensation and it was observed that if the workman was asked 'to go forthwith, he had to be paid at the time when he was asked to go and could not be asked to collect his dues afterwards.[59] In Chandra Kumar, one month's wages in lieu of notice together with the retrenchment compensation was sent to the workman concerned by postal money order, but the workman did not choose to accept the money order. In these circumstances, the offer was treated to be sufficient compliance with the requirement of s 25F(b).[60]

All that need be ensured in this connection, is a bona fide offer to the workman as a part of the same transaction of retrenchment. If actual payment in cash at the very spot of retrenchment is insisted on, it may lead to obvious difficulties. Care has to be taken that the management does not put off paying the workers. It has to make its best endeavour to pay.[61] In Indian Compressors, the workman refused to receive the notice of retrenchment and the offer of compensation. The employer sent the notice by registered post and the amount by money order the same day. A single judge of Delhi High Court held that the offer of payment and on its being refused, the sending of the amount by money order is a sufficient compliance with the requirement. The court also discountenanced the argument that the money order should have reached the workman before retrenchment took effect as misconceived since it overlooked the fact that the offer of payment had in fact, been made but it was declined by the workman and the money order was sent on the same day.[62] The Madras High Court held that a cheque is a valid tender. The mere fact that cheque cannot be encashed on that very day when the termination is effected, will not mean that the amount is not paid simultaneously.[63] In Gurmail Singh, the Supreme Court held that the amount of compensation due to various workmen awarded through individual bank drafts by the divisional/sub-divisional offices of the employer were sufficiently in time and therefore, there was sufficient compliance of the provisions of the section.[64] But a sham of tender, where receiving the payment before or at the time of retrenchment is impracticable or impossible, will be no tender in the eye of law.[65] Where the retrenchment infringed s 25F, but was otherwise bona fide, and the awarding of reinstatement is likely to be destructive to the employer, and the award of suitable compensation along with backwages was the rightful exercise of discretion by the labour court.[66]The relief of reinstatement can be denied even in a case of termination in violation of s 25F, if it is found that the employee gained backdoor entry by joining as a temporary employee first and getting extension of his service beyond 240 days, contrary to the provisions of s 4 of the Employment Exchanges (Compulsory Notification of Vacancies) Act 1959, which in turn goes against the principles governing public employment, thus violating Arts 14 and 16 of the Constitution.[67] In Tannery and Footwear, the Supreme Court repelled the contention of management that the workman had not discharged the burden of proving that he had worked for 240 days and, therefore, the order of reinstatement passed by the labour court was without jurisdiction, and held that in the absence of any evidence to the contrary the view taken by the labour court that the workman had worked for 240 days, based on the appointment letter, was justified.[68]

Where the services of a workman, who worked for more than 240 days were terminated without complying with s 25F, the labour court was right in directing reinstatement and there was nothing to show that the said appointment was temporary.[69] In Western India SM Mills, the Standing Orders of the company stipulated 60 years as the age of superannuation with an enabling provision that the management may retain an operative in service up to the age of 63 years if found efficient. Another provision of the same Standing Orders stipulated that, when retrenchment becomes necessary, a person who has completed the age of 60 years may be retired in preference to younger men. A single judge of Bombay High Court held that the management was entitled to retire the workmen who attained the age of 60 years, and that there was no need to comply with the provisions of s 25F.[70]Where the employer, after reinstating a workman pursuant to the orders passed by the High Court that the said termination was illegal for non-compliance with the provisions of s 25F, passed another order on the same day of reinstatement terminating his service duly complying with s 25F, the High Court held that the disputed questions of fact raised by the workman cannot be agitated again by way of a writ petition, and that he should pursue the remedy provided under the Industrial Disputes Act.[71] Termination of workmen without complying with s 25F, though void and the workmen were entitled to reinstatement with backwages, in view of the fact that 12 years had elapsed since termination, lump sum compensation be paid in lieu of reinstatement with backwages.[72] Termination of a casual worker who worked for more than 240 days without complying with s 25F is invalid and without jurisdiction; he is entitled to reinstatement.[73] Termination of the services of a workman, for not reporting for duty at the new place of work, without complying with s 25F is illega1.[74] Where the workman was given one month's notice, salary and retrenchment compensation in terms of s 25F, termination of his service cannot be held to be in violation of s 25F.[75] In SM Nilajkar, while dismissing the appeal filed by the workman, Lahoti J (for self and Brajesh Kumar J) made the following observations, which disclose not only the facts of the case, but also the legal principle governing 'retrenchment' as well as the time when the compensation has to be paid:

> In the case before us the workmen have been given one month's notice in writing. The reasons for retrenchment have been indicated. An opportunity of hearing against the proposed termination was also afforded though not required by section 25F. Retrenchment was to take effect on expiry of one month from the date of the notice. Compensation as required by section 25F was available in the form of banker's cheques for payment to the workers simultaneously with the time of retrenchment and they were given an intimation in advance in that regard. The workers had already approached the High Court and secured an interim order protecting their employment and status quo being maintained. They were obviously not interested in receiving the retrenchment compensation which if done may have had the effect of frustrating the interim order. In these facts and circumstances, the retrenchment of any of the appellants cannot be found fault with on any of the grounds raised by the appellants by reference to Clauses (a) and (b) of section 25F. .. Faced with this situation, a last effort was made by the learned senior counsel for the appellants urging for relief being allowed on the ground of non-compliance with the provisions of section 25N of the Act. Section 25N is placed in Chapter V-B of the Act which according to section 25K has an application only to industrial establishment in which not less than 100 workmen were employed on an average working day for the preceding 12 months. The plea was not raised before the High Court. It is not even taken in the special leave petitions. It was sought to be taken only at the time of hearing. The plea need not detain us any longer. The infirmity in retrenchment by reference to section 25N cannot be ventured to be found out without laying factual foundation attracting applicability of the provision. It is basically a question of fact. In the absence of requisite pleadings having been raised and documents having been brought on record, we are not persuaded to entertain the plea.. .. For all the foregoing reasons we find the appeals devoid of any merit and liable to be dismissed. They are dismissed accordingly. The workers are free to collect the amount of retrenchment compensation as was offered to them.[76]

In MP State Textile Corporation, the issue was whether the holding company, which transferred its employees to different units for work can claim that those of them, who were deputed to work in one of the units which was closed, were not his. In the said case it was held as follows:

> The respondent-workmen were appointed by the appellant-Corporation and their appointment letters are on record.. .. . A reading of the said letter of appointment along with the evidence led by the parties before the Labour Court clearly shows that the respondent-workmen applied for employment in the appellant-Corporation. .. Under the said appointment letter, the appellant had retained its right to transfer the workmen to any unit managed by the appellant, directly or indirectly. From this material on record, it is clear that the workmen were appointed by Corporation as its employees and were transferred or deputed to various Textile Mills under it. . ., in the instant case, to Indore Textile, Ujjain, therefore, if Indore Textile, Ujjain, suffered a closure, the services of the respondent-workmen could not have been terminated by the management of Indore Textile, Ujjain, because the respondent-workmen were not its employees. Therefore, the Labour Court as well as the High Court were justified in coming to the conclusion that the respondent-workmen were the employees of the appellant-Corporation and their retrenchment by Indore Textile, Ujjain is without authority of law since they were not the employees or workmen of Indore Textile, Ujjain.. . .[77]

The number of days of work put in by the employee in broken periods cannot be taken as continuous service for the purpose of s 25F ; the termination of the service of the workman is valid.[78] In Haryana Roadways, Mathur J (for self, Lahoti CJI and Balasubramanian J), held:

> One of the important factors, which has to be taken into consideration, is the length of service ...where the total length of service rendered by a workman is very small, the award of back wages for the complete period...would be wholly inappropriate. Another important factor, which requires to be taken into consideration, is the nature of employment. A regular service of permanent character cannot be compared to short or intermittent daily-wage employment though it may be for 240 days in a calendar year.[79]

In Allahabad Jal Sansthan, SB Sinha J held:

> …with the passage of time, it has come to be realized that industry is being compelled to pay the workman for a period during which he apparently contributed little or nothing at all, for a period that was spent unproductively, while the workman is being compelled to go back to a situation which prevailed many years ago when he was dismissed. It is necessary for us to develop a pragmatic approach to problems dogging industrial relations. However, no just solution can be offered but the golden mean may be arrived at.[80]

A badli workman, has no statutory status or right. The termination of his service for unsatisfactory performance, after giving opportunities for improvement, is neither illegal nor violative of the provisions of s 25F.[81] In Darbara Singh, the respondent-workman was appointed as a peon on daily wage basis in January 1988 daily wage on the condition that if his performance was not satisfactory or if a regular employee joins, his services would be deemed to be terminated without any notice. It was also indicated therein that the daily wager was appointed against vacant post which was temporary in character. His service was extended from time to time same terms, and finally on the appointment of a regular employee, his service was terminated. The labour court directed reinstatement and the writ petition was dismissed by the workmen. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Pasayat J (for self and Raveendran J) held that the materials on record clearly establish that the engagement of the workman was for a specific period and conditional. It was clearly indicated that on the appointment of a regular employee, his engagement would come to an end.[82] In Sukhwinder Kaur, the Sinha J (for self and Bhandari J) discussed the facts and the law relating to contractual appointment with special reference to the applicability of s 25F and observed:

> The respondent, within a span of about 18 months, was appointed thrice and disengaged thrice. As noticed hereinbefore, she was appointed on a contractual basis. The appointments were temporary ones. She was aware that her services could be terminated without notice. She accepted the terms and conditions of the said offers of appointments without any demur.. . However, it appears, before the High Court in the review application, the appellant itself had made a proposal to give lump sum compensation in lieu of her reinstatement. In view of that the appellant itself was before the High Court, we are of the opinion that interest of justice shall be met if a sum of Rs 30,000/- is directed to be paid to the respondent.. .[83]

In Des Bandhu, the facts disclosed that the services of the workman were terminated after more than one year of working, i.e., from February 1988 to March 1989, where after he was not allowed to attend his duties. He filed a civil suit in 1990 seeking declaration that he continued in service. The civil court dismissed the suit and the appeal filed before the appellate court was also dismissed in 1997. Thereafter, he raised an industrial dispute. The labour court directed reinstatement with continuity of service and full back wages. Before the High Court, the employer contended that the workman was employed on a purely temporary basis and that he had worked for only 89 days and not 240 days as alleged. The High Court however affirmed the order of the labour court. In appeal, the Supreme Court took note of the fact that the delay of 8 years was due to the workman pursuing remedy in a civil court and, in the particular facts of the case, ordered compensation of Rs 60,000/- to be paid in full and final settlement of all claims and in lieu of reinstatement.[84] In Mahesh Chand, the facts briefly were: the workman was not engaged consistently but on part-time work intermittently on some days, that too, for 2 to 3 hours a day. No sanctioned post of safaiwala ever created in BSNL. There was no offer of appointment. The work that was being done by the workman was also being done sometimes by his wife and mother. Despite this position, the tribunal directed reinstatement of the workman, which was affirmed by both the tiers of High Court. In view of the above factual position, the Supreme Court set aside the award of the tribunal as well as the orders of the High Court.[85] In Ghazibad Development Authority, the Supreme Court took a similar view in a case falling within the ambit of s 6N of the UP Industrial Disputes Act, in which the Court directed that compensation be paid in lieu of reinstatement.[86] On the question of granting the relief of reinstatement with full back wages, DK Jain J (for self and Thakker J), in Rajasthan Lalit Kala Academy, observed:

> Once the termination of service of an employee is held to be illegal, the relief of reinstatement is ordinarily available to the employee. But the relief of reinstatement with full back-wages need not be granted automatically in every case where the Labour Court/Industrial Tribunal records the finding that the termination of services of a workman was in violation of the provisions of the Act. For this purpose, several factors, like the manner and method of selection; nature of appointment - ad hoc, daily-wage, temporary or permanent etc., period for which the workman had worked and the delay in raising industrial dispute, are required to be taken into consideration.[87]

Relief of reinstatement or of compensation in respect of daily wagers is not automatic and, having regard to distinction between daily wagers and permanent employees and the length of their service, compensation in lieu of reinstatement would meet ends of justice.[88] Part-time workers do answer to the definition of 'workman' within the meaning of s 2(s) and they are entitled to the benefit of continuous service under s 25B and the protection of s 25F.[89] In Ramesh Kumar, the Supreme Court held that the finding of fact recorded by the labour court, that the workman had put in 240 days service and hence his termination without complying with the provisions of s 25F was illegal, cannot be interfered with by the High Court while exercising its writ jurisdiction, and further held that termination of his service without notice or compensation was illegal.[90] In Kuldeep Singh, Where the retrenchment of workman was found to be in contravention of provisions of S. 25F and all throughout the workman was making representations against his termination to concerned authorities, the denial of relief to him on ground that reference was made by the Government belatedly, was improper. On this view of the matter, the Supreme Court directed that the workman be reinstated with consequential service benefits but without back wages. The Court supportively cited the decisions rendered in Nedungadi Bank,[91] Sapan Kumar Pandit,[92] SM Nilajkar (supra) on the question of condoning the delay.[93]

Where the retrenchment of the workman was found to be in contravention of s 25 and the labour court directed reinstatement, the Supreme Court held that the order of the High Court setting aside the said award, on the ground that the workman was engaged only on contract basis repeatedly, and that his initial engagement was contrary to law and that it would not be in public interest to approve award of reinstatement after long lapse of time, could not be sustained. The court further observed that the worker could not be blamed for any delay in the disposal of the case by the labour court or of the writ petition by the High Court.[94] In a case where the labour court ordered reinstatement of a daily wager with 30% back wages on the ground that the employer did not comply with s 25F, Sandhawalia J of Punjab and Haryana High Court held that, even where the provisions of s 25F are not complied with while terminating the services of a 'daily wager', who had worked for 240 days or more, reinstatement would not be automatic and compensation, in lieu of reinstatement, would meet the ends of justice. On this view of the matter, the learned judge enhanced the compensation to Rs. 75000/-.[95] In Vipin Kumar, the facts disclosed that an employee who was working as a 'teacher' had, consequent upon the termination of his service, raised and industrial dispute claiming that he was employed as a 'working journalist' and that the employer had terminated his services in contravention of s 25F. The labour court declined the reference on the ground that he was working as a 'teacher' in a Model School and that the provisions of the ID Act were not applicable to his case. The employee challenged the order of the labour court. The Punjab & Haryana High Court upheld the order of the labour court and observed that the principal avocation of the petitioner was 'teacher' and not a 'working journalist' and that he was only collecting news to the Tribune Trust, and that the order of the labour court could not be found fault with.[96]

(iv) Succession to the Right of Compensation

If the workman dies during the period of unemployment subsequent to the termination of his service, the amount of his wages from the date of the termination of his service to the date of his death becomes a vested right of the workman and it will devolve on his heirs-at-law though the right to reinstatement would not survive. However, this would not be a case of retrenchment compensation. In Shambu Nath Mukherjee, the workman died during the pendency of the litigation before the Supreme Court. Therefore, without going into the technicalities of the legal maze, the Supreme Court itself ordered that since the workman could not be reinstated, the compensation in lieu of reinstatement should be paid to his widow.[97]

(v) Retrenchment Compensation under Section 25F and Gratuity

In Indian Hume Pipe, the Supreme Court pointed out that gratuity is to help workmen after their retirement, whatever cause the retirement may be due to, while retrenchment compensation is intended to give relief for sudden and unexpected termination of employment by giving partial protection to the retrenched workman and his family to enable them to tide over hard period of unemployment. There is nothing in law to prevent a workman from getting the double benefit, one under a gratuity scheme and the other as compensation for retrenchment. But now payment of gratuity has become a statutory liability of the employers under the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972.[1] In Parrys(supra), a single Judge of Calcutta High Court held that for calculating the retrenchment compensation at the rate of 15 days' wages, it is not necessary to divide monthly wages by 26, and the amendment to s 4(2) of the Payment of Gratuity Act 1972 has no application to the Industrial Disputes Act. This decision is right. In Guru Jhambheswar University, the Supreme Court took note of amendment to s 4(2) of the Payment of Gratuity of Act 1972 vis-à-vis s 2(aaa) of ID Act, which remained constant throughout. The Court, while reversing the decision of Punjab and Haryana High Court, observed:

> The language used in Section 2(aaa) is absolutely plain and clear and there is not the slightest ambiguity in the same. It is well settled principle that the words of a Statute are first understood in their natural, ordinary or popular sense and phrases and sentences are construed according to their grammatical meaning, unless that leads to some absurdity or there is something in the context or in the object of the statute to suggest to the contrary. The true way is to take the words as the legislature have given them, and to take the meaning which the words given naturally imply, unless where the construction of those words is, either by the preamble or by the context of the words in question, controlled or altered. As is often said the golden rule is that the words of a statute must prima facie be given their ordinary meaning and natural and ordinary meaning of the words should not be departed from unless it can be shown that the legal context in which the words are used requires a different meaning.. .. There is another important feature which deserves notice. Subsequent to the decision of this Court in Jeevanlal (supra),[2] an explanation has been added after second proviso to Section 4(2) of the Payment of Gratuity Act, by Act No. 22 of 1987, which reads as under:-
> "Explanation:—In the case of a monthly rated employee, the fifteen days' wages shall be calculated by dividing the monthly rate of wages last drawn by him by twenty-six and multiplying the quotient by fifteen."
> By adding the explanation, the legislature has brought the statute in line with the principle laid down in the case of Jeevanlal(supra) and has given statutory recognition to the principle evolved, viz. that in case of monthly rated employee the fifteen days' wages shall be calculated by dividing the monthly rate of wages by twenty six and multiplying the quotient by fifteen.

But, no such amendment has been made in the Industrial Disputes Act.If the legislature wanted that for the purposes of Section 25F(b) also the average pay had to be determined by dividing the monthly wages by twenty-six, a similar amendment could have been made. But the legislature has chosen not to do so. This is an additional reason for holding that the principle of "twenty-six working days" is not to be applied for determining the retrenchment compensation under Section 25F(b) of the Act.. .. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the view taken by the Labour Court is clearly erroneous in law and has to be set aside. The High Court did not go into the question at all and summarily dismissed the writ petition by a one line order observing that the compensation offered to the workman was short of the amount actually due.[3] (Paras 9, 14 & 15) (Italics supplied).

(vi) Authorities under State Acts cannot Award Compensation under s 25F

In a case governed by the provisions of Central Provinces and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act 1947, the services of some workmen were terminated for which no compensation had been paid in accordance with the provisions of s 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act. On an application being made to the state industrial court under s 41 of that Act, the industrial court awarded compensation under s 25F. Quashing the award of the industrial court, the Bombay High Court held that the state industrial court could not grant any relief whatsoever under the Central Act, since its jurisdiction was invoked under s 41 of State Act and the powers of the industrial court were continued to doing such things as were permitted by the provisions of that Act and awarding retrenchment compensation under s 25F of the Industrial Disputes Act was not one of such things.[4]

(vii) Clause (c): Notice to the Appropriate Government

(a) Notice not a Pre-condition

In Hospital Mazdoor Sabha (supra), the Supreme Court made an obiter observation that cll (a) and (c) of s 25F prescribed similar condition, i.e., all are mandatory preconditions. In a later case, i.e., Tea Districts Labour Assn, the point was not argued as it was conceded that the requirement as to notice prescribed by s 25F(c) was mandatory and was a condition precedent to the action of retrenchment.[5] In Subong Tea Estate, again the Supreme Court in an obiter said that the three conditions prescribed by cll (a), (b) and (c) of s 25F appeared prima facie to constitute conditions precedent, before an industrial workman could be validly retrenched.[6] In Bombay Union of Journalists, the court observed, that 'cl (c) cannot be held to be a condition precedent even though it has been included under s 25F along with cll (a) and (b) which prescribe conditions precedent'. It was further pointed out that unlike cll (a) and (b), 'cl (c) is not intended to protect the interests of workmen as such and it is only intended to give intimation to the appropriate Government about the retrenchment, and that only helps the Government to keep itself informed about the conditions of employment in different industries within its region'. It was, therefore, held that cl (c) did not constitute a condition precedent, which had to be fulfilled before retrenchment can be validly effected. Non-compliance with the condition laid down in cl (c), i.e. serving a notice on the appropriate Government, before the retrenchment, would not, therefore, invalidate the retrenchment.[7]

(viii) Section 25F does not Confer Right of Retrenchment on the Employer

The language of s 25F is couched in negative form, i.e., no workman, as indicated in the opening part of the section, shall be retrenched by his employer until the conditions enumerated therein are complied with. It is clear that the section does not give any positive or unregulated right of retrenchment to the employer. There is express provision in the section that on compliance with the three conditions referred to in the section, the employer shall have an unrestricted right to retrenchment of the workman.[8]In other words, the right of the employer to retrench the economic dead weight of surplus age of labour is inherent in his right to manage his business subject of course to the conditions prescribed by ss 25F and 25N. However, in the absence of any special conditions of service, the rights of the workman are to be governed by the provisions of the Act under which the only right of the employer to terminate the services of the workmen is by retrenchment after complying with the requirements of ss 25F and 25N of the Act.[9]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

[10][S. 25FF. Compensation to workmen in case of transfer of undertakings.—

Where the ownership or management of an undertaking is transferred, whether by agreement or by operation of law, from the employer in relation to that undertaking to a new employer, every workman who has been in continuous service for not less than one year in that undertaking immediately before such transfer shall be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of Section 25-F, as if the workman had been retrenched:

Provided that nothing in this section shall apply to a workman in any case where there has been a change of employers by reason of the transfer, if—

(a) the service of the workman has not been interrupted by such transfer;

(b) the terms and conditions of service applicable to the workman after such transfer are not in any way less favourable to the workman than those applicable to him immediately before the transfer; and

(c) the new employer is, under the terms of such transfer or otherwise, legally liable to pay to the workman, in the event of his retrenchment, compensation on the basis that his service has been continuous and has been interrupted by the transfer].

LEGISLATION

The original ch VA as inserted by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1953, did not contain s 25FF. The Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1957 inserted s 25FF. This section was enacted as it was not clear from s 25F whether the transfer, reconstitution and amalgamation of companies would be a ground for a claim for retrenchment compensation even if the service of the workman is continued without interruption and the terms and conditions of his service remain unaltered. This section, therefore, was substituted by present s 25FF along with s 25FFF by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1957. This amendment was necessitated by the Supreme Court's decision in the case of Hariprasad.[11] In Barsi Light Rly, it was held that no retrenchment compensation under s 25F was payable, on the construction of the term 'retrenchment' in s 2(oo) to 'workmen whose services were terminated by an employer on a real and bona fide closure of business or when the termination of service occurred as a result of transfer of ownership...would be payable to workmen whose services are terminated on account of transfer or closure of an undertaking'. However, in the case of transfer of an undertaking, if the workman is re-employed on terms and conditions which are not less favourable to him, he will not be entitled to compensation. Though, the amendment brings about a radical change in law in respect of closure of a business, with respect to transfer of ownership, at the best the law as it existed prior to the amendment has been classified and there is no radical change in this respect.[12] By virtue of s 25F, this section has been expressly made applicable to all undertakings whether they fell within ch VA or ch VB. This is the only section which deals with compensation to all workmen in case of transfer of undertakings in the entire Act. The legislature, therefore, has taken care to make this section applicable to the undertakings governed by ch VB as well. This section contains a fiction for a limited purpose and it refers to s 25F of the Act expressly. In Hariprasad, the court maintained a distinction between the termination of employment arising on transfer of undertaking and closure of undertaking. By enacting ch VB, the legislature has not wiped out that distinction. The fact that two different sections are kept in the statute book simultaneously, one dealing with transfer and the other with closure, goes to show that transfer and closure are not one and the same.[13]

PRE-CONDITIONS FOR ENTITLEMENT OF COMPENSATION ON TRANSFER OF UNDERTAKING

This section entitles a workman to notice or wages in lieu of notice and compensation in case of transfer of the ownership or management of an undertaking from one employer to another.[14] The compensation payable under this provision is determinable in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, 'as if the workmen had been retrenched'. However, before a workman is entitled to compensation under this section, the following conditions must be cumulatively satisfied:

(i) There should be a transfer of ownership of management of the undertaking from one employer to another by agreement, or operation of law;

(ii) the undertaking should be an industry within the meaning of s 2(j) ;

(iii) the workman claiming compensation should be a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) ; and

(iv) the workman should have put in minimum one year of continuous service within the meaning of s 25B immediately before the transfer of the ownership or management of the undertaking.

PROVISO: AVOIDANCE OF NOTICE AND COMPENSATION

The scheme of the proviso emphasizes the policy that if the three conditions specified in it are satisfied, there is no termination of service either in fact or in law, and so, there is no scope for payment of any compensation.[15] In other words, unless the transfer falls under the proviso, the employees of the transferred concern are entitled to claim compensation against the transferor and they cannot make any claim for re-employment against the transferee of the undertaking. The effect of s 25FF, as it at present stands, is that if an industrial undertaking is transferred, the employees of such transferred undertaking should be entitled to compensation; unless, of course, the continuity of their service or employment is not disturbed and that can happen if the transfer satisfies the three conditions of the proviso. The three conditions laid down in the proviso must cumulatively exist in which case the provisions of s 25FF will not apply, i.e., the employer will not be liable to give notice and compensation on transfer of the ownership or management of the undertaking. Thus, each one of the conditions laid down in the proviso is to be satisfied before it can be held that the right conferred by the principal clause does not accrue to the workman.[16] These conditions are:

(i) the service of the workman has not been interrupted by such transfer;

(ii) the terms and conditions of service applicable to the workman after such transfer are not in any way less favourable to him than those applicable to him immediately before the transfer;[17] and

(iii) the new employer is, under the terms of such transfer or otherwise, legally liable to pay to the workman, in the event of his retrenchment, compensation on the basis that his service has been continuous and has not been interrupted by the transfer.[18]

The application of the requirements of the proviso is illustrated in the decision of the Supreme Court in RC Sharma, where it was held that on transfer of an undertaking from one employer to another, the workmen will be entitled only to such benefits to which they were entitled at the time of the transfer of the undertaking and not to the benefits to which the other employees of the previous employer become entitled in the subsequent years.[19] A claim under cl (b) of the proviso can arise only if terms or conditions of employment are varied to the prejudice of the workman on his re-employment by the transferee undertaking.[20] The Kerala High Court in Thomas Paul, held that if the termination of the services of a workman on the eve of transfer by the transferor, is mala fide or an act of victimisation, the termination will be illegal and inoperative. The workman will be deemed to have continued in service and will be entitled to claim continuity of service with the transferor employer and shall be entitled to claim all the rights and benefits of employment in his service after the transfer.[21]

TRANSFER OF OWNERSHIP OF MANAGEMENT

The first and foremost condition, for the application of s 25FF, is that the ownership or management of the undertaking is transferred from the employer in relation to that undertaking to a new employer.[22] The transfer may be effected by agreement or by operation of law. The section provides that in all cases which do not fall under the proviso to the section, on a transfer of ownership or management of an industrial undertaking, every workman who has been in continuous service for not less than one year in that undertaking immediately before such transfer, shall be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, as if the workman had been retrenched. In other words, cases of transfer not covered by the proviso to the section attract the provisions of s 25F and that proceeds on the basis that the transfer in question brings about retrenchment of the employees to which the section applies. It is on the basis of this fiction that the employees of a transferred undertaking become entitled to compensation and notice.[23] The reference to s 25F in s 25FF is, however, only for the limited purpose of calculating the compensation payable to workmen under this section. The only claim that the workmen of a transferred establishment can legitimately make is a claim for compensation against their employers. No claim can be made against the transferee of the undertaking when the workmen have received retrenchment compensation from their quondum employer, they cannot claim re-employment from the transferee.[24] Some aspects of the practical application of the provisions of this section have been illustrated in the undernoted cases.[25]

Before s 25FF comes into operation, the ownership or management of an undertaking should have been transferred. The provisions of this section will, however, apply only to a case of bona fide and genuine transfer. They will not at all be attracted to a fictitious or benami transfer.[26] Normally this would mean that the ownership or management of the entire undertaking should be transferred. If an undertaking conducts one business, it would normally be difficult to imagine that its ownership or management can be partially transferred to invoke application of s 25FF. A business conducted by an industrial undertaking would ordinarily be an integrated business and though it may consist of different branches or departments, they would generally be inter-related to each other so as to constitute one whole business. In such a case, s 25FF would not apply if a transfer is made in regard to a department or a branch of the business run by the undertaking and the workmen would be entitled to contend that such a partial transfer is outside the scope of s 25FF. However, the fact that one undertaking runs several industries or businesses which are distinct and separate, would not necessarily exclude the application of s 25FF solely on the ground that all the businesses or industries which are run by the said undertaking have not been transferred. The distinct and separate businesses would normally be run on the basis that they are distinct and separate; employees would be separately employed in respect of all the said businesses and their terms and conditions of service may vary according to the character of the business in question. The organisation of the business will indicate clearly the distinctive and separate character of different businesses. In such a case, the transfer by the undertaking of one of its businesses may attract the application of s 25 FF.[27]

In Mettur Beardsell, a company entered into partnership with two of its own divisions and the employees working in such divisions. Later on, the company retired from partnership. Even after retirement of the company from partnership, it paid salaries to the employees on account and in the acquittance slip of the company. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that the consent of the employees for transfer was not necessary for entering into partnership because in law there would be no transfer of the workers to the transferee concerned and the relationship of master and servant between the company and the workmen did not cease and there was no severance of the said relationship. But when the company withdrew from the firm, the consent of the employees was essential as transfer of the workmen from one company to the firm could not have been effected except with the consent of the workers, express or implied. The fact that even subsequent to the withdrawal of the company from the firm, the workers were paid for some time by the company would show that the so called transfer was only a myth and not a fact and reality.[28]The change of constitution of a partnership firm or its dissolution to convert it into a sole proprietorship would not attract the provisions of s 25FF of the Act.[29] In transfer of an undertaking, there should be the identity of business, i.e. the same business which was carried on by the transferor must be carried on by the transferee.[30] On the implications of s 25FF for the transferor and the transferee as well as the workmen, in Mettur Beardsell, Pasayat J (for self and Chatterjee J) rightly observed:

> .. . the first and foremost condition for the application of Section 25-FF is that the ownership or management of an undertaking is transferred from the employer in relation to that undertaking to a new employer. What the section contemplates is that either the ownership or the management of an undertaking should be transferred; normally this would mean that the ownership or the management of the entire undertaking should be transferred before Section 25FF comes into operation. If an undertaking conducts one business, it would normally be difficult to imagine that its ownership or management can be partially transferred to invoke the application of Section 25-FF. A business conducted by an industries undertaking would ordinarily be an integrated business and though it may consist of different branches or departments they would generally be interrelated with each other so as to constitute one whole business. In such a case, Section 25-FF would not apply if a transfer is made in regard to a department or branch of the business run by the undertaking and the workmen would be entitled to contend that such a partial transfer is outside the scope of Section 25-FF of the Act.. .. It may be that one undertaking may run several industries or businesses which are distinct and separate. In such a case, the transfer of one distinct and separate business may involve the application of Section 25-FF. The fact that one undertaking runs these businesses could not necessarily exclude the application of Section 25-FF solely on the ground that all the businesses or industries run by the said undertaking have not been transferred. It would be clear that in all cases of this character the distinct and separate businesses would normally be run on the basis that they are distinct and separate, employees would be separately employed in respect of all the said businesses and their terms and conditions of service may vary according to the character of the business in question. In such a case it would not be usual to have one muster-roll for all the employees and the organization of employment would indicate clearly the distinctive and separate character of the different businesses. If that be so, then the transfer by the undertaking of one of its businesses may attract the application of Section 25-FF of the Act.[31] (Paras 17 &

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION

This section has been enacted to safeguard the rights of workmen who would not be employed by the new concern, and would be regarded as retrenched workers and will be entitled to compensation in the manner provided for, and it is immaterial whether the compensation is to be paid by the transferor or transferee.[32] This section declares the rights of the workmen of an undertaking which is transferred. The right is to receive compensation, as if the workmen are retrenched under s 25F and is available only against the owners of the undertaking, that is to say, the transferor of the undertaking. The liability of the transferor to pay compensation does not arise only when (i) there has been a change of employers by reason of the transfer and (ii) the three sub cll (a), (b) and (c) of the proviso of that section come into play. Each one of the three conditions in cll (a), (b) and (c) is to be satisfied before it can be held that the right conferred by the principal clause does not accrue to the workmen.[33] The language of the principal clause makes it clear that if the right of retrenchment compensation accrues to the workmen under it, it must be a right to receive that compensation from the previous employer who was the owner on the date of the transfer. This clause lays down that every workman mentioned therein shall be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, as if the workman had been retrenched. It is the previous employer who is liable to give the notice in accordance with the provisions of s 25F of the Act and the claim for compensation under s 25FF too accrues to the workmen against the previous employer under whom they were employed until the date of transfer.[34]

The first part of the section postulates that on transfer of the ownership or management of an undertaking, the employment of workmen engaged by that undertaking comes to an end, and it provides for the payment of compensation to the said workmen because of the termination of their services, provided, of course, they satisfy the test of the length of the service prescribed by the section. This part further provides the manner in which and the extent to which the compensation has to be paid. Workmen, therefore, shall be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, 'as if they had been retrenched'. The last clause clearly brings out the position that the termination of the services of the employees does not in law amount to retrenchment. The words 'as if he had been retrenched mark out the legal distinction between retrenchment defined in s 2(oo) and termination of service consequent upon transfer with which it deals. In other words, the section provides that though termination of service on transfer may not be retrenchment, by fiction of law, the workmen concerned are entitled to compensation as if the said termination was retrenchment.[35] A claim to compensation under this section arises on transfer of the undertaking. Every workman, who has been in the previous employer's service for not less than one year immediately before the transfer, is entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, 'as if he had been retrenched'. This provision of law presumes that on transfer, retrenchment takes place, unless the conditions mentioned in the proviso are satisfied. For this reason, s 25FF, uses the phrase as if the workman had been retrenched'. In order to entertain a claim for compensation under s 25FF, it is not necessary that the employer must terminate the services of the workmen.[36] It is enough that the transfer has taken place. Unlike s 25F, s 25FF does not contain any conditions precedent and transfer can validly take place without notice or payment of a month's wages in lieu thereof or payment of compensation. The words 'in accordance with the provisions of s 25F ' in s 25FF are used only for quantifying the compensation in case of transfer of an undertaking and are not used for laying down any time within which the employer must pay the compensation.[37]

In Akhil Bharatiya Koyla Kamgar Union, the Supreme Court held that the obligation of employer as contemplated under s 25H is not affected by s 9 of the Coal Mines (Nationalisation) Act 1973; that the employees were not a liability as yet in our country so as to fall within the ambit of s 9 ; and that, upon the transfer of business, the rights and obligations of old management continue vis-à-vis the new management.[38]Section 25FF merely safeguards the interest of workmen in the event of a transfer of the undertaking in which they were employed. The only grievance of the petitioner was that the Section did not require the consent of the workmen for the transfer. The petitioners' prayer to declare the s 25FF as unconstitutional for a non-existent clause therein is meaningless. The consequential relief could not, therefore, be granted.[39] In New Horizon, the facts were: the assets of New Horizon Sugar Mills were seized and sold by auction under the provisions of the Securitisation of Reconstruction of Financial Assets and Enforcement of Security Interest Act 2002 (SARFA ESI Act 2002) by Indian Bank, a secured creditor. EID Parry was the auction purchaser of the assets. A single judge of Madras High Court held that the workmen of the New Horizon will be entitled to the benefits under s 25FF as against the employer - New Horizon and EID Parry. In appeal, the Supreme Court following the ratio of Anakapalle CAIS (supra) held that the liability to pay the sums due to the employees rests with Indian Bank and the New Horizon Sugar Mills, and not with EID Parry.[40]

In Texmaco, the dispute fell within the twilight zone of ID Act and Payment of Gratuity Act. The facts of the case were: the respondent workman was working in Oriental Machinery and Civil Construction Ltd. (for short OMCC), which declared a lockout due to certain labour unrest and was thereafter closed in January 1979. Admittedly, no compensation was paid to the workmen by the OMCC at the time of closure in terms of s 25FFF. Subsequently, at the instance of the Government of West Bengal, negotiations took place and Texmaco took over OMCC. A tripartite agreement was executed by and between Texmaco, OMCC and the workmen of OMCC represented by Oriental Electric & Engineering Company Workers Union before the conciliation officer. The agreement provided for fresh employment of the permanent employees of OMCC, who were on its rolls as on the date of closure, in the services of Texmaco. As regard the liability of payment of gratuity to the concerned workmen it was agreed that such liability till the date of closure notice would be taken over by the Texmaco, the amount in relation whereto, however, would be payable to the concerned workmen as and when they reach the age of superannuation together with the amount of gratuity which would become due and payable by it for their fresh employment. A deed of transfer of the said undertaking was executed by the parties on 01 September 1983 although the possession thereof, as indicated hereinbefore, had been handed over in March, 1983. The respondent-employee retired on 03 January 1989. The company paid his gratuity dues for his services with the OMCC from February 11, up to the date of closure as also for the period of his service with the petitioner from 03 January 1989. The respondent No. 3 being not satisfied, filed an application before the Controlling Authority in terms of the provision of the said Act praying therein that he may be held to be in continuous service and, thus, is entitled to the gratuity for the entire period of his service. The said application was allowed by the Controlling Authority. Quashing the orders of Appellate and Controlling Authorities, Sinha J (for self and PK Ray J) of the Calcutta High Court observed:

> It may be true that no amount of compensation had been paid to the concerned workman by the erstwhile employer before declaring closure of its unit as is required under the proviso appended to section 25-FFF. Such non-compliance of the provision of the Act would make the erstwhile employer liable and not the petitioner. For the purpose of interpretation of the provision of the said Act all the provisions thereof must be read in their entirety.. .. By reason of the aforementioned settlement the third respondent agreed to become re-employed. Such re-employment was also not automatic. The very fact that the third respondent had to be re-employed upon fulfilling the criteria as contained in the settlement, the relationship of employer and employee between him and his erstwhile employer ceased to have any effect. The terms and conditions of his employment under the petitioner thus continued afresh.. . For the purpose of this case, we would assume that the closure of the Industrial Undertaking was illegal. However, as noticed hereinbefore, even if an Industrial Dispute was raised the same could have been resolved by reason of a settlement. Such settlement having been arrived at and the same being binding on all the workmen, the question of the matter being. reopened and the instance of the controlling authority does not arise.. .. Even in a case of this nature the controlling authority would have no jurisdiction to arrive at a conclusion that the settlement is illegal. The findings of the authority under the said Act have a wide repercussions. It may be true that the said Act contains a non-obstante clause but so does Industrial Disputes Act.[41] (Paras 20, 26, 28 & 29)

In Karnataka State CM Federation, the facts disclosed that Federation closed one of its ginning units employing less than 100 workmen and paid compensation as required under s 25FFA read with s 25FFF of the Act. The workmen filed a petition under s 33C(2) claiming certain sums, which were allowed by the labour court, which amounts were sought to be recovered as arrears of land revenue. Quashing the orders of the labour court, a single judge of Karnataka High Court held that (i) s 33C would be applicable if only there is a breach of the provisions of ch VA or VB, and (ii) the right claimed by a workman is a pre-existing right, and not one whose very existence is in dispute; and that, in view of the fact that neither of the two circumstances exist in this case, the labour court under s 33C was not competent to entertain the application. The court further observed that the dispute raised in the case could only be resolved before the Registrar of Cooperative Societies, who was the competent authority.[42]

SECTION 25FF DOES NOT VIOLATE ART 14 OF THE CONSTITUTION

A single judge of the Punjab and Haryana High Court, dealing with the question whether s 25FF violates Art 14 of the Constitution on the ground that in case of voluntary transfer of ownership or management of an undertaking by an agreement, it is open to the parties to the contract, to stipulate in respect of the employees of the undertaking transferred but no such right has been allowed to the parties when the transfer of the undertaking is by the operation of law; held that there is no discrimination. Moreover, the two modes of transfer—one by mutual agreement, the other by operation of law-cannot be equated with each other. In spite of that, s 25FF makes the same provision with regard to the payment of retrenchment compensation to the workmen in both cases. There is, thus, no question of discrimination or denial of equality before law as guaranteed by Art 14 of the Constitution. The section, therefore, is a perfectly valid piece of legislation.[43]

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Before insertion of this section, a workman of the predecessor had no right to claim re-employment by the successor-in-business except in exceptional circumstances. Even where available, that claim was not a matter of absolute right but was one of discretion, to be judicially exercised, having regard to all the circumstances. An industrial tribunal, while investigating such a claim, had to carefully consider all the aspects of the matter. It had to examine whether the refusal to give re-employment was capricious and industrially unjustified on the part of the successor-in-business or whether he could show cause for such refusal on reasonable and bona fide grounds such as want of work, inability of the applicant to carry out the available work efficiently, late receipt of the application for re-employment in view of the prior commitments or any other cause which in the opinion of the tribunal made it unreasonable to force the successor-in-interest to give re-employment to all or any of the employees of the old concern. After the insertion of this section, the discretion given to the adjudicatory authorities is no longer generally available. However, in a case where one or both of the parties are state instrumentality, having obligations under the Constitution, the writ court has a right of judicial review over all aspects of transfer of the undertaking. It is open to the court in such a situation to give appropriate directions to ensure that no injustice results from the change-over. In Gurmail Singh (supra), the parties to the transfer were a state on the one hand and fully owned state corporation on the other. In this situation, the Supreme Court examined the terms and conditions of the transfer and gave appropriate directions to meet the ends of the justice and directed the state Government and the corporation to carry out its directions and it also gave liberty to the corporation to amend its rules and regulations, if necessary, to give effect to the same.

In Goodacre, the Madras High Court held that where the transfer of an undertaking was bona fide and the statutory provisions under s 25FF had been complied with, the workmen of transferor-company could have no claim except the right to compensation.[44] In Karnataka Power, the facts were: During the pendency of an industrial dispute relating to the non-employment of 65 workmen, the company was taken over by the State Electricity Board. Neither the transferor-company nor the transferee-Board allowed the workmen to join duty, when they reported for work pursuant to an award passed by the tribunal directing their reinstatement. The Supreme Court held that the State Electricity Board being the successor-in-interest was bound to reinstate the workmen. The provisions of s 25FF cannot be read to mean that the existing employees of transferor-company are under a compulsion to accept transfer to a new employer.[45] Even upon the transfer of ownership of an undertaking from one owner to another, the existing employees cannot be compelled to accept employment with the new employer; and that in the event of a transfer of the undertaking, the employees would be entitled to retrenchment compensation as stipulated in ss 25FF read with s 25F.[46] In E Hill and Co, the facts were: A workman, who was transferred from Khamariah to another unit at Bisunderpur, challenged the said transfer which dispute was referred to the labour court. The workman, however, joined duty at Bisunderpur. Thereafter, the said unit at Bisunderpur was closed and he was paid compensation in accordance with the provisions of ch VA of the Industrial Disputes Act, which he accepted. In the meantime, the labour court passed an award holding that the transfer was invalid, which was upheld by the High Court. In special leave, a three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court quashed the order of High Court as also the award of labour court, and held that the fact that the workman has joined at Bisunderpur rendered his earlier challenge of the transfer infructuous, because by his subsequent conduct he accepted the transfer and also accepted the terminal benefits paid on the closure of the unit at Bisunderpur.[47]

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

[48][S. 25FFA. Sixty days' notice to be given of intention to close down any undertaking.—

(1) An employer who intends to close down an undertaking shall serve, at least sixty days before the date on which the intended closure is to become effective, a notice, in the prescribed manner, on the appropriate Government stating clearly the reasons for the intended closure of the undertaking:

Provided that nothing in this section shall apply to—

(a) an undertaking in which—

(i) less than fifty workmen are employed, or

(ii) less than fifty workmen were employed on an average per working day in the preceding twelve months,

(b) an undertaking set up for the construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, dams or for other construction work or project.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), the appropriate Government may, if it is satisfied that owing to such exceptional circumstances as accident in the undertaking or death of the employer or the like it is necessary so to do, by order, direct that provisions of sub-section (1) shall not apply in relation to such undertaking for such period as may be specified in the Order].

OBJECT OF THE SECTION

Normally every businessman would like to continue to run his business. The right to carry on business has been guaranteed to every citizen by art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution as a fundamental right. But when faced with stark situations such as recurring losses, financial difficulties caused by financial drains and stains from various sources, i.e., non-availability of essential raw materials, stringency of laws, unsatisfactory state of industrial relations making it difficult to sustain production etc., it may become imperative for the employer to close down the business. The closure of industrial undertakings naturally entails loss of production and unemployment of large number of workmen. This problem became acute in the state of West Bengal. Consequently, a President's Act-The Industrial Disputes (West Bengal) Amendment Act 1971—was enacted on the 28 August 1971, providing that an employer who intended to close down an undertaking should serve at least 60 day's notice on the state Government stating clearly the reasons for the intended closure of the undertaking. Since the problem of closure is not peculiar to the state of West Bengal alone, but was found in varying degrees in other states as well, the Central Government considered it desirable to promote a Central legislation on the subject. The matter was, therefore, referred to the Indian labour conference which generally indorsed the proposal for Central legislation after consideration of the question in its meeting on 22 and 23 October 1971.

SUB-SECTION (1): NOTICE OF CLOSURE

(i) Requirements of Notice

This provision requires an employer who intends to close down an undertaking to serve a notice on the appropriate Government. 'the notice should comply with the following requirements: (a) It should be in the prescribed manner; (b) It should state clearly the reasons for the intended closure; and (c) it should be served on the appropriate Government at least 60 days before the date on which the intended closure is to become effective. In Walford Transport, the Calcutta High Court held that the object of s 25FFA requiring the employer to give 60 days' notice, to the Government, of his intention to close down his undertaking is to prevent sudden closure and to give an opportunity to the Government to consider whether it should take any measure in respect of such intended closure in accordance with the provisions of the Act such as making a reference.[49]

(ii) Closure

The connotation of the expression 'closure' and its various aspects have been discussed under s 25FFF(1), caption 'closure'.

(iii) Effect of the Section

The right to close an undertaking is implicit in the fundamental right of an employer to carry on his business guaranteed by Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.[50] However, the question arises whether the failure of the employer to comply with these requirements makes the closure illegal or non est? The answer appears to be in the negative because from the language of the section, no prohibition of the closure is discernible. If law does not prohibit closure, the closure does not become illegal. A single judge of the Bombay High Court in Maharashtra GK Union, has taken the view that a closure effected without complying with the requirements with s 25FFA is illegal and invalid. The learned judge has based this view on the fact that there is a penalty provided in s 30A which is a pointer to the closure being rendered invalid and illegal by non-compliance of this section.[51] A similar view had been taken by the Gujarat High Court in DS Vasavada.[52]Both the decisions rendered by Bombay and Gujarat High Courts are wrong and do not reflect the true import of the provision. Sub-s (1) is somewhat analogous to the provisions in cl (c) of s 25F, which also requires the employer to serve a notice, in the prescribed manner on the appropriate Government or such authority as may be specified by the appropriate Government by notification in the official gazette, before retrenching any workman employed in any industry carried on by him. The breach of this provision also entails the penalty of imprisonment for a term extending upto six months or fine extending upto Rs 1,000 or both under s 31(1) of the Act. In Bombay Union of Journalists, the Supreme Court held that cl (c) of s 25F is not a condition precedent to valid retrenchment though its breach no doubt would be a serious matter.[53]

(iv) Constitutional Validity of the Section

As far as Art 19(1)(g) is concerned, it is not available to corporate bodies as they are not citizens within the meaning of this article. This article is available to non-corporate bodies, partnership firms or individual employers.[54] The constitutional validity of this provision vis-a-vis non-corporate bodies, partnership firms or individual firms against Art 19(1)(g) is a highly debatable question and is not free from doubt. Even in case of corporate bodies, their shareholders and directors can invoke the breach of their right under Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.[55] However, in view of the risks involved, the restriction does not appear to be reasonable. Likewise, the provision also appears to be arbitrary. In cases of partial closure, the arbitrariness is more pronounced as there are no guidelines for deciding as to what is an 'undertaking' and who is to decide it?

(v) Proviso

The proviso exempts the following types of undertakings from the application of the requirements envisaged by sub-s (1):

(1) an undertaking in which:

  (a) less than 50 workmen are employed, or

  (b) less than 50 workmen were employed on an average per working day in the preceding 12 months; and

(2) an undertaking set up for the construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, dams or for other construction work or project.

SUB-SECTION (2): POWER TO EXEMPT

This sub-section begins with the non obstante clause. It empowers the appropriate Government, notwithstanding anything contained in sub-s (1), to direct that the provisions of that sub-section shall not apply in relation to any particular undertaking. The Government may also specify the period of time in the order for which the undertaking will remain exempt. However, before making an order, the appropriate Government has to be satisfied that it is necessary to exempt the undertaking from the application of the requirement of notice owing to some exceptional circumstances, such as, accident in the undertaking or death of the employer or the like. The words 'or the like' refer to 'exceptional circumstances' and have to be construed ejusdem generis with such other circumstances. Though the order of the appropriate Government under this provision appears to be of administrative nature, it has to be made by the Government after applying its mind to the relevant material before it and bona fide.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

[56][S. 25FFF. Compensation to workmen in case of closing down of undertakings.—

(1) Where an undertaking is closed down for any reason whatsoever, every workman who has been in continuous service for not less than one year in that undertaking immediately before such closure shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (2), be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of Section 25F, as if the workman had been retrenched:

Provided that where the undertaking is closed down on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer, the compensation to be paid to the workman under clause (b) of Section 25F shall not exceed his average pay for three months.

[57][Explanation.—An undertaking which is closed down by reason merely of—

(i) financial difficulties (including financial losses); or

(ii) accumulation of undisposed of stocks; or

(iii) the expiry of the period of the lease or licence granted to it; or

(iv) in a case where the undertaking is engaged in mining operations, exhaustion of the minerals in the area in which such operations are carried on,

shall not be deemed to be closed down on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer within the meaning of the proviso to this sub-section].

58[(1A) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), where an undertaking engaged in mining operations is closed down by reason merely of exhaustion of the minerals in the area in which such operations are carried on, no workman referred to in that sub-section shall be entitled to any notice or compensation in accordance with the provisions of Section 25F, if—

(a) the employer provides the workman with alternative employment with effect from the date of closure at the same remuneration as he was entitled to receive, and on the same terms and conditions of service as were applicable to him, immediately before the closure;

(b) the service of the workman has not been interrupted by such alternative employment; and

(c) the employer is, under the terms of such alternative employment or otherwise, legally liable to pay to the workman, in the event of his retrenchment, compensation on the basis that his service has been continuous and has not been interrupted by such alternative employment.]

59[(1B) For the purposes of sub-sections (1) and (1-A), the expressions “minerals” and “mining operations” shall have the meanings respectively assigned to them in clauses (a) and (b) of Section 3 of the Mines and Minerals (Regulation and Development) Act, 1957 (67 of 1957).]

(2) Where any undertaking set-up for the construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, dams or other construction work is closed down on account of the completion of the work within two years from the date on which the undertaking had been set-up, no workman employed therein shall be entitled to any compensation under clause (b) of Section 25F, but if the construction work is not so completed within two years, he shall be entitled to notice and compensation under that section for every [60][completed year of continuous service], or any part thereof in excess of six months.

OBJECT

The objects of s 25FFF are:

(a) to provide for involuntary unemployment in case of closure of an undertaking;

(b) to create a sense of security in a worker to a reasonable extent that in case he sticks to his work he will not be thrown out when his employment is terminated either when the industry continues to run or when it is closed down for any reason including one due to transfer of business to a new employer or due to its closure on the ground of expediency; and

(c) to raise the position and status of labour and to standardise its rights in relation to industry.

SUB-SECTION (1): COMPENSATION ON CLOSURE OF AN UNDERTAKING

(i) Closure

Closure of an undertaking entails termination of employment of many employees and throws them into the ranks of unemployed. It is with the object of redressing the misery resulting from the unemployment and in the interest of general public that the legislature has made provision for payment of compensation etc., to the workmen discharged from service at the time of closure of an establishment, by this provision. The loss of service due to closure stands on the same footing as loss of service due to retrenchment for in both cases the employee is thrown out of employment suddenly and for no fault of his and the hardships, which he has to face are, whether unemployment is the result of retrenchment or closure of business, the same. [61]

According to Webster's Third New International Dictionary, 'closure' means 'bringing of some activity to a stop'. Now the term 'closure' has been defined by the Amending Act 46 of 1982 inserting cl (cc) in s 2 to mean 'the permanent closing down of a place of employment or a part thereof'. This has given legislative recognition to the judicial dicta holding that closure may be treated as stoppage of whole or part of the activity or business of an employer.[62] It is not necessary that the entire business of the undertaking should be closed down. The employer is free to close a part of the business. The closure of a distinct venture, though part of the business of a complex, is legal and permissible. In other words, partial closure must be of such a part of the undertaking as is distinct and independent.[63] The question has indeed to be decided on the facts of each case.[64]The distinction between lockout and closure is to be borne in mind because generally the unions plead that the purported closure is nothing but a lockout. Lockout as defined in s 2(1) of the Act, is a 'temporary closing down of a place of employment or the suspension of the work or the refusal by an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him'. Such closure of the place of employment is a temporary phase as a measure of collective bargaining resorted to by an employer for pressurising the workmen to come to terms. In contra-distinction to a lockout, in a closure the employer not only merely closes down the place of employment, but closes down his business finally and irrevocably.[65]

Such closure is not a measure of collective bargaining, but is conditioned by business exigencies. The employer may close down an undertaking bona fide in such eventualities as suffering continuous loss, no possibility of revival of business and inability for various other reasons to continue the industrial activity. There may be closure for any of these reasons, though these reasons are not exhaustive, and are merely illustrative. The word 'permanent' qualifying the words 'closing down of a place of employment or a part thereof, used in the definition of closure make explicit what was implicit in the expression 'closure' as interpreted by the courts as used in this section. The expressions such as 'permanently', 'finally' or' 'irrevocably' are not to be understood to mean that the closure is perpetual, i.e., the business can under no circumstances be revived till eternity. The word 'permanently' only means that at the time of the closure, the employer had unequivocal intention to permanently and irrevocably close down the business. But it does not mean that the business once closed can never be restarted or reopened. There may be circumstances in which it may be possible to restart or reopen the business subsequently by the same or a successor employer. Therefore, closure may be once for all or may even be a temporary phase. In the language of Desai J:

> To say that closure must always be permanent and irrevocable is to ignore the causes which may have necessitated closure. Change of circumstances may encourage an employer to revive industrial activity which was really intended to be closed. [66]

The only thing that is relevant, in this connection, is that closure of business whether entire or partial must be real and genuine, that is to say, it should be a closure in fact, and it should not be a ploy adopted for carrying on the same business in a different manner.[67] A sham or a mere pretense of closure will not constitute closure in the eye of law.[68] The closure or stoppage of the whole or a part of the business is the function of the management which is entirely in the discretion of the employer carrying on the business. It is not open to industrial adjudication to interfere with the discretion exercised by the employer in such a matter.[69] The carrying on of business is a right and not an obligation. It is, therefore, as much the right of the businessman to close down the business as to carry it on.[70] The industrial adjudication cannot interfere with the discretion exercised by the employer in such a matter. It has no power to direct an employer to continue the whole or part of the business which the employer has decided to shut down. Nor can it direct an employer to reopen the business which he has once closed down.[71] Where the Government decided to wind up the Corporation, the services of the entire staff of the corporation stand terminated under s 25FFF. A skeleton staff in the capacity of caretaker staff was supposed to be retained and their services may be utilised till a liquidator takes over the control of the affairs. In such a situation, where a new arrangement is made for the purpose of utility, convenience and suitability, the question of seniority and juniority would not arise. It is for the Board of Directors to see which particular official will be helpful in the given circumstances.[72]

Once an industry is down, and it is either admitted or found that the closure is real and bona fide in the sense that it is a closure in fact,[73] any dispute arising with reference thereto would fall outside the purview of the Act and that will, therefore, be so, if a dispute arises-if such can be conceived-after the closure of the business between the quondam employer and the employees,[74] as the definition of an 'industrial dispute' presupposes the continued existence of the industry.[75] The question whether there was a 'closure' of an undertaking or not is a mixed question of law and fact. The finding of a tribunal on the question is not reviewable unless it can be shown that the finding is perverse.[76] To determine whether the closure was a device or a pretense to terminate the services of the workmen or whether it is bona fide and far beyond the control of the employer, has to be determined on the evidence produced before the tribunal. The duration of the closure may not be a significant fact to determine the intention and bona fides of the employer at the time of the closure though it may not be decisive of the matter. The correct approach ought to be that when it is claimed that the employer has closed down the industrial activity, the tribunal must keep in view all the relevant circumstances prevailing at the time of the closure to decide and determine whether the closure was bona fide one or was a mere device or pretense, to terminate the services of the workmen. The answer to this question would enable the tribunal to come to the conclusion one way or the other.[77] Shifting of marketing division of an undertaking from a place in one state to a place in another state pursuant to a policy decision of the Government and consequent mass transfer of employees from the previous place to the new place would not constitute closure, particularly when the service conditions provided for transfer while protecting the seniority and service conditions of the employees.[78] The scope of industrial adjudication of the disputes relating to closure of an industrial undertaking has been discussed by the Supreme Court in a number of cases. Pipraich Sugar Mills, may be taken as the convenient starting point in which the court observed that where the business has been closed and it is either admitted or found that the closure is real and bona fide, any dispute arising with reference thereto would fall outside the purview of the Industrial Disputes Act.[79]

In Banaras Ice Factory, the court held that, if there is no real closure but a mere pretense of a closure or it is mala fide, there is no closure in the eye of law and the workmen can raise an industrial dispute.[80] In Express Newspapers, it was observed that if the action taken by the employer is a closure, bona fide and genuine, the dispute raised in respect of such a closure will not be an industrial dispute at all.[81] The use of the expression 'bona fide' in these cases does not appear to refer 'to the motive behind the closure but to the fact of the closure'.[82] In Andhra Prabha, in connection with the motive of closing down an undertaking, speaking for the court, Mitter J pointed out that there might be more than one motive working in the mind of the employer leading him to closure of his establishment and it was not for the industrial tribunal to examine that question meticulously and decide on the bona fides of the motive.[83] In Indian Hume Pipe, the company closed its factory at Barakar for the reason that most of the area occupied by and around the factory had been declared as unsuitable and dangerous for habitation, as a result of subsiding of earth in the area. The tribunal took the view that the decision to close down the factory was in retaliation of a strike notice given by the union over the question of bonus. In appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was not open to the tribunal to go into the question as to the motive of the company in closing down its factory and to inquire whether it was bona fide or mala fide with some oblique purpose, namely, to punish the workmen for union activities. On a review of the earlier dicta, the court reiterated that:

> .. . once the tribunal finds that an employer has closed his factory, as a matter of fact, it is not concerned to go into the question as to the motive which guided him and to come to a conclusion that because of the previous history of the dispute between the > employer and the employees the closure was not justified. Such a closure cannot give rise to an industrial dispute.[84]

In Kalinga Tubes, reiterating this principle, Grover J held:

> ...the entire set of circumstances and facts have to be taken into account while endeavouring to find out if, in fact, there has been a closure and the tribunal or the court is not confined to any particular fact or set of facts or circumstances. In one case the management may decide to close down an undertaking because of financial or purely business reasons. In another case, it may decide in favour of closure when faced with a situation in which it is considered either dangerous or hazardous from the point of view of the safety of the administrative staff or members of the management or even the employees themselves to carry on the business. The essence of the matter, therefore, is the factum of closure by whatever reasons motivated.[85]

In this case, consequent upon a gherao of its administrative office, by the workmen, the company closed down the factory. The question of genuineness of closure was referred to an industrial tribunal for adjudication. Before the tribunal, the main controversy centered round the question, whether there was a closure of its undertaking by the company or whether there was a refusal to employ the workmen which would fall within the ambit of the expression 'lockout'. The tribunal inter alia, held that the closure of the factory was a direct consequence of the alleged illegal activities of the workmen and of the refusal by the officers and supervisory staff to carry on their normal work and not due to shortage of raw materials, fuel or power. Therefore, it concluded that it was a case of, lockout' and was not a 'closure'. In appeal, after noticing the relevant evidence, the Supreme Court found that the approach of the tribunal was erroneous and suffered from a number of infirmities and held that the company, in fact, has closed down the factory; In Sur Iron and Steel, as a sequel to the refusal of the striking workmen to report for work and assault on willing workers, the company closed its manufacturing business. The tribunal found that the closure was real and bona fide as the factory, in fact, had been closed down and the closure was also for reasons beyond the control of the management. In appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the findings of the tribunal as it was clear that the company was not carrying on any manufacturing business at all after its closure and that the closure was bona fide and that the closure was not a cloak for a lockout or for carrying on the business under some other disguise. With respect to the findings of the tribunal holding that the closure was for reasons beyond the control of the company, the court held that, on the face of it, closure was forced upon the company by the workmen.[86] The Bombay High Court in Imambhai, held that the mere closure of an undertaking by itself would not result in automatic termination of service of all its employees. It can be terminated by a notice of termination by recourse to appropriate procedure for collective or individual retrenchment. A similar view has been taken by the Gujarat High Court in DS Vasavada.[87] In this case, the court pertinently pointed out that:

> Closure of an undertaking for any reason and which only amounts to the employer drawing the shutters need not necessarily result in the termination of the services of the workman...It is only when closure in accordance with the enactment is effected that there would be termination of service.[88]

In Hindustan Lever, single judge of the Bombay High Court held that mere discontinuance of manufacturing of one of the products of the undertaking, would not amount to closure of part of the undertaking. The provisions of s 25FFF or s 25O will apply only when the closure brings about retrenchment of workmen.[89]

(ii) Undertaking

The word 'undertaking' as used in this section has not been defined in the Act. This expression occurs in ss 25FF, 25FFA, and 25FFF, 25O and 25R. However, s 25F uses the word 'industry' while s 25G uses the word 'industrial establishment'. Since these two sections are cognate, the word 'industrial establishment' as used in s 25G has to be understood to mean the 'industry' as used in s 25F. Industry has been defined in s 2(j) of the Act, which inter alia, includes an undertaking. Thus undertaking is a narrower concept than industry. In other words, industry is a whole of which an undertaking is a part. The expression 'undertaking' as used in the definition of 'industry' was given a restricted meaning in Banglore Water Supply.[90] Thus, reading down the expression in the context of s 25FFF, it must mean a 'separate and distinct business or commercial or trading of industrial activity.' In Hindustan Steel, the court pointed out that the word 'undertaking' as used in s 25FFF appears to have been used in its ordinary sense connoting thereby 'any work, enterprise, project or business undertaking'. It is not intended to cover the entire industry or business of the employer.[91] Closure or stoppage of a part of the business or activity of the employer would seem, in law, to be covered by this sub-section. The question is, however, to be decided on the facts of each case. But the expression 'undertaking' cannot comprehend an infinitesimally small part of a manufacturing process.[92]

(iii) Closure by Stages

In Straw Board, the Supreme Court had to consider the question whether an employer is entitled to close down an establishment by stages? In this case the decision to dose down the unit was taken in the month of March 1967. The union of the workmen was informed about it even earlier. The Government of Uttar Pradesh was also informed subsequent to the decision. Various other authorities of the Government were also informed. Finally, on 5 April 1967, notice of closure of the factory was published stating that the first batch of 99 workmen would be discharged from service on 7 May 1967. Notices of termination of services were also served on those workmen individually on the same day. The remaining workmen were discharged from service between 7 May and 28 July 1967. As the process of closure had been spread over a period of time, the workmen took the stand that there was no closure on 7 May 1967, because the mill had been functioning till 28 July 1967, and therefore, the first batch of workmen must be treated to have been retrenched on 7 May 1967 and should be paid compensation, as on retrenchment under the UP Act. The court discountenanced this plea and observed that the timing of termination of the services of the first batch which was about three months earlier is not at all relevant in the context of the case which is one of closure of an individual unit. Speaking for the court, Goswami J enunciated the principles in the following words:

> It may not always be possible to immediately shut down a mill or concern even though a decision to close the same may at any rate at the time have irrevocably been taken. There is, therefore, nothing wrong in the employer arranging closure of S Mill in such a way as to guard against unnecessary inconvenience to both the management as well as to the labour and against possible avoidable wastage or loss to the concern, say, for not being able to complete some processes which have ultimately to be finished. Having decided to close down a unit on account of non-availability of raw materials the supply of which had stopped, it was necessary to go on with the unused stock of raw materials for some time for which a lesser number of workers would be necessary who would then naturally constitute the next batch or batches to go. We do not see anything wrong in law in electing such a step or mode in finally closing a unit or a concern. It may be in the nature of a business to take recourse to such a mode which cannot ordinarily and per se be considered as unfair or illegitimate. [93]

Commencement of liquidation proceedings of a company would not be tantamount to closure of an establishment run by it. Closure must relate to the establishment not to the liquidation of the company managing the establishment.[94]

(iv) Employer's Right to Close down his Business

In Hathising, the Supreme Court held that it is as much a fundamental right of an employer to close down his business as to carry on the business. It is a matter within the discretion of an employer to organise and arrange his business in any manner he considers best including the closure of such business.[1] In case of an actual closure, the termination of services of workmen has to be accepted as inevitable, however, unfortunate.[2] No employer can be compelled to carry on his business if he chooses to close it down, in truth and reality, for reasons of his own.[3] It is because of this, that s 25FFF has been inserted in the Act. This section lays down certain obligations on the employer to be fulfilled on closure of the business. These obligations are not even pre-conditions to the closure.[4] The right of an employer to close down his business cannot be questioned. The only requirement of law is that he should comply with the requirements of s 25FFF(1). The tribunal, therefore, cannot decide the question as to whether an employer can close down the business temporarily or for an indefinite period or permanently.[5]

(v) Adjudication

The disputes relating to 'retrenchment of workmen and closure of establishment' have been included in the third schedule to the Act in item no 10 and can be referred for adjudication to an industrial tribunal. This item does not say that all questions arising of the retrenchment of workmen and closure of establishment have to be decided by an industrial tribunal. This entry refers to cases where the right to retrenchment of workmen or to close an establishment is disputed. In such cases, the tribunal will be competent to decide whether the closure or retrenchment was justified and whether the retrenched workmen should be reinstated or the workers in the establishment purported to have been closed, should be continued to be paid on the basis that the so called closure was no closure at all. However, this item does not cover disputes relating to compensation on retrenchment or closure.[6] A dispute may arise with respect to the nature of the closure. What the employer may claim to be closure genuine and bona fide, the workman may contest and say that it is not a real or genuine closure or it is a pretense or sham of a closure or in fact it is not a closure at all and at the worst it is a lockout. Once it is found that the closure, in fact, has taken place, the jurisdiction of the tribunal comes to an end and it cannot go into the questions of motive behind the closure.[7] The essence of the matter is, the factum of closure as such which must be established.[8] The matter may be different if under the guise of closure, the establishment is being carried on in some other form or at a different place and the closure is only a ruse or pretense.[9] Similarly, if in fact and in substance, the closure of the business is a lockout and the business has been voluntarily closed for the purpose of disguising that lockout. Also, if a dispute is raised in respect of the closure, it would be an industrial dispute and the tribunal will be competent to deal with it.[10] Thus, though the bona fides or otherwise of the closure or the necessity for the closure and the question whether the closure was necessitated by financial, economic or other considerations, could not be gone into and could not be put up as an issue or as an industrial dispute, the question whether there, in fact was a closure, or it amounted to lockout could be put as an issue or an industrial dispute. If the tribunal finds that there was no factual closure, it would amount to lockout giving rise to an industrial dispute which could be referred to the tribunal.[11] However, if there is no dispute at all, that there was in fact a closure or that the management purported to close the business as a cloak or disguise for what in fact and in substance was a lockout, the tribunal will have no jurisdiction to adjudicate.[12] The distinction between the concepts of closure and lockout though clear in theory, in actual practice, is not always easy to decide. In the words of Desai J:

> True test is that when it is claimed that the employer has resorted to closure of industrial activity, the industrial court in order to determine whether the employer is guilty of unfair labour practice, must ascertain on evidence produced before it whether the closure was a device or pretense to terminate services of workmen or whether it is bona fide and for reasons beyond the control of the employer. The duration of the closure may be a significant fact to determine the intention and bona fides of the employer at the time of closure but is not decisive of the matter...Therefore, the correct approach ought to be that when it is claimed that the employer is not guilty of imposing a lockout but has closed the industrial activity, the industrial court before which the action of the employer is questioned must keeping in view all the relevant circumstances at the time of closure decide and determine whether the closure was a bona fide one or was a device or a pretense to determine the services of the workmen.[13]

In dealing with this question, industrial adjudication has to take into account several relevant factors and these factors may be proved before the industrial tribunal either by oral evidence or by documentary evidence or by evidence of conduct and circumstance. Whenever serious doubts arise in regard: to closure which the employees allege is a lockout, the tribunal may have to make a long and elaborate inquiry and the ultimate decision would depend on a careful examination of the whole of the relevant evidence. The question as to whether there is closure of business or not is a question of fact. If a case of closure is pleaded the genuineness of which is challenged, this has got to be decided as a jurisdictional fact, because the jurisdiction of the tribunal to adjudicate the point of reference will depend upon the decision of this jurisdictional fact. In other words, the finding, which the tribunal may record on this preliminary or jurisdictional issue, will decide whether it has jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the dispute or not. If the finding is that the action of the employer amounts to a closure there would be an end of the proceedings before the tribunal so far as the main dispute is concerned. If, on the other hand the finding is that the purported closure is not a closure, in fact, but is a mere sham or pretense of closure or 'amounts to a lockout which has been disguised as closure, then the tribunal will be entitled to deal with the reference'. It is only when the jurisdictional fact is found against the employer that the industrial tribunal will have jurisdiction to deal with the merits of dispute.[14] On the finding, the tribunal may record on the preliminary issue, it may decide whether it has jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the dispute or not. If such a case has not been made out by the employer, the tribunal is under no obligation to decide this as a preliminary issue.

Illustrations

Where the tribunal found that the factory of the employer had been closed down finally and irrevocably and it was not a mere closure of place of business, it had no jurisdiction to go into the question whether the closure could have been avoided nor had it jurisdiction to suggest the ground for rationalising the company by taking into consideration the financial position of the company.[15] Where the management notified that its directors had decided to close down its mills in view of unsatisfactory financial position, difficulty in procuring cotton at reasonable prices and the possible risk involved in storing cotton, and the mills were closed down and a dispute arose about the closure but after a period of about two months the directors decided to reopen the mills, in view of the representations received from the workmen, who had been thrown out of employment, it was held that from the past history of disputes between the management and the union it would not be possible to draw the conclusion that the closure was not bona fide.[16] A company, on account of failure in business and consequent losses, decided to close down some of its agency offices. It was held that when it was found that the business at the two agency branches was actually wound up and discontinued, the finding of mala fide regarding such closure could not justify the conclusion that the business of agencies should be deemed to continue in the eye of law and that the closure in fact was not a pretense.[17] Where the tribunal found as a fact on the basis of the whole evidence that the closure was only in name, the business having been restarted with new hands with a few old ones; it was not a real and genuine closure and it was held not to be a closure at all, though it did masquerade as such for the time being.[18]

Where the closure was not pleaded, but the case of the management was only that there was no lockout, it was held that it was very much different from saying that it was a case of closure. It may be a case of lockout, it may not be a case of lockout, that was a matter which was to be decided by the tribunal, but it was impossible to hold that it was a case of closure which was not pleaded by the employer himself.[19] In case of closure of one establishment or undertaking of the employer, the workmen have the only right to compensation under this section and they cannot claim any right for re-employment or reinstatement in any other establishment or undertaking of the employer.[20] In G Govinda Rajulu, the Supreme Court directed that the employees of the Andhra Pradesh State Construction Corpn. Ltd whose services were sought to be terminated on account of the closure of the corporation shall be continued in service on the same terms and conditions either in a Government department or in the corporation.[21] This is rather an unusual order particularly so, as it does not disclose any reasons for the direction. However, since there are no reasons, the order cannot be a precedent. Presumably, the order has been made on the main consideration that the employer is a state Government undertaking. This was noticed by another Bench of the court in Dandakaranya, where speaking for the court, Patnaik J observed:

> But in the aforesaid case neither has there been any discussion on any question of law nor any circumstances have been indicated under which the direction was given. This being the position, the aforesaid decision cannot be of universal application in all cases where there has been a closure of the project which resulted in termination of the services of the employees.[22]

In this case in view of the admitted position that the project had been completely wound up since 1990, the nominal muster roll workers were liable to be retrenched. In the circumstances of the case, the court, held that no other relief could be given to the workmen except the compensation under s 25FFF of the Act due to them on the closure of the project. In TI Diamond Chain, the facts disclosed that the company owned two factories, which had independent existence, separate E.S.I codes, separate employees' unions, separate agreements, no inter-transferability of employees between the two entities, and manufacturing different products, it was held that there was no functional integrality between the two units. On this view of the matter, a single judge as well as the Division Bench of Madras High Court, quashed the order of the labour court directing reinstatement of the workmen, who were affected by the closure of one of the two units.[23] In District Redcross Society, the facts were: The respondent-employee was appointed as a staff nurse in the Society, Karnal in 1992 and she continuously worked on the said post till her services were terminated on 30 September 1998, due to the closing down of the Red Cross Maternity Hospital, but the management had not followed the procedure laid down in ss 25F to 25H, which was a clear violation of the statutory provisions. The management had also not Disputes Act as well as 'first come last go', and thereby contravened s 25G. No retrenchment compensation was paid to her at the time of termination of her services. The alleged closing down of the Maternity Hospital was only a paper transaction as the outpatient department was still functioning and the patients were being given treatment by the doctors as well as other staff. Tubectomy operations were still being conducted in the Hospital. It was accordingly prayed that an award may be passed directing the appellant to reinstate her in service with continuity of service and full back wages. The Tribunal held that the termination of service was illegal and contrary to law and directed her reinstatement with continuity of service and full back wages. Similar awards were given in the three other adjudication cases and orders for reinstatement with continuity of service and full back wages were passed in favour of the concerned employees (respondents herein).The High Court too dismissed the writ petitions filed by the society. Allowing the appeal filed by the Society, Mathur J (for self and Balasubramanian J) held:

> .. . if the entire establishment of the employer is not closed down but only a unit or undertaking is closed down which has no functional integrity with other units or undertaking, the provisions of Section 25FFF of the Act will get attracted and the workmen are only entitled to compensation as provided in Section 25FFF of the Act which has to be calculated in accordance with Section 25F of the Act. The Tribunal and also the High Court clearly erred in holding that as other units of the appellant Red Cross Society like Drug De-Addiction-cum-Rehabilitation Centre, Family Planning Centre and Viklang Kendra were functioning, the termination of services of the respondent would amount to retrenchment. The Maternity Hospital was functioning as a distinct entity. It was not receiving any grant from the Government and was being run entirely on charitable basis from donations received from public. Due to financial stringency, the Maternity Hospital had to be closed down. The other three units, viz., Drug De-Addiction-cum-Rehabilitation Centre, Family Planning Centre and Viklang Kendra are receiving grants from Government and are functioning as separate entities and the mere fact that they have not been closed down, cannot lead to the inference that the termination of services of the respondent was by way of retrenchment which was illegal on account of non-compliance of the provisions of Section 25F of the Act. (para 9). .. In view of the findings recorded above, the respondent would be entitled to compensation only in accordance with Section 25FFF of the Act and the award for reinstatement in service with back wages passed by the Tribunal which was affirmed by the High Court cannot be sustained and must be set aside. (para 10.. . The cases of other three respondents are exactly identical to that of Babita Arora as they were all working in the Maternity Hospital. Therefore, the awards passed by the Tribunal directing their reinstatement in service and back wages have to be set aside.[24] (para 11)

In Hondaram Ramachandra, the facts briefly were: the appellant-company had a sales office in Mumbai, which was closed and the company transferred the employees to work in its factory at Goregaon. An application for payment of wages was filed against the appellant before the Prescribed Authority. The said application was dismissed, inter alia, on the premise that the respondents had refused to join their duties at the transferred place. A domestic enquiry was purported to have been held in April, 1984 on the premise that the respondents had neither reported for duties at Goregaon nor at Mumbai. The services of the respondents were terminated in December, 1985. In January, 1986, the premises in which the sales office was being run was admittedly handed over to another Company. The labour court in its award held that the termination was proper and legal and that the workmen were not entitled to any relief, which was set aside by a single judge duly affirmed by the Division Bench. The Supreme Court held (in Para 12) that the relief available to the workman was compensation for closure in terms of s 25FFF and not the relief of reinstatement with back wages.[25]

(vi) Res Judicata

The basis on which the principle of res judicata rests is founded on consideration of public policy. It cannot be treated as irrelevant or inadmissible in industrial adjudication. In Bijay Cotton Mills, a textile mill was closed for nearly a year. Subsequently, the textile mill was reopened and then closed once again. The claim of the workmen for retrenchment compensation for the period of unemployment and for reinstatement as permanent workmen on reopening after the first closure was referred for adjudication. The industrial tribunal found that the first closure was bona fide and the concerned workmen were not entitled to any retrenchment compensation. The tribunal also negatived the claim of the workmen for being reinstated as permanent workmen on the reopening. The award became final and binding on the parties. After the second closure, again the claim for retrenchment compensation was referred for adjudication. The tribunal ignored the findings in the prior award and directed that the services of the concerned workmen even prior to the first closure would count for calculating compensation under s 25FFF. In a writ petition, the High Court of Rajasthan quashed the directions in the second award on the ground that the findings in the prior award would operate as res judicata.[26]

(vii) Quantum of Compensation on Closure

This section also like s 25FF introduces a fiction in providing that in case of closure of business, the workmen concerned are entitled to compensation as if the termination of their services was retrenchment even though, in fact or in law, it is not retrenchment. In other words, termination of the services of the workmen on closure is not 'retrenchment' in the sense in which that word has been used in s 25F of the Act, but in the circumstances in which s 25FFF is attracted, workmen are entitled both to notice or wages in lieu of notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, subject, of course, to the terms of the proviso to sub-s (1), limiting the amount of compensation.[27] A comparison of the language employed in s 25F and s 25FFF(1) would bring in bold relief the difference between the phraseology employed by the legislature and its impact on the resultant right of the workmen. Under s 25F, a workmen employed in an industrial undertaking cannot be retrenched by the employer until the payment is made as provided in cll (a) and (b). Section 25FFF(1) provides that the workman shall be entitled to notice and compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F, if the undertaking is closed for any reason.[28] In other words, the quantum of compensation under this provision is the same as payable on retrenchment under s 25F.[29] The use of the expression 'as if' in this provision shows almost conclusively that the meaning of 'retrenchment' is restrictive and does not in terms apply to the case of a bona fide closure of business,[30] as the legislature has not sought to place the closure of an undertaking on the same footing as retrenchment under s 25F of the Act.[31] In other words, by s 25F, a prohibition against retrenchment until the conditions prescribed by that section are fulfilled is imposed while by s 25FFF(1), termination of employment on closure of the undertaking and without payment of compensation and without either service of notice or payment of wages in lieu of the notice is not prohibited. Payment of compensation and payment of wages for the period of notice are not, therefore, conditions precedent to closure.[32] This provision has been enacted for the purpose of calculating compensation payable to such workmen rather than providing for payment of compensation over again. Section 25FFF makes reference to s 25F for that limited purpose. Therefore, the only claim which the employees of the closed concern can legitimately make is a claim for compensation against their employers.[33]The workmen will be entitled to get such relief as they may have the right to claim under s 25FFF of the Act.[34] In order to entitle a workman to claim compensation under this section, two conditions must exist, namely: (a) closure and (b) one year's continuous service by the concerned workmen. If these two conditions exist at the time of the closure, the workmen whose services are terminated on such closure, become entitled to notice or wages in lieu thereof as under s 25F(a) and compensation as under s 25F(b).

(viii) One Year's Continuous Service

The workmen claiming compensation under this section should have put in minimum one year of 'continuous service' on the date of the closure. In other words, in order that a workman may claim the benefit of this provision, he must establish that he has been in continuous service for not less than one year in the undertaking immediately before the closure.[35] It will have to be found out, whether he has been in continuous service for not less than one year from the date of his entry in service. It is not necessary for him to comply with any further condition of continuous service, in the year ending with the date of closure.[36] Acceding to s 25B, a workman who during the period of 12 calendar months has actually worked in an industry for not less than 240 days is to be deemed to have completed one year's service in the industry. Consequently, an inquiry has to be made to find out whether the workman has actually worked for not less than 240 days during the period of 12 calendar months immediately preceding the retrenchment. These provisions of law do not show that a workman after satisfying the test under s 25B has further to show that he has worked during all the period he has been in service of the employer for 240 days in the year.[37] However, a badli workman has no right to claim compensation on account of closure.[38]

(ix) Adjudication of Compensation on Closure

The legislature has not left the notice period and quantum of compensation in dispute. The proviso mitigates the burden of the employer in cases where the closure of the undertaking is 'on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer' and limits the compensation payable to the workmen to a maximum extent of their average pay for three months. The explanation to sub-s (1) sets out what shall not be deemed to be closure on 'account of circumstances beyond the control of the employer'. The explanation gives some indication of the anxiety of the legislature to expressly rule out certain contingencies which could have ordinarily been pleaded by the employer as unfavourable circumstances beyond his control. The questions whether the closure is on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer or is due to 'any reason whatsoever' are questions of fact. A single judge of the Punjab High Court[39] has taken the view that a dispute relating to compensation under s 25FFF(1) can be validly referred as the right in such a case accrues not after the closure of business but instantaneously with it. On the other hand, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the industrial tribunal which derives its power and jurisdiction from the Act, cannot deal with the question arising out of a closure including the question of payment of compensation for the termination of the services of workmen on a bona fide closure of business.[40] The Patna High Court went a step further and held that the reference made in regard to compensation payable as a result of closure itself is beyond the competence of the appropriate Government. A priori, the resultant award must be held as void.[41] In Straw Board, Goswami J observed:

> In the course of gradual development of the industrial law the legislature by engrafting a provision like s 25FFF in the Central Act, has sought to wipe out the deleterious distinction in the consequential effect on labour upon retrenchment and upon closure except that in the latter case a restricted compensation under very specified circumstances is provided for under the proviso to s 25FFF(1) itself. It is no longer open to employer to plead that there can be no industrial dispute with regard to the eligibility of workmen to compensation or to its quantum on closure of an establishment although the factum of a real and genuine or legitimate closure, admitted or proved, is outside the pale of industrial adjudication not partaking of or fulfilling the content of an industrial dispute within the meaning of section 2(k) of the Central Act. It is, however, not to be understood that the question, whether the closure is real or genuine or a mere sham or pretence of closure, cannot be referred to industrial adjudication. What is meant is that once it is admitted or proved that there is a real, genuine and legitimate closure, the dispute falls outside the pale of an 'industrial dispute' and cannot be validly adjudicated upon by industrial adjudication. The right of compensation upon closure under s 25FFF(1) unlike the retrenchment compensation under s 25F(1) is not a condition precedent to closure. This right accrues to the workman only upon the closure of the undertaking. No doubt that an industrial dispute which arose before the closure of the business can be validly referred to adjudication. Where the business has been closed, any dispute arising after such closure would fall outside the purview of the Act. A dispute arising after the closure—if one such can be conceived—a dispute between the quondam employer and the employees cannot partake the character of an industrial dispute and cannot be validly referred to adjudication.[42] The industry having died with the closure, any dispute relating to compensation upon closure, will fall outside the purview of the Act, and cannot become an industrial dispute within the meaning of s 2(k).[43]

The right of workmen for compensation upon closure of an undertaking arises out of statute, viz, s 25FFF. Therefore, even if the closure is in accordance with the provisions of the Standing Orders and due to circumstances beyond the control of the management, the employer cannot refuse to pay compensation for the closure.[44]Before the insertion of this provision in the Act, there was no such right. Nor is any such right available under the law of contract or in common law. In Straw Board, dealing with an appeal arising out of an award under the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act, the Supreme Court had to deal with the question whether the workmen were entitled to relief under s 25FFF of the ID Act, as there is no analogous provision in the Uttar Pradesh Act. Though the point was abandoned by the counsel, the court held that the workmen were entitled to compensation as envisaged by s 25FFF. Goswami J held:

> Since the Uttar Pradesh Act does not make any provision for compensation in the case of closure and the Central Act has applied the lacuna, there is no repugnancy between the Uttar Pradesh Act and the Central Act and the beneficent provisions of the latter Act can be availed by labour even in their absence in the Uttar Pradesh Act. The Central Act applies to the whole of India, including Uttar Pradesh. Even if there may be slightest doubt in the matter, section 25J of the Central Act advisedly leave no scope for controversy in the matter.[45]

This opinion appears to be perfunctory and incorrect. Firstly, the court has lost sight of the fact that the reference was under s 4K of the Uttar Pradesh Act and not under s 10(1) of the ID Act. A reference under s 10 of the ID Act can only be made under s 12 of the Uttar Pradesh Act not under s 4K. If the references had been under s 10(1) of the ID Act, the observations of the court would be correct. As the reference clearly was not under the ID Act, its provisions would not be applicable to this case. A tribunal created by the Utttar Pradesh Act, adjudicating upon a dispute referred to it under that Act could not extend its jurisdiction beyond the provisions of that Act. In other words, it could not award closure compensation as envisaged by s 25FFF of the ID Act. Secondly, s 25J of the ID Act could also not be taken cognizance of by the tribunal created by the Uttar Pradesh Act and, more so, by the Supreme Court. In Rohtas Industries, the Supreme Court observed that the stocks of a company were the product of the industry of the workers who had contributed their labour to their production and so as a result of their hard work the stocks were produced. Hence, the wages and emoluments of the workers would rank in priority to the claim of other creditors like financial institutions with respect to the stocks manufactured before the closure of the undertaking because the subsistence and living of the workmen was of paramount importance and had to rank higher in priority. In the circumstances of the case, the court held that it would be just and proper that the goods which were lying as stock should be sold and out of the sale proceeds the workers should be paid their dues upto the date of the closure.[46]

(x) Proviso: Compensation in Unavoidable Circumstances

In Hathising, speaking for the Supreme Court, Shah J held:

> When the closure of an undertaking is due to 'circumstances beyond the control of the employer, the maximum limit of compensation is average pay for three months, irrespective of the service of the workman; in the residuary clause, the liability is unrestricted.[47]

There is a marked contrast in the expression 'for any reason whatsoever' used in the main s 25FFF(I) and the words 'on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer' used in the proviso thereto. The measure of compensation payable when an undertaking is closed down for 'any reason whatsoever' is as provided in the main sub-section which refers to the provisions of s 25F(b) as if the workmen had been retrenched.[48] On the other hand, the quantum of compensation payable to workmen, in case of 'closure' on account of 'unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer', is limited to a maximum of his 'average pay for three months' as calculated under s 25F(b). In other words, where the closure is due to 'circumstances beyond the control of the employer', legislature has imposed a restriction on the liability of the employer. In order, therefore, to take advantage of the proviso, the employer has to establish that the undertaking was closed down for unavoidable circumstances beyond his control.[49] Average pay for three months is equivalent to 15 days' average pay for six years. By this limit prescribed in the proviso, a workman will be deemed to have put in a maximum number of six years' continuous service irrespective of any larger number of continuous years of service. In other words, a person who has put in even twenty years of continuous service, shall be entitled, on closure of the establishment for reasons 'beyond the control of the employer', to compensation only equivalent to his fifteen days' average pay for six years of continuous service, i.e., three months' average pay in toto. However, a person who has put in only six years or a lesser number of years of continuous service, will not be adversely affected by the proviso, as he will get compensation at the rate of fifteen days' average pay for all the years of continuous service put in by him. This works injustice to the workmen who have rendered longer service. In Kerala Cashew, it was held that the main part of sub-s (1) provides for notice and compensation in accordance with s 25F. The proviso in force majeure cases limits the compensation payable to workmen under cl (b) of s 25F to average pay of the three months. However, the proviso does not make reference to cll (a) and (c) of s 25F. Accordingly, there is no exclusion of the notice required to be given under those clauses. In other words, even in cases where an industry is closed for reasons beyond the control of the employer, the workmen are entitled to one month's notice or wages in lieu thereof in terms of cl (a) of s 25F, in addition to the compensation under cl (b) of s 25E.[50]

(a) 'Unavoidable Circumstances beyond the Control of the Employer'

The closure on account of vis majeure or acts of God or enemy action or an act of State in exercise of its power of eminent domain, would undoubtedly be on account of the circumstances beyond the control of the employer. On the other hand, circumstances cannot be called 'unavoidable', if the employer by acting in a business-like way, or as a prudent man of business, could avoid them. He is not expected to take a negative attitude. However, the employer is not called upon to make any unusual effort to avoid any circumstances necessitating the closure of his business. Circumstances are not to be considered avoidable, simply because the employer might have restored peace by acceding to each and every demand of the workmen. Nor is the employer called upon to take extraordinary measures or incur extraordinary expenses in order to run his business, say by employing an army to restore peace. Where an employer was faced with threat, intimidation, violent methods, like stabbing and bomb-throwing, it would be a circumstance beyond the control of the employer for closure of the business, even though the business was not running at a loss.[51] The acid test, therefore, appears to be that if there is the slightest possibility of a businessman exerting himself and prudently trying to tide over the difficulty which has arisen as a mushroom one and make every possible effort to see that his business is continued then avoidance of such a duty on the part of the businessman cannot be an equation of an unavoidable circumstance.[52] The legislative intent is to limit the scope of the expression 'unavoidable circumstances' to such cases where the closure is for reasons connected with the business. Circumstances, howsoever, unavoidable and uncontrollable, may not attract the proviso unless they are relevant and related to the functioning of the undertaking. If the closure was on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer, but those circumstances are not connected with the functioning of the undertaking although they are personal to him, such closure cannot be regarded as coming within the ambit of the proviso. For instance, an employer who is suffering from a serious disease such as tuberculosis is naturally not in a position to run his business. The cause of his personal difficulty is something beyond his control to prevent. Nevertheless, his disease is not a reason connected with the running of the business, but is only personal to him. Closure of undertaking in such circumstances shall not deny the workmen, their full compensation.[53]

Illustrations

Mere financial impossibility to carry on the business would not be a circumstance beyond the control of the employer and the closure will not fall within the proviso to section 25FFF(1) of the Act.[54] Likewise, the closure due to financial condition of the employer, non-availability of orders for supply of goods and noncooperation from workmen in standardisation of the working force and reduction of the high percentage of rejection, were held not to be unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[55] Where the closure was caused by the circumstances created by a gherao practised by the workmen, but there had been no incidents involving physical violence nor any incidents for any length of period preceding the gherao nor had there been any speech delivered by any of the representatives of the workmen threatening or inciting bodily injury, it was held that the closure of the undertaking was not due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[56] Upon passing of a preliminary decree for dissolution of partnership business, the closure of business ordered by the decree was held to be for unavoidable circumstances.[57]

Where a bank was closed down under a winding-up order of the High Court, it was held to be a closure on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer and the question that it was misconduct or mismanagement that brought about the winding-up was not held to be a relevant consideration.[58] A sudden slump in the world market of tea and the consequent financial difficulties of the tea estates resulting in closure of their tea gardens was held to be a cause 'beyond the control' of the employers.[59] Where a firm was closed because of inter se differences of its partners, it was not a case of closure on account of the circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[60] Where the tribunal on the basis of the evidence on record had found that the colliery was closed as a result of financial losses and not for reasons alleged by the management, viz, that the mine was nearly exhausted, by bad roofing and presence of gas, it was held that the management was not entitled to the benefit of the proviso.[61] Where the closure was forced on the company by the workmen resiling from a negotiated set dement and on account of their insistence to take back certain suspended workmen unconditionally and without even an apology which led to strike involving the use of force against the willing workmen, it was held that in the circumstances, the closure was for reasons beyond the control of employer and, as a matter of fact, it was within the control of the workmen themselves and primarily it were they who were responsible for the closure being the main agitators at all stages.[62]

Where a petrol pump was closed on account of termination of the agency it was held to be a case of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[63] The case where the closure was not merely on account of financial loss or accumulation of undisposed stocks but was because of inability of the company to produce standard products and in accordance with the requirements of law, the closure was held to be on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[64] Closure of a sugar factory on account of unavailability of sugarcane was held to be due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[65] Wherever complete lawlessness is prevailing in the undertaking over a course of years, it cannot be said that the circumstances were 'unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer'.[66] The closure of an undertaking as a result of the order of minding up at the instance of a creditor on account of inability to pay tax will be a closure due to financial strains and as such will not take away the right of the workman to claim full compensation under the section.[67]

(b) Burden of Proof

Once it is found that there is, in fact, a closure of the undertaking, the question of applicability of sub-s (1) of s 25FFF or the proviso thereto will automatically arise for consideration in determining the question of compensation. The requirements of the proviso, which limits the quantum of compensation under the conditions specified therein will have to be carefully considered in order to arrive at the conclusion whether the onus in that behalf to justify lesser amount of compensation has been discharged by the employer or not. The decision against the employer after considering all the aspects of the matter in relation to the said proviso read with the explanation will lead to the granting of higher compensation under this section by reason of the legal fiction contained therein for payment of compensation in accordance with s 25F of the Act.[68]

(xi) Explanation

The following causes are excluded from the purview of the expression 'unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer' used in the proviso:

(a) financial difficulties, including financial losses;

(b) accumulation of undisposed of stocks;

(c) the expiry of the period of the lease or the licence granted; or

(d) in a case where the undertaking is engaged in mining operations, exhaustion of the minerals in the area in which such operations are carried on.

The explanation gives some indication of the anxiety of the legislature to expressly rule out the above contingencies which would have ordinarily been pleaded by the employer as unavoidable circumstances beyond his control. The legislature apparently was very stringent and strict about the nature of the circumstances which would bring a closure, within the meaning of the proviso, though in normal working of the business of a commercial undertaking financial losses will go a long way in establishing that it has virtually become impossible to run the business. Likewise, accumulation of undisposed of stocks and the expiry of the period of the lease or the licence or the exhaustion of minerals in a mining undertaking would also be sufficient to establish that it has virtually become impossible to carry on the business. For instance, if a company is heading towards liquidation, its business will, in normal course, have to be closed down. Similarly, if the period of lease of the site on which a factory has been set up has expired and there is no provision for its renewal or extenuation, it would ordinarily present insurmountable difficulty in the way of working of an undertaking by the employer. Notwithstanding all this, the legislature has provided that, in spite of the aforesaid difficulties, impediments or bottlenecks, the conditions of the proviso would not be satisfied merely by the happening or existence of the circumstances embodied in the explanation. The reason for doing so seems to be that whenever such difficulties arise, the employer is not expected to sit idle and not to make an all-out effort like a prudent man of business in the matter of tiding over these difficulties for saving his business.[69] The explanation shuts out any investigation as to whether the closure was due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer, where the closure was due to reasons enumerated therein. In such cases, the court is bound to apply the deeming part of the explanation and to hold that the closure was not due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer and that the proviso had no application. The use of the word 'merely' in the explanation, makes it clear that, if the financial difficulties or accumulation of undisposed stocks was only one of the several contributory causes to the closure, the explanation may not apply. It is only when it can be said that the financial difficulties or accumulation of undisposed stocks was the sole cause of the closure that the explanation should be attracted.[70]

The closure of an undertaking, therefore, merely due to these contingencies is, by the explanation, excluded from the benefit of the restricted liability of the employer, but coupled with other circumstances, financial difficulties, accumulation of stock or expiry of lease or licence or exhaustion of mineral may justify the view that closure is due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer and attract the application of the proviso notwithstanding the explanation. It will be a wrong interpretation of the proviso to hold that where the closure is solely due to financial difficulties and those difficulties were brought about by several contributory causes, the deeming provisions of that explanation would not apply. Thus, where the undertaking is closed down on account of persistent losses due to no fault of the employer or accumulation of stocks having regard to the persistent unfavourable market conditions, the closure may normally be regarded due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer. By the explanation, the jurisdiction of the tribunal which may be called upon to ascertain whether in a given case, the closure was on account of circumstances, beyond the control of the employer and whether on that account the employer was entitled to the benefit of the proviso, may be restricted. However, it is not provided that in no case of financial difficulty or accumulation of stocks coupled with other circumstances, the closure is to be regarded as due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[71] It is only in cases where closure is merely on account of any of the reasons enumerated in the explanation that it is not to be deemed as due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer. For instance, where a company had to be wound-up due to adverse trade restrictions on imports and heavy losses, it was considered to be a closure due to unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[72] On the other hand, where a company had to be wound-up by a winding-up order under s 445(3) of the Companies Act 1956 owing to financial difficulties, it would not justify the inference that the undertaking was closed down on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer.[73]

(xii) Payment of Compensation under s 25FFF not a Condition Precedent

By the use of the words 'as if the workmen had been retrenched' in s 25FFF, the Legislature did not seek to place closure of an undertaking on the same footing as retrenchment under s 25F. Payment of compensation and payment of wages for the period of notice are not conditions precedent to closure.[74] What would be reasonable time for making the payment cannot be fixed rigidly, but in the given circumstances it is always easy to hold what is not reasonable. In other words, the reasonable period will depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.[75] A single judge of the Madras High Court has taken the view that since the payment of compensation on closure is not a condition precedent to closure, the parties can in the case of closure compensation, contract themselves out of the statute.[76]This view has been taken by taking into consideration the provisions of some analogous statutes where specific provision has been made that parties can contract themselves out of the statute. This view is not correct, as there is no such provision in this Act.

(xiii) Compensation Payable only to Workmen of Industry

The question of compensation payable on closure of an undertaking can only arise where such undertaking is an industry within the meaning of s 2(j). If the business or the undertaking is not an industry, compensation as contemplated by s 25FFF cannot be awarded to its employees.[77]

(xiv) Transfer and Closure

In order to decide whether s 25FF or s 25FFF will apply to a particular case, it has to be determined whether the transaction in question is transfer or closure. Section 25FF lays down the requirement of payment of compensation in case of transfer of an undertaking whereas s 25FFF prescribes the compensation in case of closure of an undertaking. There is a clear difference between transfer and closure. In case of closure, the business completely ceases to run. But in case of transfer of the undertaking, the business continues in the hands of the transferee, though it ceases in the hands of the transferor. It is the continuation of the business which distinguishes transfer from closure. In Anakapalle CAIS, it was held that the purchaser of a going concern is a successor-in-interest of the previous employer and he had no right to claim re-employment under the successor and the employees were entitled to retrenchment compensation from the transferor in accordance with s 25FF.[78] In Upper Ganges Valley, the licence of the Upper Ganges Valley Electricity Company expired and the State Electricity Board purchased the electrical undertaking under s 6 read with s 71 of the Indian Electricity Act 1910. Thereafter, the electricity supply business was run and managed by the state electricity board. It was held that the taking over of the company's undertaking did not entail any closure of the undertaking as the undertaking was never closed down. It continued in the hands of the board. The case, therefore, was not of closure but of transfer.[79] The MP High Court followed this decision and held:

> ...the power house at Katni which was previously run by the petitioner company has not closed down. It has been taken over by the Madhya Pradesh Electricity Board on the expiration of the petitioner's licence and is now being run by the board. Section 25FFF (1) and the proviso apply where an undertaking 'is closed down' and as in the instant case the undertaking has merely changed hands but is still running, it cannot be said that the case falls under s 25FFF(1) or the proviso.[80]

(xv) Gratuity and Compensation under Section 25FFF

Gratuity is a kind of retiral benefit, and is essentially different from the statutory compensation for termination of employment due to closure of an undertaking. The objects intended to be achieved by two types of benefits, i.e. gratuity and compensation for termination of services on closure under s 25FFF are also distinct.[81] Therefore, workmen will be entitled to compensation under s 25FFF on closure of business and also to the benefits of a gratuity scheme under an agreement or award.

(xvi) Constitutional Validity

The provisions of s 25FFF apply equally to all the industries which fall within a certain group and the classification made therein cannot be said to be unrelated to the object sought to be achieved by the enactment, hence it is not arbitrary. The requirement of reasonability has been followed in legislating this provision. There is no classification involved in the section which is either arbitrary or unreasonable. Hence, there is no violation of Art 14 of the Constitution.[82] It is, no doubt, the fundamental right of an employer to carry on or to close down his business, particularly when it yields no profit.[83] However, this fundamental right is subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of general public. Applying the test of reasonability laid down by the Supreme Court in several decisions,[84] the provision of s 25FFF is not violative of the fundamental right under Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution.[85] Nor does the section contravene the provisions of Art 20 by reason of its penalising the acts which when committed were not offences.[86] Thus, from any aspect, the provisions of s 25FFF are not unconstitutional.

SUB-SECTION (1A): COMPENSATION IN MINING UNDERTAKINGS

This provision has been engrafted in the Act by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1971 (Act 45 of 1971) and came into force wef 15 December 1971. It is in the nature of an exception to cl (iv) of the explanation to sub-s (1) which provides that where an undertaking is engaged in mining operations, the closure of the undertaking on account of exhaustion of the minerals in the area in which the operations are carried on, shall not be deemed to be closed on account of 'unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer' within the meaning of the proviso to that sub-section. Sub-section (1A) further provides that in such cases, a workman will not be entitled to the benefit of notice or compensation contemplated by sub-s (1) if:

(i) from the date of the closure, the employer provides the workman with an alternative employment at the same remuneration as he was entitled to receive, and on the same terms and conditions of service as were applicable to him, immediately before the closure;

(ii) there is no interruption of the service of the workman by such alternative employment, that is to say, the continuity of his service is maintained; and

(iii) the employer is, under the terms of such alternative employment or otherwise, legally liable to pay to the workman, in the event of his retrenchment, compensation on the basis that his service has been continuous and has not been interrupted by such alternative employment. These conditions are somewhat analogous to the conditions provided in the proviso to s 25FF.

SUB-SECTION (1B): 'MINERALS' AND 'MINING OPERATIONS'

This sub-section has also been engrafted in the Act by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1971 (Act 45 of 1971) and came into force wef 15 December 1971. It assigns the meaning to expression 'minerals' and 'mining operations' for the purposes of sub-s (1) and sub-s (1A) as given to them by cll (1) and (d) of s 3 of the Mines and Minerals (Regulations and Development) Act 1957.

SUB-SECTION (2): EXEMPTION FROM PAYING COMPENSATION UNDER SECTION 25FFF

Sub-section (2) completely exempts an employer from paying any compensation on closure of the undertaking, under s 25FFF(1) or the proviso thereunder, where:

(i) the undertaking is set up for the construction of buildings, and bridges, roads, canals, dams or other construction work; or

(ii) where the construction work is closed down on account of the completion of the work within two years from the date on which the undertaking had been set up.

On the plain and unambiguous language of this provision, it is quite clear that in case of closure of categories of undertaking as mentioned therein, no workman employed in those undertakings can claim compensation under cl (b) of s 25F of the Act.[87] These conditions however, are cumulative and not alternative. Thus, if anyone of these requirements is missing, the employer shall give notice or wages in lieu thereof and pay compensation in accordance with the provisions of s 25F. More often than not, large engineering and construction companies have establishments comprising administrative offices, branches and undertakings located at different work-sites in the country. This provision in contradistinction to the word 'establishment' uses the word 'undertaking' qualified by the words 'set up for construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, dams or other construction works'. In other words, for being entitled to the benefits of this provision, the undertaking must have been set up for one or more of such purposes and its closure also must be 'on account of the completion of the work within two years from the date on which the undertaking had been set up'. If such an undertaking is closed within the period of two years, the workman whose services are terminated upon such closure shall not be entitled to 'notice and compensation' under s 25F. If the work is not completed within two years, the workman will be entitled to such compensation. In Hindustan Steel Works, the company was engaged in construction of industrial and engineering plants, both within the country and abroad. It inter alia had undertaken the construction of a super-alloy project and a nuclear fuel-complex at Hyderabad for which it had employed about 230 workmen. This project was completed in January 1980 except for some very minor works. Apprehending that the workers may be retrenched on completion of the work at Hyderabad, the union suggested that these 230 workers may be transferred from Hyderabad to Vizag including those belonging to non-transferable category. However, the management pointed out that to the extent of requirement that will arose immediately at Vizag in the transferable categories, transfers would be done from Hyderabad to Vizag. But in the case of employees of non-transferable category, they may have to be retrenched at Hyderabad and re-employed at Vizag if requirements arise there later. Accordingly, 130 workers were transferred to Visakhapatnam, but the remaining 100 could not be absorbed at any other place. Consequently, the management issued retrenchment notices as required under s 25F of the Act on the ground that the construction works at Hyderabad had come to an end and the workers in question had become surplus. The dispute relating to this retrenchment was referred to the industrial tribunal for adjudication. The tribunal found the retrenchment illegal and awarded reinstatement of the workmen with full backwages and continuity of service. The Supreme Court held that the works at Hyderabad, in fact, had come to an end. Therefore, there was no question of absorption of the surplus workmen, and in the circumstances of the case, the undertaking at Hyderabad was distinct from other units. Hence, the demand of the workmen for absorption of the remaining 100 workmen in units other than Hyderabad was not justified. Speaking for the court, Jeevan Reddy J held:

> In our opinion, however, the fact that the management reserved to itself the liberty of transferring the employees from one place to another did not mean that all the units of the appellant constituted one single establishment. In the case of a construction company like the appellant which undertakes construction works, wherever awarded does that work and winds up its establishment there and particularly where a number of local persons have to be and are appointed for the purpose of a particular work, mere unity of ownership, management and control are not of much significance. Having regard to the facts and circumstances of this case and the material on record, the conclusion is inevitable that the units at Hyderabad were distinct establishments. Once this was so, the workmen of the said unit had no right to demand absorption in other units on the Hyderabad units completing their job.[88]

S. 25G. Procedure for retrenchment.—

Where any workman in an industrial establishment, who is a citizen of India, is to be retrenched and he belongs to a particular category of workmen in that establishment, in the absence of any agreement between the employer and the workman in this behalf, the employer shall ordinarily retrench the workman who was the last person to be employed in that category, unless for reasons to be recorded the employer retrenches any other workman.

'LAST COME, FIRST GO' RULE

The Act permits an employer to effect retrenchment of workmen in his industrial establishment, but there are certain condition precedent which he have to be complied with in effecting such retrenchment.[89] In the first instance, the Act requires an employer to comply with the requirements of s 25F or s 25N, as the case may be, before he can validly retrench a workman. In addition to this requirement, he has also to comply with the requirement of s 25G. Section 25G is independent of ss 25F and 25N. Whereas ss 25F and 25N stipulate conditions precedent to be complied with while effecting retrenchment, s 25G casts an obligation to follow the procedure prescribed therein. In other words, the employer cannot utilise the weapon of 'hire and fire' in violation of the provisions of ss 25F, 25G and 25N of the Act.[90] A workman employed in an independent project of temporary nature for installing the instruments manufactured by the company including civil works like construction of buildings etc. would be governed by the provisions of this sub-section and the provisions of s 25N would not be applicable to him, and he is entitled to only notice and compensation.[91] The provisions of this section are not confined to factories only, but they apply with equal force to all industrial establishments of certain magnitude. Hence, the workmen working in god owns of FCI, will be governed by the provisions of this section.[92] Failure to comply either with s 25F or s 25N, as the case may be, or to follow the procedure prescribed by s 25G, will render the retrenchment invalid.[93]Section 25G prescribes the procedure for retrenchment. It provides that where any workman in an establishment, who is a citizen of India, is to be retrenched and who belongs to a particular category of workman in that establishment, then in the absence of any agreement between the employer and the workmen in this behalf, the employer shall ordinarily retrench the workman who was the last person to be employed in that category, unless for reasons to be recorded, he retrenches any other workman.[94] The industrial rule relating to retrenchment 'last come, first go' or 'first come, last go' where other things are equal, has been recognised for long and affords a healthy safeguard against discrimination. This principle was given legislative recognition by the Amending Act in 1953.[95] In other words, this provision means that generally when termination of service of one or more of workmen in an industry has to be made owing to abolition or reduction of post or posts, the workman who should be selected for retrenchment in a particular category, must be the last appointed one. The section does not recognise the principle of 'last come, first go', and 'first come, last go', as the last portion of the section specifically states that the principle can be departed and deviated from in case of agreement to the contrary or due to extraordinary reasons which must be recorded in writing. To this extent, s 25G is directory and not mandatory in nature.[96]

From the analysis of the section, the following principles are discernible. The first is, that where the employer and the workmen have agreed between themselves to abide by certain procedure for retrenchment in their establishment, then that agreement will prevail and the statutory procedure will not apply. The rule of 'last come, first go' can be altered, modified or completely abrogated by an agreement between the employer and each workman or workmen as a whole by making a provision in the contract of service, in a collective bargaining agreement or the Standing Orders of the establishment to that effect. Retrenchment in such cases will have to strictly conform to the terms of the agreement and if a question is raised whether a given retrenchment is or is not valid, the question will have to be determined purely as a matter of construction and application of the terms of the agreement between the parties. In the absence of any such agreement relating to retrenchment, the statutory procedure, viz, 'last come, first go' rule will apply. Where retrenchment is to be effected from among a particular category of workmen, an individual who happens to have been recruited in that category last would have to be first retrenched and so on in that reverse order. It is, however, clear from the language of the section that the rule envisaged by it, is not rigid or uniform. The section itself recognises the existence of discretion in the employer to deviate from this normal procedure and proceed to retrench any workman other than the one who has been taken in employment last. This discretion can be exercised if there are valid reasons for doing so and these reasons are actually disclosed in the notice of retrenchment. The discretion cannot be exercised otherwise.[1] The section also prescribes certain conditions to be satisfied by an employee before he can claim protection given thereunder, which are:

1. the person claiming protection of this section should be a workman within the meaning of s 2(s) of the Act;
2. he should be a citizen of India;
3. the 'industrial establishment' employing such workman should be an industry within the meaning of s 2(j) of the Act;
4. the workman should belong to a particular category of workmen in that industrial establishment; and
5. there should be no agreement between the employer and the workman contrary to the procedure of 'last come, first go'. In other words, if there is an agreement between the employer and the workman making an exception to the rule, the rule would not apply.[2]

The use of the word 'ordinarily' indicates that though the procedures of 'first come, last go' or 'last come, first go' enacted by s 25G should normally be adhered to, where the exigencies of an industry so demand, the procedure can be departed from. The only requirement that the section prescribes in case of departure from this procedure is that the employer should record reasons for the departure. The doctrine of 'last come, first go' has to be borne in mind only with respect to different categories of workmen working in an industrial establishment and not to the whole of the industrial establishment.[3] There is, however, a clear distinction between a class or category, and a grade. The class or category is a group in which posts of particular description are included and the grade has reference exclusively to scales of pay. The word 'category' as mentioned in s 25G is, therefore, not synonymous with grade. Category means a class or trade such as turner, motor mechanic, electrician etc.[4] Ordinarily, industrial rule of retrenchment is 'last come, first go', and where other things are equal, this rule has to be followed by the employer in effecting retrenchment of a workman, as it is intended to afford a very healthy safeguard against discrimination of workmen in the matter of retrenchment. The principle, that in the matter of retrenchment, the management should commence with the latest recruit and progressively retrench employees higher up in the list of seniority, has been well accepted in industrial law. The statutory obligation prescribed by s 25G to follow the rule restricts the employer's common law right to decide which of his employees he should retrench. Nonetheless, in the application of the rule, the interests of the business cannot be overlooked. The rule has to be applied where other things are equal. The management of a business must act fairly to the employees. Where the management bona fide retains staff possessing special qualification in the interest of the business, that action cannot be discarded merely because the rule is not observed, i.e. the workman retained on account of special qualification is not the senior-most. The rule 'last come, first go' is not immutable, and for valid and sufficient reasons, an employer may depart from it. The action of the management in the process of retrenching a person which lacks bona fides will not be sustainable in law.[5]

In Suraj Prakash, the facts disclosed that the workman was originally appointed as a welder in the central tractor organisation of the Army at Jagdalpur in the State of Madhya Pradesh. Subsequently, he was re-designated as a senior welder. Nearly one and a half year thereafter he was declared as surplus and was relieved from his post. However, he was told that he could be re-employed as a welder on a lower scale at the workshop of the military department at Jullundur Cantonment. The workman challenged the termination of his service on the ground that it was illegal retrenchment and further that the new scale offered to him amounted to demotion. The Union of India in contest contended that the workman was employed as a welder against a temporary post, and there was no such post in the project and in order to accommodate him, he was re-designated as a senior welder. Subsequently, when the post was abolished, the workman was declared as surplus, but he was offered re-employment in the military department at Jullundur Cantonment as welder. Since he did not accept the post, he was not entitled to any relief. The Supreme Court discountenanced this procedure and observed that the easiest course for a reasonable management to adopt in such cases would have been to revert him to the place wherefrom he was promoted and give him the emoluments which he was drawing before such promotion.[6] In Assn of Planters, a workman, John, who was working as a head-clerk in an industrial establishment resigned from his job and his resignation was accepted by the employer. After a period of about four months, John was again re-employed and the period of break in his service was condoned under the terms of agreement. During the period of John's break in service, another clerk, George, was employed. Subsequently, on a question arising regarding the relative seniority in service of John and George, for the purpose of applying the principle of 'last come, first go', the Kerala High Court held that John's service as against George's must be counted as from the date of his re-appointment.[7] However, in a case, where there is closure of one department of an industrial concern and the closure is held or conceded to be bona fide, the rule of s 25G will not apply.[8] The question whether the workman is the junior most on the appropriate date is a question of fact which requires investigation and should be investigated by the adjudicatory authorities under the Act rather than the writ court.[9]

DEPARTURE FROM THE RULE

In other words, this rule is not inflexible and extraordinary situations may justify variations. For instance a junior recruit who has special qualifications needed by the employer may be retained even though another who is one up is retrenched.[10] Normally, where the rule if departed from, there should be reliable evidence, preferably in the recorded history of the workmen concerned, showing their inefficiency, unreliability or habitual irregularity. It is not as if industrial tribunals insist inexorably upon compliance with the rule, but what they insist on their being satisfied that whenever the rule is departed from, the departure is justified by sound and valid reasons.[11] It, therefore, follows that wherever it is proved that the rule in question has been departed from, the employer must satisfy the tribunal that the departure was justified.[12] For instance, it cannot be insisted on that this principle must be applied where the employer has lost confidence in the workman. The only requirement of law is that the employer must state this as a reason while recording his reasons for departing from the principle.[13] In R Sankaran, the employer retrenched the concerned workman who was not a qualified typist while retaining a junior employee who was a qualified typist. In view of the fact that there was no rigid allocation of work and the work of the typists was of inter-changeable nature, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that the departure from the rule of 'last come, first go' was not justified on the ground that the other employee was a qualified typist.[14] This view is not correct because the writ court cannot assume the functions of the employer and decide for him which workman to retain and which not to retain. The tribunal has to determine in each case whether the management has, in ordering the retrenchment acted fairly and properly, and not with any ulterior motive. It cannot be assumed from mere departure from the rule that the management was actuated by improper motives or that the management had acted in a manner amounting to an unfair labour practice. Nor has the tribunal the authority to sit in appeal over the decision of the employer, if for valid and justifiable reasons, the management has departed from the rule and retrenched the senior employee before his junior. The tribunal has to determine, in each case, whether the management has in ordering the retrenchment acted fairly and properly and not with any ulterior motive.[15] However, the finding of the tribunal that retrenchment of a workman was in violation of the principle 'last come, first go' will not be interfered with in a writ petition or in appeal under Art 136 of the Constitution, when it is neither without materials on record nor perverse.[16]

REASONS TO BE RECORDED BY EMPLOYER

The requirement of recording reasons for the departure by the employer from the rule of 'last come, first go' in affecting retrenchment has been engrafted in s 25G by the legislature with a view to make the order a 'speaking order', so that the industrial tribunals may be able to look into the reasons to determine whether the departure is justified by sound, sufficient and valid reasons. The employer has to write down the reasons in the order of retrenchment itself and the reasons cannot be improved later on.[17] If termination of service of a senior workman is effected for good reasons it would not contravene the provisions of this section.[18] If the preferential treatment given to juniors ignores the rule without any acceptable or sound reasoning, the tribunal will be well Justified to hold that the action of the management is not bona fide.[19] The reasons must be disclosed in the order of retrenchment itself. It will not be sufficient that such reasons could be seen from the records of the employer.[20]

BURDEN OF PROOF

If amongst several probationers employed in an industry, a probationer appointed earlier is discharged by the management retaining the later appointed probationer for the reason that the former was found unsuitable for the job, it would not be invalid on the ground of violation of the principle of 'last come, first go'. In a case where it is proved that the rule in question has been departed from, the employer must satisfy the industrial tribunal that the departure was justified, and in that sense the onus would undoubtedly be on the employer. In other words, the employer should be able to justify the departure before the industrial tribunal whenever an industrial dispute is raised by the retrenched workmen on the ground that their impugned retrenchment amounts to an unfair labour practice and victimisation.[21]

INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENT

Categories of Workmen

From the scheme of the Act, it is clear that it envisages each of the following expressions as a distinct concept:

(i) an industry;

(ii) an industrial concern within an industry;

(iii) an industrial establishment, which may itself be the whole of the industrial concern, or which may be part of a larger industrial concern;

(iv) a section of an industrial establishment; and

(v) categories of workmen in an industrial establishment or in section thereof.

Section 25G makes it clear that the unit of an industry to which the statutory principle governing retrenchment applies is an 'industrial establishment'. The provision insists on the rule being applied category wise. That is to say that those who fall in the same category shall suffer retrenchment only in accordance with the principle of 'last come, first go'.[22] The obligation of this section will operate not only within the limitation of the establishment in which retrenchment is to be made bur also within the added limitation of the category to which the retrenched workmen belong. The definition of an 'industrial establishment' in the explanation to s 25A(2) is limited in its scope to ss 25C, 25D and 25E of the Act.[23] It is the essence of the concept of industrial establishment that it is local in its set up and there is one code governing the grades of workmen and their scales of wages, and this is ordinarily possible only when the establishment is functioning at a given place.[24] If an industrial or business concern runs different departments, whether some or all of them can be regarded as one establishment or separate establishments depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. The rule laid down in s 25G is to be applied unit wise, and if the rule has not been followed in the matter of retrenchment, the workmen are entitled to reinstatement.[25]The tests to determine whether one establishment is part of another, have been discussed under s 25E of the Act. However, the retrenchment is to be effected on the basis of seniority of employees working category wise and not on the basis of seniority on a particular job on the date of award.[26] In Tulsidas Khimji, the Bombay High Court has laid down the test to determine whether in a given case there is a single establishment or different establishments or single category or different categories as follows:

(i) Have the employers recruited the workmen on the basis that they belong to one particular category of the various departments, branches or units taken as an integrated whole, or is the recruitment made on the basis of that particular category belonging to each of the different departments separately?

(ii) Can the employment of a clerk be regarded as employment in a single category of clerks by reason of the unity of ownership of the different departments or by reason of:

(a) geographical proximity of different departments? or

(b) the fact that there is a head office supervision of different departments and ultimate amalgamation of the accounts?

(iii) Are the different departments functionally integrated or by reasons of the condition of transferability or seniority amongst the clerical cadre, can the departments be treated as forming a single integrated industrial establishment? [27]

However, in Indian Cable Co, the Supreme Court observed:

> Having regard to the principles deducible from the language of the section already stated, the decisive elements in our judgment are the location of the establishment and the functional integrality, i.e., the existence of one code relating to the categories of workmen and their scales of wages.. .. It is, perhaps, impossible to lay down anyone test as an absolute and invariable test for all cases. The real purpose of these tests is to find out the true relation between the parts, branches, units etc. If in their true relation they constitute one integrated whole, we say that the establishment is one; if on the contrary they do not constitute one integrated whole, each unit is then a separate unit...Thus, in one case the unity of ownership, management and control may be the important test; in another case functional integrality or general unity may be the important test; and in still another case, the important test may be the unity of employment. Indeed, in a large number of cases several tests may fall for consideration at the same time.[28]

A single undertaking of one owner may have branches in different localities and at the same time, the owner can deal with the branches as distinct establishments and the staff on an independent basis for those establishments. It cannot be said that such branches constitute one industrial establishment for the purposes of the rule. The existence or non-existence of a system of 'pooled seniority' in respect of the staff of different establishments belonging to the common owner must be viewed only subject to the principles that are relevant for the application of s 25G of the Act, when the question of absorption of retrenched personnel on the 'last come, first go' rule arises for consideration. Thus the company had its head office at Bombay and one of its branch offices at Madras which had sub-depots at Ernakulum, Bangalore and Vijayawada. On re-organisation of the business of the company at Madras, 12 workmen in the Madras branch were retrenched. On the question whether the retrenchment was in accordance with the principle laid down in s 25G, it was held, that the office of the company at Madras was an industrial concern and each of the sub-depots was a separate industrial establishment of the same industrial concern.[29] An employer may place a workman at a particular place of his industrial establishment. However, that will not provide basis for the categorisation of the workman for the purpose of inter se seniority of the workers. The employer, therefore, cannot prepare separate seniority list on the basis of the place of work of the workmen as it will defeat the very purpose of preparing the seniority list.[30] In Eastern Engineers, the labour court upheld the retrenchment ordered by the company, which was challenged by the workman. Upholding the award, Kochar J of Bombay High Court took note of the fact that (i) the company sent the retrenchment letter by post and had also sent money order towards the retrenchment compensation, (ii) the company had squarely complied with the provisions of Section 25-F, (iii) that the workman had refused to accept the money order, and hence the blame would not lie at the door of the employer, (iv) there was no illegality, impropriety or perversity in the conclusions recorded by the Labour Court in respect of ss 25-F & 25-G of the Act.[31] The rule of 'last come, first go' should be followed, even in respect of daily wagers.[32] However, in Narendra Kumar, a workman who was appointed as a peon-cum-Farrash on a casual basis in a leave vacancy was terminated after 3 months. Before the labour court, he claimed that he was discharging the duties of permanent nature on a permanent post and alleged violation of ss 25G & 25H by the management. The Labour Court held that there was no permanent vacancy of Peon in that branch of the bank and that the petitioner had not worked on a permanent post but was engaged to meet the exigencies of work. The High Court held that there was no pleading that some other person was engaged in the worker's place and that he was the last person in his category. Besides, he had taken the examination for the post of Peon but was unsuccessful. There was no infirmity or illegality in the impugned award as ss 25G & H were not attracted.[33] In Maruti Udyog Ltd., the Supreme Court categorically held that in the event of transfer or closure of the undertaking under ss. 25FF or 25FFF respectively, the workmen would be entitled to compensation only. They will not be entitled to preferential treatment under s 25H and the said section would not apply to a case of transfer or closure.[34] The pendency of an adjudication proceeding before a tribunal does not operate as a bar to the right of employer to transfer his undertaking under s 25FF, and the provisions of s 33 are not attracted in the event of such transfer.[35] A daily wager, who was not engaged in a regular post and has worked only for 58 days, has no right to hold regular post. His disengagement cannot be treated as arbitrary, and he is not entitled to any relief under s 25G. Accordingly, the direction to reinstate him is illegal and is liable to be set aside.[36] Where the service of a seasonal workman who has not worked for 240 days was terminated, such termination is not retrenchment in view of s 2(oo) (bb), and hence the provisions of s 25G and s 25H are not applicable.[37]

Illustrations

However, when a business is run in various departments and the departments are not treated as water-tight compartments and workmen from one department are transferred to another department, the staff employed in the business as a whole must be taken as a unit for applying the principle of 'last come, first go', in effecting retrenchment,[38] provided that all the departments are situated at one place.[39] A limited company carrying on its business in various places in India had its registered office in Calcutta and factory at Jamshedpur, closed down one of its branches (at Ambala) and retrenched 11 employees working there. Each branch was having different categories of workmen on different scales of wages. It was held that in the circumstances, each branch was a separate industrial establishment.[40] A partnership firm had different departments dealing with different lines of business and such departments were situated in the same locality and were under the supervision of the head office. Separate accounts were maintained by different departments and finally amalgamated in one account of the firm. Recruitment of employees in each department was made separately. Promotions of employees were also determined department-wise. Conditions of service of employees were fixed department wise. Employees in one department were not transferable to any other department as a rule except for a few stray cases. Each department was managed and conducted as a separate unit. It was held that the departments were distinct and different industrial establishments.[41] There was inter-changeability between different categories of workers in New Globe Theatre of the corresponding categories in Roxy Talkies. There was unity of management. The difference in the location of theatre was only within the same city and this difference in location was held not to be sufficient to render the two units different in the sense of constituting two different establishments.[42] The workmen working at two places were appointed by the same authority. On completion of work at one place, most of the workmen were retrenched, but some were transferred to another place, and a common seniority list for all workmen at both places was maintained at the office of appointing authority. It was held that the workmen working at both the places could be regarded as one establishment.[43] A company being juristic person, cannot always be identical with the concept of industrial establishment for the purposes of this section. Two establishments of the company Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd at Begumpet and Hyderabad were held to be two different establishments for the purposes of this section.[44] Technical Supervisor (Civil) and Technical Supervisor (Electrical) are two different categories.[45]

Judicial Review

The question whether a branch or a department is in itself an industrial establishment within s 25G is a mixed question of fact and law, as its determination involves the application of the correct test underlying s 25G, and the correct inference to be drawn from the fact established is one of law open to consideration by the High Court under Art 226 of the Constitution.[46]

CONSEQUENCES OF NON-COMPLIANCE WITH THE RULE

Failure to comply with the rule of 'last come, first go', or in case of departure from this principle by the employer, the reasons for such departure not being recorded, would make the retrenchment invalid.[47] The validity or invalidity of the order of retrenchment has to be examined in the light of the state of things when the order was passed and subsequent events cannot make the order valid, if it was otherwise invalid or vice-versa.[48] Once it is found that retrenchment is unjustified and improper, it is for the tribunal to consider as to what relief the retrenched workmen are entitled. Ordinarily, if a workman has been improperly and illegally retrenched, he is entitled to claim reinstatement and the fact that in the meanwhile the employer has engaged other workmen would not necessarily defeat the claim for reinstatement of the retrenched workmen; nor can the fact that the protracted litigation in regard to the dispute has inevitably meant delay, defeat such a claim for reinstatement. Once the tribunal finds or it is conceded that a particular department of an establishment was closed down for economic reasons and the work was divided amongst the other employees of the establishment, it cannot be held that the conduct of the employer was improper or amounted to unfair labour practice. The direction of the industrial tribunal for reinstatement of a particular retrenched workman, in such a case, on the ground that some other employee should have been retrenched, cannot be held justified and the relief of reinstatement cannot be given.[49] If the tribunal comes to the conclusion that an order of retrenchment was not properly made, and directs reinstatement, an order for payment of remuneration for the period during which the employee remained unemployed, or a part thereof may appropriately be made. Where retrenchment has been properly made and that order has not been set aside, there is no principle of law which may justify an order directing payment of compensation to employees properly retrenched in addition to the retrenchment compensation statutorily payable.[50]Where certain employees, who were seniors, were terminated by the university while retaining in service employees junior to them, the High Court ordered reinstatement of the said employees, holding that the said termination offended s 25G of the Industrial Disputes Act as well as art 14 and 16 of the Constitution.[51] Rule 77 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957 requires preparation and publication of a list of all workmen in the concerned category at least seven days in advance of the actual retrenchment. This rule has been framed so that the object of s 25G may be effectively achieved and with a view to facilitate a retrenched workman to verify that he is not being discriminated against, otherwise it may be impracticable for him to collect relevant information and enforce his right. The minimum time of seven days allowed for this purpose is not unnecessarily long for the workman to get an adequate opportunity to scrutinize the correctness of the seniority list before he is thrown out. This requirement of the rule is mandatory and its violation would render an order of retrenchment illega1.Furthermore, the object of the rule is to give seven clear days' notice before the actual date of retrenchment. The period, therefore, cannot be cut down by including in it both the date of publication and the date of retrenchment.[52]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

S. 25H. Re-employment of retrenched workmen.—

Where any workmen are retrenched, and the employer proposes to take into his employ any persons, he shall, in such manner as may be prescribed, give an opportunity [53][to the retrenched workmen who are citizens of India to offer themselves for re-employment, and such retrenched workmen] who offer themselves for re-employment shall have preference over other persons.

LEGISLATION

This section was enacted as a part of Ch VA and was inserted along with the chapter by s 3 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1956. There has been a minor amendment to this section by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964. The significant words inserted by the amendment are 'who are citizens of India'. This amendment seems to have been made with a view to bring this section also in line with s 25G. Now, like s 25G, the benefit of this section also is restricted only to those workmen who are citizens of India. Hence, the workmen who though fall within the definition of s 2(s), if are not citizens of India, will not be entitled to the benefits of ss 25G and 25H. This chapter providing for retrenchment is not enacted only for the benefit of the workmen to whom s 25F applies, but it would apply to all classes of retrenchment. Therefore, there is no reason to restrict application of s 25H therein only to one category of retrenched workmen. This section for re-employment of retrenched workmen merely gives a preference to a retrenched workman in the matter of re-employment over other persons and it is enacted for the benefit of all retrenched workmen.[54]

RE-EMPLOYMENT OF RETRENCHED WORKMEN

Re-employment within the meaning of this section imports the significance of taking back a retrenched workman in the same category to which he belonged.[55] If the retrenched workmen offer themselves for re-employment, the employer is bound to give preference to them over other persons. If this is not done and the appointments are given in violation of this provision, the retrenched workmen can raise an industrial dispute.[56] However, it is pertinent to note that this section only gives the right to a retrenched employee to be 're-employed' in the event a vacancy arises in the establishment. But such re-employment is not to be confused with reinstatement. In case of such re-employment the question of backwages would not arise.[57]However, it is only the retrenched workmen who have the right of re-employment under this section. If the service of a workman has been terminated for any other reason than retrenchment, he would not be entitled to re-employment under this section. For instance, if the workman has resigned from service he would not be entitled to re-employment. If the termination of service consequent upon resignation is induced by any act on the part of the employer, it may tantamount to retrenchment. In Saroop Vegetable, a single judge of the Allahabad High Court held that where a unit of a factory was closed on which the workman resigned, the termination of the service of such workmen consequent upon closure in reality was retrenchment, qualifying the workman for re-employment under this section.[58] Likewise, the termination of the service of an employee in terms of the contract which has been excluded from the definition of retrenchment by sub-cl (bb) of s 2(oo) will not attract the provisions of s 25H.[59] According to the Oxford Dictionary, the word 're-employ' means 'employ again' or 'take back into employment'. 'Re-employment', therefore, means taking back into service. This section gives a right to a worker to have preference in the matter of re-employment.

On the question, whether the expression 're-employment' connotes taking back into employment or service on the same terms or conditions to which the employee was entitled previously, the Andhra Pradesh High Court took the view that the obligation to employ the workmen on the same conditions as to emoluments, etc., is implicit in the concept of re-employment.[60] The Punjab High Court had gone to the extent to say that an employer has no discretion to make promotion from lower cadres to vacancies which should be filled only with the retrenched employees.[61] On the other hand, the Bombay High Court held that there is nothing in the section or any other provision in the Act which gives the workman a right to secure re-employment on his previous terms and conditions of service.[62] The view taken by the Bombay High Court appears to be correct, because re-employment is not the same thing as re-instatement. It is also not correct law to say that the employer cannot fill in the vacancy by promoting workmen from lower cadres. This section must be considered along with s 25G. That is to say, in a particular category of workmen, the last employed person must go, as a rule, first, when retrenchment occurs. If after retrenchment, the employer proposes to take into his employment again, persons in the same category of work, this section indicates what he must do. Otherwise, the expression 're-employment' will lose all significance.[63] In Ram Chandra Yadav, some workmen were retrenched and they sought re-employment subsequently in terms of s 25H, but the employer filled in the vacancies with persons junior to the retrenched employees and such juniors were continued in employment for four months. Subsequently, the junior persons were also removed from employment. In the circumstances of the case, the Rajasthan High Court directed the employer to pay wages for the period when the junior persons remained in service at rates at which they were paid.[64]

The opportunity provided by this section should be given in the manner prescribed, i.e., in accordance with the relevant rules framed under the Act. Rules 76, 77 and 78 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, are the relevant rules in this behalf. Rule 76 prescribes the requirement of notice of retrenchment which shall be in Form P. Rule 77 prescribes the requirement of maintenance of seniority list of workmen and r 78 details out the procedure of re-employment. For instance, r 82 of the Industrial Disputes (Gujarat) Rules 1966 provided that opportunity to the retrenched employees must be given by intimating them by registered notice and the failure to comply with this requirement was held to be vital to the requirements of giving opportunity to the retrenched employees.[65]

REQUIREMENTS OF THE SECTION

This section prescribes certain conditions for the workmen to be entitled to claim the benefit under it. In order to claim preference in employment, the following conditions should be satisfied:

(i) he should be a citizen of India;

(ii) the workmen should have been 'retrenched' prior to re-employment. This right is not available to a dismissed, discharged or superannuated workman;

(iii) he should have been retrenched from the same category of service in the industrial establishment in which the re-employment is proposed; and

(iv) he should have offered himself for re-employment in response to the notice by employer under r 76 of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957, or under any rules framed by a state. Failure so offer himself for re-employment as aforesaid, will disentitle a workman to the benefit of this section.

In Cawnpore Tannery, a person whose work was substantially of a clerical nature, though designated as assistant storekeeper, was retrenched. Subsequent to the retrenchment, the company employed three new hands in the clerical cadre. The industrial tribunal found that the workman was wrongfully kept out of employment at least from the date on which the company employed a new clerk and consequently directed the company to re-employ the concerned workman with effect from the date on which the award would become enforceable on the highest consolidated pay which was then being paid to the three clerks subsequently employed. The appeal to the labour appellate tribunal was dismissed. In appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held that the retrenched workman must be given an opportunity of re-employment when the employer has to employ an additional hand. The principle is not only contained in s 25H, it is of general application too in industrial law, as it is based on fair play and justice. The fact that the retrenchment and subsequent re-employment of the three new hands took place before the introduction of ch VA in the Act, was not material. Permission or approval to discharge a workman under s 33 does not affect his right under s 25H.[66] Where the tribunal is satisfied that the employer has made out a prima facie case to discharge a workman by way of retrenchment, and accords approval or permission to such retrenchment, the right of the workman so retrenched under s 25H to re-employment is not affected by such permission or approval.[67] The Kerala High Court held that the rights of the temporary workmen under s 25H of the Act cannot operate to defeat the constitutional right of the recruits appointed by the public service commission.[68] In S Satyam, the Supreme Court held:

> The plain language of s 25H speaks only of re-employment of 'retrenched workmen'. The ordinary meaning of the expression 'retrenched workmen' must relate to the wide meaning of 'retrenchment' given in s 2(oo). Section 25F also used the word 'retrenchment' but qualified it by use of the further words 'workman...who has been in continuous service for not less than one year'. Thus, s 25F does not restrict the meaning of retrenchment but qualifies the category of retrenched workmen covered therein...and it does not restrict or curtail the meaning of retrenchment merely because the provision therein is made only for the retrenchment of a workman who has been in continuous service for not less than one year. Chapter V-A deals with all retrenchments while s 25F is confined only to the mode of retrenchment of workmen in continuous service for not less than one year. Section 25F prescribes the principles for retrenchment and applies ordinarily the principle of 'last come, first go' which is not confined only to workmen who have been in continuous service for not less than one year, covered by s 25F.[69]

The above interpretation placed on s 2(oo), s 25F and ch VB calls for a detailed analysis. It is conceded that once the action of the employer falls within the four corners of the definition under s 2(oo) read with s 25F, the workmen so retrenched will be governed by the cognate provisions of ch VA, ie, s 25G (last come, first go) and s 25H (re-employment of retrenched workmen), whether they have worked for more than 240 days or less than 240 days. However, to say that s 25F 'does not restrict the meaning of retrenchment, but only qualifies the category of retrenched workmen by extending the application to a workman who has completed one year continuous service' is a misconstruction of the provision. If the termination of service of a workman does not fall within the ambit of s 2(oo), which means and implies that it is not a case of retrenchment, then admittedly s 25F does not come into the picture regardless of the fact whether the workman has put in more than 240 days' service or less. In other words, in order to press s 25F or s 25G or s 25H into service, it should, in the first place, be shown that the action of management falls within the four corners of the definition in s 2(oo). If the answer is yes, ss 25F, 25G and 25H automatically apply without anything more. If the answer is 'no', they have no application whatsoever. Secondly, there is no warrant for the Court to read into s 25F something that is neither expressly provided therein nor was intended by the legislature. As an example, let us take the case of a workman appointed on a temporary basis either (i) for a period of six months, or (ii) for a period of 18 months, with a stipulation in the contract that his temporary employment comes to an end automatically on the expiry of the date mentioned therein. Such termination in either case falls outside the purview of s 2(oo) in view of the fact that sub-cl (bb) excludes termination of such fixed tenure employment from the definition. The fact that the said workman has put in less than one year of continuous service as in case (i), or more than one year as in case (ii) above, has no bearing on the nature of the action. In both cases, the action is outside the scope of s 2(oo) and, by the same token, the notice and compensation prescribed under s 25F have no application. Once the applicability of s 25F stands ousted, it logically follows that neither the rule of 'last come, first go' (s 25G), nor the requirement of giving 'preferential treatment in the event of re-employment' (s 25H) can have any application. Thus, the doctrine of 'qualification' attributed by the Supreme Court to the phraseology used in s 25F is only productive of confusion and is unwarranted. Thirdly, the observation, 'Ch VA deals with all retrenchments while s 25F is confined only to the mode of retrenchment' is wrong on facts. Chapter VA does not in its entirety deal with the so called 'all retrenchments'. With the sole exception of the three sections, i.e., ss 25F, 25G and 25H, no other section of ch VA deals with retrenchment. The other sections refer to (i) the applicability of the chapter to establishments (s 25A), (ii) continuous service (s 25B), (iii) lay-off (ss 25C-25E), (iv) compensation in case of transfer of undertakings (s 25FF), (v) 60 days' notice to close down an undertaking (s 25FFA), and (vi) compensation in case of closure of undertakings (s 25FFF). Fourthly, the distinction drawn by the Court between 'all retrenchments' in ch VB and s 25F on the basis of one year of continuous service is equally baseless. It is not as if the requirement of 'one year continuous service' is exclusively confined to s 25F. Even in the case of lay-off (s 25C), or transfer (s 25FF) or closure of undertaking (s 25FFF), a workman who has not been in continuous service for not less than one year is not entitled to compensation. Thus, the distinction sought to be made between s 25F on the one hand, and other provisions of ch VA on the other, is not well founded. From the above discussion, it can be seen that s 25F, much less s 25G or s 25H, have no application whatsoever in respect of a termination, which does not fall within the ambit of the definition in s 2(oo). The sole deciding factor of the applicability of the aforementioned three sections of ch VA is 'whether the action can be termed as retrenchment within the meaning of s 2(oo) ', and not the 'length of service' put in by a workman. Length of service has a limited significance for the purpose of eligibility to compensation, subject to the rider that the first condition, i.e., the termination falls within the ambit of s 2(oo), is satisfied. In a case where the management retrenches a group of workmen, some of whom had put in one year of continuous service and others less than one year, the action of management does not cease to be retrenchment, regardless of the fact that the latter class of workmen are not entitled to notice wages or compensation because of the shortfall in the threshold level of service. Lastly, again, it has to be clearly understood that all the three sections, i.e., ss 25F, 25G & 25H, either apply or do not apply to a particular case en bloc and uno flatu. This legal position is further buttressed by the fact that the language used in ss 25G & 25H is so unequivocal that they do not cover a case of termination occasioned by transfer or closure of undertaking, even though the employer is required to pay compensation in both the cases in accordance with s 25F under the deemed provision appearing in ss 25FF & 25FFF. In Aravali KG Bank, the labour court as well as a single judge of the Rajasthan High Court followed the defective decision of Supreme Court rendered in Central Bank, and held that a workman, notwithstanding that he has worked for less than 240 days before termination, would be entitled to the beneficial provisions of s 25H. The above decision of the Apex Court requires to be reviewed by a larger Bench and correct law pronounced.[70] The case of Vasant Kumbhare, furnishes one more illustration of judicial indiscipline compounded by a freewheeling misinterpretation of the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act. Referring to Punjab LDRC, on the nature and scope of s 25FFF, Deshmukh J of the Bombay High Court observed:

> To my mind, what the Supreme Court intended to say...was that in case the closure applied (sic) on account of the unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer, it may be said that the workmen would not be entitled to the application of s 25H ....[71]

The above commentary of Deshmukh J is as misplaced and flawed as that of the very decision of the Constitution Bench in Punjab LDRC, which aspect has been discussed at some length in the preceding sections under the head s 2(oo). There is nothing to guess in the language used in s 25H in order for the court to bring into play such extraneous considerations, as whether the undertaking was closed due to avoidable or unavoidable reasons for the purpose of re-employment. Even so, the Supreme Court in Punjab LDRC observed:

> In our view, the principle of harmonious construction implies that in a case where there is a genuine transfer of an undertaking as contemplated in the aforesaid sections, it would be inappropriate to read into the provision a right given to workman 'deemed to be retrenched' a right to claim re-employment as provided in s 25H.

Equally, there is nothing in the above observation, which could sustain the gloss added by Deshmukh J. That being the position, to read into the provision a right to claim re-employment on the ground that the closure was not on account of unavoidable circumstances is a judicial perversion of the highest order. This decision can also be attacked on a more fundamental legal principle enshrined in s 25F read with s 25H. Even in a case where the employer validly retrenches the workmen under s 25F and, subsequently, proposes to take some persons in his employment, the liability imposed on him is limited to giving an opportunity and preference to the retrenched workmen, and nothing more. The section casts no obligation on the employer either to necessarily employ them or, when so employed, to offer the same job or the same terms and conditions which they were enjoying at the time of retrenchment. This decision runs counter to binding precedents and should be treated as per incuriam. In Industry Colliery, the Supreme Court held that the workmen of coalmines, who were retrenched prior to the nationalisation of coalmines in 1972, were entitled to preferential treatment under s 25H in the event of re-employment after the takeover of the mines.[72] Under s 25H, the tribunal cannot direct the employer to absorb temporary workmen, who worked for less than 240 days and whose services were terminated, as regular employees by giving them preferential treatment.[73] Having retrenched a workman, if the employer does not send intimation about a subsequent vacancy while re-employing his juniors, it amounts to violation of s 25H read with r 78 of Central Rules.[74] The termination of a daily-wager, while fresh recruitment was made, is not violative of s 25H, and a daily wager had no right to be considered in the event of future employment.[75] The provisions of s 25H are applicable to a case where any workman is retrenched and the employer proposes to take into his employment any person. The said provisions have no application to a case of termination of the service of a workman on the expiry of the period stipulated in the order of appointment, whose relationship with the employer comes to an end automatically on the said expiry of the period stipulated therein.[76]

Re-employment contemplated by s 25H cannot be equated with 'reinstatement' and, hence, the claim for backwages cannot be entertained.[77] In Hari Krishan, the facts were: two clerks were appointed on an ad hoc basis for six months and their services were regularised a few months later. Three months thereafter, their services were terminated on the ground that the same were no longer required. They assailed the termination before the labour court. The labour court answered the reference against the workmen holding that their termination was justified and that they were not liable to be reinstated in service. Dismissing the writ petition filed by the workmen, the High Court held that there neither any violation of s 25G nor s 25H. The Court further observed that the original appointment being against rules, the challenge to termination was not sustainable, and held that the petitioners had to blame themselves for not applying when the post was advertised.[78] Where the services of a few daily wagers were terminated in contravention of ss 25G & 25H, even though s 25F was not violated as they had not worked for 240 days, the award of the labour court directing reinstatement with 50% backwages was partly allowed.[79] In order to invoke s 25H, the employee has to prove that he was retrenched, and, if it was a case of termination under s 2(oo)(bb), he could not assert any right under s 25H.[80] The above renditions disclose a tendency on the part of the learned judges to read more into the s 25H than what it is really stipulates, bordering on an absolute misconstruction of the provision.

In striking contrast to the misinterpretation placed by several High Courts on s 25H, it is refreshing to come across the decision of Tarun Agarwal J of Allahabad High Court in Anurag Sharma. The learned judge held, and very rightly so, that s 25H does not confer any absolute right on retrenched workmen to re-employment, except preferential right hedged with certain conditions.[81] It is submitted that the interpretation placed by Tarun Agarwal J on s 25H is right, whereas the decisions rendered in Hari Krishan, Narender Kumar and Tarsem Lal are clearly misconceived, overreaching and wrong. What was the provocation for the learned judges to travel beyond the plain language and place uncalled for emphasis on s 25H, which is patently out of step with the spirit of it? It is not as if they were called upon to re-write the provision according to their whims! There is nothing so complex in the phraseology of s 25H as to warrant interpretational gymnastics of the kind displayed in the above three cases! What all the said section stipulates is very simple and clear. It says that, in the event of re-employment, the employer shall give an opportunity to the retrenched workmen, and preference to those of them who present themselves for re-employment, and nothing more. There is nothing in the language of the section, which imposes an obligation on the employer either to compulsorily employ the retrenched workmen or, when so employed, to engage them in the same job or position, much less on the same wages, terms and conditions which they were enjoying at the time of retrenchment. It is rather disquieting that a few judges at the level of High Courts and even that of Supreme Court persuaded themselves to see in s 25H more than what it plainly conveys!

Where an undertaking was closed resulting in the termination of the services of the workmen, s 25H has no application in the event of the employer starting another unit, and the benefit of the said section would not be available to the workmen who lost their jobs as a result of closure.[82] In a dispute relating to Hindustan Zinc, a similar question arise under s 25-O read with s 25N falling under ch VB. A single judge of the AP High Court held that in the event of bonafide closure of the establishment under s 25-O, the consequential discharge of the workmen was not 'retrenchment' within the meaning of s 2(oo) and hence the workmen were not entitled to be benefit of s 25H.[83] In Rakesh Kumar Tewari, the facts briefly were: The respondent-workman was employed as a messenger on a daily wage in the State Bank of India. No appointment letter was issued to him but he worked for 87 days in that capacity. After the workman ceased to serve with the appellant, he raised an industrial dispute claiming that his services had been wrongfully terminated by the appellant. The Central Government referred the following disputes to the Industrial Tribunal in terms whether the termination of services of the workman and not considering him for further employment under s 25H of the ID Act was justified. The tribunal held that the termination was in violation of s 25G and s 25H and directed reinstatement with full back wages, etc. Writ petitions followed finally culminating in an appeal before the apex court. Setting aside the orders of the courts below, Ms Ruma Pal J (for self and Lakshmanan J) held:

> Indeed the order of reference by the Central Government did not also refer to Section 25-G but only to Section 25-H. In the circumstances it was not open to the Tribunal to "go off on a tangent" and conclude that the termination of service of the respondent was invalid because of any violation of Section 25-G by the appellant. (). .. the High Court upheld the decision of the Tribunal as if the Tribunal had proceeded under Section 25H. As we have said Section 25H proceeds on the assumption that the retrenchment has been validly made. Therefore, the High Court's view that the termination was invalid under Section 25H cannot in any event be sustained. (). .. Besides in the second appeal admittedly several persons had been appointed prior to the respondent on a temporary basis. They would have prior rights to reemployment over the respondent on the basis of the principles contained in Sections 25G or 25 H (). .. In the circumstances, the award of the Tribunal and the decision of the High Court holding that the respondent's services were wrongfully terminated were both incorrect. They are accordingly set aside. There is as such no question of payment of any back wages. Additionally the only other reason given by the High Court for directing reinstatement of the respondent in the second appeal was based on an equitable consideration of the respondent having allegedly been reinstated. The factual basis for this conclusion was erroneous.[84] ()

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25-I. Recovery of moneys due from employers under this Chapter.—

[Rep. by Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 (36 of 1956), s 19 (wef 10-3-1957).]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VA Lay-off and Retrenchment

S. 25J. Effect of laws inconsistent with this Chapter.—

(1) The provisions of this Chapter shall have effect notwithstanding anything inconsistent therewith contained in any other law [including standing orders made under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946 (20 of 1946)]:

[85][Provided that where under the provisions of any other Act or rules, orders or notifications issued thereunder or under any standing orders or under any award, contract of service or otherwise, a workman is entitled to benefits in respect of any matter which are more favourable to him than those to which he would be entitled under this Act, the workman shall continue to be entitled to the more favourable benefits in respect of that matter, notwithstanding that he receives benefits in respect of other matters under this Act].

(2) For the removal of doubts, it is hereby declared that nothing contained in this Chapter shall be deemed to affect the provisions of any other law for the time being in force in any State in so far as that law provides for the settlement of industrial disputes, but the rights and liabilities of employers and workmen in so far as they relate to lay-off and retrenchment shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter.

(i) Inconsistency with Chapter VA

Sub-section (1) only provides that the provisions of ch VA shall have effect notwithstanding the provisions of any other law including the provisions of the Standing Orders which are inconsistent with it.[86] Hence, the only effect of s 25J(1) is that in so far as the provisions of the Standing Orders are inconsistent with any provisions of ch VA the provisions of ch VA will override the inconsistent provisions of the Standing Orders. But an inconsistency with ch VA in a certain provision of a Standing Order will make the entire Standing Order nugatory, if it can be severed from the rest of the Standing Order which is not inconsistent.[87] The provisions of s 25J(1) are again subject to the proviso thereto, i.e., if the inconsistent provision of any other law or the Standing Orders is more favourable to the workman, such provision will have the effect of overriding the provisions of ch VA. It determines not merely the right of workmen to receive compensation for lay-off or retrenchment and the liability of employers to pay such compensation, but it also determines the wider rights and liabilities with respect to lay-off and retrenchment itself. Though the legislature has not used clear and explicit words conferring such powers and obligations, looking to the whole scheme of ch VA, that power or obligation is implicit in the provisions of the chapter.[88] By virtue of this section, ch VA would have overriding effect over any inconsistent provision in any other law. For instance, the requirements of s 25F (which is in ch VA) of this Act will override the provisions of rr 149(1) and (6) of railway establishment board, in the matter of retrenchment.[89] The provisions of ss 25F, 25G & 25H have overriding effect over any other law which necessarily includes service rules. The service rules which are inconsistent with these provisions cannot be given effect to and have to be simply ignored.[90] In Harmohinder Singh, the Supreme Court held that s 25J provides that the provisions of ch VA would have overriding effect irrespective of any other law including Standing Orders made under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946. Chapter VA deals with lay-offs and retrenchment. There is no substantive provision in ch VA, which pertains to the period of service of an employee. Consequently, s 25J has no application to a case of fixing the maximum age limit for employees and the maximum permissible service, etc.[91]

In Devidayal Sharma, the management of a concern removed a workman from its service on offering one month's salary in lieu of notice, under its Standing Orders in which it was not provided that an opportunity to show cause against the termination of service will be provided to the workman. The tribunal awarded compensation for such termination. In a writ petition against the award, the Bombay High Court held that the employer was not entitled to rely on the Standing Orders, for that would be subject to the provisions of ch VA as specifically provided for by s 25J.[92] In RB Bansilal, the Supreme Court discountenanced the plea that in view of the relevant Standing Orders, the quantum of compensation had to be scaled down or measured in terms of the Standing Orders. In this case, under the relevant Standing Orders, the employer could in the event of fire, breakdown of machinery etc., stop any machine or machines or department or departments, wholly or partially, or the whole or a part of the establishment for any period, without notice and without compensation in lieu of notice. Further, any operative so laid-off, was not to be considered as dismissed from service but as temporarily unemployed and was not to be entitled to wages during such unemployment except to the extent mentioned in the Standing Orders. The plea was rejected in view of the clear language of s 25 J under which the provisions of ch VA are to have effect notwithstanding anything inconsistent therewith contained in any other law including Standing Orders made under the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act 1946.[93] In TR Aluminium, the employer inflicted, as it were, a punishment on the employee, who was suffering from injuries to his right hand sustained arising out of and in the course of employment and had accordingly sought compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, which led to the company availing of insurance benefits by relying on the plea that the respondent was its workman. Having done that, the company terminated the services of the workman on the ground that he was incapacitated to do any work. The labour court directed the employer to reinstate the workman. Rejecting the arguments advanced on behalf of the petitioner-employer to the effect that in terms of s 56 of the Contract Act, the contract of employment got frustrated as the workman was incapacitated to do any work, a single judge of Delhi High Court observed that s 25J read with s 25F has overriding effect over any other legislation and the plea of 'frustration of contract' under s 56 of the Contract Act was not available to the employer.[94]

(ii) Proviso

This proviso has been substituted for the old one by the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1964. The new proviso further clarifies that the workman will continue to receive the favourable benefit to which he is entitled in certain cases notwithstanding that he receives benefits in respect of other matters under this Act. The proviso now provides that if a workman is entitled to something more as 'retrenchment compensation' than under s 25F or as 'lay-off compensation under s 25C ', under any Act or rules, orders or notifications issued thereunder or under any Standing Orders or under any award, contract of service or otherwise, he shall be entitled to get that and the provisions of s 25F or s 25C will not reduce the compensation available to the workman as aforesaid.[95] In T Venkateswarlu, the Andhra Pradesh High Court held that the provisions in a bi-partite settlement confers far more beneficial rights on the employees than the ones covered by s 25F. The case, therefore, would fall under the proviso to s 25J and could not be said to override the relevant provisions of the bi-partite settlement.[96] In Mumbai Mazdoor Sabha, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that a settlement arrived at between the employer and the labour union inter alia providing that the employer would not resort to any retrenchment or termination of service or discharge of its workmen during the currency of the settlement except after obtaining the consent of the union was unfair, unreasonable and opposed to the criteria laid down in s 25J of the Act.[97]By virtue of the proviso, the rates of minimum wages fixed under the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act would prevail over the rate of wages fixed under an award passed by an industrial tribunal under the provisions of this Act, in case the latter rates of wages are lower than the rates fixed under the provisions of the Minimum Wages Act, even for the period during which the award is in force.[98]

SUB-SECTION (2): REMOVAL OF DOUBTS

Sub-section (2) has been added by way of abundant caution and as an explanation to sub-s (1). In so far as provision has been made in the Act about any rights and liabilities of employers and workmen, the same shall be determined in accordance with those provisions, but where the Act is silent on any particular aspect of retrenchment or lay-off and if an express provision in regard to it exists in any other law in force in any state and such provision is not by necessary implication inconsistent with this chapter, then the provisions of that other law will determine any dispute relating to such aspect.[1] There is nothing in this sub-section to supersede laws dealing with matters about which this chapter is silent.[2] In Rohtak Hissar, the Supreme Court held that the last part of s 25J(2) categorically provides that the rights and liabilities of the employers and workmen in relation to lay-off shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of ch VA of this Act.[3]In other words, in regard to the payment of compensation for the lay-off and retrenchment, the relevant provisions of this Act will apply and not those of the Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act 1947. By virtue of this provision, notwithstanding the provision of ss 6K and 6R of the Uttar Pradesh Act, the proviso to s 25J(1) under which the Standing

Orders which give very favourable benefits to the employers in respect of the compensation for lay-off will prevail over the provisions of the ID Act. In Sawatram Ramprasad, dealing with the question whether the Central Provinces and Berar Industrial Disputes (Settlement) Act 1947 was applicable to the case involving the determination of rights and liabilities of the management and workmen in the case of lay-off or whether the provisions of ch VA of the ID Act were applicable, the Supreme Court found that the former Act contained no provisions either for recovery of money or compensation for lay-off and, therefore, held that where a workmen had a claim arising out of lay-off, it could only be dealt with under the I D Act in view of clear and unambiguous language of s 25J(2) of the ID Act. It was further observed that even if s 31 and s 25 J save the application of the State Act, they do so subject to the condition that the question of lay-off must be decided in accordance with ch VA of the ID Act.[4]

In Krishna DMS, the court had to deal with the question as to 'whether retrenchment of an employee in an establishment governed by the Andhra Pradesh Shops and Establishments Act 1966 is governed by the provisions of that Act or by the provisions of ch VA, which deal with lay-off and retrenchment'. The court noticed that both the enactments were enacted by the state and the central legislature in exercise of their powers given by Entry 22 of List 3 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India. The court also recognised the fact that the state Act was the later Act and it had received the assent of President. However, the court found that there was no repugnancy between the two statutes as to make the provisions of the ID Act relating to retrenchment ineffective in the State of Andhra Pradesh. It was therefore, observed that by enacting s 25J(2), the Parliament intended that the rights and liabilities arising out of lay-off and retrenchment, should be uniform throughout India where the ID Act was in force and did not wish that the states should have their own laws inconsistent with the central law. If really the state legislature intended that it should have a law of its own regarding the rights and liabilities arising out of retrenchment or lay-off, it would have expressly provided for it and submitted the Bill for the assent of the President. Since the court did not see any express or implied repugnancy between the central and state statutes, the rights and liabilities of the employees in connection with retrenchment and lay-off were governed by the provisions of ch VA of the ID Act which could be enforced through the machinery of ss 41 (1) and 41 (3) of the State Act. The court, however, suggested that the ID Act itself should be suitably amended making it possible to an individual workman to seek redress in an appropriate forum regarding illegal termination of service which may take the form of dismissal, discharge, retrenchment etc., or modification of punishment imposed in a domestic inquiry. Speaking for the court, Venkataramiah J suggested the law reform in the following words:

> An amendment of the Central Act introducing such provisions will make the law simpler and also will reduce the delay in the adjudication of industrial disputes. Many learned authors of books on industrial law have also been urging for such an amendment. The state Act in the instant case has, to some extent, met the above demand by enacting s 41 providing for a machinery for settling disputes arising out of termination of service which can be resorted to by an individual workman. In this connection, we have one more suggestion to make. The nation remembers with gratitude the services rendered by the former labour appellate tribunal which was manned by some of our eminent judges by evolving great legal principles in the field of labour law, in particular with regard to domestic inquiry, bonus, gratuity, fair wages, industrial adjudication etc. The Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act 1950 which provided for an all-India appellate body with powers to hear appeals against the orders and awards of industrial tribunals and labour courts, in India was repealed in haste. If it had continued, by now the labour jurisprudence would have developed perhaps on much more satisfactory lines than what it is today. There is a great need today to revive and to bring into existence an all India labour courts, industrial tribunals and even of authorities constituted under several labour laws enacted by the state so that a body of uniform and sound principles of labour law may be evolved for the benefit of both industry and labour throughout India. Such an appellate authority can become a very efficient body on account of specialisation. There is a demand for the revival of such an appellate body even from some workers' organisation. This suggestion is worth considering. All this we are saying because we sincerely feel that the Central Act passed forty years ago needs a second look and requires a comprehensive amendment.[5]

In Straw Board, the Supreme Court held that by virtue of s 25J, a tribunal created under Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act, is competent to award compensation on the closure of an undertaking as contemplated by s 25FFF of the ID Act.[6]This view is not correct. A tribunal created under a State Act has to confine itself to the provisions of that Act and cannot extend its jurisdiction beyond that. Section 25J being a provision in the ID Act is de hors the jurisdiction of the tribunal created by the Uttar Pradesh Act. Furthermore, s 25J(2) has no reference to closure-compensation. It only refers to lay-off and retrenchment. The question, therefore, requites reconsideration.

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25K Application of Chapter VB.—

(1) The provisions of this Chapter shall apply to an industrial establishment (not being an establishment of a seasonal character or in which work is performed only intermittently) in which not less than [5][one hundred] workmen were employed on an average per working day for the preceding twelve months.

(2) If a question arises whether an industrial establishment is of a seasonal character or whether work is performed therein only intermittently, the decision of the appropriate Government thereon shall be final.

SUB-SECTION (1): ESTABLISHMENTS EMPLOYING ONE HUNDRED WORKMEN

The provisions of this chapter have been made applicable to establishments in which one hundred or more workmen are employed on an average per working day for the preceding twelve months. For determining the question as to where this chapter applies to a particular industrial establishment on a particular day, it is not sufficient that on the particular day or for some days, one hundred or more workmen were employed in it but it will have to be shown that such number of workmen were employed in the establishment on an average calculated for the twelve months preceding that day on the basis of each working day. Thus, the days of weekly rest and other holidays are not to be counted for taking the average. The Bombay High Court held that for the purpose of computation of the total number of workmen employed on an average per working day for the last twelve months, as contemplated under s 25K(1), only those persons who answer to the definition of 'workman' as contained in s 2(s) of the Industrial Disputes Act were liable to be included.Mathadi workmen and contractors' workers should not be included in computing such number. As far as 'workmen' of other establishments are concerned, they could be included only if there was functional integrality between the industrial establishment whose case under s 25K is being considered and such other establishments.[6] However, the industrial establishments of a seasonal character or in which, work is performed only intermittently even though employing one hundred or more workmen have been excluded from the application of the provisions of this chapter.

SUB-SECTION (2): DECISION OF THE APPROPRIATE GOVERNMENT

In view of the complex nature of the industrial organisation, questions, occasionally do arise as to whether an industrial establishment, infact, is of a seasonal character or whether work performed therein is done only intermittently. With a view to obviate such controversies, the appropriate Government has been empowered to decide such questions finally. In other words, such decisions of the appropriate Government are not liable to be questioned in a court of law. The question whether an establishment is of a seasonal character or not, has to be decided by the Government and not by the writ court[7] Such decision may, however, be amenable to judicial review if it is mala fide or in deciding the question, the appropriate Government has not applied its mind to the material on record or has not taken into account the relevant and vital materials or has left out of consideration the relevant and vital materials or has proceeded on extraneous and irrelevant considerations.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25L. Definitions.—

For the purposes of this Chapter,—

(a) "Industrial establishment" means—

(i) a factory as defined in clause (m) of section 2 of the Factories Act, 1948 (63 of 1948);

(ii) a mine as defined in clause (j) of sub-section (1) of section 2 of the Mines Act, 1952 (35 of 1952); or

(iii) a plantation as defined in clause (f) of section 2 of the Plantations Labour Act, 1951 (69 of 1951);

(b) notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (ii) of clause (a) of section 2,—

(i) in relation to any company in which not less than fifty-one per cent of the paid-up share capital is held by the Central Government, or

(ii) in relation to any corporation [not being a corporation referred to in sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of section (2)] established by or under any law made by Parliament.

the Central Government shall be the appropriate Government.

CLAUSE (a): INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENT

For the purpose of this chapter, 'industrial establishment' has been defined to mean:

(i) a factory as defined in cl (m) of section 2 of the Factories Act 1948;

(ii) a mine as defined in cl (j) of sub-s (1) of s 2 of the Mines Act 1952; or

(iii) a plantation as defined in cl (f) of s 2 of the Plantations Labour Act 1951.

This definition of 'industrial establishment' is the self-same as in explanation to s 25A which defines an industrial establishment for the purposes of ss 25A, 25C, 25D & 25E. But that definition is meant specifically for those provisions only, while the present definition governs the application of the provisions of this chapter (s 25K to s 25S) entirely. These provisions, therefore, do not apply to an establishment which is not a 'factory', 'mine' or 'plantation', because such an establishment is not an 'industrial establishment' as defined by this section. Hence, the provisions of this chapter will not apply to a commercial establishment even if it employs one hundred or more workmen. From a combined reading of the definition of 'lay-off' in s 2(kkk), the Explanation to ss 25A & 25E, it appears that 'lay-off' can normally be effected in a 'factory', 'mine', or 'plantation' only and not in a commercial establishment but 'retrenchment' and 'closure' can be effected in a commercial establishment as well. A commercial establishment which is not a 'factory', 'mine' or 'plantation', is not an 'industrial establishment', and thus, the provisions of this chapter relating to 'retrenchment' and 'closure' will not be attracted to it. In other words, the 'retrenchment' in or 'closure' of an office of a company employing one hundred or more persons will be governed by the provisions of ch VA and can be effected without complying with the provisions of ch VB. From the scheme of this section, it is evident that the industrial establishment as defined in this section is a much narrower concept than industry as defined in s 2(j). An establishment even if 'industry' will not be an industrial establishment for the purposes of this chapter unless it is a 'factory', 'mine' or 'plantation'.

The Orissa High Court in State Transport Accountants, held that the Orissa State Road Transport Corporation which has several factories, plants, repair workshops being engaged in 'manufacturing process' will be factory within the meaning of s 2 (m) of the Factories Act 1948 and as such, would fall within the definition of industrial undertaking as defined in this section.[8] In Lal Mohammed, the Supreme Court held that the term 'premises' in s 25(m) of the Factories Act 1948 read with s 25L of the ID Act covers not only buildings but even open land, and the laying of a railway line which has to be carried on in a phased manner must necessarily be on a given fixed site which could constitute 'premises', and the entire length of land would be phase-wise factories for construction of railway lines over them. A company employing more than 100 workmen engaged in a specific project of laying railway line, having a site adapting manufacturing process is an 'industrial establishment' within the meaning of s 25L, which is factory as defined under s 25(m) of the Factories Act 1948. Consequently, such a project would be squarely attracted by s 25N.[9] In Seelan Raj, the Supreme Court referred to a larger bench the question, whether a data processing unit falls within the definition of 'industrial establishment' under s 25L, in the sense whether it could be said to be 'factory' as defined in s 2(m) of FA, for the application of ch VB.[10] In Ramesh, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that compliance with the provisions of s 25N was necessary only in respect of three types of establishments as stipulated in s 25L, i.e., factory, plantation and mine. The irrigation division of the Jayakwadi Project was not covered by it and, consequently, ch V-B, not to speak of s 25N, was not at all applicable to such a project.[11]

2.CLAUSE (b): APPROPRIATE GOVERNMENT

In relation to industrial disputes concerning an industry carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government or by a railway company or concerning any such controlled industry as may be specified in this behalf by the Central Government or certain types of corporations, Central Government has been made the appropriate Government by sub-cl (i) of d (a) of s 2. By this provision, the Central Government has further been made the appropriate Government in relation to:

(i) any company in which not less than fifty-one per cent of the paid-up share capital is held up by the Central Government, or

(ii) any corporation established by or under any law made by Parliament which has already not been included in subclause (i) or cl (a) of s 2.

In RICWE Union, Seth J of the Calcutta High Court held that the mere fact, that the powers of Central Government had been delegated to the state Government in terms of the notification issued under s 39 of the ID Act, could not substitute Central Government, and that the state Government could never be the appropriate Government under s 25L(b) in respect of Rehabilitation Industries Corporation, which was a wholly owned Central Government company.[12] In respect of Mining and Allied Machinery Corporation, which is a Government of India undertaking with Central Government holding more than 51 per cent of paid-up share capital, the Central Government is the appropriate Government within the meaning of s 25L(b).[13]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

S. 25M. Prohibition of Lay-off.—

(1) No workman (other than a badli workman or a casual workman) whose name is borne on the muster rolls of an industrial establishment to which this Chapter applies shall be laid-off by his employer except [14][with the prior permission of the appropriate Government or such authority as may be specified by that Government by notification in the Official Gazette (hereafter in this section referred to as the specified authority), obtained on an application made in this behalf, unless such lay-off is due to shortage of power or to natural calamity, and in the case of a mine, such lay-off is due also to fire, flood, excess of inflammable gas or explosion].

15[(2) An application for permission under sub-section (1) shall be made by the employer in the prescribed manner stating clearly the reasons for the intended lay-off and a copy of such application shall also be served simultaneously on the workmen concerned in the prescribed manner.

(3) Where the workman (other than badli workmen or casual workmen) of an industrial establishment, being a mine, have been laid-off under sub-section (1) for reasons of fire, flood or excess of inflammable gas or explosion, the employer, in relation to such establishment, shall, within a period of thirty days from the date of commencement of such lay-off, apply, in the prescribed manner, to the appropriate Government or the specified authority for permission to continue the lay-off.

(4) Where an application for permission under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3) has been made, the appropriate Government or the specified authority, after making such enquiry as it thinks fit and after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, the workmen concerned and the persons interested in such lay-off, may, having regard to the genuineness and adequacy of the reasons for such lay-off, the interests of the workmen and all other relevant factors, by order and for reasons to be recorded in writing, grant or refuse to grant such permission and a copy of such order shall be communicated to the employer and the workmen.

(5) Where an application for permission under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3) has been made and the appropriate Government or the specified authority does not communicate the order granting or refusing to grant permission to the employer within a period of sixty days from the date on which such application is made, the permission applied for shall be deemed to have been granted on the expiration of the said period of sixty days.

(6) An order of the appropriate Government or the specified authority granting or refusing to grant permission shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (7), be final and binding on all the parties concerned and shall remain in force for one year from the date of such order.

(7) The appropriate Government or the specified authority may, either on its own motion or on the application made by the employer or any workman, review its order granting or refusing to grant permission under sub-section (4) or refer the matter or, as the case may be, cause it to be referred, to a Tribunal for adjudication:

Provided that where a reference has been made to a Tribunal under this sub-section, it shall pass an award within a period of thirty days from the date of such reference.

(8) Where no application for permission under sub-section (1) is made, or where no application for permission under sub-section (3) is made within the period specified therein, or where the permission for any lay-off has been refused, such lay-off shall be deemed to be illegal from the date on which the workmen had been laid-off and the workmen shall be entitled to all the benefits under any law for the time being in force as if they had not been laid-off.

(9) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this section, the appropriate Government may, if it is satisfied that owing to such exceptional circumstances as accident in the establishment or death of the employer or the like, it is necessary so to do, by order, direct that the provisions of subsection (1), or, as the case may be, sub-section (3) shall not apply in relation to such establishment for such period as may be specified in the order.]

16[(10)] The provisions of section 25C (other than the second proviso thereto) shall apply to cases of lay-off referred to in this section.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section, a workman shall not be deemed to be laid-off by an employer if such employer offers any alternative employment (which in the opinion of the employer does not call for any special skill or previous experience and can be done by the workman) in the same establishment from which he has been laid-off or in any other establishment belonging to the same employer, situate in the same town or village, or situate within such distance from the establishment to which he belongs that the transfer will not involve undue hardship to the workman having regard to the facts and circumstances of his case, provided that the wages which would normally have been paid to the workman are offered for the alternative appointment also.

LEGISLATION

Section 25M as originally enacted in ch VB was struck down by the Madras High Court in Simpson & Co, following the ratio of the Supreme Court decision in Excel Wear v Union of India (supra) holding that:

(i) no guidelines are available from the statute; and

(ii) that there is no provision for scrutiny of the order passed by the authority, by any higher authority or tribunal in appeal or revision. [17]

Consequently, the legislature has enacted the new section by removing the defects.[18] Sub-section (1) has been amended while sub-ss (2) to (9) have been substituted for the previous sub-ss (2) to (5) and the previous sub-s (6) has been renumbered as the present sub-s (10). The validity of the amended section has been upheld by the Supreme Court in Papanasam.[19] The court adopted the reasoning in workmen of Meenakshi Mills.[20]

SUB-SECTION (1): PRIOR PERMISSION TO LAY-OFF

Section 2(kkk) defines 'lay-off' to mean 'the failure, refusal or inability of an employer on account of shortage of coal or power or raw material or accumulation of stocks or break down of machinery or natural calamity or for any other connected reason to give employment to a workman'. In these contingencies, previously in all cases it was open for an employer to lay-off his workmen. Now this provision prohibits an employer to 'lay-off' any workman (other than a badli workman or a casual workman) whose name is borne on the muster rolls of his 'industrial establishment' employing one hundred or more workmen (which is not of a seasonal character or in which work is performed only intermittently) without the 'prior permission' of the appropriate Government or the specified authority except in cases where the 'lay-off is due to shortage of power or a natural calamity. But where such establishment is a mine, apart from a natural calamity or shortage of power, if the lay-off, also due to 'fire, flood, excess of inflammable gas or explosion', the prior permission to lay-off will not be necessary in the first instance. The Andhra Pradesh High Court held that 30 per cent power cut would be sufficient to justify the lay-off.[21] Natural calamities are natural disasters. The expression 'natural calamity' is of much wider amplitude than 'fire, floods, excess of inflammable gas or explosion'. Apart from these disasters, natural calamity may comprehend other disasters like tempests, earthquakes, lightening and tornados etc. If any of these contingencies happens whether in a mine or any other establishment, the employer is exonerated from the requirement of seeking prior permission for lay-off. The permission as required by this sub-section may be accorded either by the appropriate Government or by the specified authority. However, to clothe the authority with the power to grant such power, such authority must be specified by the appropriate Government in the Official Gazette, by a notification. In other words, an authority which has not been specified by a notification in the Official Gazette will not be a 'specified authority' in the eye of law for the purposes of this sub-section.

SUB-SECTION (2): APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION

The application for permission under sub-s (1) is to be in the prescribed manner in which the employer has clearly to state his reasons for the intended lay-off. The employer is further required to serve a copy of the application simultaneously on the workman concerned. Rule 75B (1) of the Central Rules prescribes that an application for prior permission to lay-off any workman shall be in form O3 and delivered to the specified authority either personally or by registered post acknowledgement due. The date on which the application is delivered to the specified authority will be deemed to be the date on which the application is made for the purposes of sub-s (5). Rule 75B(2) requires the application to be made in triplicate along with a sufficient number of copies of the application for service on the workman concerned. Where the facts disclosed that the management served simultaneously copies of the application on the two unions and also affixed on the notice-board, it is sufficient compliance with the requirements of s 25M.[22]

SUB-SECTION (3): APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO CONTINUE LAY-OFF IN A MINE

Though sub-s (1) exempts an employer from obtaining prior permission for laying off workmen in case of a mine where the lay-off is on account of 'fire, flood, excess of inflammable gas or explosion', in the first instance, where the layoff is of a prolonged duration, the employer is required to apply to the 'appropriate Government' or the specified authority for permission to continue the lay-off, within a period or thirty days from the commencement of the lay-off. Such application is also to be made in the prescribed manner. The relevant rule for making such application for continuing lay-off is also to be made in form 03 prescribed under r 75B.

SUB-SECTION (4): GRANT OR REFUSAL OF PERMISSION

The appropriate Government or the specified authority is vested with the power to grant or refuse permission to the employer to 'lay-off the workmen. But before deciding to grant or refuse to grant permission, the appropriate Government or the specified authority is required:

(i) to make such inquiry in the manner of lay-off as it may think fit;

(ii) to give a reasonable opportunity to the employer, the workmen concerned and the persons interested in such lay-off to be heard; and

(iii) then to consider—

  (a) the genuineness and adequacy of the reasons for the 'lay-off'

  (b) the interests of the workmen, and

  (c) all other relevant factors;

(iv) to record its reasons, for its decision, in writing in the order granting or refusing permission; and

(v) to communicate the order to the employer and the workmen.

The previous s 25M was struck down as it provided no guidelines and also made no provision for scrutiny of the orders passed by the specified authority or the appropriate Government by any higher authority. Now, the legislature has sought to remove these defects by engrafting the above requirements in the section. This provision requires compliance with the rules of natural justice by providing a reasonable opportunity to the parties concerned of being heard, in support and against the proposed lay-off. It also requires the authority not only to take necessary inquiry in the facts and circumstances of the lay-off but it also requires it to apply its mind to the question of genuineness and adequacy of the reasons for the lay-off stated by the employer. Furthermore, the authority is also required to take into account the interests of the workmen and all other relevant factors while deciding whether permission to lay-off should be granted or not. The requirement of the statement of reasons in writing in the order granting or refusing the lay-off, makes such order reviewable. In other words, the order of the specified authority will be open to scrutiny either by the tribunal on reference under sub-s (7) or by a High Court in writ jurisdiction under art 226 of the Constitution, if the reasons stated by it are irrelevant and extraneous, to the question of granting permission for lay-off. The order will also be reviewable if while coming to the decision to grant or refuse to grant permission, the authority has left out of consideration, vital and material factors which it ought to have been taken into account.

Where the management, having laid-off the workers due to shortage of power caused by hike in electricity tariff and disablement of its captive power source, applied to the Labour Commissioner under s 25M to continue the lay-off, and the labour commissioner rejected the application without giving an opportunity to the management of being heard, the High Court quashed the order as being violative of principles of natural justice and remitted the matter to the labour commissioner for consideration.[23] Rule 75B(3) of the Central Rules requires the employer to furnish to the 'appropriate Government' or the 'specified authority', 'such further information as the authority considered necessary for arriving at a decision on the application'. Such information, however, is in addition to the information sought in annexure to form O-3. The information that the authority may require the employer to furnish under this sub-rule is to be furnished by the employer only when called for by the 'appropriate Government' or the 'specified authority' for deciding as to whether the permission should be granted or not. From the language of sub-s (5), it would appear that the Government or the specified authority has to grant or refuse to grant permission applied for within sixty days from the making of the application under sub-s (1) of sub-s (3). Rule 75B(4) requires the employer to give notice to the regional labour commissioner (central) concerned, of the commencement and termination of 'lay-off' in forms 01 and 02 respectively, where the permission to lay-off has been granted. Likewise, where the permission to continue lay-off which had been commenced in the case of a mine, has been granted by the authority, the employer is required to give the regional labour commissioner (central) concerned, a notice of commencement of such lay-off in form 01 in case such notice has not already been given under r 75A(1) and the notice of termination of lay-off is to be given in form 02. In Tamil Nadu Magnesite, a single judge of the Madras High Court, while quashing the order passed by the Government and remanding the matter for fresh disposal held that the power to grant permission for lay-off under s 25M was quasi-judicial in nature, and the orders passed thereunder were subject to judicial review.[24]

SUB-SECTION (5): DEEMED PERMISSION

The legislature has provided a maximum period of sixty days during which the appropriate Government or the specified authority has to decide the question as to whether it should grant or refuse to grant permission to the employer to lay-off his workmen and communicate the same to him. If the Government or the specified authority fails to communicate its order granting, or refusing to grant permission to the employer within the period of sixty days from the date of making the application, the permission shall be deemed to have been granted on the expiration of that period. As is obvious from its definition, the exigency of 'lay-off' arises on sudden happening of certain contingencies, viz, 'shortage of coal, power, or raw materials or the accumulation of stocks or the breakdown of machinery or natural calamity or any other connected reason'. It is now settled law that neither the definition of 'lay-off' nor any provision in the Act vests a right on the employer to lay-off his workmen. But by a contract either in the Standing Orders or in a collective bargaining agreement, an employer may get the right to lay-off workmen on the happening of such contingencies. More times than not, these contingencies are of short duration. In sudden situations, it cannot be possible for an employer to presage the happening of such contingencies particularly the shortage of coal, power, break-down of machinery or any other connected reason.

Firstly, the scrutiny of the reasons and the other particulars stated in form 03 is apt to take quite a considerable time by the Government or the specified authority. Secondly, even after this scrutiny, the procedure before the authority is also likely to take quite some time before it can make and communicate its order. The maximum period fixed is sixty days after which the permission will be deemed to have been granted. But by the expiration of that time, the necessity to lay-off may itself vanish. The provisions of this section will over-ride the contractual right of the employer to lay-off the workmen. But the section still subjects the employers' right to carry on his business to unreasonable restrictions. Rule 75B (1) fixes the date of making the application as the date on which the application has been delivered personally or by registered post to the Government or the 'specified authority'. The time of sixty days is to be reckoned from that date. After such deemed permission, the employer is required to give notices in Forms 01 and 02 of the commencement and termination of the lay-off respectively in terms of r 75B(4).

SUB-SECTION (6): FINALITY OF THE ORDER

This provision makes the order of the 'appropriate Government' or the 'specified authority' granting or refusing to grant permission to 'lay-off' final and binding on all parties for a period of one year from the date of the making of such order. Though such order is final, it is reviewable by a writ court under Art 226 of the Constitution. It is not possible to understand the purpose of keeping the order in force 'for one year' from the date on which it was made. The exigency of 'lay-off' arises on the happening of anyone of the contingencies enumerated in the definition of 'lay-off' at a particular point of time. Normally, such contingencies are not of long duration. Nor can any employer afford to lay-off his workmen for a period of one year. The Bombay High Court observed that it was incumbent on the employer to commence lay-off on the date mentioned in the application for permission to lay-off, or if the date had already expired, then from the date of the order granting permission or the deemed grant of permission.[25] Could it be said that the employer can keep the workmen laid-off upto a period of one year from the date on which permission is granted? Will the workmen remain bound by such order for one year? Furthermore, does it mean that the employer can lay-off the workmen at any time within one year from the date of the order for any other reasons, if the reasons for lay-off have disappeared? These questions baffle understanding. The time-limit provided for keeping the order binding on the parties for a period of one year from the date on which it was made, is vague and without any guidelines. This portion of the sub-section is prima facie arbitrary and deserves to be struck down as violative of the guarantees of Arts 14 and 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. In SAE Mazdoor Union, a single judge of MP High Court held that an order passed under s 25M granting permission for lay-off could be challenged by a minority union and every workman affected by it.[26]

SUB-SECTION (7): REVIEW OR ADJUDICATION OF THE ORDER

The appropriate Government or specified authority has been given the discretion to review its order suo motu or on the application made by the employer or any workman. It is implicit in the provision that while reviewing the order, the Government or the specified authority will hear the concerned parties before reviewing its order. If there are complicated questions of fact or law involved in the matter, the Government, directly or at the instance of the specified authority may refer the matter to an industrial tribunal for adjudication. The proviso requires the tribunal to pass its award within a period of thirty days from the date of such reference. The period of thirty days appears to be merely directory and not mandatory. One of the reasons for which the previous section was struck down was that there was no machinery provided in the Act for scrutinising the order of the Government or the specified authority for deciding its legality, validity and justifiability. This section purports to fill in the hiatus but the purported benefits of this section are illusory because by the time the award of the tribunal becomes enforceable the exigency under which the need for lay-off arises generally, would have passed off.

SUB-SECTION (8): CONSEQUENCES OF COMMENCING OR CONTINUING LAY-OFF WITHOUT PERMISSION

Originally, there was no provision in the Act which made 'lay-off' illegal. This provision renders the commencement or continuance of the 'lay-off' illegal where:

(i) no application for permission to 'lay-off' under sub-s (1) has been made within the specified period;

(ii) no application for permission to continue 'lay-off' after the commencement under sub-s (2) has been made within the period specified therein; or

(iii) the permission for such commencement or continuance of lay-off has been refused.

Apart from being exposed to the penal consequences of an illegal 'lay-off' under s 25Q, the employer who commences or continues such lay-off, will be liable to the workmen to 'all the benefits under any law for the time being in force as if they had not been laid-off' for the period of such illegal lay-off. In other words, such a lay-off will be non-est in the eye of law.

SUB-SECTION (9): POWER TO EXEMPT

In exceptional circumstances, the appropriate Government has been empowered to exempt an establishment from complying with the requirements of sub-s (1) and sub-s (3) for a specified period of time. The circumstances enumerated in the provision are: accident in the establishment, the death of the employer or the like. The expression 'the like' has to be construed ejusdem generis. The question of the death of the employer may arise only where the establishment is run and carried on by an individual entrepreneur. But, by and large, the establishment to which the provisions of this chapter apply are run and carried on by corporate bodies. In such cases, the question of the death of the employer would not arise.

SUB-SECTION (10): LAY-OFF COMPENSATION UNDER SECTION 25C

This provision makes it clear that where permission to commence or continue a 'lay-off' has been granted by the 'specified authority', the laid-off workman or workmen shall be entitled to lay-off compensation in terms of s 25C. In other words, the quantum of 'lay-off' compensation in cases governed by the provisions of ch VB shall also be the same as envisaged by s 25C. However, the provisions of the second proviso to s 25C will not apply to cases of 'lay-off' falling under this section.

EXPLANATION: ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT

This explanation is analogous to cl (1) of s 25E which disentitles a workman to receive compensation under s 25C, if he refuses to accept the alternative employment. This provision lays down that where after 'laying-off' a workman in his establishment, an employer offers an alternative employment, which in his opinion does not call for any special skill or previous experience and can be done by the workman, in the same establishment from which he has been 'laid-off' or in any other establishment belonging to him, situate in the same town or village, or situate within such distance from the establishment to which he belongs and the transfer will not involve undue hardship to the workman and the workman is offered the same wages for the alternative appointment which would have been normally paid to him, such workman will not be deemed to be 'laid-off'.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

[27][S. 25N. Conditions precedent to retrenchment of workmen.—

(1) No workman employed in any industrial establishment to which this Chapter applies, who has been in continuous service for not less than one year under an employer shall be retrenched by that employer until,—

(a) the workman has been given three months' notice in writing indicating the reasons for retrenchment and the period of notice has expired or the workman has been paid in lieu of such notice, wages for the period of the notice; and

(b) the prior permission of the appropriate Government or such authority as may be specified by that Government by notification in the Official Gazette (hereafter in this section referred to as the specified authority) has been obtained on an application made in this behalf.

(2) An application for permission under sub-section (1) shall be made by the employer in the prescribed manner stating clearly the reasons for the intended retrenchment and a copy of such application shall also be served simultaneously on the workmen concerned in the prescribed manner.

(3) Where an application for permission under sub-section (1) has been made, the appropriate Government or the specified authority, after making such enquiry as it thinks fit and after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, the workmen concerned and the persons interested in such retrenchment, may, having regard to the genuineness and adequacy of the reasons stated by the employer, the interests of the workmen and all other relevant factors, by order and for reasons to be recorded in writing, grant or refuse to grant such permission and a copy of such order shall be communicated to the employer and the workmen.

(4) Where an application for permission has been made under sub-section (1) and the appropriate Government or the specified authority does not communicate the order granting or refusing to grant permission to the employer within a period of sixty days from the date on which such application is made, the permission applied for shall be deemed to have been granted on the expiration of the said period of sixty days.

(5) An order of the appropriate Government or the specified authority granting or refusing to grant permission shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (6), be final and binding on all the parties concerned and shall remain in force for one year from the date of such order.

(6) The appropriate Government or the specified authority may, either on its own motion or on the application made by the employer or any workman, review its order granting or refusing to grant permission under sub-section (3) or refer the matter or, as the case may be, cause it to be referred, to a Tribunal for adjudication:

Provided that where a reference has been made to a Tribunal under this sub-section, it shall pass an award within a period of thirty days from the date of such reference.

(7) Where no application for permission under sub-section (1) is made, or where the permission for any retrenchment has been refused, such retrenchment shall be deemed to be illegal from the date on which the notice of retrenchment was given to the workman and the workman shall be entitled to all the benefits under any law for the time being in force as if no notice had been given to him.

(8) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this section, the appropriate Government may, if it is satisfied that owing to such exceptional circumstances as accident in the establishment or death of the employer or the like, it is necessary so to do, by order, direct that the provisions of subsection (1) shall not apply in relation to such establishment for such period as may be specified in the order.

(9) Where permission for retrenchment has been granted under sub-section (3) or where permission for retrenchment is deemed to be granted under sub-section (4), every workman who is employed in that establishment immediately before the date of application for permission under this section shall be entitled to receive, at the time of retrenchment, compensation which shall be equivalent to fifteen days' average pay for every completed year of continuous service or any part thereof in excess of six months.]

LEGISLATION

This section has been introduced to assure prior scrutiny of the reasons for retrenchment with a view to prevent avoidable hardship to the employees resulting from retrenchment by protecting existing employment and check the growth of unemployment which would otherwise be the consequence of retrenchment in industrial establishments employing large number of workmen. The section is also intended to maintain a higher tempo of production and productivity by preserving industrial peace and harmony. This provision gives effect to the mandate contained in the Directive Principles of the Constitution.[28]Section 25N as originally enacted was struck down by the High Courts of Madras,[29] and Rajasthan,[30]holding that the section suffered from arbitrariness and unreasonableness as neither the section nor any provision in the Act provided any guidelines as to how the application for permission by an employer for retrenchment has to be disposed of And on what grounds permission can be refused. Furthermore, there was no provision for any appeal or revision against the arbitrary order of refusal. The restrictions imposed by the section were held to be unreasonable having regard to the fact that the employer was forced to continue to employ the personnel who were found to be surplus for his requirement and this resulted in incurring unnecessary expenditure in connection with his undertaking, leading ultimately to curtailment of the margin of his profits. The Madras and Rajasthan High Courts in striking down the section mainly relied on the decision of the Supreme Court in Excel Wear and held that the reasons for which s 25-O was struck down were fully applicable for judging the validity of s 25N. On the other hand, the Andhra Pradesh High Court in IDL Chemicals, had upheld the validity of the section.[31] The present section, therefore, has been substituted by the Amending Act 49 of 1984,[32] for the old section.

The correctness of the holdings of the full bench of the Rajasthan High Court in JK Synthetics and of the Division Bench of the Madras High Court in KV Rajendran was considered by a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court in Meenakshi Mills, in which the court has upheld the validity of the section as originally enacted. It noticed that the Madras and Rajasthan High Courts had held the section to be unconstitutional on two grounds, viz: (a) no principle or guidelines have been laid down for the exercise of the power conferred by sub-s (ii) of s 25N ; and (b) there is no provision for appeal or revision against the order passed under sub-s (ii). Rejecting both these contentions, the court held that s 25N does not suffer from the vice of unconstitutionality on the grounds that it was violative of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution and was not saved by Art 19(6) of the Constitution. Thus, while upholding the constitutional validity of the section as originally enacted, the court had put the validity of the section after its enactment beyond the pale of doubt.[33]Section 25A makes the provisions of ss 25C to 25E inapplicable to industrial establishments to which ch VB applies. A priori, ss 25C to 25E would not apply to cases of lay-off falling under s 25M. In other words, though s 25C will be applicable to the cases of lay-off falling under s 25M, the provisions of its second proviso will be inapplicable to such cases of lay-off. Therefore, the retrenchment of laid-off workmen after the expiry of 45 days in terms of the second proviso to s 25C in an establishment to which ch VB applies will be illegal.[34]Section 25N(1) corresponds to s 25F, but these two provisions are mutually exclusive because the former applies only to the establishment to which ch VB applies, viz, 'industrial establishments defined in s 25L employing hundred or more workmen'. In other words, it will not apply to industrial establishments or other establishments employing less than hundred persons. On the other hand, s 25F will not apply to establishments to which s 25M applies. It will apply only to other establishments or industrial establishments employing less than hundred workmen.

SUB-SECTION (1): PRECONDITIONS TO VALID RETRENCHMENT

This section prohibits an employer from retrenching a workman who has been in 'continuous service' for one year or more in an 'industrial establishment' which employs hundred or more workmen until conditions precedent to retrenchment set out therein have been complied with. The opening part of sub-s (1) is the same as s 25F with the exception that s 25N applies only to those establishments to which ch VB applies. The employer is required, to give three months' notice in writing to the workman indicating the reasons for the retrenchment, or to pay him wages for the period of notice in lieu of the notice, by cl (a) of this sub-section. This clause corresponds to cl (a) of s 25F with the exception that this clause requires 'three months', notice or wages in lieu of that period of notice to be paid to the workman while cl (a) of s 25F requires only one month's notice or wages in lieu thereof to be given to the workman. Then cl (b) enjoins on the employer to make an application to the 'appropriate Government' or the 'specified authority' to obtain its prior permission to retrench a workman. The requirement of prior permission to retrench workmen is the foremost pre-condition of valid retrenchment. The pre-conditions to retrenchment have been placed in the section in a rather jumbled manner. The cll (a) and (b) have to be read with sub-s (9).

After deciding to retrench workmen, the first thing the employer is required by law is to make an application to obtain permission of the 'appropriate Government' or the 'specified authority', as the case may be, under this sub-section or sub-s (3). Then, he should wait till the permission is given or the period of sixty days from the date of making the application has expired when permission will be deemed to have been granted. In so far as the requirement of giving notice to the workmen is concerned, it is open to the employer to give such notice to the workmen, after taking the decision to retrench them, at any time, before or after obtaining the permission. He may even give such notice to the workmen before applying for the permission and wait for the permission. After the permission is granted, he may either retrench the workmen on the expiry of the period of three months from the date of notice or he may retrench them immediately on receipt of permission by paying them wages in lieu of unexpired period of three months from the date of service of the notice. Alternatively, the employer may give three months' notice of retrenchment to the workmen on obtaining permission to retrench and then retrench them on the expiry of the period of three months' or retrench them forthwith on obtaining the permission by paying three months' wages in lieu of the notice. Apart from giving such a notice or paying wages in lieu of the notice, the employer is also required by sub-s (9) to pay compensation to the workman proposed to be retrenched 'at the time of retrenchment'. Thus, in a case where after obtaining permission to retrench, the employer chooses not to give notice but to pay wages in lieu of such notice, the payment of such wages, the payment of retrenchment compensation and the act of the retrenchment should be simultaneous, as parts of the same transaction. These are the mandatory conditions precedent to a valid retrenchment. In other words, non-compliance of these requirements will render the retrenchment illegal and inoperative in law and the workmen shall be entitled to all the benefits which they are entitled to for the time being.[35]

In Lal Mohammed, Majumdar J held that the exception contained in the proviso to s 25O(1) in favour of undertakings set up for construction of buildings, bridges, roads, etc., has no application to a case of retrenchment falling within the ambit of s 25N, as the two provisions address different situations, the former deals with the closure of the undertaking and the latter with conditions precedent to retrenchment, and retrenchment pre-supposes the termination of surplus workmen in a going concern which is not closed down. Section 25N deals with industrial establishment while s 25-O deals with the undertaking of an industrial establishment. An industrial establishment may be a factory and its undertaking may not be. Before s 25N can be held applicable to an 'industrial establishment, the establishment itself must be found to be a 'factory' as defined by s 25L qua such an 'industrial establishment', and for deciding this question, the provisions of s 25O(1) or its proviso would not offer any assistance.[36]

SUB-SECTION (2): FORM OF THE APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION

The notice for permission for retrenchment to be given by an employer under cl (b) of sub-s (1) of s 25N of the Act is to be given in Form 'PA' prescribed by r 76A of the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules 1957. It shall be served on the Central Government or such authority as may be specified by that Government either personally or by registered post acknowledgement due and where the notice is served by registered post the date on which the same is delivered to the Central Government or the authority shall be deemed to be the date of the service of notice for the purpose of sub-s (iv) of that section. In EID Parry, a settlement was arrived at between the employer and the union agreeing to retrench upto 60 workmen but there was no provision in the settlement that the provisions of this section will not be complied with. The retrenchment, therefore, was held to be illegal for non-compliance with the requirements of this provision. Dealing with the question as to whether in view of the settlement the prior permission of the Government under this section was necessary, a single judge of the Andhra Pradesh High Court held:

> The question as to whether the settlement between the parties dispensed with the requirement of the provisions of the Act, has to be answered depending on the nature of the dispute [] and this has to be done on the facts of each case.[37]

In Voltas, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that before offering a voluntary retirement scheme, it was obligatory for the management to place necessary details before the industrial court to demonstrate as to how many employees/workers were surplus, in the absence of which, prima facie, it would appear that, in the garb of voluntary retirement scheme, attempt was being made to retrench all the workmen, if possible.[38]This decision merits some analysis.

It is rather trite for a High Court judge to say that VRS was an attempt to retrench the workmen. Of course, any VRS offered in any sector, be it public or private or even in the Government, is exclusively meant for reducing surplus labour or staff. If not for dispensing with surplus staff, in the face of restrictions imposed under ch VB of the Industrial Disputes Act, why should an employer frame and offer a VRS at all with a fat compensation running into a few lakh rupees per employee? Is it the presumption of the learned judge that employers have so much of disposable funds to be squandered by offering compensation which is exponentially higher than that payable under s 25F or s 25N ? The further observation of the learned judge (in para 38, p 549) is as follows: 'if the benefit of VRS was intended to be extended to all the workers then, in that event,prima facie it was an attempt to close down the factory without following the provisions of s 25N of the ID Act ' is not only bereft of any substance, but is also a misstatement of both fact and law. In the first place, there was no material on which the said surmise could be reasonably based, and, at any rate, it is not for a judge to go about drawing hypothetical inferences founded on wild conjectures. Secondly, 'closure of undertakings' falls, not under s 25N, as wrongly observed by the learned judge, but under s 25-O. Thus, the stay granted against VRS by the industrial court as well as the order of the learned judge upholding the said stay, are without merit. Thirdly, an employer is under no legal obligation to inform the industrial court of the number of surplus staff before offering VRS, which by implication is purely voluntary, with the initiative to opt for the scheme resting solely with employees, and not with the employer. Instances where there was no response to VRS from the employees are numerous. Fourthly, if no employee opts for VRS, then the scheme falls flat, dies it natural death for want of takers. In such an event, what records and materials should the employer furnish to the industrial court about the surplus staff, and for what ostensible purpose? And, lastly, it has to be clearly understood that there is nothing like 'retrenchment of all workmen' in industrial law, as averred by the learned judge. Retrenchment occurs only in a continuing business and not in its closure, and it pre-supposes that the employer carries on the business with the residual labour force after retrenching surplus manpower. It is not worth its while to discuss this mediocre decision any further, as it is wholly misconceived, full of grave errors, wrong on all counts and deserves to be rejected outright without a second look. In Shaw Wallace, the facts were that a workman was terminated from service but was reinstated on court orders for non-compliance with s 25F. The management subsequently terminated the workman once again after paying retrenchment compensation on grounds that the post was abolished. While the labour court dismissed the workman's claim, the industrial court in appeal ordered reinstatement with full backwages on the ground that the establishment was covered by ch V-B and that s 25N was not complied with. Kulshreshta J of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the order of the industrial court could not be interfered with, and modified it to 50 per cent backwages.[39]

SUB-SECTION (3): GRANT OR REFUSAL OF PERMISSION

The appropriate Government or the specified authority is vested with the power to grant or refuse to grant the permission to the employer to retrench the workman. But before granting or refusing to grant permission, these authorities are required to:

(i) make an inquiry into the question of retrenchment as it may think fit;

(ii) give a reasonable opportunity of being heard to—

  (a) the employer;

  (b) the workman concerned; and

  (c) all the persons interested in such retrenchment;

(iii) consider—

  (a) the genuineness and adequacy of reasons stated by the employer,

  (b) the interest of the workman, and

  (c) other relevant factors; and

(iv) pass an order granting or refusing to grant the permission.

(v) Such order should—

  (a) state in writing reasons for the decision; and

  (b) communicate such reasons to the employer as well as to the workmen.

The powers vested in the appropriate Government by this sub-section are not purely administrative but are quasi-judicial in nature. This power has to be exercised on an objective consideration of the relevant facts after affording an opportunity to the parties having interest in the matter and reasons have to be recorded in the order that is passed. In other words, this power requires the appropriate Government or the specified authority to pass a speaking order on an objective consideration of relevant facts after affording an opportunity to the parties concerned. Furthermore, in exercise of this power, the Government and the specified authority is to bear in mind the fact that the basic idea underlying the scheme of the Act is to settle industrial disputes and promote industrial peace and harmony and in particular that this section has been enacted to prevent avoidable hardship of unemployment to those already employed and maintain a higher tempo of production and productivity. This power granted to the executive instead of an industrial adjudicator, is not unconstitutional or invalid. Likewise, the delegated power conferred on the appropriate Government to specify the authority too is not unreasonable.[40] In Electro-Steel, the Calcutta High Court held that since the reasons stated by the Government in its order refusing to grant permission were not irrelevant, the order was not reviewable.[41] A similar view has been taken by the Madhya Pradesh High Court,[42] but in Mukund Iron & Steel, the Bombay High Court held that the labour commissioner who was the 'specified authority' under the section should not have given permission to retrench the workmen when on the admission of the employer, employment opportunities were in existence but they were unable to afford opportunities of work to the workmen because they were not willing to co-operate to give the agreed norms of production. It was observed if the workmen failed to co-operate and did not give agreed norms of production, they were liable to be dealt with in disciplinary action and could be removed from service for lack of co-operation. And any such lack of co-operation could not be the basis for retrenchment where no inquiry had been made and no opportunity to dispute the allegation was given.[43]

Another Division Bench of the same High Court in Maharashtra GK Union, distinguished Mukund Iron & Steel on facts. In this case, the bench upheld the order of the 'specified authority' holding that the 'dispute relating to detailed working of the company involving a scrutiny of contracts entered into by the company with third parties in the normal course of its work cannot be gone into or reopened by authorities granting permission' under this provision.[44] In Straw Products, the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that where the reasons given by the Government are not extraneous or irrelevant, the order refusing permission would not be amenable to interference in judicial review. The scope of inquiry in a writ petition is limited to seeing whether the ultimate opinion formed by the Government is vitiated on account of ignoring any relevant factor or taking into account irrelevant, extraneous or non-existent factors so as to disclose an error apparent on the face of the record. But the writ court cannot examine the correctness of the conclusions relating to the adequacy of the reasons unless the finding thereon is vitiated by an error of law apparent on the face of the record.[45] This section does not contemplate any elaborate judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry, at the stage of permission. The very scheme of the section precludes an elaborate inquiry. Sub-sections (3) and (4) are to be read together because they prescribe the manner of granting or refusing permission in response to the application made under sub-s (2), for permission to retrench the workmen. Under sub-s (2) the Government or the specified authority, as the case may be, after making such inquiry as it thinks fit, and after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, the workmen concerned and the persons interested in such retrenchment, may grant or refuse such permission. Since any grant or refusal of permission after the inquiry has to be done within a period of 60 days from the date on which the application is made, such an inquiry by its very nature cannot be an elaborate inquiry into detailed working of the company in question and assessment of its economic viability and so on. From a juxtaposition of these two provisions, it would appear that the inquiry before granting or refusing to grant permission to retrench is of a preliminary nature and presumably, it should show prima facie that the employer has a reasonable cause for retrenching the workmen in question. The order of the specified authority granting permission passed after taking into account all the relevant facts and circumstances and for fairly detailed reasons for granting permission, will not be vulnerable to judicial review.[46]Though the appropriate Government or the specified authority under this sub-section is required to act judicially while granting or refusing permission for retrenchment of workmen, it is not invested with the judicial power of the state and it cannot be regarded as a 'tribunal' within the meaning of Art 136 of the Constitution. Therefore, an appeal by special leave under Art 136 will not lie against the order passed under this sub-section, but such orders will be reviewable by the High Court in its writ jurisdiction under Art 226 of the Constitution.[47]

After applying for permission to retrench workmen, the employer has to wait till the order of the authority is received by him. In case permission is refused, he cannot retrench the workmen. If permission is granted, he can proceed with the process of retrenchment. But if the Government or the specified authority fails to communicate its order granting or refusing to grant permission to retrench, within a period of sixty days from the date of making the application, by the fiction introduced by sub-s (4), the permission applied for shall be deemed to have been granted on the expiry of the period of sixty days. Then, it will be open to the employer to proceed with the retrenching process. In OCL India, the facts were that in an application filed under s 25N, the Labour Commissioner communicated the order after the expiry of 60 days from the date of the application. The Orissa High Court quashed the order of the Labour Commissioner as not sustainable in law, and held that the permission applied for was deemed to have been granted as per the legal fiction contained in sub-section (4) of s 25N.[48] In Orissa Concrete, the facts were: The Labour Commissioner, Madhya Pradesh passed an order on 11 July 1995 holding that there was a deemed permission for retrenchment of 40 workers employed by the appellant under s 25N(4). A single judge of MP High Court held that in view of the facts and circumstances of the case, there should not have been any deemed permission under s 25N(4), which was confirmed by the Division Bench in so far as it directed the labour commissioner to pass a revised order after considering whether any permission is to be granted to the appellant for retrenching the 40 workers employed by them. During the pendency of the appeal, the labour commissioner passed a revised order declining the permission under s 25N. Before the Supreme Court, counsel for the petitioner-company submitted that the company would like to withdraw the appeal because of a change in the factual situation, but with liberty challenge the order of the labour commissioner, by which he declined to grant permission. While permitting the company to withdraw the appeal, a Bench comprising Balakrishnan and Venkarama Reddy JJ made it clear that it was not open to the company to re-agitate the question whether there should have been a deemed permission under s 25N(4).[49]

Sub-section (5): Finality of the Order

The order of the appropriate Government or of the specified authority granting or refusing to grant permission shall be final and binding on all the parties concerned and shall remain in force for one year from the date of such order but the finality of the order is subject to the provisions of sub-s (6) which provides for review or reference of the order to adjudication. In other words, if the order is not reviewed or referred for adjudication under sub-s (6), it will be final and binding on the parties. However, if in the matter of granting or refusing to grant permission to retrench, the Government or the specified authority has violated the rules of natural justice or the order is perverse or is vitiated by errors of law apparent on the face of the record, it will be reviewable by a writ court on a writ of certiorari. It is not clear as to what is the purpose of making the order to remain binding on the parties for a period of one year. Can the employer retrench workmen proposed to be retrenched at any time during the period of one year from the date of grant of permission for reasons set out in the application for permission to retrench? Alternatively, if the reasons for the retrenchment as set out in the application for retrenchment have vanished, can the employer still retrench the workman up to a period of one year from the date of grant of permission for some other reason? Likewise, where the Government or the specified authority refuses to grant permission, is the employer barred from approaching the Government or the specified authority during the period of one year to ask permission for retrenchment for any other set of reasons? In a case, where permission is refused how does the order bind the workmen for a period of one year? These are some of the questions which defy understanding about the purpose of making the order binding for a period of one year.

SUB-SECTION (6): REVIEW OR REFERENCE OF THE ORDER

The appropriate Government as well as the specified authority have been vested with the power either on their own motion or on the application of the employer or any workman, to review its order granting or refusing to grant permission under sub-s (3). Furthermore, the Government has the further discretion to refer the matter, of its own accord or at the instance of the specified authority, to an industrial tribunal for adjudication. The proviso prescribes the time limit of thirty days from the date of reference during which the tribunal should pass its award. From the use of the word 'shall', it would appear that the requirement of the proviso that the award should be made within thirty days from the date of reference, is mandatory. Furthermore, there is no power vested in the tribunal to extend the period of adjudication. Doubt arises as to whether it can be said that an award made beyond thirty days will be invalid and inoperative. From the scheme of the section, the answer should be in the negative. Though making of the award is mandatory, the requirement to make the award within thirty days appears merely to be directory. The Bombay High Court in Engineering Workers, held that the requirement of the proviso that the tribunal 'shall pass an award within a period of 30 days from the date of such reference' is merely directory and not mandatory. Hence, on the expiry of this time-limit the reference will not lapse but will survive for adjudication.[50]

In Cable Corporation, the facts disclosed that the company filed an application under s 25-N(2) seeking permission to retrench 280 workmen out of 509 workmen working at its Borivli Unit. The Specified Authority, after giving an opportunity of being heard to the company, workmen and other interested persons, partly allowed the application preferred by the company by granting permission to retrench 276 workmen on certain conditions. The unions filed applications under Section 25-N(6) for a review of the decision or to refer the matter for adjudication, which were rejected by the Government. The writ petition filed by the workmen was partly allowed by a single judge of Bombay High Court, who, inter alia, held that merely because review application is rejected, reference could not be said to be barred under Section 25-N(6) of the Act and, accordingly, directed the specified authority to refer the matter for adjudication to the Industrial Tribunal, which decision was upheld by the Division Bench. In appeal, Pasayat J (for self and Sathasivam J) reversing the said decision, observed:

A plain reading of the provision of s 25-N (6) makes the position clear that two courses are open to appropriate Govt. Power is conferred on the appropriate Government to either on its own motion or on an application made, review its order granting or refusing permission to retrench or refer the matter to the Tribunal. Whether one or the other of the courses could be adopted depends on the fact of each case, the surrounding circumstances and several other relevant factors. Once the appropriate Govt. rejects the review petition, a reference to Tribunal thereafter would not be maintainable.[51]

SUB-SECTION (7): CONSEQUENCES OF RETRENCHMENT WITHOUT PERMISSION

Any retrenchment of a workman without permission or in contravention of the order refusing permission, will be deemed to be illegal and inoperative in law ab initio. In other words, such retrenchment will be a nullity from the date on which the notice of retrenchment was given to the workman. Such retrenchment will not affect the right of the workman and he shall be entitled to' all the benefits under the law as if there was no retrenchment. Besides, the employer will be exposed to the penal consequences of s 25Q. In Hindustan Wire Products, the facts disclosed that the company was referred to the Board of Industrial and Financial Reconstruction (BIFR) due to financial constraints, and while the proceedings were pending before BIFR, the management retrenched 219 workmen without permission from the Government as required under s 25N. The Supreme Court held that, in the circumstances of the case, the workmen should be paid a sum of Rs 1 lakh each in lieu of reinstatement and backwages.[52] In Empire Industries, the employer-company, which was covered by ch-VB had, instead of making an application under s 25N for permission to retrench workmen, raised a demand to retrench workmen and asked the Government to refer the dispute so raised by it for adjudication under s 10(1). The issues passed through several vicissitudes and reached Supreme Court. Dismissing the appeal filed by the employer-company, Aftab Alam J (for self and Chauhan J) cited the decision rendered in Meenakshi Millls, and observed:

> To say, that even without following the provisions of section 25N of the Act, it is open to the employer to raise a demand for retrenchment of workmen and to ask the Government to refer the ensuing dispute to the Industrial Tribunal for adjudication, would tantamount to substituting a completely different mechanism in place of the one provided for in the Act to determine the validity and justification of the employer's request for retrenchment of workers. It is true that under section 25N the authority to grant or refuse permission for retrenchment is vested in the appropriate Government which in this case would be the State Government or the authority specified by it. Under section 10(1) too it is the State Government that would make a reference of the industrial dispute. But the two provisions are not comparable. The nature of the power of the State Government and its functions under the two provisions are completely different. In making the reference (or declining to make the reference) under section 10(1) of the Act the State Government acts in an administrative capacity whereas under section 25N(3) its power and authority are evidently quasi-judicial in nature … [Meenakshi Mills Ltd.][53]… Further, though section 25N(6) has the provision to refer the matter to the tribunal for adjudication, that provision is completely different from section 10(1). A reference under section 10(1) of the Act cannot be used to circumvent or bypass the statutory scheme provided under section 25N of the Act. This is, however, not to say that there cannot be any dispute on the subject of retrenchment that can be referred to the tribunal for adjudication. A dispute may always be raised by or on behalf of the retrenched workmen questioning the validity of their retrenchment. Similarly, the employer too can raise the dispute in case denied permission for retrenchment by the Government. [It is another matter that the chances of the disputes being referred for adjudication are quite remote: see Workmen of Meenakshi Mills Ltd., (supra) paragraphs 56 and 57]. But the point to note is that the occasion to raise the demand/dispute comes after going through the statutory provisions of section 25N of the Act.[54]

A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF THE DECISION IN MEENAKSHI MILLS

The learned judge inter alia relied mostly upon Meenakshi Mills, in the light of the fact that it was a decision by the Constitution Bench of Supreme Court, which is a landmark decision, though for all the wrong reasons. It is therefore considered expedient to deal with the said case in some detail and highlight the misconceptions of Herculean proportions that informed the judicial mind of Agarwal J and his brother judges therein. Instead of handling afresh the perplexing observations made by the learned judge in the said case, it is considered expedient to cite the relevant portion of the analysis from the book 'Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary',[55] below:

In KV Rajendran, the Madras High Court, following the decision of the Supreme Court in Excel Wear,[56] struck down ss 25N (prior permission for retrenchment) and 25Q (punishment for violation) on the ground that the restrictions imposed on the fundamental right to carry on business were unreasonable and violated Art 19(1)(f) and (g), and that no guidelines were provided as to how the applications for permission should be disposed of by the Government.[57] With special reference to sub-sec. (4) of s 25N, Ramaujan J rightly placed reliance on Dwarka Prasad, in which one of the issues was whether cl 4(3) of the UP Coal Control Order 1953, suffered from the vice of conferring arbitrary power on the licensing authority. Briefly stated, the said clause ran thus: 'The Licensing Authority may grant, refuse to grant, renew or refuse to renew a licence and may suspend, cancel, revoke of modify any licence or any terms thereof granted by him under the Order for reasons to be recorded'. Striking down the clause, Mukherjea J observed:

> …the phrase "reasonable restriction" connotes that the limitation imposed upon a person in enjoyment of a right should not be arbitrary or of an excessive nature beyond what is required in the interest of the public. Legislation, which arbitrarily or excessively invades the right, cannot be said to contain the quality of reasonableness and unless it strikes a proper balance between the freedom guaranteed under Article 19 (1) (g) and the social control permitted by clause (6) of Article 19, it must be held to be wanting in reasonableness. …No rules have been framed and no directions given on these matters to regulate or guide the discretion of the > Licensing Officer. Practically the Order commits to the unrestrained will of a single individual the power to grant, withhold or cancel licenses in any way he chooses and there is nothing in the Order which could ensure a proper execution of the power or operate as a check upon injustice that might result from improper execution of the same. …This safeguard, in our opinion, is hardly effective…[58]

Section 25N(2), as enacted in 1976, reads thus: 'On receipt of a notice under clause (c) of sub-section (1), the appropriate Government or authority may, after making such inquiry as such Government or authority thinks fit, grant or refuse, for reasons to be recorded in writing, the permission for the retrenchment.' The said provision was worded in the identical phraseology as cl 4(3) of the UP Coal Control Order, which was struck down in Dwarka Prasad. Justice Ramanujan of the Madras High Court rightly followed the above decision and held that, 'in addition to the absence of guidelines, any order passed is not subject to scrutiny by higher authority'. The learned judge further held that neither the requirement of recording reasons nor the provision for deemed permission on the expiry of two months was a sufficient safeguard against arbitrary refusal to give permission. Against this backdrop, let us examine Meenakshi Mills, in which the constitutional validity of s 25N was upheld by SC Agarwal J (for self, Verma, Jayachandra Reddy, Ray and Patnaik JJ).[59]The said decision is a conglomerate of conjectures, abstractions and paradoxes, and stands in a class by itself unmatched in the judicial history of India. It is disquieting that the five learned judges should have handled the case with no perceptible seriousness, whatsoever, much less application of judicial mind to a matter of vital importance to the industry and the economy. Further, the judgment of Agarwal J is full of prescriptive platitudes and utopian desiderata such as 'the power has to be exercised on objective considerations', etc., in a case having major constitutional implications. A few observations of the learned judge, some of them perplexing and others frightening, have been selected for analysis in some detail.

Observation - I

> 'The restriction imposed u/s 25N was in the interests of general public'. (para 26)

This is a ready-made excuse devised by some of the later phase judges for justifying an otherwise baseless and irrational decision, which cannot be defended upon any other known legal principle. If an employer has surplus labour, which cannot be gainfully absorbed, thereby pushing up labour costs and along with it the price of his product thus placing him in a 'comparative disadvantage', should he be denied the right to dispense with the surplus manpower and save the unit from a major catastrophe of complete closure and mass unemployment? Should that right be subjected to the whims of a Government Officer, who has no stake in the enterprise? At a more fundamental level, does the right to carry on business include the right to close it down, as an intrinsic part of it? If a citizen doesn't have to submit to the authority of Government while starting a business, why should he be compelled to do so while closing it down? It is one thing to say that, in the event of termination, the employer should pay adequate monetary compensation to the workmen, and quite another to suggest that he cannot exercise that right without permission from a third party. In Rustom Cavasjee (Bank Nationalisation case), a 11-judge Bench, by a majority of 10 to 1 (Ray J dissenting), struck down the whole enactment, namely, the Banking Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act 1970 on the ground that ss 4, 5 and 6 r/w Sch II, which impaired the fundamental guarantee under Art 31(2), were not severable from the rest of the Act, and observed:

> Protection of the right to property or personal freedom is most needed when there is an actual threat. To argue that State action which deprives a person permanently or temporarily of his right to property or personal freedom, operates to extinguish the right or the remedy is to reduce the guarantee to an empty platitude. Again to hold that the extent of, and the circumstances in which, the guarantee of protection is available depends upon the object of the State action, is to seriously erode its effectiveness (para 46A). …In determining the impact of State action upon constitutional guarantees which are fundamental, it follows that the extent of protection against impairment of a fundamental right is determined not by the object of Legislature nor by the form of the action, but by its direct operation upon the individuals rights. (para 56). …Where the law provides for compulsory acquisition of property for a public purpose it may be presumed that the acquisition or the law relating thereto imposes a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public. If there is no public purpose to sustain compulsory acquisition, the law violates Article 31 (2). If the acquisition is for a public purpose, substantive reasonableness of the restriction which includes deprivation may, unless otherwise established, be presumed…if a Tribunal is authorised by an Act to determine compensation for property compulsorily acquired, without hearing the owner of the property, the Act would be liable to be struck down under Article 19 (1) (f).[60] (paras 58-60)

The above decision is a landmark decision on fundamental rights. On the relevance of 'interests of the general public', the court held (para 63): 'If property is compulsorily acquired for a public purpose, and the law satisfies the requirements of Articles 31 (2) and 31 (2A), the Court may readily presume that by the acquisition a reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right to hold property is imposed in the interests of the general public.' Where the Government acquires property for a public purpose, it can be justified on the ground that the interests of private owners of property must subserve the larger interests of the general public. But what 'public interest' is involved in a situation where an employer retrenches a few workmen who were rendered surplus to his operational requirements? Could it be said that the unemployment of a few workmen affects the interests of general public; if so, in what manner and to what extent? Let us now take a look at what another Constitution Bench had to say on 'public interest' in Excel Wear, in which the Constitutional validity of ss. 25-O and 25-R was at issue. Justice Untwalia rightly observed:

> Public interest and social justice do require the protection of the labour. But is it reasonable to give them protection against all unemployment after affecting the interests of so many persons interested and connected with the management apart from the employers. Is it possible to compel the employer to manage the undertaking even when they do not find it safe and practicable to manage the affairs? Can they be asked to go on facing tremendous difficulties of management even at the risk of their person and property? Can they be compelled to go on incurring losses year after year?[61]

It is an undisputed fact that ch V-B suffers from the vice of oppressive provisions touching upon the fundamental right to carry on business, reminding of the dark ages of slavery and serfdom. This was richly exposed in Excel Wear, in which ss. 25-O and 25-R were struck down as being ultra vires the Constitution.

Observation - II

> …while exercising its powers under sub-section (2) of section 25-N in the matter of granting or refusing permission for retrenchment, the appropriate Government or the authority does not exercise powers which are purely administrative but exercises powers which are quasi-judicial in nature. (para 30) (Emphasis added).

This gives rise to the basic question: does the phraseology of s 25N(2) refer to a quasi-judicial proceeding or an administrative proceeding? There is nothing in the said sub-section to show that it is a quasi-judicial proceeding, notwithstanding the faint attempt made by the learned judge to establish that it is of quasi-judicial nature. The very theme and spirit of IDA is not to invest the labour commissioner with the power to adjudicate any dispute or matter between employer and workmen, as is discernible from s 12. Adjudication has been entrusted to Labour Courts and Tribunals. An en bloc retrenchment of surplus workmen or a permanent closing down of the undertaking is undoubtedly a situation of serious magnitude in contrast to a dispute relating to discharge or dismissal of an individual workman. If the labour commissioner has no power to impose his decision on the parties or do anything that would affect the rights of parties even in a case of individual dismissal, how could the same authority be invested, in the same breath, the power to adjudicate an application for permission to layoff and retrench his workmen or to close down the undertaking? If this is not a contradiction in the legal status of labour commissioner, what else could it be? In Corporation of Dublin, May CJ observed:

> It is established that the writ of certiorari does not lie to remove an order merely ministerial, such as a warrant, but it lies to remove and adjudicate upon the validity of acts judicial. In this connection the term 'judicial' does not necessarily mean acts of a judge or legal Tribunal sitting for the determination of matters of law, but for the purpose of this question a judicial act seems to be an act done by competent authority, upon consideration of facts and circumstances, and imposing liability or affecting the rights of others. [62]

The relevant part of s 25N(4) runs thus: 'Government or the authority may, after making such inquiry as such Government or authority thinks fit, grant or refuse.' What does the expression 'enquiry' connote? Applying the above dictum of May CJ to s 25N(2), the only issue that requires to be answered is, 'would an order passed by the Government or the authority impose a liability and/or affect the rights of others (the employer and workmen, here) or would it not?' The answer undoubtedly is: 'Yes, it does!' There is nothing in that section to enlighten the reader as to the nature or scope of enquiry contemplated therein. It prima facie implies that the power conferred on the authority is arbitrary, unilateral and uncanalised as no guidelines were prescribed for exercising the said power properly. Thus, the above observation of Agarwal J is wholly wrong on facts.

Observation - III

> In view of the time limit of three months prescribed in sub-section (3) there is need for expeditious disposal which may not be > feasible if the proceedings are conducted before a judicial officer accustomed to the judicial process. Moreover, during the course of such consideration it may become necessary to explore the steps that may have to be taken to remove the causes necessitating the proposed retrenchment which may involve interaction between the various departments of the Government. (para 39)

The above reading is not free from serious fallacies. To say that a judicial process may take a longer time than three months prescribed in sub-sec. (3) is based neither on facts nor on law. In terms of the proviso to sub-sec (2A) of s 10 of the ID Act, labour courts and tribunals are mandated to submit the award within three months, where the dispute relates to discharge, dismissal, retrenchment or termination. This legal position demolishes much of his rhetoric on the non-feasibility of expeditious disposal by a labour court as against labour commissioner. Secondly, what was the nature of 'interaction between various departments of Government' that the learned judge was visualising? In a case, where an application for retrenchment of a few workmen is pending before the labour commissioner, what kind of lateral material is needed by him from other departments such as 'revenue', 'education', 'commercial taxes', etc., before taking a decision? Is it possible to hold that any department other than 'labour' could have any meaningful part to play? What was the need for assuming so many wild possibilities in a direct, short and simple provision?

Observation - IV

> …it is not invested with the judicial power of the State and it cannot be regarded as a Tribunal within the meaning of Article 136 of the Constitution*and no appeal would, therefore, lie to this Court against an order* passed under sub-section (2) of section 25-N. (para 35)….the power that is exercised by the appropriate Government or the authority while refusing or granting permission under sub-section (2) and have found that the said power is not purely administrative in character but partakes exercise of a function which is judicial in nature. …There is need for such principles or guidelines when the discretionary power is purely administrative in character to be exercised on the subjective opinion of the authority. The same is, however, not true when the power is required to be exercised on objective considerations by a speaking order after affording the parties an opportunity to put forward their respective points of view. (para 42) (Emphasis added).

It is startling to find a battery of self-contradictory statements in a single decision of a Constitution Bench. The pendulum of interpretation kept swinging menacingly from one extreme of 'quasi-judicial' (para 30: observation-II above) to 'non-judicial' (para 35) and to 'judicial character' (para 42). Is it possible that a judge at the level of Supreme Court with decades of experience at the Bar and the Bench could display grave confusion of this magnitude as to the connotation of 'judicial' function in contradistinction to 'quasi-judicial' and 'administrative' functions? The mutually inconsistent positions taken by the learned judge at regular intervals in the same judgment throw the reader into total disarray. This decision hardly displays any clarity as to the nature and character of the different functions, which is dwelt upon at some length below. It is well settled that there is a real and substantial difference between judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings and so is the case with quasi-judicial and administrative functions. In Cooper v Wilson , it was held:

> A true judicial decision presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties, and involves four requisites: (1) The presentation (not necessarily orally) of their case by the parties to the dispute; (2) if the dispute between them is a question of fact, the ascertainment of the fact by means of evidence adduced by the parties to the dispute and often with the assistance of argument by or on behalf of the parties on the evidence; (3) if the dispute between them is a question of law, the submission of legal argument by the parties; and (4) a decision which disposes of the whole matter by a finding upon the facts in dispute and application of the law of the land to the facts so found, including where required a ruling upon any disputed question of law. A quasi-judicial decision equally presupposes an existing dispute between two or more parties, and involves (1) and (2), but does not necessarily involve (3) and never involves (4). The place of (4) is in fact taken by administrative action, the character of which is determined by the Minister's free choice.[63]

This decision was cited with approval by Supreme Court in Bharat Bank.[64] For an authoritative exposition of the expression 'quasi-judicial body', we should turn to Rex v Electricity Commissioners , wherein the Lord Atkin observed:

> Whenever any body of persons having legal authority, to determine questions affecting rights of subjects and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority, they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division exercised in these writs.[65]

Where to place the earlier observation of Agarwal, J, that the order passed u/s 25N was 'not appealable' (para 35), in the face of his subsequent observation that it is a 'judicial' function (para 42)? If it is a judicial function, could it still be held that the order passed by the authority is 'not appealable'? If this is not a grave paradox, what else is it? It is true that the judicial power of the state has not been conferred on the labour commissioner acting u/s 25N in full flow, but then the said power was not conferred on the Labour Court and Tribunal either, while acting under the said section. If an order of the Tribunal is appealable under Art 136, as was peremptorily held in Bharat Bank (supra), by what legal yardstick could it be denied to an order passed by the Labour Commissioner, more so, when there was no provision in the Act for a review of the said order?

In this connection, it is pertinent to note that the Supreme Court distinguished Indian Constitution from s. 71 of the Australian Constitution and held that, unlike Australia where judicial power can only be conferred on 'courts' properly so-called, there is no rigidity or exclusiveness involved in the Indian Constitution as it was based on a 'broad' separation of powers.[66] This position clearly predicates that, in order to exercise jurisdiction under Art 136, it is not necessary to show that the inferior Tribunal has been vested with the judicial power of the state. Even so, the point for consideration is: "does Article 136 confer an inalienable right on the aggrieved party to move a SLP or is it a discretionary power vested in SCI to interfere selectively on the prima facie appearance of circumstances of grave and substantial injustice?" In Bengal Chemicals, Subba Rao J (for self, Gajendragadkar and Sarkar JJ), brilliantly explained this particular aspect in the following words:

> Article 136 of the Constitution*does not confer a right of appeal to any party from the decision of any tribunal, but it confers a discretionary power on the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal* from the order of any tribunal in the territory of India. It is implicit in the discretionary reserve power that it cannot be exhaustively defined. It cannot obviously be so construed as to confer a right to a party where he has none under the law. The Industrial Disputes Act is intended to be a self-contained one and it seeks to achieve social justice on the basis of collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration. Awards are given on circumstances peculiar to each dispute and the tribunals are, to a large extent, free from the restrictions of technical considerations imposed on courts….The limits to the exercise of the power under Article 136 cannot be made to depend upon the appellant obtaining the special leave of this Court, for, two reasons, viz: (i) at that stage the Court may not be in full possession of all material circumstances to make up its mind; and (ii) the order is only an ex parte one… The same principle should, therefore, be applied in exercising the power of interference with the awards of tribunals irrespective of the fact that the question arises at the time of granting special leave or at the time the appeal is disposed of. It would be illogical to apply two different standards at two different stages of the same case.[67] (Italics supplied)

Reverting to the distinction between quasi-judicial and administrative functions, if it were to be held that the authority performs a purely administrative function, there can be no escape from the conclusion that the provision had to be struck down on the ground that the power conferred on the authority is arbitrary, uncanalised and bereft of guidelines. In AK Kraipak, which is an authority on the issue, Hegde J observed:

> The dividing line between an administrative power and a quasi-judicial power is quite thin and is being gradually obliterated. For determining whether a power is an administrative power or a quasi-judicial power, one has to look to the nature of the power conferred, the person or persons on whom it is conferred, the framework of the law conferring that power, the consequences ensuing from the exercise of that power and the manner in which that power is expected to be exercised… The concept of rule of law would lose its validity if the instrumentalities of the State are not charged with the duty of discharging their functions in a fair and just manner. The requirement of acting judicially in essence is nothing but a requirement to act justly and fairly and not arbitrarily or capriciously. The procedures which are considered inherent in the exercise of a judicial power are merely those which facilitate if not ensure a just and fair decision.[68] (Italics supplied)

To sum up, Hegde J identified five criteria to determine whether the power conferred was quasi-judicial or merely administrative, as indicated below:

(i) the nature of the power;

(ii) the person on whom it is conferred;

(iii) the legal framework under which the power is conferred;

(iv) the consequences arising from the exercise of the power; and

(v) the manner in which the power is expected to be exercised.

Notwithstanding the fact that the line of demarcation between administrative and quasi-judicial power is thin and is on the verge of getting completely obliterated, it is not in dispute that the distinction is real and substantial in so far as the process and the procedure prescribed for exercising the said powers. What was the statutory basis for Agarwal J to hold: 'the power is required to be exercised on objective considerations by a speaking order after affording the parties an opportunity'? In the first place, is there anything in s. 25N which requires the authority to give an opportunity to the parties, let alone the need for passing a 'speaking order'? If the section itself is silent about affording an 'opportunity', can a judge re-write the provision by supplying the omission? Secondly, assuming that it were there, does the mere fact of affording an opportunity per se lead to the inference that the decision of the authority would be 'objective'? In the light of the further observation of Agarwal J to the effect that the order passed u/s 25N was not appealable, what recourse is available to the employer, if the labour commissioner passes a subjective, arbitrary and tyrannical order? To put it briefly, the entire judgment running into more than 30 pages in cold print is full of inconsistent and mutually contradictory positions taken by the learned judge. Lastly, what is the distinction between (i) discretionary administrative power which can be exercised on subjective satisfaction; and (ii) a power, which has to be exercised objectively by a speaking order, after affording opportunity to the parties? With the exception of a few provisions relating to 'preventive detention', 'maintenance of internal security' and certain others falling under 'land acquisition', can the learned judge cite at least one statute, which has manifestly granted unbridled license to an authority performing a 'public duty' of the kind contemplated u/s 25N, to decide matters on purely 'subjective' opinion?

I would like to cite two decisions relating to preventive detention and land acquisition. In Khudiram, it was held that the subjective satisfaction of the detaining authority was not wholly immune from judicial reviewability. The court could certainly require the detaining authority to produce and make available to the court the entire record of the case which was before it.[69] Justice Bhagwati supportively cited the observation of Lord Halsbury to the effect: 'when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities, that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion; according to law and not humour. It is to be, not arbitrary, vague, fanciful, but legal and regular.'[70] In Khusaldas Advani, interpreting s 3 of Bombay Land Requisition Ordinance 1947, which was in terms: "If in the opinion of the Provincial Government, it is necessary or expedient to do so, the Provincial Government may, by order in writing, requisition any land for any public purpose", Kania CJI (for self, Fazl Ali, Sastri and Das JJ; Mahajan and Mukherjea JJ dissenting), observed that the words of the said section did not import into the decision of public purpose the judicial element required to make the decision judicial or quasi-judicial, and held that the decision of the Provincial Government about public purpose was an administrative act and no application for a writ of certiorari would lie.[71]

A few landmark decisions touching upon the limit imposed on the discretionary power of administrative nature are cited below. In Hamdard, s 3(d) of the Drugs and Magic Remedies (Objectionable Advertisements) Act 1954, which gave power to the Central Government to add to the diseases falling within the mischief of s 3, was struck down on the ground that it conferred uncanalised power to include any disease it thought fit.[72] In Ramesh Birch, it was held that the power of Parliament to entrust legislative powers to some other body or authority is not unbridled and absolute. It must lay down essential legislative policy and indicate the guidelines to be kept in view by that authority in exercising the delegated powers. In delegating such powers, Parliament cannot 'abdicate' its legislative functions in favour of such authority.[73] In Chandrakant Saha, while dealing with the constitutional validity of ss 5 & 6 of the Rice Milling Industry (Regulation) Act 1958, 'discretionary power' was clearly distinguished from 'mandatory power' which is in the nature of a duty imposed. Justice Fazl Ali (for self, Chandrachud CJI, Bhagwati, Singhal and Desai JJ), held that the statute did not leave any discretion in the licensing officer to grant or refuse to grant a license. He had a mandatory duty to perform and, therefore, there was no question of the licensing officer having been conferred unrestricted or uncanalised powers under the Act.[74]

While striking down s 12A of HP General Sales Tax Act 1968, Rajendra Babu J held that arbitrary and uncanalised powers were conferred on the concerned person to deduct up to four percent from the sum payable to the works contractor, irrespective of whether the transaction is ultimately liable for payment of any sales tax at all.[75] In striking contrast, it was rightly held in CP Sarathy that the power conferred on the Government u/s 10 of IDA was absolute and discretionary in so far as the factual existence of a dispute and the expediency of making a reference are matters entirely for the Government to decide upon, and it would not be competent for the court to hold the reference bad for want of jurisdiction merely because there was, in its opinion, no material before the Government.[76] In this regard, it should be noted that, while making the reference of a dispute for adjudication, the Government would be acting merely as a forwarding agency and does not adjudicate the dispute itself, and, therefore, such reference does not per se affect the rights of parties. The above discussion is sufficient to expose the uneasy wavering and lack of conviction on the part of Agarwal J on almost every aspect covering - quasi-judicial vs. judicial power, administrative vs. quasi-judicial power, subjective opinion vs. objective decision, speaking order vs. silent order, appealability vs. non-appealability - and so forth.

Observation - V

> We are also unable to agree with the submission that the requirement of passing a speaking order containing reasons as laid down in sub-section (2) of section 25N does not provide sufficient safe-guard against arbitrary action. (para 49)

Justice Agarwal cited his own decision in SN Mukherjee, in support of the proposition that "irrespective of the fact whether the decision was subject to appeal, revision or judicial review, the recording of reasons by an administrative authority by itself serves a salutary purpose; viz., it excludes chances of arbitrariness and ensures a degree of fairness in the process of decision making".[77] It should be noted by the judicial fraternity that, in SN Mukherjee, neither counsel nor the learned judge referred to the ratio of Dwarka Prasad,[78] which squarely covered the issues raised therein. In Dwarka Prasad, it was clearly held (para 8) that a provision, which had otherwise conferred arbitrary power on the Executive without prescribing any guidelines, could not be resuscitated and sustained by taking a softer view that it 'requires the authority to record reasons' for the order. Reverting to SN Mukherjee, the facts disclosed that it was a case of dismissal of the petitioner (an Army officer) after holding court martial. While confirming his dismissal, the Chief of the Army Staff did not record reasons, nor did the Government do so while disposing of the post-confirmation appeal made by the petitioner. What is the relevance of the said case to the issues raised in Meenakshi Mills? The various authorities discussed in this section (supra and infra) expose the hollowness of the reasoning advanced by Agarwal J, and reinstate the legal position that the mere requirement of passing a speaking order does not by itself, without anything more, breathe ex-post facto life into an otherwise uncanalised power conferred on the executive de hors any intelligible guidelines for its exercise.

Observation - VI

> We are unable to accept this contention of Shri Nariman for the reason that the principles aforementioned governing retrenchment were laid down by this Court at a time when retrenchment, as defined in Section 2(oo) of the Act, was confined to mean discharge of surplus labour or staff. There has been a change in the law relating to retrenchment since the decision of this Court in State Bank of India v. N. Sundara Money ,[79]…In view of these decisions, it cannot be said that retrenchment means termination by the employer of the service of a workman as surplus labour… (para 32) (Emphasis added)

This observation is no less formidable, if not frightening, as Agarwal J failed to notice two fundamental issues involved, i.e., (i) the general right of the employer to reorganise his business, which may or may not involve, as an accessory thereto, the right or the need to retrench; and (ii) the true meaning and scope of the expression 'retrenchment' as defined in s. 2(oo) r/w ss 25F, 25G, 25H, 25N and so forth. With utmost respect, the learned judge seems to have confused himself with several cases, provisions and propositions for no perceptible reason or warrant. The three cases cited by counsel and dealt with by Agarwal J, namely, Macropollo,[80]Subong,[81] and Parry,[82] which have already been discussed in the preceding paragraphs, confined to the question of the general right of employer to reorganise his business, and have nothing to do with the definition or concept of retrenchment. It is an undisputed fact that both Macropollo (Venkatarama Ayyar, Gajendragadkar and Sarkar JJ) and Parry (Shelat, Bhargava and Vaidialingam JJ) were decided by three-judge Benches, whereas Subong was decided by a two-judge Bench (Gajendragadkar and Das Gupta JJ). Secondly, the interpretation of the definition of 'retrenchment' in s. 2(oo) was not in issue in any of the above cases. While referring to the above cases, Agarwal J proceeded to observe that in view of the subsequent decision in Sundarmoney et al, the law laid down in the above cases should be treated as no longer a good law on the connotation of retrenchment. This is a manifest mis-statement of fact and law apart from being an atrocious observation, as he merely mentioned the three decisions cited by counsel without apparently going through any of them including Sundaramony, on which he relied heavily. Thirdly, in Sundaramony, neither counsel nor Iyer J did cite any of the afore-said three cases. Fourthly, for any meaningful analysis on the concept of retrenchment, one has to look elsewhere, and none of the three cases is of any help. Assuming for the sake of argument that the meaning of 'retrenchment' underwent a change overnight after Sundaramony, could it be said that a three-judge bench in Sundaramony (Chandrachud, Iyer, and Gupta JJ) could overrule sub silentio, two earlier decisions of co-ordinate benches to the contrary, without being held guilty of judicial indiscipline? Lastly, what is the truth value of the proposition (para 32) that, in view of Sundaramony, the said three cases (Macropollo, Subong and Parry) no longer hold good, in view of the fact that those cases had nothing whatsoever to do with the concept or definition of retrenchment? If this is not an observation made by Agarwal J rather recklessly and blindfold, what else could it be?

I now propose to deal with the second aspect, i.e., the definition of retrenchment. For any meaningful discussion on the concept of 'retrenchment' as defined in s 2(oo) of ID Act, one has to invariably refer—not to Macropollo, Subong and Parry—but to Hariprasad,[83]Barsi Light Railway,[84]Pipraich,[85] and Anakapalle.[86] In Sundaramony, again, neither counsel nor Iyer J did refer to any of the aforesaid four decisions, without which no discussion on the definition of retrenchment could be said to be either complete or valid, much less meaningful. In addition, Iyer J went about in his neo-radical, creative style and gave a wild interpretation to 'retrenchment' as meaning 'termination howsoever produced' and held that it includes 'both transitive and intransitive senses' - a ghastly interpretation in the face of a phrase, which stipulates that retrenchment means 'termination by the employer', which cannot admittedly include 'intransitive sense.' For all these reasons, Sundaramony is manifestly perverse, baseless and per incuriam, with no binding force on any Bench of Supreme Court or any court at any level. The sole fact that a few later judges endorsed it by putting on blinkers cannot clothe Sundaramony with binding authority. Further, Hariprasad, Barsi Light Railway and Anakapalle were decided by Constitution Benches and Pipraich by a four-judge bench, which means all of them are binding on subsequent benches of five or less number of judges. Thus, Sundaramony, which was decided by a three-judge bench, was as much bound by those decisions. This aspect has been analysed at some length elsewhere. This discussion is adequate to establish the gravity of misconceptions that beset the judicial mind of Agarwal J.

Observation - VII

> Absence of a provision for appeal or revision against an order under sub-section (2) is not of much consequence especially when it is open to an aggrieved party to invoke the jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 226 (para 55). …An employer proposing retrenchment of workmen who feels aggrieved by an order refusing permission for retrenchment under sub-section (2) of section 25N can also move for reference of such a dispute relating to retrenchment u/s. 10 of the Act. It is permissible for both the workmen and the employer to raise an industrial dispute. In both the cases, the possibility of a reference by the appropriate Government would be remote. Hence both the workmen and the employer are treated alike and there is no discrimination. (para 57) (Emphasis added)

To say the least, this is an outrageous observation made by no less a person than a Supreme Court Judge, who was speaking for a Constitution Bench of five judges! The availability of a remedy in litigation extending up to the highest court is not something unique to s 25N (2) exclusively. An award passed by a Labour Court or Tribunal is as much challengeable under Art 226, notwithstanding s 17(2) which confers absolute finality on it. It is not so much the power of judicial review that was at issue as the very competence of labour commissioner to adjudicate or, for that matter, to perform an administrative function of a public duty character, with no guidelines prescribed therefor. The learned judge stopped with the observation 'it is permissible for both the workmen and the employer to raise an industrial dispute', and did not thankfully give expression to the other possibility of 'resorting to a strike or declaring a lockout.' With great respect, his argument (para 57) that 'there is no discrimination, etc.,' exposes itself to public ridicule, as it predicates that the 'indifference, lethargy and inaction of Government in not making a reference, and the consequent denial of a right to both the parties in an equal measure', is the sole touchstone on which the Right to Equality enshrined in Art 14 is tested! Is it possible to envisage a terrible situation in which a responsible Judge of Supreme Court travels to the length of making such a macabre statement in his judgment?

Observation - VIII

The expression 'interests of workers'…covers the interests of all the workers…not only the workers who are proposed to be retrenched but also the workers who are to be retained. It would be in the interests of the workers as a whole that the industrial establishment in which they are employed continues to run in good health because sickness leading to closure of the establishment would result in unemployment for all of them. …We are, therefore, unable to accede to the contention of Shri Nariman that sub-section (2) of section 25N by enabling the appropriate Government or authority to take into consideration the condition of employment in the industry or the condition of employment in the State imposes an unreasonable restriction on the right of the employer under Article 19(1)(g). (para 48)

Does the observation - interest of workers means the interest of all workers including those proposed to be retrenched and those retained - make any sense even to a man-in-the-street, let alone a lawyer, jurist or a student of law? In a case, where permission to retrench has been granted, could it be said that such permission is in the interest of the very workmen who are proposed to be retrenched? If, on the contrary, where permission has been refused and the employer is forced to carry excess manpower paying idle wages resulting in industrial sickness and eventual closure, could it be said that such closure is 'in the interest of the residual workers'? Is it possible, by any stretch of imagination, to reconcile the interests of workers to be retrenched, with those to be retained? That is the extent to which fallacies of Himalayan proportions made their way into the reasoning process of Agarwal J! Adverting to the unreasonability of the restriction canvassed by counsel, a glance at a few earlier decisions may throw useful light on the subject. The concept of 'reasonableness' and the manner of handling it in a judicial decision were lucidly explained by Sastri CJI in VG Row, wherein the learned Chief Justice observed:

> It is important in this context to bear in mind that the test of reasonableness, wherever prescribed, should be applied to each individual statute impugned, and no abstract standard, or general pattern reasonableness can be laid down as applicable to all cases. The nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions imposed, the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, should all enter > into the judicial verdict.[87]

A case in point is that of Jagannath Ramanuj Das, in which ss 38 & 39 of Orissa Hindu Religious Endowments Act 1939 were held invalid on the ground that they imposed an unreasonable restriction on the right of the Head of the Math as they provided for settling of a scheme in regard to a religious institution by an executive officer without the intervention of any judicial Tribunal.[88]

Observation - IX

> The matter now stands concluded by the decision of the Constitution Bench of this Court in Punjab Land Development and Reclamation Corporation Ltd.[89] (para 32)

This is yet another blatant mis-statement made by the learned judge qua judge, in so far as it does not reflect the true legal position relating to Judicial Discipline or Judicial Precedent. Punjab LDRC was decided by a Constitution Bench and, being a co-ordinate Bench, was very much bound by the decision given by an earlier Constitution Bench, until overruled by a larger Bench or amended by the legislature. And all the cases starting from Hariprasad to Anakapalle were decided by Constitution Benches (except Pipraich, decided by a four-judge Bench) and, accordingly, they were very much binding on Punjab LDRC. It is a well settled law that if the subsequent bench of same number of judges is of the opinion that the earlier bench did not lay down correct law, the only course available to it is to lay the papers before the CJI for constituting a larger bench and get the matter examined all over. In no case, can it proceed to overrule either overtly or sub-silentio the earlier decision of a coordinate bench. If it does not choose to get it referred to a larger bench, then it has to abide by the earlier decision, even if the earlier decision was patently wrong. That is the sum and substance of the principle of stare decisis. In the face of this settled legal position, could it be said that Punjab LDRC has any binding force on any subsequent Bench of Supreme Court or on any lower court? In the light of a clumsy crop of decisions showered from Sundaramony to Punjab LDRC, in manifest violation of all canons of judicial propriety, decorum, decency and discipline, the present legal position with regard to the definition of retrenchment in s 2 (oo) can be stated thus: If a subsequent Bench of Supreme Court or a High Court is confronted with the issue, "what is the true meaning of retrenchment", it would be absolutely free to follow either Hariprasad-Anakapalle or Punjab LDRC, even though there is a direct clash between the two renditions!

With great respect for the five learned judges who were members of the Bench, it is submitted that the decision in Meenakshi Mills was plagued by (i) perplexing statements, (ii) conceptual confusion, (iii) misconstrued provisions, (iv) outrageous observations, (v) misquoted decisions, (vi) misplaced comparison, (vii) misinterpretation of law, (viii) hysterical approbation and reprobation, (ix) sub-standard reasoning, and (x) fatal infirmities of rudimentary nature, and is manifestly and undoubtedly wrong. By no standard of judicial process can this rendition - coming as it were from a Constitution Bench - be elevated to the status of a 'judicial decision' properly so-called! In striking contrast, the decision of Ramanujan J in KV Rajendran is consistent with settled legal principles, which distinguish adjudicatory and administrative powers as well as the reasonability or otherwise of the restrictions imposed on the Fundamental Right guaranteed under Art 19(1)(g), and is right. I have shed more ink on this mediocre and insipid decision than what it really deserves, and there is no need to extend it to the rest of the text. Meenakshi Mills was wrongly decided on every count without exception, and needs review by a larger Bench, and comprehensively overruled, if for nothing else, to uphold the reputation and standing of the Supreme Court.[90] The reliance placed by Aftab Alam J in Empire Industries (supra) on the Constitution Bench decision in Meenakshi Mills is understandable and deserves full sympathy of legal fraternity from the standpoint of judicial discipline, which, on the principle of stare decisis, mandates that a coordinate or subordinate Bench has to invariably follow the decision of a larger Bench, regardless of the fact that the latter is patently misconceived and blatantly wrong.

SUB-SECTION (8): POWER TO EXEMPT

In exceptional circumstances, such as accident in an establishment or the death of the employer or the like, the appropriate Government has been given the power to exempt such establishment from the provisions of sub-s (1) for a specified period, if it thinks it necessary to do so. This sub-section commences with a non obstante clause and carves out an exception to sub-s (1). The words 'the like' are to be construed ejusdem generis with the preceding contingencies. Normally, the death of the employer is relevant only where the establishment is carried on by an individual entrepreneur. But, by and large, large scale establishments are carried on by corporate bodies and are rarely carried on by individual employers. Therefore, in cases of establishments carried on by corporate bodies, the exemption under this sub-section may be granted if there is an accident or a natural disaster etc.

SUB-SECTION (9): COMPENSATION FOR RETRENCHMENT

This provision quantifies the amount of compensation payable to a workman at the time of his retrenchment at the rate of fifteen days' average pay of every completed year of continuous service or part thereof in excess of six months. The payment of this compensation to be made at the time of retrenchment, is also a pre-condition to a valid retrenchment. [The provisions of this sub-section corresponds to the provisions of cl (b) of s 25F. Notes and comments under s 25F(b)].

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

[91][S. 25-O. Procedure for closing down an undertaking.—

(1) An employer who intends to close down an undertaking of an industrial establishment to which this Chapter applies shall, in the prescribed manner, apply, for prior permission at least ninety days before the date on which the intended closure is to become effective, to the appropriate Government, stating clearly the reasons for the intended closure of the undertaking and a copy of such application shall also be served simultaneously on the representatives of the workmen in the prescribed manner:

Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall apply to an undertaking set up for the construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, dams or for other construction work.

(2) Where an application for permission has been made under sub-section (1), the appropriate Government, after making such enquiry as it thinks fit and after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, the workmen and the persons interested in such closure may, having regard to the genuineness and adequacy of the reasons stated by the employer, the interests of the general public and all other relevant factors, by order and for reasons to be recorded in writing, grant or refused to grant such permission and a copy of such order shall be communicated to the employer and the workmen.

(3) Where an application has been made under sub-section (1) and the appropriate Government does not communicate the order granting or refusing to grant permission to the employer within a period of sixty days from the date on which such application is made, the permission applied for shall be deemed to have been granted on the expiration of the said period of sixty days.

(4) An order of the appropriate Government granting or refusing to grant permission shall, subject to the provisions of sub-section (5), be final and binding on all the parties and shall remain in force for one year from the date of such order.

(5) The appropriate Government may, either on its own motion or on the application made by the employer or any workman, review its order granting or refusing to grant permission under sub-section (2) or refer the matter to a Tribunal for adjudication:

Provided that where a reference has been made to a Tribunal under this sub-section, it shall pass an award within a period of thirty days from the date of such reference.

(6) Where no application for permission under sub-section (1) is made within the period specified therein, or where the permission for closure has been refused, the closure of the undertaking shall be deemed to be illegal from the date of closure and the workmen shall be entitled to all the benefits under any law for the time being in force as if the undertaking had not been closed down.

(7) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this section, the appropriate Government may, if it is satisfied that owing to such exceptional circumstances as accident in the undertaking or death of the employer or the like it is necessary so to do, by order, direct that the provisions of sub-section (1) shall not apply in relation to such undertaking for such period as may be specified in the order.

(8) Where an undertaking is permitted to be closed down under sub-section (2) or where permission for closure is deemed to be granted under sub-section (3), every workman who is employed in that undertaking immediately before the date of application for permission under this section, shall be entitled to receive compensation which shall be equivalent to fifteen days' average pay for every completed year of continuous service or any part thereof in excess of six months.]

CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY

The original 25-O was enacted as a part of ch VB by the Amending Act 32 of 1976,[92] but it was struck down by the Supreme Court in Excel wear,[93] being violative of the fundamental right to carry on business guaranteed by Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution of India. The court discountenanced both the extreme contentions put forward by the parties as to the nature of the right to dose down business. It rejected the contention of the employer that the right to dose down a business was at par with the right not to start a business at all. Equally emphatically, the court rejected the rival contention of the workmen that the right to close down a business is not an integral part of the right to carry on business but it was merely a right appurtenant to the ownership of the property or that it was not a fundamental right at all. On examination of the nature of the restrictions imposed on the fundamental right of the employer, the court held that the section was violative of the fundamental right of the employer to close down the business on the ground that it suffered from the vice of excessive and unreasonable restriction in not permitting him to close down his business which is essentially an interference with the fundamental right to carry on business. It was observed that all the comprehensive and detailed information given in the application Form is of no avail to the employer if the law permits the authority to pass a 'cryptic, capricious, whimsical and one-side order.' The present section has been enacted by the Amending Act 46 of 1982,[94] purporting to remove the vices from which the pervious provision suffered.

The question as to whether the section so far, it empowers the 'appropriate Government' to force an unwilling employer to carry on his business by refusing to grant permission to close down his undertaking, does not infringe the Fundamental Rights guaranteed by Arts 14 and 19(1)(g), still remains unresolved. This question has not been answered either in Hathising or in Excel Wear case. The question is debatable. In a case where the employer is left with no funds at all to carry on the business and the Government refuses to grant permission to him for closing the undertaking, the statutory remedy available to him is to apply for having the matter referred for adjudication under sub-s (5). This is the commencing point of the litigation which may pass through the stages of writ petitions under Art 226 and appeals to the Supreme Court by special leave under Art 136 of the Constitution. In the meanwhile, the employer is forced to carry on his business albeit the complete lack of financial resources with him. Insofar as this section empowers the Government to refuse permission to the employer even on compliance with the requirements of the provisions of this section, appears to be arbitrary and violative of the guarantees of Arts 14 and 19(1)(g) of the Constitution. Likewise, where the consequences of continuing the business may be disastrous on account of the acrimonious relations between the employer and the workers or for some other reasons, to force the employer to continue to carry on his business by refusing to grant permission to close down, is an arbitrary and unreasonable restriction on his fundamental right to carry on business guaranteed by Art 19(1)(g). The tragedy resulting from the refusal of the Government to grant permission to Union Carbide Company to close down its undertaking at Bhopal is in the point. The consequences are too well-known to be stated. It is significant to note that the power to deal with 'closure' matters under the section is vested only with the appropriate Government unlike ss 25M & 25N where in addition to the 'appropriate Government', the powers to deal with 'lay-off' and 'retrenchment' cases is vested with the 'specified authority' as well. In Stumpp Scheule, Rama Jois J, while striking down s 25-O, in its amended form too as being violative of Fundamental Right guaranteed under Art 19(1)(g), and hence ultra vires the Constitution, observed:

> Section 25-O does not specify the conditions, which, if fulfilled, permission would be granted. On the other hand, securing of permission of the Government, which is not within the hands of the owner, itself is a condition to be complied with for exercising the right of closure. To put it in a nutshell, the section is not in the nature of a fetter on the exercise of the right, but a provision which empowers the Government to put a shutter on the exercise of the right, irrespective of the fact that the reasons to close down the industry are valid and may be even beyond the control of the employer. [1]

In Molins, while striking down the amended sections 25-O and 25 R as being ultra vires of the Constitution, Babulal Jain J of the Calcutta High Court observed:

> A law which compels an employer to run the industry cannot be regarded as reasonable and in some cases it might become tyrannical…This will introduce another form of slavery and would amount to an unreasonable restriction on the fundamental right guaranteed by Art. 19(1)(g) of the Constitution of India …How can the employer be asked, in the form of restrictions, to continue to run his business even at the risk of it collapsing, financially and/or physically, and be forced to face extinction.[2]

In Associated Cement Companies, the Gujarat HC quashed both the order of the labour commissioner and the award of the tribunal, and held:

> A right to close down a business being an integral part of the fundamental right to carry on business, the words 'genuine and adequate' must have that meaning which is consistent with the nature of that right…it is not the function of the state Government or the tribunal…to decide whether an employer has managed his undertaking properly or not, or so to advise him as to what he should have done…Merely because the employer has not managed his undertaking properly, it cannot be made a ground for refusing permission to close down his undertaking.[3]

In DCM, a Full Bench of the Delhi HC, while quashing the order of the Lt Governor and directing him to grant the permission prayed for (to close down the unit) within seven days from the date of the judgment, observed:

> The law is well settled that if the action or decision is perverse or is such that no reasonable body of persons, properly informed, could come to or has been arrived at by the authority misdirecting itself by adopting a wrong approach, or has been influenced by irrelevant or extraneous matters, the Court would be justified in interfering with the same.[4]

In Jay Engineering Works, where the labour commissioner refused permission to close down, the said order was quashed by the Calcutta High Court. The court found that the order was not only defective for not recording the reasons for refusal, but it also gave truncated and segregated hearings to the parties. It was further found that the workmen were heard behind the back of the employer, and that the employer did not have any opportunity of refuting the contentions of the workmen.[5]

The constitutional validity of the amended s 25-O finally came up before a Constitution Bench in Orissa Textile. Variava J (for self, Bharucha CJI, Quadri, Hegde and Patil JJ), following the ratio of Meenakshi Mills,[6] held that the section was not violative of the fundamental rights guaranteed under Art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution, and further observed:

> The making of an enquiry, the affording of an opportunity to the employer, the workmen and all interested persons and the necessity to pass a written order containing reasons envisages the exercise of functions which are not purely of an administrative character but quasi-judicial in nature. As held in Meenakshi Mills' case the words 'the appropriate Government, after making such enquiry as it thinks fit' does not mean that the Government may dispense with the enquiry at its discretion. These words only mean that the Government has discretion about the nature of the enquiry it is to make. ()…The sub-section provides that the order of the appropriate Government shall remain in force for one year from the date of such order...In our view if the reasons were genuine and adequate, the very fact that they have persisted for a year more is sufficient to necessitate a fresh look. Also if the reasons have persisted for a year, it can hardly be said that they are the same. The difficulties faced during the year, provided they are genuine and adequate, would by themselves be additional grounds. Also by the end of the year the interest of the general public or the other relevant factors, which necessitated refusal of permission on the earlier occasion, may not prevail. ()…We must also take a note of sub-section (7) of Amended section 25-O which provides that if there are exceptional circumstances or accident in the undertaking or death of the employer or the like, the appropriate Government could direct that provision of sub-section (1) would not apply to such an undertaking…It must however be clarified that this Court is not laying down that some difficulty or financial hardship in running the establishment would be sufficient. The employer must show that it had become impossible to continue to run the establishment. Looked at from this point of view, in our view, the restrictions imposed are reasonable and in the interest of general public. ()…The observation relied on, in Excel Wear's case, are (sic.) in the context of An order under section 25-O (as it then stood), based on subjective satisfaction and capable of being arbitrary and whimsical below the amended section 25-O for an enquiry after affording an opportunity of being heard and provides that the order has to be a reasoned order in writing. The order cannot be passed arbitrarily and whimsically. Now the appropriate Government is exercising quasi-judicial functions. Thus the principles laid down in Meenakshi Mills' case would now apply. ()… In our view, the phrase 'in the interest of the general public' is the phrase of a definite connotation and a known concept. This phrase, as used in amended section 25-O, has been bodily lifted from Article 19(6) of the Constitution of India. As stated in Maneka Gandhi's case,[7] if it is not vague in the Constitution, one fails to see how it becomes vague when it is incorporated in amended section 25-O.[8] ().

With great respect, this is the second case in a row, which was dealt with by another five-judge Bench in an absolutely reckless and perfunctory manner. Meenakshi Mills, on which Variava J based his decision, itself suffers from a battery of infirmities of fatal dimensions, as highlighted extensively in the preceding paragraphs. A few observations of the learned judge have been identified for analysis here, if for nothing else, to expose the colossal fall in judicial standards, not to speak of the casual approach of apex court to a matter having far-reaching Constitutional implications. It is considered expedient to cite the following analysis from the book "Industrial Jurisprudence: A Critical Commentary" on the quality of judicial decision-making process.[9]

While stuffing his judgment with such platitudes as 'the very fact that the difficulties have persisted for a year more is sufficient to necessitate a fresh look', what Variava J failed to notice is the fact that the said provision forces an employer, who has no financial capacity, to go on paying wages to the workmen for a whole year during which the refusal order of the government remains in force. That, in the final analysis, is the essence of the verdict given by a Constitution Bench of the Supreme Court, while playing its enviable role as the supreme custodian of the Constitution! The reliance placed by Variava J on Maneka Gandhi in support of his doctrine 'interest of general public', is wholly misconceived. In the first place, Maneka Gandhi cannot be taken as a judicial or even a judicious yardstick as regards fundamental rights or administrative action. The facts of the said case disclosed, as admitted by all the judges who delivered separate judgments, that the Passport Officer acted in an arbitrary, unjust and unreasonable manner in impounding the passport of the petitioner, that he did not give her an opportunity of being heard, and on that count, the said order was prima facie invalid as it offended Art 19(1). Justice Bhagwati, with whom the majority concurred, had committed a basic error of fatal dimensions in so far as he went about infusing irrelevant philosophy into the reasoning process to justify his lop-sided conclusion on the only ground that the Attorney General, while admitting the arbitrariness of passport authorities, gave an assurance to the court that the said defect would be cured by giving the petitioner an opportunity of being heard. Under what legal principle could an order, which was as good as dead ab initio for all constitutional purposes, be resuscitated by the Court on the basis of an ex post-facto assurance given rather apologetically by the Attorney General? The concurring judgment of Iyer J was loaded with rhetoric, while that of Chandrachud J was paradoxical. The following passage (para 35) betrays his total lack of conviction:

> …the findings arrived at by my learned brethren…indicate that it cannot be said that a good enough reason has been shown to exist for impounding the passport of the petitioner…the petitioner has had no opportunity of showing that the ground for impounding it finally given in this Court either does not exist or has no bearing on public interest or that public interest cannot be better served in some other manner. …I would quash the order and direct the opposite parties to give an opportunity to the petitioner to show cause against any proposed action on such grounds as may be available." (Italics supplied).

The above observation needs some analysis. It was not a case of certiorari, where the superior court in some cases, after quashing the order passed by lower court, states the correct legal principle and remands the matter to the latter for re-consideration. Admittedly, it was a case of patent arbitrariness displayed by an administrative authority, which violated the principle of audi alteram partem, as acknowledged by the learned judges themselves. In other words, the order so passed arbitrarily is stillborn and is non est for all purposes. That being the position, what sense does it make to quash the order and, at the same time, direct the opposite party to give opportunity to the petitioner? Once the order is quashed by the court, the transaction is complete and nothing more is left to be done. On this view of the matter, does the majority decision qualify itself to be called a 'judgment' at all? Does it reflect the 'judicial conscience' of the learned judges? The solitary minority judgment of Beg CJI was right and that of the majority repugnant to all notions of freedom enshrined in Art 19(1) as well as the settled law. Adverting to the reliance placed by Variava J on Maneka Gandhi with reference to 'interests of general public', regrettably, the said case throws no light, whatsoever, on what is meant by the expression, except a bare and bald statement made by Bhagwati J (para 65) to the effect that the "words 'in the interest of the general public' have a clearly well defined meaning and the courts have often been called upon to decide whether a particular action is 'in the interest of the general public' or in 'public interest' and no difficulty has been experienced by the Courts in carrying out this exercise. These words are in fact borrowed ipsissima verba from Article 19(5) ." [10]

The Latin expression ipsissima verba means: 'in the same words; the exact words'.[11] Mere copying an expression from somewhere on an as-is-where-is basis is not the same thing as explaining it. Is there anything in the above observation to enlighten the reader on what exactly does the often misquoted, and frequently abused, expression 'interest of the general public', mean in terms of its nature, scope, sweep and limitations? Justice Variava went on to state that the above decision had cleared the decks for the extension of the concept of 'public interest' to s. 25-O. Is it possible that, while dealing with a crucial question of far-reaching constitutional implications, the judges of the Supreme Court could afford the luxury of revelling in nebulous expressions as 'interest of the general public' without dilating upon what exactly it means or how it could be pressed into service in a case like this? Assuming that it is relevant, what is the magnitude of the so-called 'public' in terms of number, denomination and dispersion? If the employer has no financial resources even to pay wages and the workmen have to starve for the whole period of one year, how does the court propose to protect the so-called 'interest of the general public'—a hollow slogan raised in Maneka Gandhi and followed in Orissa Textile? Justice Variava then proceeded to observe:

> Also by the end of the year the interest of the general public or the other relevant factors, which necessitated refusal of permission on the earlier occasion may not prevail. The appropriate Government would necessarily have to make a fresh enquiry, give a reasonable opportunity of being heard to the employer, workmen and all concerned. In our view providing for a period of one year makes the restriction reasonable. (para 12)

Does the observation, 'by the end of the year, the interests of the general public may not prevail' make any sense even to a layman? Are these 'interests' so transitory and fleeting that they keep changing at such a high frequency? If so, would it be wise to place so much reliance on a short-lived phenomenon, while dealing with weighty issues touching upon fundamental rights of an employer? What is meant by the latter part of his observation, '[by the end of the year] other relevant factors may not prevail'? How can a factor which is found irrelevant or not so relevant at the time of making the first application become relevant in the second - or vice versa - within a short span of one year? At a more fundamental level, what are the factors which generally force an employer to take the extreme decision of closing down his business? These factors can be broadly categorised under three heads: (i) continuous downhill trend and financial losses year after year; (ii) a near-permanent, drastic fall in the demand due to changes in customer preferences and/or life-styles; and (iii) a permanent loss of competitive edge due to a relatively high cost of production or technological stagnation. These are crises of grave magnitude which drive an employer to the edge of closing down his business. Could it be said that these factors are only a passing shadow so much so that after a lapse of just one year, things start looking up? What should the employer do for one year during which there is no taker for his products? Should he be forced keep the workforce intact and go on paying idle wages running into a few crores? If so, where should he secure the funds from? These are the right questions, which a judge sitting on the Constitution Bench of the Summit Court should ask and also find dispassionate and convincing answers thereto, before, unleashing jejune rhetoric or, threatening to administer justice!

It is too far-fetched for the Parliament to assume that an employer is so insane as to close down his business abruptly at a time when it is doing well or when better options are available to him. It is also conceded that the Parliament, with its legislative omnipotence and a brute majority enjoyed by the ruling party, choose to pass a prima facie tyrannical and absurd law, making a mockery of Fundamental Rights. Indian Parliament did, in fact, pass many such laws. But then, what is the duty of the Supreme Court in its envious role as the custodian of the Constitution and, particularly, of Part-III? The disturbing events witnessed during the mid-1970s which included - (i) the declaration of internal emergency by Mrs Indira Gandhi, consequent upon the decision of the Allahabad High Court against her; (ii) her high-handed and outrageous role in promoting AN Ray J out-of-turn as CJI. superseding three senior judges (M/s. Shelat, Grover and Hegde JJ), admittedly after the decision in Rustom Cavasjee (Bank Nationalisation case),[12] and thereby impinging upon the independence of judiciary; (iii) the abrogation of Fundamental Rights; (iv) the illegal arrest and confinement of opposition leaders and Members of Parliament; (v) the unilateral and arbitrary sacking of civil servants across States and in the Centre; (vi) her proclamation of the doctrine of committed judiciary, which was rather submissively patronised by Ray CJI, Bhagwati, Iyer, Reddy, Desai JJ, and a few other judges; (vii) the gagging of the press and opponents alike; and (viii) the passing of tyrannical laws with the sole object of serving her personal and political interests - all these events lead to only one conclusion, i.e., the traditional presumption, that "the Parliament always and invariably acts fairly or reasonably, while determining the legislative policy", is not well-founded. It cannot be gainsaid that ch VB of IDA, and several other laws enacted during that period, were the finished products of the Black Days of post-Independence Indian history and were repugnant to all notions of freedom, democracy and civilisation. For that matter, even the amended s. 25-O, which is materially no different from the original section, took its birth during the terminal innings of Mrs Gandhi. By the same token, the decision rendered in Excel Wear applies to the amended section with the same force as it applied to the original one, notwithstanding the superficial, legislative white-washing done to the said provision. The other portions of the decision in Orissa Textile do not deserve elaborate treatment as the reasoning and conclusion reached by Variava J proceeded on the same obnoxious lines as Agarwal J in Meenakshi Mills. With great respect, the decision in Orissa Textile is as perverse, arbitrary and absurd as the very provisions of ch VB. Both Meenakshi Mills and Orissa Textile need review by a larger Bench and the damage done by the five-judge Benches needs to be undone sooner than later.[13]

CONFLICT WITH SECTION 433 OF THE COMPANIES ACT

An interesting question of law as to whether there is a conflict between closure provisions in s 25-O and s 433(a) & s 433(e) of the Companies Act 1956, arose before the Bombay High Court in Bombay Metropolitan Transport Corpn Ltd v

Servants of BMTC (CIDCO). [14] After considering the scheme of the two enactments, the court held that there was no conflict in these two provisions because they operate in distinct and separate fields. Permission under s 25-O is required to be taken when an employer intends to close down, an undertaking of his industrial establishment. The provision, therefore, applies when the industrial establishment, excluding the undertaking which is sought to be closed down is intended to be operated by the employer. It contemplates the continued existence not only of the company but also of the industrial establishment minus the undertaking which is intended to be closed down. On the other hand, the order for winding-up of a company initiates the process of winding-up through the official liquidator and it culminates in dissolution of the company. From the date of this order, the company ceases to do business. If the company is an industrial establishment, it ceases to function upon passing of winding-up order. This order is deemed to be a notice of discharge of the officers and employers of the company. The services of the employees, therefore, come to an end by operation of law.

UPID ACT - WHETHER REPUGNANT TO CHAPTER VB OF CENTRAL ACT?

In Engineering Kamgar Union, the issue of repugnancy between s 6W of Uttar Pradesh Industrial Disputes Act 1947 and s 25-O of the ID Act, within the meaning of Art 254(2) of the Constitution, came up before the Supreme Court. The facts, in brief, were: The Engineering Kamgar Union was a registered trade union of workmen employed by Electro Steel Castings Ltd., having its factory in Ghaziabad and employing more than 100 persons. The company issued a notice on 21 September 1998 declaring its intention to close down the said factory with effect from 23 September 1998 as a result whereof it was notified that services of 99 workmen would be terminated. An industrial dispute was raised by the union against the validity of the said notice raising a factual plea that more than 300 workmen were employed by company and thus ID Act would be applicable. Thereupon, the Assistant Labour Commissioner served a show-cause notice on the company against prosecution for contravening the provisions of the ID Act. In its reply dated 03 October 1998, the company raised a plea to the effect that as the number of employees in the said industrial undertaking was less than 300, no permission for closure was required in view of s 6-W r/w s 6-V of UPIDA,i.e. the State Act. Two recovery certificates were issued against the company towards the salary of the workmen under the State Act. Three writ petitions came to be filed by the first respondent questioning the show cause notice as also the recovery certificates aforementioned. The union also filed a writ petition questioning the closure notice issued by the company. The High Court allowed the writ petitions filed by the company, and dismissed the one filed by the union. In appeal by special leave, the union raised the question of repugnancy between the State Act and Central Act and pleaded that s 25-O of the ID Act overrides the provisions of the State Act and, hence the employer-company was required to obtain prior permission before closing down the establishment in view of the fact that it was employing more than 100 workmen. Repelling the contention relating to repugnancy, and dismissing the appeal, Sinha J (for self and Sabharwal J) held:

> In a case, thus, where both the State Act and the Central Act have been enacted in terms of List III of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India, the question of repugnancy as envisaged under Art. 254 would arise. In that type of cases, it is well settled that in absence of Presidential assent, the Parliamentary Act would prevail and where the assent has been received, the State Act would. () … .Keeping in view the constitutional scheme vis-a-vis the Central Act and the State Act, we are of the opinion that there exists a conflict and, thus, Art. 254 of the Constitution would be attracted. Date of coming into force of the Central Act - Is it material? () … The phraseology used in Art. 254 of the Constitution of India is clear and unambiguous. It does not contemplate coming into effect of a law having regard to the nature of the legislation as a conditional one. It in no uncertain terms states that the conflict is required to be found out keeping in view a law which has already been made. The makers of the Constitution deliberately and consciously used past tense. It has, thus, to be given its ordinary meaning. () … The question, however, is to be considered having regard to the fact situation obtaining herein. The conflict between the Central Act and the State Act was apparent. The State of Uttar Pradesh inserted S. 6V by Act No. 26 of 1983 being conscious of the fact that an Act had been passed to the contrary by the Parliament in terms of Act No. 46 of 1982. … The provisions contained in S. 6V by reason of the 1988 Amendment by the Legislature of the State of Uttar Pradesh must have made consciously in relation whereto only the legislation was reserved for the Presidential assent. () … Section 114(e) of the Indian Evidence Act raises a presumption that all official acts must have been performed regularly. Section 114(f) of the said Act raises a presumption that the common course of business has been followed in particular cases. The said presumptions, therefore, would apply in this case also. In any event, we do not find any reason to allow the appellant to raise the said plea before this Court for the first time. () … Section 25S does not introduce a non obstante clause as regard ch VA. Furthermore, s 25J is not a part of ch V-B. By reason of s. 25S, the provisions of ch V-A were made applicable only in relation to certain establishments referred to in ch VB. The Parliament has deliberately used the words “so far as may be” which would also indicate that provisions of chvb were to apply to the industrial establishments mentioned in ch VA. The non obstante clause contained in S. 25J does not apply to the entire ch VB. Applicability of ch VA in relation to the industrial establishments covered by ch VB in terms of s 25J vis-a-vis s 25S is permissible but the contention cannot be taken any further so as to make s 25-O of the Central Act prevail over the State Act by taking recourse to the non obstante clause. Non obstante clause contained in s 25J is, thus, required to be kept confined to ch VA only and in that view of the matter we have no hesitation in holding that ch VB does not have an overriding effect over the State Act.[15] ().

SUB-SECTION (1): APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO CLOSE DOWN

An employer intending to close down an undertaking or an industrial establishment to which the chapter applies, is required to apply to the 'appropriate Government' in the prescribed manner for permission to close down the establishment or undertaking within ninety days on which the closure has to become effective. He is further required to state clearly the reasons for the intended closure in the application and to serve a copy of the application on the representatives of the workmen in the prescribed manner. Rule 76C(2) prescribes that the application under this section shall be in Form QB while sub-r (3) requires the application to be made in triplicate and sub-r (4) enjoins the employer to furnish to the Central Government such further information as the Government may consider necessary and call from him for arriving at the decision on the application. Though in s 25-O there is no specific reference to the retrenchment, from the scheme of the Act, it is evident that the provisions of this section will be attracted only when closure of an undertaking brings about retrenchment of workmen.[16] In Rehabilitation, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that where the Central Government, being the appropriate Government, had delegated its power to the state Government under s 39 of the ID Act, both the State and Central Governments would have parallel jurisdiction and the fact, that the state Government referred the issue relating to closure under s 25-O(5) to the tribunal, would not take away the jurisdiction of the Central Government to issue a notice convening a meeting for holding a hearing on the application for closing down the factory.[17] The proviso excludes the undertakings set up for the construction of buildings, bridges, roads, canals, darns or for other construction work from the requirements of this subsection. A priori, the following sub-sections will not apply to such undertakings. In a case, where the application for withdrawal of the first petition under s 25-O(1) was made because the company had received a letter from the Deputy Labour Commissioner calling for a meeting of the parties so that an effort could be made for an amicable settlement and Company did not wait for the expiry of 60 days from the date of filing of its application under s 25-O(1), on the expiry of which the application would have deemed to have been allowed under s 25-O(3), Markandey Katju J (for self and Thakker J) held:

> … we are satisfied that the application for withdrawal of the first petition under Section 25-O(1) was made bona fide because the respondent-company had received a letter from the Deputy Labour Commissioner on 5.4.2007 calling for a meeting of the parties so that an effort could be made for an amicable settlement. In fact, the respondent-company could have waited for the expiry of 60 days from the date of filing of its application under Section 25-O(1), on the expiry of which the application would have deemed to have been allowed under Section 25-O(3). The fact that it did not do so, and instead applied for withdrawal of its application under Section 25-O(1), shows its bona fide. The respondent-company was trying for an amicable settlement, and this was clearly bona fide, and it was not a case of bench hunting when it found that an adverse order was likely to be passed against it…[18]

SUB-SECTION (2): ORDER GRANTING OR REFUSING PERMISSION

The appropriate Government is vested with the discretion to grant or refuse to grant permission to the employer to close down his undertaking. But before granting or refusing permission, the Government is required to:

(i) make necessary inquiry into the facts and circumstances of the case, as it may think necessary;

(ii) give reasonable opportunity of being heard to:

  (a) the employer;

  (b) the workman; and

  (c) the persons interested in such closure;

(iii) consider the:

  (a) genuineness and adequacy of the reasons for the closure stated by the employer;

  (b) the interests of the general public; and

  (c) other relevant factors.

(iv) pass an order in writing granting or refusing to grant permission applied for stating the reasons therein for grant or refusal to grant permission; and

(v) communicate the order to the employer and the workmen.

In Excel Wear, the Supreme Court struck down the previous section on the ground that it permitted the Government to dispose of the application for permission to close down the undertaking by passing a 'cryptic, capricious, whimsical and one sided order'. To remedy this vice, the legislature has now provided the above requirements. In the first instance, the appropriate Government is required itself to inquire into the matter as it may think fit. Then it has to give a reasonable opportunity of being heard not only to the employer and the workman but also the persons interested in the closure. Then the Government has to consider the genuineness and adequacy of the reason for the closure not only as disclosed by the employer in his application but also in his representation on being heard. The Government is further required to apply its mind to the representations of the workmen and other persons interested in the closure. It has also to take into account the interests of the general public and all other relevant factors in coming to its decision. These requirements are aimed at making the scrutiny of the order, either by the tribunal under sub-s (5) or the High Court in its jurisdiction under Art 226 of the Constitution, possible.

The Madhya Pradesh High Court in Straw Products, held that where the reasons given by the Government for refusing permission of closure of an industrial undertaking are not extraneous or irrelevant, the order refusing permission to close down cannot be interfered with by the writ court. The scope of the inquiry in the writ jurisdiction is limited to seeing whether the ultimate opinion formed by the state is vitiated on account of ignoring any relevant factors or taking into account irrelevant, extraneous or nonexistent factors so as to disclose an error apparent on the face of the record but the writ court cannot examine the correctness of the conclusions relating to the adequacy of reasons.[19] In Associated Cement Companies, the Gujarat High Court on the true construction of the words 'genuineness' and 'adequacy' occurring in sub-section held that the question whether the reasons given by the employer are 'genuine' and 'adequate' or not will have to be considered by the appropriate Government and the tribunal in the context of the nature and incidents of the right of the employer to close down his business which right though not fundamental is an integral part of it. Refusal to grant permission either on the ground of the interests of the general public or on the relevant factors being in the nature of a restriction on the right of the employer to close down his business, can be justified only in those cases where giving of an overriding effect to such a ground can be said to be reasonable. If the employer wants to close down his business bona fide and the reasons given by him are 'genuine' and 'adequate', it will not be proper to refuse permission on the ground that it will result into unemployment unless for such reasons or because of some extraordinary circumstances refusal on that ground can be regarded as reasonable. For justifying refusal on the ground of the interests of the general public or other relevant factors, reasons must be just and more weighy. In this view of law, the court quashed the order passed by the Government as being without the proper application of mind and proper appreciation of the nature and incidence of the right of the employer and also the nature and extent of the power available under s 25-O. Likewise, the court also struck down the award of the tribunal holding that the reasons given by the company were not genuine and adequate. It held that the conclusion of the tribunal was reached on grounds which were irrelevant and speculative in nature and without considering all the aspects which the tribunal was expected to consider.[20]

A body corporate may have one or more undertakings. Therefore, a company is not to be taken as a synonym for an undertaking. Precisely, a company is the owner of the undertakings. Therefore, the considerations for closing down an undertaking under this section are different from those for winding-up a company under s 433 of the Companies Act 1956. A single judge of the Bombay High Court in Bombay Metropolitan Transport, held that rejection of an application under s 25-O would not be a bar to a winding-up petition on the principles of res judicata or principles analogous thereto. The judge went a step further in observing that to the extent that certain factual aspects have been agitated, considered and decided in an application for closure under s 25-O, 'the same cannot be permitted to be re-agitated' in a winding-up petition under s 433 of the Companies Act.[21] This statement of law does not take note of the fact that the grant or refusal to close-down an undertaking under s 25-O is an administrative function of the Government having some quasi-judicial strains while the winding up of a company under s 433 is a purely judicial function entrusted to the High Courts by the Companies Act. Therefore, the decision of the Government on facts or law cannot operate as res judicata to the same question of law or fact being agitated before the company court. The two jurisdictions are entirely different. In this case, the application of the employer company was rejected by the Government and subsequently the company filed an application under s 433(a) for winding-up the company by a 'special resolution'. The court held that the company's intention was mala fide because winding-up was a cloak for terminating the services of the workmen which could not be achieved as the permission to close down the undertaking under s 25-O was refused. The court observed that the provisions of the ID Act which is a special statute would prevail on the provisions of the Companies Act which is a general legislation. The Calcutta High Court held that the expressions 'genuineness', 'adequacy of reasons' and 'interests of general public' appearing in sub-s (2) are mere guidelines, which are meant for guidance only. The expression 'having regard to' in a statutory provision does not mean that there must be very strict compliance with the statutory provisions but the provisions should be taken for guidance only. It is not open to the court to sit in appeal over the decision of the Government in this regard.[22] In Dayakar Reddy, one of the issues raised was that the Government appeared to be pre-determined and was a judge in its own cause, while granting permission for closing the undertaking. Repelling the contention, the Supreme Court observed:

> It was contended by Sri PS Mishra, learned counsel for the petitioner, that in this case the State had suggested that the company should be closed down and it was the same State which then decided under s 25-O to grant permission for closure. In a case where > the company is a State Government Undertaking, such a situation may arise. It has to take an administrative decision under s 25-O. What we find is that while exercising its power under s 25-O, it did follow the proper procedure and consider all the relevant aspects. It is not possible to find any fault with the decision of the State Government. The facts of this case are very eloquent. Moreover, by the time the Government took the decision, out of 1800 workers, 1200 workers had shown their willingness to accept the voluntary retirement scheme. Government Order dated 16 June 1997, clearly discloses the reasons why the company had become unviable and why it was not able to carry on its activities any further. The reasons appear to be genuine and adequate and therefore the Government was justified in granting permission for closure of the company. The special leave petition is therefore dismissed.[23]

In BPMEL, where the workmen challenged the order passed under s 25-O granting permission to close down the undertaking on the ground that the said order was not maintainable in view of the status quo order passed the by BIFR, a single judge of the Calcutta High Court held that the order of status quo passed by BIFR under the Sick Industrial Companies (Special Provisions) Act 1985, related to the proceedings under the said Act, and it had nothing to do with the ID Act, and that it would not prevent the company from taking steps for closure.[24]The decision by the state Government to close down the public sector textile mill or, for that matter, the making of application under s 25-O, could not be said to be inconsistent with or contrary to or in derogation of the Maharashtra Textile Companies (Acquisition and Transfer of Undertakings) Act 1982, and the said Act does not prohibit the state Government from making application for the closure of mills because of its unviability and heavy losses incurred by the mill. An application made under s 25-O was not beyond its authority or competence.[25] Mere pendency of a writ petition in the High Court against closure is not a valid ground for the labour commissioner to refuse permission under s 25-O, so long as the reasons for closure were found to be genuine and reasonable. The order of the labour commissioner was set aside and the application under s 25-O stands allowed.[26]

SUB-SECTION (3): DEEMED PERMISSION

This sub-section is analogous to subs (5) of s 25N and sub-s (4) of s 25N. In KMPPT Sangam, the facts were: On an application made by the employer seeking permission for closure, the Government did not pass any order within 60 days resulting in the deemed grant of permission to close down the undertaking. A single judge of the Madras High Court held that the matter should be decided by an independent tribunal and directed the Government to refer the matter for adjudication under s 25 - O(5).[27] The learned judge had misdirected himself. Why should the matter be heard and decided by a tribunal when the permission sought for stood granted under the legal fiction contained in the sub-section? Once it is admitted that the Government did not communicate its decision within 60 days, the legal consequences stipulated in the provision would automatically follow and there is no provision in s 25-O, which requires that, in the event of a failure on the part of the Government to communicate its order within 60 days, the matter should be referred to an industrial tribunal. Balasubramanian J travelled far beyond his legitimate confines to the point of re-writing the law. This decision offends the provisions of s 25-O and is wrong.

SUB-SECTION (4): FINALITY OF THE ORDER

This provision is analogous to sub-s (6) of s 25N and sub-s (5) of s 25N. [Notes and Comments thereunder]

SUB-SECTION (5): REVIEW OR ADJUDICATION OF THE ORDER

This provision is analogous to sub-s (7) of s 25M and sub-s (6) of s 25N. [Notes and comments thereunder]

This provision vests two-fold power on the appropriate Government, viz:

(a) itself to review, suo motu or on an application made by the employer or any workman, its order granting or refusing to grant permission under sub-ss (i) and

(b) to refer the question of granting or refusing permission to an industrial tribunal for adjudication.

In the former case, the power to review is not limited to the power of review as contemplated by O XLVII, r 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is open to the Government, under this provision, to reconsider the entire matter including the facts and the law omitted in its order granting or refusing permission to close down the industry. It can also take into consideration the new developments that took place after the order granting or refusing permission was passed. The object of the power for review is to do justice between the parties by considering whether the original decision is legal or correct. In the latter case, whether such reconsideration is necessary or not is treated as an industrial dispute. However, making of reference is optional with the Government. On reference being made, the industrial tribunal has all the powers of the Government to consider all the relevant questions in order to decide the question as to whether the order refusing permission requires reconsideration and whether permission has to be given. In Dhanalakshmi Mills, a single judge of the Madras High Court held that once the Government had referred the review application filed by the management to a tribunal under s 25-O(5), the order passed thereon by the tribunal granting permission to close down the undertaking would supersede the initial order passed by the labour commissioner rejecting the application.[28]

Judicial Review

Like any order or award of an industrial tribunal, the award of the tribunal granting or refusing to grant permission to close down an industry is amenable to judicial review. However, the wide discretion and powers exercisable by the tribunal are not available to the writ court. The writ court, can only scrutinise the order or award of the tribunal within the parameters of the acceptable limits. Though the writ court is entitled to quash an award, in an appropriate case, and remand the matter or even decide the matter itself, it, however, is not entitled to sit as an appellate court over the order or award of the industrial tribunal.[29] In Ujjain Mill Mazdoor Sangh, a single judge of the Madhya Pradesh High Court held that the word 'may' occurring in s 25-O(5) makes it optional for the Government to either review the order of granting or reusing permission for closure or to refer the matter to the industrial tribunal for adjudication. It is not mandatory for the Government to resort to both the options simultaneously or one after the other. The word 'or' assumes significance in this context. It may or may not resort to either option or may take one option. When it elects to take the review option, there ends the matter. The provisions of s 25-O cannot be interpreted in a manner to cast an obligation on the Government to necessarily refer the matter to the tribunal for adjudication.[30] Where the state Government, on an application under s 25-O to close down the undertaking accorded approval to close down the undertaking on being found that the reasons for closure were genuine and adequate, it is not open to the tribunal to set aside the order granting approval to close down.[31] The tribunal, while granting permission under s 25-O(5) to close down the undertaking, need not wait for the outcome of proceedings pending BIFR, unless there is an agreement or settlement or an award creating a liability to that effect.[32]

In Voltas, the facts were: the Labour Commissioner granted permission under s 25-O(4) to the employer to close down the undertaking. On an application by the Voltas Employees Union, the Government referred the matter to tribunal for adjudication under s 25-O(5). The tribunal entered upon adjudication and issued notices to the parties. While this was so, the union filed a writ petition challenging the order of labour commissioner granting permission to close down the undertaking. A single judge of the Bombay High Court held that a writ under Art 226 was maintainable even when the reference for adjudication was pending. In support of this conclusion, the learned judge went on to hold that merely making a reference would not be an adequate or efficacious remedy unless the tribunal was seized of the matter.[33]The learned judge of the High Court misconstrued not only the provisions of the ID Act but also of the powers conferred on the High Court under Article 226. What is meant by the observation 'unless the tribunal is seized of the matter the reference would not be an efficacious remedy', in the face of the glaring fact that the said reference for adjudication was made by the Government as an application made by the petitioner-union itself? Further, it is also an admitted fact that the tribunal had issued notices to the parties with a direction to the management to file the statement of claim by 30 January 2002. In the face of this factual position, what was the basis for the learned judge to come to the conclusion that the tribunal was not seized of the matter and hence the writ petition was maintainable? Does the mere fact that the union did not receive the notice issued by the tribunal permit the High Court to draw an inference that the tribunal did not enter upon adjudication, in disregard of the documentary evidence produced by the respondent-management? Further it should be clearly understood that a decision either granting or refusing permission under s 25-O(4) is a condition precedent to the passing of an order either for review or for reference under sub-section (5). Where no proceeding was held under sub-s (4), there can be no review, much less reference under sub-s (5). That is the essence of s 25-O in its comprehensive connotation. In other words, nowhere does s 25-O confer a right to a party to directly approach a tribunal with a request for adjudication. The said sub-sections confer power on the Government either:

(i) to review on its own motion or on an application made by the employer or a workman, or

(ii) to refer the matter to a tribunal for adjudication. In the instant case, the Government rightly followed the procedure prescribed under s 25-O(5) by referring the application filed by the employer along with the order passed by the labour commissioner for adjudication.

This decision is a repository of misstatement of facts, misconstruction of law and suffers from fatal infirmities on almost every count, including the jurisdiction of High Court to issue a writ in a matter which has already been referred for adjudication and is pending before a competent tribunal, and deserves to be rejected in limine as being perverse and baseless.

SUB-SECTION (6): CONSEQUENCES OF CLOSURE WITHOUT PERMISSION

This sub-section is analogous to sub-s (8) of s 25M and sub-s (7) of s 25N. [Notes and Comments thereunder]. Apart from making the closure innocuous and inoperative in law, this provision specifically makes the closure, without permission, illegal. An employer, who closes down an undertaking without obtaining prior permission or in contravention of the refusal to close down the undertaking, will be exposed to penal consequences of s 25R. In Hindalco Industries, the issue was whether s 25-O applied at all to the mining activities carried on by the company. On behalf of the appellant-company, it was contended that s 25-O had no application and no prior permission was required for the closure of the mining activities as the appellant never intended to close it down before the expiry of the lease period. It was further contended that, in view of this legal position, the company was liable to pay compensation to the workmen only under s 25-FFF. Rejecting the contention, Balakrishnan J (for self and Venkatarama Reddi J) held:

> … the appellant had an establishment where more than 100 workmen were employed on an average per working day. This fact is not disputed by the appellant. In that event, the provisions contained in Chapter V-B of the I.D. Act would apply to the appellant. Section 25-O being the provision contained in Chapter V-B of the I.D. Act, they are the relevant provisions regarding the procedure for closing down of an undertaking. This clearly shows that S. 25-FFA and S. 25-FFF of Chapter V-A would not apply in respect of the closure of the mining operations of the appellant. The appellant admits that about 211 employees had been retrenched. Under sub-section (8) of S. 25-O special provision has been made for the payment of compensation to workers when a permission for closure is granted…. In view of the aforesaid circumstances, the plea of the appellant that S. 25-O of the I.D. Act applies to only planned and intended closure by the employer is devoid of merits and S. 25-O of the I.D. Act will govern the situation. We find no error of jurisdiction or illegality in the impugned judgment. The appeal is without any merits and is dismissed.[34]

SUB-SECTION (7): POWER TO EXEMPT

This sub-section is analogous to sub-s (9) of s 25M and sub-s (8) of s 25N. [See Notes and Comments thereunder]

SUB-SECTION (8): COMPENSATION

This sub-section corresponds to sub-s (1) of s 25FFF. The quantum of compensation payable to a workman where permission for closure of an undertaking or establishment is granted or is deemed to have been granted, is the same as under sub-s (1) of s 25FFF. Accordingly, every workman, who is employed in such undertaking or establishment, immediately before the date of the application for permission under this section, shall be entitled to receive compensation equivalent to fifteen days average pay for every completed year of continuous service or any part thereof in excess of six months. From the language of this provision, it is clear that the payment of compensation is not a condition precedent to closure. The liability of the employer to pay compensation and the entitlement of the workman to receive compensation arises upon the closure of the undertaking. However, this provision makes the workman entitled to receive compensation in all circumstances, It does not contain any provision like the proviso to s 25FFF reducing the quantum of compensation in 'unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer'. In Gordon Woodroffe, the facts briefly were: The Company named Gordon Woodroffe Agencies Private Ltd., employing less than 50 workman was closed w.e.f. 31 May 1984 because it had incurred heavy losses in its business, and offered to all its workmen, closure compensation as prescribed by law and other legal entitlements like provident fund, gratuity etc. due to the workmen. While many workmen received the said compensation a few did not choose to receive the same, primarily contending that they were entitled to alternative employment in a sister concern of the appellant known as Gordon Woodroffe Ltd., which was a manufacturing company, which was rejected by the company on the ground that Gordon Woodroffe Ltd. was a separate company and the question of providing alternative employment in the said company did not arise. The labour court upheld the validity of closure, but directed the management to pay additional compensation at the rate of 15 days' wages for every year of residual service till the date of superannuation and a further sum of Rs. 3000/- as a solatium to each workman. The said award was upheld by the two tiers of Madras High Court. Quashing the orders of the courts below, Hegde J (for self and Sinha J), observed:

> … the Labour Court came to the conclusion that the closure of the establishment was legally justifiable and the management had as required under the law, offered apart from the compensation payable for the closure, all other statutory dues which some of the employees collected without demur and in the case of respondent-workmen even though the same were offered on time, they did not accept it, therefore, the question of paying any additional ex-gratia compensation which is not contemplated under the statute, does not arise. This Court in the case of N. S. Giri (supra),[35]held : "An award under the Industrial Disputes Act cannot be inconsistent with the law laid down by the Legislature or by the Supreme Court and if it does so, it is illegal and cannot be enforced. "Thus, it is clear from the pronouncements of this Court that the Labour Court or for that matter the High Court had no authority in law to direct payment of any additional sum by way of ex-gratia payment otherwise than what is provided under the statute when the act of the management in closing down the establishment is found to be valid and all legally payable amounts have been paid or offered in time. In such a situation, contrary to the statute, the principle of social justice cannot be invoked since > the Legislature would have already taken note of the same while fixing the compensation payable…. For the reasons stated above, this appeal succeeds, the judgments of the Courts below are set aside. The appeal is allowed.[36]

In Karnataka Forest Development Corporation (KFDC), the facts disclosed that the Government of Karnataka took a decision in October 1991 to wind up Karnataka Pulpwood Ltd. (KPL), which is a joint sector company with KFDC holding 51% of the share capital, for a variety of reasons including public hostility and a PIL, etc., making it difficult for the company to carry on its operations. Having decided to wind up, the Government took another decision in November 1993 to merge it with KFDC. A proposal was also mooted to offer VRS to the workmen of KPL. However, no merger took place officially. In the meantime, the Government granted permission in November 2004 to KPL to close down the undertaking under s 25-O, and the company was closed. Writ petitions followed and the matter came up before Supreme Court. The main issue was whether the workmen of KPL were entitled to be absorbed in KFDC consequent upon the proposed merger. Allowing the appeal by KFDC and setting aside the orders of Karnataka High Court, Sinha J (for self and Bedi J) held:

> Before the Division Bench of the High Court, as we have noticed hereinbefore, the order of the State Government directing prior permission for effecting closure of the industrial undertaking has not been questioned. In fact, even the learned Single Judge had made observations to the effect that the closure may be effected…. The 1991 decision was modified by a subsequent or der that the undertakings also as that of the company are merging with each other. No order of merger has been passed. No decision by a competent authority under the Companies Act had been taken. Indisputably, the appellant and the company have not merged. In absence of any valid order of merger of two different entities, evidently the relationship of employer and employee between the respondents and the said company, as had been obtaining, continued. Furthermore, as soon as the closure of an undertaking became effective, it is trite that the said relationship ceased to exist…. The right of the workmen, therefore, was only to receive the amount of compensation. If the State is not in a position to take upon itself the financial burden of the appellant-Corporation for appointing the concerned workmen, direction to continue their services could not be issued. There cannot be any doubt whatsoever that the said order dated 24.10.1991 has been superseded by necessary implication. Both merger of two undertakings and the closure of one undertaking do not stand together. If the workmen, therefore, think that any other or further right has accrued to them in terms of the purported assurance given by the State, it may take recourse thereto before an appropriate forum but a writ petition was not maintainable.[37]

JUDICIAL REVIEW OF THE REFUSAL ORDER

In DCM, the management of the company had decided to close down its industrial undertaking as if it was located in non-conforming area as prescribed by the authority under the master plan for Delhi and under the Delhi Development Authority Act 1957 as under the regulations made thereunder it could no longer continue the industrial activity. The textile site mill undertaking discharging heavy toxic effluents and the conditional consent of discharging effluents previously granted by the pollution board was revoked as the conditions could not be fulfilled on account of paucity of land. The further reason for closure was on the ground that the undertaking suffered substantial losses. The Delhi administration refused permission to close down the undertaking. A Full Bench of the Delhi High Court held that the impugned order was capricious and as such liable to be struck down because the adjudicating authority had not recorded the reasons for refusal. The necessary inference, therefore, was that there were no good reasons to advance. Furthermore, the order of refusal of the Delhi administration to close down the undertaking on the ground that the mill was using refusal of consent by pollution board as a ground for closure, was in complete disregard of the material on the record and larger public interest and the finding of the authorities that the losses cannot be said to be representative of irretrievable situation, was merely illusory. The court further observed that in view of the settlement between the employer and majority of its workmen entitling the workmen to receive an amount equivalent to their pay packet for seventy-two months after closure of the undertaking, it could not be said, that the management had ignored the interest of labor. In the circumstances it was held that it was a fit case for grant of permission and the authority was directed to accord permission for closure.[38]

Inadequacy of Power Supply and Over-staffing etc

In Laxmi Starch, on a reference of the question by the appropriate Government as to whether the permission to the employer to close down an industry should be granted or not on grounds of financial loss, non-availability of raw material, increased cost of labour, the tribunal found that the plea of non-availability of raw-material was not bona fide and the financial loss was the creation of the employer and increase in the cost of material and labour was compensated by the increased price of the products. Hence, the tribunal refused to grant permission. In a writ petition against the order of the tribunal, a single judge of the Kerala High Court held that the order of the tribunal was not reviewable because it suffered from no impropriety.[39] This decision does not lay down the correct law. All these factors render it not only unprofitable but impossible to run the industry. To force an employer to continue to run the undertaking, in such a situation, would be arbitrary and tyrannical.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25P. Special provision as to restarting of undertakings closed down before commencement of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1976.—

If the appropriate Government is of opinion in respect of any undertaking of an industrial establishment to which this Chapter applies and which closed down before the commencement of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act, 1976 (32 of 1976),—

(a) that such undertaking was closed down otherwise than on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer;

(b) that there are possibilities of restarting the undertaking;

(c) that it is necessary for the rehabilitation of the workmen employed in such undertaking before its closure or for the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community to restart the undertaking or both; and

(d) that the restarting of the undertaking will not result in hardship to the employer in relation to the undertaking; it may, after giving an opportunity to such employer and workmen, direct, by order published in the Official Gazette, that the undertaking shall be restarted within such time (not being less than one month from the date of the order) as may be specified in the order.

OPINION OF THE GOVERNMENT

This section empowers the appropriate Government to direct an employer to restart an undertaking of an industrial establishment to which this chapter applies and which was closed down before the commencement of the Amending Act of 1976 inserting this chapter. But before such a direction can be made, the Government has to form its opinion in respect of such undertaking that:

(a) the undertaking was closed down otherwise than on account of unavoidable circumstances beyond the control of the employer;

(b) There are possibilities of restarting the undertaking;

(c) It is necessary for the rehabilitation of the workmen employed in the undertaking before its closure or for the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community or both; and

(d) the restarting of the undertaking will not result in hardship to the employer in relation to the undertaking.

From the use of semi-colons at the end of cll (a) and (b) and the conjunctive 'and' used at the end of the cl (c), it appears that all these four conditions must cumulatively exist before the Government can consider the question of directing the employer to restart the undertaking. If any one of these conditions does not exist, there will be no case for restarting the undertaking. Furthermore, the Government must have material before it for satisfying itself that these conditions exist. The opinion formed without any material before it or on extraneous considerations will be no opinion in the eyes of law and may be vulnerable to judicial review.

THE OPPORTUNITY TO PARTIES

After the Government has formed the opinion that the four conditions enumerated in this section exist, it is required to give 'an opportunity to such employer and workmen'. This provision is a specimen of obscure and careless drafting. The 'opportunity' to do what? Is it the opportunity to the employer and the workmen to restart the undertaking without an order being made by the Government? Or is it the opportunity to the employer and the workmen to be heard against and in favour of restarting of the undertaking? It is presumably the latter. If it is the opportunity of being heard, the scope of hearing before the Government is also not spelt out.

ORDER OF RESTARTING

After forming its opinion and giving an 'opportunity' to the employer and the workmen, the Government has been given the discretionary power to direct the employer to restart the undertaking by an order published in the Official Gazette. The Government may specify the period of time within which the undertaking has to be restarted. But the time, in any case, shall not be less than one month from the date of the order.

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25Q. Penalty for Lay-off and Retrenchment without previous permission.—

Any employer who contravenes the provisions of section 25M or [40][* * *] section 25N shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Scope of the Penalty—'Lay-off' in contravention of s 25M or retrenchment of a workman in contravention of cl (c) of sub-s (1) or sub-s (4) of s 25N exposes an employer to the punishment of imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or both. From the language of the section, it appears that mens rea has not been made a condition precedent for conviction. The mere factum of the contravention of the provisions of s 25M or 25 N (1)(c) or (4) is sufficient to warrant conviction.

40 The words "clause (c) of sub-section (1) or sub-section (4) of" omitted by Act 49 of 1984, s 6 (wef 18-8-1984).

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25R. Penalty for closure.—

(1) Any employer who closes down an undertaking without complying with the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 25-O shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, which may extend to five thousand rupees, or with both.

(2) Any employer, who contravenes [41][an order refusing to grant permission to close down an undertaking under sub-section (2) of section 25-O or a direction given under section 25P] shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to five thousand rupees, or with both, and where the contravention is a continuing one, with a further fine which may extend to two thousand rupees for every day during which the contravention continues after the conviction.

SUB-SECTION (1): SCOPE OF PENALTY

The original s 25-O was struck down by the Supreme Court in Excel Wear v Union of India , as imposing unreasonable restrictions on the fundamental rights of employer to close down his establishment. As a sequel to that, sub-s (1) of s 25R which provided penalty for closure without complying with the requirements of s 25-O, was also struck down. But now since the original s 25-O has been substituted by the present one, sub-s (1) of s 25R has been revived in the self-same language as of the original sub-section. It provides a penalty of punishment of imprisonment up to six months or a fine up to rupees five thousand or both in a case where the employer closes down his establishment without complying with the requirement of s 25-O(1). In IOL Limited, the company closed its unit in which some 156 workmen were employed without obtaining prior permission of the Government. The Allahabad High Court had set aside the prosecution launched by the Deputy Commissioner of Labour on the ground that the establishment was covered by the UP Industrial Disputes Act under which the threshold limit was 300 workmen for the purpose of obtaining prior permission.[43]

SUB-SECTION (2): PENALTY FOR CONTRAVENTION OF DIRECTIONS

The penalty provided by this provision is still more stringent than the penalty provided in sub-s (1). It exposes an employer who contravenes an order refusing to grant permission to close down his undertaking under sub-s (2) of s 25-O or a direction given under s 25P, to the punishment of imprisonment up to a term of one year or with fine up to an amount of rupees five thousand or both. Furthermore, continuing contravention of these provisions, after conviction at the first instance, has been made punishable with recurring fine extending up to rupees two thousand for every day of continuing contravention.

SUB-SECTION (3)

This sub-section was also struck down by the Supreme Court in Excel Wear v Union of India. [44]

CHAPTER VB Special Provisions Relating to Lay-off, Retrenchment and Closure in Certain Establishments

S. 25-S. Certain provisions of Chapter VA to apply to an industrial establishment to which this Chapter applies.—

The provisions of sections 25-B, 25-D, 25-FF, 25-G, 25-H and 25-J in Chapter VA shall, so far as may be, apply also in relation to an industrial establishment to which the provisions of this Chapter apply.

This section makes the provisions of ss 25B, 25D, 25FF, 25G, 25H and 25J in ch VA applicable in relation to the industrial establishments to which the provisions of ch VB apply. It is significant to note that the provisions of sections 25C, 25E, 25F, 25FFA, being excluded by this chapter will not apply to the 'industrial establishments' to which this chapter applies.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

[1]CHAPTER VC Unfair Labour Practices

S. 25T. Prohibition of Unfair Labour Practice.—

No employer or workman or a trade union, whether registered under the Trade Unions Act, 1926 (16 of 1926), or not, shall commit any unfair labour practice.

LEGISLATION

Though the judicial dicta constantly and unequivocally condemns unfair labour practice and victimisation of workmen, neither the legislature nor any judicial pronouncement has endeavoured to precisely define as to what these expressions mean. By the Amending Act 46 of 1982 (brought into force wef 21 August 1984), cl (ra) was inserted in s 2 defining 'unfair labour practice' to mean 'the practices specified in the fifth schedule'. The fifth schedule was also inserted by the same Amending Act which has enumerated unfair labour practices 'on the part of the employers and trade union of employers' as well as 'on the part of workmen and Trade Union of Workmen'. Section 25T prohibits commission of the unfair trade practices by the employers as well as the workmen while s 25U prescribes stringent penalties for commission of unfair labour practices. This amending Act was given presidential assent on 1 August 1982 and brought in force with effect from 21 August 1984. In HD Singh, the Reserve Bank of India had issued a confidential circular directing the officers that workmen like the appellants should not be engaged continuously but should as far as possible be offered work on rotation basis. In view of the provisions of item 10 of the fifth schedule, the Supreme Court held that it had no option but to hold that the Bank indulged in methods amounting to 'unfair labour practice'.[2] The Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU & PULP Act) has been enacted with the avowed purpose of regulating the activities of the trade unions and for preventing certain unfair labour practices both on the part of unions of employees as well as employers. However, this Act does not offer any remedy to the workmen to raise a disputeregarding prevention of any unfair labour practice on the part of the employer who had set in motion the machinery for discharging or dismissing a workman by way of an unfair labour practice. Even the Industrial Disputes Act has no provision for preventing any proposed discharge or dismissal by way of an unfair labour practice on the part of the employer. Thus, the Maharashtra Act seeks to supplement and cover the field for which the industries governed by the Industrial Disputes Act and the Bombay Act did not get any coverage and that field was obviously amongst others the field pertaining to prevention of unfair labour practice as defined in the Act.[3]

UNFAIR LABOUR PRACTICE

Before the insertion of cl (ra) in s 2 and s 25T of the Act, there was no legislative or judicial definition of the expression 'unfair labour practice'. But what an 'unfair labour practice' actually meant could only be felt though not precisely known. But 'unfair labour practices' have been defined in s 26 of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 to mean 'the practices listed in Sch 2, 3 and 4 thereof. Schedule 2 enumerates 'unfair labour practices' on the part of the employers, Sch 3 enumerates 'unfair labour practices' on the part of the trade unions and Sch 4 enumerates 'unfair labour practice' on the part of the employee. There is a clear difference in s 25T of this Act and s 27 of the Maharashtra Act. The former prohibits an employer or a workman or a trade union from committing any unfair labour practice while the latter prohibits an employer or a union or an employee from engaging in any unfair labour practice. In other words, the prohibition under this Act is against 'commission' of an unfair labour practice which may include the final acts of such commissions while the Maharashtra Act prohibits the concerned parties even from engaging in any unfair labour practice. The word 'engage' is more comprehensive in nature as compared to the word 'commit'. In RP Sawant, the issue before the Bombay High Court was whether, by reason of Art 254(2) of the Constitution, the entire gamut of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act 1971 (MRTU & PULP Act), pertaining to unfair labour practices must be deemed to have been repealed, in the light of the insertion of ch VC in the ID Act, which is a Central Act. Srikrishna J of the Bombay High Court observed that there were glaring distinctions between the two enactments, such as the number of unfair labour practices enumerated therein, the treatment of unfair labour practices as offence under the ID Act whereas under the State Act it was not so, and so forth, which lead to the conclusion that the intention of the Parliament in adding ch VC to the Industrial Disputes Act was not to make a consolidated law on the subject.[4]

The term 'unfair labour practice' is a comprehensive one and would appear even to include 'victimisation' in its scope, even though it has received no statutory definition, the term has received judicial attention and interpretation. Its connotation is by no means uncertain, indefinite or vague. It is, however, neither desirable nor possible to lay down the limits of unfair labour practices' in the fast developing course of industrial law. Broadly speaking, 'unfair labour practice' is committed by an employer when he does or omits to do something, which act or omission is the invasion of the legitimate rights or interests of the workmen. Within this class would be included any act or omission of the employer aimed at punishing a workman for his trade union activities or for organised opposition to any proposal of the management. A breach of promise may be illegal, it may amount to breach of contract, it may be a mala fide act, it may even be a fraudulent act, but in so far as it is not inseparably connected with the relationship of employer and employee, it cannot be said to be 'unfair labour practice'.[5] The basic principle in the concept of 'unfair labour practice' is the involvement of the relationship of employer and employee. In other words, the question of 'unfair labour practice' can arise only when something is done or omitted in connection with a matter which has something to do with regulating the relationship of the employer and employee. It is not permissible to ascribe 'unfair labour practice' to something done or omitted in connection with a matter which has nothing to do with the relationship of employer and employee. This is the basic or the fundamental principle underlying the concept of 'unfair labour practice'. A breach of promise or assurance or undertaking by an employer, whatever other consequences it may have, cannot be an 'unfair labour practice'.

Whether an act would constitute an unfair labour practice or not is a question of fact dependent upon the circumstances of each case. For instance, the mere fact of giving promotion to one person and not giving to another without anything further or any other circumstances to lend support, will not lead to the inference of 'unfair labour practice.[6] The Punjab and Haryana High Court in Kapurthala CCB, held that termination of the service of workmen on their completing 230 days, despite the fact that their work was satisfactory, disabling them from completing 240 days of service as required by s 25B with a view to deprive them of the protection of s 25F amounts to 'unfair labour practice' particularly so when other persons were employed in their place.[7] In Balmer Lawrie, on the construction of the words 'failure to implement award' used in item 9 of Sch 4 of the Maharashtra Recognition of Trade Unions and Prevention of Unfair Labour Practices Act, a single judge of the Bombay High Court held that every case of non-implementation of a settlement irrespective of the facts and circumstances or reasons would not necessarily constitute 'failure' so as to be characterised as unfair labour practice. For instance, where a party bona fide is ready and willing to abide by any interpretation of a settlement by a competent court or authority, it cannot be said that such a party 'failed' to implement the settlement so as to be treated as 'unfair labour practice.[8] In Rajasthan SBCC, a single judge of Rajasthan High Court held that if the work was not of a perennial nature and the project was likely to be finished after some time then it could not be held that giving repeated appointment letters for each tenure amounted to unfair labour practice under s 25T.[9]

Victimisation

The line of demarcation between the case of 'unfair labour practice' and 'victimisation' is very slender and quite often indistinct. The two concepts if not synonymous at least considerably overlap. The expression 'victimisation' has not been defined in the statute and is not in any sense a term of law or art. It is an ordinary English word which means that a certain person has become a victim, in other words, that he has been unjustly dealt with. In Bharat Bank, it was suggested to the Supreme Court that 'victimisation' has acquired a special meaning in industrial law and connotes a person who became a victim of the employer's wrath by reason of his trade union activities and that the word could not relate to a person who has been merely unjustly dismissed. However, in the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case, his submission was not considered by the court.[10] In Williamson Magor, the court accepted the interpretation of the word 'victimisation' as the normal meaning of being the victim of unfair and arbitrary action.[11] The concept 'victimisation' has acquired considerable significance in the area of disciplinary action, in the context of the industrial law.[12] Broadly speaking, 'victimisation' means one of the two things. The first is, where the workman concerned is innocent and yet he is being punished because he has in some way displeased the employer, for example, by being an active member of a trade union of workmen who were acting prejudicially to the employer's interest.[13] Likewise, where an employer terminates the services of a workman for refusal to carry out some work which is not part of his duty, it would be a case of victimisation.[14] 'Ordinarily, a person is 'victimised', if he is made a victim or a scapegoat and is subjected to persecution, prosecution or punishment for no real fault or guilt of his own, in the manner, as it were, of a sacrificial victim'.[15]It is not open to an employer to punish or dismiss his employees solely or principally for the reason that he had joined a trade union. Where, therefore, the circumstance that an employee had joined a trade union had at least partially weighed with the employer in punishing him, it would be an act of victimisation, and the punishment inflicted on the workman on this consideration would be vitiated.[16] The second instance of victimisation is, where an employee has committed an offence but is given a punishment quite out of proportion to the gravity of the offence, simply because he has incurred the displeasure of the employer,[17] or the punishment is such as no reasonable employer would impose under the circumstances.[18]

'Victimisation' may partake of various forms, such as pressurising an employee to leave the union or union activities, treating the employee unequally or in a obviously discriminatory manner, for the sole reason of his connection with the union or his particular union activities; inflicting a grossly monstrous punishment which no rational person would impose upon such an employee.[19] For instance, if for a very trifle or venial breach of duty, the employer proposes to dismiss a workman, the tribunal may well consider, whether the employer in imposing the punishment, which was out of proportion to the misconduct of which the workman was guilty, was not motivated by some other factor than the maintenance of discipline and the just protection of the employer.[20] Likewise, if an employer, punishes an employee for a wrong which someone else has committed, it would be right to infer that the employee is victimised by being made a scapegoat or if the employer punishes an employee for something which he has done in another context which has no relation to or bearing on the charge which has been framed against him, the charge and inquiry being only a pretext to punish him, it would be right to infer that the employee is victimised.[21] Similarly, where the material in support of the charge is so flimsy as to be non-existent, it would be a case of 'victimisation'.[22] 'Victimisation' is a serious charge by an employee against an employer which reflects to a degree, upon subjective attitude of the employer evidenced by certain acts and conduct. The onus of establishing 'victimisation' will be upon the person who alleges it. The charge of 'victimisation' being a serious one, it must be properly and adequately pleaded giving all particulars upon which the charge is based to enable the employer to fully meet them. In other words, the charge must not be vague and indefinite. The act of 'victimisation' being an amalgam of facts relating to acts and conduct, inferences and attitudes, these have to be established by safe and sure evidence. Mere allegations, vague suggestions and insinuations are not enough. For instance, the fact that there is a union espousing the cause of the employee in a legitimate trade union activity and an employee is a member or active office bearer thereof, is per se, no crucial instance of 'victimisation'. All particulars of the charge brought out, if believed, must be weighed by the tribunal and a conclusion should be reached on a totality of the evidence produced.

In the words of Goswami J, 'victimisation' is a 'multi-headed monster' to tackle with by industrial adjudication. Whether and under what facts and circumstances a tribunal will accept the plea of victimisation against the employer will depend upon its judicial discretion. But once the tribunal finds that the dismissal of an employee is by way of 'victimisation' or 'unfair labour practice', it will have complete jurisdiction to interfere with the order of dismissal passed by the employer. In that event, the fact that there is no violation of the principles of natural justice, in the course of domestic inquiry, will absolutely lose its importance and efficacy. The mere fact that there is an employees' union and that the concerned employee is a member or an active office-bearer is not sufficient to establish the plea of 'victimisation'. Nor the mere allegations, vague suggestions and insinuations are enough to establish the plea of victimisation. An inference of 'victimisation' in the absence, of evidence on record to show that there was any strained relationship between the employee and the employer on account of the employee's union activities, will not be permissible.[23] In other words, the mere fact that the domestic inquiry was held after due observance of the rules of natural justice, will not show that there could be no 'victimisation.' The two are entirely different. Hence, even after finding in favour of the employer, that the inquiry was in compliance of the rules of natural justice, it is open to the tribunal to examine the question whether there was victimisation or unfair labour practice.[24] It would be open to the tribunal to examine whether the findings of the inquiry officer were perverse, despite its finding that the inquiry was properly held. Though, normally, once it is held that the findings of misconduct alleged against the delinquent workman were properly arrived at and the domestic inquiry was not in any way vitiated, the question of victimisation or the management having a bias against the workman would not arise,[25] the order of punishment itself may be a measure of victimisation if the punishment is shockingly disproportionate to the act of misconduct.[26]

The fact that the relations between the employer and the employee are not happy and the workman was an active trade union member, would by itself be no evidence to prove victimisation. 'Victimisation' must be directly connected with the activities of the delinquent workman inevitably leading to the penal action without necessary proof of a valid charge against him. The question to be asked is; Is the reason for the punishment attributable to a gross misconduct about which there is no doubt or to his particular trade union activity which is frowned upon by the employer? The tribunal will not readily accept the plea of 'victimisation' as an answer to gross misconduct when an employee, be he an active office bearer of the union, commits the misconduct and there is a reliable legal evidence to that effect. In such a case, the employee found guilty cannot be equated with a victim or scapegoat and the plea of 'victimisation' as advanced will fall flat. 'It is, therefore, manifest that if actual fault or guilt meriting the punishment is established, such action will be rid of the taint of victimization.[27] In other words, if it is found that the employee is guilty of gross misconduct then, there can be no question of victimisation because gross misconduct merits dismissal,[28] and in such a case the inference of victimisation from the severity of punishment would not be justified. Once, therefore, in the opinion of the tribunal gross misconduct is established, on legal evidence either by fairly conducted inquiry or before the tribunal on merits, the plea of victimisation will not carry the case of the employee any further because a proved misconduct is an antithesis of victimisation as understood in industrial relations. In such a case, the inference of victimisation from the severity of punishment will not be justified. This is not, however, to say that the tribunal has no jurisdiction to interfere with the order of dismissal on proof of victimisation.[29]

CHAPTER VC Unfair Labour Practices

S. 25U. Penalty for committing Unfair Labour Practices.—

Any person who commits any unfair labour practice shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or with both.

PENALTY FOR COMMITTING AN UNFAIR LABOUR PRACTICE

This section provides penalty for committing an unfair labour practice and mandates that whoever is guilty of any unfair labour practice can be prosecuted before the competent court on a complaint being made by or under the authority of the appropriate Government under s 34(1) of the Act. On the other hand, the Maharashtra Act does not provide for direct prosecution of a party having been engaged in any unfair labour practice. Under that Act, the prosecution has first to be preceded by adjudication by a competent court regarding such engagement in unfair labour practice which may result in a direction under s 30(1)(b) or it may be a subject-matter of interim relief order under s 30(2) of that Act. It is only thereafter that prosecution can be initiated against the party disobeying such order of the court under s 48(1). Therefore, engaging in any unfair labour practice by itself is not an offence under the Maharashtra Act while such commission of unfair labour practice itself is an offence under the Industrial Disputes Act.[30]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VI Penalties

S. 26. Penalty for illegal strikes and lockouts.—

(1) Any workman who commences, continues or otherwise acts in furtherance of, a strike which is illegal under this Act, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to fifty rupees, or with both.

(2) Any employer who commences, continues or otherwise acts in furtherance of a lock-out which is illegal under this Act, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

PUNISHMENT FOR ILLEGAL STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS

The right of the workmen to go on strike and the right of the employer to declare a lockout are now well-recognised as coercive weapons in their battles for collective bargaining. However, these rights, if allowed as an unbridled exercise, would create chaos in the industry. With a view, therefore, to ensure industrial peace and harmony, the legislature has imposed certain restrictions on their use. Section 24 prescribes the circumstances in which strikes and lockouts would become illegal. Section 26(1) prescribes punishment in cases where a workman commences or continues or otherwise acts in furtherance of an illegal strike, which may extend to one month imprisonment or fine which may extend to 50 rupees or both. Section 26(2) prescribes punishment in cases where an employer commences, continues or otherwise acts in furtherance of an illegal lockout, which may extend to one month imprisonment or fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or both. To sustain action under this section, the prosecution has to prove that the accused had the knowledge that the strike or the lockout in question was illegal. In Coats India, a single judge of the Patna High Court quashed the prosecution launched under s 26(2) read with s 10(3) on the ground that the labour court did not record any finding to the effect that the 'closure' of the branch located in Bihar was a lockout.[1]

COGNISANCE OF OFFENCE

Section 34 lays down that no court can take cognisance of any offence punishable under the Act or any abetment of any such offence save on a complaint made by or under the authority of the appropriate Government. Thus, it is not the adjudicatory authorities under the Act, who can punish a person under this section. It is a court of criminal jurisdiction which can take cognisance of the offence on a complaint being made by the appropriate Government or a person authorised by it.[2]

WAIVER

The act of workmen to participate in an illegal strike gives the employer certain rights against the workmen, which are not the creation of the statute but are based on policy, and the employer has every right to waive such rights. In a dispute before the tribunal, waiver can be a valid defense by the workman. Further, the doctrine of waiver by election cannot be made applicable to procedure available for a particular remedy. But the participation itself in an illegal strike cannot be condoned by an employer so as to make that legal which has been made illegal by the statute. In other words, waiver by the employer would not be a defense, to prosecution under this section. The prohibition of strike or lockout in the circumstances mentioned in ss 22 and 23 is based on public policy. Hence strikes or lockouts commenced or continued in contravention of either of these two sections have been made punishable under the Act, subject, however, to the safeguard that a prosecution cannot be started save and except on a complaint made by or under the authority of the appropriate Government.[3]It is now well-settled that to make out a case of implied waiver of a legal right, there must be a clear, unequivocal and decisive act of a party showing such purpose or acts amounting to an estoppel on his part.[4]

STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS CANNOT BE RENDERED ILLEGAL BY SUBSEQUENT LEGISLATION

In ReCalicut Hosieries, a reference of certain disputes, for adjudication made by the State of Madras, was quashed by the Madras High Court being too vague and general. But during the pendency of that reference before the tribunal, the employer had declared a lockout for which he was prosecuted for commencing an illegal lockout. After the reference was quashed, the Madras Government enacted the Madras Act (Act 14 of 1949) validating certain references including the one in this case. The prosecution, proceeding on the basis of the reference being validated by this Act, was prohibited by the court holding that the reference being initially bad, the lockout was not illegal. It was observed that subsequent enactment validating the invalid reference would not turn a legal lockout into an illegal one, as a criminal statute cannot be retrospective in operation in any civilised country without clearest words to that effect.[5]

CHAPTER VI Penalties

S. 27. Penalty for instigation, etc.—

Any person who instigates or incites others to take part in, or otherwise acts in furtherance of, strike or lock-out which is illegal under this Act, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

PUNISHMENT

From a comparison of this section with the previous one, it would appear that the punishment for instigating or inciting strikes or lockouts is far more severe than for commencing or continuing illegal strikes. This is because the legislature intended to deter outside elements from disturbing industrial peace and harmony by instigating and inciting strikes and lockouts. The reason appears to be that the Workers and employers have their own stakes when they have to resort to strikes and lockouts, while the outside element have no such stakes, and they may be motivated in inciting strikes and lockouts for various extraneous reasons which have no relation with the real purpose of collective bargaining. The punishment prescribed by this section is six months' imprisonment or a fine up to rupees one thousand or both.

INSTIGATION AND INCITEMENT

The words 'instigates' and 'incites' in this section should be read to signify something deeper than a mere asking a person to do a particular act. In other words, the ingredients of these two words are something more than mere asking a person to do a particular act. But for stimulating action, words must come from a person who exercises some kind of influence over his audience.[6] There must be something in the nature of solicitation to constitute instigation or incitement. The words seem to convey the meaning 'to goad or urge forward or to provoke or encourage the doing of an act'. What acts amount to instigation or incitement will depend upon the particular facts of each case. In some circumstances, a throw of a finger or a mere turning of the eye may give rise to an inference of either incitement or instigation. In others, even strong words, expressly used may not mean that the person using them was stimulating or suggesting to anyone to do a particular act. The words 'instigates' and 'incites' appear to be synonymous and there must be something tangible in evidence to show that the persons responsible for such action were deliberately trying to stir up other persons to bring out a certain object.[7]

As every strike or lockout is not illegal, any instigation or incitement would not therefore be illegal unless the particular strike or lockout complained of is 'illegal' under the Act. Hence, the person instigating or inciting would be guilty only when it is established that the strike or lockout which he incited or instigated, to his knowledge was illegal. Where apart from positive evidence on the record, the very fact that the accused were on that date, members of the union and that they were fully cognisant of the agreement which rendered the strike or lockout illegal on the grounds covered by the said agreement, was held sufficient to inculpate them.[8] Similarly, when Workers are willing to work on Sundays which entitled them to double the wages of their basic rates, any person instigating or inciting such workers not to work on Sundays will be guilty of instigation and incitement under this section.[9]

CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY OF SECTION 27

This section does not infringe the fundamental rights guaranteed under Arts 19(1)(a) and 19(1)(c) of the Constitution of India, as it places no restriction either upon the freedom of speech or on the right to form associations or unions. Hence the section is not unconstitutional or void.[10]

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VI Penalties

S. 28. Penalty for giving financial aid to illegal strikes and lockouts.—

Any person who knowingly expends or applies any money in direct furtherance or support of any illegal strike or lock-out shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

PUNISHMENT

The giving of financial aid to illegally striking Workers or illegally locking-out employers is prohibited by s 25 of the Act. The punishment for giving financial aid to illegal strikes and lockouts is the same as for instigation for illegal strikes and lockouts under s 27, i.e., imprisonment up to a term of six months and a fine up to 1000 rupees or both. The intendment of the legislature in enacting this provision is also the same as for enacting the previous section.

'ANY PERSON'

The words 'any person' indicate that whether a Worker or a non-Worker who instigates, incites or gives financial aid to illegal strike calculated to disrupt industrial peace and harmony should face penal consequences thereof. However, before the prosecution can successfully bring the accused within the mischief of these two sections, it must be proved that (i) the strike or lockout complained of was illegal, and (ii) the accused had the knowledge that the strike or lockout was illegal.

The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (Act 14 of 1947)

CHAPTER VI Penalties

[11][S. 29. Penalty for breach of settlement or award.—

Any person who commits a breach of any term of any settlement or award, which is binding on him under this Act, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both, [12][and where the breach is a continuing one, with a further fine which may extend to two hundred rupees for every day during which the breach continues after the conviction for the first] and the Court trying the offence, if it fines the offender, may direct that the whole or any part of the fine realised from him shall be paid, by way of compensation, to any person who, in its opinion, has been injured by such breach.

LEGISLATION

The original s 29 was enacted in the original Industrial Disputes Act 1947. It made the breach of a binding settlement or award by any person punishable with a fine up to two hundred rupees on the first conviction and a fine up to 500 rupees on the subsequent conviction. This section was substituted by s 20 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1956 (Act 36 of 1956), whereby the limit on the quantum of fine was removed. Besides the fine, the punishment of imprisonment for a term extending up to six months was also provided. The offender could be punished with fine or imprisonment, or with both. The punishment of imprisonment was introduced with a view to make the breach deterrent.

This provision was also found lacking to have sufficient deterrent effect against some unscrupulous employers who were able to successfully thwart the implementation of settlements or awards by paying fines once, which may be far less than what the obligation would otherwise entail. Thus, workmen were unable to get the benefits flowing from awards or settlements, though employers might have been convicted for the breach thereof. Hence with a view to ensure effective implementation of settlements and awards, it was considered necessary to provide deterrent penalties for continued breaches of settlements and awards. To achieve this object, the Parliament again amended the section by s 6 of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act 1965 (Act 35 of 1965). As a result of this amendment, continuing breach of a settlement or award has been made punishable with additional recurring fine up to 200 rupees for every day during the continuance of the breach after conviction for the first breach. It clearly means that if a breach, which is a continuing one, continues after conviction has been recorded for the first breach, a fresh offence has been created by this amendment and it has been made punishable as shown therein. The crux of the matter, however, is whether the breach in question is a continuing breach.

It is significant to note that continuing breach is only made further punishable by the amending Act. If a breach is not a continuing one and for such a breach conviction has been already recorded, a person for the same breach cannot be again tried and convicted.[13]The expression ‘commission of the offence’ may refer to positive acts as well as to omissions. An offence may be committed by the commission of a positive act or by the omission to do an act. In case of certain acts, the commission of the act would be complete as soon as the act is committed and the offence would be repeated only if the act is repeated. But there may be some positive acts, which by their definition imply the continuance of the commission of the act. However, omission to do a positive continuous act may be made criminal. Here again, the omission once begun does not terminate until a positive act is done.[14]An award of a labour court, though modified by the High Court, is in effect an award of labour court. The non-implementation of such a modified award does not amount to contempt of court, and the only remedy available to the workman is to execute it under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act.[15] There is no need to interfere with the show cause notice issued under s 29, in writ petition, and it is open to the employer to put forth all their arguments before the magistrate.[16] Liability under this section is of 'any person' who continues a breach of any term of a pending settlement or an award. If an individual continues such a breach, he will be punishable. If the offence is committed by a firm, the manager thereof will be deemed to be guilty of the offence. It is not only the manager who will be deemed to be guilty, but also any person concerned with the management of the firm. Consequently, every person of the firm will be deemed to be guilty.[17]

Where the company nominated different authorities for different units for the purpose of signing a settlement, filing written statements and for the implementation of settlements, etc., the Chief General Manager / General Manager in this case, the prosecution launched against the Secretary and Director of the company is bad in law and is liable to be set aside.[18] In United Distillaries, the facts were: An award was made by the industrial tribunal between SKG Sugars and its workmen, which was allegedly breached by the management of the company by retrenching a few workmen contrary to the terms of the award. Subsequently, the company was taken over by United Distillaries Ltd. The findings of the tribunal as appearing in paragraphs 27 and 28 of the said award disclosed that that the tribunal came to a definite conclusion that the question of liability of United Distillaries had to be determined and as per the law laid down by the Supreme Court. It was held that United Distillaries Ltd., was not a necessary party to the proceeding, and that it was summoned without proper cause. The tribunal further held that it was not possible to hold that United Distillaries was successor-in-interest of SKG Sugar Ltd. In view of this factual position, a single judge of Patna High Court quashed the complaint made by the labour commissioner for prosecuting the managerial personnel of United Distillaries Limited.[19]

PUNISHMENT

This section imposes punishment of imprisonment for a term which may extend up to six months, or fine or of both, on any person who commits the breach of any terms of any settlement or award which is binding on him under this Act. On the term of imprisonment there is the upper limit of six months whereas there is no upper limit for the imposition of fine which has been left to the judicial discretion of the court. The court has been given further discretion to impose either or both the penalties provided under this Act. These punishments are in the first instance for the first breach of a settlement or award. It is, however, relevant to bear in mind that merely seeking a reference for adjudication of a dispute covered by a settlement which is in operation will not amount to an offence under this section.[20] But, in case the breach is continuing, further penalty of fine extending up to 200 rupees for every day during which the breach continues after conviction for the first breach, has been provided. Sub-sections (3) and (5) of s 19 show that there are two categories of awards, viz., (i) those which do not impose continuing obligations and decide the industrial dispute under reference once and for all; and (ii) those which impose continuing obligations over a period of time. In the former type of awards, there is no continuing obligation so as to attract any penalty under the law for the continuing breach of the terms of such an award. In such a case, the breach of the terms of Award made punishable under this section is the original breach. The award in such a case does not impose upon the employer, a continuing obligation in the sense that continued non-compliance thereof by the employer would constitute a continuing breach of offence.[21] But the breach of latter type of awards would attract stringent provisions of the recurring penalty for the continuing breach. The court has been given further discretion to pay the whole or any part of the fine realised from the offender to any person who, in its opinion, has been injured by such breach. Before directing the payment of the fine realised to a person, the court has to form its opinion that such person has been injured by the breach complained of.

PRE-REQUISITES OF PUNISHMENT

Before any person can be punished, the prosecution must prove that—

(1) there was an award or settlement in operation at the time of the breach;

(2) the award or settlement was valid in law;

(3) such award or settlement was binding on the accused;

(4) the accused has committed the breach of such award or settlement; and

(5) the complaint regarding the breach was made by the appropriate Government.

MENS REA

Section 29 makes the breach of any terms of any settlement or award, a punishable criminal offence. A criminal offence is only committed when an act which is forbidden by law is done voluntarily. The volition which is the motive force behind a criminal act is mens rea. It is only voluntary acts which amount to offences. If a person is compelled by force of circumstances to perform an act forbidden by law, he cannot be said to do it voluntarily and he will not be held liable for the consequences of that act. In other words, if there is no mens rea, no offence is committed although the act may prove detrimental to an individual or individuals.[22] In Caulfield Holland, the Bombay High Court held that the broad principles which apply in deciding the question as to whether mens rea must be proved in regard to a given criminal offence are well established. Generally speaking, a person cannot be convicted unless he commits an overt act with the wrongful or illegal intention. In other words, the presence of mens rea is usually treated as a condition precedent for successful prosecution of a person. It is, however, open to the legislature to provide for offences where mens rea may not be an essential element. If the legislature expresses its intention in that behalf in an unambiguous and clear language, the principle that mens rea must ordinarily be established in a criminal case would have no application. In the absence of clear and unambiguous language indicating such an intention on the part of legislature, it may be permissible to ascertain the intention of the legislature by examining the object of the statute in question and its general scheme. As it often happens, it is not very difficult to enunciate these broad principles, the difficulty arises in applying them to the facts in a particular case.[23]

On the other hand, the Punjab High Court in BD Meattte, dealing with the words 'any employer who contravenes the provision of s 22 shall be punishable...' in s 29 of the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act 1950, held that if there is no mens rea, no offence is committed although the Act may prove detrimental to an individual or individuals.[24] A single judge of the Orissa High Court, in RD Prasad, dealing with this section after its amendment, followed the reasoning of the Punjab High Court and dissented from the Bombay High Court as according to it, the Bombay case which was decided before the amendment of s 29 had no application.[25]The Bombay High Court view presents the correct law and the view taken by the Punjab and Orissa High Courts is not correct. The reason is that not only the word 'knowingly', unlike in s 25 and s 28 is missing in s 29, the scheme of the Act and the object of its passing indicate that the obligation to comply with the award is unqualified, absolute and categorical, and its breach attracts the penalty provided in s 29 without proof of mens rea as such. Further, if mens rea were to be treated as an essential constituent of the offence under s 29, this provision will become nugatory as it will not be possible to prove mens rea in such cases. Mens rea is a necessary ingredient to be proved for prosecuting a person under s 29 for non-implementation of settlement or award. Only such persons who are authorised by the company for implementation of the settlement or the award should be served with show-cause notices with a copy to the managing director and the secretary for information.[26]

PROSECUTION AFTER EXPIRY OF AWARD OR SETTLEMENT

An award or a settlement is binding as long as it is in operation and has not been terminated by one of the parties thereto by notice under s 19(2) or 19(6). It necessarily follows that so long as the award or settlement remains valid and operative, the employer is bound to implement it and his liability for prosecution under s 29 of the Act for non-compliance continues.[27] Once such period has run out, a person cannot be prosecuted for breach of the award or settlement nor shall he be liable to the penalties provided by s 29, in prosecution. For successfully prosecuting a person, it is necessary to show that, at the time of the breach, the award or the settlement was in operation and binding on him. In other words, a person who commits breach of any terms of any settlement or award shall be liable to the penalties provided by this section in case such breach is committed, while such award or settlement is in force and binding on the accused.[28] Appointment of special public prosecutor under ss 301 and 24(8) of Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 in a prosecution under s 29 of the Act, is in the sole discretion of the State and such appointment could not be insisted upon as of right by a union much less in favour of any particular advocate.[29]

PROSECUTION - NO BAR TO OTHER REMEDIES

The award given by an industrial tribunal in respect either of bonus or higher wages, etc., is enforceable by its own force and by the coercive machinery of the Act, and it is not merely a declaration of a character that furnishes a cause of Action to the employee to bring a suit on its foot to recover the wages.[30] The provision of penalties under s 29 does not deprive individuals of the right to take other action in cases where the award confers any personal right or benefit to a particular employer or employee.[31]Section 33C provides remedy for recovery of money due from an employer under a settlement or award, which can be resorted to by an aggrieved employee to whom the right has accrued by virtue of an award or a settlement or under the provisions of ch V-A, which is not given effect to by the employer. Besides, the Payment of Wages Act 1936 also provides remedy for recovery of wages to a workman from whose wages deductions have been made by the employer. An aggrieved employee can resort to the machinery provided under the Payment of Wages Act 1936 or under s 33C for the recovery of his dues, besides prosecution of the employer under s 29.[32]

DISCHARGE FOR WANT OF PROPER SANCTION - DOES NOT BAR FRESH COMPLAINT

In United Rubber, a complaint was filed against the accused with respect to an offence under s 29 read with s 32 of the Act. The magistrate who took cognisance of the case, passed an order directing the accused to be released from bail bond as the case was instituted without proper sanction and he had no jurisdiction to try it. Subsequently, a fresh complaint on a fresh authorisation was filed against the accused. The order of the magistrate releasing the accused for want of proper sanction was held not to amount to an order of acquittal so as to bar a fresh complaint after rectifying the defect in the sanction.[33]

LIMITATION

For attracting the penalty under this section, there must be breach of any term of any settlement or award, which is binding on a person under this Act. The settlement becomes binding under s 18(1) or 18(3) as soon as it is entered into upon compliance with the requirement of s 12(3) of the Act and the relevant State or Central Rules. But under s 17 A an award becomes binding under s 18(3) only after it becomes enforceable on the expiry of 30 days, from the date of its publication under s 17. Since no award is enforceable before the expiry of 30 days, it does not become binding till the expiry of 30 days from its publication; hence, no breach of the award can be committed by an employer within 30 days after the publication of the award if he does not implement it within that time. Offences under this section are punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months. Therefore, the period of limitation provided for initiation of prosecution under s 468 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, is one year starting from the date of enforceability of the award.[34] A single judge of the Calcutta High Court in Swaranjit Singh, drew a distinction in two types of awards, namely, (1) which decide, the questions under reference once for all, involving personal rights such as directing payment of money, setting aside the discharge or dismissal and awarding reinstatement of workmen or upholding discharge or dismissal; and (2) the awards casting continued obligation on the parties bound by them such as wage-structure, dearness allowance, holidays and other allowances and benefits etc. The awards of the first category do not cast any continuing obligation on the parties bound by the award and there is no question of the period of operation as they decided the questions once for all.[35] A similar view has been taken by a single judge of the Bombay High Court in Ajit Lhoksi, holding that reinstatement as directed by the award should have been made on the 31st day after the publication of the award in the Gazette and that if such reinstatement was not made by the employer then the offence must have been deemed to have been committed on that particular date and hence a complaint filed beyond the period of one year from that date was barred by limitation.[36]

But a single judge of the Kerala high Court in Trichur Urban Bank, has taken a different view on the ground that in the above two cases, the scope of 'continuing offence' as mentioned in s 472 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 was not considered. Accordingly, the persons bound by the award are obliged to comply with the terms thereof and that the obligation continues during the term therein and that the obligation continues during the entire period of one year when the award remains in operation. In other words, unless the employer complies with the directions contained in the award, his obligation continues until the termination of the period during which the award remains in operation. The commission of breach of the terms of the award on the first day of its operation does not absolve him from his obligation and if the obligation survives during the successive days and if he does not comply with the terms during those successive days also, the commission of the breach continues. The breach continues so long as the obligation continues.[37]A priori, the offence continues as a consequence. Cognisance of offences for the breach of such awards under s 29 read with s 32 of the Act will be barred by limitation under s 468(2)(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 if the prosecution is sought to be launched after a period of one year from the date of enforceability of the award. Any prosecution on the basis of such breach of the award will be liable to be set aside. In Subrato Roy, the complaint was filed after a period of 21 months. Apart from holding that in view of the clear language of s 29, the provisions of s 468(2)(b) Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 were not applicable and the case was fully covered by the provisions of s 472, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. A single judge of the Rajasthan High Court held that on the facts of the case the delay was caused not because of the complainant but because of the State Government in according sanction and which delay was caused because of the several adjournments taken by the employer to file a reply to the notice issued by the labour secretary. Thus the employer himself having contributed to the delay in filing the complaint, it was a fit case where the delay could even be condoned in the interest of justice under the provisions of s 473 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[38] In EE, KD Panchayat, a single judge of the Gujarat High Court held that the non-compliance of the award and commission of breach of the award was a continuing wrong. It was further held that a person who commits breach of award commits a continuous wrong and he commits the offence every day till the date he complies with the terms of the award passed by the labour court, and that action under s 29 can be taken even after one year from the date of publication of the award.[39]

CHAPTER VI Penalties

S. 30. Penalty for disclosing confidential information.—

Any person who wilfully discloses any such information as is referred to in section 21 in contravention of the provisions of that section shall, on complaint made by or on behalf of the trade union or individual business affected, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

REQUIREMENTS TO BE SATISFIED BEFORE IMPOSING PENALTY

Section 21 provides for certain matters to be kept confidential. This section provides a penalty for disclosing any information in contravention of s 21. The penalty is a severe one, i.e., imprisonment up to a term of six months or a fine up to rupees one thousand or both. For exercising the power under this section, the following requirements must be satisfied:

(i) The accused must have wilfully disclosed the information prescribed by s 21. In other words, the prosecution must prove mens rea for successfully prosecuting the accused.

(ii) There should be a complaint made by or on behalf of (a) the trade union, or (b) the individual business affected.

(iii) Such complaint should be made to the appropriate Government.

(iv) The complaint should be tried by a court of competent jurisdiction.

This section not only provides the safeguard against double complaint, it also by use of the word ‘wilfully’ makes mens rea specifically, an essential constituent of the offence under it. The word ‘wilfully’ in contradistinction to the word ‘knowingly’ indicates not only that a person should have knowingly disclosed the confidential information but he should have deliberately done so. In other words, a casual or inadvertent disclosure may not attract the penal consequences of this section.[40]

CHAPTER VI Penalties

[41][S. 30A. Penalty for closure without notice.—

Any employer who doses down any undertaking without complying with the provisions of section 25FFA, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five thousand rupees, or with both.]

PENALTY

This section provides penalty for closing down any undertaking without complying with the provisions of s 25FFA. The penalty is of a deterrent nature. Non-compliance of the provisions of s 25FFA exposes the employer to the punishment of imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or fine extending up to 5000 rupees, or both. If the prosecution proves two facts, viz., (i) that the employer has in fact, closed down the undertaking, and (ii) that the provisions of s 25FFA(1) have not been complied with, the employer will be liable to the penalty contemplated by this section. Once that is proved, no other defense is available to the employer against the penalty except where the undertaking falls within the proviso to sub-s (1) or has been exempted under sub-s (2). The quantum of actual punishment appears to have been left to the discretion of the court. The court will take cognisance of the offence under this section only as provided under s 34.

ANNEXURE I - The Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules, 1957[1]

In exercise of the powers conferred by section 38 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947), the Central Government hereby makes the following rules, the same having been previously published as required by sub-section (1) of the said section, namely:—

CHAPTER I PRELIMINARY

R. 1. Title and application.—

These rules may be called the Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules, 1957.

They extend to Union territories in relation to all industrial disputes and to the States in relation only to an industrial dispute concerning—

(a) any industry carried on by or under the authority of the Central Government or by a railway company; or

(b) a banking or an insurance company, a mine, an oil-field, or a major, port; or

(c) any such controlled industry as may be specified under section 2(a)(i) of the Act by the Central Government:

[2][]

R. 2. Interpretation.—

In these rules, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) "Act" means the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947);

(b) "Chairman" means the Chairman of a Board or Court or, if the Court consists of one person only, such person;

(c) "Committee" means a Works Committee constituted under sub-; section (1) of section 3 of the Act;

(d) "form" means a form in the Schedule to these rules;

(e) "section" means a section of the Act;

(f) in relation to an industrial dispute in a Union territory, for which the appropriate Government is the Central Government, reference to the Central Government or the Government of India shall be construed as a reference to the Administrator of the territory, and reference to the Chief Labour Commissioner (Central), Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) and the [3][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] shall be construed as reference to the appropriate authority, appointed in that behalf by the Administrator of their territory;

4[(g)with reference to clause (g) of section 2, it is hereby prescribed that—

(i) in relation to an industry, not being an industry referred to in sub-clause (ii), carried on by or under the authority of a Department of the Central or a State Government, the officer-in-charge of the industrial establishment shall be the 'employer' in respect of that establishment; and

(ii) in relation to an industry concerning railways, carried on by or under the authority of a Department of the Central Government,—

(a) in the case of establishment of a Zonal Railway, the General Manager of that Railway shall be the 'employer' in respect of regular railway servants other than casual labour;

(b) in the case of an establishment independent of a Zonal Railway, the officer-in-charge of the establishment shall be the 'employer' in respect of regular railway servants other than casual labour; and

(c) the District Officer-in-charge or the Divisional Personnel Officer or the Personnel Officer shall be the 'employer' in respect of casual labour employed on Zonal Railway or any other railway establishment independent of a Zonal Railway.]

R. 49. Voting in election.—

If the number of candidates who have been validly nominated is equal to the number of seats, the candidates shall be forthwith declared duly elected.

If in any constituency the number of candidates is more than the number of seats allotted to it, voting shall take place on the day fixed for election.

The election shall be held in such manner as may be convenient for each electoral constituency.

The voting shall be conducted by the employer, and if any of the candidates belong to a union such of them as the union may nominate shall be associated with the election.

Every workman entitled to vote at an electoral constituency shall have as many votes as there are seats to be filled in the constituency:

Provided that each voter shall be entitled to cast only one vote in favour of any one candidate.

R. 50. Arrangements for election.—

The employer shall be responsible for all arrangements in connection with the election.

R. 51. Officers of the Committee.—

The Committee shall have among its office-bearers a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, a Secretary and a Joint-Secretary. The Secretary and the Joint-Secretary shall be elected every year.

The Chairman shall be nominated by the employer from amongst the employer's representatives on the Committee and he shall, as far as possible, be the head of establishment.

The Vice-Chairman shall be elected by the members, on the Committee representing the workers, from amongst themselves:

Provided that in the event of equality of votes in the election of the Vice-Chairman, the matter shall be decided by draw of a lot.]

The Committee shall elect the Secretary and the Joint Secretary provided that where the Secretary is elected from amongst the representatives of the employers, the Joint Secretary shall be elected from amongst the representatives of the workmen and vice versa:

Provided that the post of the Secretary or the Joint Secretary, as the case may be, shall not be held by a representative of the employer or the workmen for two consecutive years:

[35][Provided further that the representatives of the employer shall not take part in the election of the Secretary or Joint Secretary, as the case may be, from amongst the representatives of the workmen and only the representatives of the workmen shall be entitled to vote in such elections.]

In any election under sub-rule (3), in the event of equality of votes, the matter shall be decided by a draw of lot.]

R. 52. Term of office.—

The term of office of the representatives on the committee other than a member chosen to fill a casual vacancy shall be two years.]

A member chosen to fill a casual vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term of his predecessor.

A member who without obtaining leave for the Committee, fails to attend three consecutive meetings of the Committee shall forfeit his membership.

[38][R. 53. Vacancies.—

In the event of workmen's representative ceasing to be a member under sub-rule (3) of rule 52 or ceasing to be employed in the establishment or in the event of his ceasing to represent the trade or vocation he was representing, or resignation or death, his successor shall be elected in accordance with the provisions of this Part from the same category, group, section, shop or department to which the member vacating the seat belonged.]

R. 54. Power to co-opt.—

The Committee shall have the right to co-opt in a consultative capacity persons employed in the establishment having particular or special knowledge of a matter under discussion. Such co-opted member shall not be entitled to vote and shall be present at meetings only for the period during which the particular question is before the Committee.

R. 55. Meetings.—

The Committee may meet as often as necessary but not less often than once in three months (a quarter).

The Committee shall at its first meeting regulate its own procedure.

R. 56. Facilities for meeting, etc.—

The employer shall provide accommodation for holding meetings of the Committee. He shall also provide all necessary facilities to the Committee and to the members thereof for carrying out the work of the Committee. The Committee shall ordinarily meet during working hours of the establishment concerned on any working day and the representative of the workmen shall be deemed to be on duty while attending the meeting.

The Secretary of the Committee may with the prior concurrence of the Chairman, put up notice regarding the work of the Committee on the notice board of the establishment.]

[41][R. 56A. Submission of returns.—

The employer shall submit half yearly returns as in Form G 1 in triplicate to the [42][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] concerned not later than the 20th day of the month following the half-year.]

R. 57. Dissolution of Works Committee.—

The Central Government, or where the power under section 3 has been delegated to any officer or authority under section 39, such officer or authority may, after making such inquiry as it or he may deem fit, dissolve any Works Committee at any time, by an order in writing, if he or it is satisfied that the Committee has not been constituted in accordance with these rules or that not less than two-thirds of the number of representatives of the workmen have without any reasonable justification failed to attend three consecutive meetings of the Committee or that the Committee has, for any other reason, ceased to function:

Provided that where a Works Committee is dissolved under this rule the employer may, and if so required by the Central Government or, as the case may be, by such officer or authority, shall take steps to re-constitute the Committee in accordance with these rules.

(b) the Vice-President;

(c) the Secretary (including the General Secretary);

(d) a Joint Secretary;

(e) any other officer of the trade union authorised in this behalf by the President and Secretary of Union.]

Where a settlement is arrived at in the course of conciliation proceeding the Conciliation Officer shall send a report thereof to the Central Government together with a copy of the memorandum of settlement signed by the parties to the dispute.

Where a settlement is arrived at between an employer and his workmen otherwise than in the course of conciliation proceeding before a Board or a Conciliation Officer, the parties to the settlement shall jointly send a copy thereof to the Central Government, the Chief Labour Commissioner (Central) New Delhi, and the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) and to the [46][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] concerned.

R. 59. Complaints regarding change of conditions of service, etc.—

Every complaint under section 33A of the Act shall be presented in triplicate in Form I and shall be accompanied by as many copies of the complaint as there are opposite parties to the complaint.

Every complaint under sub-rule (1) shall be verified at the foot by the workmen making it or by some other person proved to the satisfaction of the Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal to be acquainted with the facts of the case.

The person verifying shall specify, by references to the numbered paragraphs of the complaint, what he verifies of his own knowledge and what he verifies upon information received and believed to be true.

The verification shall be signed by the person making it and shall state the date on which and the place at which it was signed.

R. 60. Application under section 33.—

An employer intending to obtain the express permission in writing of the Conciliation Officer, Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3) of section 33 shall present an application in Form J in triplicate to such Conciliation Officer, Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal and shall file along with the application as many copies thereof as there are opposite parties.

An employer seeking the approval of the Conciliation Officer, Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, of any action taken by him under clause (a) or clause (b) of sub-section (2) of section 33 shall present an application in Form K in triplicate to such Conciliation Officer, Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal and shall file along with the application as many copies thereof as there are opposite parties.

Every application under sub-rule (1) or sub-rule (2) shall be verified at the foot by the employer making it or by some other person proved to the satisfaction of the Conciliation Officer, Board, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal to be acquainted with the facts of the case.

The person verifying shall specify by reference to the numbered paragraphs of the application, what he verifies of his own knowledge and what he verifies upon information received and believed to be true.

The verification shall be signed by the person making it and shall state the date on which and the place at which it was signed.

R. 61. Protected workmen.—

Every registered trade union connected with an industrial establishment, to which the Act applies, shall communicate to the employer before the [47][30th April] every year, the names and addresses of such of the officers of the union who are employed in that establishment and who, in the opinion of the union should be recognised as “protected workmen”. Any change in the incumbency of any such officer shall be communicated to the employer by the union within fifteen days of such change.

The employer shall, subject to section 33, sub-section (4), recognise such workmen to be “protected workmen” for the purposes of sub-section (3) of the said section and communicate to the union, in writing, within fifteen days of the receipt of the names and addresses under sub-rule (1), the list of workmen recognised as protected workmen [48][for the period of twelve months from the date of such communication].

Where the total number of names received by the employer under subrule (1) exceeds the maximum number of protected workmen, admissible for the establishment, under section 33, sub-section (4), the employer shall recognise as protected workmen only such maximum number of workmen:

Provided that where there is more than one registered trade union in the establishment, the maximum number shall be so distributed by the employer among the unions that the numbers of recognised protected workmen in individual unions bear roughly the same proportion to one another as the membership figures of the unions. The employer shall in that case intimate in writing to the President or the Secretary of the union the number of protected workmen allotted to it:

Provided further that where the number of protected workmen allotted to a union under this sub-rule falls short of the number of officers of the union seeking protection, the union shall be entitled to select the officers to be recognised as protected workmen. Such selection shall be made by the union and communicated to the employer within five days of the receipt of the employer's letter.

When a dispute arises between an employer and any registered trade union in any matter connected with the recognition of 'protected workmen' under this rule, the dispute shall be referred to the [49][any Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) or] [50][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] concerned, whose decision thereon shall be final.

[51][R. 62. Application for recovery of dues.—

Where any money is due from an employer to a workman or a group of workmen under a settlement or an award or under the provisions of Chapter VA, [52][Chapter VB], the workman or the group of workmen, as the case may be, may apply in Form K 1 for the recovery of the money due:

Provided that in the case of a person authorised in writing by the workman, or in the case of the death of the workman the assignee or heir of the deceased workman, the application shall be made in Form K 2.

Where any workman or a group of workmen is entitled to receive from the employer any money or any benefit which is capable of being computed in terms of money, the workman or the group of workmen, as the case may be, may apply to the specified Labour Court in Form K 3 for the determination of the amount due or, as the case may be, the amount at which such benefit should be computed:]

[53][Provided that in the case of the death of a workman, application shall be made in Form K 4 by the assignee or heir of the deceased workman].

R. 63. Appointment of Commissioner.—

Where it is necessary to appoint a Commissioner under sub-section (3) of section 33C of the Act, the Labour Court may appoint a person with experience in the particular industry, trade or business involved in the industrial dispute or a person with experience as a judge of civil court, or as a stipendiary magistrate or as a Registrar or Secretary of a Labour Court, or Tribunal constituted under any Provincial Act or State Act or of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal constituted under the Act or of the Labour Appellate Tribunal constituted under the Industrial Disputes (Appellate Tribunal) Act, 1950.

R. 64. Fees for the Commissioner, etc.—

The Labour Court shall, after consultation with the parties, estimate the probable duration of the enquiry and fix the amount of the Commissioner's fees and other incidental expenses and direct the payment thereof into the nearest treasury, within a specified time, by such party or parties and in such proportion as it may consider fit. The Commission shall not issue until satisfactory evidence of the deposit into the treasury of the sum fixed is filed before the Labour Court:

Provided that the Labour Court may from time to time direct that any further sum or sums be deposited into the treasury within such time and by such parties as it may consider fit:

Provided further that the Labour Court may in its discretion, extend the time for depositing the sum into the treasury.

The Labour Court may, at any time, for reasons to be recorded in writing, vary the amount of the Commissioner's fees in consultation with the parties.

The Labour Court may direct that the fees shall be disbursed to the Commissioner in such installments and on such date as it may consider fit.

The undisbursed balance, if any, of the sum deposited shall be refunded to the party or parties who deposited the sum in the same proportion as that in which it was deposited.

R. 65. Time for submission of report.—

Every order for the issue of a Commission shall appoint a date, allowing sufficient time, for the Commissioner to submit his report.

If for any reason the Commissioner anticipates that the date fixed for the submission of his report is likely to be exceeded he shall apply, before the expiry of the said date, for extension of time setting forth grounds thereof and the Labour Court shall take such grounds into consideration in passing orders on the application:

Provided that the Labour Court may grant extension of time notwithstanding that no application for such extension has been received from the Commissioner within the prescribed time limit.

R. 66. Local investigation.—

In any industrial dispute in which the Labour Court deems a local investigation to be requisite or proper for the purpose of computing the money value of a benefit, the Labour Court may issue a commission to a person referred to in rule 63 directing him to make such investigation and to report thereon to it.

R. 67. Commissioner's report.—

The Commissioner after such local inspection as he deems necessary and after reducing to writing the evidence taken by him, shall return such evidence together with his report in writing signed by him to the Labour Court.

The report of the Commissioner and the evidence taken by him (but not evidence without the report) shall be evidence in the industrial dispute and shall form part of the record of the proceedings in the industrial dispute; but the Labour Court or, with the permission of Labour Court any of the parties to the industrial dispute may examine the Commissioner personally before the Labour Court regarding any of the matters referred to him or mentioned in his report or as to his report, or, as to the manner in which he had made the investigation.

Where the Labour Court is for any reason dissatisfied with the proceedings of the Commissioner it may direct such further enquiry to be made as it shall think fit.

R. 68. Powers of Commissioner.—

Any Commissioner appointed under these rules may unless otherwise directed by the order of appointment—

(a) examine the parties themselves and any witnesses whom they or any of them may produce, and any other person whom the Commissioner thinks proper to call upon to give evidence in the matter referred to him;

(b) call for and examine documents and other things relevant to the subject of enquiry;

(c) at any reasonable time enter upon or into any premises mentioned in the order.

R. 69. Summoning of witnesses, etc.—

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (5 of 1908) relating to the summoning, attendance, examination of witnesses and penalties to be imposed upon witnesses, shall apply to persons required to give evidence or to produce documents before the Commissioner under these rules.

Every person who is summoned and appears as a witness before the Commissioner shall be entitled to payment by the Labour Court out of the sum deposited under rule 64, of an allowance for expenses incurred by him in accordance with the scale for the time being in force for payment of such allowance to witnesses appearing in the Civil Courts.

R. 70. Representation of parties before the Commissioner.—

The parties to the Industrial Dispute shall appear before the Commissioner, either in person or by any other person who is competent to represent them in the proceedings before the Labour Court.

[54][R. 70A. Preservation of records by the National Industrial Tribunals, Industrial Tribunals or Labour Courts.—

The records of the National Industrial Tribunals, Industrial Tribunals or Labour Courts specified in Column 1 of the Table below shall be preserved, for the periods specified in the corresponding entry in column 2 thereof after the proceedings are finally disposed of by such National Tribunals, Industrial Tribunals, Labour Courts.

R. 71. Notice of strike.—

The notice of strike to be given by workmen in public utility service shall be in Form L.

On receipt of a notice of a strike under sub-rule (1), the employer shall forthwith intimate the fact to the Conciliation Officer having jurisdiction in the matter.

R. 72. Notice of lock-out.—

The notice of lock-out to be given by an employer carrying on a public utility service shall be in Form M. [55][The notice shall be displayed conspicuously by the employer on a notice board at the main entrance to the establishment and in the Manager's Office:

Provided that where a registered trade union exists, a copy of the notice shall also be served on the Secretary of the Union.]

R. 73. Report of lock-out or strike.—

The notice of lock-out or strike in a public utility service to be submitted by the employer under sub-section (3) of section 22, shall be in Form N.

R. 74. Report of notice of strike or lock-out.—

The report of notice of a strike or lock-out to be submitted by the employer under sub-section (6) of section 22, shall be sent by registered post or given personally to the [56][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] appointed for local area concerned, with copy by registered post to—

The Administrative Department of the Government of India concerned,

The Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) for the Zone,

Chief Labour Commissioner (Central),

Ministry of Labour of the Government of India,

Labour Department of the State Government concerned, and

The District Magistrate concerned.

R. 75. Register of settlements.—

The [57][Conciliation Officer] shall file all settlements effected under this Act in respect of disputes in the area within his jurisdiction in a register maintained for the purpose as in Form O.

[58][R. 75A. Notice of lay-off.—

If any workmen employed in an industrial establishment as defined in the explanation below section 25A not being an industrial establishment referred to in sub-section (1) of that section is laid-off, then, the employer concerned shall give notices of commencement and termination of such lay-off in Forms O-1 and O-2 respectively within seven days of such commencement or termination, as the case may be.

Such notices shall be given by an employer in every case irrespective of whether, in his opinion, the workman laid off is or is not entitled to compensation under section 25C .]

[59][R. 75B. Application for permission for lay-off under section 25M.—

Application for permission to lay-off any workman under sub-section (1), or for permission to continue a lay-off under [60][sub-section (3)] of section 25M shall be made in Form O-3 and delivered to the authority specified under sub-section (1) either personally or by registered post acknowledgment due and where the application is sent by registered post the date on which the same is delivered to the said authority shall be deemed to be the date on which the application is made, for the purposes of [61][sub-section (5)] of the said section.

The application for permission shall be made in triplicate and copies of such application shall be served by the employer on the workmen concerned and a proof to that effect shall also be submitted by the employer along with the application.]

The employer concerned shall furnish to the authority to whom the application for permission has been made such further information as the authority considers necessary for arriving at a decision on the application, as and when called for by such authority, so as to enable the authority to communicate the permission or refusal to grant permission within the period specified in [63][sub-section (5)] of section 25M.

Where the permission to lay-off has been granted by the said authority, the employer concerned shall give to the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) concerned, a notice of commencement and termination of such lay-off in Forms O-1 and O-2 respectively and where permission to continue a lay-off has been granted by the said authority, the employer shall give to the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) concerned, a notice of commencement of such lay-off in Form O-1, in case such a notice has not already been given under sub-rule (1) of rule 75A, and a notice of termination of such lay-off in Form O-2.

The notice of commencement and termination of lay-off referred to in subrule (4) shall be given within the period specified in sub-rule (1) of rule 75A.]

[64][R. 76. Notice of retrenchment.—

If any employer desires to retrench any workman employed in his industrial establishment who has been in continuous service for not less than one year under him (hereinafter referred to as 'workman' in this rule and in rules 77 and 78), he shall give notice of such retrenchment as in Form P to the Central Government, the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central) and Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central) and the Employment Exchange concerned and such notice shall be served on that Government, the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central), the Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central), and the Employment Exchange concerned by registered post in the following manner:—

(a) where notice is given to the workman, notice of retrenchment shall be sent within three days from the date on which notice is given to the workman;

(b) where no notice is given to the workman and he is paid one month's wages in lieu thereof, notice of retrenchment shall be sent within three days from the date on which such wages are paid; and

(c) where retrenchment is carried out under an agreement which specifies a date for the termination of service, notice of retrenchment shall be sent so as to reach the Central Government, the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central), the Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central), and the Employment Exchange concerned, at least one month before such date:

Provided that if the date of termination of service agreed upon is within 30 days of the agreement, the notice of retrenchment shall be sent to the Central Government, the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central), the Assistant Commissioner (Central), and the Employment Exchange concerned, within 3 days of the agreement.]

[65][R. 76A. Notice of, and application for permission for, retrenchment.—

Notice [66][or, as the case may be, the application under] sub-section (1) of section 25N for retrenchment shall be served in Form PA and served on the Central Government or such authority as may be specified by the Government under the said clause either personally or by registered post acknowledgment due and where the notice is served by registered post, the date on which the same is delivered to the Central Government or the authority shall be deemed to be date of service of the notice for the purposes of [67][sub-section (4)] of the said section.

The notice or, as the case may be, the application, shall be made in triplicate and copies of such notice or, as the case may be, the application, shall be served by the employer on the workmen concerned and a proof to that effect Shall also be submitted by the employer along with the notice or, as the case may be, the application.

The employer concerned shall furnish to the Central Government or the authority to whom the notice for retrenchment has been given or the application for permission for retrenchment has been made, under subsection (1) of section 25N, such further information as the Central Government or, as the case may be, the authority considers necessary for arriving at a decision on the notice or, as the case may be, the application, as and when called for by such authority so as to enable the Central Government or the authority to communicate its permission, or refusal to grant permission within the period specified in sub-section (4) of section 25N .]

[72][R. 76B.] Notice of closure.—

If an employer intends to close down an undertaking he shall give notice of such closure in Form Q to the Central Government, the Regional Labour Commissioner (Central), the Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central), and the Employment Exchange concerned, by registered post.]

[73][R. 76C. Notice of, and application for permission for, closure.—

Notice under sub-section (1) of section 25-O of intended closure shall be given in Form QA and served on the Central Government either personally or by registered post acknowledgment due.]

[74][A copy of such application shall be served simultaneously by registered post on the President or Secretary of registered trade union(s) functioning in the establishment and a notice in this regard shall also be displayed conspicuously by the employer on a notice board at the main entrance to 1 Sub-rule the establishment for the information of all the concerned workmen at the same time when applications are served on the Central Government.]

The notice, or, as the case may be, the application shall be made intriplicate.

The employer concerned shall furnish to the Central Government to whom the notice of intended closure has been given or the application for permission to close down has been made such further information as that Government considers necessary, for arriving at a decision on the notice, or, as the case may be, the application, and calls for from such employer.]

R. 77. Maintenance of seniority list of workmen.—

The employer shall prepare a list of all workmen in the particular category from which retrenchment is contemplated arranged according to the seniority of their service in that category and cause a copy thereof to be pasted on a notice board in a conspicuous place in the premises of the industrial establishment at least seven days before the actual date of retrenchment.

R. 78. Re-employment of retrenched workmen.—

At least ten days before the date on which vacancies are to be filled, the employer shall arrange for the display on a notice board in a conspicuous place in the premises of the industrial establishment details of those vacancies and shall also give intimation of those vacancies by registered post to every one of all the retrenched workmen eligible to be considered thereof, to the address given by him at the time of retrenchment or at any time thereafter:

Provided that where the number of such vacancies is less than the number of retrenched workmen, it shall be sufficient if intimation is given by the employer individually to the senior-most retrenched workmen in the list referred to in rule 77 the number of such senior-most workmen being double the number of such vacancies:

Provided further that where the vacancy is of a duration of less than one month there shall be no obligation on the employer to send intimation of such vacancy to individual retrenched workmen:

[77][Provided also that if a retrenched workman, without sufficient cause being shown in writing to the employer, does not offer himself for re-employment on the date or dates specified in the intimation sent to him by the employer under this sub-rule, the employer may not intimate to him the vacancies that may be filled on any subsequent occasion.]

Immediately after complying with the provisions of sub-rule (1), the employer shall also inform the trade unions connected with the industrial establishment, of the number of vacancies to be filled and names of the retrenched workmen to whom intimation has been sent under that sub-rule:

Provided that the provisions of this sub-rule need not be complied with by the employer in any case where intimation is sent to every one of the workmen mentioned in the list prepared under rule 77.

R. 79. Penalties.—

Any breach of these rules shall be punishable with fine not exceeding fifty rupees.

R. 80. Repeal.—

The Industrial Disputes (Central) Rules, 1947, are hereby repealed:

Provided that any order made or action taken under the rules so repealed shall be deemed to have been made or taken under the corresponding provisions of these rules.

FORM OF REPORT OF STRIKE OR LOCK-OUT IN A PUBLIC UTILITY SERVICE

Information to be supplied in this form immediately on the occurrence of a strike or lock-out in a public utility service to the [6][Assistant Labour Commissioner (Central)] for the local area concerned

Name of undertaking	Station and district	Normal working strength	Number of workers involved		Strike or lock- out	Date of commencement of strike or lock-out	Cause	Was notice of strike or lockout given; if so on what date and for what period	Is there any permanent agency or agreement in the undertaking for the settlement of disputes between the employer and workmen? If any exist, particulars thereof	Any other information
			Directly	Indirectly
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11

Notes : Column (3). Give the average number of workmen employed during the month previous to the day on which the strike or lock-out occurred. While reckoning the average, omit the days on which the attendance was not normal for reasons other than individual reasons of particular workmen. Thus days on which strike or lock-out occurs or communal holiday is enjoyed by a large section of workers should be omitted.

Column (4). If say, 200 workers in a factory strike work and in consequence the whole factory employing 1,000 workers has to be closed then, 200 should be shown under "directly" and the remaining under "indirectly". If the strike of 200 workers does not affect the working of the other departments of the factory, the number of workers involved would only be 200, which figure should appear under 'directly' and column 'indirectly' would be blank.

Column (8). Give the main causes of the dispute as well as the immediate cause that led to the strike or lock-out.

ANNEXURE II - The Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946

(Act No. 20 of 1946)

[23rd April, 1946]

An Act to require employers in industrial establishments formally to define conditions of employment under them

Whereas it is expedient to require employers in industrial establishments to define with sufficient precision the conditions of employment under them and to make the said conditions known to workmen employed by them.

It is hereby enacted as follow:

S. 1. Short title, extent and application.—

(1) This act may be called the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946.

(2) It extends to [1][the whole of India [2][* * *].]

3[(3) It applies to every industrial establishment wherein one hundred or more workmen are employed, or were employed on any day of the preceding twelve months:

Provided that the appropriate Government may, after giving not less than two months' notice of its intention so to do, by notification in the Official Gazette, apply the provisions of this Act to any industrial establishment employing such number of number of persons less than one hundred as may be specified in the notification.]

[4][* * * *]

5[(4) Nothing in this Act shall apply to-

(i) any industry to which the provisions of Chapter VII of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1946, apply; or

(ii) any industrial establishment to which the provisions of the Madhya Pradesh Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1961 apply :

Provided that notwithstanding anything contained in the Madhya Pradesh Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1961, the provisions of this Act shall apply to all industrial establishments under the control of the Central Government .]

S. 2. Interpretation.—

In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

6[(a)"appellate authority" means an authority appointed by the appropriate Government by notification in the Official Gazette to exercise in such area as may be specified in the notification the functions of an appellate authority under this Act :

Provided that in relation to an appeal pending before an Industrial Court or other authority immediately before the commencement of the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Amendment Act, 1963, that Court or authority shall be deemed to be the appellate authority;]

(b) "appropriate Government" means in respect of industrial establishments under the control of the Central Government or a [7][Railway administration] or in a major Port, mine or oil field, the Central Government, and in all other in all other cases the State Government:

[8][Provided that where question arises as to whether any industrial establishment is under the control of the Central industrial establishment is under the control of the Central Government that Government may, either on a reference made to it by the employer or the workman or a trade union or other representative body of the workmen, or on its own motion and after giving the parties an opportunity of being heard, decide the question and such decision shall be final and binding on the parties;]

9[(c)"Certifying Officer" means a Labour Commissioner or a Regional Labour Commissioner, and includes any other officer appointed by the appropriate Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, to perform all or any of the functions of a Certifying Officer under this Act;]

(d) "employer" means the owner of an industrial establishment to which this Act for the time being applies, and includes—

(i) in a factory, any person named under [10][clause (f) of sub-section (1) of Section 7 of the Factories Act, 1948], as manager of the factory;

(ii) in any industrial establishment under the control of any department of any Government in India, the authority appointed by such Government in this behalf, or where no authority is so appointed, the head of the department;

(iii) in any other industrial establishment, any person responsible to the owner for the supervision and control of the industrial establishment;

(e) "industrial establishment" means

(i) an industrial establishment as defined in clause (ii) of Section 2 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936, or

11[(ii) a factory as defined in clause (m) of Section 2 of the Factories Act, 1948, or]

(iii) a railway as defined in clause (4) of Section 2 of the Indian Railway Act, 1890, or

(iv) the establishment of a person who, for the purpose of fulfilling a contract with the owner of any industrial establishment, employs workmen;

(f) "prescribed' means prescribed by rules made by the appropriate Government under this Act;

(g) "standing orders" means rules relating to matters set out in the Schedule:

(h) "trade union" means a trade union for the time being registered under the Indian Trade Union Act, 1926 (16 of 1926);

12[(i) "wages" and "workman" have the meanings respectively assigned to them in clauses (rr) and (s) of Section 2 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947).]

S. 3. Submission of draft standing orders.—

(1) Within six months from the date on which this Act becomes applicable to an industrial establishment, the employer shall submit to the Certifying Officer five copies of the draft standing orders proposed by him for adoption in this industrial establishment.

(2) Provision shall be made in such draft for every matter set out in the Schedule which may be applicable to the industrial establishment, and where Model standing orders have been prescribed shall be, so far as is practicable, in conformity with such model.

(3) The draft standing orders submitting under this section shall be accompanied by a statement giving prescribed particulars of the workmen employed in the industrial establishment including the name of the trade union, if any, to which they belong.

(4) Subject to such conditions as may be prescribed, a group of employers in similar industrial establishments may submit a joint draft of standing orders under this section.

S. 4. Conditions for certification of standing orders.—

Standing orders shall be certifiable under this Act if—

(a) provision is made therein for every matter set out in the Schedule which is applicable to the industrial establishment, and

(b) the standing orders are otherwise in conformity with the provisions of this Act; and it [13][shall be the function] of the Certifying Officer or appellate authority to adjudicate upon the fairness or reasonableness of the provisions of any standing orders.

S. 5. Certification of standing orders.—

(1) On receipt of the draft under Section 3, the Certifying Officer shall forward a copy thereof to the trade union, if any, of the workmen, or where there is no such trade union, if any, of the workmen or where there is no trade union, to the workmen in such manner as may be prescribed, together with a notice in the prescribed form requiring objections, if any, which the workmen may desire to make to the draft standing orders to be submitted to him within fifteen days from the receipt of the notice.

(2) After giving the employer and the trade union or such other representatives of the workmen as may be prescribed an opportunity of being heard, the Certifying Officer shall decide whether or not any modification of or addition to the draft submitted by the employer is necessary to render the draft standing orders certifiable under this Act, and shall make an order in writing accordingly.

(3) The Certifying Officer shall thereupon certify the draft standing orders, after making any modifications there in which his order under sub-section (2) may require, and shall within seven days thereafter send copies of the certified standing orders authenticated in the prescribed manner and of his order under sub-section (2) to the employer and to the trade union or other prescribed representatives of the workmen.

S. 6. Appeals.—

(1) [14][Any employer, workmen, trade union or other prescribed representatives of the workmen] aggrieved by the order of the Certifying Officer under sub-section (2) of Section 5 may, within [15][thirty days] from the date on which copies are sent under sub-section (3) of that section, appeal to the appellate authority, and the appellate authority, whose decision shall be final, shall by order in writing confirm the standing orders either in the form certified by the Certifying Officer or after amending the said standing orders by making such modifications thereof or additions there to as it thinks necessary to render the standing orders certifiable under this Act.

(2) The appellate authority shall, within seven days of its order under sub-section (1) send copies thereof to the Certifying Officer, to the employer and to the trade union or other prescribed representatives of the workmen, accompanied, unless it has confirmed without amendment the standing orders as certified by the Certifying Officer, by copies of the standing orders a certified by it and authenticated in the prescribed manner.

S. 7. Date of operation of standing orders.—

Standing orders shall, unless an appeal is preferred under Section 6, come into operation on the expiry of thirty days from the date on which authenticated copies thereof are sent under sub-section (3) of Section 5, or where an appeal as aforesaid is preferred, on the expiry of seven days from the date on which copies of the order of the appellate authority are sent under sub-section (2) of Section 6.

S. 8. Register of standing orders.—

A copy of all standing orders as finally certified under this Act shall be filed by the Certifying Officer in a register in the prescribed form maintained for the purpose, and the Certifying Officer shall furnish a copy there of to any person applying there for on payment of the prescribed fee.

S. 9. Posting of standing orders.—

The text of the standing orders as finally certified under this Act shall be prominently posted by the employer in English and in the language understood by the majority of his workmen on special boards to be maintained for the purpose at or near the entrance through which the majority of the workmen enter the industrial establishment and in all departments thereof where the workmen are employed.

S. 10. Duration and modification of standing orders.—

(1) Standing orders finally certified under this Act shall not, except on agreement between the employer and the workmen [16][or a trade union or other representative body of the workmen] be liable to modification until the expiry of six months from the date on which the standing orders or the last modifications thereof came in to operation.

17[(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (1), an employer or workman [18][or a trade union or other representative body of the workmen] may apply to the Certifying Officer to have the standing orders modified, and such application shall be accompanied by five copies of [19][] the modifications proposed to be made, and where such modifications are proposed to be made by agreement between the employer and the workmen [20][or a trade union or other representative body of the workmen], a certified copy of that agreement shall be filed along with the application.]

(3) The foregoing provisions of this Act shall apply in respect of an application under sub-section (2) as they apply to the certification of the first standing orders.

21[(4) Nothing contained in sub-section (2) shall apply to an industrial establishment in respect of which the appropriate Government is the Government of the State of Gujarat or the Government of the State of Maharashtra.]

[22][S. 10-A. Payment of subsistence allowance.—

(1) Where any workman is suspended by the employer pending investigation or inquiry into complaints or charges of misconduct against him, the employer shall pay to such workman subsistence allowance—

(a) at the rate of fifty per cent of the wages which workman was entitled to immediately preceding the date of such suspension, for the first ninety days of suspension; and

(b) at the rate of seventy-five per cent of such wages for the remaining period of suspension if the delay in the completion of disciplinary proceedings against such workman is not directly attributable to the conduct of such workman.

(2) If any dispute arises regarding the subsistence allowance payable to a workman under sub-section (1), the workman or the employer concerned may refer the dispute to the Labour Court, constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947), within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the industrial establishment wherein such workman is employed is situate and the Labour Court to which the dispute is so referred shall, after giving the parties an opportunity of being heard, decide the dispute and such decision shall be final and binding on the parties.

(3) Not with standing anything contained in the foregoing provisions of this section, where provisions relating to payment of subsistence allowance under any other law for the time being in force in any State are more beneficial than the provisions of this section, the provisions of such other law shall be applicable to the payment of subsistence allowance in that State.]

S. 11. Certifying Officers and appellate authorities to have powers of Civil Court.—

23[(1)] Every Certifying Officer and appellate authority shall have all the powers of a Civil Court for the purposes of receiving evidence, administering oaths,, enforcing the attendance of witnesses, and compelling the discovery and production of documents, and shall be deemed to be a Civil Court within the meaning of [24][Sections 345 and 346 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 (2 of 1974)].

25[(2) Clerical or arithmetical mistakes in any order passed by a Certifying officer or appellate authority, or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission may, at any time, be corrected by that Officer or authority or the successor in office of such officer or authority, as the case may be.]

S. 12. Oral evidence in contradiction of standing orders not admissible.—

No oral evidence having the effect of adding to or otherwise varying or contradicting standing orders finally certified under this Act shall be admitted in any Court.

[26][S. 12-A. Temporary application of model standing orders.—

(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in Sections to 12, for the period commencing on the date on which this Act becomes applicable to an industrial establishment and ending with the date on which the standing orders as finally certified under this Act come into operation under Section 7 in that establishment, the prescribed model standing orders shall be deemed to be adopted in that establishment, and the provisions of Section 9, sub-section (2) of Section 13 and Section 13-A shall apply to such model standing orders as they apply to the standing orders so certified.

(2) Nothing contained in sub-section (1) shall apply to an industrial establishment in respect of which the appropriate Government is the Government of the State of Gujarat or the Government of the State of Maharashtra.]

S. 13. Penalties and procedure.—

(1) An employer who fails to submit draft standing orders as required by Section 3 or who modifies his standing orders otherwise than in accordance with Section 10, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to five thousand rupees, and in the case of a continuing offence with a further fine which may extend to two hundred rupees for every day after the first during which the offence continues.

(2) An employer who does any act in contravention of the standing orders finally certified under this Act for his industrial establishment shall be punishable with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees, and in the case of a continuing offence with a further fine which may extend to twenty-five rupees for every day after the first during which the offence continues.

(3) No prosecution for an offence punishable under this section shall be instituted except with the previous sanction of the appropriate Government.

(4) No Court inferior to that of [27][a Metropolitan Magistrate or Judicial Magistrate of the second class] shall try any offence under this section.

[28][S. 13-A. Interpretation, etc., of standing orders.—

If any question arises as to the application or interpretation of a standing order certified under this Act, any employer or workman [29][or a trade union or other representative body of the workmen] may refer the question to any one of the Labour Courts constituted under the Industrial Disputes Act,. 1947, and specified for the disposal of such proceeding by the appropriate Government by notification in the Official Gazette, and the Labour Court to which the question is so referred shall, after giving the parties an opportunity of being heard, decide the question and such decision shall be final and binding on the parties.

S. 13-B. Act not to apply to certain industrial establishments.—

Nothing in this Act shall apply to an industrial establishment in so far as the workmen employed therein are persons to whom the Fundamental and Supplementary Rules, Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal)Rules, Civil Services (Temporary Service) Rules, Revised Leave Rules, Civil Service Regulations, Civilians in Defense Service (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules or the Indian Railway Establishment Code or any other rules or regulations than may be notified in this behalf by the appropriate Government in the Official Gazette, apply.]

S. 14. Power of exempt.—

The appropriate Government may by notification in the Official Gazette exempt, conditionally or unconditionally any industrial establishment or class of industrial establishments from all or any of the provisions of this Act.

[30][S. 14-A. Delegation of powers.—

The appropriate Government may by notification in the Official Gazette, direct that any power exercisable by it under this Act or any rules made thereunder shall, in relation to such matters and subject to such conditions, if any, as may be specified in the direction, be exercisable also-

(a) Where the appropriate Government is the Central Government, by such officer or authority subordinate to the Central Government or by the State Government, or by such officer or authority subordinate to the State Government, as may be specified in the notification;

(b) where the appropriate Government is a State Government, by such officer or authority subordinate to the State Government, as may be specified in the notification.]

S. 15. Power to make rules.—

(1) The appropriate Government may after previous publication, by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules[31] to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may—

(a) prescribe additional matters to be included in the Schedule, and the procedure to be followed in modifying standing orders certified under this Act in accordance with any such addition;

(b) set out model standing orders for the purposes of this Act;

(c) prescribe the procedure of Certifying Officers and appellate authorities;

(d) Prescribe the fee which may be charged for copies of standing orders entered in the register of standing orders;

(e) provide for any other matter which is to be or may be prescribed;

Provided that before any rules are made under clause (a) representatives of both employers and workmen shall be consulted by the appropriate Government.

32[(3) Every rule made by the Central Government under this section shall be laid as soon as may be after it is made, before each House of Parliament while it is in session for a total period of thirty days which may be comprised in one session or [33][in two or more successive sessions, and if, before the expiry of the session immediately following the session or the successive sessions aforesaid] both Houses agree in making any modification in the rule or both Houses agree that the rule should not be made, the rule shall thereafter have effect only in such modified form or be of no effect, as the case may be; so however that any such modification or annulment shall be without prejudice to the validity of anything previously done under that rule.]

ANNEXURE III - The Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules, 1946[1]

In exercise of the powers conferred by Section 15, read with clause (b) of Section 2 of the Industrial employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946 (XX of 1946), the Central Government is pleased to make the following rules, the same having been previously published as required by sub-section (1) of the said Section 15, namely:

R. 1.

These rules may be called the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules, 1946,

They extend to all Union territories, and shall also apply in any State (other than a Union territory) to industrial establishments under the control of the Central Government or a Railway administration or in a major port, mine or oilfield].

R. 2.

In these rules, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) 'Act' means the Industrial Employment (standing Orders) Act, 1946 (XX of 1946);

(b) 'Form' means a form set out in Schedule II appended to these rules.

[3][R. 2-A.

In the Schedule to the Act, after Item 10, the following additional matters shall be inserted, namely:—

"R. 10-A. Additional matters to be provided in Standing Orders relating to industrial establishments in coal mines—

[4][R. 3.

Save as other wise provided in sub-rule (2), the Model Standing Orders for the purposes of the Act shall be those set out in Schedule I appended to these rules.

The Model Standing Orders for the purposes of the Act in respect of industrial establishment in coal mines shall be those set out in Schedule I-A appended to these rules.]

R. 4.

An application for certification of standing orders shall be made in Form I.

R. 5.

The prescribed particulars of workmen for purposes of sub-section (3) of Section 3 of the Act shall be:—

total number employed;

number of permanent workmen;

number of temporary workmen;

number of casual Workmen,] number of badlis or substitutes,

* * *]

number of probationers, number of apprentices, name of the trade union, or trade unions, if any, to which the workmen belong, remarks.

R. 6.

As soon as may be after he receives an application under Rule 4 in respect of an industrial establishment, the Certifying Officer shall-

(a) Where there is a trade union of the workmen, forward a copy of the draft standing orders to the trade union together with a notice in Form II;

(b) where there is no such trade union, call a meeting of the workmen to elect three representatives, to whom he shall, upon their election, forward a copy of the draft standing orders together with a notice in Form II.

R. 7.

Standing orders certified in pursuance of sub-section (3) of Section 5 or sub-section (2) of Section 6 of the Act shall be authenticated by the signature and seal of office of the Certifying Officer or the appellate authority as the case may be, and shall be forwarded by such officer or authority within a week of authentication by registered letter post to the employer and to the trade union, or, as the case may be, the representatives of the workmen elected in pursuance of Rule. 6.

[7][R. 7-A.

Any person desiring to prefer an appeal in pursuance of sub-section (1) of Section 6 of the Act shall draw up a memorandum of appeal setting out the grounds of appeal and forward it in quintuplicate to the appellate authority accompanied by a certified copy of the standing orders, amendments or modifications, as the case may be. [8][The memorandum of appeal shall be in [9][Form IV-A] set out in Schedule II to these rules.]

The appellate authority shall, after giving the appellant an opportunity of being heard, confirm the standing orders, amendments or modifications as certified by the Certifying Officer unless it considers that there are reasons for giving the other parties to the proceedings a hearing before a final decision is made in the appeal.

Where the appellate authority does not confirm the standing orders, amendments or modifications it shall fix a date for the hearing or the appeal and direct notice thereof to be given—

(a) where the appeal is filed by the employer or a workman, to trade unions of the workmen of the industrial establishments, and where there are no such trade unions to the representatives of workmen elected under clause (b) of Rule 6, or as the case may be, to the employer;

(b) where the appeal is filed by a trade union, to the employer and all other trade unions of the workmen of the industrial establishment;

(c) where the appeal is filed by the representatives of the workmen, to the employer and any other workmen whom the appellate authority joins as a party to the appeal.

The appellant shall furnish each of the respondents with a copy of the memorandum of appeal.

The appellate authority may at any stage call for any evidence it considers necessary for the disposal of the appeal.

On the date fixed under sub-rule [(3) for the hearing of the appeal, the appellate authority shall take such evidence as it may have called for or consider to be relevant.]

R. 8.

The register required to be maintained by Section 8 of the Act shall be in Form III and shall be properly bound, and the Certifying Officer shall furnish a copy of standing orders approved for an industrial establishment to any person applying therefor on payment of a fee [10][calculated at the following rates per copy—

(i) for the first two hundred words or less, seventy-five paise;

(ii) for every additional one hundred words or fraction thereof, thirty-seven paise:

Provided that, where the said standing orders exceeds five pages, the approximate number of words per page shall be taken as the basis for calculating the total number of words to the nearest hundred, for the purpose of assessing the copying fee.]

SCHEDULE I [11][MODEL STANDING ORDERS IN RESPECT OF INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS NOT BEING INDUSTRIAL ESTABLISHMENTS IN COAL MINES]

1. These orders shall come into force on.....

2. Classification of workmen.—

(a) Workmen shall be classified as—

(1) permanent,

(2) Probationers,

(3) badlis,

12[(3A) * * *]

(4) temporary,

(5) casual,

(6) apprentices.

(b) A "permanent workman" is a workman who has been engaged on a permanent basis and includes any person who has satisfactorily completed a probationary period of three months in the same or another occupation in the industrial establishment, including breaks due to sickness, accident, leave, lock-out, strike (not being an illegal strike) or involuntary closure of the establishment.

(c) A "probationer" is a workman who is provisionally employed to fill a permanent vacancy in a post and has not completed three months' service therein. If a permanent employee is employed as a probationer in a new post he may, at any time during the probationary period of three months, be reverted to his old permanent post.

(d) A "badli" is a workman who is appointed in the post of a permanent workman or probationer who is temporarily absent.

(e) A "temporary workman" is a workman who has been engaged for work which is of an essentially temporary nature likely to be finished within a limited period.

(f) A "casual workman" is a workman whose employment is of a casual nature.

(g) An "apprentice" is a learner who is paid an allowance during the period of his training.

[13][(h) * * *]

3. Tickets.—

(1) Every workman shall be given a permanent ticket unless he is a probationer, badli, temporary worker or apprentice.

(2) Every permanent workman shall be provided with a departmental ticket showing his number, and shall, on being required to do so, show it to any person authorized by the manager to inspect it.

(3) Every badli shall be provided with the badli card on which shall be entered the days on which he has worked in the establishment, and which shall be surrendered if he obtains permanent employment.

(4) Every temporary workman shall be provided with a 'temporary' ticket which he shall surrender on his discharge.

(5) Every casual worker shall be provided with a "casual" card, on which shall be entered the days on which he has worked in the establishment.

(6) Every apprentice shall be provided with an 'apprentice' card, which shall be surrendered if he obtains permanent employment.

4. Publication of working time.—

The periods and hours of work for all classes of workers in each shift shall be exhibited in English and in the principal languages of workman employed in the establishment on notice-boards maintained at or near the main entrance of the establishment and at the time-keeper's office, if any.

5. Publication of holidays and pay-days.—

Notices specifying (a) the days observed by the establishment as holidays, and (b) pay-days shall be pasted on the said notice-boards.

6. Publication of wage rates.—

Notices' specifying the rates of wages payable to all classes of workmen and for all classes of work shall be displayed on the said notice-boards.

[14][7. Shift working.—

More than one shift may be worked in a department or departments or any section of a department of the establishment at the discretion of the employer. If more than one shift is worked, the workmen shall be liable to be transferred from one shift to another. No shift working shall be discontinued without two months' notice being given in writing to the workmen prior to such discontinuance, provided that no such notice shall be necessary if the closing of the shift is under agreement with the workmen affected. If as a result of the discontinuance of the shift working, any workmen are to be retrenched, such retrenchment shall be effected, in accordance with the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947), and the rules made thereunder. If shift working is restarted, the workmen shall be given notice and re-employed in accordance with the provisions of the said Act and the said rules.]

[15][7-A. Notice of changes in shift working.—

Any notice of discontinuance or of restarting of a shift working required by Standing Order 7 shall be in the [16][Form IV-A] and shall be served in the following manner, namely :

The notice shall be displayed conspicuously by the employer on a notice-board at the main entrance to the establishment [17][**]:—

Provided that where any registered trade union of workmen exists, a copy of the notice shall also be served by registered post on the Secretary of such union.]

8. Attendance and late coming.—

All workmen shall be at work at the time fixed and notified under Paragraph 4. Workmen attending late will be liable to the deductions provided for in the Payment of Wages Act, 1936.

Note.—All workmen shall have to do the work in establishment at the time fixed and notified under Para 4. There is a provision for deduction in the payment if some one becomes late according to the Payment of Wages Act. 1936.

9. Leave.—

(1) Holidays with pay will be allowed as provided for in [18][Chapter VIII of the Factories Act, 1948], and other holidays in accordance with law, contract, custom and usage.

(2) A workman who desires to obtain leave of absence shall apply to the [19][employer or any other officer of the industrial establishment specified in this behalf by the employer], who shall issue orders on the application within a week of its submission or two days prior to the commencement of the leave applied for, whichever is earlier, provided that if the leave applied for is to commence on the date of the application or within three days thereof, the order shall be given on the same day. If the leave asked for is granted a leave pass shall be issued to the worker. If the leave is refused or postponed, the fact of such refusal or post postponement and the reasons there for shall be recorded in writing in a register to be maintained for the purpose, and if the worker so desires, a copy of the entry in the register shall be supplied to him. If the workman after proceeding on leave desires an extension thereof he shall apply to the [20][employer or the officer specified in this behalf by the employer] who shall send a written reply either granting or refusing extension of leave to the workman if his address is available and if such reply is likely to reach him before the expiry of the leave originally granted to him.

(3) If the workman remains absent beyond the period of leave originally granted or subsequently extended, he shall lose his lien on his appointment unless he (a) returns within 8 days of the expiry of the leave and (b) explains to the satisfaction of the [21][employer or the officer specified in this behalf by the employer], his inability to return before the expiry of his leave. In case the workman loses his lien on his appointment, he shall been titled to be kept on the badly list.

10. Casual leave.—

A workman may be granted casual leave of absence with or without pay not exceeding 10 days in the aggregate in a calendar year. Such leave shall not be for more than three days at a time except in case of sickness. Such leave is intended to meet special circumstances which cannot be foreseen. Ordinarily, the previous permission of the head of the department in the establishment shall be obtained before such leave is taken, but when this is not possible, the head of the department shall, as soon as may be practicable, be informed in writing of the absence from and of the probable duration of such absence.

11. Payment of wages.—

(1) Any wages, due to the workmen but not paid on the usual pay day on account of their being unclaimed, shall be paid by the employer on an unclaimed wage pay day in each week, which shall be notified on the notice-boards as aforesaid.

(2) All workmen will be paid wages on a working day before the expiry of the seventh or the tenth day after the last day of the wage period in respect of which the wages are payable, according as the total number of workmen employed in the establishment does not or does exceed one thousand.

12. Stoppage of work.—

(1) The employer may, at any time, in the event of fire, catastrophe, breakdown of machinery or stoppage of power-supply, epidemics, civil commotion or other cause beyond his control, stop any section or sections of the establishment, wholly or partially for any period or periods without notice.

(2) In the event of such stoppage during working hours, the workmen affected shall be notified by notices put upon the notice-board in the department concerned, [22][and at the office of the employer and at the time-keeper's office, if any], as soon as practicable, when work will be resumed and whether they are to remain or leave their place of work. The workmen shall not ordinarily be required to remain for more than two hours after the commencement of the stoppage. If the period of detention does not exceed one hour the workmen so detained shall not be paid for the period of detention. If the period of detention exceeds one hour, the workmen so detained shall be entitled to receive wages for the whole of the time during which they are detained as a result of the stoppage. In the case of piece-rate workers, the average daily earning for the previous month shall be taken to be the daily wage. No other compensation will be admissible in case of such stoppage. Whenever particable, reasonable notice shall be given of resumption of normal work.

(3) In case where workmen are laid off for short periods on account of failure of plant or a temporary curtailment of production, the period of unemployment shall be treated as compulsory leave either with or without pay, as the case may be. When, however, workmen have to be laid off for an indefinitely long period, their services may be terminated after giving them due notice or pay in lieu thereof.

(4) The employer may in the event of a strike affecting either wholly or partially any section or department of the establishment close down either wholly or partially such section or department and any other section or department affected by such closing down. The fact of such closure shall be notified by notices put on the notice-board in the section or department concerned and in the time-keeper's office, if any, as soon as practicable. The workmen concerned shall also be notified by a general notice, prior to resumption of work, as to when work will be resumed.

13. Termination of employment.—

(1) For terminating employment of a permanent workmen, notice in writing shall be given either by the employer or the workmen - one month's notice in the case of monthly-rated workmen and two weeks' notice in the case of other workmen: one month's or two week's pay, as the case may be, may be paid in lieu of notice.

23[(2) No temporary workman whether monthly-rated, weekly-rated or piece-rated, and no probationer or badli shall be entitled to any notice or pay in lieu thereof, if his services are terminated.

Provided that no temporary workman shall be terminated by way of punishment unless he has been given an opportunity of explaining the charges of misconduct, alleged against him in the manner prescribed in Paragraph 14].

(3) Where the employment of any workmen is terminated, the wages earned by him and other dues, if any, shall be paid before the expiry of the second working day from the day on which his employment is terminated.

14. Disciplinary action for misconduct.—

(1) A workman may be fined up to two per cent of his wages in a month for the following acts and omissions, namely:

Note.—Specify the acts and omissions which the employer may notify with the previous approval of the Government or of the prescribed authority in pursuance of section 8 of the Payment of Wages Act, 1936.

(2) A workman may be suspended for a period not exceeding four days at a time, or dismissed without notice or any compensation in lieu of notice, if he is found to be guilty of misconduct: —

(3) The following acts and omissions shall be treated as misconduct.

(a) wilful in subordination or disobedience, whether alone or in combination with others, to any lawful and reasonable order of a superior;

(b) theft, fraud or dishonesty in connection with the employer's business or property;

(c) willful damage to or loss of employer's goods or property;

(d) taking or giving bribes or any illegal gratification;

(e) habitual absence without leave or absence without leave for more than 10 days;

(f) habitual late attendance;

(g) habitual breach of any law applicable to the establishment;

(h) riotous or disorderly behaviors during working hours at the establishment or any act subversive of discipline;

(i) habitual negligence or neglect of work;

(j) frequent repetition of any act or omission for which a fine may be imposed to a maximum of 2 per cent of the wages in a month;

(k) striking work or inciting others to strike work in contravention of the provision of any law, or rule having the force of law;

24[(l) Sexual harassment which includes such unwelcome sexual determined behaviour (whether directly or by implication) as—

(i) physical contact and advances; or

(ii) a demand or request for sexual favours; or

(iii) sexually coloured remarks; or

(iv) showing pornography; or

(v) any other unwelcome physical verbal or non-verbal conduct of sexual nature.]

[25][Provided that where there is a complaint of sexual harassment within the meaning of clause (I) of sub-paragraph (3), the Companies Committee constituted under sub-paragraph (3B) in each establishment for inquiring into such complaints, shall, notwithstanding anything contained in paragraph 15, be deemed to be the inquiring authority appointed by the employer for the purpose of these rules.

(3A) The Complaints Committee shall hold the inquiry, unless separate procedure has been prescribed for the Complaints Committee for holding such inquiry into the complaints of sexual harassment, as far as practicable, in accordance with the procedure laid down in these rules;

(3B) The Complaints Committee shall consist of—

(a) a Chairperson who shall be a woman;

(b) two members representing Non-Government Organisation (NGO) or any other body which is familiar with the issue of sexual harassment of nominees of the National or State Human Rights Commission or the National or State Commission for Women familiar with the issue of sexual harassment; to, be nominated by the employer:

Provided that one of the two members of the Complaints Committee shall be a woman.

(3C) The Complaints Committee shall make and submit every year an annual report, to the appropriate Government, of the complaints and action taken.

(3D) The employers or their agents shall report, to the appropriate Government, on the compliance of the guidelines issued by the Central Government in pursuance of the directions of the Supreme Court in Writ Petition (Criminal) Nos. 666-670 of 1992 (Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan) including on the reports of the Complaints Committee].

(a) Where a disciplinary proceeding against a workman is contemplated or is pending or where criminal proceedings against him in respect of any offence are under investigation or trial and the employer is satisfied that it is necessary or desirable to place the workman under suspension, he may, by order in writing suspend him with effect from such date as may be specified in the order. A statement setting out in detail the reasons for such suspension shall be supplied to the workman within a week from the date of suspension.

27[(b) A workman who is placed under suspension shall be paid subsistence allowance in accordance with the provisions of section 10-A of the Act.]

28[(ba) In the enquiry, the workman shall be entitled to appear in person or to be represented by an office-bearer of a trade union of which he is a member.

(bb) The proceedings of the enquiry shall be recorded in Hindi or in English or the language of the State where the industrial establishment is located, whichever is preferred by the workman.

(bc) The proceedings of the inquiry shall be completed within a period of three months:

Provided that the period of three months may, for reasons to be recorded in writing, be extended by such further period as may be deemed necessary by the inquiry officer.]

(c) If on the conclusion of the enquiry or, as the case may be, of the criminal proceedings, the workman has been found guilty of the charges framed against him and it is considered, after giving the workman concerned a reasonable opportunity of making representation on the penalty proposed, that an order of dismissal or suspension or fine or stoppage of annual increment or reduction in rank would meet the ends of justice, the employer shall pass an order accordingly:

Provided that when an order of dismissal is passed under this clause, the workman shall be deemed to have been absent from duty during the period of suspension and shall not be entitled to any remuneration for such period, and the subsistence allowance already paid to him shall not be recovered:

Provided further that where the period between the date on which the workman was suspended from duty pending the inquiry or investigation or trial and the date on which an order or suspension was passed under this clause exceeds four days, the workman shall be deemed to have been suspended only for four days or for such shorter period as is specified in the said order of suspension and for the remaining period he shall be entitled to the same wages as he would have received if he had not been placed under suspension, after deducting the subsistence allowance paid to him for such period:

Provided also that where an order imposing fine or stoppage of annual increment or reduction in rank is passed under this clause, the workman shall be deemed to have been on duty during the period of suspension and shall be entitled to the same wages as he would have received if he had not been placed under suspension, after deducting the subsistence allowance paid to him for such period:

Provided also that in the case of a workman to whom the provisions of clause (2) of Article 311 of the Constitution apply, the provisions of that article shall be complied with.

(d) If on the conclusion of the inquiry, or as the case may be, or the criminal proceedings, the workman has been found to be not guilty of any of the charges framed against him, he shall be deemed to have been on duty during the period of suspension and shall be entitled to the same wages as he would have received if he had not been placed under suspension after deducting the subsistence allowance paid to him for such period.

(e) The payment of subsistence allowance under this standing order shall be subject to the workman concerned not taking up any employment during the period of suspension.]

29[(5)] In awarding punishment under this standing order, the [30][authority imposing the punishment]shall take into account any gravity of the misconduct, the previous record, if any, of the workman and any other extenuating or aggravating circumstances, that may exist. A copy of the order passed by the [31][authority imposing the punishment] shall be supplied to the workman concerned.

32[(6)

(a) A workman aggrieved by an order imposing punishment may within twenty-one days from the date of receipt of the order, appeal to the appellate authority.

(b) The employer shall, for the purposes of Clause (a) specify the appellate authority.

(c) The appellate authority, after giving an opportunity to the workman of being heard shall pass order as he thinks proper on the appeal within fifteen days of its receipt and communicate the same to the workman in writing.]

15. Complaints.—
All complaints arising out of employment including those relating to unfair treatment or wrongful exaction on the part of the employer or his agent, shall be submitted to the manager or other person specified in this behalf with the right of appeal to the employer.

16. Certificate on termination of service.—
Every permanent workman shall be entitled to a service certificate at the time of his dismissal, discharge or retirement from service.

Note.—There is a provision under this Act for issuing a service certificate at the time of dismissal, discharge or retirement and every person is entitled to take such certificate.

17. Liability of[33][employer].—
The [34][employer] of the establishment shall personally be held responsible for the proper and faithful observance of the standing orders.

[35][17-A.

(1) Any person desiring to prefer an appeal in pursuance of sub-section(1) of Section 6 of the Act shall draw up a memorandum of appeal setting out the ground of appeal and forward it in quintuplicate to the appellate authority accompanied by a Certified copy of the standing orders, amendments or modifications, as the case may be.

(2) The appellate authority shall, after giving the appellant an opportunity of being heard, confirm the standing orders, amendments or modifications as certified by the certifying officer unless it considers that there are reasons for giving the other parties to the proceedings a hearing before a final decision is made in the appeal.

(3) Where the appellate authority does not confirm the standing orders, amendments or modifications it shall fix a date for the hearing of the appeal and direct notice thereof to be given—

(a) where the appeal is filed by the employer or a workman, to trade unions of the workmen of the industrial establishments, and where there are no such trade unions to the representatives of workman elected under Cl. (b) of rule 6, or as the case may be, to the employer;

(b) where the appeal is filed by a trade union to the employer and all other trade unions of the workmen of the industrial establishment;

(c) where the appeal is filed by the representatives of the workmen, to the employer and any other workman whom the appellate authority joins as a property to the appeal.

(4) The appellant shall furnish each of the respondents with a copy of the memorandum of appeal.

(5) The appellate authority may at any stage call for any evidence it considers necessary for the disposal of the appeal.

(6) On the date fixed, under sub-rule (3) for the hearing of the appeal, the appellate authority shall take such evidence as it may have called for or consider to be relevant].

18. Exhibition of standing orders.—
A copy of these orders in English and in Hindi shall be pasted at [36][* * *] and on a notice-board maintained at or near the main entrance to the establishment and shall be kept in a legible condition.

(c) A "probationer" is one who is provisionally employed to fill a vacancy in a permanent post and has not completed three months' service in that post unless the probationary period is extended. If a permanent workmen is employed as a probationer in a new post he may, at any time, during the probationary period not exceeding three months, be reverted to his old permanent post unless the probationary period is extended.

(d) A 'badli' or substitute is one who is appointed in the post of a permanent workman or a probationer who is temporarily absent: but he would cease to be a 'Badli" on completion of a continuous period of service of one year (190 attendances in the case of below ground workman and 240 attendances in the case of any other workman) in the same post or other post or posts in the same category or earlier if the post is vacated by the permanent workman or probationer. A "badli" working in place of a probationer would be deemed to be permanent after completion of the probationary period.

(e) A "temporary" workman is a workman who has been engaged for work which is of an essentially temporary nature likely to be finished within a limited period. The period within which it is likely to be finished should also be specified but it may be extended from time to time, if necessary.

(f) An "apprentice" is a learner who is either paid an allowance or not paid any allowance during the period of his training, which shall inter alia be specified in his term of contract.

(g) A "casual" workman is a workman who has been engaged for work which is of an essentially casual nature.

40[(h) * * *]

4. Every workman shall be given a ticket appropriate to his classification at the time of his appointment and shall, on being required to do so, show it to the person authorized by the employer in that behalf. The said ticket shall carry the signature or thumb-impression of the workman concerned. If the workman looses his ticket, the Manager shall provide him with another ticket on a payment of 25 paise.

5. Display of notices.—

(a) The period and hours of work for all classes of workmen in each shift shall be exhibited in English and the language understood by the majority of workmen employed in the establishment on notice-boards maintained at or near the main entrance of the establishment and at the time-keeper's office, if any.

(b) Notices, specifying (a) the days observed by the establishment as holidays and (b) pay days shall be posted on the said Notice-boards,

(c) notices specifying the rates of wages and scales of allowances payable to all classes of workmen and for all classes of work shall be displayed on the said notice-boards.

6. Payment of wages.—

(a) Wages shall be paid direct to the individual workmen on any working day between the hours 6.00 a.m. and 6.00 p.m. at the office of the mine. The manager or any other responsible person authorized by him shall witness and attest the payments and note the date of payment in the wage register. Payment of wages to a contractor's workman shall be made at a place to be specified by the manager and it shall be witnessed by a nominee of the employer deputed for this purpose in writing.

(b) Any wages due to a workman but not paid on the usual pay day on account of their being unclaimed shall be paid by the employer on such unclaimed wage pay day in each week as may be notified to the workmen. If the workman so desires, the unpaid wages and other dues payable to him shall be remitted to his address by money order after deducting there from the money order commission charges. All claims for the unpaid wages shall be presented to the employer within a period of twelve months from the date on which the wages become due.

(c) Overtime shall be worked and wages thereof paid in accordance with the provisions of the Mines Act, 1952, as amended by the Mines (Amendment) Act, 1959, and as may be prescribed from time to time. For work on weekly rest day, the workman shall be paid as laid down in any agreement or award or as the case may be, as per usage or custom.

7. Shift working.—

More than one shift may be worked in a department or departments of any section of a department of the establishment at the discretion of the employer. If more than one shift is worked a workman shall be liable to be transferred from one shift to another. No shift working shall be discontinued without two months' notice being given in writing to the workmen prior to such discontinuance: provided that no such notice shall be necessary if the closing of the shift is under an agreement with the workman affected. If as a result of the discontinuance of shift working, any workmen are to be retrenched, such retrenchment shall be effected in accordance with the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947), and the rules made there under. If shift working is restarted, the workmen shall be given notice and re-employed in accordance with the provisions of the said Act and the said rules.

8. Attendance.—

All workmen shall be at work at the mine at the time fixed and notified to them.

9. Absence from place of work.—

Any workman, who after going underground or after coming to his work in the department in which he is employed, is found absent from his proper place of work during working hours without permission from the appropriate authority or without any sufficient reason shall be liable to be treated as absent for the period of his absence.

10. Festival holidays and leave.—

(a) There shall be seven paid festival holidays or as laid down in an agreement or an award in force. Out of these seven days, the Republic Day, Independence Day and Mahatma Gandhi's Birthday shall be allowed without option and the rest of the days shall be fixed by agreement or local custom. Whenever a workman has to work on any of these holidays, he shall, at his option be entitled to either thrice the wages for the day or twice the wages for the day on which he work and in addition to avail himself of a substituted holiday with wages on any other day or as laid down in an agreement or an award in force.

(i) The workmen shall be entitled to leave with wages in accordance with the provisions contained in Chapter VII of Mines Act, 1952.

(ii) Normally a workman will not be refused the leave applied for by him. But the employer may refuse, revoke or curtail the leave applied for by workman, if the exigencies of work so demand. Wages in lieu of leave shall be paid to a workman, where he has been refused the leave asked for and in cases where he cannot accumulate the leave any further. If a workman is refused leave in a particular year in the interest of work, it would be open to him next year either to avail of leave on two occasions with the usual railway concession or in case he avails of leave only on one occasion thel railway fare for the unveiled trip would be paid to him in the shape of National Savings/National Defense Certificates.

(c) Quarantine leave shall be granted to a workman, who is prevented from attending to his duty because of his coming into contact, through no fault of his own, with a person suffering from a contagious disease. The leave shall be granted for such period as is covered by a certificate from the medical officer of the mine. Payment for the period of quarantine leave shall be at the rate of 50 percent of the wages (basic plus dearness allowance) payable to a workman. Quarantine leave cannot be claimed, if a workman has refused to accept during the previous three months prophylactic treatment for the disease in question.

(d) A workman who desires to obtain leave of absence shall apply to the manager not less than fifteen days before the commencement of the leave, except where leave is required in unforeseen circumstances, and the manager shall issue orders on the application within a week of its submission of two days prior to the commencement of the leave applied for, whichever is earlier : provided that if the leave applied for is to commence on the date of the application within three days thereof, orders shall be given on the same day. If the leave asked for is granted, a leave-pass shall be given to the workman. If the leave is refused or postponed, the fact of such refusal or postponement and the reasons therefore shall be recorded in writing in a register to be maintained for the purpose, and if the worker so desires a copy of the entry in the register shall be supplied to him. If the workman after proceeding on leave desires an extension thereof, he shall apply to the manager, who shall send a written reply either granting or refusing extension of leave to the workman. Sanction/refusal of leave should be communicated to the workman in writing invariably.

(e) If a workman remains absent beyond the period of leave originally granted or subsequently extended, he shall lose lien on his appointment unless he-

(a) returns within ten days of expiry of his leave; and

(b) explains to the satisfaction of the manager his inability to return on the expiry of his leave.

In case, the workman loses, as aforesaid, his lien on his appointment, he shall be entitled to be kept on the "badli list".

(f) A workman may be granted casual leave of absence with pay not exceeding five days in the aggregate in a calendar year. Such leave shall not be for more than three days at a time except in case of sickness. Such leave is intended to meet special circumstances which cannot be foreseen. Ordinarily the previous permission of the head of the department in the establishment, shall be obtained before such leave is taken, but where this is not possible, the head of the department shall, as soon as may be practicable, be informed in writing of such absence and of the probable duration thereof.

(g) Notwithstanding anything mentioned above, any workman who overstays his sanctioned leave or remains absent without reasonable cause will render himself liable for disciplinary action.

[41][11. Medical aid in case of accidents.— * *]

12. Railway travel facilities.—

(a) When a workman proceeds on leave and is qualified for free railway fare, the employer shall give him the cost equivalent of his ticket (including bus fare) and for boat to his home.

(b) Every workman who has completed a period of twelve months' continuous service, would qualify for railway fare or bus fare or both for going home on leave and returning to the mine on the expiry of the leave. The twelve months' service shall be deemed to have been completed if, during the twelve months preceding the date on which he applies for leave, he has worked for not less than two hundred and forty days.

(c) If on the expiry of the leave, a workman returns he shall than receive a cash payment equivalent to the return fare. If on his return the mine is unable to have him back, he shall be paid return fare at once.

(d) If the journey home is by bus or partly by bus and partly by train, the cost of journey shall be adjusted accordingly.

(e) The workman shall be entitled to railway fare by mail or express train, wherever under the Railway Rules tickets are available for such travel.

(f) The class by witch a workman is entitled to travel shall be :

(i)	if his basic wage is Rs. 165 or less per month	III Class.
(ii)	if his basic wage is above Rs.165 and up to Rs. 265 per month	II Class.
(iii)	if his basic wage is above Rs. 265 per moth	I Class.

13. Termination of services.—

(a) For terminating the services of permanent workman having less than one year of continuous service, notice of one month in writing with reasons or wages in lieu thereof shall be given by the employer:

Provided that no such notice shall be required to be given when the services of the workman are terminated on account of misconduct established in accordance with the Standing Orders.

42[(b) Subject to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947 (14 of 1947) no notice of termination of employment shall be necessary in the case of temporary and Badli workmen:

Provided that a temporary workman, who has completed three months continuous service, shall be given two weeks' notice of the intention to terminate his employment if such termination is not in accordance with the terms of the contract of his employment:

Provided further that when the services of a temporary workman, who has not completed three month's continuous service, are terminated before the completion of the term of employment given to him, he shall be informed of the reasons in writing and when the services of a badli workman are terminated before the return to work of the permanent incumbent or the expiry of his (badli's) term of employment, he shall be informed of the reasons for such termination in writing].

(c) No workman shall leave the service of an employer unless notice in writing is given at the scale indicated below-

(i) For monthly paid workmenone month.

(ii) For weekly paid workmentwo weeks:

Provided that it will be for employer to relax this condition and the workman may pay cash in lieu of such notice.

(d) For purposes of Standing Orders 13 (a), (b) and (c) the terms 'service' and 'wages' shall have the same meaning as assigned to them in Section 25 (B) (1) and 2 (rr) respectively of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.

14. Stoppage of work and re-opening.—

(a) Subject to the provisions of Chapter V-A of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, the employer may, at any time, in the event of underground trouble, fire, catastrophe, breakdown of machinery, stoppage of power supply, epidemic, civil commotion or any other cause beyond the control of the employer, stop any section or sections of the mine wholly or partly for any period or periods.

(b) In the event of such stoppage during working hours, the workmen affected shall be notified by notice put up on the notice-board in the departments concerned and of the office as soon as practicable as to when work will be resumed and whether they are to remain or leave their place of work. The workmen will not ordinarily be required to remain for more than two hours after the commencement of the stoppage. Whenever workmen are laid off on account of failure of plant or a temporary curtailment of production or other causes they shall be paid compensation in accordance with the provisions of the Industrial Disputes, Act, 1947. Where no such compensation is admissible, they shall be granted leave with or without wages as the case may be, at the option of the workman concerned, leave with wages being granted to the extent of any leave due to them. When workmen are to be laid off for an indefinitely long period, their services may be terminated subject to the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. If normal work is resumed two weeks' notice thereof shall be given by the pasting of notices at or near the mine office and the workmen discharged either by the employer shall if they present themselves for work, have preference for re-employment.

(c) The employer may in the event of a strike affecting either wholly or partially any section of the mine close down either wholly or partially such section of the mine and any other section affected by such closure. The fact of such closure shall be notified by notices put up on notice-board in the manager's office. Prior to resumption of work, the workmen concerned will be notified by a general notice indicating as to when work will be resumed. A copy of such notice shall be sent to the registered trade union or unions functioning in the establishment.

15. Method of filling vacancies.—

In the matter of filling up of permanent vacancies, badli and temporary workmen and probationers would be given preference in order of their seniority.

[43][16. Transfers.— * * *]

[44][17. Disciplinary action for misconduct.—

(i) A workman may be suspended by the employer pending investigation or departmental enquiry and shall be paid subsistence allowance in accordance with the provisions of section 10-A of the Act. The employer shall normally complete the enquiry within 10 days. The payment of subsistence allowance shall be subject to the workman not taking any employment elsewhere during the period of suspension].

The following shall denote misconduct:

(a) Theft, fraud, or dishonesty in connection with the employer's business or property.

(b) Taking or giving of bribes or an illegal gratification whatsoever in connection with the employer's business or his own interests.

[47][SCHEDULE I-B

MODEL STANDING ORDERS ON ADDITIONAL ITEMS APPLICABLE TO ALL INDUSTRIES

(1) SERVICE RECORD

Matters relating to service card, token tickets, certification of service, change of residential address of workers and record of age.

(i) Service Card.—Every industrial establishment shall maintain a service card in respect of each workman in the form appended to these orders, wherein particulars of that workman shall be recorded with the knowledge of that workman and duly attested by an officer authorised in this behalf together with date.

(ii) Certification of service.—

(a) Every workman shall be entitled to a service certificate, pacifying the nature of work (designation) and the period of employment (indicating the days, months, years), at the time of discharge, termination, retirement or resignation from service;

(b) The existing entries in para 16 of Schedule I and para 20 of Schedule I-A shall be omitted

(iii) Residential address of workman.—A workman shall notify the employer immediately on engagement the details of his residential address and thereafter promptly communicate to his employer any change of his residential address. In case the workman has not communicated to his employer the change in his residential address, his last known address shall be treated by the employer as his residential address for sending any communication.

(iv) Record of age.—

(a) Every workman shall indicate his exact date of birth to the employer or the officer authorised by him in this behalf, at the time of entering service of the establishment. The employer of the officer authorised by him in this behalf may before the date of birth of a workman is entered in his, service card, require him to supply:—

(i) his matriculation or school leaving certificate granted by the Board of Secondary Education or similar educational authority; or

(ii) a certified copy of his date of birth as recorded in the registers of a municipality, local authority or Panchayat or Registrar of Births;

(iii) in the absence of either of the aforesaid two categories of certificate, the employer or the officer authorised by him in this behalf may require the workman to supply, a certificate from a Government Medical Officer not below the rank of an Assistant Surgeon indicating the probable age of the workman provided the cost of obtaining such certificate is borne by the employer;

(iv) where it is not practicable to obtain a certificate from a Government Medical Officer, an affidavit sworn, either by the workman or his parents, or by a near relative, who is in a position to know about the workman's actual or approximate date of birth, before a first Class Magistrate or Oath Commissioner, as evidence in support of the date of birth given by him.

(b) The date of birth of a workman, once entered in the service card of the establishment shall be the sole evidence of his age in relation to all matters pertaining to his service including fixation of the date of his retirement from the service of the establishment. All formalities regarding recording of the date of birth shall be finalised within three months of the appointment of a workman.

(c) Cases where date of birth of any workman had already been decided on the date these rules come into force shall not be reopened under these provisions.

Note.*—Where exact date of birth is not available and the year of birth is only established then the 1st July of the said year shall be taken as the date of birth.

(2) CONFIRMATION

The employer shall in accordance with the terms and conditions stipulated in the letter of appointment, confirm the eligible workman and issue a letter of confirmation to him. Whenever a workman is confirmed, an entry with regard to the confirmation shall also be made in his service card within a period of thirty days from the date of such confirmation.

(3) AGE OF RETIREMENT

The age of retirement or superannuation of a workman shall be as may be agreed upon between the employer and the workman under an agreement or as specified in a settlement or award which is binding on both the workman and the employer. Where there is no such agreed age, retirement or superannuation shall be on completion of [48][58] years of age by the workman.

(4) TRANSFER

A workman may be transferred according to exigencies of work from one shop or department to another or from one station to another or from one establishment to another under the same employer:

Provided that the wages, grade, continuity of service and other conditions of service of the workman are not adversely affected by such transfer:.

Provided further that a workman is transferred from one job to another, which he is capable of doing, and provided also that where the transfer involves moving from one State to another such transfer shall take place, either with the consent of the workman or where there is a specific provision to that effect in the letter of appointment, and provided also that (i) reasonable notice is given to such workman, and (ii) reasonable joining time is allowed in case of transfers from one station to another. The workman concerned shall be paid traveling allowance including the transport charges, and fifty per cent thereof to meet incidental charges.

(5) MEDICAL AID IN CASE OF ACCIDENTS

[49][Where a workman meets with an accident in the course of] or arising out of his employment, the employer shall, at the employer's expense, make satisfactory arrangements for immediate and necessary medical aid to the injured workman and shall arrange for his further treatment, if considered necessary by the doctor attending on him. Wherever the workman is entitled for treatment and benefits under the Employee's State Insurance Act, 1948 or the Workman's Compensation Act, 1923, the employer shall arrange for the treatment and compensation [50][accordingly.]

(6) MEDICAL EXAMINATION

Wherever the recruitment rules specify medical examination of a workman on, his first appointment, the employer, shall, at the employer's expense make arrangements for the medical examination by a registered medical practitioner.

(7) SECRECY

No workman shall take any papers, books, drawings, photographs, instruments, apparatus, documents or any other property of an industrial establishment out of the work premises except with the written permission of his immediate superior, nor shall he in any way pass or cause to be passed or disclose or cause to be disclosed any information or matter concerning the manufacturing process, trade secrets and confidential documents of the establishment to any unautthorised person, company or corporation without the written permission of the employer.

(8) EXCLUSIVE SERVICE

A workman shall not at any time work against the interest of the industrial establishment in which he is employed and shall not take any employment in addition to his job in the establishment, which may adversely affect the interest of his employer.]

ANNEXURE IV - The Trade Unions Act, 1926

[25th March, 1926]

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS

This Bill has been prepared in response to the following Resolution which was adopted by the Legislative Assembly on 1st March, 1921:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor-General in Council that he should take steps to introduce, as soon as practicable, in the Indian Legislature, such legislation as may be necessary for the registration of trade unions and for the protection of trade unions."

The question was examined in detail by the Government of India and local Governments were consulted; full opportunity was given for the expression of views by associations of employers and employed, and by the public generally. In the light of opinions received a draft Bill was prepared and published in September, 1924. The Government of India, after considering the criticisms received on that Bill, see no ground for modifying the general principles underlying the Bill, and, except for minor alterations, the present Bill is a reproduction of the Bill previously published.

The general scheme of the Bill may be briefly explained. A trade Union making the necessary application will, on compliance with certain stated conditions designed to ensure that the union is a bona fide trade union, and that adequate safeguards are provided for the rights of its members, be entitled to registration. The union and its members will thereupon receive protection in certain cases in respect of both civil and criminal liability. No restriction is placed upon the objects which a registered trade union may pursue, but the expenditure of its funds must be limited to specified trade union purposes. The legal position of trade unions which do not register will be unaffected by the Bill.

An Act to provide for the registration of Trade Unions and in certain respects to define the law relating to registered Trade Unions[1][].

WHEREAS it is expedient to provide for the registration of Trade Unions and in certain respects to define the law relating to registered Trade Unions [2][].

It is hereby enacted as follows:—

CHAPTER I PRELIMINARY

S. 1. Short title, extent and commencement.—

(1) This Act may be called the [3][] Trade Unions Act, 1926.

[4][(2)]It extends to the whole of India [5][].]

(3) It shall come into force on such date[6] as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint.

S. 2. Definitions.—

In this Act[7][“the appropriate Government” means, in relation to Trade Unions whose objects are not confined to one State, the Central Government, and in relation to other Trade Unions, the State Government, and], unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,—

(a) “executive’’ means the body, by whatever name called, to which the management of the affairs of a Trade Union is entrusted;

(b) [8][“office-bearer”], in the case of a Trade Union, includes any member of the executive thereof, but does not include an auditor;

(c) “prescribed” means prescribed by regulations made under this Act;

(d) “registered office” means that office of a Trade Union which is registered under this Act as the head office thereof;

(e) “registered Trade Union” means a Trade Union registered under this Act;

9[(f) “Registrar” means—

(i) a Registrar of Trade Unions appointed by the appropriate Government under section 3, and includes any Additional or Deputy Registrar of Trade Unions, and

(ii) in relation to any Trade Union, the Registrar appointed for the State in which the head or registered office, as the case may be, of the Trade Union is situated;]

(g) “trade dispute” means any dispute between employers and workmen or between workmen and workmen, or between employers and employers which is connected with the employment or non-employment, or the terms of employment or the conditions of labour, of any person, and “workmen” means all persons employed in trade or industry whether or not in the employment of the employer with whom the trade dispute arises; and

(h) “Trade Union” means any combination, whether temporary or permanent, formed primarily for the purpose of regulating the relations between workmen and employers or between workmen and workmen, or between employers and employers, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, and includes any federation of two or more Trade Unions:

Provided that this Act shall not affect—

(i) any agreement between partners as to their own business;

(ii) any agreement between an employer and those employed by him as to such employment; or

(iii) any agreement in consideration of the sale of the goodwill of a business or of instruction in any profession, trade or handicraft.

CHAPTER II REGISTRATION OF TRADE UNIONS

S. 3. Appointment of Registrars.—

10[(1)] [11][The appropriate Government] shall appoint a person to be the Registrar of Trade Unions for [12][each State].

13[(2) The appropriate Government may appoint as many Additional and Deputy Registrars of Trade Unions as it thinks fit for the purpose of exercising and discharging, under the superintendence and direction of the Registrar, such powers and functions of the Registrar under this Act as it may, by order, specify and define the local limits within which any such Additional or Deputy Registrar shall exercise and discharge the powers and functions so specified.

(3) Subject to the provisions of any order under sub-section (2), where an Additional or Deputy Registrar exercises and discharges the powers and functions of a Registrar in an area within which the registered office of a Trade

Union is situated, the Additional or Deputy Registrar shall be deemed to be the Registrar in relation to the Trade Union for the purposes of this Act.]

S. 4. Mode of registration.—

14[(1)] Any seven or more members of a Trade Union may, by subscribing their names to the rules of the Trade Union and by otherwise complying with the provisions of this Act with respect to registration, apply for registration of the Trade Union under this Act:

[15][Provided that no Trade Union of workmen shall be registered unless at least ten per cent. or one hundred of the workmen, whichever is less, engaged or employed in the establishment or industry with which it is connected are the members of such Trade Union on the date of making of application for registration:

Provided further that no Trade Union of workmen shall be registered unless it has on the date of making application not less than seven persons as its members, who are workmen engaged or employed in the establishment or industry with which it is connected.]

16[(2) Where an application has been made under sub-section (1) for the registration of a Trade Union, such application shall not be deemed to have become invalid merely by reason of the fact that, at any time after the date of the application, but before the registration of the Trade Union, some of the applicants, but not exceeding half of the total number of persons who made the application, have ceased to be members of the Trade Union or have given notice in writing to the Registrar dissociating themselves from the application.]

S. 5. Application for registration.—

(1) Every application for registration of a Trade Union shall be made to the Registrar, and shall be accompanied by a copy of the rules of the Trade Union and a statement of the following particulars, namely:—

(a) the names, occupations and addresses of the members making the application;

17[(aa) in the case of a Trade Union of workmen, the names, occupations and addresses of the place of work of the members of the Trade Union making the application;]

(b) the name of the Trade Union and the address of its head office; and

(c) the titles, names, ages, addresses and occupations of the [18][office-bearers] of the Trade Union.

(2) Where a Trade Union has been in existence for more than one year before the making of an application for its registration, there shall be delivered to the Registrar, together with the application, a general statement of the assets and liabilities of the Trade Union prepared in such form and containing such particulars as may be prescribed.

S. 6. Provisions to be contained in the rules of a Trade Union.—

A Trade Union shall not be entitled to registration under this Act, unless the executive thereof is constituted in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and the rules thereof provide for the following matters, namely:—

(a) the name of the Trade Union;

(b) the whole of the objects for which the Trade Union has been established;

(c) the whole of the purposes for which the general funds of the Trade Union shall be applicable, all of which purposes shall be purposes to which such funds are lawfully applicable under this Act;

(d) the maintenance of a list of the members of the Trade Union and adequate facilities for the inspection thereof by the [19][office-bearers] and members of Trade Union;

(e) the admission of ordinary members who shall be persons actually engaged or employed in an industry with which the Trade Union is connected, and also the admission of the number of honorary or temporary members as [20][office-bearers] required under section 22 to form the executive of the Trade Union;

21[(ee) the payment of a minimum subscription by members of the Trade Union which shall not be less than—

(i) one rupee per annum for rural workers;

(ii) three rupees per annum for workers in other unorganised sectors; and

(iii) twelve rupees per annum for workers in any other case;]

(f) the conditions under which any member shall be entitled to any benefit assured by the rules and under which any fine or forfeiture may be imposed on the members;

(g) the manner in which the rules shall be amended, varied or rescinded;

(h) the manner in which the members of the executive and the other [22][office-bearers] of the Trade Union shall be [23][elected] and removed;

24[(hh) the duration of period being not more than three years, for which the members of the executive and other office-bearers of the Trade Union shall be elected;]

(i) the safe custody of the funds of the Trade Union, an annual audit, in such manner as may be prescribed, of the accounts thereof, and adequate facilities for the inspection of the account books by the [25][office-bearers] and members of the Trade Union; and

(j) the manner in which the Trade Union may be dissolved.

S. 7. Power to call for further particulars and to require alteration of name.—

(1) The Registrar may call for further information for the purpose of satisfying himself that any application complies with the provisions of section 5, or that the Trade Union is entitled to registration under section 6, and may refuse to register the Trade Union until such information is supplied.

(2) If the name under which a Trade Union is proposed to be registered is identical with that by which any other existing Trade Union has been registered or, in the opinion of the Registrar, so nearly resembles such name as to be likely to deceive the public or the members of either Trade Union, the Registrar shall require the persons applying for registration to alter the name of the Trade Union stated in the application, and shall refuse to register the Union until such alteration has been made.

S. 8. Registration.—

The Registrar, on being satisfied that the Trade Union has complied with all the requirements of this Act in regard to registration, shall register the Trade Union by entering in a register, to be maintained in such form as may be prescribed, the particulars relating to the Trade Union contained in the statement accompanying the application for registration.

S. 9. Certificate of registration.—

The Registrar, on registering a Trade Union under section 8, shall issue a certificate of registration in the prescribed form which shall be conclusive evidence that the Trade Union has been duly registered under this Act.

[26][S. 9A. Minimum requirement about membership of a Trade Union.—

A registered Trade Union of workmen shall at all times continue to have not less than ten per cent. or one hundred of the workmen, whichever is less, subject to a minimum of seven, engaged or employed in an establishment or industry with which it is connected, as its members.]

S. 10. Cancellation of registration.—

A certificate of registration of a Trade Union may be withdrawn or cancelled by the Registrar—

(a) on the application of the Trade Union to be verified in such manner as may be prescribed;

(b) if the Registrar is satisfied that the certificate has been obtained by fraud or mistake, or that the Trade Union has ceased to exist or has wilfully and after notice from the Registrar contravened any provision of this Act or allowed any rule to continue in force which is inconsistent with any such provision, or has rescinded any rule providing for any matter provision for which is required by section 6 ;

27[(c) if the Registrar is satisfied that a registered Trade Union of workmen ceases to have the requisite number of members:]

Provided that not less than two months' previous notice in writing specifying the ground on which it is proposed to withdraw or cancel the certificate shall be given by the Registrar to the Trade Union before the certificate is withdrawn or cancelled otherwise than on the application of the Trade Union.

[28][S. 11. Appeal.—

(1) Any person aggrieved by any refusal of the Registrar to register a Trade Union or by the withdrawal or cancellation of a certificate of registration may, within such period as may be prescribed, appeal—

(a) where the head office of the Trade Union is situated within the limits of a Presidency town [29][] to the High Court, or

30[(aa) where the head office is situated in an area, falling within the jurisdiction of a Labour Court or an Industrial Tribunal, to that Court or Tribunal, as the case may be;]

(b) where the head office is situated in any area, to such Court, not inferior to the Court of an additional or assistant Judge of a principal Civil Court of original jurisdiction, as the [31][appropriate Government] may appoint in this behalf for that area.

(2) The appellate Court may dismiss the appeal, or pass an order directing the Registrar to register the Union and to issue a certificate of registration under the provisions of section 9 or setting aside the order or withdrawal or cancellation of the certificate, as the case may be, and the Registrar shall comply with such order.

(3) For the purpose of an appeal under sub-section (1) an appellate Court shall, so far as may be, follow the same procedure and have the same powers as it follows and has when trying a suit under the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (5 of 1908), and may direct by whom the whole or any part of the costs of the appeal shall be paid, and such costs shall be recovered as if they had been awarded in a suit under the said Code.

(4) In the event of the dismissal of an appeal by any Court appointed under clause (b) of sub-section (1) the person aggrieved shall have a right of appeal to the High Court, and the High Court shall, for the purpose of such appeal, have all the powers of an appellate Court under sub-sections (2) and (3), and the provisions of those sub-sections shall apply accordingly.]

S. 12. Registered office.—

All communications and notices to a registered Trade Union may be addressed to its registered office. Notice of any change in the address of the head office shall be given within fourteen days of such change to the Registrar in writing, and the changed address shall be recorded in the register referred to in section 8.

S. 13. Incorporation of registered Trade Unions.—

Every registered Trade Union shall be a body corporate by the name under which it is registered, and shall have perpetual succession and a common seal with power to acquire and hold both movable and immovable property and to contract, and shall by the said name sue and be sued.

S. 14. Certain Acts not to apply to registered Trade Unions.—

The following Acts, namely:—

(a) The Societies Registration Act, 1860 (21 of 1860);

(b) The Co-operative Societies Act, 1912 (2 of 1912);

32[(c) The Companies Act, 1956 (1 of 1956)[33]], shall not apply to any registered Trade Union, and the registration of any such Trade Union under any such Act shall be void.

CHAPTER III RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF REGISTERED TRADE UNIONS

S. 15. Objects on which general funds may be spent.—

The general funds of a registered Trade Union shall not be spent on any other objects than the following, namely:—

(a) the payment of salaries, allowances and expenses to [34][office-bearers] of the Trade Union;

(b) the payment of expenses for the administration of the Trade Union, including audit of the accounts of the general funds of the Trade Union;

(c) the prosecution or defence of any legal proceeding to which the Trade Union or any member thereof is a party, when such prosecution or defence is undertaken for the purpose of securing or protecting any rights of the Trade Union as such or any rights arising out of the relations of any member with his employer or with a person whom the member employs;

(d) the conduct of trade disputes on behalf of the Trade Union or any member thereof;

(e) the compensation of members for loss arising out of trade disputes;

(f) allowances to members or their dependants on account of death, old age, sickness, accidents or unemployment of such members;

(g) the issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of assurance on the lives of members, or under policies insuring members against sickness, accident or unemployment;

(h) the provision of educational, social or religious benefits for members (including the payment of the expenses of funeral or religious ceremonies for deceased members) or for the dependants of members;

(i) the upkeep of a periodical published mainly for the purpose of discussing questions affecting employers or workmen as such;

(j) the payment, in furtherance of any of the objects on which the general funds of the Trade Union may be spent, of contributions to any cause intended to benefit workmen in general, provided that the expenditure in respect of such contributions in any financial year shall not at any time during that year be in excess of one-fourth of the combined total of the gross income which has up to that time accrued to the general funds of the Trade Union during that year and of the balance at the credit of those funds at the commencement of that year; and

(k) subject to any conditions contained in the notification, any other object notified by the [35][appropriate Government] in the Official Gazette.

S. 16. Constitution of a separate fund for political purposes.—

(1) A registered Trade Union may constitute a separate fund, from contributions separately levied for or made to that fund, from which payments may be made, for the promotion of the civic and political interests of its members, in furtherance of any of the objects specified in sub-section (2).

(2) The objects referred to in sub-section (1) are—

(a) the payment of any expenses incurred, either directly or indirectly, by a candidate or prospective candidate for election as a member of any legislative body constituted under [36][] [37][the Constitution] or of any local authority, before, during, or after the election in connection with his candidature or election; or

(b) the holding of any meeting or the distribution of any literature or documents in support of any such candidate or prospective candidate; or

(c) the maintenance of any person who is a member of any legislative body constituted under [38][] [39][the Constitution] or for any local authority; or

(d) the registration of electors or the selection of a candidate for any legislative body constituted under [40][] [41][the Constitution] or for any local authority; or

(e) the holding of political meetings of any kind, or the distribution of political literature or political documents of any kind.

42[(2A) In its application to the State of Jammu and Kashmir, references in sub-section (2) to any legislative body constituted under the Constitution shall be construed as including references to the Legislature of that State.]

(3) No member shall be compelled to contribute to the fund constituted under sub-section (1); and a member who does not contribute to the said fund shall not be excluded from any benefits of the Trade Union, or placed in any respect either directly or indirectly under any disability or at any disadvantage as compared with other members of the Trade Union (except in relation to the control or management of the said fund) by reason of his not contributing to the said fund; and contribution to the said fund shall not be made a condition for admission to the Trade Union.

S. 17. Criminal conspiracy in trade disputes.—

No [43][office-bearer] or member of a registered Trade Union shall be liable to punishment under sub-section (2) of section 120B of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), in respect of any agreement made between the members for the purpose of furthering any such object of the Trade Union as is specified in section 15, unless the agreement is an agreement to commit an offence.

S. 18. Immunity from civil suit in certain cases.—

(1) No suit or other legal proceeding shall be maintainable in any Civil Court against any registered Trade Union or any [44][office-bearer] or member thereof in respect of any act done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute to which a member of the Trade Union is a party on the ground only that such act induces some other person to break a contract of employment, or that it is in interference with the trade, business or employment of some other person or with the right of some other person to dispose of his capital or of his labour as he wills.

(2) A registered Trade Union shall not be liable in any suit or other legal proceeding in any Civil Court in respect of any tortious act done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute by an agent of the Trade Union if it is proved that such person acted without the knowledge of, or contrary to express instructions given by, the executive of the Trade Union.

S. 19. Enforceability of agreements.—

Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force, an agreement between the members of a registered Trade Union shall not be void or voidable merely by reason of the fact that any of the objects of the agreement are in restraint of trade:

Provided that nothing in this section shall enable any Civil Court to entertain any legal proceeding instituted for the express purpose of enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any agreement concerning the conditions on which any members of a Trade Union shall or shall not sell their goods, transact business, work, employ or be employed.

S. 20. Right to inspect books of Trade Union.—

The account books of a registered Trade Union and the list of members thereof shall be open to inspection by an [45][office-bearer] or member of the Trade Union at such times as may be provided for in the rules of the Trade Union.

S. 21. Rights of minors to membership of Trade Unions.—

Any person who has attained the age of fifteen years may be a member of a registered Trade Union subject to any rules of the Trade Union to the contrary, and may, subject as aforesaid, enjoy all the rights of a member and execute all instruments and give all acquittances necessary to be executed or given under the rules:

[46][]

[47][S. 21A. Disqualifications of office-bearers of Trade Unions.—

(1) A person shall be disqualified for being chosen as, and for being, a member of the executive or any other office-bearer of a registered Trade Union if—

(i) he has not attained the age of eighteen years;

(ii) he has been convicted by a Court in India of any offence involving moral turpitude and sentenced to imprisonment, unless a period of five years has elapsed since his release.

(2) Any member of the executive or other office-bearer of a registered Trade Union who, before the commencement of the Indian Trade Unions (Amendment) Act, 1964, has been convicted of any offence involving moral turpitude and sentenced to imprisonment, shall on the date of such commencement cease to be such member or office-bearer unless a period of five years has elapsed since his release before that date.]

48[(3) In its application to the State of Jammu and Kashmir, reference in subsection (2) to the commencement of the Indian Trade Unions (Amendment) Act, 1964 (38 of 1964), shall be construed as reference to the commencement of this Act in the said State.]

[49][S. 22. Proportion of office-bearers to be connected with the industry.—

(1) Not less than one-half of the total number of the office-bearers of every registered Trade Union in an unrecognised sector shall be persons actually engaged or employed in an industry with which the Trade Union is connected:

Provided that the appropriate Government may, by special or general order, declare that the provisions of this section shall not apply to any Trade Union or class of Trade Unions specified in the order.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section, "unorganised sector" means any sector which the appropriate Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify.

(2) Save as otherwise provided in sub-section (1), all office-bearers of a registered Trade Union, except not more than one-third of the total number of the office-bearers or five, whichever is less, shall be persons acutally engaged or employed in the establishment or industry with which the Trade Union is connected.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this sub-section, an employee who has retired or has been retrenched shall not be construed as outsider for the purpose of holding an office in a Trade Union.

(3) No member of the Council of Ministers or a person holding an office of profit (not being an engagement or employment in an establishment or industry with which the Trade Union is connected), in the Union or a State, shall be a member of the executive or other office-bearer of a registered Trade Union.]

S. 23. Change of name.—

Any registered Trade Union may, with the consent of not less than two-thirds of the total number of its members and subject to the provisions of section 25, change its name.

S. 24. Amalgamation of Trade Unions.—

Any two or more registered Trade Unions may become amalgamated together as one Trade Union with or without dissolution or division of the funds of such Trade Unions or either or any of them, provided that the votes of at least one-half of the members of each or every such Trade Union entitled to vote are recorded, and that at least sixty per cent. of the votes recorded are in favour of the proposal.

S. 25. Notice of change of name or amalgamation.—

(1) Notice in writing of every change of name and of every amalgamation signed, in the case of a change of name, by the Secretary and by seven members of the Trade Union changing its name, and in the case of an amalgamation, by the Secretary and by seven members of each and every Trade Union which is a party thereto, shall be sent to the Registrar and where the head office of the amalgamated Trade Union is situated in a different State, to the Registrar of such State.

(2) If the proposed name is identical with that by which any other existing Trade Union has been registered or, in the opinion of the Registrar, so nearly resembles such name as to be likely to deceive the public or the members of either Trade Union, the Registrar shall refuse to register the change of name.

(3) Save as provided in sub-section (2), the Registrar shall, if he is satisfied that the provisions of this Act in respect of change of name have been complied with, register the change of name in the register referred to in section 8, and the change of name shall have effect from the date of such registration.

(4) The Registrar of the State in which the head office of the amalgamated Trade Union is situated shall, if he is satisfied that the provisions of this Act in respect of amalgamation have been complied with and that the Trade Union formed thereby is entitled to registration under section 6, register the Trade Union in the manner provided in section 8, and the amalgamation shall have effect from the date of such registration.

S. 26. Effects of change of name and of amalgamation.—

(1) The change in the name of a registered Trade Union shall not affect any rights or obligations of the Trade Union or render defective any legal proceeding by or against the Trade Union, and any legal proceeding which might have been continued or commenced by or against it by its former name may be continued or commenced by or against it by its new name.

(2) An amalgamation of two or more registered Trade Unions shall not prejudice any right of any of such Trade Unions or any right of a creditor of any of them.

S. 27. Dissolution.—

(1) When a registered Trade Union is dissolved, notice of the dissolution signed by seven members and by the Secretary of the Trade Union shall, within fourteen days of the dissolution be sent to the Registrar, and shall be registered by him if he is satisfied that the dissolution has been effected in accordance with the rules of the Trade Union, and the dissolution shall have effect from the date of such registration.

(2) Where the dissolution of a registered Trade Union has been registered and the rules of the Trade Union do not provide for the distribution of funds of the Trade Union on dissolution, the Registrar shall divide the funds amongst the members in such manner as may be prescribed.

S. 28. Returns.—

(1) There shall be sent annually to the Registrar, on or before such date as may be prescribed, a general statement, audited in the prescribed manner, of all receipts and expenditure of every registered Trade Union during the year ending on the 31st day of [50][December] next preceding such prescribed date, and of the assets and liabilities of the Trade Union existing on such 31st day of [51][December]. The statement shall be prepared in such form and shall comprise such particulars as may be prescribed.

(2) Together with the general statement there shall be sent to the Registrar a statement showing changes of [52][office-bearers] made by the Trade Union during the year to which the general statement refers, together also with a copy of the rules of the Trade Union corrected up to the date of the despatch thereof to the Registrar.

(3) A copy of every alteration made in the rules of a registered Trade Union shall be sent to the Registrar within fifteen days of the making of the alteration.

53[(4) For the purpose of examining the documents referred to in sub-sections (1), (2) and (3), the Registrar, or any officer authorised by him, by general or special order, may at all reasonable times inspect the certificate of registration, account books, registers, and other documents, relating to a Trade Union, at its registered office or may require their production at such place as he may specify in this behalf, but no such place shall be at a distance of more than ten miles from the registered office of a Trade Union.]

CHAPTER IV REGULATIONS

S. 29. Power to make regulations.—

(1) [54][] The [55][appropriate Government] may make regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

(2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such regulations may provide for all or any of the following matters namely:—

(a) the manner in which Trade Unions and the rules of Trade Unions shall be registered and the fees payable on registration;

(b) the transfer of registration in the case of any registered Trade Union which has changed its head office from one State to another;

(c) the manner in which, and the qualifications by whom, the accounts of registered Trade Unions or of any class of such Unions shall be audited;

(d) the conditions subject to which inspection of documents kept by Registrars shall be allowed and the fees which shall be chargeable in respect of such inspections; and

(e) any matter which is to be or may be prescribed.

56[(3) Every notification made by the Central Government under sub-section (1) of section 22, and every regulation made by it under sub-section (1), shall be laid, as soon as may be after it is made, before each House of Parliament, while it is in session, for a total period of thirty days which may be comprised in one session or in two or more successive sessions, and if, before the expiry of the session immediately following the session or the successive sessions aforesaid, both Houses agree in making any modification in the notification or regulation, or both Houses agree that the notification or regulation should not be made, the notification or regulation shall thereafter have effect only in such modified form or be of no effect, as the case may be; so, however, that any such modification or annulment shall be without prejudice to the validity of anything previously done under that notification or regulation.

(4) Every notification made by the State Government under sub-section (1) of section 22 and every regulation made by it under sub-section (1) shall be laid, as soon as may be after it is made, before the State Legislature.]

S. 30. Publication of regulations.—

(1) The power to make regulations conferred by section 29 is subject to the condition of the regulations being made after previous publication.

(2) The date to be specified in accordance with clause (3) of section 23 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 (10 of 1897), as that after which a draft of regulations proposed to be made will be taken into consideration shall not be less than three months from the date on which the draft of the proposed regulations was published for general information.

(3) Regulations as made shall be published in the Official Gazette, and on such publication shall have effect as if enacted in this Act.

CHAPTER V PENALTIES AND PROCEDURE

S. 31. Failure to submit returns.—

(1) If default is made on the part of any registered Trade Union in giving any notice or sending any statement or other document as required by or under any provision of this Act, every [57][office-bearer] or other person bound by the rules of the Trade Union to give or send the same, or, if there is no such [58][office-bearer] or person, every member of the executive of the Trade Union, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to five rupees and, in the case of a continuing default, with an additional fine which may extend to five rupees for each week after the first during which the default continues:

Provided that the aggregate fine shall not exceed fifty rupees.

(2) Any person who wilfully makes, or causes to be made, any false entry in, or any omission from, the general statement required by section 28 or in or from any copy of rules or of alterations of rules sent to the Registrar under that section, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees.

S. 32. Supplying false information regarding Trade Unions.—

Any person who, with intent to deceive, gives to any member of a registered Trade Union or to any person intending or applying to become a member of such Trade Union any document purporting to be a copy of the rules of the Trade Union or of any alterations to the same which he knows, or has reason to believe, is not a correct copy of such rules or alterations as are for the time being in force, or any person who, with the like intent, gives a copy of any rules of an unregistered Trade Union to any person on the pretence that such rules are the rules of a registered Trade Union, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

S. 33. Cognizance of offences.—

(1) No Court inferior to that of a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class shall try any offence under this Act.

(2) No Court shall take cognizance of any offence under this Act, unless complaint thereof has been made by, or with the previous sanction of, the Registrar or, in the case of an offence under section 32, by the person to whom the copy was given, within six months of the date on which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

ANNEXURE V - The Central Trade Union Regulations, 1938[1]

In exercise of the powers conferred by section 29 of the Indian Trade Unions Act, 1926 (16 of 1926), and by the said section of the said Act as in force in Berar, the Central Government is pleased, in relation to Trade Unions whose objects are not confined to one[2][State], to make the following regulations, the same having been previously published as required by sub-section (1) of section 30 of the said Act, namely:—

Reg. 1. Title and application.—

(1) These regulations may be called the Central Trade Union Regulations, 1938.

(2) The regulations apply to Trade Unions whose objects are not confined to one [3][State].

Reg. 2. Definitions.—

In these regulations—

(a) "the Act" means the Indian Trade Unions Act, 1926.

(b) "Form" means a form appended to these regulations.

(c) "section" means a section of the Act.

Reg. 3. Application for registration.—

Every application for registration of a Trade Union shall be made in Form A.

Reg. 4. Register of Trade Unions.—

The Register of Trade Unions referred to in section 8 shall be maintained in Form B.

Reg. 5. Certificate of registration.—

(1) The Certificate of Registration issued by the Registrar under section 9 shall be in Form C.

(2) When the Registrar registers a change of name under section 25, sub-section (3), he shall certify under his signature at the foot of the certificate on its presentation to him by the Secretary that the new name has been registered.

Reg. 6. Cancellation of registration.—

The Registrar on receiving an application for the cancellation of registration shall, before granting the application, satisfy himself that the withdrawal or cancellation of registration was approved by a general meeting of the Trade Union, or if it was not so approved, that it has the approval of the majority of the members of the Trade Union. For this purpose, he may call for such further particulars as he may deem necessary and may examine any officer of the Union.

Reg. 7. Unions registered with [4][State] Registrars.—

If the application is made by a Trade Union which has previously been registered by the Registrar of any [5][State] the union shall submit with its application a copy of the certificate of registration granted to it and copies of the entries relating to it in the Register of Trade Unions for the [6][State].

Reg. 8. Fees.—

The fee payable for the registration of a Trade Union shall be Rs. 5.

Reg. 9. Amendment of rules.—

(1) On receiving a copy of an application made in the rules of a Trade Union under section 28(3), the Registrar, unless he has reason to believe that the alteration has not been made in the manner provided by the rules of the Trade Union, shall register the alteration in a register to be maintained for this purpose and shall notify the fact that he has done so to the Secretary of the Trade Union.

(2) The fee payable for registration of alteration of rules shall be Re.1 for each set of alterations made simultaneously.

Reg. 10. Appeals.—

Any appeal made under section 11(1) of the Act must be filed within sixty days of the date on which the Registrar passed the order against which the appeal is made.

Reg. 11. Funds of a dissolved Trade Union.—

Where it is necessary for the Registrar, under section 27(2) to distribute the funds of a Trade Union which has been dissolved, he shall divide the funds in proportion to the amounts contributed by the members by way of subscription during this membership.

Reg. 12. Return.—

The annual return to be furnished under section 28 shall be submitted to the Registrar by the 31st day of July in each year and shall be in Form D.

Reg. 13. Auditors.—

(1) Save as provided in sub-clauses (2), (3), (4) and (5) of this regulation, the annual audit of the account of any registered Trade Union shall be conducted by an auditor authorized to audit the accounts of companies under section 144(1) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913 or under section 3(2) of the Indian Companies (Amendment) Act, 1930.

(2) Where the membership of Trade Union did not at any time during the financial year exceed 2,500, the annual audit of the accounts may be conducted—

(a) by any examiner of local fund accounts; or

(b) by any local fund auditor appointed by the [7][State] Government; or

(c) by the person, who, having held an appointment under Government in any audit or accounts departments, is in receipt of a pension of not less than Rs. 200 per mensem.

(3) Where the membership of a Trade Union did not at any time during the financial year exceed 750, the annual audit of the accounts may be conducted—

(a) by any two persons holding office as magistrates or judges or as members of any municipal council, district board, or legislative body; or

(b) by any person, who, having held an appointment under Government in any audit or accounts department, is in receipt of a pension from Government of not less than Rs. 75 a month, or

(c) by any auditor appointed to conduct the audit of any co-operative societies by Government or by the Registrar of Co-operative Societies or by any [8][State] co-operative organization recognized by Government for this purpose.

(4) Where the membership of a Trade Union did not at any time during the financial year exceed 250, the annual audit of the accounts may be conducted by any two members of the Union.

(5) Where the Trade Union is a federation of unions, and the number of unions affiliated to it at any time during the financial year did not exceed 50, 51 or 5, respectively, the audit of the accounts of the federation may be conducted as if it had not at any time during the year had a membership of more than 2,500, 750 or 250, respectively.

Reg. 14. Exception.—

Notwithstanding anything contained in regulation 13, no person, who, at any time during the year, was entrusted with any part of the funds or securities belonging to the Trade Union shall be eligible to audit the accounts of that Union.

Reg. 15. Audit.—

The auditor or auditors appointed in accordance with the regulations shall be given access to all the books of the Trade Union and shall verify the annual return with the accounts and vouchers relating thereto and shall thereafter sign the auditor's declaration appended to Form D, indicating separately on that form under his signature or their signatures a statement showing in what respect he or they find the return to be incorrect, unvouched or not in accordance with the Act. The particulars given in this statement shall indicate—

(a) every payment which appears to be unauthorized by the rules of the Trade Union or contrary to the provisions of the Act,

(b) the amount of any deficiency or loss which appears to have been incurred by the negligence or misconduct of any person,

(c) the amount of any sum which ought to have been but is not brought to account by any person.

Reg. 16. Audit of political funds.—

The audit of the political funds of a registered Trade Union shall be carried out alongwith the audit of the general account of the Trade Union and by the same auditor or auditors.

Reg. 17. Inspection.—

(1) The register of Trade Unions maintained in accordance with regulation 4 shall be open to inspection by any person on payment of a fee of annas eight.

(2) Any documents in the possession of the Registrar received from a registered Trade Union may be inspected by any member of that Union on payment of a fee of annas eight for each document inspected.

(3) Documents shall be open to inspection every day on which the office of the Registrar is open and within such hours as may be fixed for this purpose by the Registrar.

(4) The Registrar may supply a Certified copy of any such document to a registered Trade Union or a member thereof on payment of annas twelve for the first two hundred words (or less) and annas six for every additional hundred words or fractional part thereof.

ANNEXURE VI - Report of the National Commission on Labour, 1969[1]

(Relevant Extracts)

NOTE FROM THE EDITOR:

As the enlightened readers will notice, the First National Commission on Labour in the post-Independent India was constituted vide the Government of India Resolution No. 36/14/66-I&E, dated the 24th December, 1966, under the Chairmanship of the celebrated Hon'ble Mr. Justice PB Gajendragadkar, former Chief Justice of India, who himself was an acknowledged authority on labour law and industrial jurisprudence. The terms of reference were exhaustive covering almost every conceivable aspect of the subject 'labour' in all its multifarious hues and shades. The Final Report (1969) was a product of an outstanding research, spanning nearly three years, and consists of 33 Chapters, 13 Annexures and 10 Appendices. This massive Report can be rightly described as a 'classic' in every sense of the term. Out of the several Annexures to the Report, the following seven, which are particularly relevant to, and have a direct bearing on, the Industrial Relations Legislation, have been identified for inclusion here to facilitate ready reference:

Annexure III:	Code of Discipline in Industry
Annexure IV:	Rights of Recognised Unions under the Code of Discipline
Annexure VI:	Model Grievance Procedure
Annexure VII:	Functions of Works Committees
Annexure IX:	Recommendations of the 15th Session of the ILC regarding Need-based Minimum Wage
Annexure X:	Definition of Minimum, Fair & Living Wages as given by the Fair Wages Committee Report, 1948
Annexure XI:	Rationalisation—The recommendation of the 15th session of Indian Labour Conference

ANNEXURE III CODE OF DISCIPLINE IN INDUSTRY

I. To Maintain Discipline in Industry

(Both in public and private sectors)

There has to be (i) a just recognition by employers and workers of the rights and responsibilities of either party, as defined by the laws and agreements (including bipartite and tripartite agreements, arrived at all levels from time to time) and (ii) a proper and willing discharge by either party of its obligations consequent on such recognition.

The Central and State Governments, on their part will arrange to examine and set right any shortcomings in the machinery they constitute for the administration of labour laws to ensure better discipline in industry.

II. Management and Union(s) Agree

(i) that no Unilateral action should be taken in connection with any industrial matter and that disputes should be settled at appropriate level,

(ii) that the existing machinery for settlement of disputes should be utilised with the utmost expedition,

(iii) that there should be no strike or lock-out without notice,

(iv) that affirming their faith in democratic principles, they bind themselves to settle all future differences, disputes and grievances by mutual negotiation, conciliation and voluntary arbitration,

(v) that neither party will have recourse to (a) coercion, (b) intimidation, (c) victimisation or (d) go-slow,

(vi) that they will avoid (a) litigation, (b) sit down and stay in strikes and (c) lock outs,

(vii) that they will promote constructive co-operation between their representatives at all levels and as between workers themselves and abide by the spirit of agreements mutually entered into,

(viii) that they will establish upon a mutually agreed basis, a grievance procedure which will ensure a speedy and full investigation leading to settlement,

(ix) that they will abide by various stages in the grievance procedure and take no arbitrary action which would bypass this procedure, and

(x) that they will educate the management personnel and workers regarding their obligations to each other.

III. Management Agree

(i) not to increase work-loads unless agreed upon or settled otherwise;

(ii) not to support or encourage any unfair labour practice such as (a) interference with the right of employees to enrol or continue as union members, (b) discrimination, restraint or coercion against any employee because of recognised activity of trade unions and (c) victimisation of any employee and abuse of authority in any form;

(iii) to take prompt action for (a) settlement of grievances and (b) implementation of settlements, awards decisions and orders;

(iv) to display in conspicuous places in the undertaking the provisions of this Code in local language(s);

(v) to distinguish between actions justifying immediate discharge and those where discharge must be preceded by a warning, reprimand, suspension or some other form of disciplinary action and to arrange that all such disciplinary action should be subject to an appeal through normal grievance procedure;

(vi) to take appropriate disciplinary action against its officers and members in cases where enquiries reveal that they were responsible for precipitate action by workers leading to indiscipline; and

(vii) to recognise the union in accordance with the criteria (ANNEXURE A below) evolved at the 16th session of the Indian Labour Conference held in May, 1958.

IV. Union[s] Agree

(i) not to engage in any form of physical duress;

(ii) not to permit demonstrations which are not peaceful and not to permit rowdyism in demonstration;

(iii) that their members will not engage or cause other employees to engage in any union activity during working hours, unless as provided for by law, agreement or practice;

(iv) to discourage unfair labour practices such as (a) negligence of duty, (b) careless operation, (c) damage to property, (d) interference with or disturbance to normal work and (e) insubordination;

(v) to take prompt action to implement awards, agreements, settlements and decisions;

(vi) to display in conspicuous places in the union offices, the provisions of this Code in the local languages); and

(vii) to express disapproval and to take appropriate action against office-bearers and members for indulging in action against the spirit of this Code.

Annexure A

Criteria for recognition of Unions

1. Where there is more than one union, a union claiming recognition should have been functioning for at least one year after registration. Where there is only one union, this condition would not apply.
2. The membership of the union should cover at least 15% of the workers in the establishment concerned. Membership would be counted only of those who had paid their subscriptions for at least three months during the period of six months immediately preceding the reckoning.
3. A union may claim to be recognised as a representative union for an Industry in a local area if it has a membership of at least 25% of the workers of that industry in that area.
4. When a union has been recognised, there should be no change in its position for a period of two years.
5. Where there are several unions in an industry or establishment, the one with the largest membership should be recognised.
6. A representative union for an industry in an area should have the right to represent the workers in all the establishments in the industry, but if a union of workers in a particular establishment has a membership of 50 per cent or more of the workers of that establishment it should have the right to deal with matters of purely local interest, such as, for instance, the handling of grievances pertaining to its own members. All other workers who are not members of that union might cither operate through the representative Union for the industry or seek redress directly.
7. In the case of trade union federations which are not affiliated to any of the four central organisations of labour the question of recognition would have to be dealt with separately.
8. Only unions which observed the Code of Discipline would be entitled to recognition.

ANNEXURE IV RIGHTS OF RECOGNISED UNIONS UNDER THE CODE OF DISCIPLINE

The question of rights (of unions recognised under the Code of Discipline vis-a-vis unrecognised unions was discussed at the 20th Session of the Indian Labour Conference (August, 1962). While a decision on the rights of unrecognised unions was deferred for future consideration, it was agreed that unions granted recognition under the Code of Discipline should enjoy the following rights:—

(i) to raise issue and enter into collective agreements with employers on general questions concerning the terms of employment and conditions of service of workers in an establishment or, in the case of a Representative; Union, in an industry in a local area;

(ii) to collect membership fees/subscriptions payable by members to the union within the premises of the undertaking;

(iii) to put or cause to put up a notice board on the premises of the undertaking in which its members are employed and affix or cause to be affixed thereon notices relating to meetings, statements of accounts of its income and expenditure and other announcements which are not abusive, indecent or inflammatory, or subversive of discipline or otherwise contrary to the Code;

(iv) for the purpose of prevention or settlement of an industrial dispute:—

  (a) to hold discussions with the employees who are members of the union at a suitable place or places within the premises of office/factory/establishment as mutually agreed upon;

  (b) to meet and discuss with an employer or any person appointed by him for the purpose, the grievances of its members employed in the undertaking;

  (c) to inspect, by prior arrangement, in an undertaking, any place where any member of the union is employed;

(v) to nominate its representatives on the Grievance Committee constituted under the Grievance Procedure in an establishment;

(vi) to nominate its representatives on Joint Management Councils; and

(vii) to nominate its representatives on non-statutory bi-partite committees, e.g. production committees, welfare, committees, canteen committees, house allotment committees, etc., set up by managements.

The rights referred to above would be without prejudice to the privileges being enjoyed by the recognised unions; at present either by agreement or by usage.

ANNEXURE VI MODEL GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE

A. Grievance Machinery

A Grievance Machinery will be required to be set up in each undertaking to administer the Grievance Procedure. The minimum requirements of such a machinery would be as follows, except where an established procedure is already working to the mutual satisfaction of either party. Even in the latter case, every effort shall be made to bring the procedure in conformity with the Guiding Principles (ANNEXURE B).

For the purpose of constituting a fresh Grievance Machinery, workers in each department (and where a department is too small, in a group of departments) and each shift, shall elect, from amongst themselves and for a period of not less than one year at a time, departmental representatives and forward the list of persons so elected to the management. Where the unions in the undertaking are in a position to submit an agreed list of names, recourse to election may not be necessary. Similar is the case where works committees are functioning satisfactorily, since the works committee member of a particular constituency shall act as the departmental representative. Correspondingly, the management shall designate the persons for each department who shall be approached at the first stage and the departmental heads for handling grievances at the second stage. Two or three of the departmental representatives of workers and two or three departmental heads nominated by the management shall constitute the Grievance Committee, the composition of which is indicated in ANNEXURE C. In the case of appeals against discharges or dismissals, the management shall designate the authority to whom appeals could be made.

B. Grievance Procedure

While adaptations have to be made to meet special circumstances such as those obtaining in the Defence undertakings, Railways, Plantations and also small undertakings employing few workmen the procedure normally envisaged in the handling of grievances should be as follows:

(1) An aggrieved employee shall first present his grievance verbally in person to the officer designated by the management for this purpose. An answer shall be given within 48 hours of the presentation of complaint.

(2) If the worker is not satisfied with the decision of this officer or fails to receive an answer within the stipulated period, he shall, either in person or accompanied by his departmental representative, present his grievances to the Head of the Department designated by the management for the purpose of handling grievances. (For this purpose, a fixed time shall be specified during which on any working day, an aggrieved worker could meet the departmental head for presentation of grievances). The Departmental head shall give his answer within 3 days of the presentation of grievance. If action cannot be taken within that period, the reason for delay should be recorded.

(3) If the decision of the Departmental Head is unsatisfactory, the aggrieved worker may request the forwarding of his grievance to the "Grievance Committee" which shall make its recommendations to the Manager within 7 days of the worker's request. If the recommendations cannot be made within this time limit, the reason for such delay should be recorded. Unanimous recommendations of the Grievance Committee shall be implemented by the management. In the event of a difference of opinion, among the members of the Grievance Committee, the views of the members along with the relevant papers shall be placed before the Manager for final decision. In either case, the final decision of the management shall be communicated to the workmen concerned by the personnel officer within 3 days from the receipt of the Grievance Committee's recommendations.

(4) Should the decision from the Management be not forthcoming within the stipulated period or should it be unsatisfactory, the worker shall have the right to appeal to Management for a revision. In making this appeal, the worker, if he so desires, shall have the right to take a union official along with him to facilitate discussions with Management. Management shall communicate their decision within a week of the workman's revision petition.

(5) If no agreement is still possible, the union and the management may refer the grievance to voluntary arbitration within a week of the receipt by the worker of Management's decision.

(6) Where a worker has taken up a Grievance for redressal under this procedure, the formal Conciliation Machinery shall not intervene till all steps in the procedure are exhausted. A Grievance shall be presumed to assume the form of a dispute only when the final decision of the top management in respect of the Grievance is not acceptable to the worker.

(7) If a grievance arises out of an order given by management, the said order shall be complied with before the workman concerned invokes the procedure laid down for redressal of grievance. If, however, there is a time lag between the issue of order and its compliance, the grievance procedure may immediately be invoked but the order nevertheless must be complied within the due date, even if all the steps in the grievance procedure have not been exhausted. It may however be advisable for the management to await the findings of Grievance procedure machinery.

(8) Workers' representatives on the Grievance Committee shall have the right of access to any document connected with the inquiry maintained in the department and which may be necessary to understand the merit or otherwise of the workers' grievances. The management's representatives shall have the right, however, to refuse to show any document or give any information which they consider to be of a confidential nature. Such confidential document(s) shall not be used against the workmen in the course of the grievance proceedings.

(9) There shall be a time-limit within which an appeal shall be taken from one step to the other. For this purpose, the aggrieved worker shall, within 72 hours of the receipt of the decision at one stage (or if no decision is received, on the expiry of the stipulated period), file his appeal with the authority at the next higher stage should he feel inclined to appeal.

(10) In calculating the various time intervals under the above clause, holidays shall not be reckoned.

(11) Management shall provide the necessary clerical and other assistance for the smooth functioning of the grievance machinery.

(12) If it is necessary for any worker to leave the department during working hours on call from the Labour/Personnel Officer or any other officer of the established grievance machinery, previous permission of his superior shall necessarily be obtained. Subject to this condition, the worker shall not suffer any loss in wages for the work-time lost in this manner.

(13) If, however, there be any complaint against any individual member of the staff, who is nominated by the management to handle grievance at the lowest level, the workman may take up his grievance at the next higher stage, i.e., at the level of Departmental Head.

(14) In the case of any grievance arising out of discharge or dismissal of a workman, the above-mentioned procedure shall not apply. Instead, a discharged or dismissed workman shall have the right to appeal either to the dismissing authority or to a senior authority who shall be specified by the management, within a week from the date of dismissal or discharge. At the time the appeal is heard, the workman may, if he so desires, be accompanied by either an official of the recognised union or a fellow worker, as the case may be.

Annexure B

Guiding Principles/or a grievance procedure

Existing labour legislation does not provide for a well-defined and adequate procedure for redressal of day-to-day grievances in industrial units. Clause 15 of the Model Standing Orders in Schedule I of the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Central Rules 1946 specifies that 'All complaints arising out of employment including those relating to unfair treatment or wrongful exaction on the part of the employer or his agent, shall be submitted to the manager or the other person specified in this behalf with the right to appeal to the employers'. In some industrial units, however, detailed grievance procedure has been worked out by mutual agreement. In the absence of a satisfactory grievance procedure, day-to-day grievances are allowed to pile up with the result that the accumulated discontent culminates sometime or the other in cases of indiscipline, strikes, etc. In what follows, therefore, an attempt has been made to draw up Guiding Principles for a Grievance Procedure. It is realised that it may not be possible to apply all these principles in respect of each and every industrial unit. However, all units should endeavour to conform, as much as possible, to these principles.

Complaints affecting one or more individual workers in respect of their wage payments, over-time, leave, transfer, promotion, seniority, work assignment, and discharges would constitute[2] grievances. Where the points at dispute are of general applicability or of considerable magnitude, they will fall outside the scope of this procedure.

A grievance procedure should take note of the following principles:

(1) Conformity with existing legislation

A Grievance Procedure forms part of the integrated scheme intended to promote satisfactory relations between employers and workers. This procedure should be designed to supplement the existing statutory provisions and it may, where practicable, make use of such machinery as is already provided by legislation. The Grievance Machinery can be availed of on the receipt by the worker of the order causing a grievance. The operation of the order, however, need not be held up till the grievance machinery is completely exhausted. Wherever possible, attempts should be made to complete the grievance procedure between the time the order is passed and when it is acted upon.

(2) Need to make the machinery simple and expeditious

(a) As far as possible, grievances should be settled at the lowest level.

(b) No matter should ordinarily be taken up at more than two levels, i.e., normally there should be only one appeal.

(c) Different types of grievances may be referred to appropriate authorities.

(d) A grievance must be redressed as expeditiously as possible and towards this end, the employer, in consultation with the workers, should decide upon the time limit required for settling a grievance.

(3) Designation of authorities

The workmen must know the authorities to be approached and it should, therefore, be incumbent on the management to designate the authorities to be contacted at various levels.

It may be useful to classify grievances as those arising from personal relationship and others arising out of conditions of employment. In the former case, a grievance should be taken up, in the first instance, with the authority in the line management immediately above the officers against whom the complaint is made. Thereafter, the matter may go to the Grievance Committee comprising representatives of management and workers. The size and composition of the Committee shall be decided at the unit level (ANNEXURE C below). Other grievances should be taken up, in the first instance, with the authority designated by the management.

Thereafter, a reference may be made to the Grievance Committee. Where the matter goes to the Grievance Committee in the first instance, an appeal shall lie with the top management.

Annexure C

Constitution of grievance committee

(1) In the case where the Union is recognised

Two representatives of management plus a union representative and the union departmental representative of the department in which the workmen concerned work.

(2) ln the case where the union is not recognised or there is no union but there is a works committee

Two representatives of management plus the representatives of the department of the workman concerned on the works committee plus either the Secretary or Vice-President of the Works Committee (this is in the case the Secretary of the works committee is also the workman's departmental representative).

It is suggested that in the case of the management, their representatives should be the departmental head plus the official who dealt with the matter at the first stage, or the personnel officer should act as an adviser. The size of the 'Grievance Committee' should be limited to a maximum of four to six; otherwise it becomes unwieldy.

ANNEXURE VII FUNCTIONS OF WORKS COMMITTEES

Conclusions of the Tripartite Committee on Works Committees

(Seventeenth Session—I.L.C Decision 1959)

It was agreed that it was not practicable to draw up an exhaustive list of the functions of Works Committees. There should be some flexibility of approach for the system to work properly. Illustrative lists of items which the Works Committee should normally deal with and those which it should not normally deal with were drawn up and approved. It was agreed that the demarcation would not be rigid and the approved lists were flexible.

I. Illustrative list of items which Works Committees will normally deal with

1. Conditions of work such as ventilation, lighting, temperature and sanitation including latrines and urinals.
2. Amenities such as drinking water, canteens, dining rooms, creches, rest rooms, medical and health services.
3. Safety and accident prevention, occupational diseases and protective equipment.
4. Adjustment of festival and national holidays.
5. Administration of welfare and fine funds.
6. Educational and recreational activities, such as libraries, reading rooms, cinema shows, sports, games, picnic parties, community welfare and celebrations.
7. Promotion of thrift and savings.
8. Implementation and review of decisions arrived at meetings of Works Committees.

II. List of items which the Works Committees will not normally deal with

1. Wages and allowances.
2. Bonus and profit sharing schemes.
3. Rationalisation and matters connected with the fixation of workload.
4. Matters connected with the fixation of standard labour force.
5. Programmes of planning and development.
6. Matters connected with retrenchment and lay-off.
7. Victimisation for trade union activities.
8. Provident Fund, gratuity schemes and other retiring benefits.
9. Quantum of leave and national and festival holidays.
10. Incentive schemes.
11. Housing and transport services.

ANNEXURE IX RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE 15TH SESSION OF THE INDIAN LABOUR CONFERENCE REGARDING NEED BASED MINIMUM WAGE

It was agreed that the minimum wage was 'need-based' and should ensure the minimum human needs of the industrial worker, irrespective of any other consideration. To calculate the minimum wage, the Committee accepted the following norms and recommended that they should guide all wage fixing authorities, including minimum wage committees, wage boards, adjudicators, etc. :—

(i) in calculating the minimum wage, the standard working-class family should be taken to consist of 3 consumption units for one earner; the earnings of women, children and adolescents should be disregarded;

(ii) minimum food requirements should be calculated on the basis of a net intake of 2,700 calories, as recommended by Dr. Aykroyd, for an average Indian adult of moderate activity;

(iii) clothing requirements should be estimated at a per capita consumption of 18 yards per annum which would give for the average worker's family of four, a total of 72 yards;

(iv) in respect of housing the norm should be the minimum rent charged by Government in any area for houses provided under the Subsidised Industrial Housing Scheme for low-income groups; and

(v) fuel, lighting and other 'miscellaneous' items of expenditure should constitute 20 per cent of the total minimum wage.

While agreeing to these guidelines for fixation of the minimum wage for industrial workers throughout the country, the Committee recognised the existence of instances where difficulties might be experienced in implementing these recommendations. Wherever the minimum wage fixed went below the recommendations, it would be incumbent on the authorities concerned to justify the circumstances which prevented them from adherence to the norms laid down.

ANNEXURE X DEFINITION OF MINIMUM, FAIR & LIVING WAGES AS GIVEN BY THE FAIR WAGES COMMITTEE REPORT, 1948

(a) Minimum Wage: We consider that a minimum wage must provide not merely for the bare sustenance of life but for the preservation of the efficiency of the worker. For this purpose the minimum wage must also provide for some measure of education, medical requirements and amenities.

(b) Living Wage: "..... the living wage should enable the male earner to provide for himself and his family not merely the bare essentials of food, clothing and shelter but a measure of frugal comfort including education for his children, protection against ill-health, requirements of essential social needs and a measure of insurance against the more important misfortunes including old age."

(c) Fair Wage: While the lower limit of the fair wage must obviously be the minimum wage, the upper limit is equally set by what may broadly be called the capacity of industry to pay. This will depend not only on the present economic position of the industry but on its future prospects. Between these two limits the actual wages will depend on a consideration of the following factors and in the light of the comments given below:

(i) the productivity of labour;

(ii) the prevailing rates of wages in the same or similar occupations in the same or neighbouring localities;

(iii) the level of the national income and its distribution; and the place of the industry in the economy of the country.

ANNEXURE XI RATIONALISATION—THE RECOMMENDATION OF THE FIFTEENTH SESSION OF THE INDIAN LABOUR CONFERENCE

The recommendations of the Conference Committee on the subject as adopted by the Conference are as follows:—
The Second Five Year Plan stressed the need for promoting increased productivity for the general benefit of the community, the enterprise and the workers. In this context, rationalisation, that is better utilisation of men, machines and management in industrial undertakings, has assumed great importance. The Committee discussed the content of rationalisation and the procedure to be followed by establishments which proposed to introduce schemes involving higher productivity. It was emphasised and agreed that Government might make arrangements to ensure that measures of rationalisation which did not serve real economic interest in the existing conditions of the country might be avoided. This and what follows would be applicable even in the case of units which have already taken initial steps to introduce rationalisation but have not completed the process. The Committee agreed on the basis provided for this purpose in paragraphs 28 and 29 in the Chapter on Labour Policy and Programmes in the Second Five Year Plan and emphasised particularly that:—

(i) there should be no retrenchment or loss of earnings of the existing employees i.e. the full complement required for the operations before rationalisation should be maintained except for cases of natural separation or wastage. Workers could, however, be provided with suitable alternative jobs in the same establishment or under the same employer, subject to agreement between the employer and his workers;

(ii) there should be an equitable sharing of benefits of rationalisation as between the community, the employer and the worker; and

(iii) there should be a proper assessment of work-load made by an expert or experts mutually agreed upon and also suitable improvement in the working conditions.

Subject to the above conditions, the following broad procedure was suggested to smoothen the progress of rationalisation. The union or unions in an undertaking and the employer could enter into a working arrangement on the following lines:—

(i) the company may seek to make such changes in machinery, lay-out and organisation as it deems necessary for efficient operation of machinery and rational use of labour and material without prejudice to the provisions of any law for the time being in force and subject to the provisions of the working arrangement;

(ii) before any such changes is effected, the company shall give reasonable notice, ranging from three weeks to three months, to the union(s) of its intention to effect the change. The notice shall be in a form mutually agreed upon and shall contain full information regarding the nature of the proposed change, approximate date of such change, proposed duties for workers concerned and their job assignment and the expected earnings. Where, however, an appropriate procedure for notice of change exists under the current legislation, the same should be observed in preference to the above;

(iii) the employer shall also furnish information regarding the change and the reduction in the number of jobs and also the effect of the change on the number of jobs in other departments affected by the same change;

(iv) the employer and employees shall meet and discuss the proposal as soon as possible after the notice has been given under para (ii) above. The employer shall furnish all information necessary for a complete understanding of the proposed change and shall explain the contemplated change to the union(s);

(v) the union(s) shall, within a week after the discussion with the employer, present its views or proposals to the employer. If there is agreement between the parties, the employer may introduce the change on the due date in accordance with the agreement;

(vi) the union(s) shall be given adequate opportunity to study the new change so as to enable it to gauge the workloads and the earnings of the employees engaged in the new operation; and

(vii) if there are differences between the parties on any matter covered by this working arrangement, the matters in dispute shall be referred for arbitration or adjudication.

2 In the case of Defence undertakings, however, a special provision may have to be made.
